While on the subject of corporate concentration and attempting to control it for fairness and equity in the marketplace, the whole question of bank directorships should be considered. For many years the problem of interlocking directorships has been a matter for serious concern. We find that there are bank directors on the boards of all major corporations in this country. We are disappointed that this legislation will not prevent that state of affairs. As we see it, it would probably be desirable to bar bank directors and bank managers from the boards of other corporations. This criticism has been met with the argument that such people provide tremendous insights when operating a business or providing financial services. I would suggest to the government that such advice can be obtained in a banker-client relationship. In that particular relationship, if you provide those services through a client-relationship, you do not run the risk of conflict of interest or coercion. Therefore it would probably be advisable if we provide greater privilege and power to bankers to eliminate the conflict of interest or coercion.

● (2120)

Moving from the subject of corporate concentration, which is of particular concern, to one of social responsibilities, there is a very serious question about social responsibilities of the banking community. We have heard a number of previous speakers attest to the great job they are doing, and certainly if the measurement strictly of profit is an indicator of great success in our society, then possibly the Big Five are tremendous successes; and we have guaranteed that for them. I have mentioned previously that in return for giving that guarantee and privilege, we would like to see the exercise of responsibility.

In some of the areas there are many national goals that we all look forward to achieving in this House, as do a great many Canadians. I would suggest maybe a few of them have been preached by many sides, the Conservatives and the Liberals, as they in turn form governments. We talked about a national goal and an industrial strategy in this country. We talked about an employment strategy. I have heard representatives from both parties stand up and say they had a goal of putting Canadians back to work. We agree with these goals. They are both vitally important goals, that is to say, getting that industrial strategy under way and getting employment created. As early as today we heard about the need of regional development to provide funds in this country, in northern Canada, in western Canada, in Atlantic Canada and in Quebec. This was to provide support for areas that through a period of time have not developed in a balanced manner. Regional development is an important national goal.

Then we come to transportation and communications. Apart from the tongue in cheek double-tracking escapade during the last election campaign, there is certainly a great need for improvement in transportation, for example, the Prince Rupert port. There is needed a whole series of improvements and upgrading in the business of transportation and communications. These are national goals with which most people in this chamber would agree.

Now I would like to turn to increasing Canadian participation and control over our own economy. The last election saw the people who now sit in government in front of Canadians saying once again that Canadians must control and make decisions that affect the economy. There is too great a penetration of foreign decision making in this economy. Canadian nationalism and the economy were a great thing.

We can see parts of the country where housing is now in difficult straits. It seems to me that I read in the local paper about the "AFLOP" program and about zero vacancy rates in the area where I live. Housing is a very serious and important national goal which many of us share. The point is that we cannot keep fuelling these programs out of the public purse. The banks control an enormous amount of the nation's capital; they must become more involved and must bring their financial power to work together to achieve those national goals in a rational way.

In this House we have all said that we want to see an expanded and strengthened small business and middle-sized business program. I would suggest that no one is being hammered harder than those particular segments. Throughout the last election, and prior to it, a stream of small businessmen came through my constituency office. There was a tremendous volume of mail about the hardship which was being created by rising interest rates, especially in rural Canada where not only do small businessmen have to carry a large inventory, which does not turn over very quickly, but they must face high interest rates on that inventory. They have to face increasing transportation costs, strictly because of the oil pricing policy. The are faced with these two elements as well as a not too often sympathetic banking industry. In my riding I have had a number of experiences, and I am certain that everyone else has, where the bank has arrived on the doorstep of the small businessman and said, "My auditor just came in today. I have too many loans out. Your loan with our bank is chopped." And that was it.

One business successful for many years, with 80 employees, had the vice- president of the bank from Vancouver along with the local branch manager arrive in the office with no notice and say to the business people, "We are calling the half a million dollar loan that you have out." The gentleman replied, "I run a very important business that serves the coast of British Columbia, not just the 80 people employed in this community and all the services and maintenance we require from this area." The bank representative said "Tough." He was asked why. The bank representative said, "We have no explanation, and we are not required to give one. It is a demand loan. Goodbye. Pay the money." And that was it. That is not a very socially responsible approach. These small businessmen are faced with high interest rates, stifling freight rates, and a banking industry which can come to their doors and say that its auditors said there are too many loans out, and that they are picked to go down the drain.

An hon. Member: It is Liberal realism.

Mr. Skelly: It is not Liberal realism exactly. I am certain members opposite are as concerned about that kind of foolishness as I am. We would all like to see a more socially responsible approach, that those who consume the services of the banks in this country would have more protection, access for appeal and reconsideration, not just a blank "thank you very much, that is a demand loan and we want all the money back today regardless of the consequence on your firm, its employees and services it provides to the people of rural Canada."

We are talking about national goals and, if I may be permitted to stretch it a bit, we all want a Canadian merchant fleet. We have talked at length about that in this House. It almost came to pass. We want to see the shipbuilding industry improved. Again, it should not all be borne out of the public purse. The banks have an obligation to bring their financial muscle behind that program and we should be encouraging that through stated policies in this legislation.

In my particular riding, and in the area of B.C. that I represent along with many other members who sit in this House in two particular parties at this moment, we are concerned about the Indian communities. Time and time again leaders of the Indian communities have come in desperate need for access to capital. They are told by the government to go out and make plans. Those communities that plan properly will be given access to capital to carry out those plans. I submit that Indian communities have done a tremendous amount of planning and hoping. They want the kinds of benefits that are available in other communities. Every time they arrive on the doorstep for assistance from the government for access to capital, they are told to go and whistle.

The banks could play a substantial role, with the assistance of public direction, in providing the desperately needed capital in Indian communities. It would be interesting to see the government comment on a situation like that. These communities need housing. They need developments in their infrastructure. Basically they need capital for economic development to put Indian people back to work. It is an interesting side feature that we do not really seriously consider Indian employment in terms of things they are able to develop and promote and improve themselves. We do not even include Indian unemployment in our statistics, and yet it is a most serious unemployment situation in my riding and in the ridings of many people from that area.

There has not been much social responsibility in banking, not because the banks are basically evil or malicious, but the lust for profit is there. If the banks are allowed the opportunity, they will certainly follow the path of least resistance to reach that profit. Development in the areas I have talked about is vital to a balanced development of the Canadian economy. Unfortunately, they are not the most profitable and they even carry a slightly greater risk. Through this particular piece of legislation I think that we could encourage the banks to participate more fully in developing and balancing the economy of Canada.

● (2130)

A further question is the one of consumer protection. We mentioned the whole business of disclosure of information. Perhaps I might be permitted a moment to take a look at the entire question of consumer protection in relation to banking.

Consumers who are users of the banking system can make intelligent choices about the services only when working with adequate information. Under consumer protection we feel that banks must disclose for the individual consumer in that bank, general credit policies and lending guidelines, all terms and conditions for borrowers including related and additional charges, for depositors the terms and conditions of savings accounts or other savings instruments such as RRSPs, all terms and conditions of mortgage lending, general advertising policies, policies of providing information to creditors, credit agencies or others, policy of retaining customer records and maintaining confidentiality.

Another question about consumer protection is the entire business of the credit card industry. It appears today that the banks, through the promotion of convenience credit, have more than 10 million cards in the hands of Canadians. About 48 per cent of the respondents to a Canadian Consumers' Association survey in Toronto in 1975 said they had experienced billing problems with their cards. Only 61 per cent of those errors were corrected within a month. The number of personal bankruptcies in 1978 was 15,800. Did you say good?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No.

Mr. Skelly: I thought I heard him say good.

Mr. Kempling: No.

Mr. Skelly: That is acceptable. We are travelling on the same track. Interest rates on Chargex and Master Charge as of April 1, 1980, were 21 per cent and are expected to rise to nearly 26 per cent. Personal indebtedness, ordinary personal loans from chartered banks, not including mortgages, totalled approximately $25 billion. Again we need better information about the cost of those loans. There should be a lot more work on credit counselling by banks.

The whole question comes back again to concentration. That worries me as much as anything. The banks through their involvement with Visa and Master Charge, have compelled many customers to use that. There are services one can no longer acquire in this country unless you can provide a credit card. It is difficult. It is more than the path of least resistance. The next few years will probably see a disappearance of a lot more of the services you can acquire with cash or cheque. If you can present Master Charge, you can certainly have it, if you are willing to become involved in personal debt.

This is fine for most people. Unfortunately, the tremendous compulsion to use those, the encouragement to spend more and more through the use of Chargex and Master Charge and the various other devices, are a serious problem. We will see bankruptcies rise. We will all pay for those costs.

The question of the credit card system will fuel the whole business of inflation. It will increase bankruptcies. As far as I am concerned, and many of the people I have spoken to about this, the banks should be driven out of this area, even though it happens to be one of the most lucrative. This type of credit should be provided as is necessary. Mechanisms such as lower interest rates, compelling them to charge much lower rates, will make it much less desirable to push credit at people, in fact to exploit people with it.

When you go into a major department store they no longer ask whether you will pay cash. They ask, "Can I put it on your charge card?" The financial aspect of that is that it is one of the highest earning departments in any retail store. You might consider requiring a small down payment. I wonder what would happen to inflation and the national debt if we were to attempt to regulate the whole business of credit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): I thought the time would never come, Mr. Speaker, because listening to the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), I wondered where it was going to end. I can only say that he reminds me of the poet who wrote:

He is so pure, as pure as can be,
For he is a member of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Author?

Mr. Kempling: I will take the credit for that. I just want to comment on the hon. member's remarks. I am no apologist for the banks—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: You do not have to use that credit card if you do not want to. It is there for your convenience. You do not have to pay the interest if you pay your account at the end of the month. What the hon. member might try some time is going into a store with cash. It is amazing what you can do with cash.

When I go into a store wanting to make a major purchase, I say, "How much is it for cash, and I mean cash. I will count it out for you." I recently went to one of the largest department stores in Canada. I wanted to purchase an appliance for my wife. I asked the appliance manager how much for cash. He said it is the same price. I said, "Here is my card. When you get around to deciding whether you want to sell me for cash or what, and what discount you will give me for cash, call me." I had a call within six hours, and the price for cash was considerably less.

I have to chuckle at the hon. member for Comox-Powell River. He talks about having to go through this process all over again. He says there have not been fair and equitable hearings. Let me tell him that I do not recall one member of the NDP turning up at any of the hearings we had, and I sat on all of them. We had representations from all of the banks, including foreign banks. I did not see anybody from the NDP. I did not see anyone there when we were examining briefs. They were not there when we did the committee report. They just were not there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: You can holler all you like. Look at the record. It is there. For some new member to come into the House and say that since 1976 this matter has not had an adequate airing in the House of Commons and has not been heard adequately, is a lot of nonsense. It has been heard. I hope that the House will act with a certain amount of dispatch after it gets rid of a couple of items that seem to be bothering us, and let the Bank Act get on its way and into operation. I believe the passage of the Bank Act is more important than the minister's budget, whenever he brings the other half of it down. This is the engine. This is what makes our business operate.

I want to deal with a couple of specific items in the Bank Act. My colleagues covered much of the hearings and the witnesses we had before us, as well as the submissions we received from foreign banks and so forth. I want to deal specifically with one section that we have changed. That is the old section 88 of the existing act which is now section 177 in the bill before us.

When we did some research on this portion of the act. We discovered how it had found its way into the Canadian act. It was lifted out of a British statute that went back to 1815 and had been substantially unchanged since that time. It was a means of allowing a manufacturer or producer to offer as collateral to the bank his work in progress or his raw materials.

A businessman may go into the bank and say to the bank manager that he wants to use section 88. As far as he is concerned, that is a form that the bank has which you fill out and sign. There is a lot of legalese and words in there, which he does not understand and I do not understand. He knows it has to be signed if you are going to pledge the work in progress or raw material as part of your collateral for the loan he is going to give you.

I think the minister is a reasonable person. What we were trying to bring before the committee was that commerce has changed a lot in this country since 1858 and that a large segment of our economy is now engaged in what I call loosely the buy-sell business—they buy material from various parts of the country and from outside the country and they service and sell it to businessmen. They are faced with a particular problem today because the banks really have no way of taking their inventories as collateral except when they take a floating charge debenture. They allow them actually about 30 per cent of real value. A businessman, say, has $750,000 tied up in inventory upon which he will only get around $215,000 from the bank when it gives him an allowance for collateral purposes.

We find that in most other jurisdictions merchandisers, wholesale or retail, can go to the bank and upon convincing the manager of the quality and freshness of the inventory, can sometimes get 75 per cent or 80 per cent. That is a matter between the banker and a businessman. We have no mechanism for doing this. We suggested, and, fortunately, the members of the committee agreed, that we should amend section 88, and we have now added wholesale and retail services to that section as far as inventory is concerned.

I think few people realize how important it is that the wholesaler or the retailer now has available to him, provided he can get the auditor to verify the value of his inventory and the bank manager has adequate confidence in the businessman and his auditor, a medium of collateral beyond the 30 per cent he would normally get. If we can get this going it will do a tremendous amount for wholesale and retail trade in this country and will help a lot to prevent many of the bankruptcies which are now occurring since, in most cases, bankruptcies come about through lack of working capital.

Another thing a lot of people do not realize is that the cost of carrying inventory in past years used to be borne to some extent by the manufacturer. Today it is not carried by the manufacturer at all because of a change in the style of manufacturing. Hon. members may recall when President Nixon brought in the 10 per cent surcharge on imports and then, along with it, passed Disc legislation which allowed American companies which manufacture and sell to a Disc corporation to retain 50 per cent of the profits they made from exports interest-free, at the pleasure of the President. The effect has been to put into the pocket of the American manufacturers, in this case, a source of funding at no interest; members can imagine what assistance this is to a manufacturing company.

The American supplier utilizes this advantage by taking an order from a Canadian consumer or a Canadian wholesaler and trades it at the bank, using it as part of his justification for getting funds from his bank in the United States. He will take an order to his bank manager, supply a history of his client—how long he has been doing business with him and the history of his payment record—and is then able to get an advance of funds for the operation of his business. Then, when he produces his product, he does not put it in inventory; as soon as it comes out from the production line it is shipped, in this case to the Canadian wholesaler, and it is the wholesaler who carries the cost of the inventory. But you see, Mr. Speaker, the wholesaler has no way to react to these circumstances. He has no source of funds unless he wants to invest his own money in the transaction. He has no way of getting funds through his bank to enable him to carry that inventory. So we were looking again at section 88, and that is another reason why we decided to amend it.

We heard a little rumble a year or so ago about section 177—we heard there were some people in the other place who were not very happy with it. In fact they wanted to change it back to the old section 88. They did not want that wording changed at all. As it turned out, the Canadian Retailers Association heard about the good things in section 177 and the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen heard about it too. They descended on Ottawa and wanted to meet with the banking committee in the other place to tell them a few of the facts of life about wholesaling and retailing in Canada. Of course members of the committee backed off when they saw there was some objection. We hope they have seen the light and that when the bill comes before their assembly they will allow it to pass without changing that section or sending it back to us for further debate.

I want to say something about leasing because we have had a number of discussions with the Canadian Federation of Automobile Dealers about leasing and about their concerns, particularly at the present time in the light of difficulties experienced by automobile dealers in coping with the down-turn in the economy. A lot of the dealers tell us that about 25 per cent of their income is derived from leasing and they are very concerned that the banks intend to move into this field and take a good deal of it away from them. Indeed, when our hearings were going on, one of the chartered banks told us they were planning to place a leasing officer in every branch across the country and that they were actively going out to seek the leasing business.

As other members have mentioned, the Royal Bank of Canada has sought to line up dealers to supply them with automobiles at a few dollars over cost and perform service for them at a 20 per cent discount, or something along those lines. This is really not the business of the banks at all. So we intend to press the minister to get the leasing provisions amended. This is one of the few points we are concerned about—getting that leasing matter dealt with. We think leasing should stay with the dealers. We believe that automobiles and light trucks up to maybe 16,000 GPW should stay with the dealers, and that the heavy trucks and the large ticket items should be made available to the banks.

I might say that the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen has carried out a survey in the last month, I believe. The results were in today, and I understand that 67 per cent of the small businessmen across this country indicated in the ballot that they do not want to see the chartered banks in the leasing field. I think the minister is a reasonable person, and I believe he will listen to that opinion and accept an amendment which would allow the banks to stay out of the leasing field and not get as involved in it as they thought they were. Car dealers have told us that the banks in fact have been raiding some of the leasing companies and taking some of their personnel, and that they are really ready to go into leasing in a big way. We think this is not a good move.

There was some concern expressed about the computer services that they were going to offer as well. I just bought a computer at my own business about a year ago. I recall going to the bank and telling them that we were buying. We had to talk to them because we were buying the computer, and it was quite expensive. They immediately said, "Well, why buy a computer; use our service". One of the things we have to remember is that we have to be flexible enough to move. We do not have to stay with one bank all the time. My concern was that if I had all my records tied up in the computer system of the bank and I wanted to move to another bank, I would have quite some difficulty doing that, so I chose to stay out of that and to use my own computer. Then, if I choose to go from one bank to another, I will.

I find that Canadian businessmen have a fixation about banks. Many of them come into my office, and they are always blaming everything on the banker. Sometimes it is the banker's fault, but it is not always his fault. Many times it is the businessman's fault. What I tell them is that if they have an idea and they are going to the bank for financing and they have it all written down and laid out so the banker can take it and explain to the people he has to deal with—maybe his regional manager or whoever it is above him who approves loans—he has to have something to pass on to him then. If the matter is explained in a reasonable way and the banker turns the applicant down, he should not become despondent. There are five or six other banks. He should just go to another one. If they all turn him down, he should go back and have a look at the concept of what he is doing. However, because someone turns him down, that is not the end of the line. I have been turned down many times, and sometimes when I have sat back and looked at it, I was glad I was turned down.

The fact is that if you do not try and do not venture, you should not blame the bank. If it turns you down, look at another one, refine your presentation and have another go at it.

The hon. member for Comox-Powell River talked about consumer protection.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He is gone.

Mr. Kempling: Well, he is really gone then. He talked about consumer protection. My gracious, I think the last bank which went bankrupt in Canada was the Home Bank in Hamilton in about 1921. It was taken over by the Commerce. I do not believe that a depositor in Canada has lost one penny as a result of bankruptcies in banks, so if we are looking at consumer protection from the point of view of the depositor at the bank, we have no worry. Part of that is due to the way banks are run, and part of it is due to the Bank Act and the way it has been administered. I do not find that consumer protection is much of a problem.

The hon. member went on to talk about requiring the interest rate to be stated. That is the law today. If the hon. member really knew what he was talking about, he would know that when you go to get a loan it is required that you be told what the interest rate is. It is there in the law now.

With regard to finding out what is on your record, most provinces in this country have legislation which requires banks to show us what is on our records, if that is what is concerning us. In fact most credit agencies are happy to have people come in asking to see their credit records because the credit agencies want them to be as accurate as possible. I do not really follow what the hon. member is getting at.

In his speech the hon. member kept talking about control, control, force and compel. That is the old NDP line that we have heard in this House so many times. They talk freedom and democracy out of one side of their mouths, and control, control, and compel out of the other.

Mrs. Mitchell: Justice, justice, justice.

Mr. Kempling: And they spit seeds out the middle.

With this Bank Act there has to be more competition in banking. There is no doubt about that. We are letting foreign banks into the country because our banks are operating outside the country. It is on a kind of reciprocal basis. At least that is the spirit that we adopted in the committee. We felt that we should have reciprocity. If Canadian banks are going to operate in other countries, we should have some sort of reciprocity here.

However, I want to see our banks involved more in exporting, particularly in the small business sector. There is no reason why they cannot get involved in that. They all show export financing in their services, and yet when you go and talk to them about it, they do not seem to have anyone there on the spot who can tell you too much about it.

I think I would rather see them keep out of leasing activities and have them concentrate more on export financing. Our long-term finance market is gone. I would like to see them more into that area.

I noted the small business development bond which the minister smuggled into his economic comments a week or so ago, which he took from the minister of finance of the previous government, which I am sure he got from some other place—I do not think anybody can claim authorship of that idea—but I hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will encourage, through the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks of this country to go after this small business development bond.

I hear—and I hope I am hearing wrong—that some people inside the department are not too excited about this small business development bond. I hear that perhaps some of the banks might not be too enamoured because they are holding colectively about $12 billion to $13 billion in term preferreds on which they pay no tax on the interest that they gather on them. Of course this small business development bond is in the same category. Regardless of that, that is the engine which will drive this economy for the next few years, and I certainly hope that the minister will see the wisdom of encouraging that sort of activity on the part of the banks; and let them keep out of leasing.

Hon. members will recall that when we let the banks into the mortgage field, the thought of the day was that with their vast resources mortgages would be a lot cheaper. The reality is that there is about a quarter-point spread between the mortgages we get from chartered banks and what we get from mortgage companies. When we questioned the banks about that, their reply was that if they go down any lower than that, they will be accused of driving mortgage companies out of business, which is not the way it was supposed to work. Everyone thought that with their vast amount of resources the banks would be able to provide mortgages at lower rates of interest and that that would help the housing industry and help Canadians get housing as they needed it.

I know we are going to present an amendment. I do not know what the progress of the bill will be. I assume it will go to committee. I do not think we are anticipating long hearings, and I hope the minister will look seriously at our amendment on the basis that the general opinion across this country is that the banks should not be in automobile and light truck leasing. They should be out of that field altogether. It should be left to the people who know that business. If they will do that, I think perhaps we can make some progress.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—AID TO CHRYSLER CANADA—IMPACT ON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 2, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) why he had apparently completely ignored the request of a successful, growing, Canadian-owned company for aid in expanding its product line. His answer to this question was completely unsatisfactory. He ignored the question, and this, together with similar evasive answers by the minister over the past two or three weeks, has caused me to rise tonight to comment on this issue.

Let me put the matter in some perspective. First, the aid to Chrysler, rumoured to be in the range of $200 million to $250 million, compares with the programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the following way. The total budgetary and non-budgetary estimates for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce were $508 million, and for DREE, $562 million. Of that amount in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, $200 million will be by way of grants and contributions. I ask the minister whether he had stopped to consider the impact of this Chrysler aid within his over-all budget. The Chrysler aid represents an enormous part of the budget in two key economic development departments.

Second, Chrysler has had a somewhat checkered existence in recent years. This is the third time that Chrysler has suffered financial problems in the past ten years. Each time the problem gets worse.

Clearly any aid to Chrysler Canada is very significant in relation to over-all Government of Canada industrial development programs. There is also significant risk that Chrysler will be back to the trough again. Thus the decision that the government makes must be viewed with concern since the decision made today may well be the precursor of a similar decision in the future.

I have tried to obtain from the minister answers to the following questions. Out of what fiscal envelope will Chrysler aid be provided, the economic development envelope or the social welfare envelope? Will any aid to Chrysler have an adverse impact on other economic development programs? Putting it quite simply, will the provision of aid to Chrysler result in fewer economic development dollars being available for other programs? I have pointed out one unfortunate situation, that of CAE Industries, which was ignored completely by the minister. What is the significance of this lack of attention? Is the government considering any alternative ways of dealing with the very serious problem of lay-offs and long-term unemployment in the automobile industry?

The minister today made the ridiculous statement that he would report to the House by the time of the question period. To date he has said nothing to the House by the time of the question period. I have learned more about Chrysler from reading the newspapers. It is essential that we have a full debate in the House on the aid program. What impact will it have on small business? What impact will it have on high technology industry support? What impact will it have on other assistance in Ontario? What impact will it have on other parts of the country? These are all very important questions.

I can understand the reluctance of the minister in commenting on particular aspects of current negotiations, but I cannot understand him stonewalling me on these broader questions. Is there any reason for his attitude? Either the answers to these questions will arouse unfavourable comment from Canadians at large, or the minister has not directed his attention to them.

Prior to the election, and even since 1971, the Liberals have been calling for an industrial strategy in this country. What is that strategy and where does aid to Chrysler fit in it? It is sad to say that we are facing here one of the most significant economic development decisions that any government has made in this country, and there is no comprehensive economic strategy within which to judge the merits of the decision. I can only discuss the matter in the context of certain statements made by the minister and others on his side in recent days. Industrial strategy usually requires that aid be given to growing companies, to the winners. Chrysler is clearly not a winner. How, therefore, is aid to Chrysler being tailored to ensure that Chrysler will become a winner?

The hon. minister has championed the cause of Canadian-owned companies in his comments on industrial strategy. How does aid to Chrysler fit within these policies? Why has he ignored a growing, successful Canadian-owned company which needed a nominal amount of capital to provide 200 to 400 jobs and some $20 million to $30 million in new business? The inconsistency is alarming. It took a statement by the president of that company that the business had been lost to evoke any reaction from the minister.

Support for small business is, and always will be, a key to any sound industrial strategy. Will the aid to Chrysler inhibit the government from supporting small business? If the money available for small business is not forthcoming because of the aid provided to Chrysler, one can be sure that the outcome will be received in a very negative way by the small business community, and rightly so.

I have asked many questions. I have not in any way tried to disrupt the negotiations which are currently under way. The purpose of these questions is to try to understand the framework within which the government is making this very far-reaching decision. It is critically important that this be done prior to the decision being made. It is impossible now for Canadians to indicate whether or not they support in principle the aid to Chrysler, since they do not know what this aid entails.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Trade): Mr. Speaker, first I thank the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) for giving me the opportunity of addressing my peers for the first time in this Parliament. I should like to reassure him and say that, contrary to what he seems to think, if anyone in this House cares about developing a coherent strategy for the automobile industry, for very obvious reasons, Mr. Speaker, it certainly is the Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). Moreover, on Friday, May 2, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre brought up the matter of the CAE Industries application for a subsidy, so that the federal government would in fact supply almost all the funds and capital investments needed to meet the requirements of General Motors which had offered the two companies the possibility of making automobile parts, specially those for the transmission of the model now being produced by GM known as the new energy-efficient front-wheel X model.

CAE Industries applied under the business development program and I would remind the hon. member—he probably knows that already and I am somewhat surprised that he did not raise that point in his speech—that that program cannot help in terms of direct capital investments, but only in terms of guaranteed loans or in research and development. Therefore, that program can be of no use to CAE Industries because of the terms of reference given by the House. However, the minister, in the name of the government, has stated several times his intention to help Canadian businesses which produce spare parts for the automotive industry and to act in such a manner as to increase Canada's share of the spare parts market. Through the minister the government has been asked for ad hoc help for that company and a cabinet decision is pending. Therefore, contrary to what the member for Etobicoke Centre said, if possible we firmly intend to help that firm but we cannot do so under the business development program which does not meet the requirements of the application for subsidy presented by CAE Industries.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS—FUNDING OF VANCOUVER ART GALLERY

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): During the last few days I have been trying to determine, in question period, the intent of this government concerning certain commitments made by the previous administration on the financing of arts and sports projects from Loto Canada funds. I find the answers to these questions uninformative and unsatisfactory.

On April 22, I asked the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) whether it was his intention to honour the commitment made by his predecessor to provide $4 million toward the conversion of the old court house into Vancouver's art gallery. In reply the minister indicated that such financial pledges were merely campaign commitments and that they were being reviewed as such.

On May 1, I asked the minister responsible for sports or the Secretary of State whether the government intended to cash the $6.4 million cheque that had been sent to the federal government by the provinces as the federal share of Loto Canada funds. In reply the minister responsible for sports indicated that the government did not intend to cash the cheque until the legal position of the agreement between the former administration and the provinces on Loto Canada had been established.

In reply to a supplementary question the Secretary of State reaffirmed that any decision on the art gallery or similar projects must await the possible jurisdictional dispute between the federal government and the provinces over Loto-Canada. We might wait forever. The issue is very simple. Will the government meet the commitments of the former administration and put up the funds for these projects?

I am particularly concerned about the federal financing of the Vancouver art gallery. This cannot be dismissed as a campaign promise. The first request for federal funds for the art gallery was made two years ago to the former Liberal administration. Subsequently, nearly $12 million has been pledged from private donations and municipal and provincial pledges, all awaiting confirmation that the federal government will come through with the promised $4 million. If the federal government money is not forthwith coming we are in the ridiculous position of having to return to the private sector the $5 million that it has contributed for the art gallery.

For the record, I would like to read the chronology of the Vancouver art gallery funding. The timing of events is as follows. In 1978 the gallery requested $4.5 million from the Liberal government. The rationale for this request was that the federal government had made similar grants across the country, particularly for Montreal and for the Ontario art gallery in Toronto. Vancouver was the last major city to be without an adequate facility and it was not unreasonable to request funds from the federal government. The amount of the request was in the order of magnitude of those for other galleries, and it is our turn.

At the same time, in 1978, a request to the provincial government was made for a grant, plus the value of the land on which the old court house stands. Subsequently, Vancouver city committed funds from the sale of the present gallery site.

In 1979 the gallery went public to raise $2.5 million. The very successful "Take the art gallery to court" campaign was launched and actually raised $5 million from the enthusiastic citizens of Vancouver between April and August of 1979, of which $2.5 million was set aside for the purchase of Canadian art.

In January, 1980, the former secretary of state, David MacDonald, announced a grant totalling $4 million in the form of $1 million per year. At the end of March, 1980, the provincial government committed $2 million, contingent on federal government funds.

We now have a situation where nearly $12 million has been pledged for both the gallery and the art bank, all awaiting confirmation of the federal government's $4 million. The delay is costly. A conservative estimate is that the delay is costing us about $100,000 per month.

If the art gallery does not go ahead, Vancouver will lose employment opportunities in cultural industries, a show case for major exhibits, such as the King Tut exhibit which attracts tourists, $2.5 million in grants for the art bank, $2.5 million in private pledges, $2 million from the provincial government, the site of the old court house, and $4.6 million from the city of Vancouver.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the time has come to end this uncertainty and proceed with this project now while these pledges are available.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to clear up—I would not go so far as to say misunderstandings—the thinking of the hon. member who just spoke. Her thoughts on this subject are not very clear. I should like to emphasize that we are dealing not with government commitments but with election promises. That is very much part of the problem.

During the election campaign the former secretary of state went across the country promising a great many things. I note there was $3 million for an art centre in Thunder Bay; $500,000 in Vancouver for the Waterfront Theatre, and another $4 million in Vancouver for the art gallery. That was all very nice, but these were election promises and nothing more. At no time did the Conservative cabinet commit themselves to these projects, and at no time did the previous government give the projects Treasury Board or cabinet approval. In fact if the hon. member would take the time to look again at the wording of the former minister's press release she will note that all that was said was that the former minister was "—prepared to allocate up to $4 million" under "—a proposed federal program." There was no commitment on the part of the former government—again, only election promises.

Even more important, Mr. Speaker, is a subject that has been brought up by the hon. member—the question of the fairness of the Loto Canada agreement. Under that agreement $12 million would be allocated to arts and culture. Was this, in fact, the best deal for the cultural community? Had this agreement with the provinces not been made, it is estimated that 30 per cent of the total net revenues from Loto Canada would have been allocated to arts and culture on an annual basis. Loto Canada estimated this amount at $30 million. Even a more conservative estimate, forecasting increased competition in the lottery field, would estimate the yield to arts and culture being no less than $19.5 million per year. In fact the arts and culture community lost financing during the period of the last government.

These figures must be taken into account, Mr. Speaker. The government must be sure that the Loto Canada agreement negotiated by the previous government was the best deal for the people of Canada and gives a fair share to both federal and provincial governments. As soon as the issue concerning the distribution of the Loto Canada funds is resolved, the government will be in a position to reassess the capital project requests that have come from across the country. I must point out to the House that there are over 60 applications outstanding for these funds. The government would be in a far better position to meet those requests if the previous government had not, through its Loto Canada agreement, reduced the funds that would have been available to the arts community from Loto Canada.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—REPORTED MERCURY POISONING OF NORTHERN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RESIDENTS—ACTION TO PREVENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, one of the observations of a report published by the Department of Health and Welfare entitled "Methylmercury in Canada" about a month ago, states that mercury levels being found in some individuals in northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec are a significant health risk, and that it is probable that some may show early or mild symptoms of mercury poisoning. The report concluded that even though milder forms of mercury poisoning quite possibly are occurring, it is difficult to prove it conclusively.

On April 29, 1980, the McGill University study on the effects of methylmercury poisoning on the health of residents in certain Quebec Indian communities was released. It found that there was an association between some of the neurological findings and estimated exposure to methylmercury. More surveillance of the population was recommended, and I concur, Mr. Speaker. But, in the end, it is not enough to describe a problem well. The politics of description is the classic liberal, social, scientific approach to the problem. Description changes nothing; only action does that.

In reply to my question in the House the other day the minister said she would have to wait until this last report was released. It has been released now, and we on this side of the House expect an answer. Therefore, I ask again what new steps are the minister and her department taking to stop the systematic poisoning of residents in northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec.

Pollution of our environment, especially that pollution already there in damaging proportions, is one of the most difficult, most frustrating and most tragic problems that industrialized countries will likely ever have to face. Make no mistake about it, we will have to face it. To be fair to the government, there are no easy solutions. There is no invisible hand which will correct, what has been for a long time, a serious predicament for the residents of northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec.

The situation as I see it is this: that innumerable studies have shown inconclusive but nevertheless significant evidence that poisoning of the river systems of northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec by methylmercury has affected deleteriously the health of the native population of the area. We have two sets of facts before us that should move the government to meaningful action.

First, we know that enormous amounts of mercury have been dumped and are continuing to be dumped into river systems. Second, we know that mercury poisoning causes certain types of symptoms, many of which have been observed in places like Grassy Narrows, White Dog, and Mistassini. We know from the Japanese experience the fact that Minimata disease frequently appears only after years and years of eating contaminated fish.

I find myself wondering whether or not this government is going to act only when we do have conclusive scientific findings, when mental and physical abnormalities in children and adults can be proven to be caused by methylmercury poisoning. This burden of proof set-up that finds us in this, as in other environmental issues, waiting to die in order to prove that we are being killed, is morally depraved. It seems that society is willing to accept these risks, as they are euphemistically called, associated with its economic development and standard of living, and this government reflects this willingness to accept these risks. But risks to whom? In this case it is the powerless people who are on the periphery of our industrial society, almost untouched by its benefits but burdened with its wastes. While we unjustly force these people to take the present risks, I think it important to remind ourselves that if this madness keeps up we will all be forced to accept these kinds of risks in one way or another.

I wonder what would happen if our response to the problem would be any different if this situation were occurring in any one of our large cities? My guess is that the response would not be all that different. So charges of racism in this question are appropriate on the one hand but overplayed on the other, because no matter who the people are or how well they are integrated into our economy, their health would also be risked for the sake of a system that puts profits ahead of people. For all its ugliness, racism has at least a human quality. But what sort of inhuman system do we live in when nobody matters, when nothing interferes with the system? This indeed brings new meaning to the phrase "systematic poisoning".

I am not hopeful that this government will take meaningful action until it changes its attitude toward the problem of pollution and how to stop it. The government must stop describing the situation and start prescribing for it with courage and foresight. Instead, Liberal and Conservative federal and provincial governments have taken the view that the public should pay for the costs of suppressing industrial pollution because the public benefits from the reduction of pollution.

Liberal and Conservative governments use tax credits and public subsidies as instruments of policy to protect the environment. I submit that this is destroying our environment. It is no surprise that this government is continuing this dangerous path. For instance, witness the latest government giveaway to Great Lakes Forest Products Limited which recently bought out Reed Paper—of $38 million, $25.3 million from the Conservative government of Ontario and $12.7 million from this Liberal government in Ottawa, ostensibly to be used as an incentive grant to help rebuild its facilities at Dryden and Thunder Bay. I wonder if it is merely a coincidence that of the $335 million total program, $35 million will be spent on pollution abatement measures that—and I quote from a DREE press release:

—are expected to result in full compliance with the Ministry of Environment's requirements.

Is not the free market system wonderful? Is it not terrible how the government intervenes in the market place, and then only to bring full compliance after all these many years? We in the NDP believe that the polluter should pay the costs of suppressing pollution to protect the health of people and of the environment.

We must ask ourselves if we want the kind of society that places most of the risks of pollution on people who themselves do not pollute? Is it fair that it is us in the main stream of society who are the ones who generate disproportionately more pollution and the rich even more disproportionately, while governments act not to make the private sector pay the social costs on its activities, but instead pick up all the costs on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer?

Governments must act to redistribute not only the wealth of society more fairly, but also the risks to health and the costs of ill health. To do this, tough and enforced public regulation will be necessary along with compensation to the victims and efforts to rebuild broken lives through the development of alternate employment strategies. Governments that fail to do this by only monitoring the problem are as negligent and as guilty of destroying human health and the quality of life as the polluters themselves.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the findings of the departmental mercury program across Canada are described in the document "Methylmercury in Canada" which was released in March, 1980, and are supported by the findings of the McGill University study in northern Quebec, which was released on April 29, 1980. Both documents come to the conclusion that while severe methylmercury poisoning or Minimata disease has not been found in Canada, milder forms of mercury poisoning, although difficult to prove conclusively, quite possibly are occurring in certain areas.

There is no specific medical treatment for the effects of methylmercury, and health programs must, therefore, concentrate on identifying those who may be at risk, and on a preventative approach in the form of health education to help individuals avoid taking in a significant amount of mercury. Therefore, the following actions are under way.

First, at risk areas are being identified based on knowledge of mercury levels in native people and fish and sea mammals.

Second, surveillance programs will be continued in these at risk areas so as to assist individuals to modify their diet to keep their mercury levels within acceptable limits.

Third, health education programs will be continued in the at risk areas.

Fourth, it is important that careful balance be established between the advantage of the traditional Indian and Inuit way of life, which can provide an excellent source of dietary protein in the form of fish and sea mammals, and the potential danger to health due to elevated mercury levels in that food source. Medical Services Branch staff are committed to work with communities and individuals to devise local solutions tailored to specific circumstances, needs and lifestyles.

Fifth, for successful local solutions, adequate information on mercury levels in local fish and sea mammal food sources must be available. Medical Services Branch staff will continue to facilitate obtaining this information from federal and provincial departments of fisheries.

Sixth, blood mercury levels estimations will become a standard investigation in the antenatal care of women from communities in at risk areas.

Seventh, the area of Quebec in which the McGill study was carried out is part of the area covered by the James Bay agreement, and ongoing care in that area will be undertaken by the Cree board of health. The board has already taken action to establish a task force to design the future program. The task force will have at its disposal both the departmental and the McGill mercury reports, and has been offered whatever assistance they may need from this department and le ministère des affaires sociales du Québec.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that this answers the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

APPENDIX

MASAYOSHI OHIRA
Prime Minister of Japan to Both Houses of Parliament in the HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA on Monday, May 5, 1980

The Prime Minister was welcomed by the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Jean Marchand, Speaker of the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Speaker of the House of Commons): Hon. members of the Senate and the House of Commons are happy to welcome His Excellency Masayoshi Ohira, Prime Minister of Japan, and Mrs. Ohira.

[English]

Excellency, we are deeply moved by the honour you do us of addressing this joint meeting of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

I call upon the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada to introduce our distinguished guest.

[English]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Prime Minister of Japan, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the Parliament of Canada.

On behalf of the people of Canada and of their parliamentary representatives, I have the honour to extend to you, Mr. Prime Minister, to Mrs. Ohira, to Foreign Minister Okita and to all the members of your entourage, a most cordial welcome.

This is indeed an historic moment. I note with pleasure and pride that you are the first holder of the high office of Prime Minister of Japan to address the Parliament of Canada. Your presence in this Chamber is a living expression of the importance of Japan and Canada to each other, and of the mutual respect and friendship which animates the relations between our countries.

There are present today, Prime Minister, men and women representing the people of every part of Canada. Their presence, as members of the House of Commons and the Senate, symbolizes not only the unity of our country, but also the traditions of parliamentary democracy which are so deeply imbedded in our way of life.

The people of Japan share this commitment to a democratic system, and in recent years there have been increasing contacts between our parliamentarians. This friendship can only add to understanding between our peoples: and I am inclined to think, Prime Minister, that such exchanges are likely to become more frequent and more valuable for both our countries.

When we look at Japan, Canadians see many things. We see a country of many dimensions and contrasts: the tranquility and timeless beauty of the temples and shrines in Kyoto; the industrial might and dynamism of modern Osaka. We see a country whose economy is the great success story of our times. We see a country whose rapid economic adjustments in recent years attest to the remarkable resourcefulness and adaptability of the Japanese people. Most importantly, we see a friend.

Prime Minister, the inherent strength and breadth of our relationship has made it an increasingly vital force in contemporary Canadian life. Japan has become our second largest trading partner. Nonetheless we remain convinced that the full potential of relations between our two countries is far from being realized. As we begin the decade of the 1980s, I invite our respective people to focus their attention on gaining a better understanding of one another's culture and institutions, so that we may add to the variety and quality of our friendship.

Canada values Japan as a nation which realizes, as we do, that the countries of the world have never been more mutually dependent than they are today. Yet the world lurches from crisis to crisis. The rule of international law is being challenged. The immunity of diplomatic persons and premises is being violated. International economic life is subject to increasing strains and pressures. In our meeting this morning it was very much evident that we shared a strong determination to resolve these problems, and to work more closely together in our pursuit of that goal.

[English]

We agree that it is no longer possible, if indeed it ever was, for countries to create their own individual solutions to problems which are essentially global. We agree as well that the time when short-term, piecemeal responses could exert any real impact is long past.

Furthermore, the governments of both Japan and Canada are acutely conscious of the leadership demanded of us as members of the Summit group of major industrialized democracies. The world community rightly looks to us for effective solutions to the political and economic crises of our times.

The energy crisis, for example, crosses all international boundaries and has destroyed the myth that geopolitical and economic problems could be treated as if they were distinct, as if they were merely regional.

In co-operation with our Summit partners, we must help the world to build a stronger and steadier foundation for the home occupied by the family of mankind. That is why these few days of bilateral consultations, prior to the Venice Summit meeting in June, take on an added dimension of importance.

In the exercise of our shared responsibility toward the larger global community, both Canada and Japan have a common interest is strengthening relations among all our neighbours in the Pacific world.

During our discussions today, Prime Minister, you were kind enough to share with me your insights into the problems and potential of the Pacific community, your assessment of the prospects for greater co-operation in the Pacific region in the years ahead.

Canada is eager to be a full partner in that progress.

It is Canada's great interest in the Pacific community of nations, of which we are increasingly conscious of being a member, that will help to bring us closer together in the years ahead.

It is our great interest in Japan itself, in the accomplishments of its people, and in our potential for working together to build a better world, that prompts us to extend a warm welcome to you, sir, the leader of the government of a great and friendly nation.

It is therefore a great pleasure to invite you to address this Special Session of the Parliament of Canada, convened in your honour.

His Excellency Masayoshi Ohira (Prime Minister of Japan): Right Honourable Prime Minister, Honourable Speaker of the Senate, Honourable Speaker of the House of Commons, Honourable Members of the Senate, Honourable Members of the House of Commons and distinguished guests.

It is my great pleasure to be here this afternoon. I am indeed grateful for the honour you gave me to speak, the first time for a Prime Minister of Japan, before the distinguished members of the Canadian Parliament.

Ever since my last visit to Canada in 1974, I have always wished to return. On this trip, I have mustered my courage to deliver my speech in English. I ask for your indulgence if my accent does not quite sound Canadian.

I only regret that the time for preparation was a bit too short for me to try to learn French as well. Excusez-moi.

Today, I should like to focus my remarks on the nature of co-operation required of Canada and Japan. While our two nations have diverse and contrasting features in many respects—in their cultural background, historical heritage, land, natural endowment, and ethnic make-up—we have also much in common: we share our belief in democracy and freedom; we are committed to the principle of free and open economy; and we possess similar objectives in our respective efforts to build a just and peaceful international community.

I, therefore, believe that there exists a basis for a broad co-operative relationship to be developed between our two countries beyond the economic relations which are already growing in both scope and intensity every year.

The 1980s saw its opening in turmoil. The events in Iran and Afghanistan highlighted the kind of challenges that we face in the present multipolar world.

We respect the cause of the Iranian revolution and have a sincere desire to expand and strengthen our ties of co-operation with this important country in the Middle East. We cannot, however, tolerate the continued holding of American diplomats as hostage, not only because this unlawful act is unacceptable from any humanitarian point of view, but it constitutes a serious threat to the basic order of the international community.

It is for this reason that, while urging the United States to continue to act with patience and restraint, we have given our full support to the international efforts through the United Nations, repeatedly made our position clear to Iran that the hostages must be released immediately, and, more recently, joined with the nine European Community countries to take certain concerted steps towards Iran to urge them to cease their unlawful act.

Japan intends to act towards the early and peaceful resolution of the hostage issue in co-operation with other like-minded countries as a responsible member of the international community. I know that Canada takes the same position on this issue and should like to pay my sincere tribute to the dramatic and courageous role Canada played in January.

The military intervention by the Soviet Union in Afghanistan is another issue of global significance not only because of its flagrantly illegal character but because of its geopolitical implications as well. Thus, the issue calls for concerted responses by those members of the world community who are seriously concerned about the maintenance of international peace and stability. We take peace seriously and we cannot but condemn what the Soviet Union is doing in Afghanistan. Japan, therefore, has repeatedly called for the immediate withdrawal of the Soviet forces from Afghanistan. We have taken concrete measures to demonstrate our disapproval of such Soviet action. We will continue to make our best efforts in concert with other like-minded nations in order to contribute to an early resolution of this serious situation. And here again, I am very much impressed and encouraged by the Canadian initiatives in expressing your deep dedication to the cause of international peace.

New challenges come not only from political issues but also from the economic front.

The first and foremost is the question of energy. Energy holds the key to a healthy and stable development of world economy in the 1980's and beyond it towards the twenty-first century. One of the most immediate tasks facing us is the conservation of oil. This benefits both producers and consumers. Japan has been making an effort to reduce the consumption of oil; between 1973 and 1978, while Japan's gross national product expanded by 19.6 percent, we managed to keep down the growth of the total use of energy to only 5.7 per cent and its use of oil to 0.7 per cent. We are also endeavouring to diversify the sources of oil supply and to facilitate the development of alternative sources of energy. I know Canada is at the forefront in developing new sources of energy, for instance, in the production of synthetic fuel, and utilization of solar energy and biomass. We are watching your efforts with admiration and I believe that there exist ample opportunities for us to co-operate together in this field. It is also my belief that the fruits of our research and development for conservation of energy and for development of alternative sources of energy should be made available to all the countries including developing nations.

Inflation is no less serious a challenge, and an enemy to our economic prosperity. We have recently introduced a comprehensive set of anti-inflation policies and are carrying out a determined fight against inflation. Through its vicious effects, inflation deprives national economies of their vitality and will definitely hamper our efforts to pursue steady economic growth. As inflation is internationally infectious, we should co-operate together with other industrialized democracies to curb this malicious problem.

None of the major economic problems, including the two I have just mentioned, can be dealt with effectively by isolated measures of any single country, but requires concerted efforts by all the major economies. It was precisely out of such spirit of co-operation, that the Summit meeting of major industrialized countries was born. The Japanese Government appreciates your active and constructive contribution in this regard, and wishes to continue our co-operation at the Summit meetings and in other fora.

Our co-ordinated efforts in managing both domestic and world economies are naturally of crucial importance. They alone, however, will not suffice. Progress in science and technology is essential to maintain the dynamism of the economies of the industrialized democracies and of the entire international economy. Canada is one of the countries that have the capacity and potential to lead the world in this most rewarding and yet most demanding field. Japan has also been doing much, and I am therefore certain that co-operation in the fields of science and technology will further enrich our relations.

Another area of international activities where our co-operative efforts can be very fruitful is economic co-operation with developing countries. Our long-term prosperity hinges, to a great extent, on the future of the developing countries. We know from experience that the development of human resources constitutes the basis for self-reliant nation-building efforts, and we attach importance to strengthening such basis through our assistance. We pledged in 1978 to double our official development assistance in three years, and we believe that we shall be successful in our endeavour. We are also making greater efforts to soften the terms and improve the ratio of ODA to GNP.

Canada, I know, has consistently been playing a leading role in coping with the North-South problem. For instance, the late Mr. Pearson's report, "Partners in Development", set the direction of international economic co-operation.

As an Asian country, we attach particular importance to Asia in extending our economic assistance. In this connection, we highly appreciate Canada's generous policy for the resettlement of the Indo-Chinese refugees, to which we, on our part, are making a substantial financial contribution. This program of yours is a noble humanitarian deed that also contributes to the peace and stability of the Asia-Pacific region.

The Asia-Pacific region contains some of the most dynamic economies in the world today. I believe that to promote co-operative relationships among the countries at the rim of the Pacific will contribute to peace and prosperity of the region. I feel that the Canadian and Japanese people have particularly important roles to play in strengthening the ties of friendship and co-operation in this region. I have no doubt that the Asia-Pacific region, which Prime Minister Trudeau once called "The New West", will benefit greatly from active Canadian participation.

We can be proud of the achievements we have made in recent years in the relations between Canada and Japan. The trade between us has grown five times in the past decade, and Japan is the second largest trading partner of Canada. We maintain close consultations on political issues, and the exchanges in cultural and academic fields have also increased, building on the foundation consolidated by the Cultural Agreement signed in Tokyo between Prime Minister Trudeau and the then Prime Minister Miki. But this is only a beginning. The horizons that we share extend much further.

Recent events demonstrate, in a convincing way, the imperative need for closer co-operation and co-ordination among the industrialized democracies. I believe that both Canada and Japan have useful and constructive roles to play as we share a common vision of the world we desire to shape in the new decade and beyond.

Today, I had extensive and extremely fruitful talks with Prime Minister Trudeau on a number of issues of mutual interest. As a result, I am convinced more than ever that Canada and Japan are not just neighbours across the Pacific but are really close friends sharing common concerns and interests.

We are both pursuing prosperity for our own people. But I often realize, and feel that we are not just seeking success or achievement in terms of statistical figures. The rich life that we strive for is a life that rewards us with deeper satisfactions. We strive to create a world where our children and grandchildren can feel proud to be born into.

I know that Canada offers a very rewarding and rich life to its people. I am also aware that this is the fruit of your cultural, social and economic heritage, and of your democratic tradition. We, in Japan, similarly benefit from the efforts of our forefathers, and I believe it our duty to enrich this heritage and pass our achievements on to our future generations. Let us co-operate together in addressing this momentous task.

Thank you. Merci.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Prime Minister Ohira, Mr. Prime Minister of Canada, Madam Speaker, Your Excellencies, distinguished members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen.

If I may, Mr. Prime Minister, I would like to say on behalf of my colleagues of the Canadian Parliament that it is a great honour for us to receive you here today. The fact that for the first time we have invited the Prime Minister of Japan to speak at one of our rare joint sittings shows how important our relationship with your country is to us. I am certain that the address you have given today will inspire us and encourage us to pursue our efforts to meet the objectives of co-operation that we have set for ourselves.

[English]

Mr. Prime Minister, detailed discussions will be held between yourself and the Canadian counterparts of your delegation on bilateral and multilateral issues which are of interest to both our countries. We anticipate great results from these contacts and exchanges, and I am convinced you share our expectations.

The ideals we share give a particular significance to our relations, and carry us forward on the road of an increasingly closer co-operation between our two countries.

Your presence here today is more than an event, it is the living symbol of our common faith in the human values proper to democratic societies. When strong international tensions threaten the world balance, it is most important that, through our concerted efforts in co-operation with friendly nations, we make sure that peace is safeguarded and world order respected.

[Translation]

Could the noblest objective of societies like ours be anything else but to bring more happiness to mankind? I am firmly convinced that this is our quest, both in Tokyo and in Ottawa. I know, Mr. Prime Minister, that the quality of life is one of the major concerns of your government. In the post-industrial era, our societies will have to adapt to new technologies which could either enrich or dehumanize the world. Like yourselves, we choose enthusiastically to remain hopeful that life on earth will be increasingly fulfilling for its inhabitants. We shall have to make full use of our imagination and creativity.

In many respects, your nation can serve as an inspiration for us in deciding the best way to react to the need for change while preserving the most valuable elements of our heritage.

I trust that on your return to Tokyo, Mr. Prime Minister, you will transmit to your colleagues of the Diet the best wishes of Canadian parliamentarians and our desire to maintain close, friendly and beneficial relations with your people. The ideals and aspirations we all share are ripe with the best promises for the future. In conclusion, let me extend my best wishes for a pleasant visit and a happy return trip.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Prime Minister, we are pleased and honoured by your visit. We listened with utmost interest to the message you gave us on behalf of your Parliament. It was an eloquent expression of your and your people's feelings for this country.

There are indeed ties that bind us and make us co-operate in building a prosperous world with institutions emphasizing the principles of fraternity and freedom examplified in Japan.

In today's universe where distance is abolished, we can easily join together and address that common task of uniting men and women with a common humanistic ideal. The maintainer of a long and rich civilization, your country generously brings us the resources of its culture and thought. It is our wish that such ongoing and increasing exchanges enhance the respect of our fellow Canadians for your people and move them to follow it on the road to arts, science and technology.

[English]

The presence among us of your official delegation consisting of hon. members of your House of Representatives and of your House of Councillors is also an honour to us. We wish to express to them our highest respect and esteem. Your Excellency may be assured that we are grateful for the opportunity we are given to meet those who work with you for the well-being of the Japanese people. We hope this visit will pave the way to further meetings which will enable us to share our experience of parliamentary democracy and lead us beyond our national frontiers to the exciting world of the universal man.

Listening to what you were saying a few moments ago, I recalled the diversity and beauty of your country, with its dynamic and industrious people. I felt the attraction of a nation rich in history and great achievements.

I thank you for having, through your presence, sir, brought us something of your radiant country.

[Translation]

Mr. Prime Minister, I would like to repeat the thanks of senators and members of this House, and I would ask Your Excellency to express our feelings of sympathy and affection to all your countrymen.

Let me now say that this House stands adjourned.

CONGRATULATIONS TO GREAT BRITAIN ON ACTION TAKEN TO CONCLUDE SIEGE AT IRANIAN EMBASSY, LONDON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the British commandos were able to conclude successfully the six-day siege at the Iranian embassy in London and rescue 19 of the hostages in a daring raid, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this House convey congratulations to the commandos who took part in the operation at the Iranian embassy in London, and to the British government for their courageous stand against terrorism.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I was on my feet. The motion is debatable. All I want to say is that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) had agreement from the other side that his motion, which was in like terms, would be seconded by the other side. Normally, the practice we follow in the House is to recognize an opposition member before recognizing members on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: You do it again and we will debate it.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES

NOVA SCOTIA—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In spite of Nova Scotia's long-standing claim to ownership and control of submarine resources and the historic and legal basis for the claim, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has unilaterally and publicly proclaimed that the provincial legislation exercising these rights of ownership and control is unconstitutional. I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House condemn the action of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in proclaiming that the Nova Scotia legislation is unconstitutional, thereby usurping the authority of the Supreme Court of Canada and wilfully undermining the function of the Minister of Justice and the negotiations for settlement of the offshore resources dispute.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MOVEMENT OF OIL BY TANKER—LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the increasing tanker traffic on the British Columbia coast and the growing concern of B.C. residents that there is inadequate legislation and clean-up equipment to deal with a spill, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That this House go on record unanimously calling for a west coast marine pollution act with regulations capable of dealing with oil spills.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TOURISM

REQUEST FOR AID FOR OTTAWA CONVENTION CENTRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that eight years ago already the federal government promised to take part actively and financially in the development of the Rideau Centre in Ottawa-Vanier; considering that the municipal and regional governments have decided to build the convention centre in the Rideau Centre; and considering the importance of the announcement made yesterday by the federal government that it would take part in the building of a commercial centre in Vancouver, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

Considering the urgency and the importance of a federal contribution to the convention centre in Ottawa, the House urge the federal government to undertake imperatively some negotiations with the various levels of government to ensure a financial participation in the construction of the convention centre and thus guarantee the development of the Rideau Centre.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARKS CANADA

RECOVERY OF EXPENSES INCURRED IN PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, concerning the move of Parks Canada to Peterborough which has been cancelled.

In view of the fact that the last Progressive Conservative government obtained Treasury Board's approval to negotiate a lease arrangement in Peterborough, and that the present government has cancelled the move resulting, regrettably, in the eviction of retail merchants and professional persons from the old Eaton's building in downtown Peterborough, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), whose riding lost Eldorado Nuclear through a similar political flip-flop a few weeks ago:

That this government guarantee the full financial recovery of expenses incurred under the relocation policy to all businesses evicted from their premises to make room for the Parks Canada regional office which no longer intends to locate in Peterborough, and that the government further advise the House where they propose to obtain the many millions of dollars lost in this flip-flop political decision, and exactly how much this political reversal of the Parks Canada regional office move back to Cornwall and a minister's riding has cost Canadian taxpayers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL LOANS ACT

REQUEST LEGISLATION BE REPEALED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under section 43 of the Standing Orders:

Whereas the Liberal government in October, 1976, indicated that the Small Loans Act would be repealed; and whereas the Progressive Conservative government later indicated that it was prepared to repeal this legislation; and whereas the Small Loans Act was passed in 1939 to serve an entirely different purpose and era; and whereas this bill will now force the registration, federally, of some 4,400 credit unions and caisses populaires, all of which are presently administered well under provincial legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That the Small Loans Act be repealed at the earliest possible time.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REBATE OF PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act 1966-1967 specifically authorizes the rebate of 95 per cent of the corporate income tax paid by investor-owned utilities to the province within which the investor utility provides the utility service, and since the federal government has apparently acted in an illegal manner since, without any changes to the act, it has advised some investor-owned utilities—one being Calgary Power—that as of April 1, 1980, it will rebate at the rate of 50 per cent rather than 95 per cent, causing utility rate increases of 6.5 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House direct the government and the Minister of Finance to immediately rebate 95 per cent of the tax paid by investor-owned utilities in the ten provinces and in the Northwest Territories to the respective provinces and the Northwest Territories, and that this House rejects any changes to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act until such time as the matter is fully discussed and decided upon at a federal-provincial conference of first ministers in a manner similar to what was done at the conference of first ministers in 1965 at which time the decision to rebate 95 per cent was adopted.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CONTRACT OF EMPLOYEES OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, especially for the employees involved.

In view of the fact that the clerical and regulatory group of employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission have been working without a contract since last November, and in view of the fact that the Treasury Board has presented to them an offer which is obviously totally unacceptable to them and borders on insult, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That the Treasury Board negotiators and those board officials earning more than $30,000 a year take a 10 per cent cut in pay until such time as the contract is signed.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

TAX ON NATURAL GAS EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Is the government considering imposing or discussing with producing provinces a tax on the export of Canadian natural gas which would bring to the federal government treasury all or part of the difference between the domestic gas price and those prices now received from the United States for Canadian gas exported to that country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as far as I, myself, am concerned, I have had no discussions with respect to a tax such as the hon. member suggests, and certainly no decision has been taken along those lines. If one were to be taken, obviously it would be a tax change that would be announced in the usual way. But by saying that I am not even suggesting that the hon. member ought to expect it.

An hon. Member: What is the usual way?

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance, of course, will be familiar with the statement attributed to his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in a March 4 article by John Howse in the Calgary Herald, in which his colleague was reputed to have said that he was considering this alternative. One would like to know whether that alternative has been discarded.

Is there some other form of federal tax or levy on the income stream generated by the transportation and exportation of Canadian natural gas; and, if so, would the minister tell us, in general terms at least, the nature of such contemplated tax or levy?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have no such tax or levy under consideration.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, may I then ask the Minister of Finance whether he is considering a more general form of energy or resources export tax which, for example, might add electricity, natural gas or, indeed, any other Canadian resource to the already existing export tax on crude oil?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, in a sense the hon. member is asking for specific information with respect to specific taxes. He has raised the possibility of an export tax on energy. Obviously, that is a possibility which could and can be considered by the government, but no decision has been taken on that matter.

Oral Questions

FORMULA OF OIL PRICING AGREEMENT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stating government policy yesterday at a Halifax news conference when he stated that in order to subsidize the generation of electricity from oil in Atlantic Canada, as was provided for by the previous Conservative government, Ottawa could only do this if there were a rich oil pricing agreement? If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was stating government policy in that regard, could the Minister of Finance indicate to the House what a rich oil pricing agreement is?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is obvious to me and to the hon. member that one of the sources of additional revenue which has to be contemplated by the Government of Canada, as was the situation with the former minister, is through an oil pricing agreement.

Mr. Crosbie: A revolutionary development.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, through this minister and others, the government is deliberately or otherwise appearing totally confused on this whole energy policy issue.

Mr. Collenette: You are confused.

Mr. Andre: In his budget statement, the minister said the pricing agreement would save a billion dollars—a specific figure. The minister was unable or unwilling to give a specific formula to the House in terms of that pricing agreement. The minister's colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, said the government would be collecting as much revenue from the oil pricing agreement as was required in the December 11 budget. The Minister of Finance continues to refuse to tell the House where that money is going to come from.

Can the minister at least inform the House when there will be an end to this confusion, with its detrimental effects on both consumers and producers? Will he at least tell that to the House, if he will not be a little more specific in terms of some of the details?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, on the question of the $1 billion to which the hon. member has referred, and to which I referred in the statement I made in the House of Commons, I said that the implementation of a blended pricing arrangement could result in a saving of as much as a $1 billion. The hon. member may understand that that was an illustrative figure of the possibilities that exist in this particular field.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member referred to confusion and he asked when the confusion will end. The hon. member is doing his own bit to create that confusion. But I want to tell him quite seriously that the uncertainty which exists at present will be ended when it is possible to reach a pricing agreement or establish a pricing regime, and that cannot take place until there have been full discussions with the concerned provinces, and in that particular pursuit the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is engaged at the present time. So I think it is rather unproductive, or futile, at the present time to pick up every possible speculation, every possibility, and bring it up in the House as if it were a final decision of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACCESS OF MANUFACTURED GOODS TO JAPANESE MARKETS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. It concerns our economic relations with Japan.

In light of the fact that there is such a substantial imbalance in our trade relations with Japan, not in a monetary sense but in the sense that we export, by and large, raw products to Japan and import about $2 billion worth of finished products, is the minister in a position to tell us what specific proposals have been put to the Japanese delegation led by their prime minister, who is now in Canada, to correct this imbalance and ensure that Canada's manufactured goods have access to Japanese markets?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada, certainly through negotiations which we had in connection with GATT, pressed very hard, as did other countries, to secure additional access to the Japanese market for additional processed Canadian goods. As my hon. friend knows, there was very strong resistance at that time. None of the industrialized countries, including the European Community, achieve the access to the Japanese market that was required. These points, obvioulsy, were repeated in the discussions yesterday with the Japanese prime minister.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister. We are aware of those discussions. I have a supplementary question with respect to the use of non-tariff barriers by the Japanese.

We know that Canadian manufacturers are being hurt by the Buy America policy in the United States, and we know that there are discussions under way at the moment concerning those laws. I should like to get an assurance from the Deputy Prime Minister as to the representations being made by the Canadian government with respect to Japanese non-tariff barriers, since we are leaving ourselves open to tremendous penetration by Japanese exporters if we are not able to have access to Japanese markets for our manufactured goods.

Mr. MacEachen: Obviously, one of the tasks which this House will have to undertake before the end of this session is consideration of the changes that have been made to the international law on the subject of non-tariff barriers. For the first time we have, and will have, some additional instruments at our disposal in order to meet the kind of threat to which the hon. member referred, and we will be able to discuss these in detail at a later date.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a supplementary question with respect to our relationship with Japan in the auto industry. It has been mentioned many times in this House that the Japanese are establishing, and have established, auto plants in the United States for the North American market. This clearly affects Canada's interest in the auto pact.

I should like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, in light of the competition that this places on manufacturers in Canada, not only of assembled cars but also of auto parts, can he tell us what specific proposals have been made to Japanese government and to the Japanese auto manufacturers to ensure that as well as building plants in Marysville, Ohio, and in California, these manufacturers will also be considering Canadian sites for the production of their cars for the North American market?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I cannot tell my hon. friend directly what particular representations were made on the question of auto parts and automobiles, but I think he will realize that at the present time Japanese cars produced in Japan are probably selling in Canada at a lower rate than they are in the United States in the absence of these particular plants to which he has referred; at least, that is a complaint I have received from interested parties.

What we would be interested in is whether there is any possibility of providing some anti-dumping assistance, and that has not yet been available to us based upon a study of the facts.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—DECISION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

This morning, on a television program, Mr. Douglas Fraser—the head of United Auto Workers in the United States—stated that the Chrysler Corporation could go bankrupt if no agreement was reached this week. He went on to state that one of the key elements in reaching an agreement in the United States was the position the Canadian government would take; time was clearly of the essence because of the problems of that corporation.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is, can he assure the House that an agreement will be reached this week; and, if not, what contingency plans does the government have in place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot guarantee the hon. member that an agreement will be reached this week. It may be that the gentleman to whom my hon. friend was referring was using some pressure tactics in order to get a quick decision out of the Government of Canada that might not be fully in the interests of Canadian workers and Canadian production.

Obviously, as my hon. friend knows, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is working to reach an agreement which would provide the suitable guarantees for Canadian jobs and production. I would not advise my colleague to enter into any agreement that would not have that result, even under the pressure from the Auto Workers in the United States.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Bankruptcy!

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I want to impress upon the Deputy Prime Minister that the pressure is not just from the head of the Auto Workers in the United States; the pressure is from the marketplace, the pressure is from the banks and the pressure is from the individuals who will be directly affected by any bankruptcy of Chrysler Canada.

My supplementary question is this: Is the government considering any alternative plans? Time is running out. What alternative plans are in place? Does the government regard the bankruptcy of Chrysler Corporation as one of those alternatives?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Madam Speaker, we are not working in this situation in expectation of a bankruptcy.

An hon. Member: You will prop it up.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO INCREASE DOMESTIC MANUFACTURING OUTPUT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. While Chrysler is one aspect of a depressed Canadian economic situation—if we just leave aside the auto industry for the moment—will the minister advise the House what steps the government is taking to increase real domestic output, manufacturing output, and employment in Canada this year, particularly in view of the forecasts by the Conference Board that real domestic growth will be down .6 per cent and manufacturing growth in Ontario will be down 4 per cent in this present year?

● (1430)

What steps is the government taking—forgetting the auto industry—generally to help battle this depressed economy and to overcome unemployment and those other things forecast that I have mentioned?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am surprised the hon. gentleman would describe the current situation, or the situation that is projected for another year as a depressed economy, because the forecast which I gave two weeks ago in respect of output is not much different from the forecast which my hon. friend made last December in his formal budget.

I would remind him that the magnitude of the current deficit, with which he is quite familiar, is rather a strong stimulative factor in the present circumstances and it will be my obligation, when I consider a budget presentation, to take into account what further steps may be necessary in order to stimulate demand.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, as usual, is as forthcoming as the sphinx. I am not asking the minister to compare his forecast with mine. His forecast is worse than mine and the facts are going to be even worse because of his lack of action. I am asking him what are this government's plans, that is, this government that got itself elected on February 18 promising economic miracles, promising it was going to lower the interest rates, promising there would be made-in-Canada interest rates, and promising a new industrial strategy?

My question is: What steps is the government taking to overcome the depressed conditions in these industries and, I might add, is the minister satisfied with the present level of the value of the Canadian dollar, and should it remain around its present position? What is his future conduct with reference to the value of the Canadian dollar as an assistance to our manufacturing exports? Can he deal with these questions? Try to give an answer. You are now in the government again. You are the Minister of Finance. Try to give us an answer.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have no objection to the hon. member framing his own questions, but I do object when he starts framing the answers.

An hon. Member: We have to get them somehow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We don't get them from you.

Mr. Crosbie: Somebody has to help you.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacEachen: May I answer the hon. member's final question which I extracted from that onrush of hyperbole that preceded the question, and that is in respect of the external value of the Canadian dollar. My hon. friend knows that the Canadian dollar is reacting to market forces at the present time. He knows, as well, that one of the reasons the export performance in Canada has been as healthy as it has been is the decine in the value of the Canadian dollar.

He should also bear in mind—and this has been one of the objectives of the governor of the Bank of Canada—the dollar should not be permitted to decline to the point where it makes possible the importation of additional inflation which his leader described as the number one problem during his speech three weeks ago. Today, the number one problem, according to the hon. gentleman, is declining output. Three weeks ago the number one problem referred to by his leader was rampant inflation. I wish they would get together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. gentleman that it is now his position as well as his government's to deal with all those problems. Rampant inflation is one, and increasing unemployment is another. They are contradictory problems.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: My final supplementary question—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member for the purpose of asking a supplementary question. He must now ask his question.

Mr. Crosbie: My further supplementary question is this, Madam Speaker: Is the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance satisfied with the present level of the value of the Canadian dollar, and is his policy to keep it at the present level of value or is he prepared to allow it to rise? What is his position in that regard?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the Canadian dollar has fluctuated rather widely in the last two months.

Mr. Crosbie: So have you.

Mr. MacEachen: The governor of the bank has permitted that fluctuation to take place, and I believe that is a comment in itself to the hon. member.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF STUDY ON KOOTENAY LAKE WATER QUALITY

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. It is in relation to the Kootenay Lake water quality study, long being conducted by the inland waters directorate of his department.

In view of the importance of this long-delayed report to both the fishery and tourist industry in and around Kootenay Lake, which is already facing closure, and having regard to the effects which the report's findings may have on international negotiations regarding possible Columbia River treaty mitigations, current Kootenay River flows at Libby Dam, and B.C. Hydro's plans for the Kootenay River diversion, would the minister kindly inform the House as to the current status of this report and when we can expect the official report to finally see the light of day?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am informed that the report should be available publicly by the end of this month.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, it is certainly reassuring, after more than a year, to hear that. In view of the fact that the release of this important report was originally scheduled for the spring of 1979—later, assurances were given by officers of the department, in committee, that it would be available for publication on July 1 of last year—and having regard to widespread suspicions that the report is being altered or tampered with to suit the designs of either B.C. Hydro or the B.C. government, will the minister undertake to launch an immediate investigation in order to ascertain the real reasons for this unconscionable delay and to determine whether the report has, in fact, been altered to suit the needs of B.C. Hydro's latest plan of attack on the interests of the people of Kootenay West and Kootenay East-Revelstoke?

Mr. Roberts: To the best of my knowledge, Madam Speaker, the assertions of the hon. member are false. As I said to him in my first answer, my expectation is that the report will be published by the end of this month. He can then make whatever judgments he himself would like to make.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER CULTURAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE STILL ACTIVE

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. As his predecessor in that portfolio, the Hon. David MacDonald, had set up a committee made up of representatives of various fields of cultural activity, committee whose purpose was to re-evaluate the Canadian policy in that particular sector, and because of the favourable reaction to the creation of that committee of the various groups interested, can the minister tell the House whether that committee is still active, when it will present its reports, and whether he intends to refer the report of the committee to the House Standing Committee on Communications and Culture?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and take the opportunity to advise him that the committee in question is still at work and holding hearings; it continued holding hearings during the last few months. I had the opportunity of meeting the committee and taking part twice in its sittings this last month. However, the committee is not in a position to present its report to the Secretary of State and will not be for a few months yet. At this point, I intend to encourage the committee, once its preliminary report is completed, to hold public hearings throughout the country, in order to complete its preliminary report precisely in light of the recommendations that may be made to it by the various interested groups from all over Canada, and have the report referred later on, as completed, to the parliamentary committee.

HARMFUL DRUG AND ANTIBIOTIC RESIDUES IN MEAT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that harmful drug and antibiotic residues are still being found in meat and meat products passed for human consumption, with serious consequences for those consumers who are allergic to specific drugs and antibiotics, what action has been taken by the food production and inspection branch of Agriculture Canada to ensure the absence of such harmful drug residues from meat and meat products emanating from abattoirs under federal inspection?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have checked into the matter of the inspections and I feel that I must disagree somewhat with the hon. member's statement about harmful side effects. Recent figures which I have viewed show that several thousand such tests have taken place, none of which has concluded that there are harmful residues present in the different meat products which have been inspected.

My department is continuing its vigilance of the product. I feel confident that everything possible is being done. We are not letting up on the program but are actually stepping it up.

Mr. Mitges: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his answer. However, according to a recent report which I have received, approximately 14 per cent of all inspected meat and poultry sold for human consumption in Canada contains drug residues. Certainly this is indicative that the present testing for residues is either insufficient, inaccurate, or both.

Will the minister take the necessary action to make available to the food production and inspection branch of Agriculture Canada whatever else may be needed in manpower, equipment, etc., to step up and increase this important service in all federally inspected abattoirs?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I have before me, in my briefing books, thousands of these tests. I will make them available to the hon. member if he does not already have the information. If he, after viewing these reports, still feels that there are some things which are not being done properly, and if he can prove his statements, I will be glad to review the matter.

FINANCE

INCENTIVES TO ENCOURAGE EXPLORATION FOR ENERGY

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. The chairman of Dome Petroleum has been quoted recently as saying that Dome has been given assurances that some kind of incentive will be granted to encourage frontier exploration.

Instead of giving such assurances to Dome Petroleum—a company which had a 50 per cent increase in profits in the first quarter of this year—will the minister assure the people of Canada that any new measures which he introduces will not allow such companies to make windfall profits at the taxpayers' expense?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is obviously referring to the cancellation of the super-depletion allowance. He also knows that an announcement was made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and myself to the effect that that particular allowance would be replaced, or that consideration would be given to replacing it with an expenditure program. When this program is in place, it will not be necessary for the hon. member to worry about windfall profits through that particular source.

Mr. Ittinuar: Madam Speaker, super-depletion is another name for incentive for these oil companies. The chairman of Dome Petroleum has also been quoted as saying the company is confident that their profit picture will follow the upward trend set in the first quarter of this year. Will the minister table documents in the House which will prove that the oil companies do, in fact, need such extensive incentives and tax breaks?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the proposal to which I have referred deals with the replacement of the super-depletion allowance which was intended to encourage frontier exploration through a new expenditure program. It seems to me that that would take care of the concern which the hon. member had in his mind when he began his questions.

LABOUR DISPUTES

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—STATUS OF CONCILIATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that Local 684 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers has been operating without a contract since December 31, 1978, and whereas a partial walk-out occurred on Friday, May 2, 1980, can the minister inform the House as to the steps his department has taken or is apt to take to facilitate the negotiations between Local 684 and the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Bring back Andy Hogan.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The conciliation commissioner, Judge Nathan Green, has been meeting with the parties to obtain briefs with relation to pension positions, and will be meeting directly with the parties this week to give his findings in an effort to settle the dispute.

Judge Green was appointed after the conciliation officer was unable, despite lengthy negotiations, to achieve an agreement between the parties. A maintenance unit of some 50 employees is involved in this industrial dispute.

STEPS TO ERADICATE CORN DISEASE

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I, too, have an infectious question for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns head smut in hybrid corn. This is not a smutty question.

As the minister will know, this new disease was discovered last year in Norwich county, which suffered crop losses as high as 35 per cent. The disease is a potential danger for all corn crop areas. Testing has been done at the University of Guelph. Chemical treatment is apparently available, but it has only a 40 per cent effective rate.

Will the minister inform the House what specific action he undertook with regard to corn smut when he met with the corn industry and, in terms of the infected corn, will he tell us what action will be taken?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the disease mentioned by the hon. member can cause severe economic losses to corn producers. There are certain varieties of corn which are more susceptible to this disease than others. It can cause anywhere from 10 per cent to 40 per cent loss in crop production.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Whelan: My department has been running tests on the seed corn, and those companies which have the varieties with corn smut spores on them have been told to withdraw that seed corn from the market. However, in case there are some infected corn seeds on the market, the crop losses which could be suffered by those producers or the growers of commercial corn who buy that corn seed will be covered by crop insurance.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, in view of the horrendous danger this disease presents to farm crops, will the minister, then, not order the seven identified hybrids to be taken from the market by the four companies that are marketing them? "Yes", or "No"?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned earlier a meeting which I held with some of the representatives of the seed corn industry, both producers and companies. We are standing by our instructions to these groups, that those known seeds which are infected with the head smut spores be withdrawn from the market.

RAILWAYS

CNR AND CPR PENSION PLANS—ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS OF HALL REPORT

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I had intended to put my question to the Minister of Transport, but he seems to have eluded us momentarily. In his absence, I shall put it to the Minister of Labour. It is a question which concerns both ministers. The question arises from the report of Dr. Noel Hall on Canadian Railway pension plans which was submitted a few years ago to the then minister of labour, now the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In view of the fact that neither the Canadian National Railways nor the Canadian Pacific Railway has taken any substantial steps to meet the recommendations of Dr. Noel Hall for improving the pensions of railway workers, will the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Transport—now that he has returned to his seat—make representations to these railway companies to consider this report, bearing in mind that both railways have received many advantages and many benefits from the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the distinguished and honourable gentleman for his question. I must say to him that, while it has not appeared that there have been dramatic results on the recommendations of the Hall commission of a number of years ago on pensions in the railways, nevertheless both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have made changes in the time period involved which have improved the pensions.

Those changes perhaps are more attributable to negotiations with the unions involved than anything else, but some of them do reflect the goals that were laid out in the Hall report.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I say to the Minister of Labour that the view of our railway pensioners is slightly different from the view of the Minister of Labour.

However, as a supplementary question, may I ask either of the ministers—no, I think I shall ask this one of the Minister of Transport: In view of the fact that Dr. Hall made, as a major recommendation, the proposition that the Canadian Pacific Railway should at least bring its pension standards up to those of the Canadian National Railways, will the Minister of Transport carry that recommendation to the Canadian Pacific Railway, perhaps with more effectiveness than was done by the Hon. Otto Lang.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): For today, Madam Speaker, I can only promise to do my best to bring about this accomplishment.

An hon. Member: Not good enough.

PARKS CANADA

ILLEGAL OCCUPATION OF LAND IN KOUCHIBOUGUAC PARK, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of the Environment who is responsible for Parks Canada. As the minister is aware, a dissident group is presently illegally occupying land in Kouchibouguac Park, New Brunswick.

The dissidents have exhausted every legal avenue in an attempt to regain this land. They have threatened to exercise force in their efforts to realize their goals, and already there has been violence. What positive measures is the minister taking to resolve this conflict once and for all, and what is he doing to ensure the safety and protection of those brave souls who might venture into Kouchibouguac Park for recreation?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Bring in the British commandos.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, this is a very tense, difficult and delicate situation. I am anxious not to say anything which might exacerbate the present difficulties.

An hon. Member: Move it to Peterborough or Cornwall.

Mr. Roberts: I have been in continuing discussion with the premier of the province. We have been discussing, together, a variety of approaches which we might take to release tensions in the area.

I cannot say much more to the hon. member than that at the present time. I cannot assure him that I will very soon be able to say much more. I can assure him that we are very concerned about the situation. It does have our attention, and continuous discussions are taking place with provincial authorities.

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, the minister's response is small comfort, I am sure, to those who live and work in the region and must depend upon it for their living.

I would ask the minister if he has taken into his confidence his colleague in the other place, the former premier of the province, who engineered the Kouchibouguac situation—or the deal betweeen the federal government and the provincial government—and also whether he would be prepared to go to Kouchibouguac, perhaps in the company of the minister of fisheries from New Brunswick—who has been strangely silent on this particular matter—in an effort to get the matter resolved.

An hon. Member: Wear an armoured vest.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, these are very interesting suggestions and I will give them the weight of consideration which they deserve.

Mr. Crosbie: Take Roméo with you.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

TABLING OF FIGHTER AIRCRAFT CONTRACT

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Since the new fighter aircraft contract has been announced, and since the minister is reported as saying he would table the contract two weeks ago, could the minister inform this House when, in fact, the new fighter aircraft contract will be tabled?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, as I have advised members of the opposition, it is my intention to table the contract as soon as practicable.

An hon. Member: You said that two weeks ago.

An hon. Member: Same old secret bunch.

Mr. Bradley: Madam Speaker, through fear the same old bunch is using the same old time-frame. Could the minister possibly inform this House how soon "as soon as practicable" may be?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, I thought that my reply was clear.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION INTO REASON FOR B.C. TELEPHONE RATE INCREASE

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and it pertains to the rate increase by the B.C. Telephone Company to sponsor a $300 million capital investment program.

The president of Gentel, the owner of B.C. Telephone, says that the capital equipment is not required and the rate increase will, in fact, involve a reduction in service and local lay-offs. Could the minister undertake to investigate the basis for this rate increase and the relationship between the B.C. Telephone Company and its suppliers, especially AEL Microtel, and intercede in those hearings if irregularities do appear from the investigation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, my reply to the first part of the question is yes. As to the last part, I am not sure that the recommendation made by the hon. member is appropriate. In any case, I am still prepared to consider it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS ON B.C. INDIAN CUT-OFF CLAIMS—STATUS THEREOF

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Last week I asked the minister if he would be kind enough to inform this House whether or not there were negotiations under way regarding the British Columbia cut-off claims. He told us that he intended to discuss the matter with the Indian leadership at the all chiefs and elders conference last week, and that he would have a specific answer for us this week. I now ask the minister for that specific answer, please.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, with respect to the B.C. cut-off claims we have undertaken—and I have undertaken—to get the negotiations again under way as quickly as possible in an endeavour to resolve the question.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary to the same minister. Would the minister be willing to give the standing committee a reference on this matter, so that we could discuss it fully in a non-partisan and productive atmosphere as was intended by the previous government?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am certainly prepared to take that course under consideration and discuss it with my colleagues; but I would indicate now that, with negotiations getting under way, I would like to get the views of the parties with respect to that particular suggestion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY WHETHER COST OF LIVING INCREASE WILL BE CONSIDERED IN REVISING SALARIES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council, a Commissioner of Internal Economy of the House.

Considering that the employees of the House are very concerned by the fact that no decision has been made about the review of their salaries, could the minister tell the House today whether he intends to make public a study which should normally have been tabled on April 1, as today is already May 6? If so, would the increase in the cost of living be taken into account were the review favourable to the employees of the House?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I shall find out whether there is a basis to the concern which my hon. colleague has referred to. If such is the case, I shall find ways to remedy this situation.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council if he intends to recommend a study on the issue to the other commissioners. I think this is now a great concern to House staff.

Mr. Pinard: As I have said, Madam Speaker, I will try to ascertain if that concern is justified. If that is indeed the case, we will take the appropriate measures and the hon. member will be advised in due course.

TRANSPORT

SOUTHERN ONTARIO TRANSPORTATION STUDY

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport, if I can get his attention. Seven months ago the SOMPS report, a discussion paper, was released in this House. What discussions have taken place in southern Ontario with regard to transportation, and does the minister have any vehicle by which the public can participate in those discussions?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, extensive discussions have taken place with the public at large, and my hon. friend is aware of some in which my officials and officials of the department of transport of Ontario have answered questions from the public. Discussions are ongoing in my department, and I hope within the next month or so to be able to present a set of views on the whole of this issue.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I have a short supplementary. There are two contentious items in this report that must be resolved in the very near future: one is terminal 3 and the other is a fourth runway for the Toronto international airport. Would the minister care to give us his position on those two items?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I was trying to avoid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1500)

Mr. Pepin: In due course I will address very clearly the two aspects mentioned in the question.

AIRPORTS

COMMITMENT TO UPGRADE MOUNT HOPE AIRPORT

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, now that we are talking about airports, and now that the minister has included Hamilton with Malton in answer to a question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth, has the minister now had an opportunity to discuss the expansion of Mount Hope airport with his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Can he now tell the people of Hamilton why he so blatantly broke the promise which his government gave to the city of Hamilton whereby it committed $100 million to the upgrading of the Mount Hope airport?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I feel I have answered this question a number of times. I hope there will be a debate one day on airport matters where this question can be aired. As recently as last week I thought I had put to rest these promises that had been made. With respect to the promises made by my hon. friends on the other side, it was just an agreement in principle by the cabinet and never saw the door of the Treasury Board. That is important to underline at this time.

Mr. Alexander: That is nonsense. I have listened to the minister flim-flamming the opposition with respect to that question. This has been going on for some eight or nine years.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I am just coming to the question, Madam Speaker. Either the minister has not been briefed, or he does not know what his job is all about. I would ask the minister this question: Can I have a firm commitment from the minister that he will bring down a decision one way or the other, so that we can remove the doubt and the haziness as a result of the incompetence of this government by the end of July, because I understand that is how long we are going to sit? Can I have that commitment, so that the people of Hamilton can know just what is going on? Is the minister capable of giving me that answer?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I did give a firm promise the other day that a commitment would be made with respect to the Hamilton airport. I did say that. I also said there were a number of matters to be elucidated before a decision could be made on the amount of money that would be needed. I thought I had the sympathy of most members of the House when I said very emphatically that the expenditures would be made for the development of the Hamilton airport that will be needed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. WHELAN—STEPS TO ERADICATE CORN DISEASE—QUESTION BY HON. MEMBER FOR WATERLOO

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, in a question from the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), he mentioned seven companies. It probably should have been seven varieties. There are over 300 varieties of corn seed sold in Ontario. We found seven varieties on which we issued orders that they be withdrawn from the market. Because of the economics of this and the concern, I thought it should be put on the record.

HULL, QUEBEC—NUMBER OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 116—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past six years, what was the total number of public servants working in the Hull, Quebec, area?

2. What is the total at the present time?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. During the last six years, the number of public servants working in the Hull area—Quebec—was as follows:

December 1974:	3,988

2. In March 1980 the number of employees working in the Hull area—Quebec—was 13,822.

Note: The data reflect the number of employees on strength reported by departments and agencies in respect of which Treasury Board is the employer—Part I, Schedule I of the Public Service Staff Relations Act—and who are working in the greater Hull area defined at this date as comprising: Aylmer, Lucerne, Deschênes, Gatineau, Templeton-Ouest, Village de Templeton, Pointe-Gatineau, Hull, Buckingham, Buckingham Sud-Est, Masson, Hull, Municipalité de Hull-Ouest, Pontiac, Eardley, Onslow-Sud, Quyon, Val-des-Monts, Portland, Wakefield-Est, Perkins, La Pêche, Municipalité de Wakefield, Village de Wakefield, Ste-Cécile-de-Masham et Masham-Nord.

LARGE CORPORATIONS—TAX RETURN AUDIT

Question No. 322—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past three years, how many tax returns of the approximately five hundred largest corporations in Canada, were audited?

2. What was the amount of the additional assessment resulting from the audit?

3. What amount of the additional assessment was contested?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): There are no statistics maintained which would permit ready retrieval of the information requested. It could only be obtained by a long and costly review of the files.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—BENEFITS IN PENSION

Question No. 342—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many former prisoners of war are receiving pension benefits from the Department of Veterans Affairs or its boards and commissions by the (a) theatre of operation (b) level of benefit of the veterans concerned?

2. How many applications for benefits are outstanding from former prisoners of war?

3. What is the estimate of the number of eligible former prisoners of war who have not submitted applications for benefits?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1. (a)	Prisoners of war of the Japanese—	1,048
	Prisoners of war of another power—	5,343

(b) 50 per cent—1,042
20 per cent—1,699
15 per cent— 735
10 per cent—2,915

2. 4.

3. It is estimated that less than 180 former prisoners of war may not have applied. The above figures include escapers and evaders.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Question No. 630—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations, are employed on staff in the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): As of April 25, 1980—15.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed, from Monday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have just a few minutes to finish the remarks I began last evening, when I spoke of the difficulties faced by many businesses in Canada in financing their operations, particularly small and medium-sized businesses, and the ends to which some of them have to go. This whole matter of financing a business is not very well understood. I am sorry to say I do not think it is very well understood by the banks as well as some of the people in business.

Before foreign exchange rates began to fluctuate, we had situations where it was easier and cheaper to finance inventories outside of Canada than in Canada. In other words, suppliers came to potential Canadian customers asking them to give them a year or two order for a product and they would put that inventory on the shelves at approximately half the rate that was available in Canada. There is an area here where the Canadian banks could move in and perform a service to help many of our businesses retain that sort of financing within Canada.

When you commit yourself to a year or two years' supply at fixed financing terms to someone outside the country, it leaves the businessman with not too much flexibility. It does not give him an opportunity to look around. He is enticed into this type of arrangement by the fact that he can get very low interest rates. I notice as well with the EX-IM Bank in the United States that many times American suppliers will come in and in fact supply a product that is already made in Canada. However, the financing rates are considerably lower than what can be had here. Consequently the Canadian consumer will make his purchase from the United States rather than from a Canadian supplier because he can get cheaper financing.

As we consider this act—and I repeat that I hope we can handle it with a reasonable amount of dispatch in the days and weeks ahead—I hope we will be able to leave the banks free to enter into more types of financing of inventories. I would like to see a consortium of our banks get together to handle collectively some exporting for the small and medium-sized business sector of our economy. There is an opening there.

In my business experience, I have done a little bit of exporting. On a couple of occasions I had to go to a finance company in order to export to a customer in the Caribbean. There is an opportunity here for Canadian banks to move into that area and stimulate that part of our economy which employs the largest number of people in our labour force.

That, Mr. Speaker, concludes the remarks I have to make. As I say, I hope we can move with a good deal of dispatch and see this bill passed on to the other House in good order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege, indeed an honour, to be able to discuss this afternoon the bill before us.

Bill C-6, which will revise the Bank Act and amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act as well as establish the Canadian Payments Association, is clearly the most important piece of long-term legislation with which this Parliament will have to deal. It will establish the legislative framework within which the Canadian banking system will develop over the next ten or, as we have seen lately, perhaps 13 years. Thus, it is of crucial importance that we consider very carefully the provisions of this bill and their long-term implications for the development of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian banking system plays a central role in the performance of the Canadian economy. It develops in large part the major payments mechanism facilitating transactions in our mixed market system. In holding the great majority of Canadian chequing accounts and savings deposits the banks assume a special responsibility in managing the nation's money supply. But the banks' most important function in terms of long-range development of the Canadian economy is to provide for the allocation of financial capital among alternative investment opportunities.

The Canadian economy is faced with a number of very serious structural problems as we enter the 1980s. Our balance of payments has deteriorated to unprecedented levels. Our $11.5 billion trade deficit in finished manufactured goods portrays a colossal failure on the part of the government to implement a foreign trade policy and domestic industrial strategy consistent with the long-term development of our economy. We are becoming increasingly dependent on the export of primary resources that provide expanded opportunities for the employment of foreign capital in Canada while our manufacturing sector, which provides the greatest opportunity for increasing the employment of Canadians, slips slowly into oblivion, I am sorry to say. The key, high-technology sectors of our economy continue to be dominated by foreign interests. As a result, research and new-product development is inadequately funded. But more important, there has been no attempt to rationalize the Canadian industrial structure to make these industries more competitive in the world economy.

The solutions to these problems are clear to most Canadians. We need efficient, world-scale industries. We need to increase Canadian control in order to stop the drain of financial resources out of Canada. We need to encourage import substitution and to develop efficient capital markets to provide the financial support required to rationalize and to modernize Canadian industry. The Canadian banking system can play a key role in achieving these national objectives and that is what makes the revision to the Bank Act before us for debate today so crucially important.

As the major financial intermediaries in the Canadian economy, the banks receive deposits and lend out huge amounts of capital. Will the Bank Act ensure that these pools of capital will be used to support Canadian business, to promote Canadian industrial development and reverse the trend toward foreign domination? I have my doubts, Mr. Speaker, but let us consider for a moment the proposed legislation.

Revising the legislation governing the Canadian banking system appears to be a ritual engaging this House every ten years or so. In my reading of the record one of the most clearly stated objectives of this ritual in the past has been to increase the level of competition in Canadian banking. This time around it appears that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has decided that competition can best be promoted by allowing foreign banks access to the Canadian economy.

This seems a rather curious decision to me. What is even more curious is why the chartered banks have not objected, indeed, why they have agreed so readily to allow foreign banks access to the Canadian capital market. The government thinks such access will increase competition in this highly concentrated sector of the economy. But, Mr. Speaker, the banks know better. And so, too, should the members of this House, especially those members more experienced than I, and in particular those members who have debated this very act over the past few years. As a new member of Parliament representing the concerns of my constituents about the effectiveness of federal government policy, I find it difficult to reconcile the objective of increasing competition in the banking system as expressed by some members of this House with the actual performance of the banks themselves.

In 1954 the four largest chartered banks held $8.7 billion in total assets. This represented 76.8 per cent of total chartered bank assets. By 1979—25 years later—the assets held by the same four banks had grown to $182.6 billion, representing 77.7 per cent of total chartered bank assets. Therefore, over the past 25 years there has been virtually no change in the concentration of assets among Canadian chartered banks.

The credibility of our legislative commitment to ensure greater competition in banking is most seriously questioned by the performance record of the chartered banks in concentrating corporate profits. In 1954, the four largest chartered banks received $51.8 million in profits before taxes. This represented 70.6 per cent of all chartered bank profits before taxes. By 1979 the pre-tax profits received by the four largest chartered banks had grown to $1.1 billion, representing 80.6 per cent of all chartered bank profits before taxes.

In spite of the well-intentioned objectives expressed by so many members of this House, Mr. Speaker, the chartered banks in Canada are no more competitive today than they were 25 years ago. Indeed, a strong case can be made for them being less competitive today. I am afraid that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was all too correct when he suggested the other night that what we were doing here in debating this bill was akin to laying down the rules for the manufacture of horse collars in an age of jet propulsion, rockets and advanced electronics. Still, we are told that this new legislation will increase competition and the chartered banks are on record as agreeing with this. I want to suggest that the kind of competition the banks are talking about is definitely not the kind of competition I have heard discussed by members of this House. But I will return to that point later.

First let me say something about the source of this new competition in the Canadian banking system. The new Bank Act will allow foreign banks to establish banking subsidiaries in Canada. This section of the bill provides very little in the way of federal leadership. In fact, it validates and formalizes a trend which has been growing for some time. Once again, like the banks' involvement in auto leasing, we act after the fact rather than before. We are followers, not leaders. Foreign banks have significantly expanded their activities in Canada over the past decade. The Minister of State, Finance (Mr. Bussières) very briefly indicated the number of financial affiliates of foreign banks the government has been able to identify.

The minister also indicated that the total assets of these affiliates reporting to the Bank of Canada exceeds $6.4 billion.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of things that are very disturbing about this entire question of foreign banks operating in Canada. First, we seem to be responding after the fact in providing a legislative framework for the activities of foreign banks in the Canadian economy and, furthermore, we are justifying this belated action on the grounds that subsidiaries of foreign banks will increase competition in Canada. However, the government has not provided the members of this House with any comprehensive information on, or analysis of, the activities of currently operating financial affiliates of foreign banks in this country. We in fact know very little about their activities.

I must agree with the comments made in this House last evening by members sitting on the Conservative benches that these foreign banks will not necessarily be operating in the best interests of Canada or Canadians. The question whether these foreign banks will be offering services in small communities throughout Canada and especially northern Canada was posed. Will these foreign banks or their subsidiaries be offering services to the small entrepreneur in the Canadian context? Will they be providing financial services to everyday working Canadians? I suspect not. I suspect, as the hon. member indicated last evening, that these will be metropolitan banks, perhaps skimming off the best deals in the resource and industrial sectors, and that they will do little for the new small Canadian banks becoming established in Canada today, such as the bank in my own province, the Bank of British Columbia. Of course, credit unions and caisses populaires are already under undue disadvantages as compared with our chartered banks. No, I do not feel we need the Bank of America in Canada today.

Frankly, I am concerned about the deterioration of our economic performance in the 1970s, and it appears that we can expect these trends to continue, at least in the early 1980s. Regional disparities and structural weaknesses in our economy have become worse, not better, over the past few years. Our manufacturing sector continues to decline, employing only 19 per cent of the nation's labour force in 1979. In 1970, nine years ago, 21 per cent of Canada's exports were manufactured goods. Today they represent 10 per cent. Our balance of trade deficit in manufactured goods stood at $3 billion in 1970, whereas last year it was $11.5 billion. In the past five years $13.8 billion in dividends and interest payments were drained out of Canada. An additional $8.5 billion left Canada in management consulting fees, patent fees and licence and copyright fees.

I suggest that these are very serious matters. Yet we are asked to approve those provisions of Bill C-6 which would allow for the expanded activities of foreign banks in the Canadian economy without knowing the role financial affiliates of foreign banks have played or can be expected to play, first, in improving or contributing to a further deterioration of our manufacturing sector; second, in facilitating foreign penetration in Canadian industry; and third, in improving or contributing to a further decline in our balance of international payments. These are questions of concern to all Canadians, and this legislation fails to address these concerns.

We are told that we are debating the question of competition in Canadian banking. I suggest that we are debating much more than that: we are debating the future of the Canadian manufacturing industry and the future of our balance of payments. As all of us in this House know, major changes are now required in our manufacturing industry in an effort to improve the status of our balance of payments situation in Canada.

To return to the point concerning the differences between our conception of competition and that of the chartered banks, the Minister of State for Finance, in moving the motion for second reading of Bill C-6, indicated that this latest revision of the Bank Act would have the effect of increasing bank competition and thus lead to better service for consumers and business borrowers requiring credit. There are, of course, no a priori reasons, let alone historic evidence, to indicate that these results will follow automatically. The large Canadian chartered banks are today among the world's largest. They have already achieved the economies associated with large scale banking enterprise. The challenge to us is to ensure that those economies are passed on to Canadian consumers and Canadian businesses. Unfortunately, Bill C-6 will fall far short of this objective.

The point is that the large Canadian chartered banks have little to fear from a handful of specialized subsidiaries of foreign banks. The chartered banks know this, and that is why they support this legislation. The kind of competition the chartered banks are looking for in this bill is the leverage that it will afford them in gaining access to foreign capital markets.

This was stated quite succinctly, if not unwittingly, by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Simmons) when he said just last week, and I quote: "It will mean that our banks will have access to foreign markets." It remains to be seen how this increased activity of our chartered banks overseas will benefit Canadian consumers, home owners and businesses.

I suggest that we are debating much more than a series of revisions to the Bank Act in this the Thirty-second Parliament. We are debating what may in effect become an international charter for the large scale banks in Canada, a proclamation of the increasingly international ambitions of our chartered banks and what may be a growth commitment to international allocation of financial resources on the basis of greatest profit.

The chartered banks have been granted a privileged position in our economy by the people of Canada. They exercise a tremendous influence over the allocation of financial resources in the economic system and thus have a profound impact on our ability to achieve important national goals. As representatives, it is our responsibility to ensure that the legislative framework we provide for the activities of the chartered banks promotes behaviour consistent with the achievement of our national goals.

One cannot overemphasize that the chartered banks should be encouraged by this House to provide funding for socially responsible areas. The banks ought to assist us in our attempts at developing an industrial strategy for Canada. The banks should assist us in obtaining the national goals of a serious, well rounded employment strategy for Canada, regional development, improvements in transportation and communication, and a move toward more Canadian control in the affairs of Petro-Canada, a principle and concept that in the last election the people of Canada indicated they supported, and supported very seriously and strongly.

Will the banks assist us in developing a serious housing policy for Canada? Will the banks assist us in providing opportunities for small entrepreneurs, encouraging them and enabling them to enter into new and foreign markets? Will the banks assist our agricultural sector? Will they provide assistance to the native people on reserves across the country to enable them to take advantage of opportunities that they are creating every day?

In considering the entire question of competition and the banking system I am somewhat surprised that the government has placed its emphasis on increasing the role of foreign financial institutions in Canada, for if there has been one source of increased competition in the Canadian financial capital market during the 1970s we have just come through, it has come from the growth of wholly Canadian non-bank financial intermediaries, particularly credit unions and caisses populaires.

During the 1970s public confidence in big business fell significantly, but that was not the case with credit unions. Between 1967 and 1977 the total assets of banks and trust companies grew at an annual compound growth rate of 15 per cent and 16 per cent respectively, but the assets of credit unions increased by 19.2 per cent. In 1967, 4,308,000 Canadians belonged to credit unions or caisses populaires. Their membership represented 56 per cent of the labour force in Canada. By 1978 membership had nearly doubled, to 8,318,000 Canadians, or 78.4 per cent of Canada's labour force.

This growth performance among credit unions has occurred in spite of numerous legislative obstacles which have hampered the development of non-bank financial intermediaries. For example, the Financial Administration Act prevents the federal government from maintaining deposits with credit unions. Through that act the federal government discriminates against credit unions in favour of chartered banks. Chartered banks are also favoured by the provisions of the Small Businesses Loans Act, the Farm Credit Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, all of which require credit unions to register individually in order to be able to provide services under those acts.

All members of the House, I am sure, are aware of the inequity created in the marketplace by the Small Loans Act in that it does not apply to chartered banks. By imposing a 12 per cent interest rate ceiling on loans under $1,500, obviously it severely limits the flexibility of credit unions to provide revolving credit to their members. Chartered banks are, of course, unhindered by this legislation and can provide this service through direct loans or through their credit card operations.

The point is, Mr. Speaker, if we are really serious about promoting Canadian enterprise and increasing competition in the financial capital market, then we should not be making it easier for foreign banks to operate in Canada. We should be considering a comprehensive revision of all financial legislation that inhibits the establishment of more Canadian banks, the expansion and diversification of credit unions and caisses populaires as well as the development of alternative financial institutions such as postal savings banks.

Mr. Speaker, over the past few years, and especially since becoming a member of Parliament, I have become increasingly aware of the many problems individual Canadians, and especially Canadian businesses, have had in dealing with the chartered banks. This is an area of banking we tend to dismiss as unimportant, but I would suggest it requires far more attention than it has received in the past or will receive in this legislation.

The chartered banks are monolithic, secretive institutions. We need to know more about their operations, but information is often not available or very difficult to obtain. In general, chartered banks are too nervous with small companies, and often loans are recalled prematurely. If a business requires additional short-term credit instead of increasing the loan, some banks prefer to use overdrafts which end up costing the small business in the range of 25 per cent to 30 per cent. Numerous cases exist where a businessman was making regular payments and a demand loan was called by his bank. These factors along with highly variable interest rates make it especially difficult for businesses to plan for even the near future, let alone do any long-term economic planning.

Decisions by the banks to alter the terms of credit or call in a loan add to the uncertainty and risks of small business. A significant number of bankruptcies could be avoided if there were better communications between small companies and banks and if banks were required to be more accountable for their decision to withdraw financial support to business ventures.

In a recent study of consumer satisfaction with financial services, 21 per cent of more than 1,000 respondents indicated that in the previous two years they had one or more experiences with financial or insurance services with which they were highly dissatisfied. Sixty per cent of those reporting dissatisfaction indicated they had had five or more bad experiences during that time period. This does little toward improving the investment climate for entrepreneurs interested in Canada's future.

Among the highly dissatisfied purchasers of financial services who cited financial institutions as most unsatisfactory, chartered banks received the highest percentage at 32.6 while credit unions received the lowest percentage at 4.3. Trust companies, credit card services and consumer loan or finance companies fell in between these extremes.

The most frequently cited reasons for consumer dissatisfaction with financial services were as follows:

The service was provided in a careless and unprofessional manner.

And the person—

—was treated like an object rather than as an individual.

Another survey of 16,000 businesses across Canada, although indicating that Canada's chartered banks are providing better than reasonable service to a majority of small and medium-sized businesses, highlighted a number of serious problems. For example, many small and medium-sized businesses are not receiving the quality of service enjoyed by older, established businesses. About 75 per cent of the operators of firms in business more than ten years believe their bank managers understand the nature of their enterprises, versus only 65 per cent of those in business less than four years. Again, I suggest, this does very little toward encouraging the new ideas and energies to enter the marketplace.

The survey also indicated that local bank managers are not visiting clients on a regular basis. Sixty-two per cent of the businesses surveyed had never been visited. This kind of contact undoubtedly plays a significant role in the bank manager's understanding of the small businessman and his problems.

In Saskatchewan, for example, 77 per cent of the respondents had been visited and 78 per cent were confident their manager understood the nature of their business, while in Ontario only 60 per cent of the businesses surveyed had been visited by their bank manager, and in that province only 69 per cent of the respondents believed their bankers understood clearly their operations.

These are all more or less serious problems facing small and medium-sized business in Canada. But a somewhat different problem exists in the very special relationship our chartered banks have cultivated with big business, and in particular the multinational corporations that dominate the Canadian economy. In a very real sense it has been easier for a Kaiser Resources Ltd. to borrow hundreds of millions of dollars from Canadian chartered banks to finance the takeover of an Ashland Oil Ltd. than it has been for many independent Canadian manufacturers to obtain financing for their own industrial expansion.

The historical record is all too clear on this crucial point. The chartered banks in Canada have played a central role in the sell-out of the Canadian economy. Who would better realize this than the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), author of a very important report seven years ago on the foreign takeover of Canadian industry. We on this side of the House congratulate the hon. member on his present appointment and look forward to his proposals for redressing this historical error in our country's industrial underdevelopment.

I am afraid that Canadians hold a fairly low opinion of their chartered banks, perhaps not as low as the oil companies but low nonetheless. Oh, they know they are financially sound, secure and very profitable, but they seriously question whether the chartered banks are conducting their business in a way that fulfils the public trust which we have placed in them. My colleague the hon. member from Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has pointed to the much broader commitment to disclosure among large banks in the United States and the glaring deficiencies in the legislation under debate which, although it is an improvement, falls short of what Canadians expect in the way of reasonable information and protection.

My colleague the hon. member from Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has raised the serious question of interest rate spreads and price discrimination by the chartered banks. How is it, Mr. Speaker, that in 1980 we can pass legislation that is silent on the "rule of 78" and other such discriminatory practices?

The banks tell us that without a penalty on the prepayment of loans and mortgages, their profits would be squeezed, that they might even lose money! Yet credit unions have been operating without penalties for years and they manage to survive. Indeed, they have grown and become more popular.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people have every right to be concerned about what we do here today. I have been discussing the financial leasing provisions of the new Bank Act with many automobile dealers in my riding. Recently I was in receipt of a letter from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business indicating that in a survey which they recently conducted with over 55,000 independent business people, 67 per cent were against the idea of banks becoming involved in the automobile leasing business. They are concerned, without having seen the regulations to be prescribed by the governor in council, that this may not only create a conflict of interest for the banks, but may also seriously reduce competition in certain segments of the leasing field over the long run.

Evidence would indicate that in the field of leasing we can expect to be falling behind those activities in the state of California. I understand that nearly 40 per cent of the automobile business in the state of California is now done through the leasing business. You can see that this, then, will probably be increasing in Canada in the years ahead. We can see that banks are interested in getting a piece of that action, and I suggest we would not be doing the independent dealers any good by following suit. Although the banks have indicated that becoming involved in the traditional leasing business is not their aim, I think either yesterday or the day before evidence was discussed in the House by other members that indeed it would appear the banks intend to get into it in much the same way as traditional leasing companies.

The hon. member for Edmonton West has pointed to the failure of this act to define the business of banking. I would suggest that it also fails to define clearly what the government means by competition in the banking system.

I previously mentioned that the chartered banks shared a dubious distinction with the oil companies—Canadians distrust them both. It is clear that we know little more about the internal dynamics of the banking system than we do about the oil industry. Because of the privileged position of the chartered banks in the Canadian economy, Canadians have every right to know more, to have a better understanding of the role that our chartered banks play in the Canadian economy.

Other countries view the central role of their banks in the economy far more seriously than we have in the past, particularly if this bill is any indication. The provisions of Bill C-6 restricting public participation in the ownership of chartered banks denies the public an opportunity to participate actively in the banking industry. Such participation would not only provide a new source of competition in Canadian banking, but, to use a much-used phrase, it would provide a window on the banking industry which would allow Canadians better to assess the performance of their banking system.

I am sure this proposal will cause some concern for the members to my right and, of course, will barely arouse the members across the way who are determined to bring Canada's banking system into the nineteenth century with this legislation.

The proposal to promote public participation in banking is anything but unique. In West Germany the local levels of Government wholly own nearly all the savings banks. There are 675 such banks in West Germany with a total of over 20,000 local branch offices or agencies. While most of these savings banks are of a small size, taken together their liabilities exceed all but the four largest commercial banks in West Germany.

The West German banking system is two-tiered in nature. The top tier contains large commercial banks which are privately owned. These banks engage mainly in wholesale banking, lending to large businesses and owning equity in large industrial corporations, and financing these activities by issuing debt obligations. Retail banking, accepting chequing and savings deposits and making small personal loans and mortgages, is the almost exclusive preserve of the publicly-owned savings banks.

In France nearly all of the commercial banks operating at a national level are majority or wholly owned by the government. Following World War II the three largest banks in France—the Societe Generale, the Banque Nationale de Paris and the Credit Lyonnais—were nationalized by the government.

In the United Kingdom the government, through its department of national savings, operates the National Savings Bank. This bank has over 20 million active savings accounts representing deposit liabilities of close to three billion pounds. The bank has no premises, a marked contrast to our marble towers of Bay Street, but it operates through local post office branches throughout the United Kingdom. All other commercial banks in the United Kingdom are privately owned.

This very brief survey of different banking systems simply serves to highlight the narrowness of purpose, the neglect of national economic priorities and the lack of vision represented by this latest revision of the Bank Act. I began my comments by comparing the Bank Act to the laying down of rules for the manufacture of horse collars. It will be a great disappointment to the Canadian people that after years of parliamentary deliberations, after hundreds of thousands of man-hours spent debating this bill, they cannot at least expect better horse collars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in saying a few words on the Bank Act. I will not attempt to give any high-faluting essay or speech on this very complicated act. Rather, I will try to speak in the language of an ordinary citizen and state what we expect from a banking system in this modern age, and to check whether or not we are now satisfied with what we are receiving from our banking system. I will do that by referring to a number of items.

First I want to deal with the matter of agriculture to the extent it is affected by the Bank Act. This act is of concern to many farmers because a section of it deals with loans to borrowers and security for such. That section is used largely by banks when making loans to packers and farmers. When I refer to "farmers", I include ranchers and various forms of agriculture. I cannot understand why the act sets out priority of rights to certain farmers and denies rights to other farmers who are also producing food for the benefit of the people. For instance, it provides priority of rights to growers of perishable products which are direct products of the soil and to the producers of dairy products. The formula which can be worked out from that would indicate that the maximum loan probably would be in the vicinity of $20,000.

I have a question for the hon. minister which I hope he will pursue to ascertain a reasonable answer or else change the legislation. Why leave out livestock producers, as one example? Why not include all producers, if we are to include any, and give them all the same privileges under the Bank Act? This making fish of one and flesh of another in such a vital matter as credit is not right. It will hurt the country and those deprived of those priorities such as livestock producers.

There should be no upper limit. Surely the banks can determine if the value is there, if the security is there or if the equity is there, without our telling them that they have to put on an upper limit in regard to loans to agriculture. An upper limit of $20,000 certainly is not satisfactory for the livestock business or for many other forms of agriculture. A level of $250,000 might be more sensible, but why should there be any upper limit? Are the banks themselves not able to determine the extent to which they can lend? Doing this by blanket legislation will hurt many operations. I cannot see why we, sitting in the House of Commons, think that we can make loans better than those who are doing it day by day and checking the security being offered.

Another item which bothers me very greatly is the security offered to packers in this country. They use the word "procedure" and not the word "purchase". Packers take in hundreds of cattle, probably thousands of cattle or sheep or hogs, but let us deal with cattle for the moment. They "procure" them but they have not yet secured "ownership" of them. They still belong to the farmer until he is paid for those cattle; they still belong to the livestock dealer, the livestock operator or the rancher. But under the present wording of the act, the packer may use the cattle of other people to secure a much larger loan than he normally could secure. If there has to be foreclosure, the foreclosure is then on the cattle that did not belong to the packer. He procured them but he has not yet purchased them. I suggest that we change the word in the act, because there is a great principle involved, to the word "purchase". Once the packer has purchased the cattle, then he should be able to use them as security or equity or for any purpose he sees fit. Surely he should not use my 1,000 head of cattle or the livestock of any other producer for his own security before he has paid us for them. This is not fair when it results in foreclosure.

I suggest we will be increasing the number of such foreclosures by encouraging bankers, and probably many others who have procured the product but have not yet paid for it, to follow this practice. I would like to see the word "purchase" put in the act, or perhaps there is a better word. This item should certainly be discussed very carefully in the committee.

Another thing that bothers many individuals in this country is the trend toward monopolies. I enjoyed the address by the hon. member of the New Democratic Party who just spoke, but I completely disagree with him regarding the nationalization of banks or of anything else. I have yet to see the apple tree that grows more apples because it is nationalized. I suggest that the nationalization of an apple tree would result in the producer getting less, because there will be more civil servants working out rules and regulations as to how an apple tree can be kept, who can pick the apples, when, where and why.

Nationalization has its place, but this country was built, with all due respect to hon. members of the NDP, on the free enterprise system, the credit system and on the system of individual effort, not on nationalization and not by the government. It was built rather as a result of thousands of individuals who were willing to risk their shirts, using everything they had, in fact, sometimes only the strength of their backs, to go out and develop this country. Now because we have so much development it is suggested that we should start nationalizing this and that.

The banks can do a job without nationalization. Certain changes should be made, and I hope some will be made, but I am concerned about the trend we are moving toward, and that is the back door way of putting monopoly in our banks. There is a danger in this bill that this may very well take place.

Let us look at the part of this measure which is supposed to provide for competition. I heard a banker say, not longer ago than today, that this item was being put in so that banks could compete with automobile dealers and other businesses. Surely that is not why we are bringing competition in under the Bank Act. My understanding is that this will provide competition with and among other people doing the same business—the lending of money and the accepting of deposits. Surely we are not going to stretch the meaning of this word "competition" to enable bankers to compete with ice cream parlours.

When you walk into some of our drugstores today you do not know whether you are in a general store, an ice cream parlour, a restaurant, a hardware shop or a drugstore. They have everything in them. We should not start this with our banks. When there is a good thing going, such as with ice cream, under this legislation they could get into the ice cream business. I do not blame bankers for wanting to get into these businesses, but they are not in that field. Bankers see a good thing in the leasing of automobiles, trucks and heavy equipment so they now want to get into the leasing business, the actual merchandising of these products.

Let us follow this through. If banks are allowed to do this, they could get into the leasing business, dealing with perhaps just 100 trucks. They could fix the rates for leasing those 100 trucks, and that rate could go up or down as the banks see fit, within limits, with the result that the people who own the merchandise, garages and small dealers, would have to adjust accordingly. This could very well reduce their margin of profit to the point where they could not stay in business.

When a bank lends money to a dealer today it does so on the basis of the trustworthiness of that individual, the type of business he is operating, his assets, etc. If a man is in the business of leasing these pieces of equipment to individuals, whether it is one truck or 100 trucks, the banks base their loans on something else entirely. In this way the banks are interfering with the livelihood of others because they could well reduce their own interest rate to the point where the small operator could not stay in business.

Most of these small operators do business in small towns rather than in big places like Ottawa, Toronto, Edmonton, Calgary, Red Deer, although they are there too. They operate in places like Strathmore, Airdrie, Drumheller, a small city of 7,000 people, Rumsey, Claresholm, that type of town right across this country. If these people cannot continue in the leasing business and make a reasonable profit, they will move out of those small towns. If they cannot meet their requirements and their commitments, what will happen? I suggest there will be foreclosures and the banks will take back the vehicles. Where will these people then go? I suggest they will move to the big cities and again there will be a trend toward monopoly and centralization.

Even if someone is able to meet all his requirements and commitments, who will carry out the repairs and maintenance now being done by these automobile dealers in our small centres? If we want to put another nail in the coffins of our small towns let us continue with this proposal, because it is just another step to drive those people in our small towns out of business.

I saw this happen in relation to the machinery business. They started with one thing and then went on and on, and the first thing we knew was that in order to get parts we had to go to the big cities of Calgary, Edmonton or Regina in the west.

When a farmer needs parts he needs them now, not tomorrow and not the next day. The farmer cannot depend on the sun shining every day; he needs the services immediately. I suggest that the minister take a careful look at this idea of permitting our banks to get into this business of leasing, as this is something that could lead to monopolies and the destruction of our small cities.

This is not the kind of competition we expect in relation to banks. We do not expect that they should be in competition with automobile dealers and other merchants with whom the banks now do business, but rather with other banks.

This country is pretty well served by those in the garage business and in auto dealerships. They give a pretty fair deal to our people, providing maintenance and help when it is needed in this day of stress. When a farmer's truck breaks down in the midst of harvest, the small dealer in our towns will on many occasions lend the farmer his own or another truck. It is a service which our farmers and our people appreciate. Let us not kill small business in our towns. I am afraid that if this clause is put into effect it will lead to more bankruptcies.

There was discussion the other day about the figure of 546 bankruptcies in 1978. I wonder how many of those bankruptcies occurred due to foreclosure. I wish that figure were available. Sometimes foreclosure is made without heart, even though there are many warmhearted bankers. In many cases a little consideration and a little help would keep these small businessmen in business.

When I have a complaint with my garage or automobile dealer, I contact the consumer affairs department of the provincial government and they look into the matter for me. If there is provision in the Bank Act for the banks to take over leasing, to whom do I complain, other than to my MP or my MLA, who may not have the wherewithal to carry out the research necessary to determine if there is gouging or something of this nature.

Let us not mix up our jurisdictions. I suggest that the banks stay in the business of lending money and otherwise stay out of small business. Banks on the whole are doing very well today. They are not on the poverty line. There should not be any provisions in the Bank Act which will be detrimental to small business, small towns or small cities. The amount of money made by our automobile dealers and such businesses is not out of line. This clause seems to be a good thing, but the small dealers in our small towns sometimes bid on large contracts in order to stay alive and to remain in that small town. I would like to say that all leases are not necessarily foolproof, even though they may be arranged by banks, and there will be some incidents of foreclosure. Let us not kill our small towns by putting this service in the hands of our bankers.

Then there is the matter of credit cards. More and more banks want to get into the credit card business for the profit it offers. I suggest that the charges for credit cards are unfair in many cases to the customer who pays cash. Hon. members should not think that it is only the rich who pay cash. Many of our hard-working people buy things only with the money they may have available from their pay cheque. These people live from pay cheque to pay cheque and do not rely on credit cards. They do not mortgage their future with credit cards. When we provide for the extravagant use of credit cards, somebody is paying for them and in many cases it is the cash customer. This matter should be reviewed very carefully and if it is the cash customer who is paying, then remedial action should be taken.

The next point I would like to mention is the matter of interference by banks with individual accounts. I do not think this procedure is widespread. However, some four or five years ago I had a small savings account at one of the chartered banks. I did not use the account because it was a savings account which was held in trust. After I had had the account for some two or three years, I took my bank book in to get it balanced. At that time I noticed there was a service charge of $2. When I asked the clerk about the service charge, after indicating that I had not used the account and that the money had simply sat there for the use of the banks for two or three years, the clerk said, "You are being charged because you did not use the money." I instructed that clerk at the desk to take my book back to the manager and to tell him to take the service charge off. I felt that he had no authority under the Bank Act to charge me that $2. The clerk came back after 15 minutes and returned my book to me without the service charge. I forthwith removed my money from that particular chartered bank.

That is gouging, Mr. Speaker. Why should I be charged a service charge when I do not use my account and after the bank has had the use of my money? It was not a current account. Too often banks are using every possible excuse to charge for their services, and sometimes the charge is exorbitant. I recently saw a sign on a bank which said, "Fifty cents to cash a cheque, unless you are an old age pensioner". I would like to know what is the tremendous amount of work involved in cashing a cheque. Banks do not cash a cheque unless they are certain that it is good.

The Bank Act should protect the common people or working people who must transact their business with a bank. Just recently there was an article in some of the papers with regard to deposits. An individual wanted to deposit a large number of pennies. He went to several chartered banks, but they wanted to charge him for taking his money, which the bank could then use. Finally, the treasury branch of the Alberta government said to this man, "Bring it to us, we will take it at no charge". The treasury branch is not under the same authority as the chartered banks. Why should the banks be able to charge someone who wishes to make a desposit, whether it be in the form of a cheque, dollar bills or in pennies? There should not be a charge for making deposits. That is taking advantage of people. The Bank Act should protect not only millionaires or those who need large volumes of credit, but the common people, the ordinary, everyday people of this country, the backbone of this country. This is a matter which needs some attention.

Our banks should have as their primary purpose the service of extending credit to develop our resources. Wherever there is a situation which will benefit a community, a province or our nation, then our banks should be right in there to see what they can do to help. If that attitude were taken—it is taken by many bank managers, but unfortunately they are given orders which will not allow them to carry out what might be best for the community—it would benefit the whole nation. The bank managers know the needs of the communities they serve.

In connection with competition among foreign banks within the country, I would like to suggest that if foreign banks come into Canada they should provide more than just competition; we must make sure that they are coming here for the benefit of Canada and Canadians. Such banks would be expected to make a reasonable profit, but they should not be coming here to do great things for another country at the expense of the Canadian people. If the Bank Act is worded to cover this area, it will be of tremendous help.

I would like now to say a word or two about something which I am sure is mysterious to most people, and it may even be mysterious in some cases to the people within our banks. That is the expansion of credit. The government gave the right of banking to private companies and also gave them the right to expand credit under certain conditions. These banks can expand credit seven, eight, ten or even 13 times. When that credit is expanded, the money given to an industry and then returned, it is taken off the books. The loan has been repaid. Sometimes not even one dollar bill changes hands; it is all done by chequing and book entries.

I know the Canadian government has made use of this expansion of credit on a number of occasions, and properly so, although I would not say every time the government used this method it was for a purpose that I would support; but nevertheless it has been used. I would suggest that now is a good time to make sure that the banking fraternity is going to serve this country. We can do this by making sure that at least one half of the expansion of credit that takes place, because of the buoyancy in this country, is lent at a very nominal interest rate for the building of schools and hospitals.

This is not going to be in competition with anybody else and it is going to provide needed classrooms and needed beds across the country. If we could adopt a policy where only a portion of that expanded credit is used for this humanitarian benefit of building hospitals and schools at a very low interest rate, it should cut down a little on the banks' profits. Bank statements I have read do not show that they are in an impoverished condition. They can expand that credit only because they have the support of the people of this country. If there was a run on a bank and we lost confidence in our banking system, banks would go bankrupt tomorrow. Yet it is years and years since a bank has gone bankrukpt or closed its doors. I hope it is just as many years before it happens again.

I think the banks should become good corporate citizens, and, if necessary by law, a portion of the profits from expanded credit should be used to build hospitals and schools. Low interest loans should be given to our school boards and hospital boards right across Canada. This would be a tremendous load off the shoulders of the men and women carrying the burden of the hospital and school administrations. In my view, we have a wonderful opportunity to make sure that this Bank Act is going to work for the benefit of Canada and Canadians. Let us not throw away this golden opportunity.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humbolt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to address this House on Bill C-6, to amend the Bank Act. This is an act where we grant a very special privilege to a corporate group in our society, namely the banks. We are granting them the privilege to do business in our country and we are laying down the rules by which that business will be transacted until 1990. With the passage of this bill, Parliament will be allowing the existing Canadian banks to continue for another ten years pretty much as they have done in the past.

There are some exceptions. We are told that in this act we will be encouraging competition in banking, that is, unless a province decides it wants to get into the banking business. I think that is fair because the British North America Act has stated clearly that banking is the business of the federal government to legislate. We are saying in this act that subsidiaries of foreign banks may be allowed to operate in this country if the minister is satisfied that the bank in question has the potential to make a contribution to competitive banking in Canada and if we are able to provide reciprocal arrangements with the foreign banks' own governments.

I am afraid that perhaps we have not spent as much time as we should on this act regarding the competition in our banking system that we have right here at home. I refer to our trust companies and credit unions, the so-called "near banks". We submit that these are the Canadian alternative to the banking system and the only real source of competition that exists in this country today.

What has the federal government done to promote this kind of competition and improve the competitive position? In my view, the programs have not been overwhelming. For instance, the Financial Administration Act prevents the deposit of federal government funds in financial institutions other than chartered banks. The Canadian Wheat Board Act permits elevator and grain companies authorized by the board to borrow from chartered banks but not from credit unions. The Livestock and Livestock Products Act requires livestock commission agents to keep a shipper's trust account in a chartered bank, not a credit union. The Bills of Exchange Act defines a cheque as a bill of exchange drawn on a bank, again not a credit union.

When it comes to presenting government services, we note that the credit unions clear government cheques and orders at no cost. In Saskatchewan, this amounts to about 40 per cent of the clearances. In Quebec, the caisses populaires clear approximately 13 million items each year, worth about $2 billion. These figures I have quoted are 1977 figures so the volume may be increasing. Yet neither credit unions nor caisses popu-laires receive compensation for their work. Granted, the banks do not charge for clearing government orders, but they at least have access to government deposits. For instance, by the end of 1978 these totalled approximately $6.7 billion. These deposits provide a considerable source of compensation for the chartered banks and, as I have already mentioned, credit unions do not have access to similar government deposits and therefore have no source of compensatory earnings.

Credit unions and caisses populaires also sell and redeem Canada Savings Bonds for the federal government which result in a net outflow of funds for which they are not compensated by federal government deposits. We say that a means ought to be found to compensate credit unions and caisses populaires for services rendered to the government. This could include balances allocated to credit unions and direct payment on a per item or lump sum basis for services rendered. I realize that not all of these impediments are created under the Bank Act; they are created under a number of other acts, but they do indicate the bias of this and previous legislation against the credit union movement in favour of banks.

In presenting the act to the House, the claim was made that we are going to be increasing competition. These claims ring a bit hollow when we look at the real promise of competition that exists here and now in the lending of money and the attendant service transactions that are not allowed to grow and develop to their full potential. This government talks about bringing into Canada foreign banks to provide competition. It almost shouts "Ignore our Canadian institutions, bring in the foreign competitors." That unfortunately is the policy which this country has been following, and we say it is about time it came to a stop. The credit unions do have a role to play here. In most western European countries, financial legislation has recognized the need for co-operative financial intermediaries to have broad international powers similar to those accorded to the banks.

In order to serve the financial needs of the various credit union members around the world, these legislative changes have been allowed. Some examples include the DG Bank in West Germany, Rabobank in The Netherlands, GZB Bank of Austria and Credit Agricole in France which, although co-operative banks, have international investment powers in other banks.

If Parliament is going to be looking at sections of this act which provide for a Canadian Payments Association, I think it is a credible step in the right direction because it will allow credit unions to become involved more fully in the banking system of this country. The credit union movement will benefit from the proposals in the bill to create a new Canadian Payments Association through which, for the first time, non-bank financial institutions that accept chequable deposits will be permitted to participate directly in the clearing system. The credit union movement appreciates this kind of legislation because it will be in keeping with the government's stated intention to provide more equitable competition within the Canadian financial system. It will allow credit unions to have equal access to the Canadian Payments Association in order to protect their future competitive position, especially since the CPA will become the focus for the evolution of electronic funds transfer systems that are being developed in this country.

Although the present clearing system, controlled exclusively by the chartered banks, appears to work efficiently, there is really no indication that it is cost-effective from the point of view of the credit union system, and so they welcome the Canadian Payments Association as a clear improvement over the old system.

Direct access by near banks to the clearing system has been recommended by the Commons finance committee in its 1967 report on the Bank Act, by the Porter Royal Commission on Banking in 1964 and by the Economic Council of Canada in its 1976 study of deposit-taking institutions.

As considerable time and effort has been devoted during the past number of years to preparing for the proposed participation by credit unions in the Canadian Payments Association, we think this part of the legislation should move ahead as quickly as possible.

Parliament will be granting the privilege and responsibility of this act to the banks. It has always been Parliament that has granted charters for new banks in this country, that is, until we pass this act. After that, issuance of letters patent for any new banks will be carried out by the cabinet. I think that right should have remained with Parliament.

There are many reasons for thinking this, but I will just say that the recent history in this country of regionalized representation which we have had in the past several governments indicates that we should leave the power within the hands of Parliament. Since the impact of any of these decisions falls on the whole of the country, such decisions should rightfully be taken by representatives from all parts of the country, and this can only happen if they are taken by Parliament itself.

I do not know if the item I am going to deal with now arises from the pleas of producers of livestock that they have been ignored or whether it is a simple case of oversight. I am referring now to section 178 of the proposed act which deals with the manner in which banks' claims against processing institutions are developed. To put it simply, section 178 lays down the ground rules whereby some producers of agricultural products are protected. The section I refer to is section 178(6)(b), which gives priority to claims by growers of perishable products of agriculture that are direct products of the soil. It also gives the same kinds of rights to producers of dairy products. However, it ignores producers of livestock. Producers of livestock do not have a similar kind of protection in the event that a processing plant goes broke or bankrupt and the bank has to move in and seize the assets of that processing plant.

The problem has been dealt with quite extensively in committee. Committee hearings were conducted in 1979. The committee heard recommendations to provide for changes to the act and it made recommendations that such changes occur. We noted in the last election that Liberals, Conservatives and this party all agreed that the change should be made. Unfortunately, it was not included in the changes made previous to the act being presented to the House. I have written a letter to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) asking him to correct this situation before we get into the committee stage so that the bill will treat all sorts of agricultural producers equitably in the event that a processing plant does have its assets taken over by a bank. It is a problem that does occur occasionally.

I will just deal with a few years. In July, 1973, City Meat and Sausage Company in Montreal went under with losses to producers. In September 1973, Coleman Packing Company went under and the producers lost money. In October, 1973, Fawcett and Cristie, in Moosomin, Saskatchewan, went under and the producers lost money. In January 21, 1975, Burkmeyers Meat Products Limited of Burlington went under and the producers lost money. In February, 1976, the same happened to Essex Packers Limited.

Producers lost money in all of these cases because the way that the act is now written, section 88, now 178, provides that the banks get prior claim if the product that the processor is handling is a livestock or a livestock-related product. That is not the case if it is a fruit or vegetable product or a dairy product. There is a hole in the act. That should be corrected in the interests of justice and basic equity to all producers delivering products.

In order to back up this kind of producer, there are a few housekeeping things that need to be done. Instead of talking about loans to processors and manufacturers of agricultural products for the "procurement" of products, banks should grant loans for the "purchase" of products. It does not seem to be a very big distinction. What we see happening with the product, whether it is livestock or poultry moving into the plant, is that the company which owns the plant takes out a loan against that livestock without paying the farmer. If the plant does in fact go broke, then the bank collects all of the assets that are in the plant and the livestock producers are left in the lurch. That is not the case with dairy producers or fruit or vegetable producers. I am sure we will get this provision changed when we are in committee. I urge that it be corrected before the bill comes back for third reading.

As well as changing those sections of the act, we should look at releasing the amount of liability that is mentioned in the act. It has been increased. The Conservative Bill C-15 referred to a formula that would pay $64 times a particular index that was quoted. This one uses the figure of $100 times that particular index.

There are a number of problems here, and probably the solution would be just to have no limit and give the producers an unlimited amount of protection. The problem with basing it on an index is that occasionally we change the basis of the index. In 1970 we got to the point where the index of agricultural products was approaching 200, so when we got into a new decade we said, "Let's turn that back to a base of 100." This could happen again in the 1980s, and because it is written into the act it would substantially reduce the amount of protection that is available to producers.

I urge the government and the House to make these small, though important, changes to the act, that we give them very real consideration, that we bring them forward in committee and that we speedily process them in order to bring about the kind of equality and justice that should exist in that section of the act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks to this House on April 21, 1980, in response to the Speech from the Throne, I stressed the need to view government economic policy as trying to form a stable and certain economic climate. This would be an economic climate which would stimulate growth, encourage investment and have the effect of creating new jobs.

This was a commitment which the government took on. When the Minister of State, Finance (Mr. Bussières) introduced Bill C-6 for second reading, he was taking a step toward that commitment. At this time it is extremely important to the creation of a stable environment in the nation's financial sector that the Bank Act be revised and implemented as soon as possible.

Further extensions of this bill would be indeed regrettable. The current revision of the Bank Act began in September, 1974, which means that a large sector of Canada's financial community has been unable to engage in comprehensive planning for almost six years.

With the help of two parliamentary committees and as a result of the consensual reports which they submitted, we arrive at our current point, consideration of Bill C-6 at the second reading debate.

Let me make it clear that I am not asking for passage of this bill because of any deadline which may exist. I feel that this bill is the result of a careful review of what at this time would be good for Canada and good for Canadians.

Our responsibility lies in strengthening and developing the Canadian financial system by promoting efficient and fair competition.

[English]

In this process we must not lose sight of Canadians who must function and live within our economic structure. If aspects of Bill C-6 will make it harder for Canadians to live within their means, it is our responsibility to redress those negative aspects. Speaking generally, I do not believe this is the case with Bill C-6.

[Translation]

This bill is extremely long and very complex. It lays down the framework and the basic rules within which chartered banks, the Quebec savings banks and the Montreal City and District Savings Bank were set up, operate and are controlled.

[English]

There are countless issues in Bill C-6 which one can address. I want now to turn to five or six specific issues.

First, I want to consider the fact that Bill C-6 does not include a definition of the business of banking. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised this point in his remarks to the House, and I welcome the opportunity to ease his concern. Surely the goals of flexibility and control are the ones we should be striving for in Bill C-6. I do not see how a definition of the business of banking would help us achieve either of these goals.

It should be noted that the hon. members of the former Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs also had no definition of their own for the business of banking, although they grappled with this issue for some time.

The hon. member for Edmonton West has called for a bill with a 25-year duration, which would allow the authorities administering this bill to discharge their duties. However, since 1974 when the current revision began in earnest changes have already occurred in the Canadian economic system due both to international and domestic circumstances. Our ability to control our banking system must rest on constant review, at least every ten years, of both the charter of the banks and the regulations which have been established to control corporate development.

The government has chosen not to define the business of banking in its present review because of the evolving nature of the banking system and the obvious federal-provincial implications of any comprehensive definition. Just as today's banking institutions are quite different from those of earlier years, an attempt to define the business of banking at this point may overly restrict the evolution of the business in the future.

Ten years ago we could not have predicted the growth of the credit card system on its current scale, expanded services in the form of multi-branch facilities and flexible banking hours. Let us not limit the growth of the banking industry inadvertently by imposing long-term restrictions now.

I would further like to stress the need for competition and openness in the banking system, but at the same time these requirements depend on a structure in which to operate. That is the logic of Bill C-6, and when hon. members argue that banking will be over-regulated as a result of Bill C-6, I am confused. It seems to me that while the ground rules will be established in the Bank Act and in the proposed Canadian Payments Association Act, some details of the new banking legislation can be better dealt with in the form of regulations. This approach will provide the flexibility which is essential in a rapidly changing economy.

The number of regulations offered have been kept to a minimum. The added flexibility provided in the regulation approach and the discretionary powers given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the inspector general of banks will also enable the authorities to deal equitably with the many more participants in the system in the future.

The hon. member for Edmonton West has offered this House a critique of the regulation approach which would rest on minimal regulation, tighter definition and a longer duration of the act. I would say to him that his approach locks us into a box when our goal should be flexibility leading to financial accountability and responsibility.

The third issue I would like to address is financial leasing, and here is an area where, as I said earlier, it is important to match the intent and the practical application of the bill. The intent of Bill C-6 was to permit chartered banks to enter the business of financial leasing, defined in the regulations to ensure that bank leases were the functional equivalent of credit. The draft financial leasing regulations which were released would have permitted the banks to do leasing only through subsidiaries and the property to be leased would have to have been acquired specifically for the leasing transaction. In addition, the lease would have been on a full pay-out and non-operating basis.

The white paper noted that financial leasing was clearly a banking activity and that the participation of banks in the area would be beneficial to the financial system. It is the intention of regulations to ensure that all leases are the functional equivalent of credit and tied to specific equipment. Banks will only be able to acquire the property to lease at the request of the prospective lessee, and the banks will be disallowed from directing lessees to particular suppliers.

Specific interests, such as automobile dealers, have raised objections to allowing banks into financial leasing. Their concerns are legitimate and should be given additional consideration.

We owe a debt of thanks to our colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), who has raised the potential conflict between the intent of the financial leasing provisions of Bill C-6 and how they would operate in practice. The information which the hon. member brought to the attention of this House was new and casts doubt, not on the principle of the financial leasing provisions of Bill C-6, but on the practical implications of this issue.

In light of the situation raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, I believe that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs would want to examine carefully the thrust of the financial leasing provisions of Bill C-6.

Other equally difficult issues can also be considered in committee—for example, the priority protection position demanded by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association.

● (1640)

Fourth, I would like to address myself to the entry of foreign banks into our economy as federally-incorporated enterprises. One could justifiably ask why foreign banks should be permitted to commence banking in Canada. Foreign banks are already engaging in business in Canada providing services which are available now from domestic banks and raising money for the purpose of borrowing in the Canadian money market.

Foreign banks have intensified their activities considerably in Canada since the Bank Act was last revised. Most of those activities were handled through affiliated financial institutions set up under provincial charters. About 100 such Canadian establishments have been identified in which foreign banks have interests and which seem to deal in financial activities. Some 50 foreign banks are shareholders in those companies. About half of them are American while the others, except for seven of them, come from member countries of the European Economic Community.

In addition, there are 50 offices which act as agents for foreign banks, almost 30 of which represent Canadian bank establishments. Total assets of Canadian businesses affiliated with foreign banks and which report to the Bank of Canada now amount to over $6.4 billion.

[English]

At present, these foreign bank subsidiaries are not subject to the Bank Act. Foreign banks should be encouraged to set up subsidiaries under the Bank Act because of the additional competitive and innovative forces they can bring to bear in the relatively highly concentrated Canadian banking system. They are to be encouraged, too, because of the additional financial support which they, with their world-wide connections, can bring to the development of our resources, industries and trade. There is also the further consideration that if we provide a basis in law for the operation of foreign banks in Canada, we can expect our own banks to obtain reciprocal recognition in other countries which is necessary if they are to extend their participation in international markets.

[Translation]

The time has obviously come to give foreign banks the opportunity to do business in Canada under the terms of our federal banking legislation. The result will be greater competition on money markets and that will benefit Canadians. At the same time, the provision included in the bill will guarantee that our banking system will remain predominantly Canadian.

[English]

To accommodate foreign banks in Canada, Bill C-6 has dropped the five-branch limit of foreign bank subsidiaries and has rejected the annual licensing approach suggested by some of the Canadian banks. The government has recognized that the five-branch limit suggested earlier was too restrictive on the operations of affiliates of foreign banks which might be interested in incorporation under the Bank Act.

In addition, with the authorized capital limit proposed in the new legislation, the branch limit would seem to serve no useful purpose. In this way, as the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs has pointed out, subsidiaries of foreign banks will not be restricted to locating their operations only in the largest Canadian cities.

[Translation]

Both committees recommended that the ceiling be abolished and the committee of the House proposed that ministerial authorization be dispensed with. Considering those recommendations and the representations received by the committees and the government, the bill embodies the recommendation of the committee of the House in eliminating the ceiling altogether. However, ministerial authorization will still be required to help in obtaining reciprocal treatment as well as some regional distribution of foreign bank subsidiaries.

[English]

I am aware that some jurisdictions prescribe annual licensing procedures for foreign banks. The Bank Act accepts the principle of licensing which will allow the government to maintain tighter control over the performance of foreign bank subsidiaries. Initial and renewed licences will be valid for a period of up to three years. It is believed that licences for three-year periods will allow adequate control over financial subsidiaries of the foreign banks.

Foreign banking in Canada is already a reality. It is our task to integrate foreign bank subsidiaries efficiently and adequately both to protect our domestic structure and to allow the entry of new competitive institutions.

I would now like to turn attention to the issue of competition, which has been raised a number of times in the House, and its relationship to Bill C-6. One of the major objectives of the Bank Act revision is that of maintaining and improving the competition which now exists both within the banking system and more generally throughout the Canadian financial market.

Equitable and vigorous competition within a framework of law and regulation, and subject to the basic control of the central bank, provides a number of benefits to the many consumers of financial services. Promoting competition is, of course, not the sole objective of the banking legislation and therefore in many cases provisions designed to encourage competition will also be shaped by other objectives, such as ensuring that organizations under Canadian control continue to play a dominant role in the financial sector.

A competitive environment is the most effective way of providing customers of the financial system with a wide choice of high quality services at the lowest possible costs, whether the customer be the ordinary wage earner who simply wants a convenient chequing account or a small businessman who will want a variety of payment and credit services.

The greater the degree of competition, the greater will be the degree of choice which customers will have between banks and among various types of financial institutions, the greater will be the incentive for banks and other financial institutions to offer innovative new services, and the greater will be the tendency for loan rates to be low and deposit rates to be high in relation to prevailing interest rate levels.

The bill presently before the House is the result of extensive discussions with all interested parties which began with the release of the white paper in August, 1976. Two of the major proposals in the white paper which were particularly aimed at increasing competition were as follows.

First, one group was designed to increase competition by providing easier entry of new or existing Canadian-owned institutions to the banking system. Second, a second group was designed to strengthen competition in the financial markets by constraining the business powers of banks in some areas such as data processing and underwriting of corporate securities while at the same time extending the powers of the banks to include financial leasing and factoring.

Let me now turn to outlining some of the parts of the bill which are designed to achieve these objectives, firstly with regard to promoting competition within the banking sector. In discussing the specific provisions of the bill I will divide them into two broad classes—those which promote competition within the banking system itself, and those which have an influence on either the competitive balance of the financial markets as a whole or on the interaction of the banking system with non-financial business.

As my colleague, the Minister of State for Finance, noted in his speech on second reading of Bill C-6, a number of measures are proposed to encourage an increase in the number of banks. Increasing the number of institutions offering banking services tends to widen the choice available to consumers and encourage such benefits as innovation, variety of services, and attractive borrowing and lending rates.

There are a number of provisions in the bill to encourage the establishment of new Canadian-owned banks. These facilitate both the incorporation of banks by letters patent and the conversion of an existing financial institution to a chartered bank. There are also proposals which would permit both provincial governments and non-deposit-taking Canadian financial institutions to play a role in establishing new banks.

Let me just make a few remarks on each of these in turn. As members are aware, under the existing Bank Act new banks can be established only by a special act of Parliament. This procedure applies only to chartered banks and is thus likely to be unfamiliar and to some extent a discouragement to any group of individuals contemplating the formation of a new bank. In addition, the procedure is more difficult and expensive than the letters patent route and, given the uncertainty of the parliamentary timetable, can involve risks as to timing which may be an additional negative factor in some instances.

The proposals permitting both provincial governments and existing non-deposit-taking financial institutions to play a role in establishing a new bank are intended to increase the range and types of organizations which may stimulate entry to the banking system. As the House is aware, one of the principles in the existing legislation is that Canadian banks should not be subject to domination by any particular individual shareholder or group of associated shareholders. Under the existing act, shareholdings by individuals or associated groups are in most cases limited to 10 per cent of the voting shares of a bank. At the time of the establishment of a new bank, however, entrepreneurs may be discouraged if they cannot obtain sufficient shareholdings to have an important influence on the early management of the bank and to reap an adequate return for their effort as the bank becomes a mature and successful enterprise.

The present act, therefore, permits those financial institutions which do not directly compete with the banks but which might nonetheless have some special expertise to hold up to 25 per cent of the shares of a new bank. It is also recognized that provincial governments may in some cases have a particular interest in encouraging the formation of banks with regional interests, and therefore similar provisions apply to shareholdings by provinces. These types of organizations are permitted to maintain up to 25 per cent of the voting stock of a bank for up to ten years. This provides adequate time for the bank to become firmly established, and after that period the pattern of ownership of shares must return to the 10 per cent limit which applies in most other circumstances.

It is, of course, true that when new banks are established they will inevitably be small and will take some time to grow to a size where they will be major competitors with the existing chartered banks. Therefore, the bill contains proposals to facilitate the conversion of existing financial institutions to chartered banks. This opens up the possibility that existing Canadian financial institutions with significant financial resources and an experienced staff will be able to enter the banking system and from the outset make an important contribution, and therefore further promote competition.

I might also mention that this bill provides additional flexibility in the ways in which banks may raise capital, by and large permitting them to make use of the full range of instruments available to other corporations. This will make it easier for new banks to raise the necessary capital to support rapid growth, as well as benefiting existing banks.

In addition to encouraging an increase in the number of banks under Canadian control, the bill will also permit the controlled entry into the Canadian banking industry of the subsidiaries of foreign banks, as I described earlier.

I would now like to address those aspects of this bill affecting the competition between the chartered banks sector and other financial institutions or other types of businesses, which is the second area that I mentioned earlier which has a great deal to do with the competitive thrust of Bill C-6.

In discussing the contribution which Bill C-6 makes to improving competition, it is important to note that it is competition in the financial markets as a whole rather then merely within the banking system as such which is important. For the individual consumer requiring such services as chequing accounts, savings accounts, consumer loans or mortgage loans, the competition between the individual banks is supplemented in a very important way by the operations of the credit unions, caisses populaires and trust and mortgage loan companies.

The Canadian Payments Association Act, which forms Part IV of Bill C-6, ensures that these institutions will be able to participate directly in the cheque clearing system, and equally, if not more importantly, ensures they will have a choice in the evolution of the payments system in Canada.

Since the provision of payments services provides an important first contact in attracting customers, the role which the Canadian Payments Association gives to non-bank deposit-taking institutions to participate in and influence the evolution of any new payments service will help to ensure that these organizations will continue to be in a position to provide vigorous competition to the banking system.

The government also is developing new savings bank legislation which will expand and strengthen the powers of the trust and mortgage loan companies. An important objective of this new legislation will be to ensure that trust and mortgage loan companies will have adequate and updated powers so that they may continue to play an important role in the financial markets. It should also be noted that the bill limits chartered bank mortgage holdings to 10 per cent of their Canadian dollar deposit liabilities and debentures, unless these mortgages are held in a subsidiary operating under the same rules as existing trust and mortgage loan companies. This will help to ensure more equitable competition between the banks and the specialized mortgage lenders without interfering with the significant contribution that the chartered banks now make in supplying funds to the mortgage market.

Vigorous competition in the financial markets also requires that the banks offer a full range of financial services to their customers. In some smaller centres a chartered bank may be the only type of financial institution and thus unnecessary limitations on the chartered bank powers will represent a particular inconvenience to people living in those regions. At the same time there must be concern that the banks are not given powers which would give them an unfair competitive advantage with respect to some other financial or non-financial businesses.

It is the types of considerations which I have just mentioned which have shaped the proposals in this bill affecting the business powers of the chartered banks. The banks' powers have been expanded to permit them to enter both factoring and financial leasing, as I mentioned earlier, two forms of business financing which have developed since the 1967 revision of the Bank Act and which highlights why it is necessary to have decennial reviews of this legislation. Permitting the banks to enter these markets will widen the range of choice and further competition in markets which to date have been largely dominated by foreign-controlled firms.

At the same time, legislation and regulations, particularly with respect to leasing, have been carefully designed, as I have mentioned, although we have noted that there could be some possibility for change. In particular, banks in that area are not permitted to offer non-financial services already provided by existing industries.

Other changes to the banks' powers have, by and large, resulted in stricter or more carefully designed limits on the banks' activities. One of the basic principles which has existed in the Canadian banking legislation for some time is that banks should not directly or indirectly engage in any other trade or business. This prevents a situation arising in which loan customers of a bank find that they are selling a better service in competition with their banker. Bill C-6 defines quite carefully the range of services which banks may provide and also prohibits banks, with certain limited and carefully controlled exceptions, from holding more than 10 per cent of any other Canadian corporation. For example, in the sale and distribution of securities, banks are controlled so as to avoid any potential conflicts of interest and to ensure that the securities market continues to provide a viable alternative to the banks as a means of raising funds—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

HOLIDAYS ACT

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF DOMINION DAY BY CANADA DAY

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved that Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if I appear to have little enthusiasm this afternoon, it is because I have a major preoccupation, and that is the Quebec referendum. I must admit that my mood changes from day to day as I see what is happening in my chosen province. I find it an extraordinary coincidence that of the 300 or so bills on the order paper, this one should have been drawn first out of the hat and is the subject of discussion this afternoon.

Last evening, at one of the many meetings I am attending at the present time trying to present the advantages to Quebec by remaining in confederation, I was questioned on the ability of federal members of Parliament to do anything about changing our constitution. When we talk of renewed federalism, we talk about our faith in our country as it is presently constituted, but we cannot seem to do anything about it. This gentleman said to me, "If you want to make any change at all, you have to get the agreement of all the provinces." How true that is. He spoke of the English insensitivity.

I must admit that in the many meetings I have been attending in the last few weeks, it is abundantly apparent that we English have lots of logic which we use to try to convince our Francophone colleagues in Quebec, and on their side those who want to promote the separatist cause—the independence of the province of Quebec—that they are extremely emotional. It is very difficult to combat emotionalism, so the argument at the present time is logic versus emotion.

I made a choice. During the last war when I came to this country to train in the air force, I was stationed here in Ottawa. I liked what I saw. I enjoyed the people. I enjoyed the opportunities that were available. So, when the war ended, I decided to come to Canada and to become a Canadian. Of all the provinces in Canada, I chose Quebec. I did not choose Quebec because it was English. I chose it because I liked the way of life in the province of Quebec. But I chose it because it was one of the provinces of Canada, and my first choice was this country—surely the richest, one of the most beautiful countries in the world. We have tremendous natural resources. We have everything to make us very proud. But maybe that is our problem. We suffer sometimes from a lack of pride in our country, and particularly in Quebec I find that a lack of pride is one of the difficulties.

I have pointed out that in the province of Quebec the provincial government already has complete and full authority for education, culture and language—the items which are probably the most important when we talk about the powers of the provinces—but always they bring up the point that when one is a minority one cannot always have one's own way. The problem is that everyone is a minority in some way or another. Whether it be the Francophone minority in Canada, or for that matter the Francophone minority in North America, the Francophone minority in the English provinces or the Anglophone minority in the province of Quebec, we are always in a minority position in some area and therefore we have to make compromises.

It was back in 1946 that the change I am suggesting in this bill was first proposed and the bill got as far as the Senate. Since then the bill has twice got into committee, and as late as last year it was killed in this House on third reading.

When I speak of logic, one could very easily argue that there is not much sense to bringing forward this kind of bill today because for most Canadians July 1 is presently celebrated as Canada Day. Incidentally, just last week when I was talking about this bill and the fact that it has been drawn out of the hat as the first bill, an individual said to me, "Why are you talking about making July 1 Canada Day when it already is Canada Day?" It is this kind of irritation that is causing us so much difficulty. It is an emotional thing. Obviously the people in Quebec look at it as another example of what we federal members are not able to do—to say on July 1 that we want to celebrate our national holiday using the name of our country, as every other country would surely want to do.

The secretary of state of the previous Conservative government used the words "Canada Day" in the literature from his department. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation uses the words "Canada Day". Most newspapers throughout the country use the terminology "Canada Day". The previous Liberal government on a couple of occasions—and one of our ministers who is present in the House today is well aware of this—introduced a bill to change the terminology so that we can legally use the words "Canada Day" on July 1.

I am making a plea this afternoon. I understand all the arguments of the persons opposed to this change. They are all on the record and I am sympathetic to their arguments. But it still does not change the fact that surely there should only be one designation for our national holiday.

The proposal in this bill is to simply change the wording in section 2 of the Holidays Act so that our national holiday will be celebrated on July 1 as Canada Day. I ask hon. members of this House to express their agreement with what we are trying to achieve this afternoon by passing this bill on second reading, so that once again it can continue its progress through committee and back to this House for third reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to get up in my place and speak on this private member's bill requesting that the July 1 holiday be changed to Canada Day from Dominion Day.

• (1710)

I find myself, Mr. Speaker, living in a country which is not sovereign, which has a constitution that goes back over 100 years which is resident in another nation. Ever since I decided to get into politics in 1967, after living for half a dozen years in the United States, I have constantly been intrigued by the fact that this nation called Canada, celebrating Dominion Day on July 1, has a constitution resident in another country, thereby being a nation not sovereign in law or in fact. We have had to journey to our mother country to change the most basic law of this nation.

I have attempted to review the events that occurred during our attempt to change and patriate the constitution over the last 50 years. In all instances it seemed to me that when we talked about the constitution, the first step was patriation and the second step was to seek or find the evolution of an amending formula. On that score there was not unanimity.

We then became involved in changing the distribution of powers, our institutions of Parliament and other institutions throughout the land, and always there were two sides. Some people have said, let us work on this process a step at a time. The moment we started, other people said, let us evolve a total package with a whole new constitution; let us find a process of constitutional convention, or some type of gathering, such that we can put together a whole new constitution that this nation can adopt and be sovereign in law and in fact. They have suggested we do that in such a way that the Parliament of Canada and the ten provinces can agree on this new constitution; but history has shown that this package was always too big to swallow.

Some have said we should go back to the beginning and start step by step. The moment we started for the second time some province or some party said, let us evolve an over-all concept with a whole new constitution, and the process started all over again.

This has been much like a tiger chasing its own tail around and around for 50 years or longer. I believe we are coming back to the same process, a process in which we will again be chasing our tail in relation to the evolution of a new constitution.

A series of events has occurred in the last 50 years during which time we have seriously tried to patriate the system or find an amending formula to revise the constitution. One of the most dramatic events that has evolved during that time is the referendum event in Quebec. That event in Quebec is not something that has cropped up quickly out of nowhere; it is something that has come up after years of consideration, after years of discrimination and difficulty in terms of self-expression by different peoples in this country.

After the Quebec referendum, irrespective of the vote, I believe that the Parliament of Canada and the provinces of this nation will have to undertake something constitutionally meaningful to indicate to the people of this country that there is a willingness, a desire and a requirement to make Canada truly a nation in every way. It is my belief that the necessary step will be patriation of the constitution.

In my estimation, and in my recognition of the law of the land and the partners in this federation, one thing this Parliament can do, with or without the approval of the provinces, is to patriate the constitution so that our constitution becomes a Canadian constitution, with Canada becoming a whole nation.

If an amending formula cannot be found during the course of patriation, then an amending formula does exist—unanimity among the provinces and the federal Parliament on changing any aspect of the most fundamental law of Canada. So there is an amending formula and that formula is unanimity. This country can patriate its constitution and become a whole nation, with an amending formula involving unanimous agreement among the provinces and the federal government on any change to the constitution.

The question has always been, is the formula too rigid; is it so rigid that the process of constitutional change becomes very difficult? One then must seek a new formula, a formula in respect of which we do not have unanimity. The Victoria charter came close to finding a formula. The Fulton-Favreau formula also came close. The provinces were unanimous then for a short period of time.

A formula that is workable can and will be found by a nation that is intent on finding a formula to amend its basic law. The point is that the first step must be taken, and the first step in my estimation will have to be taken at the earliest opportunity after the Quebec referendum. This Parliament will have to express to all the people of Canada in the strongest possible terms that it wishes the nation to become sovereign with its own "made-in-Canada" constitution, if you like.

It was my intention to speak as a member of a third group of people in this nation other than French or Anglo-Saxon. In some parts of this nation this third group of people, made up of those from countries all over the world, represents 50 per cent of the population. We have a vital interest in this nation remaining a single, whole nation called Canada.

On occasion, I have expressed a distaste for the term "ethnic" or "ethnic groups". Who are these people? I know that Canada is a nation of minorities. In national totality the French are a minority group and the Anglo-Saxons are a minority group. We are all minority groups. Canada is truly a nation of minorities. Some extra privileges have been given to some of our minorities. For example, there is language. We have adopted as our national official languages the languages of two of our major minority groups, and that is as it should be.

These two minorities acquired a pre-eminent position in Canada resulting from the great expansionary empires which in the past conquered much of the world. Interestingly, one could speculate that Spanish might have been our official language if Columbus had strayed a little farther north, and the same can be said of other explorers.

Most of the remaining minority groups came to this country as refugees from turbulence, poverty, oppression, and all of them were seeking land, opportunity, freedom and eventually equality of humanism. Above all else, they sought, first, a strong nationhood and, secondly, roots.

Many came from areas of turbulence where nations crumbled and borders changed which, in turn, caused plunder, loss of human rights, human dignity, economic opportunity, broken families and loss of the privilege to hope and to dream. Most of them knew first hand the consequences of crumbling nations and passed such concerns on to their children and their children's children.

An hon. Member: What of the others?

Mr. Yurko: They are still to come. Most, therefore, want a strong central government and will support such a government. They know that when boundaries change minorities suffer most.

My ancestors' roots are from a part of the world where boundaries changed often and nationalism was born and died with equal ease. I therefore tremble at referenda which have implications for changing boundaries in the long term. Indeed, separation is a form of national treason. But for the freedom, the almost absolute freedom, which we enjoy in this nation called Canada, it would not be tolerated in most nations. Such is the breadth and depth of the freedom which has evolved in this nation. I therefore support the member's view of having a national day called Canada Day.

If I may be so bold as to attempt to speak for 30 per cent of the people of this nation who are neither French nor of Anglo-Saxon background, I would say that we want a strong country, strong regions and a strong federal government. Hon. members will note that I did not say a strong central government. We do not want to witness the disintegration of our country called Canada. This is our home where we have replanted our roots.

However, I can understand the burning desire of peoples of like culture and like language to congeal a nation of their own. For nationalism as the hon. member across the way has indicated, is a highly emotional matter. It is the most fundamental social instrument for perpetuating a culture, a language and a guaranteed place in history, because a nation guarantees roots and linkage with the past, as I said earlier.

In today's world, interrelated by technology and economic nationalism, there has evolved a new dimension which is called "economic well-being". Economic well-being requires access to a much larger pool of resources of technology and inter-relationship. This is provided in this modern age through something which we call a federation—federation of peoples, of areas, of groups, of governments. That is the new instrument of social organization which at the same time can provide the protection of language and culture, like ideas, like peoples, like emotions, as well as integrate the benefits of technology in such a way that the whole enjoys a much higher standard of living than each little area identified by boundaries called nationalistic boundaries or nations.

Federations can be structured and are structured. The Canadian federation is one of the oldest in the world today; I believe it is the third oldest federation. Federations can be structured in such a way that they safeguard a people's roots, language, culture, emotion and attachments. Our Canadian federation is one of the finest world examples, though it is very young. Certainly it needs revision and updating, but this is possible if we only have enough courage to make a beginning and to call our nation Canada, we have enough courage, as the hon. member across the way has indicated, to have Canada Day, a day for Canada.

Quebeckers, like the rest of us, are among the most privileged people of the world. We have land, resources, freedom, and we are progressing extensively toward equality of opportunity and humanism. It is a grand federation of co-operation, association, compromise and progress. The intent is not to homogenize cultures and languages, though at one time it was. Our roots are safe. Our future is bright. We would be committing a crime, in my estimation, against civilization itself if we allowed this federation to disintegrate or in any way break up this grand alliance of people from nations all over the world.

Why should Quebeckers try a new experiment which may be very chancy? This fuzzy and unacceptable experiment in social organization, in power politics called sovereignty-association, is a gamble of imponderable proportion for Quebeckers even if it were possible. That is my opinion. It is an egotistical, political power excursion by a few that could turn into a nightmare. It is a formula for fractionalization, a formula for constriction, a formula for human recession. It is a mirage, in my estimation a backward step.

Let no one think that new nationalistic borders will be fixed for long if this nation splits. Those new borders will be subject to constant change brought about by negotiation, coercion and even by force. Changing borders brings hardships. What can possibly be gained by national disintegration that cannot be gained within the federation?

• (1730)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us as it is proposed by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is neither a novel idea nor is it the first time that the House has had the chance to debate this question.

An hon. Member: Let it go to committee.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Oberle: I take strong exception to the insinuation from the other side that it is my intention to filibuster a bill. It is my right to speak on this matter and I do not wish to be intimidated in this fashion. I certainly do not make it a practice, and I have not made it a practice in the past when the same matter was discussed by a member on this side which was talked out on the other side of the House.

I have some constructive comments to make about this bill because I share with the hon. member, who has proposed it, a very special kind of love, a very special kind of commitment to Canada, my country, because, like him, I too came here after the great war and I too have certain expectations about this country and my future here that Canadians who are born here have never felt.

The hon. member proposes that with the referendum in Quebec now is the time for the necessary inducement and impetus to remind all Canadians that we should make a very special and public commitment to Canada in terms of naming a particular day in the year Canada Day.

As you know, sir, and as all our friends and colleagues know, it will take quite a bit more than that kind of an expression from the House of Commons to convince people in the province of Quebec that they should vote either No or Yes in the forthcoming referendum. In fact it will take quite a bit more to convince Canadians in other parts of our great country, in the west, in the north, than that kind of an expression in the House of Commons to convince them that Canada as it exists today—the status quo—is an acceptable proposition for the future.

Some of us here in the House of Commons who are not yet as fluent in the two official languages have some difficulty in understanding and in interpreting the utterances of those who call themselves leaders in this referendum debate. I, for one, do not quite understand why oui should mean no and non should mean yes. I have difficulty translating that because, when I learned my French in school, the meaning was quite different. Why should it be now, just because there is a referendum in Quebec and people there say they will not go for the sovereignty-association situation why will that be sufficient indication for those who live, those who enjoy and are proponents of the status quo, to sit down after 50 years and talk seriously about a new form of federalism? I do not have the faith in the people on whom we would have to rely to begin these discussions, and that if the people in Quebec vote No in the referendum, it would be the impetus required to get these discussions under way. Nor do I think the problems being debated in Quebec today are isolated to that province.

There are other Canadians in other parts of our country who are as equally concerned and who feel equally alienated and discriminated against as do people in Quebec. They are not just the people of western Canada who have legitimate concerns over the way they have been treated by confederation. There are people in the north who are suffering the hardships of frontier and remote living, without any indication from the federal government that it is determined to strive to give them a greater degree of equity and fairness. There are natives who strive to become members in the partnership of founding nations and races.

For instance, there are people of German descent—and I know this will sound strange to you, Mr. Speaker—who feel that they have made a contribution to the founding of this nation. They were Empire Loyalists. Indeed, one of our great provinces, the province of New Brunswick, is named after the Braunschweig regiment which fought for the honour and integrity of Canada. Many of those soldiers who were on loan to Her Majesty the Queen settled in Canada in Lunenburg and other great traditional places in Canada. These people were of German descent who fought for this great country and who had a dream and a vision about this great country. Indeed, they had the same kind of vision that I had when I came here and that my friend, the hon. member for Vaudreuil, had when he chose this country to live in and bring up his family, and to help build on the natural strength that we inherit here in Canada. These people also feel that they have a right to say something about this nation.

What is wrong with the status quo? What is wrong with the constitution? What brought on these feelings of alienation and separatism which the hon. member wants now to correct with a bill in the House of Commons which would choose one day in the year to be Canada Day? How did these things happen in the first place?

Those of us who came to this land probably made a more thorough study of history than those who were born here. For example, Sir John A. Macdonald was a federalist as convinced and convicted as is our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He wanted to keep everything in the centre: education, culture, and language. He wanted to regulate it all here. He was a Conservative, of course, one of the great Fathers of Confederation. But he was more of a political realist and he was a statesman who had a vision about Canada which this Prime Minister does not share. He was a realist, because he knew that Canada would never have been possible in the first place if he could not have given guarantees to the two founding nations that their culture, language and integrity would always be protected, if guarantees could not have been issued to those who joined confederation later, or to those who were initial partners, that the right over language, education and resources would always be an inalienable right and would be entrenched as such in the constitution.

The feelings of alienation and the feelings of separatism are not because of any great historic event. The feelings of separatism have come about because here we now have a new statesman who has a new vision. I respect him for it. He has one of the great minds of our time, there is no question about that. But he wants to turn the clock back 113 years and he wants to go back to the beginning.

What a great nation this would be if it would have been possible in those days to convince all the Fathers of Confederation that we should have culture, education and language under federal jurisdiction. If that had happened, there would not be ten different history courses taught in the country today. All children graduating from school would be fluently bilingual and this would have been so for the last 100 years. All children would learn just one history course. How easy it would be to stimulate a truly Canadian identity. However, that was not to be. To think that one could turn the clock back 113 years now is just playing with disaster. To think that one could bring in a bill to declare July 1 as Canada Day which would free us of all these feelings of alienation and would once again remind people to celebrate Canada as a nation, is equally naive.

As I have said, I have the same kind of love and patriotism for my country. The problem in our country is that our love has never been tested. We have never been challenged from the outside, other than in the great war when we emerged as a nation. But since then we have never been challenged from the outside, and our love for our country has never been tested.

Let there be no doubt about the one third of Canadians of whom my friend from Edmonton has spoken, who have an equally great commitment and love for our country. I will never forget the time the Prime Minister asked me to accompany a group of German Canadians who were visiting the great city of Berlin to attend an international choir festival. All of them, of course, were Canadian citizens, and all of them post-war immigrants. I will never forget the time we were boarding a ship on the Rhine River. All of us were in a cheerful mood. One got the idea, because there were two Canadian members of Parliament, one of Liberal persuasion and myself, to persuade the captain to hoist a Canadian flag. Lo and behold, when the proposition was advanced to the captain, he did indeed hoist the Canadian flag, which we presented to him.

This group of German Canadians were standing there singing "O Canada" as we were boarding the ship. Tears were streaming down their faces, so deep is their love for their country. They are new Canadians. I often wonder whether Canadians who inherited this country by birth should not take a lesson from them. I, as a new Canadian, have something to which I can compare this country. I can appreciate the natural advantages we have here, in a much different way.

I compare the situation to the province of Quebec. We often talk about the family home that needs rebuilding when we talk about restructuring and rebuilding the constitution. We talk about the family. I am a father with four children. If you tell one of your children all the time that the others are much better, that he cannot do it on his own and if he wants to run away from home he will starve to death, eventually he will begin to believe that.

I wonder if our friends in the province of Quebec and our compatriots there are sick and tired of people who call themselves leaders in this referendum debate telling them that without Canada they would wither away. They have this dissent and distrust. It destroys the soul of people. I wonder if that is not the major impetus, and the people in the province of Quebec are finally coming to their senses and saying let us find out how good we are in comparison to others.

I wonder how much we can trust those who are happy with the status quo. They have many other incentives to ensure that Quebec stays in confederation because their own political future would be in question. If Quebec votes No in this referendum, why would that be sufficient reason after all these years to sit down and have all the premiers finally come to the bargaining table, just because Quebec has said it does not want sovereignty-association? Why would that, all of a sudden, be sufficient reason to sit down and agree to a new form of federalism? I do not have the faith in the present administration in Ottawa, or indeed in any of the other statesmen who represent the provinces, that they will come together.

The Prime Minister said we should not take any steps before the referendum to confuse the issue. Even though I support the hon. member's bill wholeheartedly, I wonder whether it would confuse the issue. I do not know if the Prime Minister is right. I would have liked him to come out and say, "If you vote No, here is what we will do, and we have the agreement of the provinces to do it."

There are two things we could do, to which all the provinces would obviously agree. They have already stated that. We could patriate the constitution; bring it home. Each of the provinces at a point could designate a minister and staff to support that minister to move to Ottawa, to stay here and consult with his government on a daily or weekly basis. He would begin the process of reforming the constitution and achieving a new arrangement under confederation. Many of us have talked about this at length. It could form the nucleus of a new upper house, a house of the provinces, following the example of other countries whose constitutions are not as old as ours but are much more functional. Maybe that new arrangement could become the nucleus of a house of the provinces which has been proposed by members from both sides of the House. Let these people sit down and spend six weeks, eight weeks, one, two or five years, and not come out of the meeting room until they have something that is palatable and meets the legitimate needs and aspirations of people not just in the province of Quebec but in western Canada and the north as well.

As much as I support the hon. member on his bill, I do not think, nor would the Prime Minister think, it is the right time to approve such a measure in the House today or before May 20. It would be viewed in the province of Quebec as another candy: "Please stay in it. After all, we are going to celebrate Canada from now on and we are doing that on July 1." That is not the kind of answer the people of Quebec want. The people of Quebec want the equity and fairness to which we are all entitled as Canadians.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman permit a question at this time?

Mr. Oberle: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman aware that in the province of Quebec and in all areas of Canada there is a very strong love and admiration for this country and that there is a great deal of desire to see the name Canada survive, not only in terms of being the nomenclature attached to this country, but being a receptacle which incorporates all of the values and all of the realities of this country? Is the hon. gentleman aware of and has he paid any attention to the debate taking place in the province of Quebec at this time?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I have stated my position. I am very much aware of the love for Canada which exists in all parts of the country, including the province of Quebec. I am very much aware, as are all members of this House and all Canadians, that there are 18 per cent or 20 per cent in the province of Quebec who would probably wish to pursue a separatist option. The vast majority of people in the province of Quebec have a very firm and unequivocal commitment to Canada. Of course I am aware of that.

However, I am concerned when we see what is happening in the referendum debate. Why do we give so much credence to this ambiguous situation, this red herring that the premier of the province of Quebec is dragging across the floor—negotiate sovereignty association? Let us interpret this term. It confuses me. The hon. member or some of his colleagues who come from the province of Quebec are saying that if Quebeckers vote Yes in the referendum, that will be the end of Canada. I understand the premier of Quebec wants to hold another referendum, that he is merely seeking a mandate to negotiate something called sovereignty association.

Will the hon. member's colleagues who come from the province of Quebec all resign on May 21? Of course not. If the verdict is Yes, we will sit down and negotiate. Of course we will negotiate. We will have to. We will have to take the premier of the province of Quebec at his word that he will hold another referendum whether the outcome is Yes or No.

I would like my friend to answer the question: what are they going to do on May 21? Does he believe that a Yes verdict out of the province of Quebec will be the end of Canada? I do not believe that. Like him, I have great faith in our compatriots in the province of Quebec, our fellow Canadians, 80 per cent of whom would never tolerate a split up of this country.

What we have to do is see this referendum for what it is. I would have preferred a massive campaign telling Quebeckers to stay away from voting instead of participating and giving the question credence, such as we have. There are people throughout the country today who actually believe that if there is a Yes verdict, the country will split up. I do not believe that will be the case, nor do I think my hon. friend does.

Mr. Roberts: Would the hon. gentleman accept another question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member's time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, a poet once said a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. Sometimes we are inclined to place too great an emphasis on a particular word. Also, I think it is wrong for any of us, at this time particularly, to be questioning the patriotism or the love of country of people anywhere in this great Dominion of Canada.

The word "Dominion" was chosen at the suggestion of Sir Leonard Tilley in the early days of our country. I think most of us admire the wisdom and the foresight of our forefathers who wrote the constitution in the first place. I admire their wisdom in not choosing a phrase such as "the Kingdom of Canada", for example, which would have indicated we were copying only one group—the British with their Kingdom of Great Britain. Sir Leonard Tilley suggested that the word "Dominion", which originally came from the French language, would mean a great deal to this country. It seems to me that the love which was envisaged by Sir Leonard Tilley and the Fathers of Confederation has, indeed, developed for the phrase "the Dominion of Canada". The suggestion was that it would tie in, too, with the strength we derive from the faith we place in an omnipotent God.

Canada is known around the world as a Christian country and we endeavour to practice that Christianity by recognizing the rights and freedom of choice of others. There exists, for instance, that splendid organization known as the Organization of Christians and Jews, in which we come together over many issues; we do not enunciate differences but, instead, we enunciate and build on areas of agreement. I believe Sir Leonard Tilley had this in mind.

Canada was founded by the British and by the French, but Canada today consists of more than the descendants of the British and French. People from countries all over the world came here. Many of them came to enjoy freedom of religion which they had not enjoyed in their own lands. The words "Dominion of Canada" indicate the importance we attach to freedom of religion, because the very words which were chosen are taken from the scripture, Psalm 72, which says, "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth".

Hon. members should recognize that when we talk about the Dominion of Canada we indicate our faith in an omnipotent God, and those who do not wish to see this have the freedom, of course, not to do so. For myself, I look upon that choice of words as being very important; they show the faith we have in an omnipotent God in this country, freedom of religious choice, in a country whose people subscribe to many religions involving a belief in God.

A second thing which I believe Sir Leonard Tilley must have had in mind when he recommended the word "Dominion" and saw it accepted by so many people in the early days, was the great future which lay before this country because people from so many nations would come here to make Canada their home and help develop this dominion which would stretch from sea to sea.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, "Dominion" is quoted in the Oxford dictionary as meaning "domain of feudal law, territory of sovereign or government." I do not see any biblical connotation there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must point out that there is no point of order there.

Mr. Blais: I apologize.

Mr. Taylor: The minister should have known that was not a point of order. When we say "Dominion of Canada" there is no thought of feudalism, no thought of submitting ourselves to other people. In any case, merely changing the name is not going to change anything else; this country will continue to be Canada, made up of the same people as before. The hon. member seems to think that by eliminating the word "Dominion" we are somehow going to change the whole outlook of people in this country. I believe he should get in touch with what people are thinking. I have spoken to people in every province and I have yet to hear a single person say, "Let us change the name to Canada Day and do away with the word Dominion". I will match the loyalty of the people of Alberta to that of any other province. We are just as loyal. None of us should be judging the loyalty of others or suggesting that, for some reason, we are practising feudalism in this country. We are not practising feudalism. We have no relation to feudalism, and the minister should know that. We are a nation—

An hon. Member: A colony.

Mr. Taylor: We are not a colony. If the hon. gentleman thinks this is a colony he should resign from the position he holds. He has been named a minister of the Crown. You are one of the Queen's ministers—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly address his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Taylor: I am, sir. I am answering people who do not have the courtesy to listen to what we have to say. We listened to their side. I think the points I am making are just as important and well thought out. "Dominion" does not mean feudalism and it does not mean "colony", and I question anyone who says it does. The people who formed this country chose the word "Dominion". They included representatives of both nationalities and they did not think of Canada as a colony. The word "Dominion" means we are a nation from sea to sea. I should like to repeat what a great Canadian once said—

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it is the intention of hon. members opposite, before the hour of adjournment at six o'clock, to do what they did in the last session and allow this bill to get to committee, or whether they intend to talk it out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussieres (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Banks of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) had the floor.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I was almost concluding when five o'clock came along, I am now at the conclusion of my comments. I would like to summarize the main points I have made in the area of competition about which I was speaking.

First, it is an important objective of this proposed legislation, Bill C-6, to promote and support the vigorous competition which now exists both within the banking sector and in the financial markets as a whole. This will lead to an important benefit for both individuals and businesses, which are the customers of the banking system.

Second, there are a number of proposals in the bill which ease entry into the banking system, help support competition between banks and non-bank financial institutions, and which ensure that the competition between the banks and the non-bank sectors of the economy takes place in a fair and equitable manner.

Third, in developing the various proposals in Bill C-6 designed further to promote further competition, such other objectives as maintaining a dominant role for Canadian controlled companies in the financial sector, ensuring the continuing soundness of the Canadian banking system and avoiding as much as possible conflicts of interest situations, have also been taken into consideration.

I would like to conclude by indicating that this particular piece of legislation has now been considered for a period of six years from the inception of its consideration in 1974. It has gone through two House committees and a Senate committee. Reports have been written. Members from both sides of the House have examined the issues very carefully and put forward their recommendations, and I think it is imperative that we come to grips with this particular issue and move this bill forward as expeditiously as possible, referring it to the finance committee, getting it back to the House for third reading, and undoing the uncertainty which now exists in the financial community with regard to when and whether this piece of legislation will be moved forward into reality for our Canadian financial institutions.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and a privilege for me to rise this evening and take part in this debate.

I have some concerns about Bill C-6, particularly as it relates to livestock producers in the country. What was section 88 in the old act will now be section 178 in the new act. This section pertains to the problem that I think producers can find themselves facing in being unsure of whether they will be paid after the seller disposes of their animals during a marketing process.

The situation now in the country with regard to livestock producers is one of some uncertainty. Hog people are facing declining markets. I think that is well known throughout the country. This is true of cattle people to a somewhat lesser degree. We have seen falling cattle prices in the last few years, and I think some of the uncertainty producers may consider that they could possibly face during the marketing operation of their cattle could be removed by some amendments to the bill.

There are many small producers in the country. There are approximately 100,000 cattle people in the country. The average size of a cow herd is something under 100 cows, depending on the part of the country one is in. In eastern and central Canada the average cow herd probably has 60 or 70 cows. What happens to a lot of producers? They risk a fair amount of effort and energy during the year to raise cattle. They have to put up with uncertainties regarding weather, marketing conditions, and problems associated with disease. When it comes to marketing, if there is anything we can do to take away the uncertainty, it is well worth considering it. I should like to pick up something which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) have said, and emphasize it relating to this aspect of the Bank Act.

What I am mainly concerned about is the cattle business, although the way the act reads, all livestock is in the same position. The reason I speak about cattle is that the physiological nature of the cow means that we can get only one calf from a cow in a whole year. That means that many producers could end up marketing their total year's effort in one marketing operation. A lot of value can change hands in a short period of time. It is not uncommon for a load of finished animals to bring in in excess of $20,000 to $25,000. If it happened that a producer lost this revenue as a result of inadequacies in this act, he could suffer severe hardship. I think there are some amendments we could make to this act to prevent that from happening.

I should like to see two or three changes brought about. I should like to see as much security given the producer under this act as possible so that he can have every confidence that he will be paid. To do this we need to take a look at the kind of securities that the banks take on the processors for financing the processors' operation. I also think that the level of prior claim that is in the bill, which is in the neighbourhood of $20,000 and which has been raised from $7,500 in the old act, is inadequate. In fact I think there should be no level of priority claim as it relates to producers when it comes to marketing their livestock.

The security of being paid is very important because, if you understand the marketing process, the cattle business is carried out largely on trust. Deals representing thousands of dollars are made by telephone or by a handshake. There is a lot of trust in the cattle business. The situation that we have now is such that some of the small processors could be hurt because, if a producer is looking around to find marketing alternatives or opportunities and he is trying to get the best bid he can for his cattle, the last thing about which he should be concerned is the assurance that he will be paid.

Some of the smaller packers may be in a position to bid quite favourably to obtain the livestock. If there is some concern that the producer might have about whether he is going to be paid, that could hurt small processors if they are not known by reputation or are not one of the big three in Canada, that is, Swift, Canada Packers, and Burns. Not only is it a potential problem for small producers, it is also a potential problem for the smaller processors. There are many of them in the country.

Producers take a great risk in terms of variations in the market and in terms of financing their input costs. We all know what interest rates are today. Producers have to buy fertilizer, they have to pay for fuel, for wages, for repairs to machinery, and for operating loans. By the end of that time, if there is some uncertainty associated with marketing, it is not a healthy situation. I think we could improve upon it.

I also think that livestock should be treated the same as the other commodities which are mentioned in this act. I refer specifically to the dairy industry and also to what they call the direct products of the soil. They are given prior claim and a different kind of treatment than livestock. I cannot really understand why there should be this difference. I should like to quote a clause from this bill to make my point. Clause 178(6)(b), at page 187 of the bill, reads:

(i) a grower of perishable products of agriculture that are direct products of the soil for money owing by a manufacturer to a grower for such products—is exempted. It goes on to read:

(ii) a producer of dairy products for money owing by a manufacturer—

is in the same category. What this means is that if I, as a producer, were to decide to move my product to a processor, that processor could not claim it as his own and use it for collateral or equity in financing his day to day operations. It means that if something then happens to the processor to whom I decided to move my product, the product is not his until I am fully paid. Also, it means that in the case of two or three days elapsing before settlement, if I were to move livestock to a packing or processing plant and if, by the time my cheque went to the bank and was cleared, the processor were put into receivership or bankruptcy, I would be put on a very long list of creditors and have to wait a considerable period of time, and would end up merely taking a certain number of cents on the dollar for my value.

What should be done and what, I hope, will be done is that recommendations will be made which would simply say that a grower of produce, or a producer of agricultural products, would be given the same kind of consideration that dairy producers or direct producers of the soil are given. It is very important that this be done. We all know that we are operating in periods of higher costs. Producers spend, in terms of the cattle business and hog business, a considerable period of production to get their product ready for market. So it is more important now than it has been in the past because of the type of dollars with which we are working.

The United States has brought about this change. In 1976 there were major bankruptcies in the United States and so the Americans brought in their Packers and Stockyard act. I should like to quote a section from that act. It reads:

A burden on and an obstruction to commerce in livestock is caused by financing arrangements under which packers encumber or give lenders security on livestock purchased in cash sales when payment is not made.

To resolve this problem, the Act states—

The act referred to here is the Packers and Stockyard act across the border.

—in effect, that all livestock purchased by a packer, and all inventories of or receivables or proceeds from meat sales, shall be held by a packer in trust for the benefit of all unpaid cash sellers until full payment has been received.

That is something that has worked very well in the United States. Since 1976 there has not been a case there of a producer having lost a cent in marketing his produce. We can observe the results very closely and try to do something similar in this country. What happens is, very simply, that every sale across the border is deemed to be a cash sale unless some other agreement is made so that cash sale, by agreement with the producer, is given some terms of sale. But unless it is deemed otherwise, the cash sale is deemed to be made. In this situation most producers feel that the product is theirs until they are paid for it, but under the law here that is not the case. The packer having offered as security the value of goods secured but not paid for, awards to the bank the value of such goods in the case of a bankruptcy or receiving order. He does so without the knowledge or consent of the producer.

What we have here are two people thinking that they have title to the same goods and, as a result of the law being as it is, the producer is the one who comes out on the short end of the stick. The packer now has the legal right to do so. The producer believes, on the basis of morality and justice, that he has the right to expect full payment. As I said, this conviction or belief of the producer is not upheld in the law as it was previously written under section 88 nor is it upheld in clause 178 of the new bill.

I think that if packing plants are going to operate, they should finance their operations on their own equity. They should not expect the producers who sell to them to put up their equity so that the packing plants can literally finance their operations on somebody else's goods. It is tantamount to stealing, if this kind of thing is allowed to go on. You can almost make the case that if the situation is allowed to continue, we might find that some of the poorer operators would be allowed to continue in business, when really they are in the kind of condition that will put them out of business financially. They can hang on merely because they can make use of somebody else's equity. I do not believe that this should be allowed to continue.

There are three changes that I should like to see made when this bill gets to committee. We suggest that under clause 178 (6)(b) there should be a reference to a grower of products of agriculture, which would eliminate the specific reference to the dairy industry and the direct producers of the soil. That would include all agricultural products. Also under clause 178.(1)(a), to which the hon. member for Bow River referred, we should change the word "procure" to purchase. That simply means that when a processor acquires something, it is not his until he has actually purchased it and paid for it. Really that is nothing more than common sense. For the life of me I cannot understand why this has been allowed to continue in its present form without some correction before now.

I have in front of me—forgive me, colleagues—the Liberal party agricultural platform which was released from the Liberal National Campaign Headquarters on January 30. In part it reads as follows:

A change in the revision to the Bank Act (section 88) will be made in order to permit better financial security for the farmer, on agricultural produce in transit storage or processing, by providing protection to producers of all agricultural products (not just crop and dairy products) and that protection will be extended to a maximum of $250,000.

This was a campaign promise which was simply not carried out in the present act.

Mr. Deans: And you are surprised?

Mr. Mayer: I suppose I should not be surprised, but that does not mean I cannot hope. According to the formula the level has been raised from $7,500 to $20,000. I would submit that even going to $250,000 is not adequate. I think the level should be removed completely. What we are talking about here is a principle, not necessarily putting a figure on it. The principle is simply that something is not yours and you cannot use it for whatever purpose you decide until it is fully paid for. It seem to me that should be a very simple principle to accept in law.

This kind of recommendation was made also in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs back on March 20 under recommendation 22, when they said that concern was expressed about the priority of banks over unpaid sellers of livestock in the hands of the processors under section 177(5) of the proposed act, and the adequacy of the base amount of the exemption. That was the act which was then in front of us. Recommendation 22 reads as follows:

> That sellers of livestock be added to the list of those claimants dealt with under section 177(5)(b) and that the base amount of the exemption be increased. The proposed indexing method is accepted by the committee, but on the higher base figure.

This is something which has been talked about for a long time, and I would certainly like to see it carried out. Also I should like to refer to what the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) said when he introduced this bill on May 1, as reported at page 623 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

> Furthermore, the Senate committee and the Cattlemen's Association have expressed concern about certain other features of clause 178 of the bill. The government will seek to prevent overlapping and confusion in the law and to ensure fairness in its operation.

I would submit that fairness at the minimum is simply ensuring producers that, when they sell something, in fact they are paid for it before it is taken away from them. When the minister says "fairness", I hope he means that, and that he will take a serious look at seeing that these kinds of recommendations and amendments are made in the bill.

The parliamentary secretary said that he would like to see the bill moved forward expeditiously, and I would certainly agree with that. I do not want to prolong the debate. Many things have been covered so far, but I should like to make one brief reference to my concerns over the banks and their intention or hope of getting into the leasing business. This is something that should be looked at very closely. I think the banks are in a little different position than other institutions in the country, in fact they are in the business of allocating money and seeing who gets loans. I think we must look very seriously at whether the banks getting into the leasing business, in competition with some of the other financial institutions and some of the automobile companies around the country, is something we want to let happen. We do not want to see it happen without taking a very serious look at it. I would rather see banks in the position of lending money to people who are in the leasing business and then let the leasing companies go on about their business as they have been.

But my main concern is the two or three things which I find not entirely in keeping with the campaign promises of the Liberals and not in keeping with the recommendations made by the previous finance committee over a year ago. I intend to pursue those matters at committee to see that we have some amendments brought in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when the minister introduced this bill on May 1, as reported at page 620 of Hansard, he said the following:

> —the main purpose of the bill is to strengthen and develop the Canadian financial system through the promotion of effective and equitable competition.

Then he went on a couple of paragraphs later to say the following:

> The chartered banks, serving the public from over 7,450 branches, with total Canadian dollar assets at the end of 1979 in excess of $147 billion and foreign currency assets, based on their domestic and international business, of about $82 billion, are central in Canada's financial system.

We agree with the minister's contention that the banks are central to our financial and economic system, but we disagree with him completely when he implies, and in fact says very plainly, that in his view we have a banking system in which there is competition and that this act will serve to strengthen that system of competition. In our view there is no real competition in the banking business.

Probably over 90 per cent of the assets of the banks to which I have just referred belong to the big five banking companies—the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank, and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Their assets are tremendous, over $200 billion. They control by themselves, or with and through their associations with the other major corporations in this country, all the major business and industrial facets of Canadian life. In our view this bill gives the banks virtually everything they have asked for in recent years. It does so although the banks have not played the part we believe they should have played in strengthening and developing the Canadian economy.

What we have witnessed in recent years is that regional disparities are worsening, but they are accompanied by persistently high unemployment and low rates of job creation. We have the highest rate of unemployment of any of the western industrialized countries plus Japan. The deterioration of the manufacturing factor is continuing. That sector's share of the national work force was 26 per cent in 1970, and it has dropped to 19 per cent in 1979. In 1970, 21 per cent of Canada's exports were manufactured goods. Today they represent just 10 per cent. In 1970 Canada had a $3 billion deficit in manufactured goods trade, and last year it was $11.5 billion.

Foreign domination continues in most of the key sectors of our economy including petroleum, base metals, rubber, autos, chemicals, electrical products, and natural resources in general. Research and development are inadequately funded. We allocate the lowest percentage of gross national product of any of the industrialized countries of the world for scientific research and development. In the past five years $13.8 billion in dividends and interest payments left this country, and a further $8.5 billion left in management fees, patent fees, licence fees, copyright fees and other similar payments. Our economy is potentially strong in resources, yet it is saddled with persistent and worsening weaknesses which point to the need for a large scale industrial strategy to change that imbalance and to gain control of and give direction to the economy.

What we need are efficient world-scale industries and efficient capital markets to finance the necessary technological and modernization changes. We need Canadian control over the economy to stop the drain of resources to foreign parents.

I had the opportunity and privilege of spending a couple of days in Japan last October. We had a briefing from our ambassador to Japan during which he described the Japanese industrial strategy and approach to scientific research and development. When I got back to Canada I was able to get a copy of the summary of that program described by our ambassador. Any resemblance between the Japanese system of free enterprise and our system of free enterprise is completely coincidental. No corporation or large business in Japan would dream of expanding without consultation with and approval by the government of Japan, to determine that what was proposed was in the interest not just of the company, but in the interest of the people of Japan and of the country.

There is not the slightest possibility that a Japanese company could have done what International Nickel has done, that is, take the money it had made in Canada in profits, along with loans received from the Government of Canada, to develop mines in Guatemala and Indonesia which are in competition with their Canadian operations and which have led to a very sharp reduction in the work force with major lay-offs in Sudbury and Thompson in my own province of Manitoba. No Japanese company would have dreamed of doing that because it simply would not be permitted, yet it is done in Canada all the time.

We say there is an obvious instrument at hand, the instrument we are debating at the present time, the banking system. By virtue of the chartered banks' self-proclaimed role as the major financial intermediaries in our economy, the banks collect and distribute huge amounts of capital. Under the direction of the government these pools of capital could and should be used to promote economic development which would benefit the country as a whole, while reversing foreign domination.

We have conferred tremendous economic power on the banks because of the way the banking system has evolved in Canada, yet the banks have been left alone to develop their own distribution and investment policies, regardless of the national interest. What the government is proposing with this bill is more of the same.

Because the Government of Canada, and I am talking about the present Liberal government, that short-term Conservative government we had last year, and previous Liberal and Conservative governments, had no industrial strategy, no clearly thought out objectives and no plans to bolster the manufacturing sector, which employs a smaller and smaller percentage of the labour force, the banks are being permitted and encouraged to concentrate on making profits. I do not blame them for doing that because that is why they are in business. I blame governments for not seeing that they do the job they should be doing. They have played an important role in the mergers that have swept this country, and which, I submit, bring no real benefit to the people of Canada.

Let me just give a few examples of what I am referring to here. We have the Hudson's Bay Company gobbling up Simpsons-Sears, only to find that they in turn were gobbled up by the Thompson interest which then proceeded to buy FP Publishers. Then we had Brascan, with the help and the financial co-operation of the Canadian Imperial Bank, moving to take over Woolworth's, a move which was unsuccessful, only to find themselves taken over by Seagram's.

The last of the illustrations I want to give tonight has reference to Dome Petroleum which has bought up in recent years Kayser Resources, Siemans Oil and Gas and a large part of TransCanada PipeLines, and this company has not paid a nickel in corporation income taxes since its incorporation because of the way in which our tax laws have been written and the way companies like Dome Petroleum can manipulate these tax laws.

Let me add just one more point about Dome Petroleum. It was the Calgary Herald, certainly no radical journal, that had a major article some months ago in which it was pointed out that for every dollar which Dome Petroleum invests in searching for oil and gas in the Beaufort Sea it gets back 97 cents from the Canadian taxpayer in the form of tax rebates. We have a system where the Canadian people pay for the search for oil and gas but the benefits go almost entirely to Dome Petroleum.

Instead of the banks being involved in fostering and helping more mergers, as they have in recent years, their investments should have gone into increasing the productive capacity of this country.

We oppose this bill because there is nothing in it that we can find which does anything to control the exorbitant profits the banks have made in recent years, and which would control the tremendous growth in the assets the banks have benefited from in those years.

Let me try to put some of the figures on the record, and I will try to be as brief as I can. Let me compare the assets and the profits of the five major banks as they were in 1973, and in 1979, six years later.

The Toronto-Dominion Bank in 1973 had assets of $9.4 billion, and by 1979 they had grown to $28.2 billion. Its profits in 1973 were $52.7 million, and in 1979 they had increased to $160.4 million.

The Bank of Nova Scotia in 1973 had assets of $10.3 billion, and by 1979 they had grown to $34.8 billion. Its profits in 1973 were $56.8 million, which had grown in 1979 to $180.9 million.

The Bank of Montreal has assets in 1973 of $14.4 billions, and by 1979 they had grown to $38.1 billion. Its profits were $68.5 million in 1973 and they were $228.7 million in 1979.

The Royal Bank had assets in 1973 of $18.3 billion, and by 1979 they had grown to about $57 billion. It had profits in 1973 of $99.2 million, and by 1979 these had grown to $270.7 million.

The Canadian Imperial Bank had assets of $16.1 billion in 1973, which had grown to $45.995 billion in 1979. Their profits went from $92.9 million in 1973 to over $201 million in 1979.

Let me summarize those figures. The increase in assets in those six years from 1973 to 1979 was over 300 per cent, and the increase in profits was over 250 per cent. Let me put just one more figure on the record. In 1975, the year in which the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Liberal government felt that our inflation had reached crisis proportions, to combat inflation the government brought in the wage and price control program, and profits increased over 1974 by 46 per cent. It is the banks which should have had their profits controlled rather than the workers having their wages controlled.

We believe that the profits of the banks should be controlled and that they can be controlled by the government—because it controls the interest rates—by the interest rate spreads and by surtaxes on bank profits.

We are opposed to this act for another reason. This act would permit and indeed encourage bank directors to hold other business directorships. We believe that that is bad for this country, and we are not alone in this belief. As respected an organization as the New York Times said several months ago about Canada's policy of permitting bank directors to participate in interlocking directorships:

> The concentration of banks is so great—

And they are talking about Canadian banks.

> —and the alliances of companies with specific banks so strong that a single bank can find itself financing both the suitor and the sought. Such was the case last fall for the Bank of Commerce when Brascan went after Woolworth's.

The Times went on to say:

> The banks with their corps of 60 or 70 directors each and their circling clans of corporations also provide the detailed intelligence system so vital in the fraternity that is Canada's business establishment. This, and a system of interlocking directorates, provide the tips, the data, the shared experiences and, above all, the connections that smooth Canada's merger movement. It is no coincidence, for instance, that Consumers Gas and Hiram Walker, both use Toronto-Dominion, where Hiram's chairman, H. Clifford Hatch, is a director.
> Many in this network grew up at the same elite schools together, such as Upper Canada College. They join the same clubs, such as the Toronto, Ontario or Albany Clubs. Their children marry within the network.

That is not my view, although I subscribe to it. That is the view of as important and serious an organization as the New York Times.

We did a little work to see how this system of interlocking directorates really works in this free enterprise system of ours. I would like to put on the record a few illustrations.

Let me begin with the Bank of Nova Scotia. The chairman is Cedric E. Ritchie, who is also the president and chief executive officer. Among his other directorships, and I will not list all of them because it would take too long, are Empire Realty Company—there is the real estate industry; The Canada Life Assurance Company—there is the insurance industry; and Olympic Trust of Canada. George C. Hitchman is deputy chairman, and among other companies is director of Algoma Central Railway. So, the railways are represented. E. J. Courtois is vice-president and director of Gaz Métropolitain, which takes care of the gas distribution system in Quebec, Trizec Corporation—the giant real estate developers—Brinco Limited, Norcen Energy Resources Limited and Phoenix Steel, to mention a few. The hon. John B. Aird—and I am sure that my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) will remember Mr. Aird when he was a Senator and chief fund raiser for the Liberal party—is not just a director of the Bank of Nova Scotia, but is also a director of Algoma Central Railway, Consolidated-Bathurst, Domglas Incorporated, National Life Assurance Company; and I could go on and on.

Let us look at the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the chairman and chief executive officer, Richard M. Thomson. Mr. Thomson is also director of Cadillac Fairview Corporation—another giant in the construction industry; Canadian Gypsum Company, Eaton's of Canada, the Prudential Insurance Company, Texasgulf Incorporated. J. Allan Boyle, president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, is also a director of Regtor Investments Limited, Excelsior Life Insurance Company, and Aetna Casualty Company.

Mr. Fulton: Is he a Liberal?

Mr. Orlikow: That is not given in the summary. Let us look at the Bank of Montreal. Fred McNeil is the chairman and chief executive officer and is also a director of Canadian Canners Limited, the Dominion Life Assurance Company and Seagram Company Limited, to mention a few. Lucien G. Rolland, the vice-president of the Bank of Montreal, is director of Rolland Paper Company, Bell Canada, Great Lakes Reinsurance Company, Inco Limited and the Steel Company of Canada. There is not a facet of our economy in which the bank directors do not play a major, if not a completely dominating, role.

The chairman and chief executive officer of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is Russell Harrison. He is also the director of the Canada Life Assurance Company, the Dominion Realty Company, Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited, and Royal Insurance Company of Canada. Lawrence Greenwood, the executive vice-president, is a director of the Dominion Realty Company, Kinross Mortgage Corporation, Imperial Life Assurance Company and Liberty Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. Fulton: It sounds like a great big pork barrel, David.

Mr. Orlikow: That is exactly what it is. Each of them scratches the other's back. Another executive of the Commerce Bank is E. F. McLean. He is a director of Canada Packers Limited, Canadian General Electric Company, the Dominion Realty, The Steel Company of Canada. Then we come to a distinguished citizen of my own city, George T. Richardson, who is a director of James Richardson and Sons, Hudson's Bay Company, Pioneer Grain Company, Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company and Inco Limited.

Now I come to that giant of banks in Canada, the Royal Bank of Canada, which has as its chairman W. Earle McLaughlin. He is a director of Sun Alliance Insurance Company, Algoma Steel Corporation, Canadian Pacific Limited, General Motors Corporation, Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, Power Corporation of Canada, and so on. The vice-chairman, Jock K. Finlayson, has a directorship on Royal Bank of Canada Trust Corporation, PanCanadian Petroleum Limited, Royal Insurance Company of Canada, Sun Life Assurance Company, and it goes on.

Now I come to a gentleman who has, along with his company, played a major and, I am sorry to say, not a very productive role in my own city, Ian Sinclair, the head of Canadian Pacific Limited. Along with being a director of the Royal Bank of Canada he is a director of Canadian Pacific Limited, Canadian Pacific Investments Limited, Canadian Pacific Airlines, Cominco Limited, Canadian Marconi, MacMillan Bloedel Limited, Marathon Realty Company, the Seagram Company, Sun Life Assurance Company, and it goes on.

With regard to Mr. Sinclair, I will illustrate something that is quite interesting. The only way in which the people of Canada could find out that Mr. Sinclair has a salary—and I am speaking from memory—of something like $350,000 a year was due to the United States law that when a company sells shares in that country the company must file a statement for the public showing what the officers of that company receive in the way of salaries. We have no law like that, so Canadians can only learn about Mr. Sinclair because of the American law. Mr. Sinclair went to court in the United States to stop that great radical journal, the Vancouver Sun, which thought that its subscribers had ample reason to have that kind of information. He went to the United States courts to try to stop the Securities and Exchange commission from presenting that kind of information.

That is just a short set of illustrations about the kind of interlocking directorships we have in our major corporations and the kind of power which they exert. As the New York Times put it so well, these people work together, live together and play together, and they look after each other's interests. I am not certain that their interests are always necessarily the interests of the ordinary people of Canada. I hoped that a Bank Act would try to plug some of the loopholes, some of the ways in which these kinds of people and these corporations have been able to amass tremendous profits, greatly increased profits, and seen large growth in their assets in recent years at the expense of and through overpayment by the Canadian people.

Let me close by giving some examples of how the bank directors' corporate connections work. I have been talking about Mr. Sinclair, Canadian Pacific Limited, and C.P. Investments Limited which has grown so rapidly to such a tremendous size that today's Montreal Gazette reports that the assets are now over $7 billion.

On the board of directors of Canadian Pacific Limited are the following directors of banks; W. E. McLaughlin, P. Paré, C. Pratte and A. M. Runciman who are all directors of the Royal Bank of Canada; T. G. Rust, F. H. Sherman, R. D. Wolfe, who are all directors of the Bank of Nova Scotia; H. J. Lang, J. H. Moore, who are directors of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce; L. G. Rolland, F. S. Burbidge, G. A. Hart, and D. Kinnear, who are all directors of the Bank of Montreal.

Let us look now at Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. This is a major energy corporation. Its directors include E. J. Courtois, who is a director of the Bank of Nova Scotia; A. S. Leach, R. Lavoie, who are directors of the Bank of Montreal; E. C. Bovey, who is a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce; and W. O. Twaits, who is a director of the Royal Bank of Canada.

Let us look at another one of our prominent corporations, and that is International Nickel. Included in its board of directors are the following: J. E. Carter and A. T. Lambert, who are directors of the Toronto-Dominion Bank; G. T. Richardson who is a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce; L. G. Rolland, C. F. Baird, J. P. Gordon and G. A. Hart, who are directors of the Bank of Montreal; D. G. Willmot and D. W. Barr, who are directors of the Bank of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Fulton: Same old gang.

Mr. Orlikow: I could go on, but as my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has just said, it is the same old gang. It is the same old gang who have been controlling and running this country I suppose ever since there was a country. They have grown rich and fat as a result of the work and effort of the Canadian people.

We are not opposed to the profit system. We believe that in the foreseeable future there will be in this country, as in most of the countries of the world, a mixed economy in which there will be a part of it owned, operated, and controlled by the people, and a large segment of the economy which will be owned and operated by the private sector. We are not opposed to that. But we may have what may seem a strange idea to many members of this House, particularly to members of the Liberal and Conservative parties, that is, we believe that the profits should be reasonable and that prices charged to Canadians should be such as they can afford to pay, still leaving a reasonable profit to the company. We do not believe that this Bank Act, which we have before us, does that or attains those objectives for the Canadian people. We believe that when this Bank Act is passed it will be essentially as it has been brought before us, because the Liberal party has a majority in this Parliament. I do not expect my Conservative friends on this side of the House to put up any real opposition to important sections of this bill.

An hon. Member: They have to scratch the same friends' backs.

Mr. Orlikow: Therefore, I assume that this bill will emerge, when it is finally dealt with by Parliament, much as it is today. We do not believe that this bill will meet the needs of the Canadian people, that it will give them the kind of financial system which they need, that it will protect them against exorbitant profits such as the banks have made in recent years, and for those reasons, and for many others which my colleagues will be dealing with, it is our intention to vote against this bill.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise and speak on Bill C-6. In my opinion it is time that the Bank Act was improved and changed. Many of the revisions that are presently included in the bill before the House have been before this House of Commons for a good number of years, as was pointed out previously by another speaker.

It is time for improvement, despite the fact that the banking system in this country is probably the very foundation of our free enterprise system, a system that has worked immeasurably well not only for Canada but for all nations in the free world. It is one that I think should be continued under that particular set of rules.

I listened with interest to some of my NDP colleagues, and although it was not included in the last speaker's speech, there have been suggestions that perhaps we should be looking at the possible nationalization of banks in Canada.

An hon. Member: The Tories want to nationalize the banks?

Mr. Corbett: I would strongly criticize that particular position if indeed it is the policy of the NDP. It is very, very difficult to try to determine what NDP policy is this day. As a matter of fact that party was instrumental in introducing a motion into this House which brought about the downfall of an extremely responsible government last December. The members of the NDP are sitting here on this side of the House as though they were the epitome of righteousness, condemning the very government they put in place and helped to support during the early years of the 1970s. We would see this situation again, I am sure, if the same set of circumstances were in vogue. It has been well said by a colleague that lack of principle is quite obvious.

During this time of repression, I look with interest at the great nationalization nation. I suppose the great champion of the nationalizing nations of the world is Sweden. Sweden has recently been in the news and we can now see the nationalization of its industries, including financial institutions, which was supposed to be such a workable situation among businesses, banks and unions and things of this nature that make it all happen, make the economy go around, and create jobs, seems to have fallen apart at the seams. The same thing very nearly happened in Great Britain. Fortunately for Great Britain and the people there, a Conservative government was elected last year or the year before. They are now in the process of salvaging what little bit was left after a decade or more of a socialist-labour government, the counterparts of the Canadian NDP.

As was stated by a former speaker, apparently the NDP approach to the solutions of the country's ills is to lower the interest rates. This seems to be the whole thrust of their position, lower the interest rates, get the interest rates down at all costs. It does not matter that it will deter the investment of foreign capital in this country, that foreign investors would obviously not be interested in coming to this country with their investment money which this country of 22 million or 23 million people dearly requires.

An hon. Member: What is your policy?

Mr. Corbett: The policy of this party when we were in power was to encourage foreign investment for the benefit of Canadians so that the net result would be a better way of life and better standard of living for Canadians. It is unfortunate that that policy did not have an opportunity to be implemented and put into place.

The other interesting aspect of lower interest rates and all of the goodies bundled up into the NDP package seems to be that, if there is not enough money to go around, we will crank up the old printing machine, grind out more dollar bills, hang them on the line, and hopefully we will not need them until such time as they have had an opportunity to dry on the line, and with those dollars we will purchase all of the goodies and provide all of the jobs that we so desperately need in this country.

What they conveniently neglect to address themselves to is what happens to all of the goods and services that are not presently available in Canada because our manufacturing service is not currently manufacturing all the necessities of life that Canadians need in order to enjoy the lifestyles that they have become accustomed to enjoying.

What about the cost of lettuce during the winter months as it comes to us from California, and all the other imported foodstuffs that come into this country? How do we afford them? I know the answer. Just speed up the old printing machine, crank out more dollars, put more dollars in the pockets of the people. It does not matter that they are worthless.

Canada is a marvellous country with probably the greatest future, provided we don't blow it with such frivolous policies as the NDP might force upon us. I suppose one of the suggestions, if everything else is to be nationalized, is that the unions should be nationalized as well and brought under the control of government. I have never heard anyone from that party address themselves to that, but I suspect that would just naturally flow. Unions would become part of the nationalized process as well. Perhaps at some other time we could have some comment on that situation from the NDP.

Last year the net debt of this country was billions of dollars. It is a debt we certainly cannot afford. We have lost more man-hours in this country through strikes than any other nation in the world, and the loss to the economy of these dollars is just fantastic. I am very concerned that the irresponsible attitude of the present government, backed up by its cohorts on this side to my left, is contributing not only to labour unrest but to the fact that our production is among the worst in the world of the industrialized nations. It is great fun, and I suppose it makes great political games for the socialists to take on the hustings when the time comes, but this is a very serious business and very serious situation.

I point that out because I feel that nationalization is not the solution to this country's ills. I believe that the banks in this country have proved to be an immeasurable success with their contributions to this country, and to the very foundations that have made this nation great, and made all free nations of the world great under the free enterprise system. Obviously the banks of this country know their business. They know it very well.

As has been pointed out, the banks are extremely successful. They are successful in the business they are in, the money business. Their profits are more than respectable; in fact, they are questionable. There is no question about it. When profits exceed those amounts that can be rationalized by any thinking person in this country, then we must take a look at the way those dollars are made and at whose expense.

How do they do as well as they do? One reason is not by being a bunch of nice guys. The banking institutions of this country have formulated a policy over the years of obtaining collateral that, quite frequently has to be at least equal to and in a good many instances surpasses that of the particular loan or whatever that company or individual might want to have from them. Of course one of the reasons they have been able to do this is because they have had a corner on the money market of this nation for so long.

We have had relatively few banking institutions in this country as banks are known to most individuals. It is a healthy sign that we, as a nation, are prepared to look at and accept that there is room for competition in the banking industry. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), the important aspect of competition in the banking industry is that the profits coming into the country through the medium of a bank if it is foreign controlled, are reinvested in Canadian businesses or businesses that are going to accrue major benefits to the Canadian people and the Canadian nation.

The attitude of banks over a period of years on a good many occasions and in a good many instances has been ruthless. They have had an opportunity to charge service charges when profits were in a very excessive position. The inclusion of new banks where profits are going to be reinvested in Canada will be of benefit to the nation.

Banks should stay in the business that they know. I am disappointed that this bill does not deal with that. In fact it seems purposely to exclude it. One of the most important provisions in the new Bank Act that has caused concern is the section that will permit the banks to enter into the auto leasing field, presumably in competition with auto dealers and others now involved. On the face of it one might consider that competition of this kind can have obvious benefits. I doubt if this would be the case.

I have discussed this matter with my hon. friend from Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) and others, and he and I, along with a good many others in the House, have concluded that the public might not benefit if auto dealers, the heart of the business community in many cities and towns, particularly in the rural areas, are jeopardized by unfair competition. So we have to ask: when is competition unfair? Mr. Speaker, it is unfair when the rules are changed without giving all those in the field equal opportunity. The banks already receive many benefits and have no responsibility in the auto business in terms of keeping facilities open. If we change the rules we must be careful of the result. If the result is to bankrupt auto dealerships, the public gains nothing.

The auto industry is presently passing through a particularly strenuous period. Every day we read in the newspaper about auto plants shutting down, the difficulties which Chrysler is experiencing, and the decline in sales. Many dealerships are making only a marginal profit, and some are making no profit at all. Their position, in relation to that of the banks, is very serious. It is my opinion, and the opinion of a great many members of this House, that the public would be much better served if the business of auto leasing were left in the hands of those who understand this business best. It should be left in the hands of those who obviously have the facilities to conduct it; the dealers have the repair shops and, more important still, they have a close interest because automobiles are their primary source of income. I would urge the minister to re-evaluate his position on the question of the banks entering the leasing field and to introduce provisions which would protect a vital and important section of business in Canada.

I should like to deal, as well, with the subject of credit cards and banking institutions—the buy now and pay later plans to which we are so often exposed in this country. I suggest it is not always in the best interests of the public when loans which likely command an extremely high rate of interest are not only available to the public but are promoted. We have all seen the signs in the windows of the banking institutions—"Come to the land of fun and sun," showing mama and papa and what-not basking in the sunlight on some tropical island. The message is, "Don't worry about the cost because you can go now and pay some time in the future when you get round to thinking about it." Mr. Speaker, we know this is not reality; this is not the way things are. This is a cold-hearted world, though people are somewhat prone to forget it. I do not think it is healthy for this nation to be bombarded with advertising of that type and to become a nation of debtors because banks and other financial institutions are determined to increase their profits at the expense of people who might be carried away by an urge to do someting they can ill afford.

I would ask the minister to consider some type of regulation which would deal with this type of promotion promising a life in the sun, a never-never land with no need to worry about paying for it. Life does not work that way, and part of the problem we are experiencing today has arisen because far too much of this so-called easy money has been available. We are paying for it now, and we shall be doing so for many years to come.

Another item to which I should like to address my remarks tonight has to do with agriculture. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in his place over there. I am pleased to see him in his place this evening where he can have the benefit of some of the opinions which have been expressed with regard to the farming industry. Attention has already been directed to the difficulties in which producers find themselves when stock and carcasses become the property of the processors, under the Bank Act, before they have actually been paid for.

I suppose there is no single group of individuals in this country who have to work harder than the farmers, or who experience more difficulty in making ends meet. They are having to deal with the burden of rising costs—around 10 per cent last year—and decreasing receipts at the same time in the order of 10 per cent, or perhaps 7 per cent. I urge the Minister of Agriculture to plead with his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), to include some provision in this bill to protect producers when their carcasses, cattle or hogs, are taken over by the processors in the event of a bankruptcy. I agree this is an unusual situation, but I believe we should show some compassion toward these people whose work is so vital to the nation, by dispensing with the provision in the bill which places them in the same class as International Harvester or any other of the equipment companies and suppliers in the eventuality of a processor going bankrupt. When the carcasses are not paid for, the farmer has not received his just due.

There is one other item in the bill which I find somewhat distressing. It seems that Parliament is to lose the right to grant charters to banks. I suggest this is an erosion of the rights of Parliament. Heaven knows, under the present government, in the last ten years there has been a great deal of erosion of the rights of Parliament, and I question the motives of the administration in including such a provision in the act. As I understand it, we will no longer have the right to debate in this House the issuance of new banking charters in this country. The authority is to be given to cabinet or some extension of the government, and these charters will not be brought before the House for debate.

I do not believe this is a healthy situation. I do not believe it is healthy for the future of the country to have this continuing erosion, because of a government that is now well known to be arrogant in a good many of its directions and decisions. Now to have another erosion of the rights of the members of this House of Commons, to discuss the issuance of bank charters, to the Canadian nation bodes ill for the future of the country, and I ask the minister to take this under consideration.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, in joining for a few moments in the debate on Bill C-6 I must admit that I am partly prompted by some of the remarks from our colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—

Mr. Orlikow: Thank you.

Mr. Stevens: —who, in his usual socialistic style, tried to get the best of all worlds. I say that because I find it odd to hear these socialists who sit on our left somehow criticizing the government and telling the government that it is not doing things properly, notwithstanding the fact that the government we now look at across the floor would not be in power if it had not been for our socialist cousins to my left.

An hon. Member: Socialist cousins? We are not related to you, Slasher.

Mr. Rae: I am not even your blood brother.

Mr. Fulton: We have nothing to do with you.

An hon. Member: Insults.

Mr. Stevens: The thing I find so strange about the line taken by the socialists generally, and in particular tonight by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, is how totally out of touch they are with the reality of the world, and how inconsistent they are in their arguments.

For example, the hon. member for Winnipeg North has told us that Canada needs world scale industries. Apparently he took a trip to Japan, which I am pleased he was able to do, and he was quite impressed with the way their industries are working. However, I would not have believed it if I had not been sitting in this House; before the same hon. gentleman sat down, he was criticizing our banks for being too big. He was indicating that somehow or other there was a strange relationship between the boards of directors of banks and the directors of corporations in Canada, presumably all because somehow or other in his mind that is capitalism, and capitalism is a nasty word to a socialist.

Mr. Rae: Not a nasty word; it is a nasty system.

Mr. Stevens: Let us get something into perspective. We heard that the hon. member for Winnipeg North went to Japan. I wonder if, while he was in Japan, he noted that of the 50 largest banks outside of the United States 18 are in Japan. Japan dominates banking worldwide outside the United States. The reason I mention this is that, included in those 18 Japanese banks, are 13 Japanese banks which are larger than our largest bank, the Royal Bank of Canada. The largest Japanese bank, Dai-ichi Kangyo Bank, had assets in 1978 of $73.5 billion, more than twice those of the Royal Bank of Canada. My socialist friend, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), has indicated—because he always reads faithfully Fortune magazine—that it is all set out in Fortune magazine.

Mr. Rae: You are using my copy.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I am. This is the first time a socialist ever did anything for me.

Mr. Fulton: He is your cousin, Sinc.

Mr. Stevens: However, as is pointed out in the August 12, 1979, edition of Fortune, Canadian banks slipped in their rating for the second year in a row. We now have only three Canadian banks which are listed among the 50 largest in the world outside the United States. If we include the American banks, we find we now have only two banks which are included in the largest 50 of the world. The reason I comment on this is that I think, certainly in this House and hopefully in the halls of government, a new sense of reality will start coming back into Canada. We seem to have become insular. We make speeches such as the one I heard from our socialist friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North. At one time he states we do not have what he calls world scale industries, and before he sits down he decries any worthwhile relatively big company we have in the country and also points out how there is a nasty interlocking of directorships. If he did not check into this when he was in Japan, I ask him now to check the interrelationship between the banks and industrial concerns in Japan. What is the interrelationship between the banks and industries in Germany?

Mr. Orlikow: And the government?

Mr. Stevens: I think it is time we stopped burying our heads in the sand and trying to play, as I said at the beginning, this House for the best of all worlds. Hon. members to my left brought upon the Canadian public the government we now have ruling this country, and I think it is high time the socialists accepted that responsibility and stopped standing up in this House as if they had nothing to do with the government with which we are now faced.

Mr. Rae: It was your incompetence.

Mr. Stevens: At the same time that the hon. member for Winnipeg North was belabouring the growth of bank assets in this country—and I want to touch on that in a moment—I noted that he carefully avoided commenting on the deficit that he and his socialist friends assisted the government across from us in running up.

Mr. Orlikow: What about the deficit in Ontario?

Mr. Stevens: We did not hear them comment about the fact that during the years they were allied, this Liberal Trudeau regime ran up the deficit, which was merely $676 million in 1974, to $12.9 billion by 1978. I am pleased that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is in the House here tonight. He has warned us that the deficit could be over $14 billion in the current year. Is it not curious that our socialist friend in one speech belabours certain things because he says that that is capitalism, but on the other hand he and his colleagues mute their criticism of their friends in the present Trudeau government who have run up a deficit of a budgetary nature such as the one to which I have just referred?

Mr. Fulton: Let us hear about the difference between you and them.

Mr. Stevens: The difference was over $3 billion, and if the hon. member had been in the House that night, he would not have voted with his friends the socialists.

Mr. Rae: He was here. We were all here.

Mr. Stevens: Speaking about growth in bank assets, I think it is wise that we get it into perspective in two senses. First, I have indicated that, if anything, the Canadian chartered banks are actually losing ground in the world banking community as far as size is concerned. However, second, I suggest that the mere fact that the banks have grown at such a rapid rate should be one of the reasons our socialist cousins should be standing up in this House and saying, "Let us get on with the passage of Bill C-6 so that we can in turn bring the foreign banks under at least some type of control or regulation as contemplated in Bill C-6".

Here are the facts: In 1968, which was the year after the present Bank Act was passed, total bank assets in Canada were $36.7 billion. At the end of last year they had reached $225 billion. Of that amount, in 1968, about 21 per cent of their assets were made up in the form of currency. Today it is approximately 36 per cent. I think it is healthy that we have institutions which have got out into the world market and have been able to increase their assets in that market to the extent I have indicated. So we should be encouraging, not discouraging, those banking institutions in their endeavours to be, I suggest, world-scale industrial companies, or banks in this case, of which, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, we needed more.

The reason I will suggest tonight to hon. members that we get on with passing Bill C-6 is that it behooves this House to recognize that the Bank Act is one of the few sunset types of legislation that we have in existence in Canada. It is a good concept, the concept that you pass a bill for a limited term, that you can review it, amend it, and then repass it, presumably with improvements. Initially it was intended that the Bank Act should be passed every ten years after a suitable review in committee and in this Parliament. That review has taken place. There have been prolonged debates with respect to the revision of the Bank Act.

Let me review what has happened since 1975. In that year the Department of Finance asked interested parties to submit briefs, in time, they said, for the preparation of the 1977 revision of the Bank Act. In August of 1976 a white paper was published in which the general principles to be incorporated in the new Bank Act were set out. By the fall of 1976, the Senate banking committee requested and received a special reference to study that white paper. The House requested the same reference but the government refused to pass a motion in agreement because opposition members were not agreeable to limiting the House debate on this issue. That was in the fall of 1976.

In June of 1977 the Senate issued its report for government study. The government again requested submissions from interested parties. Some delay was caused by provincial objections that membership in the Canadian Payments Association required holding reserves with the Bank of Canada, that is, the near banks which, under the jurisdiction of the provinces, would have to hold reserves with the Bank of Canada. The provincial objections became quite loud as they felt that somehow their responsibility for near banks was being jeopardized.

The government of the day then decided to rethink those proposals and came to an understanding with the provinces. Meanwhile, the old bill, that is, the present Bank Act, which would have been extended to June, 1978, was extended once again. The opposition was anxious that a new bill be introduced, yet the government said it needed more time to study the recommendations. By May 18, 1978, we had introduced Bill C-57 which contained most of the broad proposals set out in the white paper but made a major departure from the white paper on the issue of the reserve requirements of the near banks. In June of 1978 the session ended and the bill died on the order paper. On November 2, Bill C-15 was re-introduced, which was substantially in the same form as Bill C-57, and after a very brief House debate it was referred to the finance committee of the House. The committee studied the bill, many witnesses were called and heard, and briefs were received. What I found so odd as I sat listening to the debate here tonight was to hear our socialist friends—

Mr. Knowles: Cousins.

Mr. Stevens: —now criticizing this bill, notwithstanding the fact that a representative from that party sat during those committee proceedings, heard the evidence, agreed with the in-camera recommendations that were arrived at, and agreed to the report which was finally tabled in the House.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know that the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) would not want to mislead the House. The member to whom he is referring, Mr. Saltzman, filed a minority report at the time that the committee report was reported to the House of Commons last year. I am sure the hon. member for York-Peel would not want to imply that that was not the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has not made a point of order. It was a point of debate.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You certainly know the rules of this House.

Mr. Knowles: But do you know the facts?

Mr. Rae: I got my point across.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the point I am making is that again we have an example of our socialist cousins, as my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre likes to be referred to, liking to have the best of both worlds, in that while they sat through those committee hearings they accepted substantially all the recommendations and the points that were raised, but now they like to pretend that they are divorced from what went on before and they can stand up on behalf of whoever they stand up for and damn the bill, as they did tonight.

What I am suggesting is that I think the time has come, bearing in mind the long history of this legislation and the committee's reviews, for us to get on with passing Bill C-6. Certainly there are certain points which I hope will be raised in committee and there might be amendments yet to be made to this bill, but I believe it is substantially in a form that is acceptable, in a form that the people of Canada would like to see it passed and, above all, it is in the form that the financial community of the country, the industrial community and the banking community, would like to see it passed to bring some certainty back into this world instead of the uncertainty with which we have been living.

I brought us up to 1978. You will recall that when we formed the government in this country we acted promptly with respect to the bank legislation. We reviewed the reports of both the Senate committee and the House of Commons committee on the Bank Act, and in the fall of last year we introduced Bill C-14, which is substantially the bill we now have before us, namely, Bill C-6. Surely there is no disagreement in substance with regard to the provisions of Bill C-6 either from our side, from the government's side or, I suggest, from the socialists to my left. So why the prolonged debate?

If what we are witnessing is a general frustration that we were robbed of a proper budgetary debate by the Minister of Finance, whom I see in the House at present, if we are sensing in the House a degree of frustration because the theft was made, then let us do what we can to bring the Minister of Finance to account.

For example, I think it was quite proper in a committee of the House today to suggest that the interest rate review that we had instigated while we were in government be continued in a committee of the House. Frankly, I think all members of the Opposition, including the socialist members on that committee, were most startled to see that, to a man, the government members on that committee used their heavy-handed majority to vote down the mere suggestion that a committee of the House should review the interest rate structure and what could be done to achieve lower interest rates in this country, or at least to relieve the people from some of the side effects of our high interest rates.

What I am trying to point out is that surely Parliament is not functioning properly when we have before us a bill such as Bill C-6 which has been debated, or at least reviewed, since 1975. When we have a bill that is substantially agreed to on all sides of the House, surely we are not operating properly by having a prolonged debate on that bill and, at the same time, having government members virtually stalling a meaningful review by a committee of this House of interest rates in this country. Having said that, and having urged that members get on with the passage of this bill, I should like to go further and say what are some of the pluses in the legislation.

I know the foreign bank question perhaps has been one of the more controversial, contentious issues which has been raised during the debate over the years concerning the Bank Act revisions. But I would suggest that if we are properly going to come into the 1980s, it is time we accepted that there is more to be gained than to be lost in Canada by making us an international banking centre, and that is exactly what the admission of foreign banks to a greater extent into Canada will do for us. I think there are pluses to opening up the banking system in Canada and letting, under the regulations that are contemplated in the act and in the regulations, foreign bank activity grow in Canada.

Since 1967 when the present Bank Act was last revised, foreign ownership of any chartered bank in Canada, as we know, has been restricted to a maximum of 25 per cent. However, there were no restrictions placed in that act on the establishment of subsidiaries by foreign banks. Since 1967 numerous foreign bank subsidiaries and representative offices have been established in Canada. For example, in the office building in which I had my office at one time, one day I counted 26 foreign bank agencies or representative offices alone. How ludicrous it is for us to allow that situation to continue, and perhaps most important, think how we look in the eyes of the world.

At last count there are supposed to be 100 corporations doing business in Canada that, to all intents and purposes, are really in the banking business and are controlled or owned in some instances by foreign banks. About 50 foreign banks have an equity interest in these corporations according to the Department of Finance press release of May, 1980, which I know my friend, the Minister of Finance, probably wrote with his own hand.

In addition to the 50 foreign bank representative offices, there are about 30 representative banks which do not appear to have any investments in Canadian financial corporations. The total assets of Canadian affiliates of foreign banks reporting to the Bank of Canada currently exceed $6.5 billion. In short, in addition to the banking assets to which I have referred, we have a situation where there is over $6 billion of banking activity going on within the affiliates, the agencies and the representative offices of foreign banking concerns in Canada. This act will attempt to regulate to some extent that activity, and I think that is good. First, I think it is good that hopefully we will know better what those banking concerns are doing, and second, it will help our banks expand into the foreign markets that we need so badly.

Also I suggest that as we face the current account deficit that we do in this country—the worst of any western industrialized nation—it is important that we recognize that to the degree we become more of an international banking company it should help our trade activity in those foreign countries. In short, let us be less inward looking, let us be less insular, let us be more world-minded, so that we can tap some of the tremendous economic activity that is churning in the world and which could churn to our greater advantage if we accepted the reality of the world such as it is today. I would suggest that among the various reasons we could give for endorsing the concept of opening up our system to foreign banks is the need to increase competition in Canada.

As we have indicated, we have large banks. On a world basis the largest is about thirty-fourth, but in terms of Canada they are undoubtedly very large. Surely it behooves us to open up the system to allow some of the foreign concerns to lend their innovative ways, their new approaches, their new techniques and their ingenuity to our Canadian banking system. I would suggest, from people who have talked to me, that already the foreign banks in the limited extent that they have been active in the country have rejuvenated many aspects of our banking business, and I think that is to be encouraged.

One point which I think was raised very effectively at committee was that, if we do not open up our banking system, we will find that there will be less reciprocity open to us as Canadians when we try to go into foreign banking markets ourselves. In short, let us catch up to the 1980s. I feel that if the socialist rump group to my left—

Mr. Knowles: Call us friends or cousins.

Mr. Fulton: What is happening? You called us cousins before.

Mr. Orlikow: I like it better this way.

Mr. Knowles: The blood stream is all mixed up here.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why they should be so sensitive to being called a rump group.

Mr. Fulton: I thought it was cousins.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps they feel it very fitting, but what I am saying is that I think it is time that little group stopped playing it purely political, and accepted responsibility for their actions now that they have placed the Trudeau government back in power.

Mr. Fulton: I thought we had an election.

Mr. Stevens: I think it is time that they stood up and said, "We are jointly presenting Bill C-6; we hope the House will accept it; let us go get on with its passage." Instead we have heard speech after speech in which they attempt, if it suits their purpose, to disown the bill and, in any event, delay its passage.

Mr. Fulton: Name one area in which you are different from the Liberals.

Mr. Stevens: My friend is asking for one area in which we differ from the Liberals. I thought I had just mentioned one area in which we very dramatically differ from the Liberals, and that was on the question of the deficit. To me a $3.7 billion—

Mr. Orlikow: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) seeks permission to ask a question.

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder if the hon. member who is so opposed to deficit financing by government would explain to members of the House how it is that the Conservative government of Ontario has had a deficit in the millions for each of the last half dozen years or so.

Mr. Stevens: If the hon. member would like to meet with me after this evening's session, I would be very pleased to go through the budgetary position in Ontario.

Mr. Orlikow: I would like to know now.

Mr. Stevens: I think he will be most impressed to see, if capital items are taken out, that the provincial budgetary position in Ontario is now in surplus. I think the Conservative government of Premier William Davis is to be complimented for keeping a current budgetary surplus in Ontario. To the extent that I can ever be moved to compliment the NDP, of course, in this connection I have to compliment the NDP opposition in Ontario who consistently support Mr. Davis and keep him in power. Clearly the deficit that the hon. member for Winnipeg North thought he saw in Ontario's budgetary position is non-existent. In fact, it is presumably so acceptable that even his cousins in Toronto—

• (2150)

An hon. Member: They are brothers.

Mr. Stevens: Apparently they are brothers, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Tell us one thing that is different.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member is asking me to indicate one thing that we would perhaps differ on as far as the Bank Act is concerned. At the committee I think the hon. member may see one or two places where we suggest changes or amendments to Bill C-6, but I do not think that makes it necessary to delay its passage.

For example, one area where I think there should be further consideration is the extent to which it may be advisable to allow our banking institutions to get into leasing. Most of us have had discussions with those who might be affected by bank leasing activities. I think we would be wise at least to hear out those observations and hopefully come up with a formula that would give the banking institutions substantially what they want in leasing activity, because I think, certainly with regard to the big ticket items, there is a need to have further financing and development of leasing. On the other hand, I think it would be a pity if, in giving the banks that new scope, we somehow inadvertently killed off other forms of competition in the leasing of smaller ticket items.

Again at committee we should be more conscious of the fact that the trust and loan companies of this country might perhaps find it very difficult to compete if legislation is not brought in at an early date modifying trust and loan legislation in Canada, ensuring that trust and loan companies are given whatever new provisions are needed to make sure that they become truly competitive with Canadian banks, and to make sure that in no way are they put in a position that they cannot prosper and grow.

In short I am suggesting we do have a good banking industry in Canada. It is time we showed that, as a House of Commons, we can act. Since 1975 this bill has been under review and debate. Surely now there is absolutely no excuse to prolong the debate any further. Let us get Bill C-6 into committee, and if the changes to which I have referred, or other changes that might be suggested, are approved by the committee, that is fine, but let us for once show the business community in Canada that this House of Commons, and hopefully this Parliament, can act when it is clearly in the interests of all Canadians that some action be taken and politics be put in a secondary role.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the consent of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Stevens: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Skelly: The hon. member spent a great deal of time talking about foreign banks. I felt he was coming to the conclusion of his remarks and that it might be worth while if, following the presentation of the merits of foreign banking, since this particular act purports to provide for near-banks and other organizations to form banks more quickly and easily to compete with the major banks in this country, he would tell us whether, in his opinion, it would be advisable to provide those institutions that might desire to do so with an opportunity to compete as Canadians rather than having the competition by foreign banks. Would he tell us what hazards he might see in the possibility of extraterritorial control in Canada from these foreign banks? We see this government, and even the Conservative government, sincerely concerned about Canadian control of the economy. What kind of conduits are they creating by allowing foreign banks in this country rather than looking for new mechanisms to legitimize these organizations? Basically, can he answer the question about competition for Canadians and about creating potential extraterritorial control?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has forgotten that his party voted us out of power. His question would appear to be much more appropriate for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, or my colleague, the former minister of finance.

Let me simply reply to him that I think we need both. We need encouragement to those who would start new banking concerns in Canada, and none of us are opposed to that. If the trust companies, loan companies, financial institutions and others wish to form new banks, fine, let us facilitate that. At the same time we have to accept that we are part of a very interrelated world banking community, and we cannot continue indefinitely to have the benefits of penetration into some of those foreign countries without accepting at least limited penetration by those foreign banking concerns in Canada. I am suggesting that such penetration is something we need not fear, because I believe with the restrictions in Bill C-6 they are not going to run away suddenly with the domestic Canadian market. On the contrary, I think they will be a very effective, new competitive force in the Canadian market which will make our own bankers even better than they are in serving the public.

Having said that, I do not think those two things are inconsistent. In fact if we do not begin to accept in Canada that we should be much more of an international power, and much more concerned with international activities, we will be destined to a rather secondary role in the world, and that should not be the role for Canada, and certainly would not have been had former Prime Minister Clark been allowed to continue to govern this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: We are not cousins any more.

Mr. Stevens: Think of the potential. If we properly change the banking legislation to permit foreign banking activities, such as I am suggesting, and Bill C-6 goes a long way, and if we tried to encourage an atmosphere in Canada for international banking activity, then I can see that Canada could easily become, in North America, the Switzerland of North America. Think of the benefits that would create. If foreign bankers felt that one of the most desirable places to be doing business of an international nature in North America was in Canada, that would be the type of thing I would wish to see encouraged. Let us take the blinkers off. This is a big country. Let us get away from the insular type of petty thinking that seems to be heard so much from my cousins to the left.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you this. If we, as a new Parliament, can pass this bill, that will go a long way toward creating a new sense of confidence in the economic community in Canada. This is needed, and I only hope that members will accept the challenge and say, "Let us debate it, get it into committee and passed." Thank you very much.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

METRICATION—REQUEST METRIC COMMISSIONERS BE RELIEVED OF DUTIES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for according me the privilege of bringing to your attention a very important matter. I wish to place before this House some facts about the metric conversion program in this country. They are facts, not arguments.

The fact is that the Liberal government has created a monster in the most devious fashion possible. The metric system was thrust upon the Canadian people by an order in council and by regulation. Surely it must rate as the number one subject which rankles Canadians. It is a costly mistake. It is too much, too soon. It is an over kill.

The metric conversion program was first introduced to this House in the form of a white paper which was tabled in 1970. The government had the courtesy at the time to give our spokesman, Mr. Ged Baldwin of Peace River, advance notice, but even then he had only scant minutes to reply in the House to a subject which has had, and is having, sweeping ramifications across this land. Even then Mr. Baldwin warned the government of the day of the pitfalls of proceeding with haste with metrication unilaterally, without working in concert with the United States, the country with which more than two thirds of our trade takes place.

No, the government decided to operate by stealth. Metrication was introduced through the back door and, like Topsy, it just grew. Last week in the House the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) conceded that no formal metric bill had ever come before this House. I question, since this is the case, whether the metric program has effect in law. It was not passed by this House. Were indeed the estimates for the program passed by this House? I think not. What is the legal glue which holds this sticky wicket together?

We have had occasion to amend existing pieces of legislation so that they conform with the SI scale of measurements, amendments which could allow the use of metric standards in lieu of the inch-pound measurements. I would like to lay some facts before you, Mr. Speaker. Fact one, the metric program was introduced to the House in the form of a white paper. Fact, the white paper was not debated, merely commented upon by opposition spokesmen, and very briefly. Fact, opposition spokesmen warned the government of the suicidal course of going it alone without parallel measures coinciding in the United States.

Fact, the metric commission was established by executive order or by cabinet. Parliament was bypassed in the creation of the overseers of the metric program. Not even the NDP raised a word about this fact. Fact, as the Minister of State for Small Businesses has readily admitted in his reply to my question of privilege, an omnibus bill which would allow us to debate the principle of the metric system was never brought before this assembly.

Fact, the metric program was imposed on the good citizens of three major centres of population, Peterborough, Ontario; Kamloops, British Columbia; and Sherbrooke, Quebec. Fact, the program has not been well received and the government has had to pull in its horns in all three areas. Fact, in Peterborough, Ontario, residents boycotted city stores which had to use metric and did their shopping in the neighbouring communities, which was a severe financial hardship on Peterborough merchants. Fact, despite the unpopularity of the metric program, the bureaucrats intend to introduce metric, cold turkey, in 25 or 26 other cities and towns early next year.

This is folly, Mr. Speaker. Why is the government so prone to rush in when it is so obvious there is built-in resistance to an unpopular program? Why can the government not admit a mistake and draw back until the time has come for metric? It may not be in my lifetime, but perhaps sometime in the distant future. Our young generations, our school children, will have little trouble assimilating metric along with their other studies. Perhaps the solution to the dilemma would be to have school children study both systems, become conversant with both, in order to plan for that day when metric might be introduced in a sane and rational fashion when it is needed.

You cannot teach an old dog new tricks, Mr. Speaker. I, for one, will probably always rely on the old measurements. Even though metric has been in effect for some years, I still convert in my head metric to the old scale.

I implore the government not to proceed with this foolhardy course it is taking. If it persists, let us get it out into the open, get a bill before Parliament where the principle of metric and metric conversion can be intelligently debated. Let us get it out in the open so that the elected representatives can voice the concerns that are being expressed to them by angry and confused constituents, businessmen and ordinary citizens.

If, as the Minister of State for Small Businesses admits, a metric bill has never been debated in this House, now may be the time to do it, now before the bureaucrats ram the program down the throats of Canadians in 25 or 26 other centres. Let us have a free vote.

Let us work in concert with our neighbour to the south. Let us find out what its plans are vis-à-vis the metric system. Let us get off this unilateral, undemocratic course, pushed at us by an arrogant government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he would listen to the petitions of western members; let him now fulfil that promise.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I should quote the president of the nation to the south, Mr. Carter, who, in January 1980, said this:

I personally support and encourage the use of the international metric system of measurement in the United States. Conversion to the metric system will help us to expand America's export market.

Mr. Carter concluded with these words:

Because I believe metric conversion holds important long-term benefits for our country, I am taking steps to encourage the use of this system in the private sector as well as in government.

With regard to the comment on working in concert with the United States, it is interesting to note that plans for the automobile industry in north America are for it to be completely metric by 1982.

Legislation on the subject of metric conversion has had considerable debate in this House. The use of the metric system was made legal by Parliament with the passage of the metric Weights and Measures Act many years ago. The Weights and Measures Act of 1971 included an amendment which made the international system of units the legal embodiment of the metric system in Canada. The policy that metric conversion was inevitable and in the national interest was established with the House leaders of all parties on January 15, 1970, speaking in the House in support of the white paper on metric conversion in Canada.

The Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act of 1971 made it mandatory for all pre-packaged goods to carry a metric contents declaration.

The Statute Law Amendment Act of 1976, which was debated in this House over a period of nine months, gave the governor in council the power to set dates in any sector of the economy after which the use of the customary or imperial system would be illegal.

A program of guideline dates for metric conversion recommended by Metric Commission Canada after consulting with industry, labour and consumer groups, was approved by the government and debated in the House of Commons on March 17, 1975. The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs studied this matter at length and voted unanimously in favour of it. It reported it back to the House of Commons on December 17, 1976, with a recommendation that the House consider the advisability of adopting this program and also introduce additional legislation to metric conversion. Subsequently the Statute Law Amendment Act of 1976, was passed by the House of Commons on July 25, 1977, and received royal assent on August 5, 1977.

In view of the fact that metric conversion currently is proceeding or has been completed in 88 of the 100 odd sectors of the economy which have published conversion plans, with the phasing and co-ordination of Metric Commission Canada, there is a proven continuing need for the commission staff and the commissioners to ensure that orderly conversion is made to the best advantage to consumers and to Canada.

It is interesting to note that an industry in my constituency has expanded its production threefold since going metric because it can now export to Europe.

TRANSPORT—MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—ALLOCATION OF HOPPER CARS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to debate a matter which I discussed briefly during the question period with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I choose this timing because it is my understanding that the minister visited this strange and mysterious land beyond the rocks which is called Colombie-Britannique. He just returned from there. I presume he had some discussions with the politicians and transport managers there. Maybe, just maybe, his parliamentary secretary will be able to make an announcement tonight with respect to this matter which has been of concern to me and the people I represent in the farm community in the Peace River area.

I asked the minister in the House why it is that the British Columbia Railway, which is known to some people in his department as a foreign railway because there is no direct subsidy or involvement by the federal government or the national railways in the ownership and operation of that railway, has never been allocated any hopper cars. These are the cars, as hon. members know, that are part of our modern grain delivery system. They are now essential to fulfilling the task of getting our grain to market.

The reason the minister used for not allocating any hopper cars to the railway relates back to the Crowsnest freight rate. As hon. members know, it has always been the understanding that the railways would have to haul grain from the prairies to the ports on a subsidized basis because, without that, it would be very difficult to compete in world markets. It has always been the understanding as well that, in return, the railways were granted large areas of land and other concessions. Over the years they have been granted other subsidies like branch line subsidies and so on. All of these things were never granted to the BCR.

The minister argues, and he said to me in answer to my question in the House that the subject is debatable. That is what I am doing here. He said the BCR, because all their grain goes to the west coast from the Peace River country, is not obliged to haul its grain on the same terms and conditions that the national railways haul through the Crowsnest Pass. That is quite true. However, nobody would ship any grain on the BCR if it were not shipped and transported in competition with the rates that prevail in other parts of the western prairies. The Peace River country, knowing the geography of this country, is the last part or the tail end of the prairies.

When the BCR extended its line to Fort St. John in the B.C. portion of the Peace River country, it had to compete with the Crowsnest rates. It began in 1958 to haul grain at the same price it was hauled to other ports by other railways. Therefore, that argument does not hold true. It has been very disconcerting to us because many farmers in the Peace River country have not been able to fill their quotas. There were never any cars. There are not sufficient cars there now to move the grain from the elevators to the port.

As well, the system is being modernized and changed to the point where these cars are essential because it is very difficult to unload the conventional cars at the ports now with all these modern elevators.

In 1973 the federal government purchased the first 2,000 hopper cars and allocated them to the national railways. They were allocated in proportion to the volume that these railways were hauling, CP and CN. CP got 52 per cent of the initial order and CN got the rest. They passed them on to the other railways such as the Northern Alberta Railway which competes with the BCR to some extent for the Peace River grain. That particular railway, because it is not an alien railway and because it is owned by the CN and CP jointly, has the use of these hopper cars.

In 1975-76 another 4,000 were bought by the federal government. In 1978 another 2,000 were purchased. That is 8,000 altogether. As we all know, the minister now has a commitment which was made by the former Conservative minister to purchase another 2,000 cars. Even though there is some doubt about that commitment, since he is using different criteria to make an assessment, I understand from the answer he gave the other day to one of my own friends from Alberta that he will live up to that commitment. So the federal government will have about 10,000 of these cars in service. These are allocated to the national railways at a cost for maintenance and repair of 3 cents per mile.

It is true BCR has been offered some of those cars but 23 cents a mile was demanded for maintenance and repair, and that is not tolerable. It is true, also, that British Columbia has not contributed to the extent of other provinces to the aquisition of these cars. Alberta has made a commitment to purchase a thousand cars, and other provinces have purchased or leased some. On the other hand, the government of British Columbia will have told the minister during his visit out there that it has made contributions in other areas, namely, through the development of Prince Rupert, helping with the infrastructure to a large extent, and so on. So there is no excuse for the withholding of a number of these cars which are owned by the taxpayers of Canada through the Wheat Board. There is no reason a portion could not be allocated to the British Columbia Railway, and I hope tonight the parliamentary secretary will have an answer for me.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to reply to the hon. member on this question of the allocation of hopper cars to the British Columbia Railway.

The hon. member suggested that BCR is viewed by Department of Transport officials as a foreign railway. The fact is that the railway does not come under the Railway Act and is therefore not obliged to carry grain at the Crowsnest Pass rates. I am sure our major railways find this position enviable. The British Columbia Railway voluntarily maintains a rate structure for grain comparable to the statutory rate.

It is correct that no hopper cars purchased by the federal government or by the Canadian Wheat Board have been allocated to the British Columbia Railway. This is because of the general shortage of cars and the fact that the federal government has no jurisdiction over the said provincial Crown corporation. However, the government is sympathetic to the case presented by the Peace River region grain producers that the railway which serves them should receive an allocation of hopper cars from the federal government and the Wheat Board fleet.

The Wheat Board has entered into discussion with the British Columbia Railway to establish the railway's need for the cars. As the hopper car fleet increases, so does the likelihood of some cars being allocated to the BCR for grain service. Nevertheless, the federal government must obtain certain assurances from the railway regarding car operation, future rates to be charged and grain service provided.

I am pleased to inform the hon. member that discussions have taken place as recently as this morning between the Canadian Wheat Board and the British Columbia Railway and that it is very likely some agreement will be arrived at in the near future.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—ACID RAIN—CANADA-U.S. DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) indicated on his return from Washington that he had received no commitments from the Americans. In fact Mr. Costle, the head of the Environmental Protection Agency, said the following about planned coal plants in the United States: If the coal plan means more emissions in the northeast, "we are going to have to offset them," meaning the emissions, "somewhere else."

● (2220)

Where is that? Are the Americans considering setting aside some areas of their country as pollution wastelands? Is Canada to be one of those zones, or is this government going to be tough and aggressive and protect this land and Canadians?

The minister alluded to the fact that ten years ago the Scandinavian countries were concerned about acid rain. Today their lakes are dead. What the minister is saying is that we will cut back a few percentage points over the next few years while the United States increases by many. The remedy the minister offers is a prescription for a dead environment. Why has he not taken the reins in this situation and set acceptable limits to be met this year, in time to be of some use to Canada?

The U.S. response is unacceptable, and it is time to increase pressure from Canada. The Liberal actions are a peculiar approach: on the one hand to export low-cost non-polluting natural gas to the United States while, at the same time, President Carter is putting in place and operating coal-fired plants with little and often no pollution reduction equipment. There is a need for analysis of the costs foisted on us by the Americans, and at the same time an analysis of the energy benefits given to the United States by our country such as hydroelectricity and natural gas.

Our lakes, buildings, farms and health are taking the brunt of coal-fired pollution to allow the coal-producing and consuming states to maintain low energy rates and costs.

The United States is dumping five times as much on us—three million to four million tons per year—as we are on them. They dump about one quarter of their airborne pollution into Canada, which kills off lakes, etc., in Ontario, Quebec, and the maritimes principally. Quebec is one of the most sensitive geologically, and the history of the federal government in pressuring the U.S. has been weak-kneed and ineffective.

Destruction of the Canadian environment by "insignificant increment" now has deadlines that can be measured in tons, days and months.

The minister made political hay here in Canada recently by juggling maximum limits from Inco, which were at 3,600 tonnes per day and, with present output, are only 2,200 tonnes per day. This allowed the hon. gentleman to lull Canadians into thinking that something is being done and that because Inco was not polluting full bore the minister was somehow responsible for this incremental reduction. This is hardly the case. Available information in Canada indicates that emissions can be brought by Inco to below 1,000 tonnes per day at a cost of only 20 cents per pound. This would put Inco in a highly competitive and unreduced production position. Why is the minister not mobilizing a plan to reach the figure immediately?

The question is, what is the minister doing? I state to the House that he is doing nothing in Canada to demonstrate a tough attitude in order to protect Canadians from our own pollution, nothing to demonstrate to the United States that we will stop dumping over one million tonnes per year into their back yard, and nothing to awaken the United States to the fact that Canada will not accept the destruction of our environment, lakes, fish, farmland, health, forests and general well-being. In fact President Carter proposes to increase emissions by hundreds of thousands of tonnes into Canada.

Is the minister waiting for a major health epidemic or photographs of thousands of dead acres of fish and trees? Or is the de facto Liberal policy that the environment is of no value?

Perhaps the minister's representative here in the House tonight will reveal just what steps the Liberal government and the minister are taking on all fronts to obtain reductions from the United States. If he cannot be specific, that is precisely what he should say to this House and to Canadians.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said about acid rain in the Scandinavian countries, acid rain has not long been recognized as a problem of major proportions. Indeed, it was only in 1976 that the OECD recognized it as a serious problem. It is only in the last half dozen years, I say to my colleague, that the matter has appeared to take on the kind of urgency which he speaks of tonight.

In those years the problem has mushroomed in Canada. We now emit into the air in sulphur dioxide and nitric acid something in the order of five million metric tons of the first, sulphur dioxide, and just about two million metric tons of the latter, nitric acid or nitrogen oxides generally. It is a problem of major proportions. The problem is seen in its true proportions when we realize that the United States emits five times what Canada does.

As I listened to the hon. gentleman, I realized that much of his grievance is against the United States, and so is ours. To that end about three weeks ago the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) went to Washington and spoke with Mr. Costle, the head of the Environmental Protection Agency, about the subject of acid rain and what ought to be done about it.

We are very disappointed and discouraged by the failure of the Carter administration to include any provision for reducing emissions in its coal conversion program. However, I say to my friend, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), that the light at the end of the tunnel is that Mr. Carter's coal conversion program has not yet passed the Congress. I say to him, and to others in the House, that this is a good time for us in the House and in the country to give a higher profile to the increasingly serious subject of acid rain and its adverse environmental impact on acquatic life and, to some degree, though more indirectly, on agricultural products.

There are things which we have to do here at home, and to this degree we wanted to be identified, as we were last week, with the program being undertaken by the Ontario government in so far as Inco in Sudbury is concerned, but that is only part of the solution to the problem. It is easy to knock it because we have not come up with an instant solution in one day, as is the wont of my colleague and his friends in that party, but we are on the road; we are beginning.

Part of the solution lies in persuading the U.S. government and the U.S. Congress that what they are doing with the coal conversion program without proper safeguards in so far as acid precipitation emissions are concerned, is further damaging our situation here in Canada and their own situation in the United States. I believe that that is the main lever which, without reference to partisan causes, we should highlight now to the degree that we may have some effect, we hope, on the passage of this coal conversion program through the American Congress.

HANSARD CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF 100TH BIRTHDAY FROM HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication from Her Majesty the Queen in response to my letter of April 16, 1980:

Thank you for your message of loyal greeting sent on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Official Report of the House of Commons Debates. The ceremony on May 7 will honour an institution which is indispensible and incorruptible. I appreciate the greetings from all those who are associated with the publication of Hansard in Canada and I express my confidence in the continuing impartiality and accuracy of this institution.

Elizabeth R.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I should also like to inform hon. members that at noon today, in the rotunda of Parliament, I unveiled a plaque which commemorates the first 100 years of Hansard's service to the House of Commons.

Today I had the honour of unveiling a plaque commemorating the centenary of our Official Report known in English as Hansard. That event deserves to be celebrated because it bears witness to a phenomenon that belongs, at one and the same time, to oral and written tradition.

So much has been said in both Houses of our Parliament that it would have been a pity not to keep the text of all speeches which reveal the substance of the concerns of all those who have spoken on behalf of their fellow citizens. From the spoken word, the voices of the illustrious spokesmen of our country have been recorded in writing, thus giving permanence to the words while respecting as much as possible the tone and inspiration.

That move, whose perfection preceded the technology of radio and television, bears witness to the quality of its initiators and of those who have never ceased since to record faithfully the words of our parliamentarians.

From the scribes of antiquity and the transcribers of the Middle Ages, to the faithful recorders of Hansard, there has been continuity in the art, patience and faithfulness which, on your behalf, I want to praise and honour.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, allow me to join you and pay special tribute, on behalf of my colleagues on this side of the House, to the staff of Hansard whose 100th anniversary is being celebrated today.

As we know, the members of that staff record, with considerable spirit, the verbal exchanges in this House and though, on occasion, corrections are requested, in all fairness it must be pointed out today, without—ambiguity statistics prove it—that on average only one word out of 10,000 needs correcting. That is surely a most enviable record for the staff who devote themselves to the Debates of the House, Hansard.

If, occasionally, hon. members ask for a correction, this is truly a very rare occasion because the Hansard staff have always performed their work admirably well. This fact deserves to be stressed on this very special occasion.

Finally, they have contributed in a very direct way in bringing Parliament close to the people by transcribing our deliberations word for word; in so doing, they bring our noble institution closer to the man on the street, thus contributing in a priceless way to the evolution of democracy in Canada. On behalf of my colleagues of the Liberal party and the government, I join you, Madam Speaker, in paying a sincere tribute to the Hansard staff from its very beginnings, that is 100 years ago today.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I begin my remarks by noting the absence of our Clerk, Dr. Koester, who is convalescing satisfactorily at home today following heart surgery. I know that Dr. Koester has taken a lively interest in today's commemoration of the centenary of Hansard, and I am sure all hon. members join with me in wishing him a speedy return to health and to service in this Chamber.

On behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, I am pleased to join in offering birthday greetings to Hansard on the occasion of its centennial celebrations.

Madam Speaker, it is with deep respect and pride that I pay this tribute to Hansard. Our House of Commons debates staff have provided a unique and essential service to the House of Commons, to the Canadian public and to our democratic system.

It was under the Sir John A. Macdonald government that the Canadian House of Commons established Hansard as an integral part of our debates. In fact, after the appearance of the Canadian Hansard, one of its main supporters was Sir John himself who said, and I quote Hansard as many of us sometimes do in the House:

[English]

If we can afford it—and we can afford it—every hon. member who represents a constituency has a right to have his speech reported; for we are all equal here, we are all equally interested and have equal rights and responsibilities; we all have the same rights; the youngest member has the same right as the oldest member to have his utterances as fully spread out in the official report as the Leader of the House or of the Opposition.

● (1410)

In helping to create Hansard, Sir John understood that it would best serve Parliament and the nation by allowing each and every member of this House an equal opportunity to be reported and read. In this sense, Hansard is truly a critical extension of our deliberations here in this House.

Hansard is daily evidence of one of the essential ingredients in our parliamentary democracy—freedom of speech. Hansard helps both to preserve and enhance this important freedom, and I think it fitting that we in this House honour today the major contribution that Hansard and its staff have made to our Parliament and to our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I join with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in paying tribute today to the job which has been done for Parliament and for the people of Canada by Hansard.

In these days we tend to take this institution for granted. Perhaps it is well to remind ourselves that there was not always the practice of letting the people know what was said in legislative halls. There were days when members tried to keep secret what went on in bodies such as ours. But public demand for information, and the public's insistence on the right to know, brought Hansard into being in other countries, and brought it into being in a tentative form early in the life of our Parliament. However, in an official form, under a branch set up by our House of Commons, Hansard began just 100 years ago. We pay tribute to what has been done during those 100 years.

In the few words I am privileged to say, I should like to point out that just as history is people, so an institution like Hansard is people. It has been that way across the years and it is that way today. I know of no service that works for Parliament in which those who do the work are as interested in the job they are doing, are as anxious to know its history and are as concerned about doing an accurate and good job as are the members of the Hansard staff.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: I suppose I am admitting something, which I do not mind admitting, if I say that on many days a member of the Hansard staff comes to me and asks me what it was like back ten, 20, 30 or 40 years ago. To me, that is an indication of their interest in the institution and we are indeed honoured to have such a staff with us.

As a matter of fact, they are part of a great tradition. I have known Hansard editors from Earl Young down to Charlie Empringham, who is with us today, to John Robertson, who defied the Speaker—when the Speaker asked him to say something, John refused and walked out—then Newell Price down to Doug Baker, who is our editor today. I have also known a number of the editors of French debates including, today, Mr. H. J. Lacombe.

The Hansard people show their liking for the job by the number of them who are here for a long time. Around here I get teased about having been here for quite a while. What about Eddie Quirk of the Hansard staff, who came to work for the House of Commons 52 years ago? He, of course, is in a great tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: When Hansard was first established, there was engaged as an assistant to the Hansard office a Mr. John Boyce. He liked it so well that later on his son Charles became part of the Hansard staff and then moved over to Journals. When I came here in 1942, he asked me if I had ever heard of Arthur Puttee, whom I still knew for he was still alive. He had been a member of Parliament for Winnipeg back in 1900.

● (1415)

Then there was also John Boyce's daughter, Ida Boyce, who used to like to tell us in those old days about ancient experiences, such as trying to cover the Liberal convention of 1919. So these are long traditions. There are persons here today who have spent many years in this service. They are not just employees, not just hands at work, they are part of what we do. We are proud of them and I am pleased to join in the tributes being paid today.

I should like to close by congratulating the associate editor of Hansard, John Ward, on the book "The Hansard Chronicles" which he recently published, and to read the last sentence or two of his book. In the final paragraph, Mr. Ward makes reference to the Right Hon. Sir John S. Thompson and to Sir John George Bourinot. These are his two final sentences:

There was delicious irony in the spectacle of two former Hansard reporters, Bourinot and Thompson, sitting in the chamber within a few feet of each other, the Clerk of the House of Commons, and the Prime Minister of Canada. Who knows what Hansard has yet to offer the nation?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CALL FOR INQUIRY INTO SUICIDE OF INSPECTOR JAMES WORRELL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, which I hope will receive the unanimous consent of the House.

In view of the fact that RCMP Inspector James Worrell shot and killed himself last Saturday at his home in Winnipeg following testimony before the McDonald commission the previous week, and in view of the fact that the Solicitor General has expressed his serious concern—shared by all of us—about the circumstances of this suicide, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call upon the Solicitor General to commence immediately a comprehensive inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the suicide of RCMP Inspector Worrell.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

COD STOCKS—ACCESS FOR ALL CANADIAN FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the minister of fisheries in Newfoundland has started an interprovincial cod war between the Newfoundland government and the fishermen of Nova Scotia by demanding that Nova Scotian-based companies immediately withdraw their fleets from the northern cod fishery, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

S.O. 43

That the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans take steps immediately to mediate and bring to an end this dangerous conflict and ensure that all Canadian fishermen have access to all cod stocks in Canadian waters.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF DISABLED PERSONS

CELEBRATION IN 1981—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I am raising a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Canada is on the eve of hosting the Rehabilitation International Congress which will be held at the Winnipeg Convention Centre in June—an event that is a prelude to the International Year of Disabled Persons in 1981—and the Government of Canada has neglected to put into operation the Canadian organizing committee for 1981, a project that was well under way before the election, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie):

That the organizing committee for 1981 be organized immediately to proceed with its urgently important work of planning Canadian participation in the International Year of Disabled Persons.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PROTECTION OF LOW AND FIXED-INCOME FAMILIES FROM INCREASED COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise, as well, under the usual provisions of Standing Order 43.

What can only be considered to be a policy statement was made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in Halifax over the weekend. It was very disturbing with respect to the denial of any offsetting assistance regarding ever-escalating domestic, commercial and industrial electricity rates, which are already twice the national average—$259 in Charlottetown and $53 in Trail, for the same 5,000 kilowatt-hour package. I move, in view of this statement which denies any assistance to low, middle and fixed-income people:

S.O. 43

That this government take immediate measures similar to those proposed by the former Progressive Conservative government to protect low and fixed-income families in Atlantic Canada against the unacceptably high increase in electrical costs which will result from this direct and new government policy.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TOURISM

DISTRIBUTION OF INACCURATE TRAVEL BROCHURES ON ATLANTIC CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the federal Department of Tourism has caused to be printed 15,000 travel supplements, supposedly promoting the Atlantic provinces, which have been distributed to households throughout the United States and portray Saint John, New Brunswick, to be in the middle of the St. Lawrence River upstream from Montreal, places Halifax where Saint John used to be, and indicates the province of Nova Scotia has replaced Maine—all of which could adversely affect the tourist industry of New Brunswick and the entire Atlantic region—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That the House instruct the Department of Tourism to publish and distribute to the participating newspapers a travel brochure rectifying the errors and correctly depicting the geography and beauty of the Atlantic region.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DISTRIBUTION OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS TO AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Agriculturalists across Canada are alarmed at the implications contained in the Energy Supplies Allocation Board's designation of agriculture as deserving of not higher than second level priority in the distribution of petroleum products. Considering the fact that food production is the final and only imperative for individual and national life maintenance, I move, seconded by the hon. member of Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this Parliament of Canada instruct the Energy Supplies Allocation Board to place agricultural producers and industries at the highest possible priority as users of petroleum products in any emergency which interrupts normal supplies.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS—FAILURE OF TURKEY TO ABIDE BY UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In light of the fact that no progress has been made in the intercommunal talks in Cyprus, and in light of the fact that this lack of progress can be principally ascribed to the failure of the occupying power, Turkey, to make any significant concessions or to live up to resolutions passed in the United Nations and supported by Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House calls upon the Canadian government to insist that any bilateral or multilateral economic or military assistance to Turkey be linked directly to that country's willingness to make concessions in the Cyprus negotiations, and calls on the government to maintain Canadian participation in the United Nations forces until such time as the negotiations produce a settlement satisfactory to both sides.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

POLICY ON RENTAL PAYMENTS FOR CROWN-OCCUPIED ACCOMMODATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a motion of urgent necessity concerning the hardships being experienced by lessors across Canada who are seeking financial relief in terms of an adjustment to rental payments for Crown-occupied accommodations.

Consideration by the Department of Public Works and the Treasury Board have been ongoing, without arriving at an acceptable solution. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

● (1425)

That this House urge the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Public Works to personally intervene in the consultations, with a view to immediately ending the discriminatory aspects of this government policy by including escalation clauses in these particular leases.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

LCL FREIGHT SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROTESTED CURTAILMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Having regard to a decision taken by the British Columbia Railway to eliminate less than carload freight shipments and to curtail pick-up and delivery services at major points in northern British Columbia—including such settlements as Fort St. James, Fort St. John, Dawson Creek and Fort Nelson—and to dramatically increase pick-up and delivery charges in other centres, and having regard to the fact that this action will result in additional cost and economic hardship in those areas, I move, seconded by hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Transport immediately exercise his full authority to prevent the curtailment of these services to these communities which rely very heavily on this vital transportation link, and that the minister be required by the House to examine subsidy agreements which exist between his department and the major railways in Canada that offer similar services to rural and northern areas of the country, with a view of offering subsidy payments to the BCR commensurate with those paid to other railways.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

RESOLUTION ON OIL PRICES WITH PRODUCING PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Saudi Arabian oil company, Aramco Corporation, has commissioned Human Resources Management Ltd., of Calgary, to recruit 1,700 Canadian petroleum and other employees, offering tax-free salaries, paid vacations, free medical care and free education anywhere in the world for the workers' children, for a two-year tour of duty in Saudi Arabia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to move quickly to reach a satisfactory resolution on oil prices with the producing provinces, so that the companies which find and produce the oil in this country can develop their corporate plans and compete with Saudi Arabia for the skilled manpower which this country needs to achieve self-sufficiency.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

IMPORTATION OF RADIO-ACTIVE SLAG—CLASS ACTION PROCEDURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada has permitted the importation of radio-active slag in Surrey, British Columbia, possibly with negligence on the part of the companies or on the part of the agency itself, and in view of the fact that there are legal difficulties for a number of residents to sue because we do not have in Canada, as they do in the United States, adequate class action procedures for lawsuits so that a number of residents could sue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

That the government be urged to bring in procedural legislation enabling easier class action lawsuits in federal courts in Canada, and that the government press its provincial counterparts for similar legislation.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST COMPLEMENT OF JUDGES BE INCREASED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that statements made by a member of the Supreme Court of Canada, that legal aid cases are "plugging the courts in all ten provinces", might cast serious doubts on the value of legal aid programs and raise questions about the state of justice in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House direct the Minister of Justice and Attorney General and Minister of State for Social Development to immediately determine whether the allegations respecting legal aid cases in the courts are correct and, if so, take action to ensure that Canadians are properly served by increasing the complement of judges available to try cases.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF RAILWAY RELOCATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. On Sunday, in Winnipeg, the Minister of Employment and Immigration suggested that there should be consideration given to financing railway relocation in that city by taking money from existing federally-funded programs.

I presume that this proposal has been discussed in cabinet or, at least, in Treasury Board. Would the President of the Treasury Board tell the House which existing programs the government has in mind, and from which existing programs the government proposes to divert funds for the purpose of railway relocation in the city of Winnipeg?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, under the new expenditure management system, with which the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is familiar, decisions of this kind must be made within the envelope. The opposition leader is familiar with those procedures and he can assume that they will be carried out.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I would assume, from the reply made by the minister, that the funds for the railway relocation in Winnipeg will be diverted from programs that are now in the social and cultural envelope of the Government of Canada; or will they be diverted from the economic development envelope?

I ask this question because a minister who is responsible for a social program announced the economic development initiative. Which envelope is affected, the economic development envelope or the social envelope?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is suggesting, or questioning whether or not we know what we are doing, the answer is yes, we do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

WINNIPEG—DREE CONSIDERATION OF FUNDING RAILWAY RELOCATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I can understand why the minister feels called upon to make that statement of faith, because nobody else in the country believes it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister has not indicated from which department the money for railway relocation will come, although I gather that he was saying the money will come. Since the government keeps its word, I gather that it will be to the extent of $100 million, as promised by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On April 25, the Minister of Transport said that DREE might make a contribution to rail relocation in Winnipeg. On May 2, the minister of DREE said that he had "barely enough money to meet his existing commitments". Can the minister tell the House whether or not DREE is now actively considering funding rail relocation in Winnipeg, or has that option been closed?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I am considering at the moment how I can redeploy my very limited budget to determine if I can be of some help to that project which has been given top priority by the city of Winnipeg.

I am also studying the matter of what would be the consequences of the expenditures throughout the rest of Manitoba over the next few years. I am giving the matter very active consideration.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, can the minister tell the House which existing DREE commitments will be abandoned to take account of the $100 million contribution being contemplated by the Government of Canada for rail relocation in Winnipeg?

Mr. Crosbie: Explain it to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I am not, of course, considering anything in the area of $100 million.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: What is it, one dollar?

Mr. Lawrence: No, three railway ties.

Mr. De Bané: The amount I am considering would be extended over the next few years, and in the order of $5 million per year for approximately five years, which would total $25 million.

Mr. Blenkarn: You mean $25.

Mr. De Bané: Hon. members opposite do not seem to take very seriously the question put by their leader.

Mr. Crosbie: He does not want to take your answer seriously.

Mr. De Bané: Obviously, if that project should be financed it would take the active co-operation of several federal departments as well as the municipal authorities and the provincial authorities of Manitoba. At the moment I am considering whether I could fund the amount of $5 million per year over a five-year period, which would total $25 million.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There goes your $100 million.

FINANCE

WINNIPEG—NEGOTIATIONS ON FUNDING OF RAILWAY RELOCATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I would like to direct to the Minister of Finance. Would he inform the House whether he has been involved in the negotiations to provide $100 million in funding?

I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that we cannot wait for 25 years, that we can only wait a maximum of 1½ years. Two bridges in that city are already under weight restrictions and they will only last another two years. Will the minister give a firm commitment this week on whether or not the government can provide $100 million in funding?

The urgency of the situation is that these two bridges will not last 25 years; they will only last another two years.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member the assurance that the total expenditure allocations or projections will be increased to accommodate this or any other program.

Obviously, this particular program, which is so worthy in the view of the hon. member, was not included in the estimates prepared by the former government. Had it been included, the minister of DREE would not now be attempting to alleviate a problem which had not been met by the former government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that it was his government which ordered this study. This study was ordered by the previous Liberal administration and it was not completed until just one month ago.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McKenzie: That is why there was—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat.

Mr. McKenzie: —no commitment from this government.

Madam Speaker: Will he ask his question.

Mr. McKenzie: Now that the matter of the study has been cleared up with regard to the involvement of the previous government, will the Minister of Finance give some kind of commitment before the end of the week so that we may know where we stand?

We will not have a means to cross the CPR rails, as these two bridges will have to be closed down. Can the minister not see the seriousness of the situation? Will he please give us some kind of firm answer either today or tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has really diagnosed the problem that existed in the former government; it studied everything and took no action.

Mr. Nielsen: It is your study.

INQUIRY WHETHER CHRYSLER CANADA PROPOSING JOB GUARANTEES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am sure the minister is aware that up until late Friday of last week, Chrysler in the United States was faced with insolvency and that only the intervention of the Michigan state government, in the form of $150 million in grants, saved it from possible bankruptcy.

As a result of meetings in Detroit and Winnipeg over the weekend, it appears as if there is the basis for an agreement between the federal government and Chrysler Canada. Can the minister tell the House, now, whether or not he has been able to determine, as a result of the negotiations, if Chrysler is prepared to put up any kind of job guarantees, either now or in the future, to preserve both the jobs that exist and the jobs that have now been lost as the result of that company closing down its plants in Windsor and in other cities?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, progress was made in the discussions which took place over the last two days, including the very important matter of Canadian jobs which is a priority of this government. I hope that it will be possible for me to make an announcement to the House very soon.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, in order that we not be put in the position of having to learn of these negotiations and their impact long after the fact and long after anything reasonable and sensible can be done, would the minister be prepared to at least acknowledge to the House one of the facts, that the government is prepared to put up in one form or another some $200 million, and that that money will not be made readily available to Chrysler until such time as it actually meets some of the guarantees with regard to jobs and production in Canada—guarantees which hon. members of this House and members of the Ontario legislature have been asking for over the last six months?

• (1440)

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, protection of Canadian jobs has been a priority of this government and myself since the outset of the matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: What we are prepared to make available for Chrysler Canada will depend on what is agreed to by them on the matter of job guarantees and the other elements we consider necessary. I do not intend that members of the House will learn through other sources of any arrangement that is worked out but, rather, through an announcement by myself through this House.

Mr. Deans: A final supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Can the minister explain to the House how it is possible to determine the kinds of job guarantees and to have them included in the agreement, given the massive lay-offs now occurring in the auto industry, ranging upwards of 34,000 people unemployed either permanently or temporarily in the province of Ontario?

Can the minister indicate to the House what proposals he intends to put before Parliament that will not only guarantee the jobs at Chrysler, but will also rationalize this industry and guarantee that there will, in fact, be jobs for the auto workers in Ford, Chrysler and in General Motors in the future?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am glad to note that the hon. member has acknowledged the problems facing the North American automotive industry. We are trying to get the best possible deal for Canadian workers in the light of those problems. He and the House will be able to assess what we have worked out if and when we reach an agreement and it is announced to the House.

Aside from our efforts with respect to Chrysler Corporation, as I have already informed the House, we have been undertaking discussions with the automobile manufacturers with a view to seeking new commitments from them on such matters as jobs, investment, research and development. We have obtained the agreement of the United States government to begin high-level consultations on the operations of the auto pact. I want to repeat, we are seeking agreement that the first meeting for this will take place before the summer of this year.

ENERGY

PROTECTION OF LOW AND FIXED-INCOME FAMILIES FROM INCREASED COSTS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance, in view of some baffling responses he gave to the hon. member for Calgary Centre yesterday to questions about whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was enunciating government policy when, in Halifax, he told Atlantic Canadians that unless he achieved a significantly richer oil deal with the west, there would be no offsetting compensation or assistance for already heavily beleaguered users of domestic commercial and industrial electricity.

I should like to ask the minister, who is also Deputy Prime Minister and, beyond that, is a Nova Scotian—the political boss—whether he contemplates any immediate initiatives to ease the strain and the burden on low, middle and fixed-income people of Atlantic Canada against the higher electricity rates that will result directly from the responses to Nova Scotia of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources earlier this week.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman ought to be pleased that we have saved the people of Nova Scotia from the additional burdens that were imposed upon them by the former minister of finance, by not reintroducing the inequitable and iniquitous 18-cent tax on gasoline.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, as a Nova Scotian, the minister is not going to be allowed to get away with that. Sometimes one cannot help but wonder whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources set out to blackmail the non-producing provinces in their final war with the producing provinces with respect to an oil rich energy agreement.

My question is to the Minister of Finance. Perhaps if it was to the Minister of Labour, we would get some sympathy for Nova Scotians. My supplementary question is to ask the Minister of Finance to explain to this House why it is that Atlantic Canadians are being asked to wait until the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has an oil agreement with the western oil producing provinces before he can indicate what assistance will be given to the four Atlantic provinces and, indeed, to eastern Quebec—so it is virtually five provinces—with respect to getting them out from under domestic electricity rates that are now running virtually double. I cited $262 for 5,000 kilowatt hours—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks why it is necessary to wait for an oil-pricing agreement to indicate whether any assistance is to be given to the Atlantic provinces. He finds that unusual and unprecedented.

I would remind him that that is precisely what the former minister of finance did, namely, in his budget delineate a price agreement, a so-called price agreement, and indicate that if the revenues were available he might—he would to some extent alleviate the burden on citizens of eastern Canada.

I would point out to the hon. member that since then there have been no increases and, furthermore, the alleviative action proposed by the former minister was an insignificant proportion of the additional burden that he laid upon the people of the province of Nova Scotia. I did not find that the hon. member got up during the campaign to plead in the interests of the people of that province.

Som hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO FINANCE VANCOUVER TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as the senior minister in that department. Can he explain to the House how the Minister of State (Trade) was able to announce yesterday in Vancouver a $17 million federal contribution to the trade and convention centre there, when only eight days previously the Minister of State (Small Businesses) said in the House, in response to a question regarding policy, as reported at page 445 of Hansard:

—is now being reviewed within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; we shall be in a position to put before our cabinet colleagues a document for discussion purposes within coming weeks.

Does that mean that $17 million is below the level which requires cabinet approval?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, it simply means that, unlike the previous government, we are able to take quick and correct decisions.

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, the minister knows very well that he is concerned with employment. In view of the contribution to employment made by trade and convention centres both during construction and afterwards, will he tell the House when this review of his government's policy, if they have one, on the funding of trade and convention centres will be announced?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, with respect to the other elements of this matter, this is going on now and I hope to have something else to announce through myself or my colleagues very soon.

OTTAWA-CARLETON CONVENTION CENTRE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to convention centres. As he knows, in the national capital area the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton has had an application for a long period of time. Since the Minister of State (Trade) was able to go to Vancouver and make an announcement with respect to the convention centre there, or a trade centre there, when will the announcement be made with respect to Ottawa-Carleton; or has the minister decided that Ottawa-Carleton is not to have a convention centre?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, there has been no such decision. We are very aware of the interests of the people of Ottawa-Carleton in this project, and I am confident we will find a way of responding to it, unlike the government of my hon. friend.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. If my friend is honest with the House, he will know that I made an announcement that our government was prepared to make a financial contribution of $9 million to the trade centre and convention centre in this area. That was the commitment of our government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Since the government has been prepared to move Eldorado to the north, and move Parks Canada, or keep Parks Canada in Cornwall—both Liberal ridings—would they be prepared now to make an announcement that they are going to build a convention centre in the riding of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, who is a Liberal? Is that an inducement to a decision?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, to indicate the non-partisan nature of our efforts, I want to remind my hon. friend that the Vancouver trade and convention centre, unfortunately, is not in a Liberal riding.

An hon. Member: There is hope yet.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CONTRACT TO SELL COAL TO JAPAN—EFFECT ON INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the visit of Prime Minister Ohira to Canada, and discussions here and on the west coast between the Canadian Prime Minister and the Japanese Prime Minister.

There appears to be a deal to sell northeast British Columbia coal to Japan—a ten to 15-year contract involving five million tons of coking coal annually for Japanese steel mills. Can the minister tell this House how this coal deal fits into a Canadian industrial strategy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government of British Columbia has been putting forward the necessity of developing the very extensive coal reserves of that province. Obviously, we would want to co-operate with the government of that province or any other province in the development of its natural resources. For that reason, we have been supportive of the efforts of the government of British Columbia.

I do not know the details of the negotiations, but certainly the Prime Minister of Japan expressed an interest in this particular aspect of our commercial relations. I do not have the details as to whether contracts have been negotiated, at what price, and in what volume. Certainly, these factors will have to be considered in entering into any joint support with that province.

Mr. Waddell: The minister knows, as I do, that the industrial strategy was mentioned in the throne speech. As I understand it, it is the building up of the manufacturing and secondary industry base, rather than just exporting raw materials.

Let me ask this as a supplementary. The minister may not know the details of the negotiations, but I suspect he had a hand in preparing the positions, as Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell the House whether the Canadian government, in the dealings with the government of Japan, asked the government of Japan—in return for Japan's access to British Columbia's ample energy reserves—whether there was any commitment, or trying to get a commitment by the government of Japan to facilitate access to Japanese markets for Canadian industrial goods?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the effect of the Canadian discussion with the prime minister was to impress upon him the opportunities that were available in Canadian manufacturing, especially in high-technology industries in Canada, obviously with an effort to secure greater access of Canadian products into the Japanese market. That is the gist of the approach that was made.

FINANCE

PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TRANSFER LEGISLATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, would the Minister of Finance advise the House if and when he consulted with the provincial treasurers of the provinces affected by the Public Utilities Income Transfer Act as evidenced in Bill C-24, or has he continued the lamentable practice of his predecessor, now the Attorney General, in unilaterally amending the agreement?

Will he advise the House, as well, why the provisions are being made retroactive for over a year? Also, under what authority has there been a reduction of funds transmitted to the provinces, resulting in the utility companies increasing their rates up to 6½ per cent to their consumers in the province of Alberta?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recall that the reduction in the transfer contained in the legislation was the result of the expenditure exercise undertaken by the government in 1978, which resulted in a reduction in expenditures of $2.5 billion. Because about 20 per cent of total expenditures were transfers to the provinces, it was felt necessary to have that source of expenditure reflected in the reductions. We made changes in the equalization and the public utilities transfers.

The former minister of finance did have consultations with the ministers of finance at that time. In fact, as a result of those consultations—as I recollect—the extent of the proposal was changed to take into account the views of the provinces. The hon. member will realize that these particular savings have already been reflected in the expenditure plans both of this government and the former government. On the legal point, I would like to look into that further.

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker, might I check with, or have the minister consider that his predecessor advised the provincial treasurer of Alberta over the telephone of his intention to carry out this change. It was a unilateral decision by the Government of Canada in an agreement with the province. However, subsequently, and before discussing the matter further in this House, in answer to questions by myself he did negotiate with the provincial treasurer to arrive at 50 per cent.

Again, I come to the point. What is the authority for reducing the funds before the amending legislation is passed by this House? This is not merely a transfer, but something that is subject to legislation. I invite the minister to tell us, because he must know why. What was the legal basis for the cut-off of funds earlier this year?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me for a legal opinion, which I will seek for him. However, I am sure that we are operating correctly in this matter because these savings were reflected in the expenditure plans, the estimates prepared by the former government which he so enthusiastically supported.

EMPLOYMENT

IMPLEMENTATION OF ECC REPORT—EFFECT ON WORKING WIVES

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. On February 20 this year, the Economic Council of Canada published a report entitled "The Evaluation of an Alternative Unemployment Insurance Plan".

The minister, having read the report, will know that the effect of the implementation of this plan would adversely and disastrously affect many thousands of working wives. I would like him to now offer a commitment to the House that he and his officials have rejected the plan and the principles in it.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the unemployment insurance plan is under review. There are a series of terms of reference as to the nature of the study. I have already stated publicly that we have rejected the concept of two-tier benefits which, in fact, was included by the previous government in its review. Therefore, I can give the hon. member the assurance that we do not include that recommendation by the Economic Council which, in fact, was accepted by his government as part of their terms of reference.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister who, I say with respect, did not deal with this report. This report does not deal with the two-tier system; it deals with the question of the evaluation of benefits for working wives. It says that if the plan goes into effect, working wives will find their income benefits diminished, their dependency increased and the discrimination that they already suffer enhanced.

The principles contained in this one deal with working wives. With regard to this report, will the minister be more forthcoming and tell us what he feels about the principles in the plan? If he has not read the plan, will he kindly indicate that?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I have read the plan. I have already told the hon. member that we have rejected the concept which was accepted by his government of looking at the family unit, or household, as a basis for the insurance principle. I stated publicly that the insurance principle was based upon the individual, and that would be the basis of the review.

WATER RESOURCES

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PROPOSED FLOODING OF KEMANO ENERGY PROJECTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the enormous support from the public, municipalities, MLAs and MPs in northern British Columbia for a full public inquiry, and in view of the fact that the B.C. government has now refused use of the public Inquiries Act to examine the Kemano II flooding proposal which may cost the public hundreds of millions of dollars and the 30-year old water licence, will the minister utilize the Inquiries Act, in conjunction with the province of British Columbia, to examine all implications of the Kemano I and II energy projects?

• (1500)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): When I was in British Columbia a few weeks ago, I was told by the B.C. government that no formal proposal had been received for development of Kemano II or the completion of Kemano I.

However, my department has met with the authorities of the Aluminum Company of Canada and indicated that water flows would have to be maintained in accordance with the legislation passed unanimously by this Parliament, and that we would want to see their plans when they do come up with a firm proposal. I have not seen a firm proposal as of now; one may have been received within the last few days.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the fact that it is 30 years since the 1950 water licence was granted, and that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has been incapable of regulating and getting agreement on flows in such rivers as the Nechako, and the fact that the provincial approach to this multijurisdictional situation has proven disastrous historically and is inadequate in the public interest, will the minister at least go on record today as supporting, once Alcan comes forward with the new plan, an inquiry under either federal or provincial inquiries legislation?

Mr. LeBlanc: I would want to consider the implications of the hon. member's suggestion. I am favourably disposed to a full public discussion of this issue. It is for this very reason that we amended the Fisheries Act to strengthen it in the case of developments which affect, not the fish directly but the spawning grounds and the habitat without which there is no fish resource.

SPORTS

CFL—ALLEGED VIOLATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Hon. Judd Buchanan (London West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for amateur sport. Recently, the Toronto Argonauts of the Canadian Football League cut Scott Mallender, an outstanding Canadian quarterback from the University of Windsor, without so much as a try-out.

Bearing in mind, also, the recent decision of the Ontario Human Rights Commission as far as Jamie Bone was concerned—they upheld Jamie Bone's contention under the Canadian Football League's designated rule—could the minister tell us whether he is planning to take any action to see what can be done about these apparent conflicts with the laws of Canada?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): I can assure the hon. member for London West that I am profoundly concerned—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: —about the unfairness of the Canadian Football League's bylaw which certainly appears to discriminate against Canadian quarterbacks. Other splendid football players from our colleges are able to play professional football in this country, but the quarterbacks under this rule seem to be subject to discrimination.

My department has been studying the matter for some time, and I intend personally to contact the commissioner of the CFL to discuss with him some existing Canadian laws which I think bear on the matter and try to convince him that this bylaw should be removed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

LOSSES RESULTING FROM MORTGAGE FORECLOSURES AND QUIT CLAIMS UNDER AHOP

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for CMHC. Can the minister confirm that CMHC has been forced to provide for losses of $176 million as a result of sales of properties acquired as a result of foreclosures and quit claims under AHOP?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am unable to confirm the actual amount to which the hon. member has referred. No doubt the failures under that plan are part of the larger failures which the corporation is experiencing in greater amounts last year and again this year. It goes without saying that we are in tight times, and there is that experience. It is also fair to say, as I have indicated, that AHOP is part of that experience.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I have a copy here of the 1979 annual report of CMHC—the letter of transmittal was sent to the minister on March 10. I wonder whether the minister has read this report and, if so, whether he can confirm that the figure I have just quoted was taken from page 28. The $176 million figure would be enough, if it were spent, to buy $50,000 houses for 3,250 Canadian families.

Can he confirm that in addition to that $176 million, CMHC has also had to absorb losses on subsidies paid in the form of loans under AHOP and on home owner grants given to people who have assumed houses under AHOP? In other words, is the total sum likely to be considerably in excess of $176 million?

Mr. Cosgrove: The hon. member has the report in front of him. I do not quarrel with the figures. The point I made was, that report is not up to date. The experience this year has been complicated and there have been further losses. The mortgage insurance fund, through the sale of properties that are coming back into the fund as the result of defaults, is meeting some of those claims.

The corporation has come to the government, as it went to the previous government, for assistance in meeting some of those losses on a temporary basis. But the fund is in good condition, the corporation reports that they think they will be able to replace the borrowings from the government within a two-year period, and I would think it is the business of the fund to ensure that those experiences—which for the first time have been the experience of the fund—will be met by the corporation's program.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PLANS TO REDUCE CRISIS IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Now that we know of his concern for one unemployed person, perhaps we could get clear from the government, now that 22,000 people have been laid off in the auto industry, not to mention the hundreds of thousands affected in the small and larger communities they live in—shoe clerks, grocery workers, or whatever—and while the government fiddles on that question perhaps the minister would advise us what programs he is recommending to cabinet to deal with the ever-growing crisis in unemployment in this country?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for his question and I compliment him on his first question on labour after being designated as the labour critic for the official opposition.

I want to say to him that he will be aware, of course, that many of the provisions for unemployment in this country now fall under the Department of Manpower. In relation to the responsibilities of the Department of Labour, I can tell him that in co-operation with other government departments we have monitored developments affecting the auto industry generally, and the auto workers in particular. An interdepartmental task force recently investigated the situation in the Windsor area and officials of my department are aware of any pending lay-offs.

At the present time, most of the auto workers are still entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, and as for workers in the Windsor area, the hon. member will be aware the period was recently extended and that they are not required to work for a shorter length of time to re-establish the UI benefit claim. The forthcoming government decision regarding Chrysler Limited will further clarify the need for potential assistance programs for the auto workers.

Mr. Bosley: We now learn that the Minister of Labour knows all about unemployment. What we really need to know is, what is he going to do about that problem? Might I ask him this supplementary question, however? Last week, in a public forum in Halifax, he indicated he was spending the vast majority of his time dealing with matters related to Nova Scotia—Sysco and Michelin, matters of that sort which we thought were in the purview of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Could he clarify whether his intent is to succeed in his ambition to succeed the Deputy Prime Minister, or whether he will do the job all across this country that the people are paying him to do?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I regret that the hon. member, in his first effort at dealing with a labour matter, was not able to deal with some of the concerns and some of the strike situations which affect workers in this country, and that this was the most his imagination could produce.

● (1510)

I want to assure him, however, that my recollection does not bring to mind any such statement to a forum in Halifax last week. As a Nova Scotian minister, I will continue always to attempt to show interest in Nova Scotian problems as well as discharging the responsibilities of my department, and if I can assist that most able of all Nova Scotians—the Deputy Prime Minister—in that regard, then I am delighted to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DISCUSSIONS ON QUEBEC-CANADA AGREEMENT FOR DEVELOPMENT OF EASTERN QUEBEC

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. During his visit in the Gaspé Peninsula on April 24 and 25 last, the minister said that he would like to conclude another Quebec-Canada agreement for the development of eastern Quebec. Such agreement of course should be reached following discussions with and approval by the Quebec government. Could the minister indicate to the House if, as the result of that announcement, there have been discussions or meetings with ministers of the Quebec government and what would be the approximate amount involved in such agreement?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, indeed I made the following proposal to the Quebec government and it has been described by some individuals as most generous for the Gaspé Peninsula, to wit the federal government fully respecting the jurisdiction of the Quebec government would take part in setting up a fund in which the federal government would contribute three times more money than the Quebec government to help promote the economic development of eastern Quebec. Unfortunately, my Quebec counterpart Jacques Léonard who answers for the QPDC, rejected that proposal through the media. I find his refusal not only cruel for the Gaspé Peninsula but also very hypocritical, since he has received some $20 million from my department for his own constituency, but he denies to other Quebec areas the financial assistance of my department.

USE OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS TO CONSERVE ENERGY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that conventional sources of oil are on the decline, as we all know, I wonder if the minister could tell this House whether he would agree that the expansion, improvement, and particularly the use of urban transit systems in Canada, could or would be beneficial in achieving the important goal of energy conservation. In other words, is there not more energy saved by using mass urban transportation, for example, rather than the gas guzzling motor car?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question would have been to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will put it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In view of the reply just now of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and because of the dramatic need to conserve energy in every possible way, can the Deputy Prime Minister now explain why his government just recently, once again, cancelled the often promised federal aid for urban transit—this time to the tune of $30 million—to the province of Ontario? This government started making promises in 1974 in this regard, and then broke them. We tried to honour them, and now hon. members opposite cannot even agree among themselves. Can the Deputy Prime Minister explain the inconsistency in this regard?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, taking the hon. member's statement as fact, he ought to be aware that the reason this program and other programs cannot proceed at the present time is our desire to maintain strict control over government expenditures.

Mr. Nielsen: How about Winnipeg?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There goes Winnipeg.

Oral Questions

EMPLOYMENT

TRAINING OF PERSONS FOR SKILLED JOBS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns a statement which was reported today, that he apparently made yesterday in Vancouver, that he was anticipating a labour shortage among certain categories of workers and he anticipated that this shortage would have to be met by increasing immigration to Canada.

In light of the most recent projections from the Department of Finance, which show an unemployment rate of somewhere between 8 per cent and 10 per cent in 1985—which is when the minister anticipates this shortage—what specific steps, besides immigration, does the minister plan to take to train young Canadians, and Canadian women in particular, to fill those skilled jobs, rather than to continue the age-old pattern of relying on the importation of skilled labour to meet Canadian needs?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have not seen a copy of the report to which the hon. member refers, but I can give him every assurance that this government is acutely aware of the need to initiate a number of serious retraining programs.

As the hon. member probably knows, we have already spent over $800 million in this country on training programs. We will be renegotiating agreements with the provinces on those programs before the end of next March. During those consultations we will be making every effort to ensure that the heavy demand for new skills, particularly in major resource projects in western Canada, will provide full and equal opportunity for many workers who are presently disadvantaged or handicapped in the work market.

I simply ask the hon. member to encourage his colleagues, in the debates we now have on the employment tax credit bill and other measures, to give us their full co-operation so that we can get those measures through as quickly as possible and so that we can move on with the job which has to be done.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I am not sure the minister really answered my question, but I appreciate the speech. Rather than referring to federal-provincial programs only, I refer the minister to the fact that only 15 per cent of non-traditional training seats were slotted for women in programs sponsored by his own department.

What specific steps does the minister plan to take to ensure that we do not simply continue the pattern of importing skills when we have well over one million Canadians who are now unemployed? Every anticipation, with the projections which came from the Department of Finance in the budget of December, is that unemployment will remain a consistent and persistent problem in Canada until 1985. What steps is he taking in his own department to ensure that Canadian men and women occupy those jobs which will be required for our industrial expansion in the 1980s?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I also appreciate the speech made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. I simply want to remind him once again that in the throne speech at the opening of Parliament, the government indicated that there would be a number of measures designed to reorganize retraining and job-creation programs. We intend to make the announcements as soon as those programs are fully designed.

In the meantime, in our department we have an affirmative action program. We are presently meeting with a number of private employers across the country to make sure there is full access and opportunity for women and minority groups. Furthermore, if the hon. member can be patient for a week or two, I can give him every assurance that we will be initiating a number of new programs to provide for action of the very kind he contemplates and which we intend to take.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2, 9, 192 and 309.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Order Paper Questions

[Text]

PUBLIC SERVANTS—SALARIES ATTACHED FOR UNPAID DEBTS

Question No. 2—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the government intend to introduce legislation to make it possible for public servants to have their salaries attached for unpaid debts for which judgments have been obtained against them and, if not, what would be the legitimate reasons for allowing this privilege to continue which is not available to other Canadians?

2. Will it be government policy to see that public servants must take their full responsibility to society in so far as payment of debts is concerned?

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. Yes, such legislation will be introduced in this session of Parliament.

2. Yes, to the extent that any employer is legally responsible to comply with the laws which permit the garnishment or attachment of employees' wages.

MAJOR P. A. LEMIEUX—PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

Question No. 9—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the complete public service history of Major P. A. Lemieux of the Privy Council office including positions held, dates of appointment, etc?

2. Did Major Lemieux, prior to entering the public service, serve in the Canadian Armed Forces and, if so (a) in what capacity (b) for how long (c) what are all the details of any connection he may have had with matters of security?

Mr. David Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Major P. A. Lemieux, (Lieutenant-Colonel retired), was appointed to the Privy Council office on July 5, 1972 as a secretariat officer—Security and Intelligence.

2. Major Lemieux served in the Canadian army, infantry, in Canada and overseas, from January, 1943, until November 1945 when he was transferred to supplementary reserve status. He returned to active service in the infantry in November 1949 and was appointed to a junior staff officer position in the directorate of military intelligence in January, 1950. Major Lemieux served in various military intelligence and security appointments until his secondment to the Royal Commission on Security in January, 1967. Following his work with the commission, he served in the Privy Council office, on loan, from January 1969 until July 1969, when he returned to a staff appointment with the CAF directorate of security. In November, 1969 he was formally seconded to the Privy Council office security panel secretariat until he reached compulsory retirement age for his rank.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—REVENUE OR DEFICITS

1. For each fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits for Defence Construction (1951) Limited?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the Corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Motion for Papers

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

1. (a)	1976-77	Revenue	Vote 15 DND	$4,965,645
		Net Deficit		164,208
(b)	1977-78	Revenue	Vote 15 DND	5,837,866
		Net Deficit		45,105

NOTE: Net deficit is calculated as revenue less expenses. Revenue is the funding by National Defence through Vote 15.

2. (a) Vote 15—DND

1977-78	$5,837,866

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—CONSTRUCTION—ST. JEAN, QUEBEC

Question No. 309—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past seven years, what was the value of construction work administered by Defence Construction (1951) Limited at CFB St. Jean, P.Q.?

2. What was the value of (a) uncompleted contracts (b) outstanding tenders, as at March 31, 1979?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence):

	Base Development	Other Construction	Total
1972-73	$ —	$1,336,428	$1,336,428
1973-74	—	58,842	58,842
1974-75	—	573,962	573,962
1975-76	1,662,673	894,934	2,557,607
1976-77	11,977,794	—	11,977,794
1977-78	32,617,416	92,359	32,709,775
1978-79	23,729,271	7,500	23,736,711

2. (a) $69,734,237 NOTE: Work outstanding on these contracts—$4,965,486.

(b) No outstanding tenders.
No outstanding requests for tender.

REPORT—CLASSIFICATION AUDIT—NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA—NON-NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA

Motion No. 3—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the data base upon which the Report on the Classification Audit in the National Capital Area and the Non-National Capital Area was based.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the report on the classification audit in the national capital area and the non-national capital area was tabled in Parliament by the President of the Treasury Board on December 18, 1978. There is no document in existence that could be said to be the data base for this report. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Herbert: Transfer for debate.

Madam Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I ask that all other notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1933 SUPPLEMENTARY CANADA-FRANCE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1935

MEASURE TO REPEAL

Hon. E. F. Whelan (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill S-5, to repeal the Canada-France Trade Agreement Act, 1933 and The Supplementary Canada-France Trade Agreement Act, 1935, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill has been before the House and, I believe, before the Senate four times. We expect that by repealing this act we will resolve some of the legal problems facing the Canadian wine industry with regard to the use of the name "champagne" in particular, and of other wine names which are considered to be appellation of origin. We have received no official opposition from the government of France after official discussions took place, I believe, well over two years ago with the former secretary of state for external affairs who now holds another position in his native province of Newfoundland.

This Canadian product to which we are referring is a good product, and if any one has any need or desire to use it, I would suggest that they try it some time.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to make a few comments on this bill, the passage of which I urge today. The Canada-France Trade Agreement of 1933 as amended in 1935 should have been repealed some years ago.

For years, Canadian wine producers have labelled their wines as champagnes, using generic names without hesitation or hindrance. Champagne was known by that name in many countries, and so it was that Canadian wineries have produced and marketed champagnes under their respective labels. But the legal proceedings initiated against one of our Ontario wineries a few years ago gave our wine industry cause for major concern. The repeal of this agreement will go a long way to remedy that concern.

The introduction of the new excise tax proposed and imposed by the present government justifies further elaboration on the grape and wine industry as it exists in this country. This industry is one of the fastest growing in Ontario. There are over 900 grape growers in the Niagara area alone, working 26,000 acres of vineyards. However, this last year, in spite of an increase of 1,000 acres, the grape harvest resulted in a reduction of some 3,000 tons of grapes. Of the 70,000 tons of grapes produced, over 44,000 were sold to Ontario wineries, thus generating considerable employment in the processing, bottling and packaging industries of this country.

Plantings of French hybrid grape vines began in the late 1940s, followed by planting of the classic Vinifera strains. Many experts predicted that these grapes would not survive in Canada's winter climate. However, due to the dedicated work of researchers and scientists of the Horticultural Research Institute of Ontario, and to the research conducted by individual wineries, as well as the skill of the Ontario grape growers themselves, the volume of these special vines have topped 20,000 tons for the second year in a row. More and more Canadian wine consumers are discovering that Ontario table wines are living up to their successes in international competitions.

While there has been a considerable emphasis on preferred varieties of grapes, experience has shown that the Labrusca grape, which constitutes 50 per cent of the Niagara region grapes, cannot be overlooked in the grape growing, planning and planting programs. Many of the Labrusca vineyards are on soil that is not suitable for the newer types of grape vines. The Labrusca is ideal for grape juice, where their fruitier flavour is readily recognized. It is the staple grape for the lower alcohol, 7 per cent crackling wines, and for Niagara's famous sherries and ports. Perhaps many wine connoisseurs do not appreciate the Baby Ducks, Lonesome Charlies and other 7 per cent alcohol wines, but these wines now enjoy a remarkable share of the wine market across Canada, and yet are the only wines being exported beyond the shores of Canada to the United Kingdom and Japan.

Through continuing enterprise, grape growing, wine producing and juice processing have developed into major industries which are of increasing importance to the economy of Ontario and to Canada.

Grape growers' receipts for 1979 grossed out at $19 million. It is estimated that in 1979 federal and provincial income through excise and federal sales tax, provincial sales tax and mark-up, reached $100 million. This is solely from the sales of wines processed from Ontario-grown grapes. Had the excise tax now imposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) been applied to that 1979 crop, tax revenues would have totalled $118 million. This would have meant that federal and provincial government income would have averaged $2,600 for every ton of Ontario grapes processed into wine, or to put it another way, each acre of wine grapes grown in Ontario would have generated $7,800 for federal and provincial treasuries. This is considerably out of line when one considers that the grower receives only an average income of $780 per acre.

The proposed change in the excise tax represents a tax increase of over $184 per ton of grapes grown in Canada. The average per cent increase per gallon of wine is 185 per cent, as opposed to a 29 per cent increase on beer and a 6 per cent increase on a gallon of spirits. About 38 per cent of Niagara area wine production is in ports and sherries. The new excise tax increase will result in an increase of $1 per bottle for each bottle of sherry or port. The result is that the domestic wine producers, not being able to compete in ports and sherries, are eased out of this market and have ceased and will continue to cease to buy the staple Labrusca grape. The government may wish to review the impact which the fall of sales in this most highly taxed section of wines will have on its over-all tax revenue.

For years the urban growth and development of the city of St. Catharines have been hampered and restricted for the very good reason that it is located in the fruit-growing belt of the Niagara Peninsula. Tender fruit orchards have been converted to grape vineyards because now, at last, there is a mechanical grape picker. For the most part, growers of tender fruits must continue to rely on offshore labour to harvest their crops. Municipalities and organizations interested in the preservation of these fruitlands for future generations of Canadians are looking to the federal government to determine whether or not it is serious about protecting the fruitlands of our country. Despite the fact that for years the fruit growers of Canada have been crying out for some form of protection, it cannot be said that the grape growing and wine production industry in Canada is a protected industry, or even one receiving federal encouragement.

Champagne

The chairman of the Ontario Grapegrowers Marketing Board called the so-called mini-budget a major disaster for Ontario's grape and wine industry. He said:

> Unless changes are made and made quickly, our forecast is that this fall we will have a surplus of 10,000 tons of grapes without any hope of a market. This will be the most disastrous year in the history of our industry.

Also he said that the new federal excise tax on wines signals the biggest crisis the Ontario grape and wine industry has ever faced.

If the federal government is interested in preserving these fruitlands against the pressures of urban growth and development, it can no longer treat the tender fruit industry and the valuable grape and wine industry with indifference. It must act and act quickly to restore the traditional tax relationships between the various forms of alcoholic beverages. Wines, beer and spirits are very different beverages except for the fact that they each contain alcohol. Canada would be more in line with other wine growing countries if there were little or no tax applied to domestic wine.

Taxes on wine in Canada are already higher than those imposed in most countries in the world, with the result that our industry is having trouble competing with the cheaper wines from Hungary, Italy, Yugoslavia and elsewhere. To leave this excise tax unchanged would be to undermine this developing Canadian industry directly. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) recognized this and promised the wine industry early this year to review the tax should his government be re-elected.

The passage of this act today is a positive step in the direction of assisting the grape and wine industry of Canada. It should be followed by a quick and substantial reduction in the amount of tax imposed on this sector of our economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to say two or three words about this matter. My experience with the wine industry goes back a long number of years—at least 14 years—having been involved with it in a number of ways, the least of which was in tasting the product. I can recall when I was in the Ontario legislature that the matter of grape growers and the impact of legislation on grape growers was one which came before us with amazing regularity. Having represented an area for almost 12 years, I am very distressed with the length of time it has taken for the government to come to grips with this matter. I know the problems which confront both those who grow the grapes and those who make the wine.

Dealing with grape growing itself, one of the major impacts alluded to by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) has been the effective urban sprawl and the dramatic increases in costs that are attendant upon that effect, and the difficulty that farmers are having in maintaining a viable operation in the face of urban sprawl. We must add to that, again as was mentioned by the hon. member for St. Catharines, the matter of the excise tax and, of course, all the litigation which has been gone through by the wineries and of course paid for, in part or in whole, by those of us who consume, and by the farmers who grow the grapes. Those things lead to a great deal more uncertainty than the people in the area should be required to face.

I want to suggest that there are a number of things which should be considered by the government. If we are to encourage the wine industry, if we believe that perhaps it is a place where some growth can take place, and if as a result of that we are to encourage the growing of grapes, then we will have to look very seriously at the pricing structure. I hate to keep referring to the hon. member for St. Catharines, but he is absolutely right on this occasion. He may be wrong on other occasions, but certainly on this one he is right. The difficulty is that as our wines become more acceptable, as the quality rises, as the taste becomes more palatable, as more and more Canadians, and others, are inclined to purchase the wines, then the pressures, both from the government to extract even more by way of tax, and from the importers in whatever way they can and must impede the growth of the industry, are a matter that the government must address itself to in its totality.

It is not enough simply to say that the excise tax adds an unfair burden. For example, I should like to suggest that in the matter of sherries the wine industry of the Niagara Peninsula produces sherries which are very palatable and very acceptable. If they were put in another bottle, many, many people who consider themselves connoisseurs would not be able to tell the difference. Unfortunately, now that they have achieved that level of excellence and acceptability, the government sees fit to add yet again to the tax burden. I think that is counter productive. I think that, in fact, would be wrong. At this period of time, when the industry is showing some potential for growth, the government might consider not doing that by way of tax, but instead encouraging further use and development of the industry for the future needs of the people who enjoy those kinds of drinks.

As far as the French champagne argument is concerned, when we were making champagne that no one would drink, the French did not care what we called it. It was only after we started to manufacture a champagne that was selling, it was only after we improved the quality of that white sparkling wine to the point where it could be taken home and actually put into a glass and drunk, that the people in France started paying attention to it. The government might well have considered moving much more swiftly because there has been considerable cost attached to preparing and developing the case that must be made before the courts, or would have been made before the courts if this bill had not been brought in today.

I suggest to the government, while it may appear in the over-all theme in the interest of Canada, with the development of the country and with all of the major problems that confront us, that the problems of the wine industry are somewhat smaller and, therefore, of less consequence; it may appear that way, but in the over all, in terms of their capacity to produce in southern Ontario, particularly in the Niagara

Peninsula, and in the over all in terms of the amount of money they are able to generate from the sale of the product, the delays by this government have cost them dearly. In fact, they may even have contributed, in all fairness, to an undermining of the saleability of the product. This may be because of the uncertainty that existed and because of the fact that many of the farmers, and some of the wine manufacturers, were uncertain of what the future held, and, knowing that champagne by any other name would not be champagne, at least not in terms of its capacity to be marketed, this delay may have impeded the natural growth which was taking place and, of course, may have required, and no doubt will require the industry to spend considerably larger sums of money in its marketing efforts.

I say to the minister in that regard that I am delighted to support the bill. I can remember a couple of years ago being in the Ontario legislature, and I would have been delighted to have supported such a bill then. I never did think I would see the day when I would be here with this bill before us. You never can tell. Is it not amazing what happens to people.

Mr. Whelan: Ask Stanley.

Mr. Deans: There you go, you see.

The other problem is that I suppose it might have been done more quickly had we been on the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: The other thing I want to suggest is that we will have to make up our minds. Either we are going to have a wine industry in the Niagara Peninsula, secured and supported by growers in the peninsula, or we are going to see the entire peninsula turned over to tar, macadam, and buildings. The decision must be made by government at all three levels. The wine industry cannot possibly survive if it is to be crowded out by urban sprawl.

The hon. member for St. Catharines will recall the attempts by the members of the council of the city of St. Catharines to extend the boundaries of the city not so many months or years ago, and the long delay and debate that took place in attempting to determine whether that would be counterproductive and, therefore, harmful to the growers in the area. Of course we cut it back substantially, but I think the government will have to make some very tough and enforceable decisions about land use policies. We will have to try to find a way to co-ordinate the effort of the farmer with the effort and the necessity of the city dweller. We will have to pay recognition to the heavy tax burden the farmer must carry when he becomes surrounded, more or less, by urban development. We will have to recognize in the tax structure the onerous burden the small family farmer in the Niagara Peninsula is required to carry as a matter of taxation.

When municipalities, Stoney Creek being a good example, with a pro-development council, are prepared to tarmac almost anything they can get their hands on, and encourage development to the exclusion of the preservation of the farm community, we have to recognize that farmers, if they are to survive, have to be treated in a way that will enable them to compete with industrial development and with urban sprawl in the peninsula, in other parts of the province and in other parts of the country.

The passage of this bill may well put an end to the battle over the name champagne. I frankly doubt it, as I suppose it will carry on at some other level. It may well be carried on, if not in the courts, certainly in the media. However, the long-term future of the industry will depend to a great extent on co-ordinated pricing, taxation and land use policy. The industry cannot survive, no matter what we allow the names to become, unless we have that kind of policy.

I would suggest to the minister that some time in the not too distant future he might address himself to that very matter in this House, and suggest to the House how he proposes to rationalize the tremendous imbalance the farmer must face in terms of his contribution to the tax structure, and the tremendous pressure he must face with regard to urban sprawl, and the way in which we may be able to secure for future generations the perpetual use of most valuable land for farming purposes. There is no point in saving all the stony land for later and using up the arable land now. There is no point in allowing development to take place on the best soil in areas with the most favourable climatic conditions, only to be left in years to come with nothing but perhaps the less desirable and, obviously, less fertile land.

I have had it said to me that, of course, modern technology in the farming industry will bring about the necessary changes, and that somehow or other we will be able to produce more on less; that with machinery and with all kinds of feeds and whatever we will be able to produce more with less. I am from Missouri on that one; I think I would like to see something a little more concrete, and not just simply some pie in the sky proposals, or perhaps some ill-dreamt-up, middle-of-the-night claims after a bottle of cheap wine or, for that matter, a bottle of cheap whisky or beer.

Frankly, I think it would serve us better in the long run to deal with the real problem. While this is an example of a problem, the real problem is the one I have just mentioned. We will have to do these things, and I urge the minister to take that problem on post haste, and let us see if we cannot get it resolved.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have just a very few words to say on this matter because I am aware, and perhaps pleasantly surprised, that an all-party agreement to pass this particular bill, which has already cleared the other place, has been reached. It is extremely tempting to utilize this time to discuss the industry in general, and to indicate the need for an opportunity to do precisely that, and, on another occasion, to discuss the tremendous growth in the Canadian wine industry, not only in Ontario, but potentially in other parts of the country, including British Columbia.

I was reluctant to rise because I know there is an agreement to dispose of this bill in the House before four o'clock, and I know that we have to depend to a great degree, with justification, on the good will and co-operation of members of parties opposite. Nevertheless, I thought that it was important that I rise and at least be on record as having approved of this bill and, if nothing else, to indicate my new found interest—I must confess that it is not a new-found interest in wine—perhaps an ongoing interest—I have for the area once represented in the provincial legislature by the hon. member for the New Democratic Party, with whom I have a very good rapport outside the House.

I am pleased with the passage of this bill because it legalizes something which the government indicated several years ago, the end to a protocol and a trade agreement with France which goes back to the 1930s when in fact our wine industry left much to be desired. What this bill is doing is legalizing the intent expressed by the government some years ago, and thus eliminating the possibility of legal action.

The hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) is a very astute politician and has served his country very well at all levels. For instance, he was the mayor of St. Catharines when it allowed that beautiful wine-growing area on the outskirts of the city to be absorbed into the urban sprawl. It must have been a very difficult decision for the mayor to, on the one hand, go along with the developers and, at the same time, express the interests he has expressed today, which are so well known to the farmers. It is a dilemma which the hon. member from Hamilton has pointed out.

Surely the greatest defence which the farm community has against further spreading of the urban sprawl or the cement jungle, is in time to make certain that the farmer has a decent income from his land. This is why I must pay tribute, at the risk of sounding partisan, which is not my intention, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The people of Lincoln County, and particularly those from the town of Grimsby, tell me that the Minister of Agriculture is responsible for the development of a small but growing brandy industry. Through the minister's efforts some years ago, the cabinet of the day was persuaded to provide moneys needed to buy up certain grapes which, in turn, were turned over to Canada's one company that can legitimately say it produces Canadian brandy. This is an indication that the wine industry, particularly in the Niagara Peninsula, has friends on all sides.

Again, I must gently say to the hon. member for St. Catharines that the tax which was imposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) some weeks ago is, in my opinion, detrimental to the wine industry. I am rather sorry to see the tax implemented, but I must again remind the hon. member for St. Catharines that, although it is not the subject of discussion today, the tax is nothing more than a total and complete replica of the tax proposed by the previous government. I am sure that the hon. member is quite accurate when he said that the former minister of finance did agree, during the election campaign, to review that particular tax. However, it should not go unnoticed that the present Minister of Finance made the same commitment the other day in the House.

In conclusion, I do not wish to end in a partisan role, nor do I wish to express different opinions from those of the hon. member for St. Catharines. I am very pleased that the members of all parties from the Niagara Peninsula have been able to put aside their partisan differences for the common good of the wine industry in our part of the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan).

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, thank you very much. If the Chair has difficulty with my name, I have—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair might have difficulty, but, as a point of order, the Chair prefers to be known as Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: I agree, sir, but if the Chair has difficulty with my name, I have difficulty with gender.

I am rising briefly, Mr. Speaker, because I know that there has been all-party agreement to move this bill through all its stages into law, and to get the bill to the other place for royal assent today. It will basically help the industry. I appreciate that the members from the Niagara Peninsula have a little more direct interest in the wine industry.

The only reason that I rise is to forewarn the minister, although I know full well that he is from another area of the good province of Ontario, that in other provinces, and including Ontario, there is another problem, not with champagne or Champlaign, but with apple cider. Without getting into the details of the controversy, and in view of the fact that the Horticultural Council of Canada has passed resolutions on the problem of sweet cider and apple drink which, if resolved, will help the productivity and/or the income and well-being of the farmers of this land, I would like to put the minister on notice that while I certainly am in approval today and do not wish to hold up passage of this bill, I was thinking at one point—before I realized there was all-party agreement—that if the bill had anything to do with liquids I would use it to make sure that, no matter what liquid it was, we would talk about cider.

Whether it be in the House, the Standing Committee on Agriculture, or by letter, hopefully we will be able to move the horticulture resolutions on the sweet cider problem to a satisfactory conclusion as we are doing today with the matter under discussion in Bill S-5.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I was champing in pain a little bit, as it were, as I listened to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey). Has any hon. member ever tried to order Canadian wine on Air Canada? It is impossible. I agree with just about everything which the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) said, but I would point out that there is a wine industry in the Okanagan Valley in British Columbia. It is a very good wine industry. As a matter of fact I tried to bring some sample bottles here for some hon. members so that they might try them. I refer to the new wines which are being made in the Okanagan Valley, particularly in the new industry which is called the cottage wine industry which, for example, can be found at Trepanier, as well as at Port Moody and in the lower mainland.

I agree specifically with the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain as they referred to the problems caused to the wine grower when urban sprawl takes over farm areas. We have had to deal with that matter. A previous NDP provincial government had to deal with that problem in British Columbia. I think that that government will go down in Canadian political history as being very courageous in its dealings in this matter. The Barrett government, the last NDP government and the next one in British Columbia, brought in a land freeze act that protected the farm land of the province. It not only protected the farm land, but it added to the land freeze a measure to protect the small farmer who needed help and a stable income in order to continue the orchards.

The orchards of the Okanagan are in some danger today. The area is facing floods of Albertans who come to the area—and who of course are welcomed as Canadians—for recreation. I hope that we can continue to keep those orchards and keep the new wine industry growing. There is no pun intended. I support this bill and agree with the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain with regard to champagne. What is in a name? I suspect, though, that the dispute about the name champagne will go on, but at least this bill will give Canadian wine growers a chance.

There is a snob appeal, which is found more among my generation than perhaps the other generations because we have become more of a wine drinking generation, that we must drink French wines and foreign wines when, in fact, there are very good Canadian wines. These Canadian wines are made in my area and other areas of the country. As the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has said, the problems of the wine industry wither on the vine when they are put beside all the problems of the world. I do not wish to add any sour grapes to this debate when I say that, but I think that it is important that this bill go through today.

We in the New Democratic Party support the bill and commend to the government the remarks made by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain that steps should be taken, both federally and provincially, to stop this urban sprawl in wine growing areas in order to give them and wine growers a fair chance.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, after consultation, there seems to be general agreement that this bill be referred to Committee of the Whole rather than to the standing committee of this House and that it be disposed of forthwith, through all stages.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Motion amended.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amended motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion as amended agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Francis in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Mr. Whelan (for Mr. MacGuigan) moved third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in this, or for that matter, any parliament. I deem it a good omen that the opportunity occurs on the same day that we are celebrating the centenary of Hansard. The record of 100 years of accurate reporting gives me confidence that my words will be reported accurately.

I am very pleased, in fact I am very proud, to be able to represent the people of Okanagan North in this great assembly. Today I continue debate on this very comprehensive Bill C-6, which represents the decennial review of the Bank Act. This is an important bill for the people of my constituency, as indeed it is to all Canadians.

In Okanagan North the availability of financial services is essential to our economic well-being. Our economic base depends upon having a healthy forest industry, a healthy agricultural and tree-fruit industry, and a healthy and active tourist industry. The people who own, operate, and work in these industries—most of whom are small business people—depend to a rather large degree on obtaining operating capital through local banking and financial institutions at competitive rates. It is important to them that operating loans are available quickly at reasonable rates. Unfortunately, in recent months the ever-increasing escalation of interest rates to unprecedented levels has made it extremely difficult for business people, for farmers, for fruit growers, for people in the lumber industry, and indeed for all small business people—or large business people—in the Okanagan and elsewhere in Canada, to operate at a level of activity and a margin of profit which would enable them to survive. Here we must ask who is to blame for these high rates.

There are those who blame the bankers. There are those who blame the banking system. There are those who blame the central bank. Mr. Speaker, there is only one place we can lay the blame for high interest rates. There is only one place we can honestly look to for responsibility for those killing interest rates. There is only one culprit, Mr. Speaker, and that culprit is the present Liberal government, a government whose policies over the past 12 years have been solely responsible for the position that all business people, home owners, and the whole country, are in today. Over those years this government has pursued a reckless, irresponsible, and indeed almost an insane policy of government spending, a policy of huge and ever-increasing deficits and a policy of printing money to meet those deficits, a policy of building bigger and bigger bureaucratic monstrosities until today our civil service establishment per capita is one of the largest in the world. It is this government, with its policy of inflation, which has caused the high interest rates, and it is this government which seems determined to maintain an even higher inflation rate and consequent high interest rates.

It is indeed unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this bill to revise the Bank Act will probably have no effect on the disastrous economic policies of this government. I speak in favour of the early passing of this bill, however with some changes which I shall detail later.

There are two general areas of the bill which deserve commendation. First of all, the bill purports to increase competition in the Canadian banking system and, by doing so, it will almost certainly strengthen an already strong Canadian financial and banking structure. The bill will increase competition by providing easier entry into the banking field by new banks, first by making it possible to incorporate by letters patent rather than by an act of Parliament. Second, it will allow greater access to the Canadian market by foreign banks and thus provide existing Canadian banks with greater competition and the Canadian public with a greater diversity of banking institutions.

The banking community of Canada supports this move, this endeavour, for greater competition. This support has the hon. member from Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) of the NDP wondering how much competition will really result from this act. He said, if I remember his words, surely the banks are going to face additional competition, and they are in favour of it? Surely the act is not going to provide the competition which the minister says. He indicated that those big, bad financial corporate bums, as they were once termed by the NDP, would not favour this act if they were going to find competition. I suggest to him that those big bad banks, the Canadian bankers, are as capable as any in the world and they are prepared for a trade-off. That trade-off is that they are prepared for greater competition in Canada if they receive similar, reciprocal treatment to enable them to compete in other parts of the world, which they feel they can do effectively.

As a Canadian I am certainly pleased and proud that our financial institutions are known and exist the world over. I only wish other Canadian companies were as successful in competing around the world.

The Canadian public will benefit from the increased competition which will be encouraged by this bill, in two ways. First of all the entry of foreign banks into the market will provide a greater diversity of financial services. We live in a world marketplace. The time is long gone when we can be parochial and limit our horizons, whether as individuals or as businesses, to the confines of one country.

This is particularly true of the financial world and this country can only benefit by having access, not only to the credit resources and financial services of Canadian banks, but also to the credit resources and financial services of some of the great financial institutions of the world.

That is why I favour the early passage of this act, because it will allow foreign banks easier access to the Canadian market and provide Canadians with access to their financial resources. Bill C-6 also deserves my support, and the support of this House, because it will make it easier for new banks to be established in the maritimes, in eastern Canada and in the western provinces. This bill will facilitate the conversion of existing financial institutions to the status of a chartered bank. Again, as I said earlier, this bill will make entry into the banking business easier.

We, in western Canada, are well aware of the results and effects of the lack of competition that used to exist among the major banks in this country. It was not too long ago that the head offices of the major banks in Canada were located in Toronto or Montreal. I have worked with large businesses, and with small businesses, in the western provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and now British Columbia. I well remember in the 1950s and 1960s, and earlier, whenever there was a small, short depression—now they call them recessions—and money was in short supply and credit was tight. The local managers of the major banks were forced to go to their customers and call their loans. This was done because decisions were made and based in the offices in eastern Canada. Of course their decisions were based on the needs of those companies which needed credit in different parts of the country.

Things have changed. We now have several new banks. Some of the banks have head offices and decision-making offices in western Canada. We now get loan and credit-making decisions on the basis of western need. This bill will provide an opportunity for the establishment of even more banking institutions. New banks, new institutions mean more competition. More competition means more efficiency, new ideas, and better service for the Canadian public.

Let me illustrate. In British Columbia we have a financial institution called the Bank of British Columbia. Let me quickly disclaim any special brief for the Bank of British Columbia, but, just by way of illustration, it provides an example of what competition from a new source can mean in services to the Canadian public. We all, or at least some of us, remember the response of the five major banks in Canada when the question of providing daily interest to customers who had money on deposit was suggested. I believe it was suggested during the hearings that this House had in committee on this particular bill. "It cannot be done," said the chartered banks at that time. "It is too costly. Impossible!" they all cried in unison. However, in recent years the "new boy" in the banking system, the Bank of British Columbia said, "We can do it," and they have done it. Today all of the old existing banks are stumbling over themselves to get in on the act. Now you can even get daily interest on chequing accounts.

This bill is strongly supported by the credit union movement in Canada. That union says, and rightly so, that it will benefit from the proposal in the bill to create a new Canadian Payments Association through which, for the first time, non-bank financial institutions that accept chequable deposits will be permitted to participate directly in the clearing system.

Credit unions agree that the bill will provide more equitable competition within the Canadian financial system and provide them with increased service. There is, however, one aspect of this bill which concerns me and many of my constituents, particularly those in the auto industry who are involved in automobile leasing. This concern has been expressed before in this House during debate on this bill. I am glad to see the minister agree that perhaps some change could be made in committee.

The part of the bill that concerns us is that part that allows banks to enter the business of the financial leasing of equipment, including automobiles, through the use of subsidiaries. The minister said that the Canadian public would benefit from allowing banks into this area because increased competition in the leasing field would result. I disagree.

First, I believe it is generally admitted in the industry that leasing an auto is considerably more expensive than is borrowing money from a financial institution and buying the automobile outright. For instance, when I go to seek advice from my local bank as to whether I should lease a car or borrow the money from that bank to buy a car, my bank manager in all likelihood, as would everyone's bank manager, would explain that leasing costs considerably more money in most circumstances than does borrowing money from that bank to purchase a car. He would also explain that leasing was only valid under certain circumstances and special conditions. Today, under present circumstances, I believe my friendly banker would offer to lend me the money to buy the car of my choice.

However, if under the terms of Bill C-6 the banks are allowed into the leasing industry and, do as they intend to, and have a leasing officer in every branch across the country, as they now have loan officers and mortgage officers, under those conditions the natural thing for him to do is to say, "I would like you to meet my leasing officer". It must be true, and undoubtedly is true, that there is considerably more money to be made in leasing than there is in loaning money, or else the banks would not be so eager to get into it. Consequently, no longer would I as a consumer have two choices, one to borrow money, and one to lease effectively. I would be steered into the leasing business which would be more expensive for me as a consumer.

The second objection I have to the proposed Bank Act, and indeed the existing act and previous acts, is that they are not really designed as a vehicle properly to enable the banks to get into the business of dealing with commodity purchases or commodity leases, as suggested in this new act.

Admittedly, today, when a bank lends money to purchase equipment, be it a car, a fridge or whatever, and takes as security a conditional sales agreement or a chattel mortgage on equipment to be purchased or financed, it is dealing with commodity purchases. The bank now has that right. However, several provincial governments, if not all, have found that financial institutions—not necessarily banks but not necessarily excluding them—have taken unfair advantage of the consumer. Mr. Speaker, that is a terrible thing to have to say, but unfortunately it is true.

There are many cases in which financial institutions, bank managers, feel it is necessary for them to repossess the vehicle or other equipment of a defaulting purchaser. In order to regain their money they sell it quickly, probably for an amount considerably below its real value. This happens at times even when the purchaser has a large equity in the equipment. The result is an unfair loss to the consumer concerned. Provincial governments have devised and enacted legislation in almost every province, I believe, to protect consumers against this practice. However, this legislation does not affect the banks since the bands claim they come under federal jurisdiction and are immune from provincial laws. They currently claim this immunity in respect to the financing of chattels by way of mortgages or conditional sales contracts. I have the experience of several cases in which banks have repossessed articles contrary to provincial legislation. Provincial legislation is only followed provided enough fuss is made when bad publicity is given or, more usually, as a result of action by the department dealing with consumer affairs. When this happens, the banks back down and voluntarily accept the terms of the provincial legislation.

Undoubtedly abuses will arise in the field of financial leasing, and undoubtedly provincial legislation will be brought forward to correct such abuses, but again this legislation will be unable to provide a remedy if it is the banks which are guilty of the abuse. It is for this reason that, in my view, the bill before us should be changed in committee so as to restrict the involvement of banks in the leasing field. The banks should be restricted to providing financial leases for large fleets, heavy equipment or heavy trucks—things of that nature. Competition for leasing to the individual consumer is already extensive, and no benefit would accrue to the Canadian public if we were to enable the banks to enter this field.

In closing, let me repeat that the passing of this bill will not solve the economic problems for which the policies of the government are responsible. We are not likely to deter this government from the disastrous course down which it is headed. However, we can, and we should, rely on the resourcefulness of the Canadian people to succeed in spite of the government. The passing of this bill will allow one segment of Canadian society, the financial and banking community, to get on with the job.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on the revision of the Bank Act. Since this is my opening speech I should mention that in the beautiful riding of Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands we do, indeed, have banks. We also have credit unions, which are even more relevant to the interests of ordinary people.

Without digressing too much, I might add that Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands is one of the most beautiful parts of Canada or, indeed, of the world. I thank the people of the riding for their confidence in me; I will do my best to serve them. On their behalf let me say it is a nice place to visit, but we don't want too many of you to live there. I urge hon. members to visit their banks or credit unions before they come.

I was in the House two nights ago when the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) suggested that new members should not become too involved in this discussion because all the important questions have been asked and answered to almost everyone's satisfaction. Last night the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) agreed with him in wanting to rush this bill through its several stages. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I must decline the invitation to remain silent on this measure. It touches on too many issues which are important to me. These issues concern me as a Canadian interested in the broad economic and social well-being of my country. They concern me as a consumer of financial services, and they concern me as a member of a political party which is working for progressive change in Canadian society.

The Minister of Justice expressed concern that this session of Parliament should not reinvent the wheel. I can assure him we are not interested in reinventing the wheel, but we do have some questions about the direction in which the wheel is travelling. In short, we oppose the proposed revision of the Bank Act as set out in Bill C-6. We oppose it for some of the things it does and also for some of the things it fails to do, or does not do in an adequate manner.

Let us examine some of the things this act does. First of all, it opens the door for foreign banks to have a larger, more official role in Canada. In a sense the Bank Act amounts to an official baptism of the situation which already exists. The government hopes by this to place greater control over foreign banks in the hands of federal authorities. When we look at the government's track record when it comes to controlling big corporations, I must say this is a rather forlorn hope. The bill talks about means of increasing competition with the chartered banks. But we ask how much this kind of increased competition will help ordinary consumers or small businesses. As other members have pointed out, foreign banks would emphasize large-scale commercial and industrial accounts. The foreign-owned subsidiaries of the multinationals would be inclined to use foreign banks for their financial transactions rather than Canadian banks.

Last night we heard the hon. member for York-Peel yodelling about Canada becoming the Switzerland of North America. I suggest that the first step toward this was taken when we go rid of our merchant navy. The second is bringing in the foreign banks. Instead of the gnomes of Zurich we will soon, perhaps, be able to talk about the Hobbitts of Bay Street. We all agree that more competition in banking would be desirable, but this could be better achieved through more Canadian banks and through enlarging the scope of our credit unions. We should also be looking seriously at such alternatives as post office banks.

Another reason often cited for allowing foreign banks into Canada is the need for reciprocity, so that Canadian banks will have access to foreign markets. But, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the record of Canadian banks in South Africa or the Caribbean, we have serious doubts about the value of this proposal. With regard to Canadian banks in the Caribbean, one informed source pointed to the concerted attempt by multinationals to destabilize the government of Jamaica. Canadian banks have not been neutral.

Canadian banks have not been enabling or developmental in their approach, but they have been part of the multinationals' grab for Third World resources. In South Africa Canadian banks, through their loans to companies doing business in South Africa and to South African government agencies, have given powerful support to the policy of apartheid. In this regard I am pleased to note the following statement on foreign lending that the Toronto-Dominion Bank issued on March 14 of this year:

> We have reviewed our position and again state categorically that we are opposed to apartheid. The bank has made only one loan in South Africa in recent years. That was to the state electrical system, along with a group of European and other banks, for construction work at a coal-fired generating station. This would increase the over-all electricity supply to support the government's announced intention of electrifying the non-white communities. This loan will not be renewed nor will the bank make new loans to the government of South Africa or its agencies under present circumstances.

I believe it would be good if other major chartered banks followed this example.

Second, the new Bank Act allows the cabinet to issue letters patent for a new bank rather than requiring that charters be issued only by an act of Parliament. This undermines the role of elected representatives. This provision undercuts the need for full, public and open discussion of any new bank proposal. However, this seems to be a hallmark of this government: more rule by cabinet and by the bureaucracy, and less by the people and their representatives.

Third, as has been pointed out repeatedly, not only by members of the New Democratic Party but also by hon. members from the Conservative party, the new act allows banks to expand into such areas as automobile leasing. Automobile dealers have clearly recognized the threat that this poses to their business. They very much fear that they will be completely unable to compete with the massive resources of any of the chartered banks and the access that these banks have to the leasing market.

Now let us look at some of the things this act does not do. First, it does not offer any substantial improvements in public disclosure regulations. The public needs to know how interest payments are calculated. The public needs to know about any associated costs of loans. There is a need for disclosure regarding the policies, practices and operations of the banks and their international subsidiaries. For example, what loans are being made to companies in South Africa?

Second, this act does not control the spread between the rate of interest the banks pay to depositors for their savings and a much higher rate that borrowers must pay to the banks when they borrow money.

Third—and this is most important—the new act takes no action against interlocking directorates. In interlocking directorates, directors of large commercial and industrial corporations sit on the board of directors of one or other of the major chartered banks. We are opposed to this system because it gives us the worst of all possible worlds. It does not give us healthy competition.

Large corporations have the inside track in raising capital. This, in fact, is one of the ways by which multinational corporations dominate our world economy. Scarce savings come increasingly under the control of one of the large banks, and loans are made much more easily to corporations which have representatives on the boards of directors. If we are going to talk about competition and free enterprise, there should at least be an arm's length distance between financial corporations and their major industrial and commercial customers.

Certainly interlocking directorates encourage some planning for the rational use of resources, but this is not public planning, and it is not planning in the interest of the public. It is planning in the interests of those who do the planning, namely, the interlocking directorate. So we have neither a healthy free enterprise system of competition nor a rational system of public planning. We have monopoly capitalism, and those members of the Liberal and Tory parties who vote for an act which allows this kind of interlocking directorship to continue are, in effect, voting for that kind of monopoly capitalism. There is nothing competitive in it at all.

Fourth, the new act does not make it possible for the government to use the Canadian banking system as an effective instrument of public policy. This is a very important issue. Since I have been here in this House we have discussed low interest loans for small business, but we do not have any provisions to require the banks to make available a certain amount of money for these loans at low interest rates.

Today the people of Canada are crying out for a housing program which would enable them to purchase homes at reasonable rates. Where is the mechanism in this act which would allow the government to require the banks to make loans for such a program?

Native Indian bands are starved for economic development funds. They require capital. The Bank Act should make the banks more responsive to this kind of public need.

Some people will reply that all of this should be left up to free enterprise and that everything will adjust itself in the private interest. In response, we can ask how helpful banks have been to the growth of Canada in the past. In "The History of Canadian Business" Tom Naylor points out that the Canadian banking system evolved from a need for capital to move staples out of the country. It was oriented to the idea of Canada being a hewer of wood and a drawer of water rather than being a modern, industrial nation. Naylor shows how the banks siphoned savings from the maritimes to use for opening up the west and its staple production. As a result, necessary industrial development did not take place in the maritimes. This is one of the reasons for the present regional economic problems.

Areas of Canada are undeveloped today because of the free enterprise policies of our banks in the past. In one maritime community, for example, the ratio of deposits to loans reached 20 to one; that is, for every $20 local people invested in savings only $1 was loaned back to the local community for necessary improvements or any kind of economic development. A ratio of 20 to one! It is no wonder we have problems in the maritimes today.

Similarly, in the west banking policy confirmed people there in a staples economy rather than one based on industrial development. Farmers were sometimes unable to negotiate loans which would help them to hold back their crops and get decent prices. Instead, the money was loaned to speculators who then forced the farmers to sell immediately for what they could get. Revolving loans were often made to fall due just before harvest time, once again forcing farmers to sell at whatever price was offered.

These are some of the previous policies which our banks have followed. These policies proved to be very lucrative for the banks, but they have had disastrous effects on our economy. They do not give me great confidence in the direction in which our banking system has been moving in the past. There is nothing in this act which indicates that it is going to change direction. The conservative nature of banks is shown by the near panic created in 1911 by a modest proposal that there be a central fund to guarantee the notes of all Canadian banks. Sir Edward Clouston, general manager of the Bank of Montreal at the time, was quick to categorize this proposal as communism. Imagine, only the barest possible protection for the consumer is denounced as communism!

Again we can look at the track record of banks as employers. When we are reviewing the place of banks in our society, it is not a bad idea to see what kind of employers banks are, and how they treat their own workers. Banks are the largest private employers of women in the country. In our banks we have seen entrenched forms of sexual discrimination. Banks have created a job ghetto for women. Women have been given the routine, low-paying jobs, and have been passed over for promotions. Often women have trained male employees who then advanced five times more rapidly beyond them. Sometimes we talk about "bankers' hours", but the women who have worked at banks were often forced to work without coffee breaks and coerced into working overtime at straight pay.

In a book entitled "An Account to Settle: The Story of the United Bank Workers", we are told how this worked. It reads:

The banks have a special exemption from the law that workers must be paid for working overtime. By means of an arrangement with the Ministry of Finance, overtime in banks was "averaged". If one night everyone worked late and another night they were sent home early, the two were considered to cancel each other out, and no overtime was paid. The banks were allowed to average overtime over a thirteen-week period so that employees could be required to work overtime every day for several weeks without pay.

That is the kind of bankers' hours that they were demanding for their own workers. I wish all members of the House could read this book as it details the hassles these women faced when they tried to form a union. It tells a story of coercion, intimidation, and bribery, in the attempt by the banks to break the union. It is not a very pleasant story for the 1970s.

Surely with the profits that the banks have been making, they could afford to be better employers that this. Surely these pinnacles of respectability do not need to exploit women as cheap labour in this day and age. In fact banks were almost as bad employers as the House of Commons itself, which refuses its employees the right to form a union.

It is true that banks have made some concessions to workers in British Columbia in order to defeat the bank workers' organizing drive. But in spite of these concessions, bank workers continue to earn less than the average British Columbia wage. They have no seniority recognition in relation to transfers, promotions, or job security. There is no effective grievance procedure. Surely our banks can be better employers than that. Banks have an account to settle with their own workers.

Two years ago, on the anniversary of the Soweto riots against apartheid, Canadians were asked to close their accounts with banks which supported that vicious policy through loans. In response to this appeal, I closed my account and took my financial business to the local credit union. In my letter to the chief executive officer of the bank, I emphasized that I had always enjoyed good, courteous service from the management and staff of the local branch of the bank. My action was concerned only with the bank's policy of loans to South Africa. I had a small loan at the bank with one or two payments left, and I paid this off as they came due. Imagine my surprise, therefore, when two months after the last payment I received a dunning letter from the bank which read:

We feel we have been more than lenient with you in the handling of this account. However, unless we hear from you by October 24, 1978, your account will be referred to a collection agency.

They felt they were being more than lenient with me when I paid the loan off two months earlier! This letter indicates the bank's attitude to the Canadian people. The banks feel they have been "more than lenient" with us, that they are doing us a favour by putting money out to usury.

In this party we think that in this revision of the Bank Act we have been more than lenient with the banks. We believe that the time has come for some fundamental changes in the Canadian banking system, not changes to allow more foreign banks into Canada. We do not need changes that will allow the cabinet to charter new banks without recourse to Parliament. We do not want changes that would allow the banks to enter the leasing market. Rather, we need changes that will allow a decent measure of public disclosure. We need control of interest rate spreads. We need changes that will put an end to the stranglehold of interlocking directorates.

Finally, we need legislation which will give this government the power to use banks as an instrument of social and economic policy. Instead of rushing this legislation through, let us take the time to bring in a revision which will meet the real needs of Canada in the 1980s.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) who, a few moments ago, made his initial speech in the House. I remember him when he served as the distinguished mayor of Edmonton, and many others in this House remember him in that capacity. I am glad to say in passing that, as he gave his speech today analysing Bill C-6, I noted that his powers of analysis and persuasion have not diminished, even though he moved further west in the course of his career. So, along with many others, I welcome him to this House.

I wish to make some very brief comments this afternoon on Bill C-6, particularly with reference to the leasing provisions. I know that several comments have been made already in this debate on the leasing provisions, but I think the matter must be simply stated again in order that the government receive a clear indication of the strength of the opposition to the leasing provisions contained in Bill C-6.

I am opposed to the idea of banks being involved in the leasing business, especially the leasing of cars to individual consumers. Banks should remain in the financial field and leave merchandising to the private businessman. That is the thrust of the comments I want to make this afternoon.

The leasing of automotive vehicles involves a variety of factors, not just the extension of credit. An appropriate model vehicle must be selected and a lease drawn up to suit the individual's needs and requirements. Equipment, maintenance, insurance and disposal of the vehicle at the termination of the lease are all involved. Banks are in no position to provide this complete range of service. Whatever banks may say about their desire to help the consumer by providing competitive leasing arrangements, it is clear that they are interested in leasing because of the profits involved. After all, that is the fundamental reason they have become involved in leasing. It is questionable in my mind, however, whether banks will, in fact, increase competition in the marketplace.

In the majority of cases, banks finance large dealer-leasing operations and require complete dealer-customer files, including the names and addresses of lessees and the terms of the lease contract. Of course banks are also able to obtain money at a cheaper price than private businesses. That is a point we should not overlook. They will start out with a competitive edge and will be fully capable of attracting lessees away from private dealers. I think the fear that has been expressed by the automotive industry across the country is well-founded. Moreover, they have a right to expect a government that will foster a climate for private business, not impede it.

What we are contemplating if this bill goes through unchanged, is the banks achieving a virtual monopoly in the leasing business. That being the case, what guarantees do we have that they will remain competitive in this field? The limited number of banks in Canada would make this near-monopolistic situation much easier to control. We must ask ourselves: can five or six banks really provide as much competition as 3,000 independent dealers, in the long run? I believe bank leasing would also represent a conflict of interest. On the one hand they are providing operating lines of credit to car dealers, while on the other hand they will be competing with those same dealers in the leasing business. What guarantee is there that banks will not drive a dealer out of the leasing market by curtailing his credit? Dealers and manufacturers of automobiles are already under severe economic pressures without this added threat.

Some of the amendments which were made to the former Bill C-15, and which were contained in the regulations attached to Bill C-14 of the previous government, were supposed to address the concerns of automobile lessors. For example, banks were excluded from directing lessees to a particular dealer. However, how this would be enforced is left unsaid, and I believe that it would be extremely difficult to have this kind of enforcement.

The stipulation that no more than 20 per cent residual value could remain when the lease term is over does not really restrict banks from entering the car leasing field. If one has a vehicle which is depreciated at 2.5 per cent over 36 months, the residual is down to 10 per cent, a level which banks can operate under. It really depends on how the depreciation will be calculated.

If the original intent of this legislation was to permit banks to lease big ticket items such as locomotives, aircraft, ships, etc., then some of the restriction related to on-highway vehicles of a certain size would not be contrary to this intent. That is the kind of amendment I would favour.

I was pleased to note yesterday that the parliamentary secretary suggested that he recognized the distinction to be made between the intention and the application of the car leasing provisions in the bill as it is now written. He gave an indication that the government would be amenable to examining the thrust of the financial leasing provisions of the bill when it gets into committee. He said in his speech, as reported at page 763 of Hansard, that there could be some possibility for change. That raises a ray of hope for those of us who feel as strongly as I and many of my colleagues do against the car leasing provisions. But if the government had made up its mind to accept an amendment to the legislation, I believe the parliamentary secretary would have been more specific. Perhaps the government needs to receive the kind of message which I am indicating this afternoon a few more times, before it sends a clear signal to us indicating that indeed the bill will be amended in the manner I have proposed.

I think it is now clear that the present legislation is not sufficiently specific in this regard. In fact automobile dealers report that the major chartered banks have begun building staffs of experienced vehicle leasing personnel. Obviously the banks think the restrictions are lax enough to permit car leasing, so these restrictions should be tightened.

Several suggestions have been made by other members of my party about how this act could be amended so that car leasing stays with the dealer, and heavy trucks and large ticket items are available to the banks. Again I say that these suggestions should receive the serious consideration of the government. I think that dealers have provided a reasonable leasing service to consumers in the past and are closer to the consumer than a bank could ever be. If we are worried about some aspects of the car leasing business, we should deal with those problems through the provisions of consumer and corporate legislation, not the Bank Act.

I think the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) put the matter very succinctly in his opening speech on behalf of our party when he said, as reported at page 636 of Hansard:

> The idea of the banks engaging in the business of leasing passenger vehicles and trucks up to a certain commercial weight will not fly, period.

Following that, the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) indicated in his intervention on this bill, as reported at page 725 of Hansard, "We think leasing should stay with the dealers". I think those two statements very accurately sum up the thrust of opinion of many members on this side of the House.

Finally, I want to restate the principle that is at the core of my speech today. There is a great danger in Bill C-6 that banks will overstep their proper functions and the effect will be to the detriment of the consumer as well as of the independent businessman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this Bank Act amendment, or the entire revision of the Bank Act. Before I deal with a couple of concerns which I have with respect to it,

I wish to refer back to the speech of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) last night in which he called the hon. NDP members his cousins, and there was a great deal of good-natured banter back and forth. In that line I want to dissociate myself from the cousin concept. I very carefully checked my family tree and I found that there were no socialists in my family tree. Therefore, I cannot, with the greatest respect, call any of them my friends or, certainly, my cousins.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe your grandchildren will be.

Mr. Thacker: I suspect that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is incorrect. I do not think any of my dependants will become socialists because, by nature, we are accumulators of capital, accumulators of things, so that we can build this nation rather than try to tear down the people who work hard and build up a little nest for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thacker: With respect to this present act, I know that it has been under review for four or five years. I know that on the whole the Bank Act is excellent. It clearly brings Canada into the modern era. It permits Canada as a whole to pursue actively international development. For me it is absolutely critical, in this small world we have, that we all become very much interlinked. The sooner we can have Canadian banks operating in the entire world, the sooner other nations can have their money in this nation, the greater chances there will be for world peace. One of the greatest things to keep people peaceful is if they know they will lose an incredible amount of money if they are aggressive in a nation.

My two concerns with respect to the Bank Act are very narrow points which can be rectified easily in committee, and I hope they will be. My first concern relates to the position of livestock producers and the payment they receive from their animals when sold to packing plants, particularly those plants that have a section 178 bank loan but go bankrupt before the producers are paid. Some will immediately say that that will not happen very often, and that is correct. But, in fact, it does happen from time to time to the small producers. There is no doubt it will happen again. It will basically happen because in this country at the national level we have accumulated a deficit that has really become onerous. We are in tough times vis-à-vis the world economy, and there will be several thousands of businesses and people who will have to declare bankruptcy, and clearly some of those will be processors.

I think another aspect that will cause failures in my own province of Alberta, and very likely in my own riding, which has a lot of livestock producers and processing plants, relates to the fact that the province of Quebec is taking equalization money from the national government and using it to subsidize its farmers who are becoming self-sufficient in terms of livestock. That is affecting our livestock producers in Alberta, with the result that several of our small packing plants are going to go bankrupt. It is a shame that should be so, sir, but that is the hard reality.

In addition, there is the question of equity between the innocent livestock sellers and the lending banks. We need, for a moment, to address our minds to section 178 of the Bank Act, which is the actual section that gives banks a very special type of security for the loans they make to agricultural producers, agricultural processors and others in a number of similar situations.

When the borrower signs a section 178 security the effect in law is to transfer the ownership of the goods secured to the bank. The bank then has a very special procedure the rest of us in our society do not have, and that is to sell those products and thereby be paid in full.

If I come to you, sir, and buy your cow, I take delivery and tell you I will pay you tomorrow, and I do not pay you tomorrow, then you have to bring an action in law in the courts, and presumably you will get a judgment and you can seize my assets. If I do not have any, it is tough luck for you.

The effect of section 178 vis-à-vis the banks is to give them some special security, so they get a degree of priority in respect of those goods.

Under section 178, as proposed, certain products are exempt from this special security the banks take. One of those exemptions relates to direct products of the soil and another to dairy products. It is interesting that the bill continues these special exemptions from the old act. I think we need to look very carefully at this in committee, because we must understand the rationale for picking out certain of the agricultural products and not the broad range. In committee we need to look very carefully at an amendment that would permit us to have the entire range of agricultural products fit within this exemption.

Perhaps I could trace an example for you of how this would work a hardship on the individual livestock producer, of which there are many in my riding. We know that across Canada there are over 100,000 livestock producers. They usually have operations with 60 to 100 cows, which usually results in from 50 to 100 calves each year. If, in fact, there were 100 head and they were sold for $900 an animal, that would result in about $90,000. In fact our livestock producers are not getting that kind of return now. They should be, because that is what it would take to really have an economic operation. They are getting much less, and we need to address our minds to that question at another time. We should note that if the producer sold his entire 100 head for $90,000 that would be his entire gross income for the year.

The producer would take those animals to a smaller packing plant, negotiate a price and sign an agreement for the sale. The effect of that agreement is that from the moment of the agreement the ownership of those animals is transferred to that packing plant. Even though that producer has not been paid he has lost ownership of those animals and the ownership is with the packing plant.

Such a producer does not really have any choice. You might say, let him watch out for himself. Certainly people have to be vigilant for their own protection, but in actual fact that livestock producer does not have any alternative to selling them because his animals are at market weight. If he keeps them, it costs him more to put additional weight on them and they become over or undergraded and he loses money on the sale. He has to sell them when they are ready for market.

The problem comes in relation to the packer who, prior to buying from the livestock producer, has borrowed money from the bank and has given to that bank a section 178 security. The effect of that security is to transfer the ownership the packer gets to the bank. If the packer goes bankrupt, all of its assets are frozen, a trustee in bankruptcy is appointed, that trustee collects all the assets, sells them and distributes the money among the creditors. However, the bank, having taken a section 178 security, steps in and gets absolute priority. It picks the animals up, takes them out, sells them and gets paid in full. The rest of the people, including our livestock producer—and remember that this is his entire product and income for the year—ranks as an ordinary creditor, and has to share with the other creditors, and very likely settles for 15 cents or 20 cents on the dollar. I have seen that happen many times in my career. Therefore we really need an amendment by which we could perhaps delete the whole section. The effect would then be to make the banks much more careful about the loans they give to the producers as well as to the packing plants.

A more likely amendment would be one which would give livestock producers a priority for payment, that is, they would have continuing ownership in those animals until they were actually paid for. We know, the way the livestock industry works, that payments very seldom come through in less than a period of 30, 60, or 90 days. The United States, as a result of having gone through the major catastrophe of a large packing plant going bankrupt, with several hundreds of individual producers suffering, amended its law so that the livestock producer continues in this ownership quality until he is actually paid. If he delivered his animals to a packing plant and the packing plant went bankrupt, he could step in and get his animals back and go elsewhere. While he might suffer some loss, it certainly would not be as great as if he got nothing.

The way the statute is now, upon declaration of bankruptcy the ownership of the animals passes from the producer to the packer, and because the packer has signed a section 178 security the ownership immediately transfers to the bank. Therefore, as between two innocent parties, the seller and the bank that lends the money, the way the existing statute reads, the seller bears that entire loss. That really is not fair. If we amended the statute to give the livestock producers a priority in payment that would certainly solve the problem.

The question really is, who should bear the loss between many small producers and one bank? I submit to you that the institution, or the person, that can best protect itself is clearly the financial institution. Our banks are now large successful corporations. They should be large and successful, and I am delighted to have shares in banks because that gives me a piece of the action. I am glad to note that other members have some too. I hope our friends in the NDP have shares, because certainly that would give them a feeling of owning this country and being a part of it. That is a great feeling.

Mr. Knowles: Did you ever hear about credit unions?

Mr. Thacker: Sir, if they have their shares in credit unions that is the first step in the right direction, because very soon credit unions will want to apply under this amended Bank Act to become banks and their members will automatically get shares. That will solve the problem, so there is hope for them yet.

• (1710)

Getting back to the banks, they now have specialized lending officers, particularly in the agricultural industry. These officers are able to monitor the very few packing plants in the country, but it is difficult for the 100,000 producers to be aware on a daily basis of what is happening in the packing plants and the industry generally as to who is weak and who is strong. Banks are able to monitor this situation through their agricultural commodity loans officers.

Between the two parties, I believe that there should be equity in favour of the producers. Clearly this Parliament is the highest court of the land, and we have an obligation as members to be equitable as well as to allow what we would define as narrow legal rights. I submit that we should be more concerned with the producers in this area.

My second major concern is with regard to the provisions in this act which would permit the banks to be involved in automobile leasing. I will not bore you, Mr. Speaker, with too many comments on this subject. I agree with the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) and the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer). It is a measure which will need study in some detail during the committee stage and perhaps amendments will be proposed.

If banks are permitted to get into the auto leasing industry directly, they would, on the face of it, be in a conflict of interest situation, because the rest of us must borrow money from those same banks. They could easily give a degree of priority to their own subsidiary corporations by way of a lower rate of interest, or they might give a loan or withhold a loan to me, for example, if I were in competition with them. That is a very real concern, and I think it is necessary to build in some protection if those sections will be allowed to pass. I would prefer to see these sections deleted completely.

Therefore, subject to the act being amended in these two areas, I believe that the bill is sound, that it is in the national interest and that it will see this country take off in terms of becoming an active participant in the international development of the world. As a result, it will lead to a more peaceful world, which can only make things better for the citizens of this country.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to Bill C-6 with regard to the effect it will have on the development of the Third World. Because of my different background and experiences, I see the bill in a completely different manner than does the last speaker, the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker).

I would like to begin my remarks by reading a newspaper article published on April 26 in the Montreal Gazette which was taken from the Washington Post. Perhaps some hon. members have read the article. I believe that it has something very significant to say in a very simple way. The article is about a story which originates in Peking, China. It reads:

> In classroom 207 of China's most prestigious university, the brightest minds of the next socialist generation leaned forward to hear one of the great secrets of the capitalist world:
> "When you pass Go, collect $200."
> At Peking University's chorus on the American economy, instructor Frank Hawke, a 26-year-old American was introducing 63 young Marxists to the mysteries of the game of monopoly. One could have heard a Chance card drop as students strained to understand the intricacies of what seemed to them a microcosm of the American system.
> China is flirting with capitalism this spring. About 3,000 Chinese factories have been permitted to experiment in the use of some of their income, buying and selling without central government control. To these young Chinese, it seemed safe to ponder the ravages of ruthless competition, as long as they were safely confined to a brightly coloured board propped up on Hawke's desk.
> Hawke is teaching a course at the university after spending a year here collecting material for his doctoral thesis.
> The inspiration to bring monopoly to class struck during last week's lecture, when, he said, he was discussing the transition from competitive to monopoly stage capitalism "and found myself talking about this game. From their perspective it really must be sick. The object of the game after all is to make everybody else poor."

In that context, I would like to address my remarks to what I believe is happening in the international community, particularly with regard to the transfer of funds and banking. Basically, I, like many other Canadians, am frustrated to look at an act the size of the Bank Act and realize that I really do not have any power over it. I realize that there are people who have more experience in this particular area of banking and that they are the ones who lay down the laws. These laws frustrate me, and I am sure that in the long run they frustrate millions of other people in other parts of the world.

I would like to address my remarks basically to how I see the Canadian banking system affecting the whole question of international development. I am happy that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) has indicated in the House that he is willing and looks forward to discussing seriously the Brandt commission which deals with the whole north-south question, the question of the rich and poor, the question of the Third World and the developed worlds, and the question that faces us in the next decade, the situation of interchange or interconnection, that we cannot lay something aside and forget it. It is basically part and parcel of our life. Of course the question is, how will it be part and parcel of our life?

I have experienced living and working in Third World countries. I have lived with people who were not just poor, but who were living in utter misery. I have lived and worked in countries that just do not have the economic ability to alleviate their situation. When I hear people say, "if they would just work, they would get ahead", I know that that statement is not true. I know that those who work the hardest get the least. The hardest job which I have ever seen performed is the cutting of sugar cane. I know that those who, in a sense, work the least, get the most. I believe that those who go to banks to cut their coupons are really working the least, but getting the most.

When we reflect on the over-simplification in the statement "if they would just get down and work, they would get ahead and become rich like us", we all know that it is a false statement. I am certain that many hon. members here realize that it is a false statement.

Many hon. members in the House have lived through the 1930s. Many of them are my age and many are older, but they all know that we lived at that time in a Third World situation. I grew up in Saskatchewan during the 1930s. I was too young to really know that there was another way. I thought that being poor, as my family was, was the normal situation. At the time, of course, everybody was in the same situation.

I would like hon. members to reflect on their experiences of the 1930s because that is what is going on in most of the world today. My father, like other fathers of hon. members who lived in the west, was a homesteader. He went west with great ambition and worked hard. But due to disasters beyond his control such as drought, but mostly due to the economic system—he went broke. He did not simply go broke, but reached a point of no return.

I can remember as a child my father pacing the floor at night. I suppose he was worrying about what we were going to eat the next week. I can remember him talking about banking and worrying that he could not pay the interest due. Although he had probably paid enough interest to buy the machinery four or five times and the farm four or five times, he was in a debt trap that left him a broken man. When he died just a few years ago, the worst word in his vocabulary was the word "debt".

The last speaker referred to the fact that he thought the revised Bank Act would bring about a world development program. I do not agree, and I will give my reasons later. As our family and many of our neighbours were enduring this desperate life, a kind of aid program was established, not unlike those aid programs we sometimes talk about today. People from Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba who are my age will remember this aid program. It was called relief, which amounted to aid from the east. This came in forms which were determined, I suppose, by what commodity happened to be in surplus. As a child I remember that my father and my neighbours felt embarrassed because they had to accept it. We were given salt fish which must have come from somewhere in the maritimes. I suppose if you grow up in the maritimes you think that salt cod is good—

Mr. Rompkey: It is excellent.

Mr. Ogle: There is someone who grew up in the maritimes, Mr. Speaker. People on the prairies thought it must be some kind of snowshoe. We certainly could not eat it because we did not know how to eat it.

Mr. Rompkey: That's funny; we ate bread all the time.

Mr. Ogle: There was probably another aid program going the other way to help people in Nova Scotia. Perhaps we were sending them aid which they did not know how to use. I remember we were given cheese and apples which often arrived frozen and rotten. Somehow or other, this all seemed to make us less than human.

That is the kind of thing that will be reflected again if we let the banks continue in the direction they are headed. They will tie up poor people in poor countries by setting the same debt trap for them that my father and his neighbours were in during the 1930s.

In the coming decades we have to face not only our own internal problems but the problems of misery and poverty and the universal kind of depression in these other countries that keeps people in a depressed condition—not because they do not work but because the economic system is based on the game of monopoly. The idea of that game is to make the other person poor and keep him poor—keep him weak so that he cannot get power. In monopoly the winner ends up with all the property and power, and the loser is kicked out of the game.

After the depression a strange thing happened, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure we all remember it. In 1939 a world war broke out and suddenly there was lots of money and there were jobs all over the place. Everything boomed. But we should not think that an arms race or a war today is the way to bring our economy back to life. I think the experience of Canadians in the 1930s can be compared with the situation in some Third World countries where people are suffering today.

I think it is important when considering this bill, Mr. Speaker, that we examine how the world banking system is constructed. The frustrations of the man in the street, personal indebtedness, high interest rates and mortgage rates, that we speak of all the time in this country are the same the world over. These frustrations are experienced by all who are trying to become members of the community of nations. The banks that cause our own people to be frustrated are causing the same frustration in the Caribbean and many other areas of the world where they are a major presence. They are present in those countries for one reason only—to earn overseas profits.

Canada is integrated into the financial system of the western world. A bill such as C-6 which affects the behaviour of dominant corporate factors in the system cannot be viewed in purely domestic terms. The power and privilege enjoyed by the big banks outside Canada are related to the power and privilege they enjoy in this country.

I think it is useful for Canadians to examine how our financial institutions operate in Third World countries because that is where inflation, currency devaluation, unemployment, and foreign debt are most severe. When we examine conditions in Third World countries we can see what will happen here if we allow the same system to continue.

I have lived in countries where the devaluation of currency has reached 300 per cent per annum. Other people have probably had the same experience and know how dreadful conditions are. I have lived and worked in countries where half of the population was unemployed; I have worked and lived in countries where all the money that could be earned was used to pay interest on the foreign debt.

We must ask the following questions: who controls, who decides, what are the needs, what are the greeds that continue to keep this world alive today—or dead?

Sometimes development is taken to mean that you take money and go out and build something. That is a part of development, but if we look at it in only that light we are missing the basic fact. Unless development affects the lives of individual people in individual countries in such a way that they can live without oppression or a feeling of being inferior, it cannot be called successful. One of the great problems of debt—that word that my father hated so much—is that it finally destroys the person as a person; it finally turns him into something less that a human being; it destroys. Aid given to countries that will involve them in debts just so that Canadians can make profits, is shortsighted. Increasingly, it is also because the governments of many less developed nations are desperately in search of outside capital to keep their economies afloat. That is the same thing I can relate back to the whole experience of growing up on the prairies when it was necessary somehow or other to face, as my father would find out each spring, and as many fathers had to face, how were you going to make the next year work, how were you going to get the seed grain, machinery, feed for the animals, and so on.

Those are the problems the Third World faces in another way. Each year they have to face how they are going to produce, how they are going to make their economy grow for that year. Therefore they begin the year in debt. They begin the year only with the hope that the minimum they can do is pay off the interest on the debt of the year before. They are thrown into the same ultra-hopeless position which people lived through on the prairies in the thirties.

During the last two decades, which have been called the development decades, the Third World indebtedness has risen in a most alarming way. The price of Third World exports has not kept pace in any way whatsoever with the soaring costs of imported oil and western manufacturers. This is something that western farmers like many of my colleagues sitting around me realize right now, that they are living in the same kind of cycle. Their incomes, which come from their product, grain and food, are not in any way keeping up with the cost of the machinery and the fuel they have to use. However, the squeeze they face is nothing compared to the squeeze of developing countries in which their whole economy may depend on one crop such as cocoa or something like that, and everything they have to use comes in from the outside.

Last fall Michael Manley, the prime minister of Jamaica, speaking at the Third World foundation in London on October 29, 1979, brought this kind of point home in his address. You have probably heard it, Mr. Speaker, from other sources, but the idea is very simple. He was simply saying that the relationship between sugar and tractors, and this is a question of not only Jamaica but any one of the Caribbean countries that produce sugar, for example, the relationship between sugar and tractors in the system of international exchange is now a classic in the dialogue, but factually we need to realize that this is far more than a point in advocacy. He gives an example.

In 1965 the average price per ton of sugar realized by Jamaica was $73 Jamaican compared with $1,536 Jamaican for a Ford 5,000 tractor that would be used in the growing of the sugar, a ratio at that time in 1965 of one tractor per 20.84 tons of sugar. In 1979, 14 years later, the Ford 5,000 tractor was no longer available. It had been replaced by a new model called the 66,000 which is slightly more powerful but is designed for exactly the same purpose as the other tractor was being used for.

In 1979, Mr. Manley says the provisional average per ton of sugar had risen, it was true, to $530 Jamaican per ton, but the price of the tractor which did exactly the same work as the one that was manufactured before was now $30,945, so that the ratio of one tractor now required 57 tons of sugar instead of the 21 tons that had been needed in 1965.

The point simply is that sugar does not multiply like that. Jamaica with its economy is just demanding and using up more of its natural raw products to get what amounts to the same thing. Therefore as they struggle to increase their production in the same length of time, they are falling behind in such a way that they are becoming more and more involved in the whole thing that is called the debt trap.

Brazil, for example, now uses half of the total of its export earnings just to service the accumulated foreign debt. An important thing for us to remember is that the very problem I am speaking about of Third World underdevelopment is something that we Canadians must not be smug about, because the very same things that are affecting the Third World countries are also affecting the economy of our country.

We need to be reminded that Canada, as Premier Blakeney has noted, faces its own problems of underdevelopment and will do so if it continues to mortgage its future to foreign investors. Our own balance of payments figures indicate that we are not immune from the debt trap that now affects most of the Third World.

I now come to the Bank Act. A crucial phenomenon of recent years has been the rapidly growing role of private multinational banks in international loans to the Third World. These banks have amassed huge holdings of U.S. dollars, principally Eurodollars and petrodollars. They are kept in banks outside the United States beyond the control of the U.S. central bank, the Federal Reserve Bank, in the absence of any international regulatory authority which could control the amount of credit extended against these dollar reserves, many of which are now held by foreign subsidiaries of major U.S. banks.

The Eurodollars phenomenon began after World War II when the Russians had lots of American money. They did not want to put it in the United States. They wanted to have it invested some place. They would frequently invest it in one of these multinational banks which have places outside the United States.

The petrodollar, the money that came from the recent explosion in oil money, is another form of money that has been put out, not in the Federal Reserve Bank of the United States but in multinational banks that have offices all over the world. What happens to that money is that the poor come looking for it, just as they do in the monopoly game that we talked about before. They are given the money. However, the one who has the money makes the rules.

One of the results has been that the hundreds of billions of dollars held in these banks outside the United States and other major countries that have no regulatory control, can now be recycled to refinance the hundreds of billions of dollars of Third World debt. The private banks therefore become a neutral intermediary in the debt trap.

How does the debt trap work? It means that the developing country in its problem of trying to make itself get ahead has to borrow money. It has to pay interest. It cannot accumulate. It cannot build the reserves that would be able to break it out of the thing. They have to borrow more money to pay the interest they cannot pay.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Just like this government.

Mr. Ogle: Finally, they are in the trap of being hopeless. A member says it is just like this government. Maybe he is not far off. It is like this government that is borrowing and borrowing and getting itself, as Mr. Blakeney from Saskatchewan says, into the debt trap.

Today in Canada we hear about the growing number of individuals, small and even medium-sized businesses going bankrupt. A lot of businesses are going bankrupt, a situation made worse by the interest rates of the monetaristic policies of the Liberal and Tory governments. I want to add that in the world today there are a lot of countries—not individuals and not corporations—that are on the verge of bankruptcy or are already bankrupt. They must borrow yet more to meet the repayments on outstanding loans, a situation made worse by the monetaristic policies of western high finance. It works as follows.

Because many Third World nations are now in danger of defaulting on their loans, the situation has become serious for many multinational banks as well. For example, the two largest United States banks—

• (1740)

Mr. Friesen: Would the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) permit a question?

Mr. Ogle: Perhaps the hon. member could wait until the end of my speech. Possibly the hon. member was rising to ask me when I was going to finish.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ogle: Many Third World nations are now in danger of defaulting on their foreign loans and, as a result, the situation has become serious for many multinational banks as well. For example, the two largest United States banks, Citibank and Chase Manhattan, earn three-quarters of their profits from their foreign operations. The large banks, then, have a vital interest in preventing the collapse of the debt spiral particularly if they have overextended credit to debt-ridden Third World countries. That is what the banks are really afraid of. What happens if somebody out there cannot, finally, pay? Can you go and take over the country? Well, in a sense that does happen at times—they are taken over in one form or another. But one thing that does not happen is the development of that country as a free country in control of its own future.

The institution to which many people look as a means of staving off financial collapse is the International Monetary Fund which was created at the same time as the World Bank to stabilize currency markets and aid reconstruction in the aftermath of World War II. Today, the IMF has 128 member countries and acts as a lender of last resort to those experiencing acute balance of payments problems. The generosity of the IMF, however, is more apparent than real.

First, when the IMF extends credit to Third World governments it is often only for the purpose of allowing them to pay back loans to western governments and lending institutions. The financial elites of the west which dominate IMF decision-making are the chief beneficiaries, not the host countries. Again, this is the simple principle of the monopoly game: he who has the money makes the rules. So, when in February of 1978 the U.S. Congress was asked to approve a $1.7 billion contribution to a special $10 billion IMF debt relief fund, no less a paper than the Wall Street Journal described it as "The bankers' relief act". Relief! The same idea as my father had to face, but now it is the banks that are getting it because they were no longer able to secure the interest they felt was coming to them for the money they had advanced.

In the second place, the IMF does not extend credit without a great many strings being attached. Typically, it demands that a recipient country follow a strict regimen of domestic deflation and restraint in order to improve its credit rating, so to speak, within western financial circles. This austerity recipe usually includes huge cuts in government spending, particularly in the area of social services, and a domestic tightening of credit together with a laissez-faire, open-door policy to attract foreign investment, and currency devaluation to encourage exports and discourage imports.

Again, these are the rules of the monopoly game—taking away the basic cards of the players who are losing. It is a recipe which imposes enormous social costs on the masses but which does nothing to correct the scandalous inequalities and imbalances between nations which are responsible for much of the problem in the first place. It amounts, again, to saying, "It is your fault you are poor." It is the same as saying, at the end of the monopoly game. "It is your fault that I have all the chips."

I should like to speak for just a few moments about a particular case. The government of Jamaica, about whose dealings with the IMF I questioned the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) earlier in the session, is one of the countries facing the brunt of this Hobson's choice. Because the IMF "seal of approval" is usually needed before a country can obtain loans from other international sources, for example member governments, the World Bank, or multinational banks, Third World countries are increasingly facing an unenviable choice: they must either submit to the bitter medicine of the fund, which makes the disease of dependency even worse, or they can go it alone, defying the international creditors and staking everything on the achievement of national self-reliance. The odds on the latter course being successful are formidable indeed. So a country like Jamaica has to decide whether it will continue to be forced increasingly into a debt trap from which it cannot escape, or whether to take a chance and try to go it alone. It is a terrible choice to have to make, particularly if both involve losing situations.

In 1978 the Jamaican government agreed to accept an emergency $220 million balance of payments loan from the IMF. Since previous negotiations with the fund had not led to a happy conclusion, the Manley government was forced to accept extremely stringent conditions for the new loan. In part, these conditions were based on the same perverse, so-called monetarist economic theory as now holds sway at the Bank of Canada. Its prescriptions are predictable: restrictions on the money supply, restrictions on growth, cuts in social spending, and the creation of an attractive climate for foreign investment. The consequences for Jamaica have also been predictable: a decline in real wages, higher unemployment, cutbacks in social services, greater inequality.

As a result, the people are unhappy. And what finally happens? Because of the pressure which has been applied it can lead to political and social unrest. And who is responsible?

An hon. Member: The NDP!

Mr. Ogle: Somebody said it was the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ogle: Who is responsible for the fact that people have been dumped into a debt trap from which they cannot escape? Jamaica's recent refusal of the IMF terms in the latest round of negotiations has put it in dire straits since, without IMF approval, it is finding great difficulty rescheduling debts and negotiating for new loans with the World Bank and with the private banks. These include the large Canadian banks which have recorded handsome profits from their Caribbean operations but which do not like Mr. Manley's politics—this is a dislike which they apparently share with the IMF.

Now how does all this effect development? The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills said the reason the banks were involved was because of development. But what is development? Development seems to mean the basic destruction of the countries concerned.

The strategy of CIDA during 1975-1980 stresses the creation of conditions for self-reliant development directed to meeting basic human need in the poorest countries. I think CIDA has put it very well. The development program of the Jamaican government has similar criteria which are being more hindered than helped by our western financial institutions. I hope the Canadian government will review this situation to determine whether we are really doing all we can to foster true human development.

It was our colleague, the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), who spoke of another area in which Canadian banks are forcing their way into the affairs of other countries. He spoke particularly about the fact that I, as a Canadian, he as a Canadian, and we as Canadians, do not know what is happening to the money we may have saved, the insurance we may have put away or some formula we have arranged with banks to keep our earnings so that we can be taken care of in our old age. What happens to that money? Where does it go?

We face a modern banking situation. We do not know where the money goes, and it may be—and often is—used not for development of peoples but for the basic oppression, for instance, of the blacks of South Africa, as my colleague mentioned, or of the peasants of Peru or somewhwere else. As a British analysis recently put it, all this means for the worker of the industrialized world is that a growing proportion of his pay packet is siphoned off for purposes unknown, and sent to far off countries of which he knows less.

In view of the fact that the banks in Canada constitute a very select inner elite and have grown enormously in wealth and power over the previous decade, it is more urgent than ever that government attempt to inject at least a modicum of public accountability into our banking system.

I would like to conclude my remarks on the question of basic social morality. Where does the money go? What do banks do with it? How does that affect human beings? In the interest of a more open, accountable and just financial system, I urge the government to look seriously at the policy recommendations which the Task Force of the Churches on Corporate Responsibility presented in a brief to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on January 23, 1979.

In order that the Canadian public be in possession of information which permits it to form valid judgments about the foreign loan policies of Canadian banks and other financial institutions involved in international investment of underwriting and in order that clients and shareholders be given the legitimate choice of raising questions about these policy decisions, the task force submitted the following recommendations for inclusion in the revised Bank Act:

1. that the Bank Act make provision for uniform and equitable public disclosure requirements of loans by Canadian banks, their subsidiaries and affiliates and by other financial institutions made directly or through consortia to foreign governments or agencies of foreign governments of amounts totalling more than $1 million;

2. that in the interest of public and shareholder accountability, Canadian banks and other financial institutions be required to disclose the amount and the dates of such loans and publish them as a matter of record;

3. that in order to preserve the principle of client/banker confidentiality and in order to safeguard the principle of competition, financial institutions should not be required to disclose such loans prior to 30 days following signed agreements.

I trust that these recommendations which have been made after deep and serious thought and study by the Task Force of the Churches on Corporate Responsibility will be included through amendments to Bill C-6, the bill we are discussing at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hate to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) entertain a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time of the hon. member has expired.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the honourable Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to certain bills:

Bill C-2, an act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976—Chapter 1.

Bill S-5, an act to repeal the Canada-France Agreement Act, 1933 and the Supplementary Canada-France Trade Agreement Act, 1935—Chapter 2.

It being six o'clock p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 22(1).

At 6.03, the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX A

HANSARD CENTENNIAL

SPEECHES MADE AT UNVEILING OF MEMORIAL PLAQUE

Mr. Charles Fisher (Chairman, Hansard Centennial Committee): Madam Speaker, hon. members of the Senate and the House of Commons, dear colleagues, the program calls for me, at this point, to introduce Madam Speaker, a lady who obviously needs no introduction. So perhaps I would do better to begin by introducing myself, a Hansard reporter who, as chairman of our centennial committee, has been given the agreeable task of co-ordinating these arrangements to celebrate our 100th birthday.

[Translation]

We are honoured by your presence, Madam Speaker. It is indeed a good omen that our celebration, which got off to such a good start, will continue throughout the year, which will be a most active and interesting one.

[English]

I say that making these arrangements has been a pleasant task, and for good reason. The encouragement and assistance we have received from Your Honour, from Mr. Jerome while he was Speaker, from Mr. Fraser, while he was clerk of the House, from Dr. Koester and, more lately, from Mr. Pelletier, have exceeded all our expectations. We are especially grateful to Dr. Koester for good advice. I must also refer to the help given us by senior officials in the administration, by the Sergeant-at-Arms and by the protective staff. Our grateful thanks go out to them all.

Madam Speaker, a Hansard reporter has a place in the House of Commons but, by tradition, he has no voice there; he may not speak, not even if a Prime Minister were to ask him to do so. In the course of a working life he must listen to thousands of speeches and it would be surprising if, on occasion, he did not permit himself some private reflections on their quality. But though he has plenty of experience as a listener he has no opportunity to practice oratory, and my only excuse for this indulgence today is that it happens so rarely and that it will not happen again for a hundred years.

Today, as we contemplate this plaque, soon to be unveiled by you, Madam Speaker, we may be forgiven if we summon up remembrance of things past and think kindly of those generations whose efforts have gone into the recording, compilation and printing of Hansard over the past 100 years.

It was never an easy task, and it is not so today for reasons which even a casual visit to the House of Commons makes clear. There is always present, you see, an element of risk. Voices raised in contention are not always robust; quotations are not always from the sources alleged; sentences do not always, alas, contain verbs.

The splendid rotunda, in which the plaque before you is to be placed, reminds us of the theme which is at the very centre of this celebration; that is to say, continuity—the continuity of our institutions together with their ability to adapt to new circumstances, which is like water flowing over stone.

Hansard today is far removed, in some respects, from the Hansard of yesterday. Electronic engineering has made possible two remarkable changes, one of them central to good reporting, in two words, accurate hearing. That certainly beats the crystal ball, which I suspect our colleagues, long retired, consulted more often than they would admit. The other change is two-edged. The slow-moving ribbon of the tape machine can, in the end, outrun even the fleetest pen. It records, without emotion or hesitation, every word, every stammer, every unintended error.

A way must be sought, and found, to combine the literal accuracy of the machine with the truthfulness of informed human reporting by people who, for one reason or another, understand the work they are doing. This, I suggest, is the path which lies ahead during the next 100 years.

Madam Sauvé, the bronze plaque which the House of Commons has caused to be placed in this hall is an expression of the regard felt here for Hansard as an institution. It is a most splendid tribute.

Upstairs, in the offices of the Debates branch just outside the Chamber, one can see another record of achievement—rows of bound volumes dating back to 1880 and occupying yard after yard of space on shelves which have lately been specially reinforced to bear their weight. I look at them from time to time, consider all the skill and effort they represent and think, perhaps presumptuously, of the line dedicated to Sir Christopher Wren: Si monumentum queris, circumspice.

Madam Speaker, we would be most honoured if you would say a few words while unveiling the long-awaited plaque.

Madam Speaker: It is not without some feeling of admiration that I have the honour of unveiling this plaque commemorating the centennial of Hansard.

[English]

On an occasion such as this, we think first of those whose enterprise and courage laid the foundation of reporting freedom in Canada, a freedom of which the daily publication, in full, of words spoken in the House of Commons, serves as witness. We think, for example, of Francis Collins, the first professional shorthand writer in Upper Canada; we think of men like John Bourinot, Alphonse Desjardins and Sir John Thompson, whose energies found expression in a wider field of the national life. Not least, we think of Luke Hansard of Westminster whose name has come to represent, more neatly than any official title could do, the service whose centenary we celebrate.

[Translation]

Let us not forget the staff, a great many of whom are honouring us with their presence. They have many talents and I would like to focus on one: their ability to adapt smoothly to a new means of communication, namely television. Other innovations will follow that are yet impossible to foresee because of the speed of technological change. But one thing will endure—the tradition of impartiality, freedom of expression and high standards will prevail in this essential service of the House of Commons.

[English]

I am told that among the events planned for the centenary celebration is an exhibition of Hansards from around the world. For more than 12 months copies have been arriving in Ottawa from the provinces and territories, from Commonwealth countries, from countries in the east, from lands so remote that some people have not heard of them at all. They are printed in English, in all the languages of Europe, in Cyrilic, in Arabic script, in ideograms, all of them belonging, as it were, to the Hansard family of which our own institution is a part. Even though they may not hear the words of greeting, our good wishes go out today to all the men and women employed in this essentially democratic task. We send them a message of good will. And we congratulate, from the bottom of our hearts, those who, here in Ottawa, provide us daily with our Hansard.

[Translation]

Mr. H. J. Lacombe (Editor of French Hansard): Madam Speaker, on behalf of all my colleagues, I wish to thank you for so graciously accepting the invitation to unveil this plaque. Your presence and that of other distinguished guests highlight the significance of this centennial for all parliamentarians as well as for all Canadians.

Madam Speaker, the publication of Hansard is the best example of freedom of expression in Canada, one of the many freedoms we all cherish. We thank you for joining with us in commemorating this happy event.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

STATUS OF WOMEN

RIGHT TO EQUALITY WITH MEN IN ALL PHASES OF THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House, noting that already in this session fine statements have been made about the rights of women, but that these statements have not been followed by the taking of positive steps to establish and protect those rights, calls on the government to take affirmative action to establish equality for women in all phases of our economy, particularly in employment opportunities, access to adequate training and upgrading, equal pay for work of equal value, and equality between men and women in all pension plans.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF FEDERAL LICENSING POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the former minister of fisheries had initiated a major policy review, leading to a white paper on fisheries development for the 1980s, and since that review would have included a reference to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry on the subject of fisheries licensing policies, including proposals contained in the Sinclair and Levelton reports, and whereas the standing committee should travel across Canada to hear first hand the views of fishermen, processors and others concerned with the fishery, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House direct the government to make a reference to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to conduct a thorough review of federal fisheries licensing policy, which would include travelling to the regions of Canada to hear first-hand the views of fishermen.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PUBLIC COMMITMENT TO ALL NATO AND NORAD POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In face of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and the international turmoil in the Middle East and elsewhere, it is imperative that members of the NATO alliance stand together in defence of our common interests and support common defence policy. Notwithstanding this fact, the NDP refuses to commit its members to support NATO and NORAD policies. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That this House require its members who accept offices in the NATO Parliamentary Association, Canadian Branch, to accept and embrace publicly the commitment to all NATO and NORAD policies and, in particular, to mutual and shared defence arrangements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McKenzie: The socialist gang stuck together.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

CALL FOR APPOINTMENT OF WEST COAST DEPUTY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I too rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

In view of the commitment made during the last election campaign by the Liberal party that it would appoint a deputy minister of fisheries and oceans for the west coast, whose office would be in Vancouver, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House direct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to appoint immediately a west coast deputy minister, in fulfilment of his commitment to the people of British Columbia, whose problems and concerns have too long been ignored by this government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CABINET DOCUMENTS

AVAILABILITY TO FEDERAL COURT JUDGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisons of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that Mr. Justice Collier of the Federal Court, trial division, has condemned the present Prime Minister's practice of refusing to disclose the relevant cabinet documents pertaining to the decision to refuse a pension to former Supreme Court Justice Landreville, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller):

That this House call upon the government to forthwith turn over to Mr. Justice Collier all relevant documents, and repeal section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

REQUEST FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE BE CONVENED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation yesterday released figures indicating that multiple dwelling starts were down by 19 per cent from April, 1979, and since Canada is currently running more than 50,000 housing starts behind the number required to adequately house Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That the minister immediately convene a federal-provincial conference on housing, including representatives from the housing industry, to plan a co-ordinated attack on the housing problems of the 1980s.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. Interest charges to business, particularly to small business, have caused and are causing extreme problems, despite the recent reduction of the prime rate. A number of businesses have had to seriously curtail their activities and cut back on employment because they are not able to finance receivables and inventories at current bank rates.

The minister has accepted the proposal made in the Crosbie budget to provide for small business development bonds. The minister presented some details of this proposal in his masquerade budget of April 21. Nearly three weeks have passed and no legislation has been introduced. No arrangements for debate of legislation have been made.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, the business people of this country cannot help but wonder whether this is just another flip-flop and a broken promise.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is the time to put motions. If the hon. member has a motion, I will entertain it.

Mr. Blenkarn: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt):

That this House do forthwith direct the minister to introduce immediately the required amendments to the Income Tax Act to allow for small business development bonds, and that the government forthwith bring this matter to debate for immediate passage into law.

Madam Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRICE OF WHEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the initial price of top grade wheat has been established at $3.75 per bushel, which is 50 cents a bushel less than grain producers are now receiving and is far below the cost of production, since the lowering of North American export prices can be directly related to the U.S. embargo, and since the Prime Minister has assured us that this government will protect the grain producers from the effects of that embargo, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That this government establish the initial price of top grade wheat at $4.25 per bushel, the present level being paid to grain producers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

DISCRIMINATION IN PROPOSAL TO REDUCE UTILITY INCOME TAX REBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing concern to many Canadian farmers.

In view of the fact that the government plan of reducing utility income tax rebate will create a situation where citizens of our country are not treated with equality, descriminating between farmers in each province so that, for example, the farmers in Alberta will be subjected to an extra cost for utilities from $100 to $200 per annum, as opposed to their counterparts in the province of Saskatchewan who will suffer no extra charge, I move, seconded by the hon. member from Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the Minister of Agriculture condemn this illegal act and immediately exercise his authority as Minister of Agriculture and as guardian of the farmers' rights by demanding that the Minister of Finance immediately abide by the law, providing the rebates and withdrawing the proposal which would discriminate against parts of the Canadian farming community.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

DISBURSEMENT OF FEDERAL LAND SPECULATION TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Inasmuch as municipalities are severely strapped for finances, and that they are primarily responsible for land-use zoning, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House instruct the government to return by way of grants all the proceeds collected through the federal land speculation tax to the municipalities within which it was collected, so that the housing industry may be stimulated.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—REASON FOR DELAY IN MAKING POLICY STATEMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is coming into the House.

The minister will know that he had scheduled a statement on motions for three o'clock today in relation to the policy of the Government of Canada on Chrysler. I understand that that statement has now been postponed or delayed. Will the minister explain to the House what factors caused him to delay the statement he had scheduled for three o'clock today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I regret any inconvenience caused to hon. members opposite or the media through the premature announcement that I would be making a statement. We have no new date at this time for a statement. Some factors have come up which cabinet felt needed further consideration, and that is about all I can say at this time.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, clearly what we have here is a situation where the cabinet has reversed a decision taken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated that there were some factors which caused cabinet to take that decision. Without identifying specific factors, will the minister tell us what kind of factors caused his colleagues to prevent him from making the statement he had intended for three o'clock today?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I do not think it was the practice when my hon. friend was prime minister of the country to go into cabinet discussions and what was taking place in them. I do not intend to change that precedent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Neither, Madam Speaker, was it our practice to leave a minister hanging out on a limb like the Government of Canada has done to this minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: Look at Crosbie; Crosbie is still hanging.

Mr. Clark: The minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I will wait until they are quiet, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clark: I guess, Madam Speaker, that when a government comes apart—as this one does—it has to do so with the accompaniment of a great deal of background noise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister has had his position reversed by his colleagues.

Miss MacDonald: Twice.

Mr. Clark: At least twice. Will he tell this House what kind of factors caused the Government of Canada to delay or postpone the statement that was scheduled to be made at three o'clock? Were they factors relating to the negotiation? Were they factors extraneous to the Chrysler question? What kind of factors caused this delay?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, obviously they were important factors. I will repeat that it has not been the precedent to go into matters in cabinet discussions. My hon. friend has talked about being left out on a limb. No limb anybody on this side is on compares to the limb the Canadian people left him on after February 18.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CHRYSLER CANADA—PLANS TO HELP LAID-OFF WORKERS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I ask him about the limb that the people in the city of Windsor are on: the workers of Chrysler Canada, the suppliers and others who are affected by this decision? What about the limb that they are on?

Mr. Chrétien: What about Davis?

Mr. Wilson: I am asking the question.

Mr. Chrétien: Call Davis.

Mr. Wilson: What plans does the minister have from here forward which will help the people most affected by this decision, or lack of decision, to plan their future? Does he have any timing in mind as to when a decision will be made?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I have no timing to announce right now, but I want to confirm our concerns with respect to the well-being of the workers at Chrysler and their suppliers and the communities in which they live. I am surprised at the hon. member's concern, since he and his government dithered from August to February without doing anything about these workers.

• (1420)

CHRYSLER CANADA—POSITION OF ONTARIO GOVERNMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister has referred to dithering. I point out that his government, when it was in office before, dithered for 15 years about the auto pact, and that is why we have the crisis that now exists.

Would he confirm for the House that his equivalent in the Ontario government was also scheduled to make an announcement in the Ontario legislature this afternoon and for all we know, unlike the minister here, he has gone ahead with it? In addition, would he confirm that that announcement was to reveal that the Ontario government was not going to support the package put together by the minister and Chrysler?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I cannot confirm what my hon. friend has said. As far as I know, the minister of industry for Ontario has not yet made an announcement. I suggest my hon. friend should check with him, Mr. Grossman, or his opposite numbers in the Ontario House.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, will the minister tell the House, to put it positively, whether he has obtained an agreement with the government of Ontario to take part in this package that he has prepared? As a second part of the question, will he also confirm that the package does not include any specific job guarantees, nor does it include a commitment to build a six-cylinder engine plant in Windsor?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I think the premises of my hon. friend are wrong, particularly when he makes some suggestion about job guarantees. They continue to be a very important part of our considerations.

With regard to the respective roles of the Ontario and federal governments, we on this side have to take our responsibilities as the federal government. We are obviously in very close consultation with Ontario, but they have to speak for themselves. That is part of our federal system, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, given the fact that this minister has now cancelled three press conferences at which he was to announce in a definitive way an agreement on the crisis situation—and, for all we know, may go on cancelling such announcements forever in the future—will he now at least assure the House that the government will bring in some assistance program for the thousands of auto workers who are out of work, not only at Windsor but in dozens of automotive communities across the country?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has already taken administrative action under his existing authority to trigger extended unemployment insurance benefits. He is working actively on other solutions to the matter, and we have time to do that because of these extended benefits. This whole matter remains one of very great concern to us.

In so far as the press conferences are concerned, the first two in question, I must say, were scheduled by staff without my formal consent. In respect of the third one, I will say I gave consent to that and I have already expressed my regret to hon. members of the House for any misunderstandings that may have been created. We are continuing to work on this, and I am still optimistic there can be a good solution for Canadian workers and the Canadian economy.

FISHERIES

POLICY RESPECTING OVER-THE-SIDE SALES AGREEMENT WITH JOINT TRAWLERS LTD.

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In light of the Fisheries Council of Canada's recent criticisms of the over-the-side sales agreement with Joint Trawlers Ltd., as well as the complete dissatisfaction of the provincial fisheries ministers of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island with the federal government's lack of meaningful consultation with them—and that is even more important—can the minister tell this House why he has elected to depart from the clearly-defined policy of his predecessor regarding over-the-side sales?

Would the minister also indicate why the Eastern Fishermen's Federation, an organization which represents the vast majority of fishermen in the maritimes, was rejected as bargaining agent for the direct sales?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would leave it to the former minister, who is perfectly able to explain his own position, to see if he accepts the entire content of the hon. member's question.

● (1425)

Certainly, my predecessor had not prohibited over-the-side sales, but he did introduce conditions. One of the conditions was varied by me, as I felt that the situation of a guarantee being totally rejected would leave the fishermen in a position with very little bargaining power. A judgment call had to be made. Fish caught by Canadian fishermen will be made available in very small quantity, about 1 per cent of the total landing and 0.7 per cent of the total value, which means that the processors have control of some 99 per cent of the Canadian fish landings.

As far as the eastern fishermen's group was concerned, the application which they presented jointly with the processors contained the sort of loopholes which no government could accept. For example, at the end of each day a decision would be made on whether or not freezing capacity was required. I know of no freezer from overseas that can get to this side of the ocean on a day's notice.

With regard to the rest of the hon. member's question, provincial ministers have taken positions of this issue which are at some variance with the apparently united front which seems to have developed this week. Certainly, when I asked one of the privincial ministers in an important fishing province recently if he was against all over-the-side sales, he said that he still supported some such sales under good conditions.

Mr. Gass: Madam Speaker, I notice that the old, new-old government is still as evasive as ever. Can the minister tell the House if this government intends to ride roughshod over the provinces, as they have done in the past and, also, if the large number of Maritime Fishermen's Union members residing in his area was a determining factor in deciding that the Eastern Fishermen's Federation would not act as the bargaining agent in the over-the-side sales arrangement?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, in areas where provinces have jurisdiction, obviously we will continue to consult and to work with them. There are times when the interests of the fishermen and the apparent interests of provincial governments do not coincide. I can give the example of provinces which refuse their fishermen the right to organize in unions or associations of their choice.

As for the hon. member's last point, the Maritime Fishermen's Union is exactly that, an organization which has locals in all three maritime provinces including some, I suspect, in the hon. member's riding, if he would bother to meet with them.

Oral Questions

INQUIRY WHETHER CATCH ROYALTY OR LANDING TAX WILL BE IMPOSED

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. My question is prompted by throne speech references to partial cost recovery and "reinvestment of enhanced earnings in the fishing sector".

Will the minister tell this House whether or not it is true that he is preparing legislation which will impose a substantial catch royalty or landing tax against west coast fishermen—a tax which is rumoured to be in the order of 10 per cent of the landed value of the catch?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would expect that the hon. member's previous incarnation would have allowed him to read the literature on this issue, which goes back some three or four years.

When the salmon enhancement program was put forward, it was quite clearly indicated at that time that the expenditure which was over and above the normal management cost to the fishery could be subject to a cost recovery mechanism. The matter has been discussed with the industry and with the provinces. I suspect that my predecessor has had discussions on this very issue. If the matter requires legislation, it will come back to this House.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, the situation in current world markets has led to a depressed state for the price of salmon and herring. How can the minister possibly contemplate at this time a stiff tax which, I understand, would exceed the amount required to pay the cost of the salmon enhancement program, but would indeed include a surcharge to pay for the costs of management on the west coast? Also, would the minister confirm that this tax is only contemplated for the west coast of Canada?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, obviously the previous government intended to have a stiff tax, because the hon. member seems to be referring to their arithmetic. I have not come to a figure of what it might be: I use words like "might be" because the final decision on whether or not to bring in legislation has not been taken. The matter is under discussion, and in due course if there is the necessity for legislation, obviously it will be brought to Parliament.

● (1430)

As for the matter of east coast or west coast, I have made it clear, and I think the Speech from the Throne is pretty precise in this area, that if it is above the normal cost of management, that is, to multiply the amount of fish available—in this case it might apply to salmon—and if it applies to other species where we do enhancement, of course, there would be the same type of cost recovery if we decide to proceed.

OLYMPIC GAMES

STATUS OF CANADIAN OFFICIALS GOING TO MOSCOW—USE OF TAXPAYERS' MONEY FOR EXPENSES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): "Merci, madame le Président." My question is directed to the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for fitness and amateur sport.

In view of the fact that a number of Canadian Olympic officials will be going to the Moscow Games, according to news reports, can the minister tell the House whether they will be participating in any official capacity at the Games, whether taxpayers' funds are involved directly or indirectly; and, if so, how the government can justify this slap in the face to our athletes on a moral basis, when they have been denied the privilege of going to Moscow and Canadian officials are apparently going to be allowed to go?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. I am not aware of any decision on the part of Canadian officials to participate in any officiating capacity at the Olympics in Moscow.

It is true that the governing bodies of some of the world athletic organizations in individual sports hold their four-year meetings at the time of the staging of the Olympics. There might be disadvantage if Canadian officials are not at those meetings. If any Canadian officials go to Moscow to attend such meetings, however, I would want to strongly urge them, as I urged the athletes, that they not only not participate in the Olympics but that they not attend the Olympics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. It would appear to me that if a boycott is to be effective, it must be a complete boycott. Considering the reasonable approach the minister is taking with Canadian Football League officials regarding discrimination against quarterbacks, will he undertake to meet now with the Canadian Olympic Association and discourage any trips to Moscow? Such trips can only dilute the effectiveness of our boycott.

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I think in answering the original question I neglected to point out to the hon. member that we are certainly not providing any financial assistance. Indeed, our position is to discourage Canadian athletes, officials or just spectators from attending the Olympics in Moscow, in view of the circumstances in Afghanistan.

I have already had discussions with the Canadian Olympic Association, but I certainly would be pleased to pass on the representations the hon. member has made—that in his view no one should even attend the meetings if the meetings are being held in Moscow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST COAST FISHERY AGREEMENT—POSSIBLE CHANGES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the very important East Coast Fishery Agreement which this House has ratified and which Canada hopes to see ratified, without amendment, by the United States Senate. Yesterday, Secretary of State Muskie, when asked about his approach to the agreement, stated that it was his intention to try to resolve the differences, presumably between the administration and the United States Senate.

Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the House whether he is aware of any compromises or changes to the treaty that Secretary of State Muskie might be considering in order to accommodate certain proposals by the United States senators, proposals which would have a very damaging effect on Canada's industry?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, when then secretary of state Vance was here several weeks ago we made very strong representations to him on this subject, and requested that the treaty be put through without amandment by the Senate.

He gave us his undertaking at that time to attempt to do just that, with all the forces at his disposal. That is still our position and I trust it is still the U.S. position. I hope to discuss it next week in Brussels with the new Secretary of State.

Miss MacDonald: Because of the urgency of this matter, Madam Speaker, and considering that Secretary of State Muskie, when he was in the Senate, supported the ratification of the treaty without amendment, and now seems to have changed his position—according to his statement of yesterday—I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would immediately get in touch with his counterpart in the United States to bring to his attention the very strong position of the Canadian people and, presumably—one would hope—the Canadian government, to have the treaty ratified as quickly as possible without amendment and not even wait until next week to do that.

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, with this assurance of support from the other side of the House, I think that gives me an opportunity to communicate again with the United States and tell them that this is our position and request that the treaty be immediately passed.

FINANCE

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO MODERNIZE SYSCO PLANT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On Monday last the minister indicated, in response to some questions about aid to Sysco, that the government was awaiting some concrete plans to modernize the plant before proceeding with the grant that had been announced. It has now come to light that Premier Buchanan of Nova Scotia submitted such a proposal in January and followed it with additional information on the subject on April 3 of this year.

I should like to ask the minister, now that he has that information, and given that he has had it since January and has had an opportunity to look at it and the additional information, when we can expect some word from the minister and the government with regard to the aid that is so necessary in order that those 500 workers who are now laid off can get back to work.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that it was not possible for me to have the information in January, because we were not on this side of the House then.

The hon. member asks when we may expect a definite decision on the commitment that has been made to Sysco. I would tell him that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and other members of the government are prepared to sit down with the government of Nova Scotia at any time to consider concrete plans that will have some prospect of ensuring a viable future for the Sydney Steel plant.

As I said earlier in the House, we are not prepared to make funds available unless it is in the context of a plan that will provide some certainty for employment and production at that plant, with some assurance that there is a market and a sales program and a production program that makes sense. Up to the present time, at least to my knowledge, the Government of Canada has not seen any proposal that has come forward, a plan that contains these essential ingredients.

Mr. Deans: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Since the Minister of Finance was the minister who made the statement on April 3, 1979, that the money was to be made available for the development and redevelopment of the plant in Nova Scotia, can he tell us what plans he had before him at that time which led him to believe it was appropriate to make a statement regarding advancing the number of millions of dollars he was prepared to advance then? What has happened between April, 1979, and May, 1980, that has caused him to back off this commitment?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I shall be happy to explain to the hon. member why the circumstances have changed. The proposal to which he refers concerned a large sale to a British Columbia plant, and the Sysco management pressed the Government of Canada to make a commitment with respect to that $50 million because it insisted that unless we made the money available at that time, that particular project would fail.

We responded to the request of the government of Nova Scotia, but subsequently Sysco management abandoned the plan. That is why the funds in that context could not be made available.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

LACK OF CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON OVER-THE-SIDE SALES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Last fall, to bring order into what was a chaotic situation dealing with the over-the-side sales question, after consultation with the provinces, the processors and the fishermen we worked out a set of guidelines which was acceptable to all.

Now the minister has violated two of the principal guidelines, namely, one dealing with no guarantees, or direct allocations, and the other one dealing with consultation with the provincial governments, processors and fishermen.

In view of the fact that this could—and in fact will—set back the cause of a unified collective bargaining voice for maritime fishermen considerably by driving a rift between the EFF and MFU, may I ask the minister why he did not consult with the provinces and the EFF before going ahead with this deal with the MFU and Joint Trawlers?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that this government came into power March 3. The time was fairly advanced and the gaspereau were heading into the rivers, or were close. Time was very short and there were proposals presented to us at the very last minute. A meeting was held with representatives of the processors, the fishermen—including the two fishermen's organizations which the hon. member mentioned—and provincial observers, and it was not successful because there was just no will to negotiate and arrive at any kind of a solution.

I certainly did not intend to drive a rift between the fishermen's organizations. On the contrary, when I saw there was one organization left out—in this case the Maritime Fishermen's Union—I said that the department would have to act as an umbrella and allow all bona fide and licensed fishermen belonging to either the Eastern Federation or the Maritime Fishermen's Union to sell their fish if the sale over-the-side was authorized.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, by way of a supplementary question, the three ministers of fisheries for the three maritime provinces have taken grave issue with what the minister has done. The minister knows full well the impact that this could have on working out a harmonious arrangement between the maritime governments, the processors and the unions.

Before the minister concludes this deal—before the minister allows this deal with the MFU and Joint Trawlers to be signed—will he sit down with the government of the three maritime provinces to at least try to salvage something out of what will unfortunately create a very chaotic situation?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the position taken by at least one province indicates to me that if we await an agreement before deciding on anything, that constitutes a veto for that province which has consistently taken the side of the large companies and has consistently forgotten the interests of its own fishermen, especially inshore fishermen, in areas such as Cape Breton and the riding of the hon. member, the former minister of DREE.

If the hon. member is asking me to give that sort of veto before a decision can be made, as the fishing season approaches, obviously the answer is no.

ACCESS TO NORTHERN COD—LEGALITY OF NEWFOUNDLAND ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I, too, wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It seems that today is fish day, even though it is only Thursday.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion stated in Montreal on May 6 that the federal government has made available more than $41 million for the establishment of new service centres and fish processing facilities in Newfoundland, has the minister assured himself of the legality of the action being taken by the fisheries minister of Newfoundland, who has threatened to close branches of Nova Scotia companies if they do not withdraw from fishing northern cod? If so, what steps is the government taking to resolve this situation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the quota in question will have been taken by this Saturday, and that fishery will be closed. Meanwhile, the claims made by the minister of fisheries for Newfoundland are not sustained. In fact, in 1979 Newfoundland vessels took some 22,000 tonnes; in 1980 they took 27,000 tonnes; in 1979 maritime vessels took 7,000 tonnes, and this year 4,000 tonnes.

I fail to see what claim the minister responsible for fisheries in Newfoundland would have to make the sort of statement that he makes. The other point is that until the constitution is changed the management of the fishery will remain in federal hands.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, in light of the minister's answers, I would like to ask him, is the government planning any reduction in the quotas authorized for some 356 foreign factory and freezer trawlers that have been licensed within our 200-mile limit, a fleet which operates for the most part in Newfoundland waters catching northern cod for countries such as Japan, the U.S.S.R., Portugal, Spain, Denmark, France, the Faro Islands, West Germany, Cuba, East Germany and Bulgaria?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the quotas allocated to Canadian and foreign fishing enterprises are set in the annual fishing plan which is the subject of exhaustive discussion and consultation with all segments of the industry—fishermen's organizations, processors' associations, provincial governments. At one point a judgment is made—as I am sure it was when my hon. friend from St. John's East was minister of fisheries—that it is in Canada's interests to allocate some of the resources in the 200-mile zone in exchange, among other things, for Canadian fishing where we have a substantive interest outside the 200-mile zone. That is the part of the management plan that has been in effect and, I think, has been working surprisingly well.

STATUS OF WOMEN

STUDIES ON EMPLOYMENT STRATEGIES FOR WOMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I have before me some of the hundreds of studies that have been done on employment strategies for women over the past two or three years, including a memorandum to the cabinet—

An hon. Member: Did you read that?

An hon. Member: Order.

Miss Jewett: —that was prepared by the minister's own department, a memorandum dated—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a petition on her desk?

Miss Jewett: No, I have a question, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: It's a long question.

Miss Jewett: I would like to ask the minister responsible for the status of women—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should know that she cannot bring these kinds of objects into the House. Will she please have them removed from her desk and ask her question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam.

Miss Jewett: I would like to ask a question of the minister responsible for the status of women. In view of the fact that these hundreds of studies have been done on the status of women—plans of action, not just abstract ideas, that have been carried out in writing but not yet implemented—I ask the minister, why does he now decide to sign a contract with Lorna Marsden, a vice-president of the Liberal party—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: —to undertake yet another study on employment strategies for women?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had taken some time to read those studies that she had in the box on her desk, she would have noticed that many of the studies and evaluations were offered by the same person that she mentioned. The reason why we have obtained the services of Mrs. Marsden, who is also the dean of social studies at the University of Toronto, as well as a former president of the action committee for women in this country, is that we intend to bring those studies into action.

We want the people who have been working on these efforts for such a long time to be involved right at the bottom drawer when we implement these things.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I do know that none of these hundreds of studies was actually prepared by the vice-president of the Liberal party to whom I have just referred; indeed, none of the programs which the previous Liberal government prepared toward equality for women was her responsability.

May I ask the minister, then why does he not—if he continues to be indifferent to the cabinet memorandum drafted last December—at least now not have another study, but implement the 35 specific strategies in this document, "Towards Equality for Women", prepared a year or so ago by the previous Liberal government.

● (1450)

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would say the hon. member has some trouble in reading.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Axworthy: If she had been paying attention to some of the statements and commitments which have been made, she would have recognized that in the Speech from the Throne issued by the government we clearly indicated our intention to take action to deal with those recommendations. Many of the recommendations are already in process of implementation, and as soon as the enforcement and implementation is there she will be the first to know.

ENERGY

CORPORATION RESPONSIBLE FOR RENEWABLE ENERGY TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the urgency of the development and demonstration of Canada's renewable energy technology, and the government's commitment in the last election campaign to establish an alternate energy corporation, can the minister tell us when this corporation will be established, what its initial capitalization is to be, and what will be its top priorities in its first year of operation?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already had some talks with members of Petro-Canada in that connection. The corporation responsible for renewable energy will first be set up as a branch of Petro-Canada, which has indicated to me that it was considering a capitalization of some $20 million for that new corporation. As for its priorities, I would hesitate to give details as long as the members of the new board of directors and its chief executive have not been appointed. I merely wish to indicate that the main purpose of the corporation will be to promote all kinds of new energy, especially renewable energy.

FISHERIES

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBOURS IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans whether or not the government intends to honour the commitment of the former government to increase the small craft harbour allocation by $14 million so that the much-needed program to improve fishing harbours in Atlantic Canada can commence immediately.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): I suspect that what the Secretary of State has been saying with reference to certain cultural program announcements is quite applicable to this question. When we inherited the economic envelope we found that the commitments were great but that the reserves were small, if existent.

Obviously, we intend to try to restore the integrity of this program which, by the way, was frozen by the previous president of the treasury board: the building season last year was quite negatively affected. This year, the budget was at the $26 million level, which would have made it the lowest level for a number of years.

Mr. McCain: Madam Speaker, it is easy to muddle up the statistics to the benefit of the individual speaking at a given moment and, perhaps, even to mix the envelopes. But since the minister has answered as he has, let me ask this question: Does he consider that the figure of $26 million, which appears now to be allocated, is adequate for the job which has to be done in his constituency and in other Atlantic constituencies?

Mr. LeBlanc: If the expenditure program which was prepared by the previous government, obviously under the benevolent eye of the former president of the treasury board, had been given adequate funds, I would be able to respond to the hon. member. But we will try to get more money into this program.

SMALL CRAFT AND HARBOURS—DISTRIBUTION OF DREE GRANTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): A supplementary to the Minister of Fisheries. The estimates tabled in this House total $58.4 billion, which included $50 million in a special employment fund for eastern Canada, programs aimed at stimulating employment and economic development there, of which the previous government had allocated $14 million to small craft and harbours and $25 million to fisheries.

Why does the Minister of Fisheries not get on the ball and secure that money which is already in the estimates, the $58.4 billion tabled in this House, and get it for his department and carry out the promises made, the commitments made, for small craft and harbours?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): The budget which was established for the small craft harbours program in the estimates which were prepared by the previous government and tabled in the House indicate a level of $26.5 million for small craft harbours. I will endeavour to obtain from my colleague the moneys which were referred to in the election campaign by the hon. member, but which to my knowledge were not provided.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary to the minister for the employment of Liberals and immigration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should refer to the minister by his proper title.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you, Madam Speaker. One gets mixed up when one sees what is going on. In the minister's department this year, within the estimate of $58.4 billion which was tabled there were $50 million of additional moneys to stimulate employment in eastern Canada. Some of that money has apparently been diverted by the minister responsible for DREE for railway track removal in Winnipeg.

Will that hon. gentleman provide the $25 million for fisheries that is the amount there, and $14 million for small craft and harbours, and not take it for the defenestration of railway tracks in Winnipeg, and put it to its proper use?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): It is unfortunate that at the meeting held last Sunday in Winnipeg among the representatives of the three levels of government there was not a representative of the Conservative party there from the federal caucus. He would not, then, be repeating the kind of misinformation which was issued by his leader yesterday on the question of rail relocation.

I suggest to him that, when it comes to employment, we shall be announcing an employment program which will provide full satisfaction for concerns in the maritime area. I say to him it will be a lot better than the cancellation of programs which the previous government undertook.

INQUIRY WHETHER EXPORTS WILL BE REDUCED

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. At a convention in Montreal, the Fisheries Council of Canada accused the minister of being the minister of the fishermen, rather than the fisheries. In addition, its new president, Bernard Blais stated that with the 1980s we are going into a flat period because of the recession in the United States, which will result in lower prices for fishermen's catches. Can the minister tell the House whether he has statistics or studies on hand proving there really will be a 10 per cent dip in the Canadian export market? If so, what steps does he intend to take to remedy the situation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it does not hurt me at all to hear that people complain about my being the fishermen's minister more than the fisheries. I am less pessimistic than some producers about the capacity of the American market for continuing to absorb large volumes of fish imported from Canada. I see no sign yet of any softening in the market to an extent that might warrant our reducing immediately the prices paid the fishermen. On the other hand, I have asked the industry to reflect upon the fact that the price of Canadian fish is not going up, like inflation in the United States; in fact, there exists a stability which might be defined as a stagnation of sorts. As for marketing generally, I have indicated that we were going to look into the possibility of co-ordinating it to a larger extent, especially abroad, and that we are trying to reduce our dependence on the American market.

LIMIT ON SIZE OF CHINOOK SALMON CAUGHT BY SPORTS FISHERMEN OFF WEST COAST

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the minister who has just resumed his seat, whether he is a pêcheur, a pécheur or une pêche.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Can he inform the House whether he intends to proceed with the plan formulated by his officials to institute an 18-inch limit on chinook salmon caught by sports fishermen off the west coast?

● (1500)

While he is answering that question, would the minister indicate whether he has some other plan in mind? Does he have any plans for instituting a licensing system for sports fishermen?

[Translation]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has been talking about fishing and fishermen; I just hope he will not refer to anything fishy.

Madam Speaker, my predecessor was about to reach some very difficult decisions and I regret somewhat that the election that stopped him from taking that good initiative came too soon. That being said, I am studying, as my predecessor surely did, the proposals aimed at improving fisheries management, sport fishing particularly, to apply better conservation policies. I am not now in a position to announce specific decisions in that regard. I shall inform the House in due course.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wonder, then, Madam Speaker, if the minister would assure the House that he has no plans for increasing the commercial licences for 1980 or 1981 on the west coast and, if not, would he say when the announcement of changes will be made, so that the uncertainties which are now plaguing west coast fishermen can be laid to rest?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the discussions which I had with the advisory council created by my predecessor—which turned out to be a very positive initiative—led me to believe that it would be very useful to have a further exchange in June. I intend to spend a fair amount of time on the west coast in the middle of June, to put forward some proposals and to hear the reactions before a decision is made. That will be part of the discussion.

WINNIPEG RAIL RELOCATION—REPLY OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, in answering or attempting to answer a question today, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) indicated that at a meeting held on Sunday with regard to Winnipeg rail relocation at the CPR yards no Conservative member was present at that meeting. I want to inform you, Madam Speaker, that in fact there were representatives there of the city of Winnipeg and of the provincial government. I at no time had an invitation from the sponsoring group to appear at that meeting, but I want to indicate that if the minister persists in that kind of half truth in this House—

Mr. Axworthy: Were you there?

Mr. Epp: —the point has to be made—

An hon. Member: Were you there or not?

Mr. Epp: As the Winnipeg Free Press editorialized the next day, we would like to know from the minister what programs would be cut in Manitoba in terms of rail relocation. The editorial was headed simply "Shut Up".

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it being Thursday, I wonder if I could ask my friend the President of the Privy Council and government House leader about his plans for tomorrow and into next week, bearing in mind that today is an allotted day for Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, tomorrow we shall try to get second reading of the small businesses loans legislation and if, as we hope, the bill passes that stage, we shall pursue on Friday consideration of the Employment Tax Credit Act. On Monday, the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne will resume; it will be the seventh day. The eighth day will come later in the session at a date not yet determined. But Monday for sure will be the seventh day of the throne speech debate. On Tuesday, we would like to complete second reading of the Bank Act and if we succeed before the end of the day, we could proceed with second reading of the Bretton Woods Agreements bill. Wednesday and Thursday, as my colleagues know, will be business supply days; the House will be in Committee of the Whole, and I expect that my hon. colleagues will let me know in due course the estimates of which departments they would like to examine.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it is our intention to give that advice to the minister. I thank him for the invitation.

I had raised a question with the minister with respect to the matter of parliamentary groups like the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Canadian branch, and others having the opportunity to report to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. I wonder if he would be prepared to consider that reference—or maybe he has had time to do so—so that the work of those committees could be reported to Parliament appropriately. I undertake with the minister that there would be no debate on a reference of that nature.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, there are times—for example, yesterday—when we interrupt whatever business we are doing because something comes along which is regarded as urgent. May I ask the government House leader to have discussions with his colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, on the urgency of the promised legislation to do something about the widows of disabled veterans. Can he assure us that that legislation will be brought in soon?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague can rest assured that I shall bring his concern to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs as soon as he returns from Holland.

[English]

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Has the minister had an opportunity yet to consult with his colleagues on the very worth-while suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission be referred to a special committee of this House for very comprehensive consideration?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, first I would like to advise the House that in a few days we will give notice of a motion to refer to a joint committee the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages. This results from an agreement we reached this morning with the leaders of the opposition parties.

As regards the suggestion repeated today by the hon. member, no decision has been reached yet on this matter; however, my hon. friend should understand that committees of the House are now studying the estimates and that many other matters are likely to be referred to them soon. This does not, by any standard, depreciate the suggestion he is putting forward. It is being seriously considered and I hope to be able to give him an answer within a reasonable delay.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ALLEGED DELETION FROM OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, you will recall that last Friday I raised a question of privilege, but it was deferred because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was not in his seat. He was in the House today but he has now left, so I ask that that matter stand until tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS TO SPEAK

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise just briefly to ask for clarification from the Chair, if possible, and to obtain some idea of the basis on which members of the House who are commonly classified as backbenchers are recognized, particularly during the last part of the question period.

As one who has been fortunate enough to obtain recognition to move three or four motions under Standing Order 43 since the start of the session, but who has been unable to gain the floor for questions, I wonder if Your Honour could outline upon just what basis backbenchers are selected for asking questions during the latter part of the question period.

Madam Speaker: There is no written rule about the order in which members are recognized in the House. The member who has the floor is obviously the one the Speaker recognizes. When a discussion on a particular subject is taking place and a member of the opposition who has held responsibilities concerning a certain department rises to ask a question, obviously I will recognize him because I do not want to break the rhythm of the dialogue which takes place during question period. I think it is very healthy to have questions and answers from people who have a particular interest in a specific area. I think that is quite a healthy thing to encourage in the House.

As for backbenchers, they have rights in this House equal to those of any of the members who sit here. I try to recognize them, but obviously they are more numerous than the others, and their turn does not come up as often as perhaps they would like. However, I do my best.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, on this point I wonder if I might be permitted to say a word. It does seem to me that one of the reasons many members are not getting the floor in the question period is that those who do get the floor, and ministers who answer are too loquacious. I suggest that if questions and replies were succinct there would be an opportunity for more questions to be put in the question period.

● (1510)

Madam Speaker: The remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) are most welcome. I feel that it will become increasingly important to cut off the preamble to questions. The questions should be sharp and, as everyone knows, the sharper ones are more effective. I suppose that members of the House are looking for effectiveness in their dialogue. This also applies to answers which, I think, should be brief and to the point. I find that I will be increasingly asking members to comply with that practice.

This is not an unwritten rule; it is a written rule that the purpose of questions should be to elicit information and that answers should give information. This would allow me then, if we save some time—I would be grateful for the co-operation of hon. members in this respect—and if members asked crisp and brief questions and answers were equally brief, to recognize more backbenchers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—SX CLASSIFICATION—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 356—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Privy Council Office (b) how many were (i) Francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the PCO since March 31, 1979 and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SX's employed?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

1. SX 24
   Francophones 3
   Females 0
   Females 1
3. A new organizational structure came into effect on October 1, 1979. It did not change the number of SX's employed in the office.

JUSTICE—EMPLOYEES IN THE SX CLASSIFICATION

Question No. 362—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979, (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Department of Justice (b) how many were (i) francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the Department since March 31, 1979, and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SX's employed?

Point of Order—Mr. Cossitt

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development):

1. (a) 1

(b) (i) None;

(b)(ii) None.

2. 1.

3. Yes, there has been a change in the structure of the department, but that change had no effect on the number of SX's employed.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I would like to refer to two questions to which I have been referring for about three years approximately, perhaps longer. They have been repeated on successive order papers. I understand that the previous government was about to answer them in a much more timely fashion before it left office than the present government, which has taken two to three years to answer some questions. I refer specifically to question No. 15, which concerns a gentleman named Mr. Martin Goldfarb, Goldfarb Consultants Limited and the amount of public funds they have received for doing business for the present government and for the former Liberal government when it was in office.

I do not think it should take three years to figure out just what Martin Goldfarb has been getting in the way of payments for his services to the Liberal party as well as for his services to the government of this country. In other words, I think it is about time that these questions were answered. Three years is a long time. I have every right to complain vigorously about it because if it were three weeks, three months or four months, one could say that it takes a long time to compile statistical information, but it should not take three years. Three years means that something is being hidden.

My other question—the number of which I do not have readily available without having to flip through the order paper, but I am sure that the parliamentary secretary is well aware of it from its substance—is a question which has also been on successive order papers for a number of years. It involves the fingerprinting of civil servants by this government, both when it was in power previously and now. My question asks how many of them are there, why they were fingerprinted and so on. I am referring to public servants who are not in security positions, not connected with national security or national defence. I am referring to such people as secretaries and unemployment insurance officers who, I know, have in the past been frequently fingerprinted all across this country.

In my opinion, this is an invasion of privacy. Parliament has the right to know why this has been done. For three years I have been asking this question. I have raised at least five or six points of order, and for three years the government have been sitting on their behinds, which seems to be what they usually do, and have not attempted to answer either of these questions.

Could the parliamentary secretary give us some indication right now—not tomorrow, not the next day, but right now—when these questions are going to be answered?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I welcome the intervention of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), and I should like to point out, as I did on Friday, that the present government has an admirable record in answering these questions when one compares it with the record of the former government in the Thirty-first Parliament. I would ask the hon. member to look at my answer given in reply to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton last Friday on the rapidity with which questions are answered in this House.

My role is merely to report to the House those questions which are answered by departments. It is not for me as Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council to comment any further on these questions. I suggest that if the hon. member is not satisfied with a particular answer, he can take it up in the usual way. He can ask questions in the House, he can ask further questions on the order paper, he can avail himself of the "late show". There are a number of things he could do in addition to resorting to private correspondence with ministers.

He brought up a couple of specific questions. One is question No. 15 with respect to Mr. Goldfarb. I will try to get the answer for him as quickly as possible, but it is my recollection that since the session started we have answered a number of questions from the hon. member. I think he is doing very well in comparison with other members in the House. Mind you, I should say that the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville is one of the few members of the House who has practically filled up the order paper with questions, so he cannot expect answers to all his questions immediately.

With regard to the question concerning fingerprinting—I forget the number—he asserts that the answer was ready to be given by the former government. I ask him to consult with his leader and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, who was president of the privy council at that time, to ascertain why, if these questions have indeed gone through the departments, they were not tabled in the House. But I will try to expedite all the questions in the course of my normal duties.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I do not want to prolong this debate but I cannot fail to make two observations about the remarks of the parliamentary secretary.

As I understand the role of the parliamentary secretary, he does not stand up in the House and spout answers which are given to him by various ministries in response to different questions. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville has asked that a question which has been on the order paper for three years in successive Parliaments be answered. I think there is a duty in those circumstances on the part of the parliamentary secretary to answer those questions if he can. If he cannot, I think it is inappropriate for him not to say that he will use his best efforts, as Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council responsible for the operation of the House, to obtain answers for the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville and indeed for any other member of the House of Commons.

I will not argue the statistical record because I think it is a very foolish argument and we can deal with statistics any way we like. We are talking about the principle of the government answering questions put by members.

If there is some reason respecting the security of the country for the question not to be answered, then the hon. member is entitled to know. If the reason is that it is an embarrassing question for the government, then I think that is not sufficient reason to fail to answer the question. Certainly that question would not have been an embarrassing matter to the government of the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), who is now Leader of the Opposition. But apparently it is embarrassing or something to the present government because it has not been answered by the parliamentary secretary or former parliamentary secretaries. The question is now for the third time on the order paper.

All I am saying to my friend is that he has the duty, not just to give us the statistics, but to say to members, when questions are persistently left unanswered, what they can do to obtain the answers or at least to inform the hon. member why the question cannot be answered. I think it is extremely important that we establish that at the beginning because I think it is important to the relationship which exists between the government and the opposition in terms of the operation of the House of Commons and House business.

I put it to my friend very seriously that three years is a long time to wait for any answer. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville indicated the position on a prior occasion when we had the privilege of forming the Government of Canada. He said that the answers were ready, that they were to come on, but that they did not come on because of the fall of the government. If those answers were ready for our government, those answers are now ready for his government. I suggest he go to see the Clerk of the Privy Council immediately, obtain those answers, if they are ready as he says they are, and bring them forward to the House. I think it will simplify matters, and certainly it will be helpful in terms of the flow of information to which I believe members of Parliament are entitled.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members to my left have made their point. I will allow the parliamentary secretary to reply if he insists, but I thought the point was sufficiently made and that perhaps we could cut if off here and proceed to the other item.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I did make the point, and I will stand by what I said, that I undertake to answer these questions. But there is a sort of underground insinuation about who is culpable in terms of answering a particular question. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville has made the assertion that that question was ready to be answered during the tenure of the former government. I do not know whether that is so. All I know is that in the two weeks, three weeks or five weeks we have been sitting here and answering questions, that question has not come from the Privy Council office to be answered here today.

Mr. Lalonde: They did not do it in six months.

Mr. Collenette: They did not do it in six months. If indeed what the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville said is correct, they did not table it themselves. I just want to point out that inconsistency.

Also I should like to point out that delay in answering questions, or failure to answer any particular question on a given day, does not necessarily imply that that question will not be answered at some time in the future.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO FORMULATE HONEST AND EFFECTIVE ENERGY POLICY

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to formulate an honest and effective energy policy.

He said: Mr. Speaker will note that we as the official opposition have chosen to use this our first allotted day to bring to the attention of the House and to our fellow citizens the failure of this government to deal honestly and effectively with a variety of important and urgent problems in the field of national energy policy.

Some of the problems which will be discussed today are as follows: first, pricing and supply; second, consumer impact; third, conservation and alternative sources; fourth, economic and industrial impact. I think it will be obvious to the House in terms of both importance and urgency that any one of these several issues alone could form the subject matter of today's debate. In terms of the total energy situation, I should like to point out that this list obviously is not an exhaustive one.

Any opposition acting responsibly could be justified in devoting allotted days to a variety of other energy-related issues. For example, one thinks immediately of the fact that Canadians are entitled to know, and we are entitled to debate, the international aspects of energy, particularly those aspects which gave rise to what we know around the world in this era as the energy crisis. Similarly, it would take little to justify using an allotted day to debate the energy dimension of Canada-United States relations.

Of course, there are numerous other energy issues which demand and deserve our attention. However, we feel compelled to bring to the attention of the House the four matters I have enumerated because it is our view that to ignore any one of those would, as an official opposition, be irresponsible. That irresponsibility would not be less than the irresponsibility of the government in failing to deal effectively with all four of those issues. Perhaps the combining of all four of those issues enumerated in this debate will serve at least to emphasize their interrelationship and their interdependence, because among the multitude of sins committed by this government in the energy field—and by previous Liberal governments—has been the sin of ignoring or failing to comprehend this interdependence.

The only more serious charge that I could lay at the doorstep of this government and previous Liberal governments would be their guilt in forsaking any medium or long-term energy strategy for the sake of short-term political expedience. We have had years of announcements by a parade of ministers of finance and ministers of energy. I recall at least two ministers of finance in the last few years talking endlessly about the necessity of moving toward, to or beyond world prices in oil. We have had at least two ministers of energy announcing a conservation strategy which they thought was so good that they reannounced it several times in several sessions. Of course, it was never fully and certainly never effectively implemented, because it faced that one insurmountable hurdle—the hurdle of Liberal political expediency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker will hear one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), dealing with energy pricing and supply. We in this party find it unacceptable that this government's attention span to self-sufficiency lasts no longer than one month following the latest Middle East crisis. That is the entire attention span of this government. Following that one month it is completely ignored.

In our view, this government takes greater satisfaction in concluding deals with foreign suppliers of oil than seizing upon the challenges and the opportunity to become self-sufficient from our own resources. We do not believe that enormous payments of Canadian dollars from Canadian taxpayers to foreign producers need be the destiny of our country. It takes little imagination for anyone in this House of whatever political persuasion to realize what we could be doing with the $3 billion we are paying out today in subsidy payments alone. Think of it if you wish, sir, in economic or industrial or regional development terms. Others may choose to think of it in terms of the enhancement of social programs. Others may think of it in terms of the reduction of the national debt. But if Mr. Speaker wishes to think of it purely in energy terms, I point out that that $3 billion would provide $500 worth of new insulation in virtually every home in Canada. In turning its back on self-sufficiency, this government is committed to the continuation of this enormous and endless drain for an indefinite period.

In terms of pricing, sir, when the government talks about pricing it talks exclusively about price at the pump. Sometimes, rather rarely, it talks in terms of prices in regard to revenue sharing between producing and non-producing provinces. But never does this government talk about price in the most important context—in terms of bringing on required Canadian production.

Does this government ever ask itself, for example, at what price is tertiary development from conventional sources viable? I suggest it never does. Does it ever ask itself at what price is Alsands viable, given the enormous capital investment, or at what price is gasohol, solar or tidal energy practical? I suggest never.

Pricing to this government is first a matter of algebra; it is the xyz formula, the nature of which has been and continues to be a secret. Second, when it talks about price it talks about taxes, whether they be refinery taxes, export taxes consumer taxes, next year's taxes or the taxes for the year after, all of which remain secret.

Perhaps it was put best by The Globe and Mail, coincidentally just this morning, in its editorial. It states:

> It is useless to complain that the government is trying to find ways of replacing the excise tax which it said it would not levy. The government has done little but evade its election promises since the election. Why expect honour?

Another of my colleagues will be dealing with the impact upon Canadian consumers. Indeed, that is not a problem that is confined to the gas pumps, as this government would have us believe. Any Canadian consumer is entitled to ask, what is the future of low-income groups who must heat their homes? What about those on fixed incomes, what is their future, particularly senior citizens who, possibly to the surprise of this government, do not drive large gas-guzzling cars to the pumps?

What about the enormous disparity that already exists among Canadians—and one thinks immediately of those in Quebec and Atlantic Canada—as compared to those in other parts of the country? How much greater is this disparity to be allowed to grow? Is there to be any form of energy cost cushion? Will there be an energy tax credit? Is there to be a subsidization of the generation of electricity in Atlantic Canada? Apparently that is not to be, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, many of those Canadians least able to protect themselves will become even more vulnerable in the future should this government's policies continue to develop as they have over the past few months.

The third point we will be raising, sir, will be in respect of conservation and alternative sources. I confess that I am not convinced this government has made that one basic decision yet, and that decision is, do we implement conservation measures or do we ration gasoline? I do not believe that decision has been made. There is no indication that it has.

Hon. members will remember former energy minister Donald Macdonald announcing a conservation measure in February, 1975. It was reannounced by his successor, the Hon. Alastair Gillespie, in 1976. What has been implemented? I suggest virtually nothing. The conclusion one reaches is that this government, as previous Liberal governments, is content with a 3.5 per cent increase in energy consumption. That is the inescapable conclusion one must draw, even in the face of not just independent studies, but its own government studies which say that 2 per cent is attainable. What is the government's response? All we have seen so far has been the throne speech. We have an awesome conservation program consisting entirely of two things; fuel efficient standards for cars, and higher home insulation standards. That is the total conservation package we have had from this government.

What then, sir, has the government said or done about alternative sources? Again one looks to the throne speech, and I quote:

An alternative energy corporation will be created with a mandate to stimulate the development of new and renewable energy sources to replace oil.

The sole response to the challenge, the opportunity of developing alternatives, is another Crown corporation. Today in a reply to a question from one of his colleagues, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said this corporation will become a subsidiary of PetroCan, that it will have a board of directors and, I think, $20 million capitalization. He was not asked where the head office was to be, but I presume it is Calgary, a marvellous city in which to live. I am envious of those defeated Liberal candidates who can catch on to this Crown corporation, and there are lots of them out in Alberta. The only reason, frankly, that I see for putting this subsidiary in Calgary, much as I like the city, is its proximity to defeated Liberal candidates.

Where does this failure to respond to this challenge leave a variety of projects? Where, for example, does this leave the potential in Ontario for gasohol and alternative liquid fuels as dealt with in the Ontario budget? Where does this leave the tidal power project on the Annapolis River? Where does it leave the biomass project in Prince Edward Island? What about the Donkin No. 2 coal project in Nova Scotia? And the list goes on and on. Those projects remain at the mercy of our 432nd Crown corporation. I confess I am not sure about the numbers, but it is four hundred and something, and I believe it is 432. It is close to the 500 mark.

These projects are at the mercy of this newest Crown corporation, to be a subsidiary of PetroCan, located in Calgary, with a yet unnamed board of directors. These important projects, as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, were some of those to flow from our proposed national energy bank. Others, you will recall, included Canadian-owned oil upgraders, because we are exporting oil we do not have the capacity to deal with it at this time. That was another project. Then there was the oil sands project and the gas pipeline to Quebec City and through to the maritimes. Then we had proposals for urban transit, which we heard yesterday were now being discarded. We had urban transit upon which Liberal candidates have run for almost half a century, I believe. Are all of these projects—I say this more in sadness than in anger—and our ability to harness the alternatives with which we are so rich to have the same fate as urban transit? Is that the energy future for Canada and for Canadians?

Another of my colleagues will be dealing with the economic and industrial impact.

Earlier this week, in speaking to the Canadian Conference Board in Toronto—and I have read the speech carefully—the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources dealt with the effects of higher energy prices and said that they:

—are bound to increase the inflationary pressure . . . and to depress over-all economic growth. They will work against an improvement in national employment and will weigh against both productivity and profits.

● (1540)

The picture is pretty gloomy. In terms of the gas pump psychology of the Liberal government, when a Canadian goes to a gas pump he will find the price of gas too high, no matter what it is, if he is unemployed. The price will always be too high for the unemployed. However, more importantly, I understand what the minister was saying and I share some of his concerns; but the real tragedy, the inexcusable tragedy, is the government's failure to appreciate the economic and industrial opportunities that are presented in the strategy of energy self-sufficiency, whether the opportunities be in growth, jobs, productivity, profits or taxes flowing to various levels of government. If one were an industrialist, one would think of such projects as Syncrude, the Foothills pipeline, and the Q and M pipeline.

If one thinks in terms of conservation, there is the potential of solar heating. Think of the manufacturing opportunities available in solar heating. That is why we were so anxious to seize upon this opportunity that is so uniquely Canadian through our energy strategy. That is why we introduced the energy self-sufficiency tax and the national energy bank.

Referring once again to the minister's speech to the Conference Board earlier this week, he said:

In developing the government's policy approaches to this situation we will be striving to create a positive approach and inject into the Canadian energy environment an element that I know has been absent for some time, namely, that of greater certainty.

What greater certainty than the certainty of price, not the xyz algebraic formula of blended pricing. In fairness, there is a certainty—the certainty of direct and indirect taxes, whether they be consumer taxes, refinery taxes, export taxes, income taxes, and who knows what other form they may take. It is certain that Canadian consumers, directly or indirectly, will pay more for their energy from this government than they would from the previous Conservative government.

Mr. Lalonde: That has to be the joke of the year.

Mr. Jarvis: It is certain, with regard to supply, that Canada will become more and more reliant on foreign sources of energy. With regard to the consumer impact, without the cushion provided by the energy tax credit and other measures, the consumer is certain to get socked; that is inevitable.

Mr. Waddell: He is getting socked.

Mr. Jarvis: With regard to the certainty of conservation, not one measure has been announced except the fuel standards for automobiles and home insulation. That is the certainty of conservation!

The certainty of alternative sources is another matter. There is an alternative source to which this government is devoted—to sign a contract with yet another foreign government. That is its whole alternative source program. Where is the certainty in our economy? The minister promised in Toronto fewer jobs, lower profits, lower productivity and, of course, consequently lower tax revenues.

The tragedy goes beyond all that I have just said, Mr. Speaker. Granted it is tragedy enough, but beyond that, the real cost to the Canadian consumer, both in economic and human terms, is the failure of the government to see the challenge and to grasp the opportunity that is uniquely and solely ours. That is the tragedy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: There is the challenge of price as a tool of supply, the magnificent opportunity to be self-sufficient, of taking hold of that ability we have to protect our consumers, the obvious opportunity to enact a real conservation program, the development of alternate sources which are begging for development and the economic and industrial potential to develop these opportunities. All of these challenges were taken up in the budget of last December. Failure by this government to seize upon those challenges and to develop those opportunities would, I submit, be irresponsible, wasteful and tragic.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague of the official opposition on his first intervention on this very important question of energy and for having taken the opportunity on the first opposition day to put this question on the agenda. Indeed, energy has been the most important question facing this country over the last few years, the last few months, and I suspect that it will remain so for the next few years.

The question of energy is related not only to energy self-sufficiency or energy itself, but is also very closely related to the entire economic environment of this country. It even goes beyond that. Energy is closely related to the question of the unity of our country. It has as an issue all the makings of a tremendous opportunity for growth and unity in this country. However, at the same time, it can divide this country, extremely and profoundly.

Energy can also be the cause of a serious deterioration of our economic opportunities and development. Our purpose and objective as the government is to use energy as a source of tremendous economic development and as an element in bringing this country together, rather than dividing it—and there is that danger.

Having complimented my colleague for raising this issue today, I am sure that he will allow me to make a few more comments which will not be quite as complimentary, not to the hon. member but to the government of which he was a part, fortunately for a rather short period. The Conservative party can be accused of having many defects, but one thing that it has—

Mr. Siddon: —is common sense.

Mr. Lalonde: —is nerve, nerve indeed for bringing forward on the first opposition day a motion "condemning the government for its failure to formulate an honest and effective energy policy."

Mr. Andre: Underline the word "honest".

Mr. Lalonde: My hon. colleague opposite, who is hiding behind the curtains, is attempting to comment. As usual, his comments are not very relevant nor very intelligent but we will not leave him behind the curtains.

My party has been in office for just over two months. Last year the Conservative government was appointed early in June, and then the minister of energy disappeared for four or five months. He had been gone for so long that he was being referred to in the press as the invisible minister. I say this in all friendship to the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) because I have always thought, and still do, that he is a very decent human being.

Miss MacDonald: That's very generous.

Mr. Lalonde: But the fact is that he disappeared for several months. When he reappeared it was impossible for the opposition of the day to get any significant information from him; everything was under study, under examination, under review and, sometimes, under discussion.

● (1550)

What did we have then? We had a period in which there were intense divisions between the provinces, particularly the province of Ontario and the province of Alberta. There was intense dissatisfaction by the provinces at the lack of consultation, lack of opportunities to have an input and lack of knowledge as to what was transpiring between them.

Then, that poor minister was pushed aside by the former minister of finance and his leader, who took over and tried to arrive at some deal between the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta, leaving completely in the dark the government of the other producing provinces, and even worse the governments of the consuming provinces. One would have thought that after six months that government would have come up with an honest and effective energy policy; that is the least one would have hoped for and expected from a government that seemed to be so long in generating anything.

We were facing an elephant pregnancy in the case of the last government's energy policy. We were given a statement in the budget of December 11, a statement that was so horrendous that the opposition unanimously had to reject it, vote it down, one that the people of Canada had no hesitation whatsoever in rejecting in the following general election.

This is the party that dares ask for an honest energy policy, yet they came forward with a budget in which they told Canadians, "Don't worry, we have got a deal; we have an 18-cent excise tax and over the next four years an arrangement by which you will have an increase of $4 per barrel this year over and above the 18 cents; and you will have an increase of $4.50 for the next four years". En passant, they said, "The third year we will adjust to 75 per cent and the fourth year we will adjust to 85 per cent of the Chicago price", which is the equivalent of the world price.

Mr. Stevens: Not necessarily.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member says "not necessarily." He knows that the Chicago price, in effect, is higher than the world price by a couple of dollars.

Mr. Stevens: It was always the lower of the two; tell the truth.

Mr. Lalonde: Now he says it would have been the lower of the two. Then it would have to be 85 per cent of the world price or of the Chicago price, whichever was the lower; but in fact the Chicago price was higher so we are back to the same statement.

What has been discovered in all of this? We discovered that the party which now claims that theirs was an honest energy policy had been pulling the wool over Canadians' eyes. But fortunately Canadians are no fools and they saw through the trick. They decided what to do about it at the last election.

What was the meaning of the $4.50, Mr. Speaker, that we were going to get next year and the following two years? We already know that with the current increases it would have meant $5.80 next year, $4.70 in 1982, and from what we know now, in 1983 it would be $10.90 and in 1984 $7.60. That is on the basis of inflation plus 2 per cent. It is a very, very modest assumption about what will happen to oil prices.

We all know that the OPEC countries are meeting in Saudi Arabia to review the question of oil pricing. They are due to meet on June 9 and already we are hearing talk about further increases in the price of oil on the international market.

That is the kind of proposition that was being put by the last government, Mr. Speaker. They did not dare set it straight during the speech on the budget or after. As a matter of fact, their minister of finance tried to say something about this during the election. He said that he might have to increase the price even more, but then promptly we had his leader contradicting him the next day, saying that the increase would not go over $4 or $4.50. We know now who was right; it was their minister of finance and not the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who was prime minister at the time.

Mr. Andre: That is what I mean about honest. You are being dishonest.

Mr. Lalonde: Our friend in the opposition was hiding behind the curtains a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker. Now he is moving to the front bench. I am sorry his leader has not found him dignified enough to put him in charge of anything yet, especially in the field of energy but ask him to be patient.

That is the party that is now calling for honesty, that is calling for effectiveness in terms of energy policy. We know what that policy was; it was the baseball bat approach to energy. The consumers of this country rejected it and rejected it strongly in the last election. I find the opposition has a lot of nerve to dare raise this question today in the way they have; but nonetheless, I am happy it is on the agenda. My colleagues and I will have an opportunity to go into several of the elements of this policy today.

I know the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) was unavoidably absent from the House for a couple of weeks, but I am glad he has had time to read the speech I made in Toronto a couple of days ago. I would invite him to read the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Halifax during the election campaign when he was leader of the opposition, as well as my speech in this House during the throne speech debate and other speeches I have made in Quebec and Montreal in the last few weeks.

If he read those speeches he would find there the principles that this government came out with during the election campaign and since, the very clear outline and clear principles on which the government's energy policy is based. We have been quite forthcoming with the public about what we were proposing in the field of energy. Our commitment derived from a basic belief that energy policy must be based upon principles of security, equity and opportunity.

The previous policy was not based on those principles; it was very short on principles generally. What we had after very little consultation with the provinces other than Alberta—practically none, from what I could assess—was excessive increases in the price of oil, and an excise tax the people of Canada rejected. They did not come up with anything of substance in the area mentioned by the hon. member for Perth, that is, conservation and substitution.

We have said that what we need is a price not tied to the international price but one based upon the Canadian reality and the Canadian situation. We will have in this country a price that will be based on Canadian situations. The wellhead price for oil and gas will be determined through negotiations with the producing provinces in particular, at levels which reflect the right of the producing provinces to a fair return on their investment.

● (1600)

I want to make it quite clear that it is not a question of taking away the rights of any provinces, of preventing the producing provinces from getting richer. It is quite clear that Alberta is richer than any other province in this country, will become even richer in the next few years and fabulously rich in this decade. There is no doubt about that. Any deal arrived at will make the province of Alberta by far the wealthiest province in this country.

Nonetheless, the price must also be one that recognizes that the cost of developing new sources of supply is greater than that associated with supplies already in reserve.

When we talked about our "made-in-Canada" price, we said that there will be one price for oil coming from conventional sources and another higher price for oil coming from non-conventional sources, such as the tar sands or the frontier areas. Also, there will be an injection into that price of the cost of imported oil which will continue to impart for a number of years.

Mr. Andre: What about new oil and tertiary oil?

Mr. Lalonde: This price—we have stated quite clearly and repeatedly, and I repeat it again today—will be lower than the price which had been forecast by the previous Conservative government in the ill-fated budget of December 11, and that is a commitment of this government.

An hon. Member: Tell us the price.

Mr. Lalonde: We want a revenue system so structured that if prices rise, as they will, the national government will get the share it needs to carry out its national responsibility.

I see my friends in the opposition over there worrying. What they should realize is that if we in this country are going to be able to stick together, we will need to have a national government which will have not only the powers but the resources to ensure that regional disparities are not going to become excessive. One cannot have a country in which there is a province that would become a Kuwait and another province that would become a Jordan. One cannot have a country like that.

For instance, the province of Nova Scotia's total revenue from natural resources is, I believe, about $8 per capita at the present time. The province of Alberta's total revenue from natural resources alone is $1,900 per capita. How much more and for how much longer can we have a continuation of this kind of disparity if we do not have in the national government the resources necessary to redistribute them in a way that will try to help those provinces with fewer resources? Obviously one will have to call upon the wealthiest provinces to make a contribution to the national wealth of the country to arrive at a better distribution of income in Canada, a better distribution than just the location of natural resources would allow for.

Mr. Andre: How does relying on Saudi Arabia help?

Mr. Lalonde: Again, my friend from Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) cannot get that through his head. It is elementary. If you want to have a country, you will have to face those realities. I see that my friend from Calgary Centre is going through the roof, but some day he will come down to earth. As I have said, as far as we are concerned, we recognize this as a basic element of any energy policy in this country.

My hon. friend talked about pricing and supply, but he did not talk about revenue sharing. Ignoring this question is ignoring the reality of this country, and it is going to lead to very deep divisions in Canada if that question is not faced squarely by all provincial governments and by all parties in this House.

I noticed that the opposition completely left out not only the question of revenue sharing, which is fundamental in my view, in addition to the question of pricing, supply and conservation, but also the question of Canadian ownership. In my view this is not surprising coming from the opposition, but I find it regrettable.

In this country we have tremendous oil and gas resources. If we look to the future of this country, we can say that Canada will be sitting on top of the world. Unfortunately, a large portion of our resources in this field are still foreign owned. We want to do more to remedy this situation.

The previous Liberal government set up Petro-Canada as one instrument to achieve this purpose. The official opposition was trying to destroy Petro-Canada in the short six months it was in office. Petro-Canada has been a major instrument in ensuring that we are taking over a larger portion of and playing a bigger role in the petroleum industry. We want to maintain and expand Petro-Canada. One of the first steps we took after our election as the government was to remit the $80 million to Petro-Canada which the previous government had refused to give it to allow it to do its job.

Mr. Stevens: More debt.

Mr. Lalonde: In addition, we have indicated that our objective is to arrive at 50 per cent—my friends on the other side keep interrupting and shouting all the time, Mr. Speaker. I know that this subject touches their nerves. They made such a mess of it in their short six months.

Mr. Andre: We cannot believe that you are that ignorant about what is going on.

Mr. Stevens: Where did you get the $80 million from?

Mr. Lalonde: They are livid with rage about their goof.

We want to ensure during this decade that the petroleum industry will be at least 50 per cent Canadian owned. We are not going to wait until 1989 to work on this question or to ensure that we are going to make substantial progress in that direction.

As I have indicated, we have already taken some steps through Petro-Canada. We are working now on a new act concerning federal lands which will ensure that there will be a greater role for Canadian-controlled firms in all areas coming under federal control and jurisdiction. We have already indicated that we will take steps to favour Canadian firms in the area of oil and gas.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that I have only a few minutes left. Several of my colleagues will have the opportunity to touch on other aspects of this crucial issue.

I simply want to indicate once again that we have clear and unequivocal objectives as far as our energy policy is concerned. We have set out these objectives during the campaign and we have reiterated them in the Speech from the Throne. I myself have made a statement on this matter in the House. These objectives have been endorsed by the Canadian people, and it is our intention to achieve them during this government's term of office. In the two months that we have been in power, we have taken several measures which indeed indicate this government's determination to ensure that Canada has an energy policy tailored to its needs, an energy policy which will guarantee that this sector is truly under Canadian control and in particular an energy-pricing policy to protect Canadian consumers against exorbitant prices such as those proposed by the former Progressive Conservative government and which the House, Parliament and the entire population unequivocally rejected.

We have already taken action to strengthen Petro-Canada. In the weeks ahead we will be announcing several other concrete measures to promote our conservation policy and our policy on alternate sources of energy. We want to negotiate a price formula for natural gas which will encourage all Canadians to use natural gas instead of oil and heating fuel.

Once again, I have already communicated several times with my colleagues in other provinces and representatives from the industry, and I hope that in the weeks to come, I shall be able to announce certain important measures which may result in an increase in the use of those resources of which we have large reserves and bring about a substantial decrease in the consumption of oil, which must obviously come down.

We also want this new energy policy to provide a new economic impetus to Canada, because we are convinced that the energy issue, far from being a crisis or a problem in itself, constitutes for Canada the greatest development opportunity of its history. This government has no doubt that because of our advantageous energy situation in Canada, whether we are talking about hydroelectric resources, natural gas resources, conventional and non-conventional oil reserves, our underwater resources which are now being developed or nuclear energy, this country owns more resources than any other country in the world. Yet, here we are, a population of 23 million people, literally sitting on this incredible wealth which causes envy among all the other countries. We are firmly determined as a government to enable all Canadians to benefit from this wealth, and not only those Canadians who happen to occupy such and such a territory at any given time.

We are also determined to have these resources increasingly developed by Canadians and for Canadians. Having said this, it is obvious that those Canadians who reside in a province with greater natural resources than the others will benefit more from their development. There is no doubt about this and our policy is in keeping with this reality, but at the same time, it aims at ensuring that there will not be in this country regions which become extremely wealthy at the expense of others which will then become proportionally extremely poor. This is the role of national government and this is the role of national Parliament: To see to it that there are enough resources distributed throughout the country for the governments of the various provinces and regions to be truly able to meet their responsibilities toward the population, and also to ensure that Canadian citizens who decide to live in Quebec, in Newfoundland, in Prince Edward Island or in Manitoba will not have to move the next day to improve their standard of living to some other province because this other province happens to have an exceptional resource.

We have no intention of supporting any policy whose result would be to transform some of our provinces into uninhabited national parks. Mr. Speaker, once again, my colleagues will have the opportunity to provide more details about certain aspects of our policy, but I wish to reassure the opposition that not only will we have an energy policy, but also that we now have one which is honest and effective, and that everyone will be able to see its results in the months to come.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my comments on the speeches by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) for the Conservatives and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) for the government, I would like to make two preliminary remarks. I am told that many people now watch the proceedings of the House of Commons on television, and I think that as they see the cheap shots that go back and forth between the parties and as they see one group which was in government a few months ago blaming the other group, they must recognize that nothing very concrete happens except that the debate gets turned back and forth into what the other party did when in government. I think people must get disgusted at this kind of action and would like to see us get on to more positive suggestions.

The second comment I would like to make is that I understand that the minister of energy in Alberta, Mr. Leitch, today introduced a bill which would allow Alberta to curtail production in the oil fields "in the public interest". It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in the public interest, or of the rest of Canada at least, for us to have a confrontation in this country between "two gun slingers meeting in the Alberta corral to shoot it out" in order to get an oil deal. It seems to me this is what is happening and it would be a real tragedy for this country.

We see the minister of energy in his opening shot a few weeks ago unilaterally—without really discussing it with Alberta—changing the deal on the oil price and lowering the price from the world standard of prices. I happen to agree with that decision. Indeed, it was suggested many years ago with a little bit of foresight by Tommy Douglas in this House that that pricing deal was wrong. I agree with what the minister said but I do not agree with the way he did it. I think it was an opening shot, so we now find Mr. Leitch and Mr. Lougheed taking their turn at bluffing. We already have one national unity issue in this country, possibly a serious one after May 20. Let us not have two.

I am a western member and I have a lot of sympathy for some of the views of the province of Alberta. But may I say that the price and the security of oil supplies for Canada is a matter of national concern, not just provincial concern. If there were ever a time for politicians in Canada, whether it be the minister of energy sitting over there or the premiers of Alberta and other provinces, to take the high road in the name of national unity, this is the time.

I would like to take the time to deal with some of the remarks made by the Conservative spokesman, the hon. member for Perth. I should tell him that the New Democratic Party rejected the Conservative government's energy policy, as did the Canadian people. There were very good reasons for rejecting that policy. One of the main reasons we rejected it was because of the split-up of the wealth after that excise tax was to be applied. What was to happen to that money which was to have been taken out of the pockets of the Canadian consumers? Where was it to go? Well, $33 billion was to go to the industry, $40 billion to Alberta and only $17 billion to the federal government. And not all of that $17 billion was earmarked for energy programs; some of it was going to be put into the mortgage interest deductibility scheme, which was really a subsidy for upper middle-income people.

We approved of some of the measures in that budget, the energy tax credit and so on. We spoke favourably about some of them. But generally it was a lousy policy which redistributed wealth into the hands of the people who did not need it, namely the oil companies, and also into the hands of one single province. We rejected that and so did the Canadian people.

While the minister was talking about Petro-Canada, I heard some Conservative backbenchers call it a "peanut operation". We in the New Democratic Party do not believe that it should be or is a peanut operation. The Conservative party had four policies on Petro-Canada. All of them were intended to privatize Petro-Canada. The Canadian people did not approve of that and they made their views known in the election. Where I come from it was an important issue in the election campaign.

The Conservatives have proposed the following resolution:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to formulate an honest and effective energy policy.

We agree with that resolution, but it is much like the pot calling the kettle black when the Conservatives propose it. Surely the Clark government's pricing agreement, its excise tax, its treatment of Petro-Canada and its gas export decisions were indicative of a disastrous energy policy and a disastrous energy future for Canada.

Let me turn to the remarks made by the minister about the Liberal government's energy policy, such as it is. The hon. member for Perth used the phrase "an honest and effective energy policy" in his motion. I refer specifically to the word "honest." I think that is an appropriate place to start when one has to discuss any Liberal policy because if it is anything, it is not honest. It is dishonest.

Speaking during the election campaign in Halifax and elsewhere, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that oil prices would be lower than the Conservative price. They would be $4 a barrel, then $4.50, and $4.50 up until 1984. Now he is attempting to slide out of that promise. He is attempting to weasel around it. I think the promise was really directed to the people of Ontario, and I wonder if they will tolerate this standard of political morality. Will they let the government off the hook on this promise?

I would like to read from a transcript of a press conference the Prime Minister gave, and I think this is indicative. John Ferguson of the Canadian Press asked the following question:

Mr. Prime Minister, in a speech in Halifax in which you set out the energy policy of your party, you said that the Liberal government would keep the prices over the next four years below those outlined by the Conservatives in their defeated budget. Since that time there has been a variety of interpretation as to whether you were talking about specifically the $4.00, the $4.50/$4.50 formula, or whether you were talking about keeping the increases below a less defined but possibly higher price related to world levels. Could you tell us now whether or not you are committed to keeping the price increases below $4.50 a barrel for the next three years or whether you are talking about something else?

The Prime Minister answered the following:

I was talking in the terms which you just quoted, and I did not ask myself the question you are asking now: Would that mean much lower in one year and slightly lower in other years or much lower in average over the whole period? I think you can read it the way you want—

Q. Then you are saying that there is no commitment to keep the increases below $4.50 a barrel in the following three years?

A. Well, in each of the three years?

Q. Yes.

A. Well, I have just answered. You can take it in whatever way you want, so can Mr. Lougheed, Mr. Blakeney and Mr. Lalonde.

The minister is sitting over there.

The important thing is that we get a better deal for Canadians in pricing over those four years . . . You shake your head. I will take supplementaries on this if you want.

The pressman said "no". There were no supplementaries.

I used to know an Indian chief in Alberta who used to say that sometimes when white men talk they speak in gobbledygook. Surely this is an example of gobbledygook, of trying to weasel around a campaign promise. The Prime Minister is very prone to speak philosophically in this House. Through the minister I ask him what the cost, in terms of political morality, of this promise is.

An ex-aide of the Prime Minister, a Mr. Michael J. Kirby, who is now president of the Institute for Research on Public Policy—

Mr. Rae: He is back here now.

Mr. Waddell: He is back here? He was president of the Institute for Research on Public Policy for a short time. The article I have here says he is a former Trudeau aide, but he is now back. He gave a speech in April at Carleton University. It was a lecture. In the lecture he said, and I quote: "Restoring faith in government must be our primary goal". I ask the Prime Minister now, how do you restore faith in government?

I cannot use the word in the House, but when I was a criminal lawyer I used to talk about the word "fraud", and it meant not dealing directly but dealing deceitfully and indirectly with the people. That is what the Prime Minister has done with the people of Ontario. Why do you not come clean, Mr. Minister, with the people of Ontario and the people in the rest of the country? If you are going to go to world levels or above the Conservative price, then do it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Lalonde: You have to address the Chair.

Mr. Waddell: I am sorry. I will put it through you, Mr. Speaker. If the government is going to go to world levels and if it is going to change that policy, then perhaps it should do it and tell the Canadian people honestly about it.

Another criticism I have with respect to Liberal policy is criticism of the statement given in the Speech from the Throne and given again by the minister, and that is that by 1990, 50 per cent of the oil industry will be Canadian controlled. It is as if we never had Liberal government before in Canada, as if hon. members opposite never had a chance to get control of Canadian industry and this is just a new idea, no doubt stolen from the New Democratic Party. However, it is too little by 1990, and it is too late. By that time all the cheap oil will be sold. By that time all the big profits will have been made by the oil companies. They will have diversified the profits they will have made and bought up other industries. The minister's department has a report to this effect which was tabled in the last Parliament.

This government is big on talk. The Americans used to say that Theodore Roosevelt walked softly and carried a big stick. This government talks tough, but it carries no stick at all. It talks about being progressive, but let us not be fooled because its policies are conservative. In fact, this is the real Progressive Conservative party over there.

Mr. Jarvis: Oh, heaven protect us!

Mr. Andre: Would you like to step outside and say that?

Mr. Waddell: I thought that would get a rise out of my friends to the right. They are coming alive. Just last week I raised in this House the matter of oil company profits. I raised the point that Texaco's profits increased 94 per cent in the first three months; Gulf, 72 per cent—

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the hon. member calls the Liberals Progressive Conservatives, I respectfully request that that be included in Beauchesne as unparliamentary language.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not only verbose but he is also not very funny.

Let me continue. I was talking about oil company profits, a subject which I and my colleagues have raised in this House. There has been no reply. We have raised the matter of investigations into the oil companies with respect to their price fixing. There has been no reply. After seven long years we still have not seen any action. Why have we seen no action? Perhaps it is because of the financial returns of political parties. I only have figures for 1978; figures for 1979 have not been published. Gulf Oil of Canada gave $27,200 to the Liberal Party of Canada. It gave $41,000 to the Conservative party. Perhaps there is a difference in the two parties. Kaiser Resources gave $10,000 to the Liberal party. TransCanada PipeLines gave $16,690 to the Liberal party. Alberta Gas Trunk Line gave $15,800 to the Liberal party and $15,752 to the Conservative party. I could go on and on. Neither the Liberals as a government nor the Conservatives are going to intervene or interfere with their friends or with the interests of their friends who are giving them money to run their parties.

Mr. Malone: Tell us about CLU.

Mr. Waddell: I would like to speak about another area of Liberal policy, gas policy. When the minister was in opposition he said, "We are not going to sell gas cheaply." He said, "We are not going to make a fast buck." He said he wanted ironclad guarantees that there will be a northern pipeline. Now what has happened? He has been in office, what, a couple of months? He is already backtracking. A sham hearing is already being conducted at the National Energy Board. We are going to have an export gas pipeline to the United States and we are going to lose that Canadian gas. Does it not make sense to keep that gas? We are cheating ourselves and future generations if we continue to export natural gas rather than use the gas we have for substitution and to supply eastern Canada or my area of the country, Vancouver Island. That makes sense as a policy.

● (1630)

I should like to quote the Western Canadian Lumber Worker, a publication from my area. The editorial puts it rather well. It reads:

—Tories have absolutely no policy differences. They both act precisely the same when in power, and merely go through the motions of criticizing each other's policies when in opposition.

I want to say briefly what the NDP would do in this matter. With regard to gas, we reject the Liberal and Conservative policies of increasing natural gas exports as being shortsighted. We would extend the reversible gas pipeline to Quebec and to the Atlantic provinces. We would encourage substitution—

Mr. Lalonde: You are reading a Liberal speech.

Mr. Waddell: Instead of exporting gas we would set up a national gas bank—I challenge the minister to do that—and use that gas later on for Canadians. On oil, we would not go for an artificial target of OPEC prices which the Conservatives and, to some extent, the Liberals are prepared to accept. That leads to large profits for multinationals, it is used to buy back more of our country, and it concentrates the wealth in one province.

We tried to be honest with the Canadian people during the election. We agree that there will be some rise in the price of oil to achieve certain social objectives, but we would not tie it to the OPEC price and we would put it in response to three fundamental priciples. The first one is that not one cent of that money would be taken out of Canadian taxpayers' profits and given back to the oil companies. Second, the lion's share of the money would go to the federal government to be distributed across Canada, and it would be distributed equitably throughout the country. The Premier of Saskatchewan has put forward some of these proposals and has taken a rather statesmanlike attitude. The third principle is that there be no oil price increase without tax cuts to put money back in the pockets of ordinary Canadians. Those are the principles on which we will formulate our oil-pricing policy in subsequent debates.

With respect to Petro-Canada, we would expand it from coast to coast. We would make sure that when Canadians put gas in their car, that money goes back to Canada. We would move Petro-Canada to take over one of the major oil companies in this country so that Petro-Canada would expand and we would really have some control in the Canadian industry.

Canadians must decide whether they want to go nowhere with the Conservatives, whether they want to flounder a little with the Liberals, or whether they want to come with us and really have a made-in-Canada energy policy, and they must act now.

An hon. Member: And really be taken for a ride.

Mr. Waddell: My friend says "And really be taken for a ride." Let him consider that if we do not get control of our oil industry now for Canadians, if we do not do that in the next four or five years we will lose it entirely.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Can the hon. member explain to me what makes multinational oil companies uniquely different from the multinational automobile industry in southern Ontario, specifically Chrysler, which that party supports? Because the industry belongs primarily to two or three western provinces, why is it somehow a diminishing industry to be thumbed down while that party wants to support other multinationals? I should like to know the unique difference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has the option of answering the question if he so chooses, but I will have to take it out of his time.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I prefer to complete my speech. I think it is a rather ignorant question, if I might say so. We want the automobile industry to work for Canadians, just as we want the oil industry to work for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Let me conclude my remarks by making one quick reference to alternate energy. We have heard nothing in this House from the government, in spite of the remarks today by the minister, on alternate energy or on conservation. We have already raised in this House the matter of urban transit and the matter of solar and alternate energy. We are going to raise the matter, and we have mentioned it, of local groups and neighbourhoods conserving energy. All that makes sense.

Let me conclude by quoting, on another level, the words of Aleksander Solzhenitsyn, from his "Letter to the Soviet Leaders", and my friend, the hon. member from Calgary will like this. Solzhenitsyn said:

—what any village graybeard in the Ukraine or Russia had understood from time immemorial and could have explained to the progressive commentators ages ago, had the commentators ever found the time in that dizzy fever of theirs to consult him: that a dozen worms can't go on and on gnawing the same apple forever, that if the earth is a finite object, then its expanses and resources are finite also, and the endless, infinite progress dinned into our heads by the dreamers of the Enlightenment cannot be accomplished on it.

We have squandered our resources foolishly without so much as a backward glance, sapped our soil, mutilated our vast expanses with idiotic "inland seas" and contaminated belts of wasteland around our industrial centres—but for the moment, at least, far more still remains untainted by us, which we haven't had time to touch. So let us come to our senses in time, let us change our course!

We are being asked how much energy it takes to run the industrial machine, where does the energy come from and where is the machine going, and what happens to the people who live in the path of the machine. I think we stand on the leading edge of history, driven by forces which require greater and greater use of energy and greater and greater consumption of dwindling resources. Can we change direction? I think that upon the answer to that question depends the future of the world we know, of our environment and of our country.

As I have said today, and as speakers for my party will after me, I think these are some positive and Canadian solutions to this energy problem which faces us in this country today.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate passed Bill S-4, an act to amend the Department of Labour Act, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO FORMULATE HONEST AND EFFECTIVE ENERGY POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jarvis:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to formulate an honest and effective energy policy.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is a matter of procedure. Is it not the practice in the House that we alternate between opposition and government members in debate, and should not a member from our side be recognized at this time?

Mr. Knowles: No; the debate started on this side.

An hon. Member: Can't you count?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The matter is one to which I gave some consideration when taking the chair today. It is an opposition motion which is being debated today. It was my view that the appropriate alternating sequence of members would be, first, the hon. member who spoke for the opposition, followed by the minister, followed by a speaker representing the NDP; and from here on in the order of speakers would follow the ordinary practice during government orders.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. This is an opposition day and the practice has been, when it has been our motion, to give the weight of any choice to this side. I suggested to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) last night the proportion of two here for every three speakers there. That seemed to be agreeable to him at the time.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. We would not agree to this.

An hon. Member: The minister is leaving the House.

Mr. Lalonde: Some of my colleagues have noticed that I was leaving the House—at least it proves they are awake. I want to tell them that I must leave to meet with my provincial colleagues, the minister from Saskatchewan and the minister from Manitoba. I think it is very important that we have those consultations with the provinces which were so absent during the time when the party opposite formed the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: In the meantime, the parliamentary secretary will be in the House to speak for the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. The Chair is of the impression, on the point of order raised with respect to the rotation of speakers, that the matter was agreeable to all members. We would alternate from one side to the other as is done under government orders, with the third or fourth opportunity being given to members of the NDP. If that impression is incorrect, perhaps I can receive some instructions from hon. members.

Before we do that, may I announce the proceedings on the adjournment motion for this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Finance—Aid to Sydney Steel and Michelin Tire; The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie)—Energy—Protection of lower-income groups from severe price increases; The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Alleged illegalities committed by members of force.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO FORMULATE HONEST AND EFFECTIVE ENERGY POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jarvis:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to formulate an honest and effective energy policy.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to intervene. I was in the lobby and was not following the course of the debate. I understand that there has been some discussion about the speaking order. While I was not privy to the actual agreement, I understand that the implication was that, since this is an allotted day, the opposition would have more speakers than the government and that the usual rules of alternation would be suspended. If that is suitable to all hon. members, the parliamentary secretary and the minister, I think we should proceed on that basis. I think perhaps we were talking about three Conservatives, two Liberals and one NDP—in that order. That is fine with the government side, if it is agreeable to hon. members.

● (1640)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is agreeable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Then I will take that as agreed. I did not recognize the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) because I thought he was rising in debate rather than on a point of order.

Mr. Andre: That is correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Whichever it may be, I now recognize the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks, I must comment on the remarks of the spokesman for the New Democratic Party in regard to multinationals. I compliment the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) in observing the point. I suspect that if he was looking for a rule, the multinationals that one does not criticize in the NDP are the ones that Dennis McDermott likes.

Mr. Rae: That is a good point, Harvie.

Miss Jewett: Was that a point?

Mr. Andre: Also I suggest that if the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) re-examines what the Premier of Saskatchewan has been saying about oil pricing and revenues, he would be less quick to insist that the New Democratic Party is united. The Premier of Saskatchewan is every bit as vigorous although much more skilful at hiding than the Premier of Alberta.

I should like to commence my remarks with a quotation from a newspaper article which appeared on May 1 in the Calgary Herald. It reads as follows:

> Lack of credibility at the political level is costing this country dearly according to the president of the C.D. Howe Institute. Carl Beigie told a Calgary Chamber of Commerce luncheon on Wednesday that the world will survive the Iranian crisis and Canada will survive the Quebec referendum. But, he said, Canada won't survive for long under the current "deterioration of government credibility". The prime example of this breakdown, he said, is Ottawa's energy pricing policy.

That statement was not made by a Progressive Conservative partisan. It was not made by an oil company executive. It was not made by an Alberta politician or even a resident of Alberta or western Canada. That statement was made by a resident of Montreal, the president of the non-partisan, Montreal-based C.D. Howe Research Institute. He said that the biggest threat to Canada is not the Quebec referendum but this government, particularly this government's energy-pricing policy.

An hon. Member: He is an American.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), who did not have the courtesy to hang around, proved what we had to say about honesty in that fatuous and false excuse he gave for leaving. He started his remarks by saying that we have nerve to raise this issue, that this party has nerve to raise this issue. I would suggest that he has colossal gall to sit there and suggest that what they have been doing and saying is anything else but totally destructive to the country, as evidenced by a research institute in his own backyard. In the view of the C.D. Howe Institute, this government's energy pricing policy is simply incredible, lacking any credibility whatsoever. Also, it is totally dishonest.

A friend of mine who happened to be in Germany shortly after the recent election, told me about an editorial which he read in a German newspaper. It described Canada's reaction to the 18-cent a gallon excise tax as resembling that of a central American banana republic. In other words, to Europeans the energy-pricing policies as articulated by the Liberal party are the subject of ridicule, equivalent to those that one would expect of a banana republic. Yet we have this government apparently feeling proud to be compared with a banana republic.

In the Speech from the Throne, in the mini-budget and repeatedly in the House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated that the one decision they have taken is that they will not increase the excise tax by 18 cents a gallon this year, as if somehow this negative decision required some great act of courage and would be so helpful to this nation. Somehow behaving like a central American banana republic is a marvellous thing to this group, however embarrassing it is for the rest of the world to view us as a banana republic because of the positions taken by the Liberal government, the tired old Liberal government.

The most serious criticism that could be made is the fundamental dishonesty of what the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have been saying. They claimed repeatedly and erroneously that they are saving the consumers of Canada billions of dollars. What consumers are they talking about? What are they really saying? Are they really saving consumers anything?

Consistent with their dishonest approach, the government failed to recognize that the budget of December 11 provided an energy tax credit for those persons earning less than $20,000 a year. If one does not own a car because one is too poor, is a senior citizen or a student, obviously one would not pay that 18 cents a gallon excise tax, but one would still receive the energy tax credit. If one owned a car and earned less than $20,000 a year, the energy tax credit provided the equivalent of 24,000 tax free miles per year.

Thus, the position of the government on this 18-cent excise tax is to save the consumer who owns and drives a car and earns more than $20,000 a year. That is their position, but in the process they are penalizing those people who earn less than $20,000 a year and those who do not own cars. For example, they are penalizing senior citizens who use heating oil and have to keep the temperature up because of their age and, perhaps most of all, the student who does not own a car but will be saddled with the debt the government is incurring on his behalf.

Mr. Beigie of the C.D. Howe Institute stated in Calgary on april 30 the following:

> We are leaving a very unattractive legacy to the children. We are borrowing from the future as a nation rather than investing in it.

Therefore, at best the government is shielding a select and generally well-off portion of Canadian consumers of petroleum products. That is at best, but even they might not be getting the protection the government claims. The government indicated that crude oil increases will be less than what we proposed in our budget. To rationalize that, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a couple of weeks ago sent out his officials with a totally fallacious, dishonest analysis of the energy-pricing agreement which the government had reached with the province of Alberta. Fortunately and not surprisingly, the press interpreted it for what it was—a sham, a shell game, a totally dishonest attempt to misrepresent what in fact had happened. They are trying to justify price increases considerably in excess of what had been decided by the previous Conservative government.

In his mini-budget, the Minister of Finance said that their blended pricing system, this magic made-in-Canada system, will result in $1 billion less expenditures through the import subsidy program.

Mr. Evans: That is a misquote.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member can read it; it is in his statement.

Mr. Jarvis: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Andre: He said that there is $1 billion less. Does Mr. Speaker know what that translates into? It is at least a $2 a barrel increase. On Tuesday night in Toronto the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources thought that $2 per year for the industry was fine. If we just combine those two, we are already at a $4 per barrel increase this year. That is contrary to every promise made by that group over there, including the Prime Minister, during the election campaign.

That does not take into account the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on April 16 in the House when he stated that they intended to collect from any oil-pricing agreement as much revenue as the previous government would have received from the budget of December 11. That means there will have to be an additional price increase this year of between $1 and $4 depending on whether or not the excise tax is included.

To honour the statements made by this government so far, it will require an increase in crude oil this year of between $5 and $9 a barrel, or twice as much as was provided for in the December 11 budget. That is a total contradiction of what this government pledged during the campaign. Remember, none of these figures takes into account any extra revenue for industry or any extra revenue for the government of Alberta. This does not take into account the position of the government of Alberta or the government of Saskatchewan, that they expect as much revenue out of the future pricing agreement as was provided for in the last budget.

What does that mean? Quite simply it means that if the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources were telling the truth to the House and to the country, then what can be expected out of an oil-pricing agreement for Canada is that the consumers of gasoline will be faced with price hikes at least as high—perhaps a penny or two less—as those which would have been provided by the December 11 budget. But what is truly shocking is that users of heating oil will be faced with much higher increases than provided under the December 11 budget, and there is no provision for tax credits for those who do not have a car.

The hon. member over there must have a giant V-8 that he is worried about filling up. How about worrying a little bit about the senior citizen who does not have a car but uses heating oil to heat his home? How about worrying a little bit about him?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: In order to protect those earning more than $20,000 a year driving V-8 cars, like my friend over there, we will have a pricing scheme that is going to affect everybody, the senior citizens and the students without cars, along with those with low incomes and so on.

I reiterate, this will occur only if the minister of energy and the Minister of Finance were telling the truth in explaining to the House what they expect under the oil price agreement; and, of course, that is always a dangerous assumption to make.

How about this new blended price system? The minister of energy says it will give us a made-in-Canada price. I am sure we all saw that quote: You mix a little bit of x, y and z then you take an "ah-oh".

An hon. Member: Maybe the minister understands it and that is the problem.

Mr. Andre: The first thing to note, Mr. Speaker, is that this made-in-Canada price will mean that from its implementation, as soon as we have this made-in-Canada price, the price in Canada will increase immediately when OPEC prices increase. That is what will happen when this made-in-Canada price comes in. This so-called made-in-Canada price means the Government of Canada is going to get out of the responsibility for oil prices in this country. It is a cop-out. Why did the government adopt this scheme? I suggest it was for just that reason. I know the source of that scheme. I know where it came from. It was sold to this government. The government says: "Look, this is great, we put in this blended price system and if OPEC prices go up we just pass it along to the consumer and we do not take the blame. We can blame the Arabs."

This made-in-Canada price means the Government of Canada no longer takes responsibility for oil price increases in Canada. I know who passed this idea on to that great committee that made the decision over the Christmas holidays. Where did they get it from? This blended price, this made-in-Canada price, is precisely what was in effect in the United States in 1971. This blended price is what the Americans put in place in 1971.

What was the experience in the United States with this blended pricing system? It was a complete and utter disaster. After six or seven years of experience with this blended pricing system, the United States, about a year and a half ago, abandoned it because it found that it created chaos, confusion and required a bureaucracy of over 4,000 civil servants to administer. Let me read what the U.S. comptroller-general said, and I quote:

> The cost is higher consumption, lower domestic production and higher imports. The program is complex, subject to fraud and manipulation and often administered ineptly.

That is what he said about this blended price, made-in-Canada, and stolen from the United States program.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, this government, this tired, old, dishonest bunch, would have the Canadian public believe that it will produce a made-in-Canada crude oil price by introducing a blended pricing scheme which the United States employed for six or seven years and has recently discarded because it was a disaster as an energy pricing policy. It makes one want to weep. Small wonder that the C.D. Howe Institute in Montreal concludes that this government's energy-pricing policies are the greatest threat facing Canada today.

Aside from the dishonesty of this energy-pricing statement, the most damning criticism, and the real tragedy and the neglect and dishonesty of this minister, is that every single observer of the international energy situation has reached the conclusion that the real problem facing the world is not the price of oil, but will there be enough oil. Within two or three years the Soviet Union, the largest producer of crude oil in the world, will be a net importer of oil. This will mean that all of eastern Europe will be making demands on the same production the west is now making demands on, and there is not enough to satisfy our needs. No one but a raving maniac would suggest that international supplies of crude oil will remain readily available. In the face of that kind of world picture, it is clearly insanity for any nation to pursue policies that will increase our dependency on international supplies of oil. Yet that is precisely what the Government of Canada is doing.

By moving to this blended pricing scheme the government is adopting a scheme that leads to lower levels of domestic production and higher levels of imports. This is a scheme which exacerbates our already serious balance of payments problems, causing pressure on the dollar with resulting high interest rates and/or high inflation, which means that billions of Canadian dollars, instead of being ploughed back into the Canadian economy, will end up in the already overloaded coffers of middle eastern sheikhs. In the words of Marshall Crowe, a former adviser to the Liberal government and former chairman of the National Energy Board, we will end up with the worst of both worlds; high priced and scarce oil.

This government, instead of encouraging and promoting the development of new tar sands and heavy oil plants, has unilaterally acted to revoke a contract with Syncrude, producing at best only one year's delay at a cost of $2 billion to Canada, but perhaps causing the shelving of any other plans, certainly the delaying of any other plans for future Syncrude and heavy oil plants.

I am completely and continually amazed that this government has not worked out the simple fact that three tar sands of heavy oil plants would make this country self-sufficient. Furthermore, if we had them the money we would save would not be sent to the Middle East but would pay for those plants in three years. The NDP would rather send it to the Middle East because it might be some foreign owned company that would build them. They would sooner send it to the Middle East and let the sheikhs have it than build the plants in Alberta.

The real tragedy is the opportunity we are missing. Money spent here in Canada creates jobs here in Canada. We can continue the policy of this government relying on offshore supplies, relying on the Middle East, Mexico and Venezuela, or we can decide to become self-sufficient. That will cost a lot of money. It will mean tremendous changes in cash flows and distribution in this country, but that will have to be addressed. Again quoting Marshall Crowe:

> The problem for Canada could be to decide what to do with its potential surplus rather than the problem of finding the foreign exchange to buy increasingly scarce oil from abroad.

In closing, I would like to make a plea to this government. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is behaving like the minister responsible for DREE. He says he wants to equalize things, forgetting entirely that he is the only minister in this government who has the responsibility for understanding that Canada has supplies of energy. What does it matter if we all share the shortages? What does it matter if we have some scheme in Canada for sharing the shortages when in fact we could and should have all the oil produced in this country to satisfy our needs, to be self-sufficient and to be unique in the world in that regard? My plea to the government is, stop this stupidity, stop fighting with the producing provinces, stop fighting with these bogeymen, the multinational oil companies, and get on with the job of making the country self-sufficient.

Then we can truly have a made-in-Canada oil price because we will not have to rely on the rest of the world. Then we can address the question and make sure that Canadians share equitably in the revenues generated by the tremendously healthy economy at that point of time. Let us do that, but for goodness sake let us get our priorities straight.

As every sensible and sane observer in the international community knows—I am not talking about partisan politicians or oil company executives but about the independent groups—our supply will not last. An MIT study of three years ago shows we face a crisis perhaps within the next two or three years, certainly no later than 1985. Yet the government is saying that the important question is 18 cents a gallon for car drivers earning more than $20,000 a year, that the important question is whether or not it can beat the producing provinces into submission or whether or not PetroCan will dig the holes or do something else. Those are not the important questions. The important question is: Will we have enough energy to heat our homes and drive our cars, no matter what the cost? That is the question and it is about time we had a minister of energy who will address himself to it.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the rhetoric of the two previous speakers has led me to think that we are back prior to February 18, engaged once again in hearing the same cant which we heard from the Conservative party and to some degree from the New Democratic Party during the campaign. What is equally evident, however, is that the House is conscious that Canada is part of a world faced with serious disequilibrium between supply and demand for oil.

Security of oil supply has become a major international problem. The fear about the security of supply, as much as lack of supply, leads to higher oil prices. There was no oil shortage in 1979, yet the fear of one led companies and governments to stockpile, driving prices up. Indeed, the price of oil rose in 1979 in relative terms on the same scale that it did during the Arab oil embargo of 1973-74. Massive price increases in such an essential commodity as oil have, of course, substantial adverse economic effects. They increase the rate of inflation, decreasing the rate of world economic growth.

Canada is naturally not immune from that world reality. As a major trading country our own economic well-being depends on the economic health of the rest of the world. But Canada fortunately is in a unique situation. We are a net exporter of energy. We are a country rich in many natural resources and rich in people who know how to use those resources. Provincial public utilities have an outstanding track record in hydroelectricity and thermal generation of electricity, including nuclear. In the Canadian nuclear power system, for example, we have one of the most efficient and safest systems in the world. In non-conventional oil extraction, Canada has recently become a world leader.

However, these opportunities also confront us with many challenges. We are intent on making sure that our natural resources are used for the benefit of all Canadians and of the Canadian economy. We must be certain that we have increased energy supplies at prices people can afford. That is why we as a government will not tie ourselves to international prices, as the minister has repeatedly pointed out.

We are committed to the principle that all Canadians must benefit from our energy opportunities. Producing provinces have a clear entitlement to their natural resources. We undertake that they will get a fair return. But we are also committed to the principle that the federal government must have sufficient revenue to allow it to carry out its basic responsibilities of economic stabilization across our whole country. We are confident that all Canadians share the basic objective that energy will be used toward an equitable distribution of income.

We are confident, too, that the negotiations on oil pricing with Alberta will do nothing to affect adversely the principles of equalization and central management of our national economy. The petroleum industry in Canada has benefited enormously from higher oil prices. There is a broad consensus that the industry cash flow would have been enough had domestic oil prices risen only $2 a year. There is a real danger that too great a cash flow could result in bidding up the cost of production, increasing company takeovers and diversifying oil companies into other areas of economic activity.

Our policies will accordingly address the real possibility of excess concentration, as well as the degree of foreign control in our petroleum industry. The former Liberal government ensured that foreign ownership was reduced in that industry from 91 per cent to 75 per cent. This government will ensure that that total is further reduced to 50 per cent.

We in Canada are blessed with a variety of energy resources within our borders in addition to oil and natural gas. There is the tar sands, coal, uranium, hydroelectric capacity and so on. Accordingly, it would be shortsighted to allow our debate today to be dominated by the question of oil pricing.

While the energy problem may have arisen largely due to external factors, we believe that the remedies are within our own grasp. Regardless of what price is established for oil and gas on a domestic or international stage, we face now the fact of increased cost and difficulty in exploiting our non-renewable resources and, concurrently, the development of new sources of renewable energy.

It is that subject to which I should like to turn now. In order to facilitate the transition to alternative energy forms, this government is acting now to ensure a secure future for Canadians. At the same time, we have a responsibility to minimize social dislocation and adverse environmental impact.

I should like to say something about what we must do to increase the efficiency with which we use energy in order to reduce the rate of growth of our energy consumption. I want also to set forth some alternative sources of energy which we as a government are sponsoring.

First, what have we done and what may be done to foster conservation? Although there is likely to be an increased number of private vehicles on the roads of Canada in the near future, we can hold gasoline consumption stable by implementing fleet average performance standards for vehicles sold in Canada and encourage greater public use of mass transit, which would progressively lead to more efficient use of fuel. Another obvious conservation measure is insulation, whereby energy consumption in residences can be improved by an average of 37 per cent. CHIP, the Canadian Home Insulation Program established by the government in 1977, has already committed over $1 billion to this goal over the next seven years. Much, however, remains to be done to improve upon the insulation standards governing the construction of new residential units.

Our current practices in heating are wasteful in the extreme. With an oil-fired furnace, for example, we can reduce consumption by some 20 per cent through relatively simple means. Similar savings can be found in commercial and industrial buildings. Through design innovation and by replacing primary energy with waste energy, industry is becoming more secure and more competitive.

The government has shown leadership with a wide variety of programs directed toward this end. I am happy to report that we are working with private industry in demonstrating the various possibilities of conserving energy. The voluntary task forces of businessmen have already made major progress in this area. To demonstrate better the depth of our commitment, the federal government has embarked upon major internal programs for conservation which have already saved some $50 million annually.

Through other programs, our government funds district heating feasibility studies which estimate that a large central furnace burning conventional fuels can achieve an efficiency quotient of about 85 per cent, against much smaller ranges available for standard furnaces. The central heating sources would be particularly suitable for demonstrating the substitution of municipal and wood waste. In this case we would happily avoid the cost and environmental impact of garbage landfills.

I have, through this brief selective survey, indicated our commitment to energy conservation. But second, and of equal importance, we shall take the opportunity to supply up to 10 per cent of our energy requirements from unconventional renewable energy. Most of this will come from the use of wood waste already accumulated in our forest industry. Wind and tidal energy are long-range potentials, but closer to realization are solar and biomass.

The federal government has a major role to play in developing solar, biomass, and nuclear energy. It undertakes long-term, high-risk developments which cannot be expected to be supported solely by the private sector. It also supplements work in this area by the provinces. As early as 1974, we established an interdepartmental task force, which evolved into an energy R and D panel, which apportions funds in relevant areas. Three-quarters of the total money sustaining the work in renewable energy, which was $21 million in the current fiscal year, comes through this panel. If we include expenditures of provincial governments and of private industries, the total swells to $35 million for renewable energy.

The National Research Council has taken a vigorous, effective lead in supporting, both within its own resources and in the private sector, new ventures in solar, tidal and wind energy. Much of this funding is contracted out to the private sector, with the National Research Council continuing to act as agent and scientific authority.

The heating of domestic water with solar energy is already cost-effective in Atlantic Canada. We have been active in promoting solar research and development through PASEM—a Program of Assistance to Solar Energy Manufacturers, and PUSH, the Purchase and Use of Solar Heating program. With the provinces, we have begun to demonstrate through these two programs the practicalities of solar energy.

With regard to biomass, Canada's vast forest and agricultural resources could, in theory, provide a huge amount of methanol annually. To equate this to current gasoline consumption, methanol could substitute for about 75 per cent of demand. Converting wood to gas is, however, still in its technological infancy, but we are working to establish its reliability and economy. Ethanol, from low grade wheat and other grains, is simple to produce but is currently economically unattractive. Our government has, therefore, created some $150 million in loan guarantees to assist in establishing electrical facilities using biomass as the energy source.

Finally, we have in Canada a nuclear industry with a product, the Candu reactor, of which we can all be proud. Here we have a high technology, indigenous Canadian industry which employs, directly and indirectly, some 85,000 Canadians. In a country which unfortunately lags behind its industrial competitors in much R and D, in a country where much of the industrial sector is passive branch plants, the Canadian nuclear industry is almost unique.

Nobel Laureat Albrecht Bethe said of the "technical wonder", the Candu reactor:

> Not only is it very conservative in fuel usage, but it works with a regularity and reliability that are absolutely fantastic.

Compared with their major competitor coal, nuclear reactors are quiet, clean and reliable. They produce no smoke, no dust, no acid rain, no ash. Given the grave implications of the acid rain problem, we must use less harmful energy sources, and I include nuclear power as one.

Our energy strategy, then, is a multi-faceted one. We shall approach the time when there is a need to provide greater co-ordination of all these efforts which build bridges to a secure and prosperous future.

The problem, as I see it, in the area of renewable energy is twofold. First, how do we provide a public focus for these many activities currently under way? Second, how may we overcome the natural reluctance of lending institutions to finance new and risky technologies?

One approach, as the minister mentioned today, is the establishment of an alternative energy corporation, able to underwrite demonstration and commercial ventures of private companies by financial and technical assistance. It can undertake alternative energy projects, from the research stage through to commercial production. An alternative energy corporation will, in the public interest, share with private entrepreneurs the risks and benefits. It will, in addition, ensure that Canadians are protected from more mature foreign competitors. Initially, Petro-Canada, our own creation, will foster this fledgling corporation until it is old enough to go it alone.

I have covered a number of areas regarding conservation and renewable energy sources. Other speakers on this side of the House will deal with other questions, including the expansion of our national oil corporation, Petro-Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to underline the exciting possibilities to which the minister drew attention—possibilities which can ensure all Canadians a stable and prosperous future.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on the motion presented by my colleagues condemning the government's failure to formulate an honest and effective energy policy. Let me say immediately that I support the motion and I agree wholeheartedly with both its letter and its spirit: the government has been both dishonest and ineffective in energy policy.

I intend to address my remarks today primarily to consumers across Canada and wish to consider how the government's failure affects these Canadians. Today, for Canadian consumers the price of energy is a vital issue. Consumers responsible for home heating costs and the cost of electricity face a perilous and potentially disastrous future in terms of matching their personal incomes to their expenditures for essential goods and services.

Their plight is compounded if they are also commuters required to travel by automobile to their employment. Those who live in the colder regions of Canada, the air conditioned city centres or those in areas where electrical generation is oil fueled, face special problems. They all stand on the brink of financial disaster. Was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) addressing Canadian energy consumers when he said: Welcome to the eighties?

Let us examine the great body of Canadians who are often referred to as "consumers". This group includes all 24 million Canadians in one sense, but there are some who buy more goods, supplies and services than others. In total number there are over 18 million in the adult Canadian group.

Let us take home owners, the group that would have been insulated against increasing costs for mortgage interest and municipal property taxes. Our mortgage interest and tax rebate program would have resulted in annual income tax savings of as much as $1,500 for these taxpayers. Now, those with mortgages face expense increases as high as $200 per month on loans in the $50,000 range without any help from the government.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) says there is no problem. Home owners, he says, can afford a drastic increase in interest rates. He says over 340,000 home owners who will be forced to pay increased interest rates will use only 30 per cent of their income for their monthly payment. That is no problem: they can cut back on luxury items like meat and potatoes. He says those 7,000 to 10,000 Canadians who are not disqualified by this cruel means test will be helped. He has not said how or when, so we must await the presentation of this limited assistance plan. In the meantime, some may lose their homes through foreclosures and the plan may never come about.

Mr. Speaker, there are 4.4 million occupant-owned homes in Canada. Many of those home owners face, or will face, increases in mortgage payments and property taxes in addition to substantial increases in normal household expenses. Of the seven-million-plus Canadian dwellings, 62 per cent are owned by the occupant. But those home owners—those elite Canadians, as the Prime Minister calls them—those rich people who can afford to bear cost increases according to the Deputy Prime Minister, are not the only ones who will suffer. Every Canadian family living in rented premises, and there are three million of them, faces the same kind of cost escalation, although not always directly in the form of interest rate and tax increases.

But hon. members can be certain that every interest payment, tax or utility charge increase will be recovered from the tenants. All seven million Canadian householders face the same interest, tax and household expense squeeze one way or another without help from the government. Their situation is now compounded because they have to face the energy problem. Seven million households are now being hit by the international energy crisis, and the government has no protection for them. The government has no policy to help them. That is why my colleagues condemn the government. The government has no policy on energy.

But the situation is worse than I have already indicated. Those seven million Canadian householders must participate in society and must work. By Canadian standards, they are entitled to recreation. But for many, the only method of transport is the private motor car. There again, Canadians face gloom and doom. The price of gas will rise. We ask, by how much? Not by as much as the PC government would have increased the price, says the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). How much is that? That depends, he is not sure, or so he says.

I am sure that, like death and taxes, gas price increases are inevitable. Gas prices will rise whether by way of an excise tax increase, a new wellhead price per barrel, a made-in-Canada price system, or any other formula. The most the government intends to do is to make the increase one or two pennies less than the gas price we announced last December. The government is only doing that so it will not be laughed at or scoffed out of office. The government does not intend to preserve the purity of the Liberal party promise not to increase the price of gasoline, only the technical words.

But what of the spirit of the promise? What of the Liberal party's vow to protect Canadians from the whims of the Ayotollah Khomeini? These people are lost in a sea of verbal rhetoric and mathematical mischief, deceit and dishonesty. Who are the victims? They are the ten million registered car owners in Canada, many of whom expected to pay much less for gas, not almost the same or even more, under a Liberal government.

We talk of consumer revolt. People are fed up with price increases. They naturally react favourably to promises to hold the line, to stabilize the price of gasoline, fuel oil and other forms of energy. The NDP spouted their usual rash promises of no price increases, lots of exploration and development without charge or sacrifice. But the NDP does not fool knowledgeable Canadians.

But Canadians were deceived by this government. There is no policy for price stability. There is no help. And, worst of all, there is no government respect for our seven million Canadian householders, our ten million car owners; that is to say, our Canadian consumers. If these people revolted, no army in creation could stop their advance. But fortunately for the government, Canadians are not like that. They are both peaceful and patient. They have been cruelly deceived. They face an uncertain increase in gas prices and fuel oil. They do not know the cost of energy, but they will wait until a policy or some kind of plan is formed.

What can Canadian consumers expect? Canadians must recognize the problems that face our nation in the energy field. We have a double-barrelled concern in Canada, namely supply and price. We can produce and purchase all kinds of energy at world prices, but that would adversely affect our whole economy. Yet if we continue to utilize our oil resources at current rates without provision for exploration and development of alternate energy resources, we will very soon run out of cheap Canadian energy. We will be left high and dry and dependent upon the whims of foreign nations and international oil dealers.

There is only one answer, and everyone in this House knows it. As a national policy we must establish energy self-sufficiency in Canada. We must formulate a plan to achieve self-sufficiency. Naturally such a policy and plan has a price tag. We presented just such a plan. Many consumers thought that the price was too high. I, for one, accept that verdict. But what can we do?

First, let us consider the problem in relation to gasoline used for transportation. I consider that the government should be concerned about the plight of the commuter, the person who must travel by private car to his or her employment. It is also reasonable to make provision for necessary incidental travel for those in urban areas not served by public transportation, and for those in rural areas. Many consumers in this category would be expected to travel 12,000 to 15,000 miles a year. With a price of $1.20 per gallon and allowing 20 miles per gallon, the yearly gas supply would approximate $720. A 10-cent per gallon increase adds another $60 or more to the annual cost of transportation. Under the government's proposal, we can expect an annual increase of at least $200 for commuting consumers.

Can this increase be absorbed by them? I have serious doubts that the commuting consumer whose family income is in the $20,000 range has the income to cover this cost increase. Some provision must be made for financial assistance. We provided exactly that kind of assistance with our energy tax rebate.

A family of five would have received a rebate of approximately $250. Has the Minister of Finance made such a provision for rebate or for equivalent assistance? No, there is no help on the way. The government is content with keeping the increase one or two pennies below the price that we proposed. This is not much of a deal for consumers.

Let us look at the plight of those home owners or renters who are responsible for home heating costs. In Canada we have become used to a standard that has developed over the years which has allowed us to heat our homes to certain temperatures with a certain consumption of oil or gas, or whatever is used to heat the home. This past standard has to be reviewed in the light of current problems. Energy conserved is money saved.

Does the government become realistic with the people and tell them what the situation is? Does the government encourage people in this way or does it lead them on into thinking that they can go on and on using energy without a policy of conservation? It is true that an insulation program was instituted, but that was only a drop in a bucket compared to running a home at a temperature of 75 or 80 degrees fahrenheit. The government has to deal with these problems.

Cost has become a real concern to home owners. The cost of heating a home with approximately 1,200 square feet, say a bungalow in eastern Canada, is in the vicinity of $850 a year. Home owners can expect this cost to increase by approximately 20 per cent, which is nearly $200. How is the home owner going to absorb that cost without any assistance if his income is less than $20,000? I do not believe he can, and I believe that the government must provide a program to assist that home owner.

We must remember that home heating costs affect groups of citizens. It is not, as the Prime Minister indicated in the past, that home owners are rich people. We have senior citizens, couples on old age assistance, who are trying to maintain themselves in their own homes. We have young families bearing all the cost of educating and clothing their children. They face these dramatic increases in cost too.

It is not realistic to think that these people can survive without some assistance from government. The Prime Minister and his ministers have said many times that they do not expect to ride on the backs of the poor, that they are not going to charge the increases in the cost of energy to the poor people in Canada. But they have provided no provision for subsidy. They have provided no program and no plan. I think it is improper. I think a plan has to be prepared.

Where will the money come from for a program of assistance to home owners in the lower income provinces? In Canada we spend over $2 billion a year subsidizing the importation of foreign oil. Much of this foreign oil is refined into gasoline for use in motor vehicles across Canada. Some of these cars with large engines use excessive amounts of gasoline, yet we subsidize them along with gas used in cars of lesser power with more economical engines. This is a terrible waste of funds. Then, too, we have all heard about border sales as a result of which subsidized gasoline is carried away across the border, again at tremendous cost to the Canadian taxpayers. There are many ways in which the system could be tightened so as to reduce the amount of money spent on subsidizing foreign oil imports. This money could be channeled into assistance required by home owners.

Let us talk for a moment about alternate supplies of energy because this is the long-term solution to the problem of the Canadian home owner-consumer in terms of the price of energy. Our program provided for funds to be rechanneled into vital energy projects thus reducing dependence, particularly in eastern Canada, upon imported oil.

Since the Liberal government was returned to office, all the programs that were vital to eastern Canada, particularly to Nova Scotia, have been stalled. The Donkin coal mine project which would have produced millions of tons of energy to replace foreign oil is adrift. Nothing is being done. The government has done nothing to speed up the extension of the natural gas pipeline eastward. The matter is presently before the National Energy Board and some interest has been expressed in its extension, but there are many things the government could do to advance this vital and important project. While there is afoot a project involving the Annapolis River, much research remains to be done in the development of tidal power in the Bay of Fundy. All these projects, including things like solar energy mentioned by the parliamentary secretary, are vitally important to the long-range effect on consumers because they are the method by which we can reduce dependency on foreign oil and thus reduce the cost of energy to consumers, particularly in eastern Canada.

Let me speak for a moment on the special energy needs of eastern Canada. In many of the eastern provinces, particularly Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, 70 per cent of the electrical generation is dependent on foreign oil. Consumers in Nova Scotia pay twice the national price for energy. The Crosbie budget provided a subsidy which would have permitted the provincially-owned utility in Nova Scotia to maintain the price of energy notwithstanding any increases in the price of oil. This government has refused to commit itself to providing a similar subsidy. Indeed, in Halifax the other day the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said such a subsidy was dependent upon the negotiation of a price for western Canadian oil. Nova Scotians are left to wonder what will happen when that price is negotiated. They will be left to wonder whether they will again face horrendous increases in the price of electrical energy at the consumer and household level.

I believe the government should observe and recognize an average price for electrical energy across Canada. It is such an important and essential service in the home that the government ought to assist people in areas of Canada where the cost of electrical energy is greatly in excess of the price paid by those in other parts of the country. This is exactly what our subsidy would have provided to people in eastern Canada, particularly in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. It would have allowed the utilities in Nova Scotia to maintain the price of energy at 1980 levels notwithstanding increases in the price of oil.

To add insult to injury, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has refused to return to Nova Scotia the $80 million the Government of Canada has saved by virtue of Nova Scotia's coal displacement program. This sum might have been used to subsidize any increases in electrical energy prices resulting from oil price increases. Under that coal displacement program, coal was being used from the development of coal resources to fire thermal generation plants thereby displacing foreign crude oil. This resulted in a saving of about $80 million in the funds used to subsidize the importation of foreign crude oil. The decision taken by the government would not appear to be fair. This money should be returned to Nova Scotia to finance further projects which will result in the displacement of foreign crude oil by coal or other sources of alternate energy.

Let me mention briefly the plight of farmers and fishermen as consumers. Though fishermen and farms are not in the same category as the retail consumers, they nonetheless face great difficulty in passing on to the persons who buy their products the increases in their costs. Provision has to be made for them because, in the end, it is the consumer who will pay. The whole point of any sensible energy program—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member may continue if he has unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosby: I want to conclude by saying that any sensible energy policy must allow for subsidization to those who cannot bear the cost of increases in the price of energy. The government has clearly stated its intention not to ride on the back of Canadian consumers in energy policy. Now it must fulfil its promise and deliver energy at fair prices to consumers, or suffer the consequences.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) said at the beginning of his remarks that the Progressive Conservatives had a lot of nerve introducing such a motion, and I would go further and say it took nerve, audacity and boldness in the case of a member from Ontario, a former member of the previous government who witnessed disputes between the premier of his province and the Premier of Alberta in 1973-74, when Alberta hiked its natural gas price considerably. If he has forgotten the rather aggressive words his provincial minister had for his Alberta colleague at that time, I shall be pleased to send him a copy for his information.

Mr. Speaker, it is very easy for us on this side of the House to debate this motion, because the energy policy of the Liberal government is easily and agreeably defendable, and I can now understand why we have not yet heard my colleague from Joliette (Mr. La Salle) speak in defence of his party's policy on energy matters. That too would require a lot of nerve.

● (1740)

The policy of the government is well known, Mr. Speaker, it is a policy designed to help all Canadians. I think the member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) has a lot of nerve speaking against the energy policy of the present government because that policy brought Nova Scotia large sums of money in 1976 and 1977 to offset the higher cost of oil used to produce energy in that province. Unfortunately, the previous speaker did not touch upon this subject, Mr. Speaker. He did not say either that some of his present-day colleagues, those who were here in 1977, criticized the Liberal policy announced by the government. They blamed the government for favouring a province then headed by a Liberal government. It is somewhat unfortunate, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member decided not to say anything about it and recognize the merit of the Liberal government of the day for considering the very serious problems which faced the people of Nova Scotia.

That was another unequivocal example of a truly national policy. That is why I understand the enthusiasm with which my colleague from Alberta, from Calgary East I believe, rose to speak and criticize the Liberal government's energy policy.

Yet it would be rather difficult, even very difficult for a member from eastern Canada, from Ontario, from either Perth or elsewhere, to rise and criticize a policy which gave Canadians a Canadian price for oil as far back as 1974. And that Canadian price, Mr. Speaker, was not determined in secrecy, as the one they tried to set last December. It was done at a federal-provincial conference where all provincial ministers responsible for the supply of energy in their provinces contributed and even helped determine that price of energy for a set period.

So, Mr. Speaker, before the debate on this motion ends, I urge my colleague from Joliette to say what he thinks of the energy policy of this government which has saved the province of Quebec, his own province, no less than $6 billion since 1974. And here, Mr. Speaker, I find I should add a Quebec and provincial dimension to my speech because right now there are a lot of falsehoods being said in the province of Quebec by people holding government positions in that province, people who should have some respect for the truth.

I had started to say, Mr. Speaker, that the energy policy of this government has saved the province of Quebec no less than $6 billion since 1974. Some even talk about $6.5 billion. And if you add everything up, including benefits of $20 million a year the province of Quebec and the maritimes get from the transportation of this oil from Sarnia to Montreal by the new pipeline, that figure totals over $6 billion.

So the whole province of Quebec and all the Atlantic provinces benefited from that. And my colleague from Halifax West, who is listening attentively, did not mention what that Canadian policy saved the people of Halifax, for example, in his riding. The motion deplores the lack of an energy policy when all Canadians, particularly in eastern Canada, know full well that there is a Canadian policy, and that that policy has benefited eastern Canada since 1974.

Mr. Speaker, if the people of Halifax with a 1977 or 1978 Chevrolet fill up today it costs them slightly more than $20 whereas if they had to pay the international price the people in Halifax West would have to pay twice as much. If I take time to give those figures it is because the hon. member omitted to do so and that becomes my responsibility. And I hope the hon. member for Joliette, if he can find the courage and the zest to do so, will rise in the House to defend and commend the steps taken by the Liberal government in 1974-75 to provide Canadians with a truly efficient energy policy.

So that is what the Canadian energy policy is all about: first to determine a Canadian price for oil; then, above all, to provide a safe supply for all Canadians. The security of supply has resulted in a smooth supply, if we compare that to the difficulties encountered by our neighbours to the south who also produce oil. It is the security of supplies which is somewhat uncertain and which wavered at the end of 1978 and the beginning of 1979. European or Asian visitors to Canada would think that there is absolutely no oil shortage in Canada, even if we consider oil prices and supplies, while everywhere else such a shortage exists and causes problems for the industry.

This Canadian policy has also contributed to ensuring the survival of our industries in the east, both in Quebec and in the Atlantic provinces, which means that they are in a much better position than their competitors in Europe, Asia or Japan, because they are guaranteed supplies at a much lower price than the world prices.

Mr. Speaker, there is also another policy of the Liberal party which states that the energy resources of each province must benefit all Canadians. Some provincial governments may not have recognized the need to share their wealth with the rest of Canadians, but this need is becoming more and more obvious. The provinces accept this fact and demand increasingly that it be considered. I can mention as an example the Newfoundland premier who has pleaded for assistance from the Canadian government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his fight with Quebec for the development of the energy resources in his province. And I would quote in this regard an article published a while ago in a Montreal newspaper which reported Newfoundland Premier Peckford as saying:

[English]

Under our constitution the Government of Canada has the right, and I submit the duty, to ensure that goods, including obviously hydro power, pass freely from one province across the territory of any other—

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Newfoundland's premier very eloquently demonstrated that the right hon. Prime Minister's policy of having Canada's resources benefit all Canadians is something, a responsibility, that all Canadians should and do accept. Some politicians may have difficulty in adapting to and accepting that policy, but all Canadians indeed demand that the nation's resources benefit all Canadians. And this is probably why the separatists in the province of Quebec, the Yes supporters, those who want to separate Quebec, submit that we should move to the international price as soon as possible. Of course, if they can win that point and prove to Canadians in Quebec that in a matter of a few months or a few years the international price must be reached, this would help them. They do not balk at using political terrorism, and indeed some ministers already are exercising it, ministers who should act more responsibly but who say that two or three years from now Alberta's reserves will be depleted. We know full well that Alberta's known reserves of conventional and tar sands oil are adequate for at least 300 years based on our yearly consumption.

According to my own estimate, we have more than that, and now that the world price exceeds, in effect, the production cost of oil from the tar sands, it is misleading the people of Quebec and making a comedy of their intelligence to scare them into believing that in a few years, well, whether they like it or not, whether they are separated or not, all Quebeckers will have to pay the world price. And we all know that they go as far as to say that even if we were compelled to pay the international price, our increased electricity sales to our southern neighbours and to Ontario could easily compensate for those much stiffer oil costs. That statement should be viewed in light of the answer given to me by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources two weeks ago when I asked him about the validity of the statement made by ministers Bérubé and Joron, I believe, who said that higher sales of electricity to our neighbours could easily compensate for the international price of imported energy. The difference would be as follows: If we had to pay the international price, it would now be over $6.8 billion while power sales to our southern neighbours, even if the price were double, would scarcely reach $1 billion, thus creating a deficit of $5.8 billion. To a large extent, such a demonstration by these two provincial ministers only serve to undermine the credibility of people who quote figures; I do not know where they get their figures to frighten the public and prove that, whether we are part of Canada or not, we shall have to pay the international price some day.

In his excellent speech this afternoon, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources reiterated again in front of everybody, to make it clear in the minds of Canadians in general and Quebeckers in particular, that the government is intent on maintaining the Canadian price well below the U.S. price; that is to say, that Canadians from all provinces will pay considerably less for their energy, oil and gas supplies than Americans must pay. I suggest that this argument defeats the motion with which we are dealing today, Mr. Speaker, because the Canadian energy policy will make sure that Canadians pay prices way below those paid in the countries of our competitors.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition could easily have chosen an entirely different topic on which to criticize the government. In fact, the record of the Liberal government in that regard has been very good since 1974, and will continue to be so in coming months because negotiations have already started. The minister made a trip out west last week; he is pursuing consultations with the responsible ministers in the east in order to ensure that the Canadian policy and the pricing formula for the next few years is one to which the responsible minister for every province, both producing and consuming, has contributed.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the essence of the Liberal energy policy. One can probably understand the resistance of the Progressive Conservatives and their wanting to criticize the government on that aspect of its administration in which it has had the most success, because if there is any field in which it has proved its sense of responsibility not only to eastern Canada but to all Canadians, it certainly is in the pricing of oil in Canada. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the majority of Canadians gave their support to the Liberal party last January and February; Canadians are used to trusting this government, and the government of the present Prime Minister. The Liberal government, has accustomed the Canadian people to expecting just and fair policies for all Canadians. Once all my hon. colleagues understand the urgency of lessening regionalism, of stifling increasing growth in Canada, the urgency of nourishing a devotion to this country whose land is one of the most generous in the world, then things will improve. I do feel that Canadians supported us last February precisely because they knew the great pains the Liberal government had taken in developing a "made-in-Canada" oil energy policy.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate in order to put before you my support for the motion that has been put forward by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), not that we ally ourselves with the energy policy which his colleagues put forward when they were in government—I think they will understand that, in view of the position which we took with regard to their budget, and we have not changed our minds concerning that—but to respond to some of the things that have been said.

I think the energy problem poses a challenge to our economy and to our constitution. Just as we are preoccupied these weeks with the events in Quebec, I think we should also recognize the fact that there are other sources of tension in consideration which are perhaps no better exemplified than by the problem of energy. Indeed, the problem of energy also allows us to analyse our economic dependence on multinational companies and to reflect on the cost of continuing to subsidize those companies by means of pricing policies, royalty policies, and taxation policies which, if allowed to continue the way they have, would result in a transfer of tremendous funds from Canadian consumers to foreign dividend holders.

I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) is uneasy whenever we in this party talk about the multinational companies, but I would ask him to reflect upon the fact that it is two economists from the University of Alberta—who are not members of my party or indeed of any party—who have published papers over the past two years in which they point out that the problem of what the economists call the recycling of rents and revenues from our oil-pricing policies, the recycling outside Canada, poses a tremendous problem for our economy, a challenge to our constitutional ingenuity, and a challenge to our capacity to plan for the future of our economy. Let it never be said that we, on this side of the House and in this party believe that this is an easy problem to resolve. It is an extremely difficult problem to resolve, and it is with some of those difficulties, challenges and some suggestions, not of easy, quick-fix solutions but of a series of policies that, we believe, will aid Canadian economic independence, Canadian energy self-sufficiency and enable Canadians to have a greater degree of control over their own affairs, I would like to deal after the dinner hour. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2000)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, in my introductory remarks before the dinner hour I said that the energy question touched upon many different challenges facing the country in the 1980s such as the constitutional problems and the foreign ownership problems. Our view in December was that the proposals put forward by the Conservative government of the day did not lead to a resolution of those problems, but compounded them. So, we believe that we must, as Canadians, attempt to find a solution. I impress upon the House the fact that we in this party are under no illusions as to how difficult that search will be. We must find a solution that will strengthen our economic independence and not weaken it, that will strengthen Canada's long-range industrial and economic future rather than weaken it.

I am sure most Canadians are aware that Canada imports oil. Somewhere in the area of 20 per cent of its oil needs are met by foreign suppliers, for which we pay a world price at the moment in excess of $30, and we charge Canadians about half that amount. The majority of the oil produced in Canada in 1980 is what is known as conventional oil, but the fact remains that our conventional supplies are rapidly depleting and will have to be replaced by far more expensive non-conventional supplies of which the tar sands are perhaps the most well-known example.

In determining a policy on energy pricing, we must consider the fact that there is a distinction between old oil and new oil, and that nearly all of the existing conventional petroleum reserves—more than 96 per cent of them—were discovered prior to 1973. The fact remains that the majority of the oil we are using today is the same as the oil on which companies in 1972 or 1973 were making a 15 per cent rate of return. At that time the price per barrel was $2.77. Even allowing for the fact that operating costs may have risen more than $1 per barrel on conventional oil, which still provides the majority of the supplies we use in Canada, if we do not change our taxation and royalty systems in relation to any increases in price which take place from this day on, the fact remains that we will be draining off to the multinational companies some $2 per barrel, or $1.3 billion per year. We must ask ourselves whether that is the kind of policy we want to follow. We rejected the view in December, and we reject it today.

The problem remains that the Liberals are telling us they believe in something called the blended price. Apparently a combination of the price of conventional oil, the price of imported oil and the price of non-conventional supplies are somehow put into a blender to produce a mixed price. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) laughing. I am sure, since he is a former professor of economics, he will be able to explain to this House, the way he was able to explain to his students, exactly what a blended price consists of. I would suggest to you that it is simply a way of attempting to justify to the Canadian people an increase whose size may not be justified by the requirements of the cost of production.

There are arguments which we on this side are prepared to accept for some increase in the price of oil as we enter the 1980s.

• (2010)

An hon. Member: Define "some".

Mr. Rae: The parliamentary secretary asks me to define "some". When we form the government we will define "some". He is a member of the government now and should define "some". That is his job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: It is no different from the way you behaved when you were in opposition.

The question of what that price will be is something which is determined as part of a package, and you cannot separate out and say what that price will be in the absence of knowing what all the other concessions and arrangements are in respect of royalty, wellhead tax, tax on revenues, and it is unreasonable to name a price out of thin air. Mr. Lalonde has not done so, and I suspect—

An hon. Member: Why are you criticizing us?

Mr. Rae: I have not come to criticize you. You are very sensitive. It is not a question of criticism, it is a question of analysing the basis on which the Liberal party is going to be giving us these tremendous price increases, and analysing where these revenues are going to go and how they are going to be recycled.

The fact of the matter is that, even on the Liberals' own terms, if we follow the policy of the Liberal party of eventually gaining 50 per cent control of our oil and natural gas, which is the objective the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has set for the country, the dividends which will be leaving the country as a result of price increases and as a result of windfall profits to multinational companies, that have by far the greatest stake, not only in our non-conventional supplies but in our conventional supplies, will amount to tens of billions of dollars.

The fact of the matter is that the foreign ownership question, far from being irrelevant to this issue, as Premier Lougheed has said, and far from being a red herring, is central to a resolution of this problem which will be acceptable to the Canadian people.

The fact of the matter is that it is not possible to go to the Canadian people and ask them to accept higher prices for oil and natural gas when they know what the cost of conventional supplies is, and when they know where the windfall profits are going. That is the critical problem. The problem is not so much a question of price; the problem is a question of revenue and where the revenue goes.

As I said earlier, whereas the Liberal party has been using this particular problem as an excuse, in a sense, for mobilizing certain sentiments in central Canada against those of the west, we take the view in our party that we have to find a way, in terms of our constitution, to provide for a solution to the energy crisis which will, at one and the same time, recognize the legitimate rights of producing provinces, and they have rights to some revenues from increases in prices, and indeed from existing prices, and provide for the generation of surplus within Canada which will provide for future energy needs.

We took the position in December that the excise tax was wrong in December, and we take the position that the excise tax is wrong today. The excise tax is not the way in which to go about punishing the consumer in order to generate revenues for the federal government. If anything has emerged in the past four weeks since this House began sitting, it is that the government itself has no particularly clear idea of how it is going to replace the Tory excise tax. Indeed, there was an interesting ambiguity in the throne speech. That ambiguity was in saying not that there will be no excise tax, which was the promise the Prime Minister made to the Canadian people when he was campaigning for office, but that there will be no 18-cent excise tax, which is the new position of the Liberal party.

There is a very major difference between going to the Canadian people and saying there will be no excise tax, and coming back to the Canadian people and saying in the throne speech there will be no 18-cent excise tax. What are we waiting for from the Liberal government, a 17-cent solution, or a 16-cent solution?

We have been convinced for some time that we have to deal with the problem of windfall profits, profits that are substantial both in the United States and in Canada. The fact of the matter is that oil profits in the first quarter of this year have been higher than ever before in Canada's history, and that they are on average 100 per cent higher than they were for the first three months of 1979.

If the Canadian people are going to be paying more for their oil and for their natural gas, they want the assurance that those prices and those revenues are not simply being recycled and taken out of the country. The evidence today is that this is precisely what is happening as a result of pricing policies, as a result of free enterprise policies, and as a result of multinational oil company policies, policies which were followed by the Conservative government when it was in power, and policies which are being followed by the Liberal government today. That is why the question of public ownership is not some ideological ruse simply coming from those who seek public ownership for its own sake.

Public ownership in this particular field is a necessity because it is the one key which will give to the Canadian people the knowledge and the confidence that when they are paying more for their gas at the pump, that money is being recycled into the Canadian economy and being used by Canadians for Canadians. It is simply not possible to divide up revenues in such a way that will satisfy the producing provinces, the multinational oil companies, the needs of the federal government and the needs of all the people of Canada, without raising that price to a level which is completely unjustifiable. That is why the Conservative government fell in 1979, and that is the conundrum facing the Liberal party in 1980.

We have to recognize that the solution to this problem is not an easy one. Certainly we on this side recognize that. We wish the minister well in his negotiations with the provincial governments. We are not at all impressed with the information he has given us, or with the conflicting news inflicted on this Parliament week by week as we are told the government is not considering a certain tax. Then ministers come back the next day and say, "we are not considering that tax this year", or they criticize the Conservative party for its $4 or $4.50 increase, and yet indicate that the over-all package which the Liberal party may be proposing over the next three years may result in prices which are even higher. It is not a particularly impressive record. Certainly it is not a record of honesty and integrity in energy policy, which is what this motion is all about.

If new patterns of public ownership could be established in the oil industry, Canadians would see that revenues from higher prices were being used for exploration and development, conservation, and for the growth of alternative supplies. There would be no need to challenge provincial ownership of this resource. Furthermore, tremendous disparities in provincial revenues as a result of ownership of resources could be at least partially resolved by direct interprovincial transfers or by the funding of a national energy bank which could be drawn on as a source of capital by non-producing provinces.

I suggest that energy self-sufficiency would then be a goal which would provide some sinew to the new confederation, a confederation which would recognize the legitimacy of provincial economies without making of them a fetish, a confederation which would recognize the notion of sharing, the importance of national co-operation, strategic planning, intervention and, indeed, selective public ownership. Dare I call it a co-operative commonwealth?

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this opposition day debate on energy. With the exception of the referendum in Quebec, I cannot think of an issue that is as important to the future of Canada as that of energy. When one comes to understand what the effect of the government's inaction in the field of energy may bring, it does not take too much foresight to imagine how difficult life may soon be.

Television has already demonstrated what life with gasoline shortages will be like by showing us the American experience. Gas stations will close on Sundays, or at the end of the month when their supplies run low. People wishing to purchase gas will have to stand in line. Unrest will grow as farmers and truckers find that they no longer have the fuel that they need in order to earn their livelihood. Consumer goods based on hydrocarbons will inflate rapidly in value as supplies of oil for industry dwindle. Finally, the government will turn to rationing in order to ensure a fair division of remaining supplies.

Eventually, public opinion will force the government to examine alternative sources of energy and new methods of introducing conservation. That was the American experience. For Canada the scenario is just one step more severe. Unlike the United States, Canada does not have areas of warm climate. When our oil runs out, people will have to deal with the Canadian winter.

Let us assume that somehow the government comes to understand the problem and manages to provide an adequate supply of oil to heat our homes, drive our cars and fuel our industries. But no matter what expense we go to in order to search for new supplies of oil and gas, eventually we will run out. No need to worry; by then we will have switched to hydrogen-powered cars and our homes will be heated by electricity, solar power or biomass.

There are only a few small details to be ironed out. The new technologies that we will need to produce these forms of energy take time and considerable sums of money to create. Canada has proved to be unwilling to invest those sums. But this is just the beginning of the technology that we will need.

It is fine to discuss replacing the energy that we get from oil, but how do we begin to replace hydrocarbons in their other functions? For example, how do we replace oil as a lubricant or as a base in paint, or for its use in producing drugs? Or how do we replace the use of oil for producing plastics and other synthetics? We have an understanding of the means of producing new forms of energy so that the average Canadian will be able to drive his car and heat his home. However, the question remains, without oil will we be able to build that car or furnish that house?

If we were to look around and try to come to an understanding of how important oil is to the maintenance of our style of life, I think that we would come to realize just how undervalued our remaining supplies are. Granted, Canada does have larger oil reserves than Saudi Arabia. The question is, will we be able to get it out of the ground when we need it? Unless the government is willing to invest in heavy oil, the tar sands, frontier exploration and new delivery systems, the answer is no. Running out of oil seems like a remote possibility until one remembers that Alberta's conventional reserves will run out in less than ten years.

Getting oil from the tar sands is a costly venture and this government, under the guise of a made-in-Canada price, has said that it is unwilling to pay that price. The Liberal party referred to the last campaign as the "18-cent election". I wonder what the people of Canada will say when they recognize the real cost of their decision. The government has committed itself to rationing in the event there is shortfall in supply. It takes great pride in telling Canadians that this is the only fair way in dealing with distribution. Through rationing, it is explained, people would receive energy on the basis of need, not according to their ability to pay, and on those terms it does seem quite attractive.

What the government overlooks is that rationing will lead to as many problems as it solves. A black market in gasoline is sure to develop which will lead to a situation where those who have money will still be able to afford to drive, while those who could not afford the cost prior to rationing will be even less likely to be able to survive in the marketplace.

Which groups will be hardest hit by such a situation? It will be the poor, commuters, those who use fuel in the course of earning their living, people in rural areas who generally do not have access to mass transit and, of course, the elderly who will have low priority when it comes to allocating the rations, and who do not have the economic power to deal in the market.

There has been much made, Mr. Speaker, of federal-provincial antagonisms over resource control. There have been serious actions and reactions between Ottawa and the provinces, differences that at times seem to threaten our nation. At the very least natural resources are a focal point of constitutional discussions. It is important that this matter is approached openly and, indeed, it has been given scrutiny by a number of examiners. But there is a major feature of this rationing possibility that should give major concern to those interested in regional energy supplies and resource control. This rationing system would ultimately be an arm of the federal government.

How would the needs of industry be considered as compared to commuters and other private consumers? How would one province's needs be considered as compared to another? How much power would reside within the rationing bureaucracy in a country that remains 20 per cent dependent on foreign supplies of petroleum because it has failed to provide the dollars necessary for resource development and, in fact, continues to increase our national deficit by not even recovering the $4 billion of subsidy payments to offset the cost of foreign inputs?

Who will say, Mr. Speaker, whether I will do without gas because my function is not as important as yours and that you will do without gas because your function is not as important as a farmer's? Will we or will we not have gas? Should Parliament be dissolved so the farmer may plant? For all the energy problems we have addressed in the last years, our actions have been mere tokens of the real actions that are needed.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gurbin: That was from the no-development party. The government is reacting to situations that have developed from benign neglect. Even worse, the government seems prepared to make some decisions on the basis of political patronage rather than on merit.

What then is more equitable—rationing or adopting a user-pay system of bringing new resources on stream? Surely it should be those who use energy who should be responsible for paying the cost of finding and developing new resources. Otherwise we move either to rationing and a continued depletion of our resources or a situation where the government provides funds from its general revenues, in which case everyone pays.

I simply do not believe that a bureaucratic machine in Ottawa can show either the flexibility or the understanding of local conditions to react in a truly fair manner when determining how supplies of oil should be distributed.

An hon. Member: How did they win the war?

Mr. Gurbin: We did not have the New Democratic Party when the war was on. On past experience, I know that the bureaucracy has seldom shown the sort of insight that areas such as mine require.

I would like to turn now to an examination of the policy priorities of the Liberal and Conservative parties. I think a moment would be well spent in contrasting the records of the two parties while in power. This government is incapable of separating its often misguided notions of social justice from its other policy discussions. Its set of values tends to cloud its judgment. For example, in the May, 1976, budget the government introduced measures which would have imposed a special graduated excise tax on heavy cars. I am sure that the reason for introducing the measure was that the government had romantic notions about putting an end to limousines, at least for cabinet ministers—or at least other than for cabinet ministers. What the government failed to consider was the fact that such an excise tax would actually discriminate against many efficient cars. Under the scheme, a Camaro giving 18 miles per gallon would only be taxed $70, while a Cutlass of that model year using one gallon every 24 miles would be subject to a $500 tax levy. Fortunately public and opposition reaction caused the government to withdraw.

Let us consider the history of the government's conservation policies and targets. Between 1975 and 1979 the government announced three different target rates for growth of energy demand, and made energy conservation announcements a total of ten different times. This might seem to indicate that the government was being quite progressive and was introducing stronger and stronger measures. What it really means is that the government kept making announcements to contradict or change its previous announcements. For example, the government announced its program to label household appliances four different times during that period. I am optimistic enough to believe that we may some day see the results of those announcements.

Last fall the House heard lengthy speeches from the Liberal benches about the length of time that it was taking for a Conservative government to reach an agreement with the provinces regarding oil pricing and federal taxation. It is worthy of note that those remarks came from the same people who were stalled for three years, between 1973 and 1976, in similar negotiations, and from the same people who are practising confrontation with the west today.

Our government had reached an agreement with the west. It was an agreement which would have provided funds for a federal energy development bank. It was an agreement that would have promoted conservation of our non-renewable resources. It was an agreement that would have provided an impetus to the development of the tar sands and heavy oils. It was an agreement that would have set the stage for the development of alternate forms of energy. In short, it was an agreement that would have provided energy self-sufficiency and a future for Canada, and it was an agreement that this government has rejected.

Under Liberal governments, Canada has had to import ever-increasing shares of its oil requirements. The Canadian public has seen little or no action on extending the natural gas pipeline to Quebec and the maritimes. Renewable forms of energy have been largely ignored. The Canada reactor has languished because of poor marketing, scandals, and inconsistent standards for nuclear safeguards. In sum, the government has a miserable record. Its last target for energy conservation was to limit the growth in demand for energy to 3.5 per cent per annum. This sort of conservation leads to a doubling of Canada's energy requirements every 21 years.

Even when the government sees fit to introduce worth-while programs such as PASEM and PUSH, mentioned by the parliamentary secretary, it does not follow through to their full realization. The government creates programs, creates an industry, and then loses interest and allows the project to wither and die.

Even having seen what Liberal governments have done in the past I do not despair of Canada's ever seeing a coherent energy strategy. Quite the opposite, in fact. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) recently proved, the government knows where to go when it needs well reasoned and innovative policies. Because Canada benefits as a result of such a process I do not begrudge the government the use of our policies and, in fact, I would like to take this opportunity to remind them of some points that they may have overlooked in our platform.

The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, as represented by its members in the House of Commons and its supporters across our country, has made no secret of its desire and willingness to see Canada become energy self-sufficient by 1990. In order to meet that target Canadians may have to face some short-term inconvenience, but what we receive in return is long-term security of supply. The pricing formula and budgetary means for such a program are well known and I will not dwell upon them. On the other hand, I would like to enumerate the areas of development that are essential to the completion of such a plan.

I was honoured to have been able to sit as a member of the prime minister's advisory committee on energy last summer. That committee was struck because our government inherited a legacy of inaction on energy matters. We needed to determine what could be done to turn the situation around. The committee met throughout the summer and examined energy matters from the perspective of the provinces, of the various companies involved in energy development in Canada, and on the basis of the needs of the average Canadian. Reconciling those varied positions is difficult but it can be done, and we had made a start at doing so. An energy agreement has been worked out with the west, oil companies had been consulted about the price increases that they needed in order to bring new resources on stream, and the end result would have been an assured supply for all Canadians.

These measures grew out of the policies that we had outlined prior to the May 22 election. One cannot compare an election platform of one party that has not been in government for a considerable period of time with the legislative record of one that has. What one can compare, on the other hand, is the fact that the present government, in its previous incarnations, failed to come to terms with Canada's energy needs, while in the six months of our government a comprehensive energy program was outlined and we had taken steps to implement that program.

How did the last Liberal government come to terms with the need for conservation? It spent considerable sums of the taxpayers' money telling taxpayers how to conserve. It spent further sums training people as experts in energy conservation in order to run their taxpayer education scheme, and then cancelled the whole program. It then went on to set conservation targets for itself. In fact the department that was responsible for the program could not meet the target and, in fact, 17 departments actually increased their energy consumption in the same period. All of this was at even further expense to the taxpayer. Even though the government failed to save energy, it proved that in Canada there was a long way to go in conservation of tax dollars.

The bulk of the government's push for conservation is to be found in the CHIP program. CHIP has a number of problems of its own but it, at least, does provide some assistance to home owners. Unfortunately it has also caused a number of fly-by-night insulation companies to come into being.

By and large, the government has felt that conservation can be mainly voluntary. It is my opinion that voluntary conservation is about as likely as the individual Canadian deciding to do his part in fighting inflation by refusing his next pay raise. The fact of the matter is that he will only start to conserve when the price of energy starts to become a concern. Obviously the poor should not be pressed further into poverty by the cost of energy, nor should those living on fixed incomes be asked to bear a heavy burden. It is for that reason that our government introduced the energy tax credit in the Crosbie budget. The tax credit would have been more than equal to the increased cost of energy to those on low incomes. At the same time we were prepared to increase funding for CHIP, and I am pleased to see that the government has followed our example.

While conservation provides an immediate and vital decrease in our energy requirements, it does not fill all of our needs. We must, therefore, look to expanding our supply of energy. Remembering that hydrocarbons may be too valuable merely to burn, we must look to alternate forms of energy to fill the gap, and to replace this finite resource.

Canada has leading edge technology in the field of nuclear energy. The Candu is at one and the same time the most productive reactor over its life cycle and the safest reactor in use in the world. This is a technology which could and should be exported in order to offset our balance of trade deficit. Unfortunately the government, through AECL, has not been able to market the system properly, and in the case of its deal with Argentina actually managed to lose money by selling a reactor.

In dealing with renewable energy, the government has had an equally poor record. It did institute the PASEM and PUSH programs, but it dumped those funds into the market so quickly that the industry could not take proper advantage of them. Now, after having tried to develop the industry, the government, in the Speech from the Throne, announces its intention to create a renewable energy corporation which would compete with the small companies and possibly lead to their demise. The government recently announced the composition and funding of this corporation. This is a gleam of hope after years of limited action.

By comparison, the Crosbie budget provided for lower bond requirements for individuals wishing to distill alcohol for fuel, provided for accelerated write-offs for conservation equipment, and established discounts on natural gas in order to persuade Canadians to convert from oil to gas furnaces. In effect, six months of Conservative government showed more of a conviction to deal with energy problems than the previous decade of Liberal government. The government shows little indication that it intends to mend its ways. It will continue to pretend that there is no problem until the lights go out.

Mr. Speaker, the concept of an energy crisis has gradually entered our consciousness. Indeed, we do have a problem, but it does not come from a lack of reserves; rather, the crisis is with the cost and the will necessary to identify, develop and distribute our God-given resources. The crisis cannot be met with the traditional manipulations, reactions and confrontations at different government levels. We have an immediate need to respond to the condition by developing a national policy, based on the regional opportunities that present themselves.

We must extend the neglected natural gas pipelines to provide markets and linkages for gas reserves, east to west, north to south. We must seriously consider the neglected electrical interconnection and controls to allow the vast quantities of electrical reserves in James Bay and Churchill Falls to be accepted in New York or Ontario grids. We must finally come to grips with the whole question of resource export taxation on natural gas, oil, as well as electrical energy.

● (2040)

Especially in those provinces whose opportunities to develop fossil reserves are limited, we must hesitate no longer to take major steps to provide opportunities for replacement of conventional fuels. The government should take into account the British Columbia opportunity for a major coal liquefaction plant. Similar opportunities offer themselves in the Atlantic provinces.

Transportation fuels account for about 45 per cent of petroleum consumption. The potential of conversions from conventional fuels to natural gas and its components, including M gas and gasahol, have yet to be recognized by this government by appropriate taxing and bonding measures. In the prairies, Ontario, and Prince Edward Island, opportunities for synthetic fuel production from biomass or waste may have been delayed by this government's inaction.

Conservation can be enhanced not only by pushing through research and development of appropriate fuels and engines for private transportation, but also by major research and development and dedication to an improved urban transit system.

Our previous government had initiated a concept of funding for energy projects. That funding would have derived from revenue from energy resources. Without specific and major financial resources, major projects in cogeneration, urban transit, and tidal power may fail to materialize. Major conventional energy systems such as heavy oil supply, hydro development, and additional coal mining opportunities, may be delayed.

Because of the lack of a cohesive energy plan we continue to miss the opportunities for development of potential exportable energy technologies, such as those coming from research and development in photovoltaics and genetic engineering.

Financial research and development capability and political will should provide us a secure energy future. We are destined with the government's present approach to an increasing dependency on petroleum imports and increasing political antagonisms—a fossil-foolish mentality—that need not have limited our energy future.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Mines): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion there is no other point in the Speech from the Throne that was more welcome or more important than the one that dealt with the setting up of the alternate energy corporation. This is something which we in the Liberal party feel is going to be extremely valuable in the years to come, and one which we feel the party and the government will put to good use. It is hoped by each and every one of us, certainly by parliamentarians in general, that the alternate energy corporation will not only seek to find ways of using possible new sources of energy, but also will not discount or ignore the existing sources of energy that are in our country in such abundance.

It is one of those sources of energy that I would like to deal with this evening, namely, coal. This afternoon the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) discussed the problem that Nova Scotia has regarding is dependency on offshore oil. This dependency no doubt exists. In fact it has existed for some time. When we were blessed with an inexpensive source of oil, this was not a problem. But when the cost of offshore oil rose, and rose very quickly, it caught the province of Nova Scotia very much by surprise.

As the hon. member for Halifax West stated, dependency on offshore oil amounted to approximately 70 per cent of electrical generating requirements. Since that time there has been movement to reduce this particular dependency. The province of Nova Scotia has brought on stream a hydroelectric system in Wreck Cove, Cape Breton Island, and also four thermal generating plants at Lingan close to New Waterford. It is hoped when thermal generating plants three and four are on stream that this will reduce Nova Scotia's dependency on offshore oil from 70 per cent to approximately 15 per cent.

The uses and possibilities for coal are limitless. The use of coal is very important when we look at the possibility of finding alternate sources of oil and transportation fuels. The idea of liquefaction of coal, liquefying coal, or gasifying coal started in pre-war Germany, and the hydrogenation of coal is something that goes back quite a few years. Unfortunately it is something that has been neglected over the past because of the abundance of cheap energy, but it is now being looked at very seriously. Unfortunately it will take a good many years before the technology that was started so many years ago is brought on stream and made viable in Canada. We are anticipating that it will probably be the mid-1990s before this very valuable source of oil is available to us.

There is another source that was started at approximately the same time, that is, the sasol process which was developed in pre-war Germany as well, but has been adopted in South Africa. It is a process that the South Africans initiated in 1953 with the building of Sasol One. It is a process for the liquefaction of coal using an adjustment of the carbon monoxide hydrogen components and, using a catalyst, in fact can form a very wide abundance of products ranging all the way from methane to a heavy petroleum wax. It is a very strong and excellent possibility for the future, not only for South Africa but for the world as a whole.

Just a few days ago Sasol Two was commissioned in South Africa and a trade delegation from Canada was there at this particular exercise. This new plant is capable of producing 45,000 barrels of oil a day from the coal derivative. South Africans are going to be commissioning a third sasol plant, and that will be commissioned in 1983.

In 1983, when Sasol One, Two and Three are working, they will in fact be producing 50 per cent of all of South Africa's transportation fuels. This is a significant portion of the country's transportation fuel needs, but of course it will utilize a great deal of coal. The fact is that these two plants, one producing 45,000 barrels of oil a day from coal, and the second producing 50,000 barrels a day from coal, will require as much as 27 million tonnes of coal a year. This is more coal than is produced in Canada at the present time. Yet it is a need in this country. It exemplifies to us what a valuable resource this is and how we are going to come to depend on this very valuable resource.

The South Africans are able to utilize this source of energy right now because of cheap labour costs. They are able to produce coal for about $6 a ton, which is considerably cheaper than Canada can. The plant that will be coming on stream in 1983 they expect will cost between $3 billion and $4 billion. The Fluor Corporation which has constructed Sasol Two, and will be constructing the third one, is in fact negotiating with the American government at the present time to construct the plant in that country. The Americans are showing considerable interest in this technology. That corporation estimates that the plant, capable of producing 50,000 barrels of oil a day from coal, will in fact cost $3.5 billion. In terms of comparing this to a refinery producing oil from oil sources, it would be the equivalent of $48 a gallon—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You mean a barrel.

Mr. MacLellan: —a barrel. Although we have not reached the situation where coal is in a position to compete with oil in the gasoline markets, we are going to be fast approaching that point. It is something we are very definitely going to have to consider.

● (2050)

Mobil Oil, also in the United States, has developed a process called Mobile M where they are able to turn coal into methanol and upgrade the methanol into a high octane gasoline by a process known as methanol M, and the product derived therefrom is known as M gasoline. In 1979 New Zealand found that using a natural gas base to create methanol would in fact give them a high octane gasoline at $10 a barrel cheaper than the gasoline which could be produced from the sasol derivative. They are using this process now and are producing gas from this source.

In the United States, because of their interest not only in the sasol process but in the Mobile M process, they have designated $100 million for exploration experimentation, and research into this valuable source of fuel for the future. They are making grants of $4 million each to companies, research laboratories and institutions of sufficient size to be able to carry out this valuable work. Applications for these grants closed on April 25 and the results should be announced in the not too distant future.

With respect to our country, the Alberta Gas Trunk Line has in fact sent two tons of coal to the Saarberg Corporation in Germany which has been very active in the hydrogenation of coal. This coal was experimented on there and fuel was produced from it. The cost to the Alberta Gas Trunk Line was merely the cost of the shipment because the Saarberg Corporation was able to do the work at very little cost to this country. The Alberta Gas Trunk Line is now in the process of carrying out detailed feasibility and conceptual engineering studies of this interesting possibility.

The Brazilians are using methanol in their automobiles. In fact all major automobile manufacturers in Brazil are making cars which run on methanol. These methanol-powered engines are becoming very popular, and it is estimated that in Brazil at the present time they have approximately 100,000 such cars. Methanol gives off a much cleaner exhaust and is a more energy efficient fuel than high octane gasoline. The methanol rating would be approximately 103, whereas high octane gasoline would probably have a rating of about 93. In Germany, Volkswagen has developed a car which runs exclusively on methanol. There are other cars, including Volkswagens, which run on a combination of methanol and gasoline. So the technology is there; it is growing and becoming increasingly popular.

With respect to eastern Canada some difficulty arises because the coal is a little more expensive to extract from the ground, yet there is another technology which I think is going to be extremely important to eastern Nova Scotia, a process which the British are developing. As you probably know, Mr. Speaker, the coal in eastern Canada is very high in volatiles; approximately 20 per cent to 30 per cent of the coal in Cape Breton consists of volatiles.

The British are developing a process whereby the volatiles in such coal are separated by using a solvent. The carbon portion of the coal could be used for thermal generating and the volatiles for transportation fuel. Canmet is very involved in this particular situation, working on what is more or less the next step, and is developing what they call a hydrocracker, a process for upgrading heavy oils which would be the derivative of the solvent-producing carbon on the one hand and the heavy oil on the other. The heavy oil volatiles could then be used to be upgraded into a light oil capable of feeding any refinery which exists in this country at the present time. Not only that, but to this heavy oil could be added additional hydrogen and coal, coal solids, and this mixture could be upgraded to an efficient fuel capable of being fed into any refinery in the country. This is not new technology, it is technology which has existed for the past 17 years, but it is very important technology as far as eastern Canada is concerned. Unfortunately it has been allowed to languish unused for far too long a period.

It is hoped that the alternate energy corporation will bring this technology forward to a greater degree for the benefit not only of eastern Canada but of the whole of Canada, and that coal will become a very serious alternative in a fuel-hungry world. It is important to this country that we explore all our energy possibilities. The government has declared its intention to go ahead with the natural gas pipeline to Nova Scotia. They have made that commitment in the Speech from the Throne. It is a very important commitment when one considers the possibilities of natural gas existing off Sable Island.

Added to this is another possibility, the possibility of oil off the coast of Newfoundland. These are very important potential sources brought to prominence to a large extent through the contribution of Petro-Canada, an institution to which this government has pledged its support—in fact the government has made available to the corporation an extra $80 million, recognizing that this is an important operation upon which the satisfaction of the future energy requirements of this country is going to depend. It is important that sources of energy and sources of wealth are derived from all areas of this country and that no area should find its natural resources or its possibilities for employment pushed into the background.

All members here will agree that although we represent various constituencies we are also representatives of the whole country, and in this very important matter we must look not only to decisions which have been taken, but also those yet to come. On May 20 there will be made one of the most important decisions in the history of this country. But sometimes, before decisions can be made, problems must be overcome. We owe it not only to our constituents but to a unified country that these problems, and the areas in which these problems are found, are studied, analysed and understood. It is only in this way we, as a country, will become more unified and more purposeful.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I should advise the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) that the parliamentary secretary has completed his speech but, with the agreement of the parliamentary secretary, I will permit the question.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I found the parliamentary secretary's speech very interesting and enjoyable, but the question which immediately pops into my mind results from an exchange which occurred here several days ago when the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) what part coal was to play in the national energy policy. The minister sloughed that question aside and would not really answer it. He gave the impression that coal was not really to fit into the picture.

Because the hon. parliamentary secretary is privy to what the cabinet is thinking on these matters, perhaps he can tell us whether what he said tonight was an expression just of his own personal views or whether indeed there is an imminent announcement to be made on coal policy for Canada by the cabinet.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, this is a subject of great interest to this country, and the government is studying it very, very carefully. The reason the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) did not elaborate on that subject is because it is now under the jurisdiction of the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola), and she would be the one who would be glad to elaborate on it at any time the hon. member should ask.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by saying that as a new member I am rather astounded at the situation in which we find ourselves today in Canada with regard to energy. It is inconceivable that we would be running out of a resource of which we have more in Canada than has ever been found in the world to date because past governments have not had the wisdom or the courage to develop these resources. The main reason I entered politics was to help bring some businesslike sanity into government and the ownership and better development of resources and responsible economic policies on which to build a great future for this country. Economic policy must involve energy these days, and energy policy must involve economics. They are interlocked and indivisible. One holds the key to the other.

We have known for a long time that we in Canada were energy rich and resource rich. We have known that by selling our resources we could live like kings without working very hard. Over three decades Liberal governments have capitalized on this fact to provide better social standards for Canadians, and that has been great up to a point, but such wealth must be carefully handled. It must be wisely utilized to provide not only social justice but also creative work for Canadians, and an investment in future stability, because resources do run out, many of them, and so some portion of their value must be set aside to build an ongoing industrial base for the benefit of future generations of Canadians who will follow us. However, successive governments have consistently spent more than they took in, and Canada has amassed a huge national debt, partly by buying foreign goods and services instead of letting Canadians produce them.

We have sold our raw materials, our iron ore, nickel, asbestos, tin, zinc, tungsten, oil and gas in great quantities and at low prices, and we have bought cars, televisions, cameras, machines and thousands of other manufactured goods at high prices. We have exported Canadian jobs and guaranteed the employment of foreigners. It is time we stopped doing this kind of stupid thing, stole a leaf from the Parti Québécois book and became maîtres chez nous; masters of our own house, controllers and investors in our own destiny.

I would like to use my time to look at the benefits of energy development rather than dwell on just the costs, as the Liberal side of this House has myopically continued to do.

It is incumbent on any government of any country to plan for future needs, but for the government of a country as vast as Canada—and as subject to cold weather conditions as Canada is—not to have planned much, much better for energy development, is no less than dereliction of duty. However, that is the position we are in. No longer are we exporters of petroleum energy. We are net importers, and at a strangulation price. Today all the lands and people east of the Ottawa River are dependent on supplies of foreign oil. They are held ransom to fragile supply arrangements from unstable foreign lands, over long water distances and at high world prices. Why? Because governments since the early seventies have not had the foresight or the wisdom to develop western reserves, nor the common sense to build a pipeline past Montreal into Atlantic Canada. Instead, these same governments were content to tax Canadians for social and foreign aid programs we could not afford, while neglecting to finance and assist in the development and transmission of vital energy.

This year, 1980, we will spend $5 billion for foreign oil. That is enough to build a tar sands plant, and every single year until we get down to developing our own reserves adequately we will spend even more. Every year we wait, Atlantic Canada runs the risk of interruption of supply, with terrible consequences to farmers and fishermen, to their factories, and to the heating of their homes. What action do we get to help the citizens of Atlantic Canada? Just the crossing of fingers in the hope that Hibernia will turn out to be the biggest goldarned oil find in the world. We all hope that that will prove to be the case, but that is hardly the stuff of which sound energy policy is made.

How does the government plan to develop Canada's energy? How will it raise the vast sums of money—the hundred plus billion dollars—needed to pay for development of the western oil reserves and the tar sands? Well, it does not know. It does not have a plan. The present government, after joining the NDP to defeat the only plan for energy development Canada has ever had, after only seven months of Conservative government, has come up with no plan, no action, and no pricing formula, unless we take the blended price, which will probably add up to more than our formula.

No one should be surprised that a political party which has its entire power base in eastern Canada finds it impossible to accept the economic realities of the need to pay a higher price for oil. In their blatant grasping for votes they have prujudiced Canada's economic future. No one in Canada wants to pay more for gasoline, and neither do the Americans, the Japanese nor the West Germans, but they do not have a choice, as we do. They have no oil of their own, so they pay world prices, but they have accepted it. They have reacted positively to it, and they have prospered in spite of it. We, who do not have enough oil of our own, pay the world price too for the 20 per cent of our oil which we must import and which is increasing as a percentage due to the increasing annual consumption and the diminishing supply. Unless we undertake a crash program of exploration and development of the tar sands, we will be paying the world price too in this century.

The Conservative energy program, with its 18 cents a gallon and $4 a barrel, was designed to do at least three important things. First, it would keep us from going deeper into debt each year with the Arabs and the Venezuelans. Second, it would have encouraged reductions in consumption of gasoline by encouraging the use of smaller cars, car pools, public transit and any other way one can economize. Third, it would pay for a massive program of energy development, with all its future benefits. How did these farsighted, long-range Liberal planners react to this first ever plan for Canadian energy self-sufficiency? They rejected it. They defeated it. They denied the people of Canada the fantastic benefits of and pride in the achieving not only of energy but also of economic self-sufficiency. They said Canadians could not afford it. They said Canadians could not afford to pay $1.40 a gallon when Americans pay $1.60 and some people over $3.

Does anyone here seriously believe that we are not paying higher prices for gasoline today? Just because the pump price is $1.10 or so, that does not mean we are paying $1.10 a gallon. There are three billion extra dollars which do not appear on the pumps but which must still be paid by all Canadians, whether they drive cars or not, through their taxes to pay the Arabs and the Venezuelans for our shortfall. History will reveal the cost of Liberal duplicity. Each year we wait will cost Canada billions of wasted dollars.

Instead of saying that we cannot afford higher prices, we should recognize that we cannot afford not to have the benefits which higher prices will bring. Take, for example, my province of Ontario. Ontario produces half of all the manufactures of Canada. How then could Canada spend $100 billion out west without a fantastic boom occurring in Ontario or in Quebec where over half of all the things that go into the building of a high technology industry like the tar sands development originate? If we spend $100 billion in western Canada by 1990, about $25 billion will come back to Ontario and Quebec for the production of pipe, valves, turbines, generators, pumps, trucks, in an industry which desperately needs jobs, computers, building materials, not only for plants but for the thousands of new homes which will go into the new plant sites accompanying the plants, and so on. Who will build these homes and manufacture these goods? Ontario and Quebec companies, and Ontario and Quebec people. In fact companies and people from every province in Canada will benefit from this unprecedented job boom.

Just yesterday Foothills Pipe Lines announced that Stelco in Hamilton and Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Corporation in Regina were given an order for pipe for the Alaska gas pipeline project worth $2 billion. This represents 5,500 man years or person years for Canadians. These companies, working with over 300 suppliers throughout Canada, will provide 28,000 man years of employment. Is anyone so blind that they cannot see the job opportunities, skills, training opportunities and investment opportunities for all Canadians? Even teachers, that hard-hit profession, will be pressed hard to teach the skills which will be in such great demand across Canada.

In the case of the Quebec and maritime pipeline, which would be an investment of over $4 billion, over $3 billion would accrue to Quebec and the maritimes and would create 64,000 man years of jobs over the next two decades. Add to these the jobs, the opportunities for the merchants and businesses along the route and you begin to get an idea of what developing our resources means in terms of jobs and wealth to Canadians. Today a tar sands plant will cost upward of $5 billion. For every plant built, Ontario will benefit to the tune of $1 billion.

Another major benefit which would have accrued to Ontario and to all Canadians through the Conservative energy policy, would have been the guaranteed 85 per cent of world price maximum for gasoline and oil, and even less for natural gas, in fact only 72 per cent of world oil price. Compare such benefits for Canadian manufacturing and job-creating opportunities with the speculative purchase of foreign energy supplies which offer no opportunities to Canada. Here we have, on the one hand, tenuous or questionable supply linked to rapidly escalating world price. The spot market oil prices today range in the $40 to $50 a barrel bracket. On the other hand, we could be enjoying guaranteed supply at much lower prices by creating jobs for Canadians. So which is preferable?

Shall we pay fellow Canadians to develop our resources and produce our energy needs from our Canadian companies, or shall we pay foreigners for their oil, make them rich at our expense and enable them to invest our former dollars to buy out Canadian companies? With sound energy policies we could already have been maîtres chez nous, masters of our own destiny, instead of potentially shivering in the cold and dependent on foreigners as Liberal government inaction has had us do.

In the debate over increased costs of petroleum energy, Ontario took a firm position against such an increase, largely on the grounds of loss of jobs in Ontario caused by inability to compete due to higher costs. That was the argument. They used the old "we can't afford it" argument. In terms of total energy needs, Ontario today can generate just over 22 per cent of its requirements. It has recognized that through conservation and conversion to indigenous forms of energy, largely electrical, it can supply a target objective of 35 per cent of its total energy requirements by 1995.

Can this be accomplished without cost to the taxpayer? Of course not. The price tag, by the Ontario government's estimate, will be $30 billion over the next 15 years. This huge sum of $30 billion should be recognized as a quarter as much as the entire Conservative government proposal for petroleum self-sufficiency, and yet will supply only a 12 per cent increase in Ontario energy needs. So how can it be justified? Why would a province commit $30 billion for 12 per cent more energy? For benefits, that is how. Ontario sees the benefits of lower cost power and reliability of supply of power. These tangible elements of energy supply will attract and encourage the establishment and development of increased industrial growth, particularly in the high technology industries with increased tax payout and job creation for the province. Ontario also foresees a comcomitant reduction in increasingly expensive petroleum consumption, thus reducing the external influence and the extra costs to its economic affairs.

Now let us look at what Canada's smallest province plans to do about its energy problem. P.E.I. is actively considering the biomass alternative. Its studies show that under today's conditions, for every dollar spent on energy importation, primarily petroleum, 90 cents leave the province. The satisfactory development of biomass would reverse this condition and keep 80 cents of every dollar within the province.

So both the most populous and least populous provinces have recognized the advantage of substantial investment for the long-term benefit of their citizens. Their policies are pay now, benefit later, the very spirit and attitude which built this country. What a contrast this is to the do-nothing, unimaginative, inactive federal Liberal government which seriously jeopardizes Canada's economic future and leaves it under the control of foreigners. Even today it is not too late for the government to realize the error of its ways, to change its direction, to recognize the need to raise oil prices in order to generate the funds needed to commence the huge task before us and, at the same time, revitalize the sagging Canadian economy. The world would welcome such a change and would be anxious to participate. Investment dollars would flow into Canada with the consequential rise in the value of the Canadian dollar, the creation of new companies, both within and around the energy field, and the rise in employment which would be immediate and dramatic.

What would be down the road? In a world short of energy, Canada would be unique, a blessed nation, a nation with not only sufficient energy but with a strong industrial base to use that energy, to make productive use of it for the well-being and social benefit of its citizens.

So to the government I say: Please take up the challenge, recognize the potential, take the steps necessary to achieve the vision of a nation which has the resources, has the knowledge, and has the resolve to realize its destiny.

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on a motion from the opposition which deplores the absence of an honest and efficient energy policy.

Some hon. members said this afternoon that it takes nerve and temerity to present such a motion at the beginning of this Thirty-second Parliament and I agree. I heard the hon. member who spoke before me say that we have no development policy in the field of energy. I would like to point out to him that our development policy in the field of energy applies to all provinces, not only to one or two, and I am talking more particularly about the western provinces.

Speaking of energy sources development, I would remind the House that during the short time it was in power the previous government, which is the official opposition today, agreed to allow massive exports of natural gas to the United States. That government agreed such exports without any guarantee of any kind as to the construction of a pipeline or as to the possible exchange of gas between the two countries, namely the state of Alaska and Canada. The opposition also made that decision during that short period of time to pave the way for massive exports of one of our most precious natural resources in Canada, a natural resource which among other things is non polluting and one of our most important assets. In doing that, the government of the time had no specific policy or program for Canada in this area, let alone for Canadians. So, Mr. Speaker, it can certainly not be called an efficient policy.

Before the Houses were convened, about a month after the transfer of powers, this government had already accepted and approved a decision by the National Energy Board to start the construction of a Quebec-maritimes gas pipeline, namely the St. Lazare-Boisbriand section, over a distance of some 30 miles. Mr. Speaker, that is what I believe we call efficiency.

But we are now faced with another dilemma. After the federal government agreed to have the construction of that section started, we are faced with another government that certainly has no development policy in the energy area. That government, the government of the province of Quebec, which wants to reduce its dependence on oil by 30 per cent by 1990, and its dependence on natural gas by 25 per cent by 1990, that government has not yet given its approval to the construction of that gas pipeline. We know that pipeline would have enabled 83 billion cubic feet of gas to be moved to a new market in Quebec and the maritimes, which is the equivalent of 40,000 barrels of oil a day.

While the government of Quebec refuses to approve that construction, Quebec energy and resources department experts stated before the National Energy Board that if it is to reach its 25 per cent goal by 1990 Quebec needs the construction of a gas pipeline all the way to Quebec City, a low price for ten years for the consumer and the distributor, and a guaranteed supply of gas from western Canada. You see the incoherence of such a government. While some officials of one of their respected departments, a most important department in view of the crisis we are facing in Canada, are asking the National Energy Board to take measures to step up the development and supply of energy in the province of Quebec, there are ministers who are unable to make decisions, which we feel, in view of the current situation, are probably outright political.

In spite of this, the Quebec minister of energy has indicated that Quebec can pay the world price for its natural gas. How do those who favour the thesis put forward by the Quebec government reconcile their irresponsible approach with the serious opportunities for gas development? Would a sovereign and independent Quebec have access to the natural gas from western Canada and enjoy the same favourable conditions as now?

If Quebec were no longer part of Canada, why should it receive preferential treatment over the United States for natural gas prices? The American markets are nearer to the gas fields than Quebec, and the natural gas sold in the United States brings $4.86 per thousand cubic feet to the Canadian producers compared with $1.51 for the gas sold to Quebec. If Quebeckers had to pay the international prices, the natural gas they now use would cost them $550 million. By comparison, they paid $225 million wholesale in 1979, and this represents only 7 per cent of the energy used in Quebec. If we consider a proportion of 25 per cent, which is the objective for 1990, the cost would rise to about $2 billion at the 1980 international prices for gas.

Mr. Speaker, we really must wonder what would happen in such a case to the energy self-sufficiency plans of the Quebec government. However, if we look at the present policy of the Canadian government, we see that we are trying to develop an energy program on a rational basis. As we have underlined and as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has underlined several times, Petro-Canada, this Canadian corporation which we want to maintain and in which we want to invest more money so that it may become one of the highest rated companies in Canada, continues its explorations in eastern Canada and the northern seas.

The discoveries that Petro-Canada has made already and will certainly continue to make in the future will benefit all Canadians, all Quebeckers, and certainly the entire population of eastern Quebec, especially in the lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé area. We all know to what extent these peripheral areas depend on energy discoveries at the present time, and we also know that Petro-Canada, because of its discoveries and the proximity of the gulf and the ocean, will be able to develop harbours on the north shore, the lower north shore and also in the Gaspé peninsula, and will eventually be able to think about building more plants.

It is extremely important, especially for the population of eastern Quebec, to share fairly in all these Canadian resources and in all this wealth. How can we, in Quebec, accept all that is being said at the present time in our province simply to convince part of the population, a part which I must say is getting smaller and smaller, as we shall certainly be able to see when the next poll is published, which should be tomorrow, I believe. We shall certainly see then that this percentage of the Quebec population is decreasing at a rate that the members of the Parti Québécois and the Quebec government will certainly find alarming.

Mr. Speaker, I am coming back to the members of the Parti Québécois who, as I was saying, claim that Hydro-Quebec will provide the money necessary to purchase oil and gas at world prices. This money will be obtained by selling electricity to the United States. The Quebec energy and resources minister said the following to a Radio-Canada reporter on March 10:

> We are going to depend increasingly on the international market for our oil; on the other hand, we will have ever larger quantities of electricity which can be seen in the framework of energy exchanges. That is to say, we sell our electricity at a high price and use the profits on that electricity to purchase our oil, so that in fact the cost of energy in Quebec will continue to be very low.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what the Quebec minister of energy spreads around the whole province almost daily. This afternoon, my colleague the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) quoted figures on oil. He mentioned that the estimates of the Quebec government do not correspond with what this party foresees. Well, just for a few moments, I should like to look at the forecast expansion of the Hydro-Quebec grid. In 1985, the surplus electricity available for export would reach a peak. At that time, Quebec would still be able to pay, with the help of its hydro exports, only 10 per cent of the total cost for oil imports. That, Mr. Speaker, does not take into account the world price it will have to pay for natural gas. As I said earlier, the Quebec government in 1990 wants to have at least 25 per cent of its energy requirements covered by natural gas.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, they are somewhat over-confident in their optimism on hydroelectric surpluses. It must be realized that these surpluses are short-term spin-offs. In other words, Mr. Speaker, when new power plants go on stream and provincial demand is lower than production, the surplus is sold in the United States. Current Hydro-Quebec projections are that after 1985 these surpluses will decline significantly. By 1995, provincial demand for hydro power should balance supply.

Even if the total production capacity currently built in the James Bay project were exported at twice today's price, gross revenue would be around $1.7 billion. This would leave no margin for conversion to electricity in Quebec, and leave a $2.6 billion deficit at the 1979 oil costs, and a $5.1 billion one at the current 1980 prices.

This shows that the Quebec government projections for future energy alternatives are totally out of line. They quote figures out of nowhere, they base their assumptions on an expected power yield that is totally unjustified. It is unfortunate in my view that the Quebec government ministers try to convince part of the people with unverified and unverifiable assumptions to document their point on the viability of independence, in a period of energy crisis where we know that the nation's greatest opportunities lie within other provinces. It is unfortunate that they come and tell the people that within 15 years the benefits from hydro power can balance the loss of oil supplies. It is most unfortunate that they use such an issue that is so vitally important to the survival of the people, that they make such points with partisan motives and nothing else.

I feel we should stick to the facts that now exist, and to the Canadian reality. As far as the federal government is concerned, what we want to do, what we want is precisely a development plan, by a corporation like Petro-Canada, which would allow us to divide the existing wealth and by which the province of Quebec, within a united country, could partake of the benefits and of the vast potential that we have. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Quebec, faced with all these facts and vast opportunities, will decide to continue being part of this great country in order to benefit from the policies our government has implemented, the policies it is implementing and also from everything the government intends to do in this regard so that the province of Quebec and the maritimes will have maximum benefit.

Mr. Speaker, as I have tried to show, all the Quebec government is trying to make us believe is that the demand for electricity will allow it to make up its deficit, especially its monetary deficit, so that Quebec can get its oil supply. But again, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we can believe those statements, and that is why our government, as the minister stated this afternoon, intends to take action in the field of energy so that all of Canada can satisfy all its energy needs.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I get a very strange sense of déjà vu when listening to this debate. It takes me back to 1974, 1975 and 1976 when the warnings being sounded by members on this side were ignored just as they are being ignored today.

I would like to ask the House to examine with me the chaotic situation that exists today in respect of energy in this country. Let us not forget that this is the same old government which dithered and dreamed while the energy situation worsened in those years from 1974 to 1979. They did not face up to the growing problem then and they are not now. They knew the problem was there. It was just as plain as the nose on the face of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), and I am disappointed to see that he is not in the House tonight. Indeed, there are no ministers in the House tonight when we are debating one of the most important issues that confront the country today. There is not a single minister in the treasury benches tonight to listen to the views and opinions being expressed by members of this House. This is the same old government that assured Canadians there was no energy problem in that last year of office prior to the May election, yet it increased the national deficit by $2 billion in that last year.

I see that there is now half a minister in the House. We do not know what he does to earn his salary, but the half of him is here.

The deficit in that last year of office was increased by $2 billion to pay for imported oil. This is that same old government which fought an election and won it on the issue of preventing an 18-cent a gallon increase and is now faced with the necessity of imposing a 16-cent a gallon increase almost immediately, with much more to come later, and that cannot be denied.

Our policy would have enabled Canadians to know what they were paying. It would have encouraged conservation, contrary to the dishonest assertions which I have been hearing in this debate in contributions made by those opposite. It would have encouraged conservation in the same way that President Carter's policy is doing in the United States. He has introduced almost an identical policy to the one which would have been adopted had our budget been passed. It would have reduced the incredible budgetary deficit by some $4 billion to $5 billion.

The government does not care how high our deficit goes. The Liberal policy is to deliberately conceal from Canadians what they are paying for oil. There are no ifs, ands or buts about that deliberate concealment. Their budget encourages the profligate use of diminishing energy resources. Their policy attempts to lull Canadians with the false assurance that all is well, when in fact the deficit is again rising by a further $2 billion over last year, and my prediction is that it will rise even higher with the blatant pork-barrelling that is going on by that same old bunch over there, day after day.

While Liberals have attempted to hide the consequences of their reckless policy of enforced bankruptcy, the results are evident in uncontrolled inflation, the drop in the value of the dollar, the spread of bankruptcies across this country, steadily increasing unemployment, and the steady diminution of public confidence. The policy which we prepared under the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was a tough policy, but it was an honest policy and it was effective. The government's budget is a wishy-washy, queasy, dishonest, sleazy policy. In a very short time Canadians, I believe, will see that we were right. They will not thank the present government for leading this great country once more on the road to bankruptcy. Canadians will see the Trudeau government for what it really is.

When the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis) was speaking and quoting from The Globe and Mail, the minister took exception to the source. I would like to give a quote, just so that members opposite will see that these views are not mine alone. My quote comes from a newspaper which has very rarely been a friend of those of us on this side of the House, the Ottawa Citizen, of just last week.

The article is an editorial which is headed, "Yes, but wait until next year."

Mr. Evans: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) who, I believe, is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, wishes to speak, I hope that he will rise and do so. There is also the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier) who runs around the House like some kind of punch in a Punch and Judy show. He comes down to the front bench to heckle, then moves over to the right and then to the left, but I never see him participate in debates. Let the hon. member rise if he wishes to ask a question; we will answer him.

I will read from the editorial which I found in a Liberal newspaper:

> There's been a lot of fiddle-faddling, diddle-dawdling and fuddle-duddling on the part of the federal Liberals over the question of an increase in the excise tax on motor fuel.
> The daily question period in the House has been dominated by the issue, as the Liberals played cat-and-mouse games with the Tories and as the Tories scrambled to put questions to the government that couldn't be evaded.
> It looked very much last week as if the House of Commons needs a rule requiring the government to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That, sir, as their history has proven, and as they have already proven in the short time that this House has been in session, is the last thing which we will hear from the ministry, the same old ministry that is now back in office. The editorial goes on:

> But the dam finally broke on Thursday under the persistent pressure of unimpeachably clear questions by Tories Bill Jarvis and Harvie Andre. The government finally made it known how it intends to get more revenue from energy without raising excise taxes.
> First, there's the matter of the government's time frame. Marc Lalonde had said earlier in the week that the Liberals never promised that they'd never increase the federal excise tax. The promise was for 1980 alone, despite whatever impression the Liberals may have wanted to convey to win votes in February.

Further on the editorial says:

> However, with the lid off on Liberal promises after January 1, 1981, this plan and others will likely come into play. One already in place, announced in finance minister Allan MacEachen's mini-budget, is the change in the federal sales tax paid by fuel retailers from five cents a gallon to a nine per cent ad valorem tax. As oil prices rise, the government's income from this source will increase too.

That is the shady way in which this government operates and in which they attempt to hide the inevitability of an increase in fuel prices in this country, and attempt to slough off the blame on the government which they replaced. In fact, so cynical, so crass is their policy, and so brutal in its disregard of the future of this country, that it could only be followed by those who, in their hearts, do not believe in Canada and have no faith in its future. It is a policy that is based on "here today and gone tomorrow". That is their philosophy and it shows.

Mr. Chénier: That is what happened to you last year.

Mr. Nielsen: There goes the Punch of the Punch and Judy show over there again. Their policy shows no regard for the faith which they should have in this country.

Mr. Chénier: What faith did the Canadian people have in you?

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau, instead of yapping away with this clap trap over there, wants to participate in the debate, then let him rise and do so and not act like a Punch in a Punch and Judy show, popping all over the House and heckling away.

Mr. Chénier: You said that before. You are the clown, not us.

Mr. Nielsen: Nowhere have the weakness and evasiveness of the government been more evident than on the question of energy pricing. They know full well they cannot go on subsidizing oil imports at the expense of the taxpayer, piling up huge and dangerous deficits. The cost of financing this government's deficits is now a major component of our annual expenditures. Our government tried to face up to this situation. It was an element of the budget introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West. Yet this vacillating government continues to pretend that it is offering Canadians cheap, or relatively cheap gas, and in that very fact encourages waste.

If one were to talk about their so-called policies on conservation, there has been no attempt whatsoever at providing leadership in the field of energy conservation by the government. Quite to the contrary. One simple way in which oil conservation could be encouraged, would be a reduction in the price of natural gas which would give Canadians an incentive to convert from oil to natural gas. Another example of this government's erratic energy posture was the meeting between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and Premier Bennett of British Columbia just a day or two ago, the details of which still remain shrouded in mystery.

It is, however, authoritatively reported that the Prime Minister offered to provide federal funding for the proposed B.C.-Japanese coal project only on the condition that B.C. would make some kind of tax concessions for the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. If there has been a more blatant betrayal of the pipeline project, I do not know where it is recorded. The supreme irony is that this comes from the Prime Minister—who has been accusing the Clark government of fumbling this very pipeline, an accusation which he knew to be false when he made it.

When the Prime Minister goes to work, he does not fumble, he simply knifes the project in the back and does it behind closed doors. I cannot say that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is very far behind him in the manner in which he has been manipulating, or attempting to manipulate, the decisions of the National Energy Board, which is supposed to be a free and independent agency of the government, making its own free and independent decisions.

The latest episode in the oil pricing charade is when the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources issues provocative statements such as the one he made to the Conference Board yesterday, to the effect that Alberta, and I am quoting him, "cannot use its resources to the detriment of the rest of Canada." He said that again today. While he was saying it, it took me back to the days when I lived in the maritime provinces. The people down there felt very deprived. They felt that eastern Canada was lying under the udder of the cow; the front end of the cow was feeding the prairie provinces, and guess what the maritimes got? That is what they are getting under this government as well.

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? Does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make that kind of statement about Saskatchewan selling its potash at world prices, or does it mean that Quebec is marketing its hydro power—does he make the statement with respect to that matter—or Ontario its wood pulp or gold—does he mean it should sell its nickel at world prices as he insists that Alberta does with its resources, and Saskatchewan too?

It is a dangerous game that is being played by the Liberal party and the Liberal government, both in Alberta and British Columbia. I might say that this does nothing at all to encourage unity in this country. The government is playing fast and loose with provincial resources and provincial rights as though these things were within the jurisdiction of the federal bureaucracy. They are not, and the attitude that they are is one of the reasons why we have creeping separatism across this country today. They are deliberately fueling that emotion in this country. There is no question about it. As my friend says, they set about destroying it and they are achieving it in a very admirable fashion, as we see across our northern provincial boundary today. It is a very dangerous game they are playing. There is no question in my mind that if more attention had been paid to the rights and needs of the provinces in energy and other fields, we would not be having a referendum in Quebec today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Federal government spokesmen have been using the same tactic in Quebec as they used in the rest of Canada during the election. They have made energy a political football. They have been going into Quebec and promising cheap oil as an incentive to vote in a certain way in the referendum. Like thousands of others, I hope that Quebec citizens will see where their interests lie and reject the ghetto mentality of the Parti Québécois and its supporters. But I deplore a tactic which promises what is not theirs to deliver, just as they did during the election campaign last May. The energy crisis in this country will not be resolved as long as this government treats it as political bait, provides no leadership in conservation, and refuses to take the necessary measures to control this situation. The situation in Quebec cannot be resolved on a promise to deliver cheap oil. That is not going to happen.

Energy is a symptom of this government's breakdown in the field of federal-provincial relations, as is their absolute disregard for the constitutional rights of the provinces in every field, including offshore rights about which they continue to make threatening statements. That is why Canada is fragmented and that is why we have a situation in Quebec which is a reflection of a similar uneasiness, felt but not voiced as loudly yet in other provinces.

Recently the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), that jolly jumper, that jovial gentleman who at one stroke rid himself of all contenders for the leadership of his party and returned to office as a part-time Prime Minister, told Canadians—a so-called part-time Prime Minister—that they could easily afford to pay exorbitant interest rates. To young married couples across this country, newly established in expensive homes and following extremely tight budgets, this arrogant bachelor over there says, "pay up or ship out." "You can afford it," he told them from the eminence of his minister's salary, "It is no problem. All my friends," he says, "are in a position to pay." That is an astonishing statement from one who, in earlier years, when the mantle of humility sat on his shoulders at one time, was a paragon of socialist virtues—a man moved to tears in this House by the simple contemplation of the number of Canadians living below the subsistence level.

As if that were not enough, sir, a few days ago he complained in the House—at least I thought he was complaining though he may well have been boasting—that a number of his cabinet colleagues were coming in with expensive programs which might have the effect of increasing the present astronomical deficit even further. There seems to be continuing contention between himself and the minister responsible for DREE.

It is a new and welcome departure to see the minister in the role of watchdog of the public purse. It is unfortunate that he did not adopt that role somewhat sooner, a few years ago, for example, when his colleagues took their first faltering steps toward the fiscal chasm on which they are now hovering.

Unless they change their ways, Mr. Speaker, and face up to the problems as did the hon. member for St. John's West in his budget of last December, the Apocalypse will be upon us. I do not expect that they will change because the same Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse are back at the helm. I speak of the Minister of Finance, I speak of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and, of course, I cannot leave out the Prime Minister. The same old bunch, the same old bankrupt methods, and the same old pork-barrelling thrust.

So bad is the situation, so bankrupt the government of policy that the minister did not even dare to bring in a real honest-to-God budget. He favoured the House with a poor, misshapen, ill-conceived, tortured, whimpering excrescence that he tried to pass off as a budget—a performance that not even all his artfulness could accomplish. He brought it in by the back door, sir. He snuck it in in a way that would attract the least attention during the debate on the address when it would attract the least notice. He parked the baby on the doorstep and stole away into the night, leaving for Europe by the first plane, but not before he trampled the rights of Parliament by denying debate on money measures. We are used to that kind of conduct, though.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hate to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: More.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There appears to be unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a first performance it is unexcelled in budgetary history. Presumably on the next go-around the minister will simply sit in his office and issue a directive which the House will be expected to follow. With the electronic progress we have made in this place it will probably come to us through the earphones rather than the House being graced by his presence.

They have started issuing legislative decrees, as was pointed out the other day by Eugene Forsey. This same attitude of benevolent disdain is shown by this government in coming to grips with the oil crisis, a difficult thing for a government to do at any time, and particularly difficult for a government already as slippery as the present government. As my friend, the hon. member for St. John's West says, they are as "slippery as a cod's tongue in a barrelful of cod livers."

Once again we see the same old Liberal policy, the same old shell game of appointing several people to be responsible in the same area so that no one knows where the real responsibility lies. I suggest it lies at the door of the Prime Minister. We have a minister of energy but he is not responsible for pipelines. They are the responsibility of another gentleman who is in the other place and cannot be questioned in this House. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has a piece of the action when he is not sweating it out or too occupied with Chrysler as he is every day, all day. We wonder when that decision is going to be made.

Is it any wonder with all these crooks—excuse me, cooks, that the energy broth has become a bubbling stew of inapplicable policies and ineffective programs?

Where is the minister of energy now? What is he up to? He is a brooding figure in his seat, day after day—mum and out of touch.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58 (11) the proceedings on this motion have expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Thank you for recognizing me, Mr. Speaker. I just want to confirm some arrangements for tomorrow. To bring the House up to date, I have had discussions with the House leaders on the other side about private members' hour. Not too many of the private members' bills have been circulated and distributed yet. Those who have their bills printed are either unwilling or unable to proceed tomorrow. We were hoping to proceed with motions at one point and there were discussions about continuing with government business until five o'clock. I was wondering if we could have some general agreement reached as to whether or not that is the agreed course of action for tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we had explored that point. I think it might be best that this, being the first of private members' hours, that private members' business could be dealt with tomorrow rather than going to government business. Since the private bills are not ready, I understand it is the rule that we could move to motions. I know of at least one motion that is ready, and there are perhaps others that would be ready to proceed tomorrow so that private members' hour would not be wasted.

I believe it is important that private members of the House do have an opportunity to express themselves on their own matters, and we ought to preserve that right. That is the attitude that I have taken in discussing the matter.

I did explore the matter of going on with government business, but it was felt that we should preserve as much as we could of the private members' hour. This is one way that we might be able to do it, so there would be a private member's motion ready to be heard tomorrow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The suggestion is that private members' hour tomorrow should deal with private members' motions. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, if it is agreed, then perhaps tomorrow before eleven o'clock we could let the House leaders know which motion will be called, after consultation in the normal way with those persons whose names stand on the order paper under motions.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is quite acceptable, and I want to thank the parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—AID TO SYDNEY STEEL AND MICHELIN TIRE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, about three weeks ago I asked the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) about the situation with regard to two very important projects to the economy of Nova Scotia, namely, Michelin Tire expansion, and aid to Sysco. I see my friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan) is here in the chamber tonight and I see that he shares my concern although he has been strangely quiet about expressing the same kind of concern that he did when he sat on this side of the House, but I guess that is understandable.

The Minister of Finance sat mute in his seat and permitted the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Harquail) to assure the House that there would be an announcement made very shortly. Enough time has elapsed, about three weeks, that I feel compelled to underscore, once again, the importance of this particular situation not only to the province of Nova Scotia but to the Canadian economy.

I want to take this opportunity also to express my confidence in and my admiration for the new Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané), a man of sensitivity and a man who, I truly believe, has the interests of all parts of Canada foremost in his mind. As I say, I want to take this first opportunity to assure him of my good will and support in this regard.

Unfortunately, I cannot express the same admirable sentiments when it comes to the attitude and the past record of the Minister of Finance who has had, for a period of ten years, the opportunity as a member of the government of this country, and as a minister from Nova Scotia, to do something. Instead of that he and the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), the former premier of Nova Scotia for nearly a decade, were not part of the solution, they were part of the problem.

However, dealing first with Michelin, may I just put on the record that this is a very important project. To all intents and purposes it was a fait accompli early last winter. There really has been no valid reason for the delay in the confirmation of this very important project which not only will assure that Nova Scotia will be pre-eminent in the field of radial tire technology but, indeed, will ensure a vital stake for Canada in this particularly important industry. The fact that certain parts of Ontario are having difficulty with their segment of the rubber industry certainly should be no reason for anyone to try to deny the obvious merit of proceeding with the Michelin expansion in Nova Scotia. This company makes one of the finest, if not the finest, tires in the world, has fulfilled all of its commitments and should certainly, as a matter of right, be allowed to proceed with an RDIA grant which is not only perfectly in order but which should have been announced weeks ago.

If the government does not wish to proceed on that basis it could certainly proceed under the aegis of a subagreement under the general development agreement between the province and the Government of Canada. So I can only reiterate my hope that the government will get on with this job and stop the delay which is only costing employment and economic impetus to the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker, dealing with the Sysco situation, this again is vital to the Nova Scotia economy. On its success rests not only the economic well-being of Cape Breton Island but also the viability of a large industry in Trenton, Nova Scotia, employing some 2,000 people. The Minister of Finance, as a Cape Bretoner, ought to know that delay is the deadliest form of denial. He participated in this tactic for, as I say, almost a decade together with Tom Kent who was probably the most incompetent manager that any large corporation ever had, setting the cause of Sysco back for a decade instead of modernizing and building upon the foundation which existed in 1970 when the government of Nova Scotia had previously, for various reasons, to take over this corporation and which was then producing about a million tons of steel every year under the same chief executive officer who has now come back to try to resuscitate it after ten years of neglect. Instead of doing something at that time, the government continued to obfuscate and delay. Mr. Speaker, there is ample precedent for the Government of Canada doing something immediately to take this economic burden off the province of Nova Scotia. We have the St. Lawrence Seaway reorganization and consolidation of debt; we have the Air Canada situation where a similar burden was lifted, and Nova Scotia deserves at least the kind of economic consideration that wealthier parts of this country have enjoyed from this government.

I see my time has almost elapsed in this brief adjournment debate. May I simply say to the government opposite: Get on with the job. Our government was doing something about it. The government had ten years to do something about it, and since taking office again it looks as if we are back to the same old empty promises exemplified by the grandiose Gabarouse project that the Deputy Prime Minister ate off for years with no results for anyone.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, the present government shares the concern of the hon. member in respect of the future of the Sydney Steel Corporation in Cape Breton and the possibility of additional manufacturing and related activity in Nova Scotia by Michelin Tires (Canada) Limited.

The hon. member is well aware that this government wrote the first significant subsidiary agreement for assistance to the Sydney Steel Corporation in December of 1977, with total commitments close to $20 million. Further significant federal commitment to the Sydney Steel Corporation was made in April, 1979, but was not acted upon by either the province of Nova Scotia or the Government of Canada which assumed power after May 22, 1979. Since that time the circumstances which led to the federal commitment to Sysco have changed considerably. The company and the province decided not to enter into a long-term billets contract with Tree Island Steel Company of British Columbia, and the government of Nova Scotia primarily withdrew from further consideration of comprehensive joint studies which had been made to examine viable future options for the company. I am, however, optimistic that Canada and Nova Scotia will resume serious examination of viable future long-term solutions for Sysco.

I have to remind the hon. member, of course, that the Sydney Steel Corporation is a provincial Crown corporation and that decisions as to the future of the corporation are in large part dictated by the objectives of the government of Nova Scotia. I can say, however, that I do not believe that short-term remedies for Sysco which have been proposed from time to time constitute the right way to go about solving the problems of the company.

I understand that the province of Nova Scotia presented a proposal to the previous administration in January of this year. No action was taken at that time. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has indicated to the House, he has discussed the Sysco situation with Premier Buchanan at a meeting on April 11 in Halifax and in other telephone conversations. He has also indicated to the House today that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) and other members of the government are prepared to sit down with the government of Nova Scotia at any time to consider concrete plans which will have some prospect of ensuring a viable future for the provincially-owned steel plant at Sydney. He emphasized that any federal contribution will need to be placed in the context of a plan that is based on a viable production, sales and marketing program which can also provide an assurance of the longer term future of Sysco.

ENERGY—PROTECTION OF LOWER-INCOME GROUPS FROM SEVERE PRICE INCREASES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, we are now at a critical stage in the history of the maritime provinces. New Brunswick, for example, faces grave threats to its economic and social well-being and also significant opportunities to escape some of its chronic difficulties. In 1979-80 it achieved the dubious distinction of having half its provincial revenues derived from Ottawa—a landmark of dependency already passed by Prince Edward Island and soon to be reached by Nova Scotia. Moreover, rising energy costs threaten New Brunswick's single most important industry, the forestry sector, for its mills are substantially more energy-intensive than competitors elsewhere; this at a time when disease control and plant modernization are also urgent. Because social benefits reversed the net migration out of New Brunswick during the 1970s—a good thing in itself—the province has a high unemployment rate despite a respectable record of job creation.

In fact New Brunswick is just now experiencing what most other provinces began adjusting to some time ago—an increasing number of job seekers, especially women, with high educational qualifications and career aspirations to match.

There is one other major obstacle to maritime economic recovery which has been part of our condition for so long we have almost stopped treating it as a problem. If New Brunswick is to have significant manufacturing beyond the processing of its own most skilled and enterprising citizens, then it must identify and develop external markets, and it must have technologies suited to local circumstances. But large companies based outside the region have little reason to invest in such marketing or research and development, and most local companies can seldom afford it.

Those opportunities which must be seized relate mostly to energy. In terms of supply, there are several possibilities for reversing our growing and dangerous reliance on imported oil—dangerous for all of Canada because the country is already subsidizing New Brunswick alone to the tune of about $1 million a day. For Atlantic Canada as a whole, the figure is now well over $3 million.

Expanded hydroelectric capacity, including the harnassing of Fundy tidal power, is the most attractive source because such energy will never run out. We hear mutterings about the prohibitive cost of Fundy power but, as the cost of fossil fuels skyrockets and as we compare estimates for this kind of development with the projected investment in tar sands projects, we are entitled to wonder why the investigation of Fundy has been so slow.

We should also be thinking of a regional power grid and drawing on plentiful, distant sources, such as the still underdeveloped potential of the lower Churchill Falls in Labrador. New Brunswick's commitment to nuclear energy has been made in the form of Point Lepreau, which will begin to provide from 20 per cent to 30 per cent of provincial electric requirements next year. The ideal solution for pulp and paper mills is, of course, to convert wood residue to useful energy. Apart from the saving in imported oil, this would be a stimulus for new forest management techniques on both farmlands and private woodlots. Coal and thermal peat have technological obstacles to be overcome, but these resources also exist in abundance.

● (2215)

The question of natural gas is a distinctly two-sided one. There are enormous potential gains for New Brunswick. The Petro-Canada proposal to ship liquefied natural gas from the Arctic to an east coast port, where it would be gasified and piped to central Canadian markets, as well as the more immediate Q and M and TransCanada proposals to ship western gas eastward until Arctic resources are available—all these would command substantial activity. Q and M alone forecasts 5,500 man years over a three-year period.

The availability of natural gas opens up numerous industrial possibilities, including materials for the conversion of users to gas from other forms of energy, plastic pipe for the transmission of gas, and the production of New Brunswick's newly exploited potash resources.

The greatest opportunity of all, however, is for the expansion of Saint John's shipbuilding facilities in order to build liquid natural gas carriers. Experts are agreed that if a proposed two-phase, $50-million program to lengthen and widen the inner dry dock goes ahead, the port's permanent ice-free condition and other modern facilities will make it a strong competitor for vessel contracts.

The danger in natural gas development is long term and controllable, but only if we keep sight of it amidst the present enthusiasm. Gas is a non-renewable resource; the maritimes must learn from their mistake with oil and not become heavily dependent on another vanishing commodity. Natural gas consumption must be treated primarily as a transitional phase, with conservation and non-depleting forms of energy as the ultimate answers.

The previous government demonstrated, in the short time allowed it by the Liberals and their western surrogates, that it understood the problems and the need for immediate, comprehensive action.

Virtually every reputable economic authority in and outside the country, not to mention previous Liberal ministers of finance and energy, recognized that there could be no successful conservation campaign and no adequate development of alternate energy sources, until oil prices began rising toward realistic levels. The proposed energy bank was precisely the kind of mechanism through which research and conversion could be financed in the maritimes, and it would have provided the impetus, finally, to activate the Maritime Energy Corporation as the basis for a co-ordinated, long-term regional strategy. The budget also recognized the need to cushion the impact of oil price increases during the period of transition, hence both the shelter allowance and the subsidy for oil-generated electricity.

For an average maritime family of four driving 12,000 miles a year, getting 20 miles per gallon for gas and earning under $21,000 a year, the energy tax credit of $80 per adult and $30 per child would have amounted to $220—and fully compensated for the 18-cent excise increase and $4 a barrel price increase. Whatever the government's eventual position on oil pricing, I recommend that special consideration like this be given Canadians in the lower and middle income brackets, and that a goal of energy self-sufficiency stress development of our indigenous energy sources.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Mines): Mr. Speaker, when the minister responded to the questions from the hon. member for York Sunbury (Mr. Howie), he explained that he was in the process of negotiating with the producing provinces on oil prices and, until that process was completed, he would not know the extent to which the new price structure might impose a burden on the Atlantic provinces. It could be said with certainty, however, that the impact of a price increase would have been much greater under the planned budget of the previous government. In fact, the price increase this year will be less than half of what it would have been under the Tories.

The government is examining Atlantic provinces needs in the context of the over-all energy strategy now being developed. Specific programs can only be worked out, however, when revenues that will be available to the federal government are known, and this information must await a determination of oil price conditions. The very considerable assistance that has been provided to the Atlantic provinces in relation to oil costs should not be forgotten.

● (2220)

Over the years the federal government has provided assistance in a variety of ways to assist the maritime provinces in meeting their electricity requirements. The assistance dates from the early 1960s when funds were provided under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act. More recently support has been provided through federal loans to aid New Brunswick in construction of the Point Lepreau nuclear generating station, and Nova Scotia through funds to advance construction on the second coal-fired thermal generating unit at the Lingan coal mine. Prince Edward Island has been assisted through the construction of the interconnecting cable providing lower cost electrical energy from its neighbouring provinces. Assistance to Newfoundland is being provided through the Lower Churchill Development Corporation leading to proposals for hydroelectric development in Labrador and related electrical transmissions systems.

The federal government is strongly committed to the Maritime Energy Corporation as a means of achieving a co-operative effort in the planning and development of efficient electrical distribution throughout the maritime provinces. The federal government stands ready to provide financial support to this broader degree of regional co-operation and planning as soon as the maritime provinces reach a consensus on a procedure that would permit the necessary co-ordination. Any further studies of the Bay of Fundy tidal power must await the establishment of the Maritime Energy Corporation in accordance with a memorandum of understanding signed by the three maritime governments and the federal government in February, 1979.

I should like to remind hon. members of the huge amount of assistance that has been provided to residents of the Atlantic provinces, in respect of oil price increases, by way of the oil import compensation program. During the past six years the people of the Atlantic provinces have benefited from this program to the extent of about $2.5 billion, or approximately $1,100 per person over a six-year period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the time allotted for the hon. parliamentary secretary has expired.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALLEGED ILLEGALITIES COMMITTED BY MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to raise some very serious questions concerning the RCMP operation Checkmate, the McDonald commission, and the role of the Liberal government to date in these matters. I might add that unfortunately the Conservative party in this Parliament has been totally silent, both inside and outside the House, on these important points concerning the responsibilities of the government to uphold the rule of law in this country.

Operation Checkmate, which was disclosed on April 19 and 20, made reference to a number of illegal operations carried out under the guise of disruptive measures pursuant to the alleged mandate of the RCMP security service. The concern that I have on this question is that if we are to respect the principle that there cannot be one law for the RCMP and another law for the rest of Canadians—and surely this must be a cardinal principle under our system of law in this country—where there is clear evidence of wrongdoing, either criminal wrongdoing or under another federal statute, it is incumbent upon the government to prosecute that wrongdoing.

Of course, we have seen where there are prosecutions in some cases that the courts will consider the circumstances in arriving at a sentence, such as in the case of Superintendent Cobb who was given an absolute discharge in connection with the APLQ break-in. Unfortunately, the attitude of this government, however, appears to be not one of upholding the concept of the rule of law, but rather saying that if certain actions to date on the part of the RCMP have been illegal, if the RCMP have been breaking the law, then we must change the law. That appears to be the concept of the Liberal government, and that is a concept which we on this side of the House reject.

I would point only to the example of mail opening. We have seen a succession of evidence of illegal mail opening, many instances of mail opening, and the response of the government. The hasty response of the new Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has been: well, perhaps what we should be doing, then, is changing the law to make this very serious invasion of our privacy legal. Once again, we reject that response to this question.

There are a number of remedies which the government can consider in dealing with violations of the law by the RCMP. Basically there are three such remedies. First, there is a question of prosecution either by provincial attorneys general or by the federal attorney general. Of course, the question of jurisdiction was one of the questions which arose in my exchange with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on April 21.

It is clearly beyond any doubt under criminal law in this country that the federal government has the responsibility and, indeed, the exclusive jurisdiction to prosecute under federal statutes such as the Post Office Act or the Income Tax Act. Indeed, the Supreme Court of Canada has left open the question as to whether the federal government has jurisdiction to prosecute under the Criminal Code of Canada, that is, of course, in the Hauser decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. Prosecution is one remedy that is available.

A second remedy is disciplinary proceedings against those members of the RCMP who have been found to have violated the law, and thirdly there is the question of civil action by those persons or groups who have been aggrieved by the illegal actions of the RCMP. This is a time-consuming and expensive method of proceeding on these wrongdoings, however.

The significant factor in all of these cases of wrongdoing today is that there has not been a single charge, not a single prosecution in respect of any of these wrongdoings. It is that fact which is causing very serious questions to arise in the minds of Canadians as to the desire of this government and its predecessor to uphold the rule of law in this country.

We have seen a series of offences under the Criminal Code; forgery, breaking and entering, theft and impersonation. I suggest it is encumbent upon this government not to hide behind the smokescreen of the McDonald commission, but to proceed to show Canadians that where the law is violated there is a responsibility on the part of the government to prosecute under that law, and that there is one law for all Canadians.

We in the New Democratic Party expressed serious concern at the time of the formation of the McDonald commission, in a number of areas, including the limited terms of reference of this commission and its failure to have any mandate to look at the question of political accountability of the security service. We were frankly concerned about the political background of a number of the commissioners and, indeed, of some of the senior staff, and that was a background of active involvement in the Liberal party.

We are concerned that the RCMP must not be allowed to be made scapegoats if the responsibility for their illegal actions lies higher up in the political chain. The commission has been going for approximately three years, and at every instance when the illegal actions of the RCMP have been disclosed we have been told by members of the government that we will have to await the outcome of that commission.

We say that the time has come to act. The Prime Minister has indicated that he intends to await the outcome of the commission report. We say, based on the record of the commission so far, and based particularly on the record of the commission in its first report on the Official Secrets Act, that we have very little cause for optimism, indeed, that this report will not be satisfactory to deal with the concerns we have in this area.

In closing I would like to say that there are two major points on which we would like some clarification. The first is, are the disruptive measures which were used by the RCMP in operation Checkmate still authorized under the mandate of the security service today, and are they being carried out? Secondly, as I asked the Prime Minister, what happened to the files which were destroyed pertaining to operation Checkmate, and who authorized that destruction?

There are many other serious questions in this area of the RCMP and the law, and I am sure that in the days ahead they will be raised.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Mines): Mr. Speaker, as both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) have stated, it is not the policy of the government to comment on the day to day proceedings of the commission of inquiry. This includes the details of operation Checkmate and the destruction of associated files, which matter is also under investigation by the commission.

It can be said, however, that it is the Solicitor General's policy, as it has been of his immediate predecessors, to direct the framework of the law. As for the future, the government is considering future arrangements to govern the activities of the RCMP, and in this regard the government hopes that the forthcoming report of the commission of inquiry will be useful.

The laying of charges is not the responsibility of the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General, but a unique prerogative of the attorneys general, federal and provincial, depending on the nature of the case. However, Mr. Justice McDonald has clearly indicated that he would prefer any such action to await his report, and in view of the fact that he is committed to report during the summer it seems reasonable to give the commission this opportunity.

The government recognizes that the provincial attorneys general are fully responsible to determine what action they should take and when it should be taken. The Solicitor General has offered consultations to them, and two provincial attorneys general have taken up his offer, as a result of which further information under his control will be provided to them. In the event, however, that any of the attorneys general seek access to the in-camera transcripts of the proceedings of the commission, it should be borne in mind that the commissioners have taken position that the control of such material is theirs exclusively. Accordingly, in such circumstances it would be necessary for the Solicitor General to discuss any such requests with the commissioners.

The commission itself established rules that determine who is authorized to have access to the transcripts of its in-camera proceedings. The Government of Canada has access to such transcripts, but for it to circulate the information further would in the view of the commissioners, be contrary to the rules of the commission, If, however, any of the attorneys general involved decide to make formal representations to the Solicitor General to secure access to the in-camera transcripts, the Solicitor General is prepared to discuss the matter further with the commission.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

CHRYSLER CANADA—ALLEGED FAILURE TO REACH EQUITABLE AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the privilege of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Inasmuch as the motor car manufacturing industry is in a financial crisis as a result of the rapidly changing market and competition from overseas, and whereas the jobs and livelihood of thousands of Canadians are threatened by the mismanagement and incompetence of the Liberal government and, in particular, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House condemn the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for his failure to negotiate an equitable agreement with Chrysler to safeguard Canadian jobs and for misleading this House and the Canadian people by publicly indicating on three occasions that he had reached an agreement with Chrysler.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TOURISM

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SEPARATE DEPARTMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on what is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, not only to the residents of the Parry Sound-Muskoka region but also to the residents of all regions of the country which depend heavily upon revenue generated from tourist activity.

For the year 1978, the total revenue generated from tourist activity involving both Canadian citizens and residents of foreign countries amounted to $11.1 billion, or 5 per cent of the country's GNP. In light of the fact that the revenue produced from activity directly or indirectly associated with the tourist industry in this country represents such a substantial proportion of the country's GNP, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That an independent department of tourism be established by the current administration to be headed by a minister solely responsible for tourist activity in this country and to be staffed by individuals presently affiliated with the branch of tourism under the existing Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATURAL RESOURCES

APPLICATION OF BNA ACT IN NEGOTIATIONS ON ENERGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Section 109 of the BNA Act and Supreme Court of Canada decisions on that section clearly state that mines and minerals, including oil and gas, belong to the provinces in which they are situated. The Government of Canada has honoured that section with respect to Quebec and Ontario resources such as asbestos, lead, zinc, nickel, electricity, etc. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to recognize his personal and public duty to honour and uphold the constitution and that he instruct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to honour section 109 in the present energy negotiations.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AIRPORTS

DEVELOPMENT OF AIRPORT IN HAMILTON AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

S.O. 43

In light of recent statements by the Minister of Transport that the future of Hamilton airport has as yet not been determined, and in light of repeated announcements over the last two years which have indicated a willingness, both on the part of previous Liberal governments and of the immediate past government of the Conservative party, that expansion plans with a price tag of not less than $40 million had been approved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this government set forth, in a concise statement, plans which it has for the development of a regional airport in the Hamilton area and that, in addition, this statement clearly sets out the parameters in terms of size, dollars and aircraft usage within which a regional airport is intended to fall.

REPORTED DAMAGING STATEMENT CONCERNING STAFF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

A recent statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) in the May 7, 1980, edition of the Ottawa Citizen reads as follows: "—that he knew of cases where females had to go to bed with supervisors to get promotions."

Owing to the fact that this now casts a cloud of suspicion over the House of Commons staff, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the hon. member for Ottawa West be called immediately to appear before the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services to explain these very upsetting and damaging statements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ABORTIONS

CALL FOR DEBATE AND AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and heartrending necessity.

In view of the fact that the lives of over 60,000 innocent Canadian children were terminated by the decision of therapeutic abortion committees during the past year, and recognizing that unborn infants are not nondescript appendages attached to their mother's womb but, in fact, are living human beings to whom society has an undeniable moral responsibility, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government be directed to convene a full parliamentary debate on this important subject at the earliest possible hour, with a view to amending the Criminal Code so as to recognize the full legal and human rights of unborn children and that, further, the three political parties represented here do consent to a free-conscience vote on the consequent amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR LIGHT RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM IN B.C. LOWER MAINLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that previous Liberal governments have made promises with respect to the funding of light rapid transit and have broken them, and in view of the fact that the benefits of light rapid transit, including energy conservation, efficient movement of people and preservation of residential neighbourhoods from cars and bridges, are well established, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House calls upon the federal government to provide major financial assistance for the capital and operating costs of the proposed light rapid transit system for the lower mainland of British Columbia.

PROMOTION OF SWEET APPLE CIDER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the urgent and pressing necessity to protect the primary producers of this country, and in the afterglow of the unanimity of the House this week when it passed Bill S-5, defining Canadian champagne, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That the Minister of Agriculture use the weight of his office to finally enact long-delayed regulations to preserve the purity and protect the market for sweet apple cider, so that those Canadians who have neither the taste nor the pocketbook for champagne can enjoy the quiet quality and sobering strength of natural sweet apple cider.

THE CONSTITUTION

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR AMENDMENT IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas some provinces have repeatedly refused to endorse the patriation of the Constitution of Canada from Britain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty the Queen, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). Does the House agree to such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

● (1115)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the House will remember that the previous government of which I was the prime minister had submitted to Parliament a white paper and a bill the effect of which would have been that suggested by the motion of the hon. member opposite.

Naturally, we are still anxious that this happen, and that Canadians can really see themselves as having a Canadian Constitution rather than a constitution made more than a century ago in another country and still ultimately amendable there. This has been our aim for many years.

I think the House has heard me say that many prime ministers of different political stripes have attempted this patriation operation, with the first attempts going back to the middle 1920s. Each time we failed to achieve the purpose because, as the motion tells us, one or the other, and sometimes several, provinces refused to agree on an amending formula.

We are determined that in the months ahead the House will have an occasion to express itself on this matter. Perhaps the House leaders of the other parties, our own House leader and myself could discuss the appropriate time to proceed with that. For my part, I think it would be appropriate if we consulted the provinces before acting unilaterally on that motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if I may just respond for a few moments to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said, I think it is the desire of most Canadians that there be that right within our own country to amend our own constitution. I think that goes without saying, really, but I think I should say it because of the spirit in which the Prime Minister has put forward the motion today. I was very happy to hear him say that we might consult with respect to an opportunity in this House of Commons to debate this matter. I think that is a very appropriate reference, and I commend him for it.

I also commend him for indicating the necessity and, indeed, if not the necessity certainly the propriety in our system, of consulting the provinces in respect of that matter before we act unilaterally.

Speaking for my own party, I would be more than happy to consult with my friend, the government House leader, as to an appropriate time when that debate might take place. I undertake, on behalf of my party, to participate in that kind of discussion in the event that it is initiated.

Therefore, I commend the hon. member for bringing forward this motion today and I think, given those parameters which have been laid out, I think quite appropriately, by the Prime Minister, it is a motion worthy of the support of this House.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, not only do we commend the hon. member for bringing forward the motion, but we commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for giving it the consideration that he has in the remarks he has just made.

I certainly want to say, on behalf of our party, that we are prepared at any time to have discussions among the House leaders as to the appropriate time when we could have a debate on this issue, and one hopes that we might come to a satisfactory conclusion.

● (1120)

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, in speaking to this motion may I indicate how pleased I am to have heard the comments by the Prime Minister and the House leaders of the two opposition parties. However, I would like to inform the House that during private members' motions this afternoon from four o'clock to five o'clock, motion No. 13—which deals very specifically with this matter—will be up for discussion.

In that light, this motion this afternoon, as far as I understand it, deals not only with the patriation of the constitution but, indeed, deals with a possible amending formula which goes back some time in its evolution. Indeed, I hope it will be a time when, in fact, a number of members of this House can rise in their places and speak on this motion.

I trust, again, Madam Speaker, that a similar motion, either to the motion under Standing Order 43 this morning or the private members' motion this afternoon from four to five will be brought before this House at the earliest opportunity for an additional debate, as this matter should be debated by Parliament at the earliest opportunity.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DIPLOMATS WHO EVACUATED AMERICANS FROM IRAN

Madam Speaker: Before we begin the oral question period, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of our Canadian diplomats in Iran who helped in the escape of the American diplomats.

[English]

It is always satisfying when one is called upon to render service to others. I am sure that is sufficient reward to our diplomats from Iran, but I know this House would want to pay homage to the intelligence and courage of Ambassador Ken Taylor and his colleagues for having done something which makes Canada extremely proud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have just received a joint resolution from the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the state of Tennessee, expressing appreciation to the government and the people of Canada for the action of their diplomats in Iran. I am sure that hon. members will want me to reply on their behalf.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT'S DECISION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, yesterday the right hon. Leader of the Opposition tried, without success, to find out the reasons for the reversal on the Chrysler decision which apparently was dealt with by cabinet.

My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether or not it was because of actions taken, or statements made by Chrysler Canada, the province of Ontario, or the decision of the federal cabinet, that the position which apparently had been taken by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was reversed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to point out that there was no reversal of a decision. The subject, which had been discussed at previous times in cabinet, was discussed again today. A decision was not reached in time to make the announcement yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, there was clearly a reversal. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated his intention to make an announcement at three o'clock, and a short while later he came out of the cabinet meeting and said that he was sorry, that no decision had been taken and there would be no announcement.

• (1125)

My question relates more to the position of the United States government. Today, the U.S. loan board will be making a decision on their aid package to Chrysler. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated quite clearly that there is a very close relationship between the position the Government of Canada would take and the position of the U.S. loan board.

Because of the importance of this decision, I am sure the Prime Minister is very current on these negotiations. Could he advise whether there was something that the U.S. loan board were requesting from Canada, in their proposal, that caused this reversal to take place? Was there something that was unacceptable on the part of the U.S. loan board that caused this action?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker. The fact that the loan board was meeting today was the reason the minister had hoped to make his announcement yesterday. I repeat, discussions in cabinet indicated that we were not ready to make that decision, in spite of the meeting of the loan board today.

The minister had been attempting to reach his counterpart—I believe it is Secretary Miller—who sits on the loan board, but he was away in Yugoslavia to attend President Tito's funeral. This made it difficult for us to obtain certain additional facts, on the one hand; on the other hand, we were informed that the government of Ontario was hoping to improve upon the package that had been discussed between Chrysler and Canadian officials and ministers.

I personally spoke to the Premier of Ontario who, indeed, confirmed to me that he hoped to improve on the package and that he was hoping to have a meeting early next week with Chrysler officials, which presumably would also be attended by the federal minister. At that time they will attempt to improve the package for Canadians. But the general desire of the federal government is still, of course, to help this industry and the workers whose jobs depend on its survival; but, of course, we bend to the superior wisdom of the Ontario government, who feel that a better deal can be reached, and we are willing to go along with that.

Mr. Wilson: My supplementary question is also to the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. In committee this morning, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce lashed out at committee members for asking whether there was any contingency plan in place, and whether this government was considering any alternatives to the support proposals that are under consideration now, in view of the precarious position of the company, having lost $400 million in the first quarter. It was unclear to us why he was taking this rather defensive position. It occurred to me that possibly there is no contingency plan in place.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is a contingency plan in place in the event that agreement is not reached with Chrysler Canada, and in view of the very difficult position that the workers and the company and the suppliers have been put in. If there is no contingency plan in place, would he commit to the House that steps will be taken immediately to commence work on such a plan?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I believe that under the rules of the House it would not be proper for me to comment on the proceedings in front of a committee. I must confess that even if it were proper, I was not able to follow that committee. I can only indicate that it seems out of character to me that the minister would have, as the hon. member put it, "lashed out" at anybody. He is a very patient and constructive man.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Probably the reason that he did not want to talk of any contingency plan is that we do not believe the Chrysler deal has fallen through. I just indicated to the hon. member that, on the contrary, we were hoping that the government of Ontario would be successful in this meeting, which it is convening for next week, in obtaining an even better deal for Canadians. I think the hon. member would have blamed us if we had decided to go ahead on a deal that even the government of Ontario think can be improved upon.

CHRYSLER CANADA—ASSISTANCE BY WAY OF LOAN GUARANTEES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister's colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, stated on March 7 that the government was committed to loan guarantees to the Chrysler Corporation. He said:

Oh, certainly. We committed ourselves during the election campaign to that.

In view of that statement, is it the position that the government will provide assistance by way of loan guarantee to Chrysler, whether or not the government of Ontario involves itself in the assistance and support program? Is that the position, in view of this commitment, or is the Prime Minister now trying to blame the Ontario government for some delay?

• (1130)

Supposing the Ontario government does not go forward at all and has no share at all in this program, will the Government of Canada carry out this commitment that was made during the election campaign, of loan guarantees?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the question is hypothetical—"Supposing the Ontario government does not", and so on. I would have to see at that point. If the Ontario government does not think that an industry in its own province should be in some way assisted, then I think the undertaking that we made to assist Chrysler would have to be re-examined.

I do not say that we would not carry forward with it, but surely the hon. member would be ill-advised to suggest that the government of the very province in which we are trying to save the jobs of the workers is uninformed on the situation and that its judgment should be disregarded.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has left his minister patiently twisting in the air, but there are thousands of auto workers also waiting with some impatience. It was the Prime Minister's government who made a commitment during the election to give loan guarantees to Chrysler, and the Prime Minister's government did not ask the Ontario government at that time—they did not make it a condition that the Ontario government participate. The Prime Minister's party made that commitment.

Will the Prime Minister affirm that his government will go forward with loan guarantees, with or without Ontario, that he is not going to make that a condition now; and would he tell the House, in view of the fact that President Carter has contacted him recently by telephone, whether the American government has said that it is a condition of their proceeding with their whole package for Chrysler in the United States that Canada participate? Is that a condition that the United States has informed the Canadian government that they have made? There are two parts to this question. I hope the Prime Minister can realize that, and answer both parts.

Mr. Trudeau: On the second part, my answer is no, Madam Speaker. On the first part, I want to express my astonishment that the hon. member would suggest that we should go ahead with a deal that the government of Ontario thinks is not a good deal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We made a commitment to assist Chrysler, Madam Speaker. It was not a commitment which was made on the condition that we would assist them if Chrysler was not prepared to come forth with certain conditions. As a matter of fact, when I made that commitment in Windsor, I indicated that we would assist Chrysler, provided Chrysler were prepared to do certain things.

It is now the judgment of the government of Ontario that not enough of those things have been done, and it would be preposterous for me to suggest that our government should override the judgment of the government of Ontario on a matter such as this, without giving the government of Ontario a chance to make its case. Perhaps we would proceed without Ontario; perhaps we would not. But I certainly think the government of Ontario should be given a chance to make its case.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, my final supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister agree that the Government of Canada has responsibility for economic development and economic conditions generally in the country and that, with or without the assistance of provinces, the Government of Canada should meet those obligations, particularly when the Government of Canada has made specific commitments during an election campaign to do so?

When answering that, would he advise the House, is the problem job commitments; is the problem that is now delaying this matter a question of commitments from Chrysler to preserve or expand the number of job opportunities? Is that the problem?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I do not think I can assist the hon. member any further. I have made it quite clear that we have been bargaining with Chrysler for quite a while. Our minister had arrived at a package which seemed rather good, but the government of Ontario is convinced that it can be improved. I cannot say anything more than that.

The hon. member might pick up the phone and talk to somebody in the government of Ontario and see if they are just trying to waste time in order not to provide jobs for workers in Ontario. I am surprised that the government of Ontario would say that.

Mr. Crosbie: That is not the question.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PETROLEUM PRICING AND AUDITING AGENCY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, my question is for the Prime Minister. During the election campaign the Liberal party promised to establish a petroleum pricing and auditing agency, one of whose functions would be to advise the government about an appropriate price for oil. I just want to remind the Prime Minister that this is one of the seven major commitments that the Liberal party set out during the campaign.

Yesterday, not in this House but after the debate in this House, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that it was not the government's intention to establish the agency before the price rises which are going to be coming in June or July. Second, he said, and I quote: "The new energy watchdog will not even be asked for advice in this period, and in the period after July." Can I ask the Prime Minister which one of the seven commitments will be the next to go?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, this commitment still stands. We want to set up that petroleum price auditing agency. We will do so, and it will be very important in the government's pursuit of its energy policy.

It is unlikely, the way negotiations are going, that we will have the input of that agency before July 1. The minister does not want to say that we will arrive at July 1 without having any price determined for petroleum. That, I presume, is why he said that he would have to proceed even if the agency has not completed its work.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, yesterday the minister said that the government's information indicates that it costs about $8 a barrel to exploit conventional reserves. I ask the Prime Minister, where does he think the minister gets that figure, and can he explain why it now costs over four times as much to produce a conventional barrel of oil in 1980 as it did before the tremendous price increases starting in 1973?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member may have heard that since 1973 there has been inflation, which has increased the cost of work in producing oil.

Mr. Rae: An additional factor, Madam Speaker, may be the oil profits picture in the oil industry. The Prime Minister said that the multinationals operating in Canada are using their profits, not to provide greater energy to security but to buy up unrelated businesses. The figures which have been revealed after the first quarter of 1980 show that the oil companies' profits have gone up 102 per cent, on the basis of prices today.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister how he can justify the kinds of increases that are being discussed, when we know that the oil companies are making windfall profits even at the present time.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am not attempting to justify any particular price increase. The minister is out west now—I believe he is in Regina today—discussing this very problem. So I am not prepared to say in advance that the results will be acceptable either to the hon. member or to myself.

As far as profits of oil companies are concerned, I agree with the hon. member that they have seemed very, very excessive. That is the intent of the answer I gave the other day. As a matter of fact, I think that on energy policy, probably the hon. member's party and mine are very close to each other—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —on a lot of questions, and that is why we were discussing an alliance between the two parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF OIL AND GAS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Would he advise the House whether it is in his thinking that this price review, or monitoring agency is the first step that the government has in contemplation of establishing a system whereby the production and distribution of oil and gas in this country shall become a public utility under federal jurisdiction?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker, it is an auditing agency; it is not a takeover agency.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EFFECTIVE AND STRINGENT INTERNATIONAL SAFEGUARDS OVER USE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Recognizing Canada's substantial international role in the distribution of both nuclear technology and nuclear fuel, and in view of the pessimistic report of the international fuel cycle evaluation conference regarding the potential nuclear proliferation throughout the world, did the Prime Minister discuss with the Prime Minister of Japan any new initiatives for more effective and stringent international safeguards, including possible control of the fuel cycle in the purchasing state, atomic energy regional disposal centres, or return of spent fuel to supplier nations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, that was discussed in my presence by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He obtained from the Prime Minister of Japan a rather satisfactory answer on the safeguards' problem.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, in the House last week, the Prime Minister stated that the schedule for keeping the nuclear energy industry viable in Canada is very, very short. My question for the Prime Minister is this: Does the government, given the narrow time-frame referred to, intend to lower Canada's nuclear export safeguards standards, retain them at the present level, or enhance them?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, there is no question of lowering the standards. We want to retain them. I missed the preamble to the question. I do not know if there is any particular area where the hon. member is suggesting they be strengthened, but I can point out to him that Canada has been in the vanguard of increasing safeguards. As a matter of fact, many other countries involved in production of nuclear energy machines have not yet gone as far as Canada.

STABILIZATION PAYMENTS TO HOG PRODUCERS

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The minister announced recently that stabilization payments would be made to Canadian hog producers this year. Could the minister explain how the figure of 5,000 hogs was arrived at in calculating the maximum payment that a producer could claim?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, after due consultations with the Canadian Pork Producers Council, which recommended that figure, and considering the total hog production in Canada, taking all those things into proper perspective we decided that that was a fair figure.

Mr. Vankoughnet: Madam Speaker, is the minister aware that under the terms of the program some producers could claim up to 15,000 hogs, provided they give proof that they have three legitimate partners in the operation? In light of this fact, would the minister not agree that the maximum 5,000 hog ceiling discriminates against individual producers who have spent large amounts of money to make their operations cost efficient?

If he does agree, would he consider raising the ceiling so that the 12 producers in Ontario who each raise more than 5,000 hogs can be given the same advantage as their competitors who have partners in their businesses?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member will check, he will find that we have done the same in the past with apple producers and producers of other commodities where there is a father and son, father and two sons, or three different partners. We did the same with beef production, where we allowed payments for a single producer of 2,500, but a maximum of 7,500 head when we paid beef stabilization.

Therefore, there is nothing new in this principle that we have announced for hog stabilization. We believe it will cover approximately 90 per cent of the production, but these people must prove they are in the production entity the same as producers of the other commodities I outlined. So there is nothing new in it at all. It still protects the basic family farm and the producer who is actually involved in hog production.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last week, the Minister of Justice tabled the annual report of the Human Rights Commission. The commission made several recommendations, including adding as grounds for discrimination the addition of political convictions, retardation, mental illness and sexual orientation. In view of the validity of these recommendations, can the Prime Minister tell the House when he will take action to protect the victims of these types of discrimination?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had myself the opportunity to read the report mentioned by the hon. member, but I can assure him that the Minister of Justice will consider this matter as soon as possible and that he may be able to provide an answer next week.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is also for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In 1978, the Prime Minister stated in a letter that he was waiting for the recommendations of the Human Rights Commission before adding sexual orientation to the grounds for discrimination. Can the Prime Minister now tell the House whether he will follow the example of the province of Quebec and the recommendations of the commission by adding sexual orientation to the grounds for discrimination?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I have just told the hon. member that I have not read the report. I have therefore not read its recommendations and I cannot make any comment on this matter. All I know is that the hon. member received a reply yesterday from the leader of the government to the effect that we were considering asking a special committee of the House to study this matter. If the hon. member wants to express his views before this committee, he may have the opportunity to do so.

COMPUTERS

USE BY GOVERNMENT OF DATABANKS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I understand that the President of the Treasury Board has been briefed by his officials on the investigation currently under way in the United States into an attempt from a New York private school to enter 21 Canadian databanks.

Can the President of the Treasury Board confirm to the House that of these 21 Canadian databanks on which attempts were made, at least two of these were federal government banks? Will the minister table in the House immediately a list of all federal government databanks connected to the Infodat or Datapac systems, as well as a description of the contents of the information contained in those databanks?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the question of computer theft is, of course, a very serious one. The government does have the two systems to which the hon. member has made reference, but my understanding is that no sensitive material is contained in any government computer which has dial-in access.

I am also advised that there have apparently been attempts to break into the government computer bank system in this fashion. However, I am advised that none of those attempts has been successful. The security and evaluation team of the RCMP is responsible for the security of these databanks. So far, we are very satisfied that no information has been obtained by any such attempts.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board did not indicate a willingness to table in this House a list of those databanks which are connected to Infodat or Datapac and indicate the substance of the information contained in those databanks. I wonder whether he might do that.

Also, can the minister confirm that in the opinion of the law officers of the Department of Justice it is not a crime in Canada today to obtain confidential information from databanks, although it may be a crime to steal computer time, telecommunications' time. Can the minister indicate to the House whether he has communicated with his colleague, the Minister of Justice, to try to close that very gaping loophole in the law at the present time?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, with respect to the request that certain information be tabled regarding government databanks, I will take that request under advisement. With respect to the second part of the question, namely, the offence of theft of information from computers, I understand that an appeal under section 287 of the Criminal Code will be going to the Supreme Court this autumn.

There is some question whether the section in question covers an offence of the kind we are discussing. I intend to recommend to the Minister of Justice that amendments to the Criminal Code be considered for the purpose of making it clear that any such theft would be a crime under the Criminal Code.

FINANCE

REDUCTION OF PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TAX TRANSFER

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, which states that 95 per cent of the income tax paid by corporations shall be paid to the provinces. This has been cut to 50 per cent by order in council No. 1980-816. Since when, and under what authority, can the cabinet change a statute by order in council?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the cabinet does not have the authority to change a statute by order in council, and such a course was not followed in this particular case.

Mr. Taylor: In what way does the order in council not change the statute, and by what authority was this done?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the statute empowers the Minister of Finance to determine the timing of payments to the provinces, and it is under that power that a regulation was made to establish the timing of payments.

The hon. member will realize that the expenditure plan which has been in operation, and adopted by the former government, included these particular savings, so that I am confirmed in my decision that I am behaving properly by the action taken, not only by the former Liberal government but also by the former Conservative government, under the authority that is given to the Minister of Finance in the statute.

Mr. Crosbie: Stop hiding behind somebody else.

HOUSING

FUNDING OF NON-PROFIT UNITS—ALLOCATION OF CO-OP UNITS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Since 1980 demand for non-profit housing units is over 11,000 and over 5,000 co-op units are ready to go with no funding, will the minister assure the Co-op Housing Foundation, which is meeting here today, that at least another 2,000 units of co-op housing will be allocated immediately?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated privately to my hon. friend opposite co-ops have the potential to meet the target of renters seeking accommodation in tight rental situations. It is possible that within the provisions of my budget and the corporation's budget there could be some reallocation. It is a matter that the corporation officials and I, together with provincial ministers, are considering.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, the question was with regard to additional units, not a transfer of units. This week, municipal non-profit housing corporations also held a conference in Ottawa. They prepared five recommendations which I hope the minister will act upon.

Since poor people particularly are desperately in need of affordable housing, will the minister agree to introduce a land assembly program to assist municipalities to build much needed social housing?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, if it was not clear, what I intended to convey to the hon. member opposite was that I hope within the over-all budget of the corporation some transfer could be made into that area of co-ops, so that I was talking about new units in the co-op area.

However, that problem really identifies my general problem, and my response to my hon. friend's second question is that I have to try to act within the budget. There are no funds to assist in the second program which she mentions. I realize there is an urgent need, but we are pressed from the other side regarding a number of urgent needs, and as a new minister in this ministry I am trying to priorize them.

HOGS—STABILIZATION PAYMENT FOR FARROWING OPERATIONS

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, who recently announced a stabilization payment for hog producers. I wonder whether the minister has considered the fact that farrowing operations, which are very capital-intensive and which are very seriously affected by the current slump in the pork industry, are excluded from any benefits of this stabilization payment.

Does the minister have any plans to help farrowing operations survive the current situation and, if so, could he tell the House what they are?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows as well as I do that there are some operations which are farrow-to-finish operations. The problems of duplication, double payments, etc., exist here. I wish there was some way we could devise a program that would be beneficial to those people who are in the piglet operation, or producing weaner pigs or whatever you want to call that operation and which would make it possible for other people to finish them.

I realize the terrible economic position some of these producers find themselves in, but the present legislation that I use is statutory and I would have to submit a whole new program for that kind of production to be able to make a payment to them.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, does the minister's often spoken policy of encouraging supply management boards in the pork producing industry mean that he would like to squeeze some present farrowing operations out of business, and does he consider that some of these heavily capitalized farrowing operations should be allowed to go under in order to reduce supply?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, knowing the hon. member's background and his association with marketing boards, I am surprised he would even insinuate that I would be so cruel and mean as to try to do that to anybody. In no way do I want to see them suffer economically. But the hon. member is also well aware that they can do things themselves, and could have done so in the past, to better their economic position and supply the market in a much more orderly fashion than they have, so they would not be in the position they are in.

I am sure the hon. member is aware that they have told me from time to time not to interfere in their hog production operations. They have said, "Don't you dare touch them," and I warned them two or three times. If they produce hogs until they are coming out of their ears, where are they going to put them? Where are they going to market them or sell them? I warned them that the whole economic stability of the hog production industry would be destroyed, and that is what happened. A blind man on a galloping horse could see that it was going to happen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SURVEILLANCE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the practice which existed in his former government, whereby through an agency in the Solicitor General's office lists were compiled and surveillance of Canadians who were in extra-parliamentary opposition to the former Liberal government and who posed a danger to the security of our country was conducted. Can the Prime Minister say today whether this practice has been reintroduced or is still going on today?

Second, and with regard to the first part of the question, could he say whether the government is now undertaking, in light of the finding of the McDonald royal commission that there were numerous lists and that the information on those lists was shared with other countries, some effort to assist Canadians who were affected by these lists to vindicate themselves and clear their names?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the question seems to be somewhat confused. If the hon. member is referring to the fact that the Solicitor General and the RCMP inform various arms of the government about people who they might have cause to feel should not be employed—if this is what the hon. member is talking about when he talks about lists—then I have no reason to say that this will not continue.

On the contrary, I think it is the duty of the RCMP and of the Solicitor General to inform the ministers, and particularly the Prime Minister, about people who might not be fit to serve in such and such a position. Before appointing ministers or parliamentary secretaries, I always make sure I give a list to the RCMP and make sure that this list is okayed by the RCMP in terms of security clearances.

So I cannot give the assurance the hon. member asks for. On the contrary, I feel this is my duty, and I am quite sure the present Leader of the Opposition, when he was prime minister, must have done the same thing.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister well knows, my question relates more to lists which were compiled in the Solicitor General's office itself, which listed innocent Canadians who may have been in opposition to the Liberal party and the Liberal government, rather than subversive to the country. I want to know whether that list still exists. I refer to the so-called EPO list.

In connection with the whole matter of security clearance, can the Prime Minister also tell me whether it is the intention to change the guidelines in connection with security clearance, and particularly that portion of the guidelines which made it impossible for Canadian citizens who had relatives in other countries of the world who were not friendly to Canada to achieve higher positions in the public service?

• (1200)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I can give the hon. member the assurance that the kind of lists he described never existed, in our government at any rate. The Solicitor General did not compile lists of innocent persons, as the hon. member indicates, in order to harm them. The Solicitor General never was the inventor or author of lists. If he got names which were reported to him by the RCMP as names of people who should not be employed in certain positions, he merely transmitted that information.

An. hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Trudeau: I hear an hon. member from the NDP say "Oh, come on". That is precisely what I am doing. The RCMP transmits its information to the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General does not invent that information and does not fabricate these lists.

LABOUR DISPUTES

INQUIRY WHETHER CONCILIATOR APPOINTED TO FACILITATE MOVEMENT OF GRAIN AT CHURCHILL

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I had hoped to ask my question of the Minister of Labour, but I understand he is not in the House for personal reasons. Therefore, I should like to put my question to the Minister of Agriculture who has expressed some concern in these matters.

In light of the breakdown in negotiations between the National Harbours Board and the grain handlers at Churchill, has the government received telexes from the minister of agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan and the minister of labour for Manitoba asking that a conciliator be appointed to facilitate the movement of grain at Churchill?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I am happy to report that both parties signed a memorandum of agreement yesterday. The union will recommend acceptance to its membership and the wage settlement is all but concluded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—INQUIRY WHEN GOVERNMENT WILL ANNOUNCE ITS PROPOSALS FOR RENEWED FEDERALISM

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Since the important date of the referendum is barely ten days ahead, and since the Prime Minister had two wonderful opportunities when going to Quebec to shed some light on his renewed federalism project, but did not deem fit to do so, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to announce before May 20 some of the proposals he apparently wishes to put forward to the provinces in that respect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know the referendum question is not on renewed federalism but sovereignty and association. The position taken by this government has been very firmly based on that question, and I would hope the hon. member would do the same.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I am fully aware of the question, but the Prime Minister should also be aware that Quebeckers would like to know what they are offered in return. In view of the fact that one of his former colleagues, Mr. Pelletier, our ambassador in Paris, officially recognized Wednesday last that a large number of Quebeckers will vote Yes because they are hoping for some thaw, without necessarily being separatists, and since 15 per cent of the people are undecided, could the Prime Minister explain why he sheds no light on what I call that slogan of renewed federalism.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it must first be ascertained whether Quebeckers want to leave Canada or not. If they want to leave Canada, clearly a renewed federalism is not within the mandate of the Premier of Quebec.

We know that the PQ premier came to Ottawa a few times to attend federal-provincial conferences. He rejected all proposals we made for amending and improving the constitution. He referred to them as a mere pittance and so forth. Clearly that is his policy, because he believes in a separated Quebec. Therefore he is not going to co-operate with us to improve federalism. This should be obvious even to the hon. member for Joliette.

ORDERLY MARKETING SYSTEM FOR HOG PRODUCERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. This week, processor buying practices have forced western hog prices down $12 to $13 per hundredweight below the eastern price, making the stabilization program announcement this week virtually meaningless to most prairie producers. The western producers have reduced their share of the market by almost 25 per cent in the last four years in an attempt to tailor production to demand. My question is: what will the minister do to implement an orderly marketing system about which he keeps talking, in light of the obvious packer moves into more vertical integration in the hog industry in Quebec where no marketing agency exists, since these moves are at the expense of producers in provinces which do have marketing boards?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well, I suppose, and I take it for granted, what his provincial minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan has suggested—I believe about 20 per cent of the hog producers belong to the support program that they have there—that we enforce a national hog marketing plan on hog production in Canada.

When the hon. member refers to Saskatchewan hog producing going out of business and to orderly marketing, he is stretching the point even more than a little, I think. Because when they went out of hog production to the tune of over 50 per cent, it was mainly because grain prices, and especially barley prices, were very good and gave them a better return with less work than producing pork. So they went out of the pork business and the pork business was done through the free market system which was operating with no control over production, so that anyone from any part of Canada could enter hog production. For instance, in Ontario in the last two years 1,800 new hog producers entered into the production area and borrowed money, in most instances from private lending institutions. If you check with the Farm Credit Corporation, Mr. Speaker, you will find that there are fewer problems than there were a year ago at this time.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, since the minister referred also to grain marketing, I should like to ask him the following supplementary question. Since Otto Lang's feed grain policy was a large contributor to more processor control of the hog industry and its subsequent shift to an unorganized province, will there be a reassessment of the open market feed grain policy and will feed producers in the west get a vote on the feed grain policy?

Mr. Whelan: We will honour the agreement we made about reviewing the feed grain policy and I hope that I can report something in the very near future concerning that program. But again the hon. member has misinterpreted what has taken place, because even when the feed grains brought in a fair return, there was not that much difference in the total return, whether you were a hog producer or whether you were selling your grain as a commercial grain grower. The returns were fairly equal, and if producers had stayed in production at that time, they would probably be in a better position and maybe there would not have been that increase in production in other parts of Canada. No one can really say. Many people were entering into pork production because it looked as if it would bring a proper return. If one were to check the records, one would find that I had warned them over two years ago to get their house in order.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

CARTIER SQUARE—REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE OF RECREATIONAL AREA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. With all the difficulties of trying to guarantee jobs, the high price of oil and everything else, I would hope that the Minister of Public Works could give us a guarantee in terms of Cartier Square. I know that he had a press conference which attracted a lot of interest last week, in which he stated that the historic Ontario Teachers College will be maintained as a heritage property and, what is perhaps equally important, that the open space in Cartier Square will be left to a certain extent so that a public park would be guaranteed as well as a school playing field, in view of the fact that Lisgar Collegiate, which is an historic school in the city, does not have adequate school playing field space.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, my friend asks whether I can guarantee that there will be certain amounts of open space. That is an easy guarantee for me. As the minister reporting for the National Capital Commission, I can report that Mr. Drury has indicated that the school will continue as a heritage building, but its eventual use in terms of user is something to be determined. There are large open spaces that we will retain in view of the move of the embassy from that site to another. The plans for a courthouse, I believe, should be re-examined in terms of their appropriateness for the site, location, etc. But indeed there will be a large open space remaining and I hope that all parties, the city, the region, the commission, and indeed myself as the minister responsible for the commission to Parliament, will have some say in the site analysis.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TAYLOR—ALLEGED CHANGE OF STATUTE BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I want to raise a question of privilege on the answer given by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) today. Just to recap the matter, my question was: Since when and under what authority can the cabinet change a statute by order in council? The answer given by the hon. minister was that the cabinet cannot change a statute by order in council.

Now I should like to look at the facts. First I should like to outline three very important axioms which are very relevant to this particular question. One is that the cabinet has no power except that given to it by the House of Commons. The second one is that the regulations must be based on laws passed by Parliament; they may be extensions but they may not change the law. The third one is that the House of Commons holds the ultimate power.

I want to review the circumstances. After an agreement reached by the Government of Canada with the provinces, a bill was presented to the House of Commons which was passed. I should like to refer to chapter 37 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970. Section 3.(2) reads as follows:

> The amount that may be paid to a province under subsection (1) in respect of a taxation year of a designated corporation is 95 per cent of that part of the income tax paid under part I of the Income Tax Act by the corporation for the year that is attributable to its gross revenue for the year—

There is a continuation but it does not change that particular point. So the statute definitely points out that 95 per cent of those moneys collected from the generation and sale in a province for distribution to the public of electrical energy or steam must be repaid to the province. That has been going on since the statute was passed right up until the order in council in question here.

I might say that in the 1978 budget of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) it was suggested that this would be changed. At that time I believe a bill received first reading. It was not proceeded with, so the law was not changed. But on March 27, 1980, the present cabinet passed the following order in council known as SOR/80-214 under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. It reads in part as follows:

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue, pursuant to section 5 of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, is pleased hereby to amend the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Regulations, CRC, c. 1361, in accordance with the schedule hereto.

It continues:

Paragraph 3(2)(b) of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Regulations is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"(b) cause the product obtained by multiplying the estimated amount by the fraction 50/95 to be paid to the province out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund."

This is not an extension of the present act; this is a change of the amount entirely. This regulation was based on the act. The new regulation is not based on the act. I submit that one cannot change a regulation. As it is predicated upon the act—and the act indicates 95 per cent— the order in council certainly cannot change it, yet that is exactly what the order in council did.

As further reference that this is what the order in council did, the minister introduced a bill which received first reading on May 2. I should like to refer to clause 3 of that bill. The other clauses are not relevant to this particular point. Clause 3 reads as follows:

All that portion of subsection 3(2) of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act—

Those are the ones I read to the House. It continues:

—preceding paragraph (a) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

So we are taking out of the act the section that the former regulation was based upon. It continues:

"(2) The amount that may be paid to a province under subsection (1) in respect of the 1966 to 1978 taxation years of a designated corporation is 95 per cent, and in respect of the 1979 and each subsequent taxation year of a designated corporation is 50 per cent, of that part of the income tax paid under part I of the Income Tax Act—

This will definitely change the legislation. It has not yet been changed, but it has received first reading in this House. I should like to point out that if the cabinet can change a law in this way, members of the House of Commons might just as well go home. To approve of changes in the law before the changes are made means that the House of Commons is being treated as a rubber stamp. We are violating one of the primary principles of representative government. The cabinet cannot spend money or use taxation without the consent of the House of Commons, yet that is exactly what has been done.

The bill goes a little further. Actually it places emphasis upon public ownership. It is a back door way of forcing the provinces into public ownership rather than private ownership. If that is the ultimate objective, the House will have to consider it. The law has not yet been changed, but the 95 per cent approved by the previous Liberal government, passed and approved by the House of Commons, has been violated by the present government. The minister said that we do not have the authority. In effect he has said, "Amen", that this is a question of privilege.

I want to suggest since this is a question of privilege that Madam Speaker approve it as such. I emphasize again that the order in council changed the regulations based on the law which was in effect. It had no authority to change that amount. The House of Commons said 95 per cent; at that time the regulations indicated that it could be 95 per cent, but the minister in his order in council said, "No, we will change that basis and make it 50 per cent", which is completely different from the original act.

If the hon. Speaker finds this a valid question of privilege—and I think the minister has agreed already that it is—then I suggest that this question should be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to consider this whole matter, including the payment to the provinces of the moneys withheld under the authority of this order in council. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to consider this whole matter, including the payment to the provinces of the moneys withheld under the authority of that order in council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) would permit a question. In view of the nature of this matter, I wonder whether it would not be better to ask for it to be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. That is the committee which deals with this kind of thing. It is more versed in this area than the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Motion amended.

● (1220)

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on a matter of privilege and also as the seconder of the motion that has just been made.

Speaking on the matter of privilege which is before this House, I suggest it affects the responsibilities and the privileges of each and every member of this House. I would also like to point out some facts to add to those that have been put on the record by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). Let me point out that on May 6, at page 738 of Hansard, I brought forth this matter under Standing Order 43 as a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The corporation affected by the order, or by a request from this government, was forced to reduce its rebates, which the government was rebating to the people of Alberta so affected, from 95 per cent to 50 per cent. This request to the company, or this order, if you wish, to the company, was made by the government before, in my estimation and understanding, the government had legislative authority to do so.

I again wish to refer to the Public Utilities Income Tax, Transfer Act of 1966-67, specifically to sections 3(1) and 3(2), and make a case in connection with the possible actions of the

Section 3(1) reads:

> The Minister of Finance may cause to be paid to a province out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, at such time or times as he may determine, an amount determined by the minister in accordance with subsection (2) in respect of the 1966 and each subsequent taxation year of a designated corporation carrying on business in the province.

Subsection (2) reads, and I want to emphasize the specific wording:

> The amount that may be paid to a province under subsection (1) in respect of a taxation year of a designated corporation is 95 per cent of that part of the income tax paid under part I of the Income Tax Act by the corporation for the year that is attributable to its gross revenue for the year from
> (a) the distribution and sale to the public in the province, or the generation and sale in the province for distribution to the public, of electrical energy or steam; or
> (b) the distribution and sale of gas to the public in the province.

What it does say, as I read this legislation, is that if the minister, who has the ability and the capacity within the act to make payments on his schedule, does so, the minister when he makes these payments has to make them at 95 per cent, not 50 per cent, 40 per cent or 30 per cent. They must be 95 per cent as specifically stated under subsection (2) of section 3 of the act. The regulations, as I read them in this legislation, do not give the minister any ability to reduce that rebate when it is made, if it is made at all, from 95 per cent to 50 per cent.

The intent of the minister's actions in connection with the action he has taken in respect of Calgary Power is very clear. I submit the minister acted beyond the law, or beyond the intent of the law, in issuing instructions that the rebate he has given to some of the companies involved, namely, Calgary Power, be reduced.

I submit this matter is a very serious matter involving a breach of the privileges of this House. It is a matter involving the use of powers the minister does not possess. As a result, I fully agree with the hon. member for Bow River and suggest that the matter be referred to the committee, as suggested in the motion he has placed before this House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to deal briefly with this point which has been described as a question of privilege. It is obviously not a question of privilege. Whatever it is, it is not a question of privilege. It may be a matter of debate that can be dealt with when the bill is called for second reading.

The fact of the matter is that the bill—and of course, nobody questions that the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act provides that payments will be made at the 95 per cent level; there is no dispute about that—provides the minister with the power under the act to make payments at such time or times as he may determine, and the timing of the payments is provided for under regulations of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act.

The regulations provide that payments can be made once each fiscal year in March. Each payment is composed of a final adjustment in respect of a prior taxation year and an interim payment pending Revenue Canada's assessment of the tax return in respect of the current year. For example, the payment made in the 1979-80 fiscal year was made in March, 1980, and comprised a final adjustment in respect of the 1977 taxation year and an interim payment in respect of 1979.

Parliament was notified some time ago by the present Minister of Justice and (Mr. Chrétien) that the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act would be amended and the decision was taken in the context of a $2.5 billion expenditure restraint program undertaken in the summer and fall of 1978. It was felt that in the light of this substantial expenditure restraint program, payments to the provinces, which constituted 20 per cent of total outlays, should bear part of the burden, and for that reason it was decided in fact to abolish the 95 per cent rebate by legislation and to make changes in the equalization program.

In fact, those two changes constitute, over the next two fiscal years, an expenditure amount of $1.5 billion. In other words, if this bill affecting the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and equalization were not proceeded with the treasury would be attacked to the amount of $1.5 billion.

We are talking about the regularity of this procedure. These particular savings have been worked into the estimates that were prepared by the former government, and the former minister of finance has behaved in precisely the same way on the basis of the power that was given to him under the act; otherwise he would not be able to work these savings into his expenditure program.

The order in council was passed or the regulations were made under the authority and power given to Parliament, and by Parliament to the Minister of Finance, to make payments at such time or times as he may determine. I have stated that it is the practice each March to make a payment with respect to a past taxation year and an interim payment with respect to the current taxation year. We made an interim payment with respect to 1979, and that interim payment was 50 per cent.

If this bill is not passed when it comes to making the final payment for 1979—and the final payment is not due until 1982 under the practice—then, of course, it would have to be made at the 95 per cent level. The Minister of Finance is empowered to establish the timing, and the practice has been to make an interim payment. We are making an interim payment of 50 per cent for 1979. When the final payment comes due in 1982, under the practice which has been followed up to the present time, and if this bill is not passed, then of course the will of Parliament will be observed by the government in office and the full payment of 95 per cent will be made.

So the hon. member may raise a question of privilege in 1982 if the bill is not passed and if the government fails to make the payment in the amount of 95 per cent. I suggest that we defer the question of privilege until March, 1982, and it may be relevant at that time.

Madam Speaker: From the outset I have to rule that this is not a question of privilege. Obviously, it seems to be a difference of opinion between two members of the House. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) is questioning the regularity—

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I am rising on a point or order, with respect.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot speak twice on this question. That is why I am not recognizing him. I will continue my remarks which I had begun with regard to the hon. member's question of privilege.

I have said that I do not think that it is a question of privilege. I would add that since the hon. member is questioning the regularity of the procedure used by the government in order to fulfil its responsibilities, the precise matter raised by the hon. member is under constant review in the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Therefore, the question which the hon. member is raising can be referred to that committee. In fact, it is automatically referred to that committee under Standing Order 65(3) which I could read to the hon. member, but I suppose that he can do that for himself.

I invite the hon. member, if he is not satisfied with the explanation just given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), to go to this committee and make his point another time.

Mr. Taylor: I am definitely not satisfied. This is a violation of the rights of every member of this House.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, because there have been some discussions about private members' hour today, arising from the fact that certain bills are not ready, I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council would indicate to the House what the agreement is for four o'clock today.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I wish to confirm that all parties have agreed to take up motion No. 13 standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). I would point out at this time that there is substantial difference between the motion under Standing Order 43 which the hon. member for Edmonton East raised and which was adopted by the House, and motion No. 13. Hopefully all members will participate in that debate at four o'clock.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix) that Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity today to speak briefly on Bill C-17, a bill which gives some urgently needed recognition to one of our most vital sectors of our economy, that of small business.

There are over one million small businesses in Canada. Most of them have annual sales of less than $2 million and yet these small businesses were responsible last year for almost one-third of our GNP. Small business is highly labour intensive, employing 2.5 million or about 42 per cent of all business employment in Canada.

Small business means big business for Canada's banks. At the moment there are 430,000 loans made to small business enterprises which total $9 billion or 25 per cent of the total lending by banks. So to say that small business is an important part of the Canadian institution is simply an understatement. It is the backbone and financial base of every community, large or small, in this country, and it forms a very important segment of our national economy.

Yet, for some reason, in many political circles business is the least understood and the most maligned segment of our society. Some would have us believe that it is the businessman who is reaping rewards at the expense of the ordinary man who is struggling to make ends meet. The truth of the matter is that the goals and the aspirations of millions of Canadians in our work force depend on the success and the initiative of those engaged in small business.

In these difficult economic times, it is the small businessman who stands to lose everything that he has worked for. That is one of the reasons I and many of my colleagues entered politics. We saw those who had the most initiative, who took the most risks and who certainly worked the longest hours being pushed to the wall.

Our Liberal colleagues over the years have, because of increased spending on both domestic and foreign aid programs, loaded heavy taxes and endless regulations on to business, small and large. During the election campaign I spoke to many small businessmen in my community and we discussed their situation—the cost of filling in and filing forms, collecting and remitting taxes, applying for and paying licence fees, dealing with inspectors of all kinds, defending actions, and so on. It has been estimated that the cost of the "paperburden", as the present government so aptly termed it several years ago, comes to something like an average of $5,000 per year.

In addition, this past year business has had to cope with high interest rates, rates designed to fight inflation and uphold the value of the dollar but which add enormously to the cost of running a business.

Those with a cash flow problem—and let us be realistic, this includes practically every business—are caught. They must still stock their shelves or keep production going or they risk losing everything they have worked for. They cannot just go into hibernation while interest rates and costs are high and come out again when the situation brightens. Bills must still be settled, payrolls must be met and taxes must be paid. And they usually are paid; the community benefits and people benefit and governments and banks benefit. Meanwhile, however, the debts of the small businessman are increasing as he strives to survive another month.

Small business is facing today a genuine economic crunch and we believe that the government has a special obligation to deregulate, unburden and generally help the small business community. Unlike large business, the small businessman does not always have the time to do the fancy, analytical work so necessary today, to examine economic trends, file briefs, make submissions to government to keep abreast with tax laws, exemptions and new regulations that continually come forth. A small firm can lose track of its real costs quickly in the maze of inflation and fast changing interest rates.

The individualistic small businessman, who has traditionally been the last to depend on others, is now looking to government to help solve a problem which is beyond his control and is not of his making. And why not? The government caused much of the problem by overspending, by artificially stimulating the economy, by buying and paying more than our markets could justify, and by borrowing so much in money markets to pay its debts that it crowded out legitimate business needs and enterprises.

I might also mention that, in addition, governments have failed to exercise control where control might well have been exercised. After all, if government is going to control and regulate business inside and out, it should at least be consistent and apply controls on the elements of cost created by itself, as well as costs relating to productivity. Fair wages, yes, but for fair production as well. We have a long way to go in this country in improving our labour cost versus productivity output. We have a long way to go towards balancing our position with other industrialized nations such as Japan and West Germany, which have nothing to compare with Canada's potential in national resources.

Our failure to date can hardly be laid at the door of the small businessman who is struggling against high wage costs, high taxes, and the high cost of operation, mostly brought about by government intrusion. Is it any wonder that almost 6,000 businesses went bankrupt in 1979, and that Ontario bankruptcies in the first two months of this year went up 25 per cent over the same period of last year?

Instead of making life difficult for small business, government should be injecting policies into the system to restore the basic incentive aspects to the business world. It is the responsibility of this House to enact legislation which will aid small business and we are supporting this bill because we believe it will help. We are glad the individual loan ceiling has been raised but we would have been happier with measures which would have lowered the interest rates on that increased loan amount.

The government has an obligation to fight, on behalf of the small businessman, the high interest rate problem, as the previous Conservative government did when it proposed the introduction of the small business debenture. This would have allowed the small businessman to borrow up to half a million dollars at half the nominal rate of interest. This measure would have effectively lowered the after tax interest rate on such debts by about three percentage points, and this would have allowed many small and medium-sized companies to at least consider expansion programs which could result in further employment.

It was a great disappointment to me, when speaking to small business owners during the election campaign, to discover that they did not know about this excellent cost reduction measure which would have greatly aided their profit picture. Not only would it have made their businesses more profitable but it would have given small business an 8 per cent or 9 per cent competitive advantage over big business.

Hardly anyone was aware of this important measure, designed to keep small businesses healthy and vital and to maintain local employment in areas not protected by collective bargaining procedures. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that in offering assistance to small business, the government must not only uncomplicate the procedures but must also improve the method of disseminating information all across this country so that business people are aware of the funds, loans, assistance programs and tax measures available to them.

I would like to stress the need for the speedy passage of Bill C-17. The Conservative party recognized the importance of small business in our economic community in its defeated budget of last December and was delighted to see so many of the measures proposed crop up again in the mini budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). It was our government which underlined the urgent need to alleviate the cash flow problems of the small business sector resulting from abnormally high interest rates, and we would certainly do nothing at this point to impede the passage of a bill which offers some relief to this country's small business people.

We strongly back the measures included in Bill C-17 but we must underline the need for the continuing support of this vital, mostly Canadian-owned segment of our economy. Bill C-17 is a start but the government must not stop here.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address myself to this bill and to the House for the first time in the Thirty-second Parliament. I am also pleased to see that the new government is again implementing initiatives first voiced by the last government. I, of course, refer to our stated intention of aiding small business, by recognizing the importance of small business to the national economy.

For the benefit of those who are unaware of some of the facts concerning small business in Canada, I should like to point out that there are approximately 600,000 small firms in business in Canada. In combination with other small entrepreneurs such as professionals and commissioned sales personnel, there are a total of over 800,000 enterprises which could be described as comprising the small business community in our great country of Canada.

In terms of total national employment and production, the small business community plays a substantial role in the working of the economy. The production of goods and services by small business enterprises accounts for 20 per cent of the value of all goods and services produced in Canada.

● (1250)

Clearly, a sector of the economy which produces such a substantial component of the gross national product must be counted as a vital component of the total commercial and industrial mosaic in Canada. In terms of achieving national goals such as increased employment, increased real earnings and dimished regional disparities, the potential contribution from small enterprise is indeed immense. It is difficult, in fact, to see how such goals could be achieved without enhanced small business participation.

A major interest of mine, in contemplating the benefits of small business to our economy and national life, is the contribution made by the tourist industry. This industry leads to an increased understanding and awareness of each other's unique contribution to Canada, and, as such, is a strong bond in our confederation. Moreover, of the 800,000 small businesses in Canada, fully 80,000 or 10 per cent are involved in some way in the tourist trade.

In 1978, the Canadian tourism industry was worth $11 billion to Canada, or about 5 per cent of our gross national product. Of this amount, nearly $9 billion came from the spending of Canadians travelling right here in Canada, while more than $2 billion came from the spending of visitors to Canada from foreign countries.

This industry accounts for over one million jobs in Canada, or one in every 11 working Canadians. The majority of foreign visitors come from the United States, our great neighbour to the south. Two-thirds of our international travel revenue comes from this source, while overseas visitors account for roughly one-third of our foreign exchange revenue from travel. Tourism is Canada's sixth largest earner of foreign exchange, and it is the world's fastest growing industry.

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian tourism industry involves some 80,000 businesses which are widely dispersed across our nation. There are about 20,000 hotels, lodges, cabins, motels and campgrounds, an estimated 43,000 restaurants, a myriad of events and attractions, as well as facilities such as parks, historic sites and marinas.

Furthermore, it has been forecast that tourism will be one of the world's largest industries, if not the largest, by the year 2000. If current growth rates of approximately 10 per cent per annum continue, very nearly two billion people will be travelling by the year 2000. That means for every two people travelling today, there will be three in the year 2000. Total worldwide tourist revenues will rise to nearly $2,000 billion by the year 2000.

In terms of the total numbers of travellers, the future looks like a marketer's paradise. Canada will undoubtedly share in the growth of worldwide tourism, and it is well placed to benefit from these faster growth rates.

However, in order for the tourist industry in Canada to benefit fully from this expected increase in travel, certain programs and opportunities must be in place to support and promote the travel industry in Canada. That is why, with certain reservations, I am happy that this bill has been introduced and that it will make financing of loans of up to $100,000 available. For in order to exploit the growth in tourism, Canadian facilities must grow and improve, and as we know that will require money.

If I may, I would like to refer to a report of the Tourism Sector Consultative Task Force on the Canadian tourism industry. The publication is dated July 12, 1978. At page 33 under the title of C-9 in connection with the Small Businesses Loans Act, it says:

> —in connection with the Small Businesses Loans Act, the limits should be raised to $250,000 (amount of loans outstanding) and $2,000,000.00 (gross revenue). There may be a problem of chartered banks requiring mortgages for a small business loan. They should accept a second mortgage as the loan is government guaranteed.

So we see that $100,000 is not too much money, and it is probably insufficient for many businesses to carry on.

However, I do have some misgivings about the Small Businesses Loans Act. The fact is that this program has not been fully promoted and advertised. The majority of small business persons are unaware of the Small Businesses Loans Act and, indeed, are confused by the multitude of programs available, either provincially or federally.

These programs, I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, offer many financial alternatives to small businesses. In point of fact, however, without adequate dissemination of information on particular programs, such as the Small Businesses Loans Act, the small business person is confused and perplexed in an already complex financial marketplace.

Therefore, my recommendation would be to make the small business person more aware of the programs available by advertising in trade magazines or by information supplied to the accounting profession, who are often the first turned to when a question of financing is raised.

The purpose of this proposed advertising would be two-fold. Not only would the business person be apprised of the funding available, but this knowledge would arm him in his dealings with the banks and other lending institutions. For it is well known in the business community that the banks are reluctant to inform loan applicants of this funding option.

This is not because of any inherent risk in lending funds with the federal government acting as guarantor although, if the federal deficit continues to increase as forecast by the infamous mini-budget, that could become a real consideration. It is because, as in so many other situations, businesses both large and small do not have the time, and many times do not have the patience or the resources, to indulge in the vast amount of paperwork which dealing with the government entails.

I have had constituents who have told me that banks just cannot be bothered to go through all the nuisance of filling out forms with all the detail that government demands. I ask you,

Mr. Speaker, what is the use of having this program if the banks, who are to administer it, would rather not inform their clients of its availability because the benefit to the bank is outweighed by the cost, in terms of time needed to comply with the government demand for information? If the bank is willing to lend the money, using the criteria that prudent lending practices dictate, why is it necessary that this government form be so complex and so demanding?

This is a problem that is not restricted to those who live in my riding of Erie. It is a problem that is seen across Canada and recognized as a hindrance to business by many, chief among them the Canadian Federation of Independent Business which has made strong representations in the past to the federal government on this problem.

The situation is so bad that the professional trade magazine for accountants counsels its members to do an end run around the banks and other lending institutions by applying for a loan, having it approved, and then requesting that the loan be considered under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

This government, who in the past started the "office of paperburden", should be aware of the difficulties encountered by small business in availing themselves of funding, strictly because of the complexity of the application for that funding. If this government indeed means what it says about helping small business, this is an obvious first step to take. Eliminate the paper burden, advertise the Small Businesses Loans Act extensively, and this recommended legislation will be a good start to encouraging and promoting the cause of small business in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have to give the House the usual warning that if the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) takes the floor, that will terminate this debate. I presume he does wish to take the floor.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at one o'clock, Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, was under debate. The Minister of State for Small Businesses had risen to take the floor. As I indicated to hon. members, if the minister speaks that will end debate on second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed with the debate that has gone on in the House during the few hours we have had to study Bill C-17 on second reading. That debate has allowed us to see that on both sides of the House, that is on the part of hon. members of the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party as well as those of the government party, there is a common determination to attend very specifically to the well-being of small business in Canada.

I agree with my colleagues when they say that that sector of our economy is one of the most important, if not the most important of the whole economic structure of our country. I am sure we all agree in the House, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of the large number of small businesses in Canada, their importance in terms of gross national product as well as the remarkable personality of our Canadian entrepreneurs, this sector of our economy constitutes the spearhead of any industrial strategy or economic approach to the development of Canada.

As I said earlier, I am very happy with the favourable remarks made in the House about that vital sector of our economy.

[English]

At the beginning of my remarks I wish to commend the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) who, as the former minister of state for small businesses, trade and industry, led off the response from the official opposition. In his remarks he displayed a keen sense of the issues that face small businesses today. His remarks were constructive and helpful to the government.

• (1410)

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): He termed the Small Businesses Loans Act, and I quote "a very successful program of financial aid to the small business community", and he spoke of the very low loss percentage of the program. Further, he welcomed the announcement that the government will be conducting a comprehensive review of its financial support programs for small business.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) then expressed the wish that we look more specifically at that question of working capital or the accessibility of small businesses to certain funding programs to increase their availability of working capital. That idea was repeated by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), the NDP critic on small business, and I think that the government also shares their concerns about the availability of working capital. However, the instrument before us, Bill C-15 to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, might not be the ideal instrument to deal specifically at this point with the question of greater accessibility to working capital for Canadian entrepreneurs. But I am quite prepared, Mr. Speaker, to hear the representations of my colleagues on this point. I have myself started to attach a great deal of importance to this, more particularly in the general context of the review we are now doing of the funding problems of small business.

As I said in my remarks at the outset of this debate, we have in co-operation with the Canadian Bankers' Association as well as the Economic Council of Canada undertaken two comprehensive studies on programs relating to small businesses and the funding difficulties facing small businesses at this time. I think that, within those comprehensive programs, we will be able to find more adequate solutions to the problems relating to working capital.

Others of my colleagues opposite used this debate on Bill C-17 to deal more generally with the interest rate problems and all the difficulties facing small businesses. I think I should have expected that because in the political arena it is normal to use all opportunities to try and make a point, to say that much needs to be done, but what I remember most from the debate is the general agreement my colleagues opposite expressed with the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act being proposed in Bill C-17.

I noticed more particularly, Mr. Speaker, the very lively and convincing speech by our colleague from Burlington (Mr. Kempling) who referred to the difficulties and annoyances small businessmen can face in Canada when they decide to apply for those programs established by any level of government. I can assure my colleague from Burlington that we will not limit our efforts to reducing administrative formalities and problems caused to Canadian businessmen by red tape. Indeed, as he requested in his speech, we have explained the Small Businesses Loans Act in a booklet and 300,000 copies have been distributed in 1979; furthermore, the banks are trying to improve and develop their information system so that businessmen can be made aware of that very useful and very important program as a development tool for small businesses.

As I said earlier, the high interest rate issue has also been raised. However, I do not think that Bill C-17 is the proper channel through which to tackle the high interest rates which Canadian businessmen have to pay. As all hon. members know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, as late as yesterday we saw that for four weeks now the interest rate has maintained a downward trend and I hope that will help Canadian businessmen.

As mentioned by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) earlier this morning, I think the proposal made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his economic statement a few weeks ago, that is the business development bond, will allow them in the short run to face the high interest rates which have been especially hard on small business.

[English]

I would like to come back more precisely to one remark made by our colleague, the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). In his remarks he said that clause 4 of the SBLA bill would allow the maximum aggregate number of guarantees to increase from $600 million to $675 million up to June, 1980. The hon. member said at that time, and I quote from page 448 of Hansard:

> There is no way an additional $75 million is going to be guaranteed within the next 30 days or so, and therefore I strongly suspect that this is a cover-up and that loans have already been guaranteed in excess of the $600 million allowed by the law.

I would like to correct right away this remark by saying that from July 1, 1977, to the end of March, 1980, $551 million has been guaranteed. Lending in 1980 is running at 24.8 per cent over 1979. If this increase continues for the month of April, 1980—statistics are not yet available for April—only $49 million will remain in the guarantee for the months of May and June. The $600 million guarantee has not yet been exhausted.

The following are the figures for the three-year guarantee period: July 1, 1977, to December 31, 1977, $50 million; January 1, 1978, to December 31, 1978, $176 million; January 1, 1979, to December 31, 1979, $258 million; and January 1, 1980 to March 31, 1980, $67 million. The total is $551 million.

While the guarantee of $600 million has not yet been surpassed, this will happen before the current program terminates at the end of June, and this is why we have proposed to increase the ceiling by $75 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I would like to come back to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Catharines and those of the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) to point out how urgent it is for the standing committee to study that legislation so that Canadian businessmen may continue to take advantage of that program as in the past, because the allowable financial ceiling will be reached within a few weeks.

[English]

As hon. members opposite have not raised objections to this bill, I am hopeful that it will be passed quickly through committee to be enacted.

[Translation]

To conclude, I would like to thank all my colleagues who participated in this debate for their excellent suggestions and also for the positive comments they made in their addresses.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to resume debate on Bill C-19 after an adjournment of several days. I should like to take the opportunity in the course of my intervention to expand upon some of the concerns I have as a Canadian about the larger questions of the current state of our economy, and what I see as a lack of action on behalf of the government and of the minister who introduced this bill in coming to grips with the much needed solutions to these problems.

The bill before us, entitled "an act to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act", is merely an extension of an existing program which was introduced as a temporary program, and for that reason we will extend it for one more year. Government members opposite have made a great deal in recent months of the number of jobs that have been created through programs of employment tax credit and the like.

I think that Canadians would like to know what follow-up statistics show as to whether jobs created by this type of a temporary initiative are permanent or whether those jobs self-destruct shortly after the benefits terminate. We understand that the extension for another year will allow another 50,000 new jobs to be created, but we have to look to the next year with a great degree of discomfort in recognizing that, by the end of 1980, we may again have more than 1.2 million people unemployed in this country. I think we should really be asking the minister—and I hope we will ask him—in committee and on future occasions, what other initiatives he has been able to impose upon his cabinet colleagues to convince the government to deal with the growing and horrendous problem of unemployment which is likely to occur in this country, if the economy goes in the direction that many prognosticators predict it will.

So the first question I ask is: Will these be temporary or permanent jobs? Second, will the conditions of eligibility—that is, that the employer has to state that these positions will be surplus to the normal requirement—and the atmosphere which is likely to prevail in such circumstances, reduce inefficiency and initiative on the part of the employer and the workers, in the sense that it means essentially that we will get more bodies to do the same job?

If the government is going to give employers back some of their tax money or allow them to keep it to hire people to do tasks surplus to the normal requirement, perhaps that might be regarded as having a demoralizing effect on fellow employees and on the attitude of the company in pursuing competitive instincts. Of course, we want to know whether, and how, abuses are prevented in which the employer signs a declaration leaving the impression he is embarking on a new initiative when, in effect, he may just be filling a position which he would otherwise have had to meet from his existing cash flow. So there are a number of questions that might be asked of the minister and I trust we will have a chance to pursue these questions in committee.

However, I should like to get off that point and on to the main thrust of my intervention to indicate that this is indeed a short-term initiative. It is as if the minister were pretending he was feeding peanuts to a friendly elephant in a situation where that elephant is no longer an elephant but has become a hungry lion. If the minister is not too careful, he may lose more than his arm.

The scenario facing this country in the next few months, I think, results from an attitude on the part of the government—not only the politicians but the bureaucrats who design systems—that we can cater to every human need by throwing more money at it or by designing a new government program, establishing a new government department, and proliferating the notion that the government can take over whenever the private sector fails. It is true that we need more in the way of tax measures and less in the way of government make-work programs. As this is a tax measure I applaud it, albeit as only a temporary initiative.

I believe that the country is in a state of crisis largely because the private sector in this country has become seriously demoralized. What do we need to do to re-establish a buoyant and productive economy in Canada? I believe that the past decade of Liberal rule has broken the spirit of the private sector economy, especially the small business sector, such as manufacturing, merchandising, construction, farming, fishing and the like. A government which takes with one hand and hands back to someone else with the other sooner or later demoralizes the producers in society. Indeed, we will have a degree of equality where we may all enjoy the same comforts of life, but those comforts, in the final analysis, will be less in total than if we continued to encourage individual initiative and the instinct to rise to the height of challenge, to be entrepreneurial and to create an expanding economy.

Therefore, I really believe there are two key facets to the problem of unemployment in Canada today. First, we have the facet that has been created by more than a decade of government which pursues a Liberal socialist philosophy and which is destroying the private sector instinct to build our country.

Second, we have a government which has set a bad standard for the private sector to emulate in terms of the manner in which they have managed the economy. I would go so far as to suggest that the monetary socialist approach that has been taken to the conduct of our economic affairs in this country reflects a degree of incompetence and a lack of common sense. There is little comprehension of the tools required to encourage the growth, development and entrepreneurial instincts of those who would build their future, without having to be subject to the heavy hand of government.

I want to give a few examples to illustrate that thesis, but first I should like to return to my first point. I think there is a philosophy afoot in this country. I do not have to think that; it is obvious. It is manifest in the attitude that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has taken toward the resource-owning provinces. It is an attitude which is based on the so-called concept of sharing.

I put a lot of stock in the Judeo-Christian values which suggest that we should be our brother's keeper. I think most members in the House do so too. There is genuine hardship and genuine need in society and we all do have a collective responsibility to respond. But the concept of sharing as revealed by government members opposite and by my friends to the left has become a dogma. I would go so far as to say it could be called the Robin Hood concept of sharing. In fact, the dictionary will confirm that "sharing" means the "giving and receiving of wealth or goods for the common good, in a framework of generosity".

I believe that it takes an atmosphere of generosity and good will if this notion of sharing is to work, the notion which was so fully reflected in the throne speech and which stated that we must have justice for all. I suggest that in our quest for justice and equality we can go too far; we can go so far as to destroy the spirit of individuals and of regions to build and progress on their own account.

I believe it is true that the resources of individual regions are given to them as the basis for building their local economies. That title to resource ownership has been granted since the time of confederation. Indeed, there was some dispute in the House earlier today about the means by which the government opposite is intervening and abrogating that right which the provinces have enjoyed for more than a century. The notion that resources can be confiscated from one sector of society or from one individual in society and assigned to another can be carried too far. As a consequence, I believe the private sector, the business sector and particularly the small business sector in this country are terribly demoralized. We will not eliminate that problem by increasing taxes, by imposing upon them more bureaucracy, more red tape and form filling, but indeed by doing the exact opposite; that is, by getting off their backs and giving them an opportunity to grow and prosper in this country.

I should like to come to the second point of my thesis. Aside from being over-zealous in the pursuit of this notion of sharing, the government, the monetary socialists, have really mishandled the economic affairs of this country. There is a lack of common sense in the manner by which they have husbanded the taxpayers' hard-earned resources. We read a lot these days about something called the Laffer curve.

I do not want to bore the House with technical descriptions, except to indicate that there is one theory in society which indicates that the higher the tax level is raised, the more revenue the government gets for the purpose of delivering the programs it would like to deliver. That is, the greater the taxation becomes as a percentage of take-home income or the gross national product of the country, the more revenue will flow to government and the more opportunity the government will have to do things; to reinvest that revenue to provide some form of incentive or initiative in some other sector of the economy. Increasingly it is becoming evident that that type of a straight line relationship just does not follow common sense, nor does it conform with thousands of years of experience. In fact, if the percentage of the wealth of the economy or of the average take-home pay of individuals that the government takes in the form of taxation is increased without limit, there is a level of taxation where we begin to destroy the incentive for individuals who want to build collectively for the common good of society. If one continues to increase taxes above that level, the revenue flowing to government, and indeed the gross national product of a country, will begin to subside and fall very quickly to a very low value. This is the principle behind the so-called Laffer curve.

When one is beyond that point at which the level of taxation has exceeded the optimum one for producing the best delivery of services and the healthiest economy, or when people are being surtaxed to too great an extent, one will find that further increases in taxes do nothing more than further demoralize the economy. In fact, in this situation tax reductions are the only way to stimulate the economy and to put us back on an even keel. If we look at the evidence, it is clear that the percentage of taxation as a fraction of the gross national product in this country has doubled since 1970. I believe, that we have gone beyond the point where further increases in taxes can be regarded as a benefit to the economy and to the initiatives the government might take. In fact, the present tax levels are probably destructive to the economic progress of our country.

This little discourse on the mechanism of the Laffer curve tells us, I believe, that we are heading into difficult economic times and ever-increasing unemployment, simply because we do not understand the basic, common sense rules of economics.

I should like to point now to some information which came to my attention recently. This information is not widely known. It has to do with the magnitude of Canada's borrowing. We have heard a lot of debate in recent weeks about the additional deficit which will result because the Liberals opposite are reluctant to face up to the fact that we must pay for what we consume or else our children will pay it for it in the future. So they do not mind holding down oil prices artificially and accumulating an additional $2 billion of federal deficit for 1980. They feel that it is all right that our children pay for that some time further down the road.

Of course, that is just one example of the way in which this government continues to enlarge the federal deficit to the point where in 1979-80 the former Liberal government projected to spend 20 per cent more than they would receive in revenue. But when the Progressive Conservative government took office and presented its budget, we had reduced that government deficit to less than 14 per cent of government spending. Now, as a consequence of the mini non-budget presented recently in this House, we are back to a situation where the government will again incur 20 per cent more in terms of spending than it will receive by way of income during the present fiscal year.

The budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) indicated that within five years a conservative government would reduce our deficit to less than 6 per cent of programmed expenditure. It is a travesty, a condemnation of the government opposite, that they will not present five-year projections as to where this country is going. They are reluctant, they are hesitant. They know where they are leading us but they are afraid to admit to the public at large that they are bankrupting this country.

I think it is important that we plan ahead, that we respect the resources of the people who foot the bill and display some consideration for the consequences which massive deficit financing will have on the economic strength of Canada. To highlight that point I want to refer to data taken from the annual reports of the World Bank which showed something rather alarming. These reports indicate that in the years from 1974 to 1979 Canada has borrowed more money in the form of foreign loans and international bond issues than any other country in the world. I do not mean on a per capita basis; I mean that Canada is borrowing more money than any other nation in the world. Sure, it is great to live in Canada, but how is it that we can be so foolish as to borrow at such a rate that in 1976 we borrowed 26 per cent of all the moneys borrowed by all the countries of the world? The average between 1974 and 1979, as reported in the annual reports of the World Bank, is 18 per cent of all the world's borrowing, incurred in the name of Her Majesty the Queen on behalf of those of us here, our families and our children. Since 1974 Canada has been the world leader in total borrowings.

When we listen to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) coming into the House and telling us that because of high interest rates Canada will now incur at least $500 million more in deficits as a result of the carrying charges on that borrowing which was not anticipated two or three months ago, it shows how vulnerable this country has become to international forces and how dependent we are on the wiles and economic circumstances of countries and situations beyond our control.

It might interest members to know that in fact Canada's borrowing is larger than that of France or Japan by a considerable degree. In 1976 Canada borrowed $9.5 billion on international markets, while the next highest borrower, France, borrowed only $2.8 billion. We borrowed $9.5 billion out of a total of $34 billion borrowed by all the countries of the world. Indeed, we are borrowing almost a quarter of the world deficit!

Is it not time to take this matter under consideration and change the course of this country? On a per capita basis Canada borrowed almost 25 times as much as Japan, and in 1976 Japan was the world's third highest borrower. In 1978 Canada borrowed $4.85 billion out of a world total of $36 billion. Japan borrowed only $2.8 billion with a population five times larger.

I see that you are shedding a tear or two, Mr. Speaker, and I think we all should. I am citing this evidence to show that government members opposite have no common sense when it comes to the question of managing the wealth of this country and its tremendous potential. Here we are going off to Mexico signing contracts for oil, we go off to Saudi Arabia and elsewhere to assure sources of supply, when we have the supply right within our own country. The present government is, indeed, assuring non-security of supply by its very actions.

We also have this question of high interest rates, and I have to reflect on a personal perspective which has probably been mirrored by what has happened in the last couple of weeks with the collapse of the interest rate levels. When Mr. Bouey, the governor of the Bank of Canada, came before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs last fall, he told us that we had to maintain high interest rates in order to keep inflation under control, and the reason for that was that we depend so much for the commodities we consume and use in our homes on "imported products".

Secondly, governor Bouey said that our Canadian plant capacity was saturated. Therefore, if we did not keep interest rates high the Canadian dollar would fall, thus encouraging more inflation because of the higher costs of imported goods which we rely upon. He said we had to discourage that and keep inflation under control.

Some very prominent people in this country associated with the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy—and all members of Parliament received this report released on April 22, 1980—recently took the following position, and let me quote:

> The Bank of Canada's policy for reducing inflation— tight money and high interest rates—might have had some justification if the inflation had been caused by an overly expanded economy. But the Canadian economy has not been overheated. Therefore, the Bank's policy has been ill-advised. It has not been successful, and, if persisted in, will be no more successful in the future.

I am pleased to see, therefore, that there has been some change of heart on behalf of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I do not think that the current trend is entirely consequential upon the tumbling interest rates in the United States. I hope we are soon going to wake up to the realization that we do have the opportunity to control our own economy. It is shortsighted to say we cannot increase our own plant capacity. It is shortsighted to say we should continue to enjoy all of the comforts of these things we like to buy from offshore and to travel extensively outside the country when, indeed, a lower dollar, if that had to be the consequence of lower interest rates, would offer a tremendously healthy advantage for our economy. That point also is clearly stated in the report which I have cited.

An hon. Member: Who wrote it?

Mr. Siddon: If hon. members opposite wish me to indicate the author, as they have requested, let me say that the author of this report was a former Liberal finance minister who says the Bank of Canada is wrong, that the Liberal government is wrong and has been wrong for many years, and that it is time we realized that the only way to an independent and healthy economy is to recognize that high interest rates in fact increase inflation, increase bankruptcies and impose a hardship on individual businesses that operate within our country.

Now, if you look at the budget brought down by the former minister of finance on December 11, Mr. Speaker, you will note that the mortgage tax credit program would, indeed, have represented a subsidy on interest rates to the tune of 25 per cent. Members opposite do not want to admit that and neither do our NDP friends to our left, but a 25 per cent tax credit on mortgage payments is a 25 per cent subsidy on mortgage interest rates. That would have ensured that the forest industry would not be collapsing in western Canada and in other parts of the country. It would have assured the construction industry, the real estate industry and the home furnishing industry a much healthier position in Canada today. This would have reduced the cost of a 15 per cent mortgage on renewal to something less than 12 per cent. It is utterly irresponsible for members opposite to have taken the approach they did in condemning that initiative.

On the other side of the question, they like to make a great point of the fact that the mortgage tax credit was going to cost the government something. Actually it was a matter of leaving revenue in the pockets of the people who earned it and were entitled to it. It is the opposite of the Robin Hood philosophy.

On the other hand, the Liberals said that to pay for that cost we were going to increase the price of oil. We were in fact going to increase the price of oil—to a lesser degree than they will in fact have to increase it, inevitably—in order to encourage conservation, and also in order to encourage employment in this country in the private sector of the petroleum industry, in exploration, in the steel fabricating and steel rolling industries, and in terms of all of those supporting industries, including the shipbuilding industry, which would be part of our attempt to develop our own energy resources.

What I am saying is that higher oil prices and a mortgage tax credit program both would have created more jobs than we have in Canada today and would not have cost the Government of Canada one nickel. In fact, all of these additional jobs would have reduced the burden on the unemployment insurance fund and would have increased the flow of income tax revenue to the federal coffers. Without any net change in the existing revenue picture, the Government of Canada and the people of this country would be facing a much healthier economy as we move into the 1980s than we are as a consequence of the Liberal government's retrograde policies; its ill-conceived and nonsensical plans.

Let me deal now with some of the consequences of the government's incompetence in my own riding. I should like to cite a few circumstances that have arisen over the past two or three years. Let me read first from a letter dated April 27 1980, received from a constituent. Reading from its body, it states:

> It is with regret that I have to inform you that Max Sibbelee Aircraft Tires Ltd. is forced to close down its retreading plant as of May 1, 1980.
> Due to rising costs, stiff competition from the United States companies and the complete lack of protection from the federal and provincial governments, another Canadian company has gone down.

I should like to tell hon. members a little of the history of this situation. Some three years ago the owner of this small business, the only western Canadian business engaged in the retreading of aircraft tires, was placed under some pressure from a California firm to stop retreading tires and to merely import and distribute their product. At the same time, the Canadian federal government was financing the establishment in Ontario of a retreading plant in the name of that same California firm, and that government-supported retreading plant, of course, got all the Air Canada business. My constituent found that his area of the retreading market was reduced, but rather than accept the offer from the U.S. firm to become merely a warehouse for their tires, he came to the hon. government House leader in the other place, a well-known Liberal politician from western Canada, and asked if the Senator could help him obtain some tariff protection so that this company from California would not be able to compete unfavourably with him, allowing him to stay in the business of continuing to supply tires to the Department of National Defence, CP Air and other airlines operating in western Canada.

Unfortunately, my constituent had a very frustrating and unsatisfactory time with that particular member of the government. Subsequently he learned that if he was to stay in business he had to purchase a machine called a holographic tire testing machine, which he could buy only in the United States, in order to examine every retreaded tire he produced to ensure there were no imperfections or defects. One wonders why this new standard was suddenly imposed. Nonetheless, upon purchasing this equipment, which cost several hundred thousand dollars, he was immediately slapped with an import duty for bringing that piece of equipment in from the U.S., although it was not available in Canada.

He appealed successively to ministers of this government but received no satisfaction and no agreement to his request that the import duties assessed be refunded. So on the one hand he got no protection from imported products that competed with his product line and, on the other hand, when he was required to upgrade his own manufacturing capacity, he had to pay import duty on the equipment he had to purchase from the U.S. in order to stay in business.

As a consequence of the recent action of this government, in denying this man some rebate of the duty on this very sophisticated piece of equipment, his business has collapsed and 50 people are out of work. There is something wrong with the attitude of a government which does not pay attention to the importance of building enterprise in this country and to giving special consideration to small businesses and employers such as my constituent.

I would like now to cite another situation which has developed in my riding. It is with respect to the potato processing industry. Three years ago an entrepreneur in my riding had just put the finishing touches on an $8 million plant for processing french fried potatoes into packaged form for use in commercial and retail outlets. Around that time he discovered that the federal government had awarded a large DREE grant to a company in Manitoba to produce the same product.

I tried at that time to find out from the officials in DREE what market studies had been done to determine the impact of the competitive imbalance which would result, because of the federal government's subsidy to this large competitive corporation, which is known as McCain's. McCain's were able to provide a product at a price which was backed by the goodheartedness of the people of Canada, so that they undercut the new industry in my riding which was attempting to get into that market. We were told that DREE had no intention of explaining the extent to which they had studied the market factors surrounding their decision to award several million dollars to this plant in Manitoba. A short time later the plant in my riding collapsed.

After several more months of discussion and appeals to the provincial government and federal government, a special ARDA grant was awarded which allowed the owner of this plant to remove all the potato processing equipment and instal a big cold storage freezer. This cold storage freezer was installed after he had laid off 100 employees. Now he employs fewer than ten people and his business is freezing fish. The equipment and the jobs in that plant went somewhere else.

The spin-off implications for my riding and for farmers in the lower Fraser Valley are quite significant because that plant in Manitoba, together with its associate plants across Canada, has a virtual monopoly on the frozen french fried potato business in this country. That company had a smaller plant in Vancouver which was very antiquated and it is now closed. This older plant was the only source of sales for the potatoes grown in the lower Fraser Valley, other than those potatoes which go direct to the consumer market.

What I am saying is that through the process of government intervention to ensure some form of regional equality—sharing or help to other regions of the country—jobs, and opportunities have been lost and dreams have been broken in my part of the country. That is wrong. The farmers who would have been planting potatoes are now trying to find something else to plant and having a very difficult time. In fact the government, as we determined in an exchange with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) the other day, refuses to introduce some form of seasonal tariff to protect the farmers of the lower Fraser Valley from the large quantities of potatoes which are imported from Washington and Idaho. The situation is ludicrous and intolerable.

The government has destroyed a company in my riding which was employing 100 people and an opportunity for farmers in my area to grow produce, but allows produce in large quantities to be imported from just across the border, a few miles away, without giving Canadian potato growers one small bit of protection.

Incidentally, this large company which received all these DREE benefits, to the tune of $10.5 million, the McCain Corporation, is reported to have made an attempt some months later to purchase an interest in Canada Packers Limited. Here is a company that knocked off a few little businesses across the country with the benefit of $10.5 million of taxpayers' money, which then makes a play some months later for a share in Canada Packers. I believe that the transaction was actually completed and McCain's did acquire an interest in Canada Packers Limited. I cannot understand it.

As I said earlier, there is the situation in British Columbia where sawmills and forest industry enterprises in general are collapsing because of similar initiatives by this government. It shows a complete lack of any sense of realism in the approach which it has taken to the housing industry, and the industry is at the point where it is collapsing.

I am pleased to see that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), who is responsible for housing, is present because his solution to this problem was not very well received by the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies the other day when he suggested that the government may be introducing some form of deferred or graduated payment mortgage scheme to accommodate the current high interest rate. The scheme is being contemplated to accommodate the problems of foreclosures and mortgage defaults.

The minister implied that the benefits of government assistance will go first to those who need it most. This, of course, means the AHOP foreclosures. But AHOP is a program that resulted from a foolish government policy in the first place. What the government is contemplating now is an extension of the old AHOP deferred payment system where one could start with small payments and increase them as time went on. That is the solution which the government is offering to the people of Canada at the present time. Based on the expectation that real estate values will appreciate, the government, assuming that it can find some investors who will lend the money on a deferred payment basis, wants to allow people to buy houses on small payments which will increase progressively with time. But what happens if the tide of inflation reverses or the economy collapses? There may be hundreds of thousands more ghetto units across the country financed by the people of Canada. Furthermore, our children will carry the burden because of the massive deficit of this country brought on by a government that has conned people into buying something which we as a society can ill afford.

A spokesman for the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies, after the speech of the Minister of Public Works last week, said:

> Putting the case for major subsidies, he said it was inconsistent that the federal government was willing to subsidize oil by up to $4 billion this year and give nothing to housing.

That is the case which I made earlier. Our government would have given 25 per cent of the mortgage interest payment back by 1982. This year we would have allowed a 12.5 per cent saving on mortgage interest which would have remained in the pockets of Canadians. Instead, the Liberals are subsidizing the high cost of imported oil. It makes no sense.

I have a few more quotes from that same page of The Ottawa Journal with respect to the mini-budget submitted in this House by the Minister of Finance last week.

An hon. Member: Don't quote comic books.

Mr. Siddon: I am not quoting comic books, I am quoting informed public opinion. On that page of the Journal the Canadian Chamber of Commerce spokesman is quoted as saying:

An increased deficit, particularly when viewed against a commitment to a major effort to control expenditures, could undermine the government's credibility regarding fiscal discipline.

The article goes on:

Not only will a larger deficit undermine the government's credibility, it will create additional downward pressure on the Canadian dollar and the financial markets.

The chamber also favours a more rapid move toward oil prices in the domestic market. It says higher oil prices would help reduce the federal deficit, encourage conservation and promote new exploration and development.

What about all the new jobs such a situation would create?

Mr. Chénier: That's an old cliché.

Mr. Siddon: We had a program which essentially assisted people with high interest rates. It was no less than a genuine subsidy of the mortgage interest rate. I find it hypocritical that the Minister of Finance, in his statement last week, agreed that he would introduce our small business development bond, which has the effect of benefiting small businesses in this country, but refused to accept that a similar initiative is long overdue and much needed in terms of the home building industry and to meet the aspirations of young people to own their own home and to be able to afford to keep it.

An hon. Member: Why didn't the people buy it?

● (1500)

Mr. Siddon: The hon. gentleman opposite asks why the people did not buy it. I think it is because they were conned into believing the mortgage tax credit was going to be financed by higher oil prices and they did not believe higher oil prices were essential to our future energy security. I think they were wrong; I think higher oil prices are essential. Time will prove the truth of the initiatives spelled out in that December budget which I think will go down in history as a most important initiative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, in my first address to the Thirty-second Parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: I do not wish hon. members to think this is my first time here. I have been here for a while, but this is the first time that I address this Parliament.

I must commend the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) on his speech. I wanted to make some remarks about the economy, but he has put the view on the record so well he stole the words out of my mouth.

I shall limit my remarks on the bill to two aspects, Mr. Speaker. I hope to challenge the House to use its imagination in order to assist one group of Canadians which is attempting to find employment, that is, the youth of this nation. I want to discuss that aspect of the problem because I have a feeling that when we have such high unemployment in this nation, a bill of this sort does not assist the youth. I think the minister feels that the unemployment tax credit is an important aspect of youth unemployment.

The other area I want to speak about for a few minutes is the problem of unemployment amongst the native people of this nation and how this bill does not in any way assist them. We have a serious problem of unemployment in the country, particularly among young Canadians.

In March of this year the unemployment rate was 8.6 per cent; the rate for Canadians between ages 15 and 24 was 15.1 per cent, almost double the national figure. This contrasts with the 6.3 per cent unemployment rate for Canadians over 25 years of age. These figures do not even begin to reflect the situation in the more disadvantaged regions of this nation. In Newfoundland the rate of youth unemployment is 25.7 per cent and in New Brunswick it is 21.8 per cent. Nor is the situation improving, Mr. Speaker. In March of this year the seasonally adjusted figures showed that the level of unemployment had increased for men and women aged 15 to 24 by 18,000 and 5,000 respectively. In contrast, when we look at the unemployment figures for men and women aged 25 and over, they actually declined by 17,000 for men and 5,000 for women.

We should consider these statistics in the context of the bill before the House which proposes to assist people to find employment. From these statistics it is obvious that this piece of legislation, and others that have been enacted by Parliament, do not assist young people to find jobs during the winter, nor will they in spring and summer. These figures are only numbers and they really obscure the impact of young people not being able to find employment. When they arrive in the work force just out of school, feeling the challenge to get out and earn a living, and then find there are no jobs, the psychological effect is great.

Our society places a great deal of emphasis on work. The work ethic is regarded by our citizens as a very important attribute of this western society. But what does it feel like to be pounding the pavement, not able to find a job when you feel society expects it of you? In a work oriented society you need that job. It has been said many times that the employment of men and women has something to do with their dignity and feeling of self worth.

These young people come out of college, high school or a technical institution, loaded with achievement, ambition, and enthusiasm, to find that only one in two or one in three can find a job, even though manly of them spend hours, days and weeks trying. Many young Canadians are caught in this vicious cycle right now. They graduate with a degree or diploma from university, high school or technical school and find it is not enough. When there is high unemployment, employers can be selective and ask for people with experience. Obviously young people just graduating have had no opportunity to gain experience. As we know, they have enthusiasm and eagerness. They are generally efficient and often more productive than any other age group, once they find a job.

I suppose there is no man or woman in this assembly who has been unemployed.

An hon. Member: Don't depend on it.

Mr. Schellenberger: Well, you are not unemployed right now—maybe soon, but not right now. The only people in this House who are of that age group are the young men and women sitting at your feet, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps they can identify with the problem of getting out into that work-orientated world and being able to find a job. They can recognize the problems that result.

At a recent meeting of the Amerian Ortho-psychiatric Association, Dr. Saul Levine and Dr. Eli Ginzburg concluded that long-term youth unemployment can be both individually and socially disruptive. The alienation which such youth feels from society manifests itself in high rates of dropping out of the school system entirely, of despair and depression, and even of crime and mental illness.

I have described the problem, Mr. Speaker, and I assume the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is aware of it. I certainly hope so. The question is, what can we do about it? Is this piece of legislation going to assist, or even in some way solve the problem? The statistics I used earlier would lead me to believe that it will not. Parliament must find new and productive programs to assist youth in their search for jobs. Our schools can help in this. I remember when a member of the Conservative party travelled the country a number of years ago in the labour field. He came to the conclusion that our schools are not suited to training young people to find the jobs they want to do. They are being taught many important skills but those skills are not necessarily related to the jobs which are available when they go out looking, nor are they related to summer employment programs. Maybe part of the answer is to examine some of the other countries in the world which are having some success in this field.

I look at a couple of programs from Europe. Youth unemployment there is relatively the same as that for people in other age groups. Perhaps we can learn something from the programs that are in place in Europe. In many of these countries there are programs in place to give a young person the opportunity to move in the direction of the kind of employment he will ultimately want to pursue. He receives training by these companies at the same time he is attending school. It is a kind of apprentice program while being educated. Upon leaving school, rather than have the companies give these perspective employees long-term on the job training programs, which generally they cannot afford in a tight economy or when there is high unemployment they do not have to, people are partially experienced and partially able to make use of some of those skills. We should be looking quickly at instituting this type of on the job training while students are still attending educational institutions. I know that the federal government has a large budget for education, but by using these suggestions perhaps we could get a program like this on the road much quicker than we are doing at the present time.

A number of other suggestions have been made which I think are very valid. In particular I am speaking of the summer employment program. We have a program called OFY. Basically—but it is not the case in all of the programs because some of them actually assist young people in acquiring the skills they need as they go on in life—many of these programs are simply menial tasks that do not really give the young people the kinds of experiences and on the job training that they need. Surely the amounts of money that we set aside for this program could require more constructive terms of reference as to the end use of that skill in which we want to get our young people involved.

Surely we could come up with some new programs, for instance, work outside of the government where we could encourage existing local governments, private non-profit and volunteer groups, educational and research organizations to assist in hiring students for special summer projects. By doing that they could be selective about the kinds of students that they hire. They could select those students who have a desire to work eventually in the specific field after leaving the educational institution.

We have experimented with summer hiring programs. Many of the federal government departments have done this. I think it is working very well and I would hope that we would expand that kind of program. Instead of hiring full-time people during the year, many of the surveys and field projects carried on by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Department of Agriculture, the department of housing, and the department of urban affairs, could be done by hiring young people during the summer to assist them. These young people would then be getting the skills and on the job training which will assist them after leaving school.

I am sure many committees of the House of Commons, as well as members of this House, could devise some excellent short-term projects for the summer that could be of value to us in this institution or in some government departments. Our imagination should be used. Our party also suggested that we create a specific environmental corps for the summer to employ young Canadians in major environmental operations across Canada. In my opinion, that is an excellent suggestion.

Coming from an agricultural riding, I believe that we could assist many of our farmers during the summer by employing young people. I know that in Ontario and in parts of British Columbia farmers are constantly looking for people to harvest the crops in the summer and in the fall. Farmers have great difficulty in finding people to do these jobs. In fact they have to import labour from offshore. Surely there are a lot of young people who are unemployed who would be willing to take on this kind of work if the government would assist them in their travel and housing arrangements for brief periods during the summer. At the same time we would be assisting the farmers in getting their produce to market. And, again by using imagination, we could come up with some ways of assisting young people.

There is another area that I think is essential and it is something along the line of a youth opportunity fund. We could channel it through the Industrial Development Bank, or some other institution. By doing this we could assist profit orientated community development groups initially to hire young people to assist them toward a goal where they will be making money and able to pay salaries. There are many of those kinds of community profit orientated types of groups who require people to assist them, and this is one way we could get that sort of thing off the ground. All these programs are programs that assist in a small but very important way. The biggest dilemma that faces us is getting our economy rolling again. If we can bring down the total rate of unemployment, we will then bring down the rate of youth unemployment at the same time, and as my hon. friend who preceded me mentioned, these are some of the ways we could move in order to bring our economy back to order.

Our young people must be challenged. At the present time we are not challenging enough of them. We have not given enough thought in this House of Commons, provincial assemblies or even in the municipalities to how we can better assist and challenge the young people in this nation.

As I look at the bill, I cannot help but think that it really is not giving the assistance necessary. There is one other area I would like to discuss before leaving the Employment Tax Credit Act, and that is the unemployment rate among our native people. The unemployment rate for our native people in the worst of any group in this nation. By looking at the statistics we find that the native unemployment statistics are 300 per cent higher than any other group of people in Canada. The problem is somewhat distinct from any other problem.

Most of these people live on specific reserves set aside, and others who have left those reserves and who are now living in cities often having great difficulty getting jobs. Many of them live in the poorer parts of the cities on welfare and many other social programs that go along with that. This program does nothing to assist them. Obviously, as we look at the rates of unemployment, the programs that we have put in place in this House of Commons are not doing the job. The statistics show that there is no drop in these high rates. By looking at statistics we find that the unemployment rate gets as high as 95 per cent during certain times of the year. These people are not productive nor are they producing anything toward the wealth of this nation. These people are forced to live on the various social programs that are available. I hope to be challenging the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) by asking them to tell this House what plans they have in place for the next year or two to assist this group of Canadians to find employment.

We have many suggestions. I hope that we will be given the opportunity to discuss them in this House and in committee, but we must deal with these problems.

I was interested in the minister's remarks about having the potential to build tar sands and heavy oil sands plants in Alberta if the proper agreements are brought forward as far as pricing is concerned. These plants create a tremendous number of jobs for Canadians. The minister said that he could not put anything into this agreement because of a bill that the provincial House has passed that does not allow preferential hiring in Alberta because, based on the individual Human Rights Protection Act, no one group should be singled out to be given preferential treatment. That does not limit us in this federal House when negotiating contracts to put into them such things as hiring within an area. That area is in the northern part of the province and is surrounded by large numbers of native people.

We have the examples of the Syncrude and Sun Oil plants which have hired a great number of native people. They trained them and they are now working in those tar sands plants. We should be putting into effect the same kinds of opportunities for more of the native of people of that area to work in the Cold Lake plant and the new Athabasca tar sands plant.

I make this suggestion to the minister who said it was impossible because of this piece of legislation. I do not believe it is impossible. I think it is very easy to draw hiring in a specific area into the contract. It is only common sense. I hope that suggestion can be drawn into the contract because it is important to those groups of people. Here is an example of something that is working very well. Both of these tar sands plants have a large amount of laundry that needs to be done. The band that had no employment opportunities before was able to secure that contract. It now has many of its men and women working in the new laundry service, and it is working in an excellent manner.

Surely we can put our heads together to come up with more opportunities when starting projects that have billions of dollars associated with them, in order to create employment for those groups of people in the statistically highest unemployed areas.

We have put some challenges before the minister today. We will be asking him questions based on those challenges. I hope he has some answers with regard to the assistance this bill can give to those people, if any, and maybe some other initiatives to which he is putting his imagination.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to enter the debate this afternoon on Bill C-19 to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, which we hope will relieve some of the high unemployment in Canada. A number of speakers have described this as a band-aid bill. However, we must support it because the government has presented no major job-creation programs to this time for meaningful full-time employment.

It is most distressing to read news articles in the paper such as one that appeared recently, and I quote:

Canada's Specialty: Highest Jobless Rate

Canada has the unwelcome distinction of being alone, among the industrial rivals of the U.S., with a higher rate of unemployment.

That is an absolute disgrace. It certainly does not say much for almost 17 years of Liberal government in this country. I am going to touch on unemployment in Manitoba this afternoon and make some recommendations to the minister on how to alleviate the high unemployment in the construction industry in that province. The latest figures put out by the Winnipeg construction association show that there are 8,423 craftsmen out of work in Manitoba, not a very happy record. Also, for the record, we have to look at the number of business bankruptcies in this country from 1968 through to 1979, which have increased year after year. This clearly indicates how difficult it is to operate a business in Canada. It is one of our major problems and the reason we have almost one million unemployed today.

We hope the government will bring forward some legislation such as that recommended in the Crosbie budget last year. One recommendation was a common stock investment plan which would have assisted Canadian corporations in expanding. There is no doubt about the job creation spin-off there. Also recommended was special incentives for the Atlantic region which has very high unemployment. This government has seen fit to drop those special incentives.

Also in the Crosbie budget were tax incentives for firms investing in depressed areas. That was an excellent piece of legislation. It would have been excellent for regions in the maritimes and other sections of Canada. Perhaps the minister will introduce something similar to that in the near future. There was also the mortgage and property tax credit plan which would have affected employment across Canada and helped many industries, but that was also dropped. It has been a tremendous setback.

I said I would speak on recommendations for alleviating the unemployment problem, particularly in Manitoba. I refer to the CP rail relocation. If we could ever get that program moving, it would create thousands of jobs in Manitoba. In a moment I will go into some detail of some of the studies which have been done with regard to rail relocation in Winnipeg and the economic benefits that would create.

For the past 14 months the minister has been trying hard to obtain funding for the CP rail relocation, but his success has been very minute. We are all behind him in this project as it is something that has been talked about in Winnipeg for 50 years. We have a very serious problem there with two bridges crossing over the CP tracks that will have to be closed down within two years. That is why I cannot understand the DREE formula presented to the House the other day whereby, over a five-year period, all we get is $25 million. I do not know how there can be a proper rail relocation program with $25 million which will be accumulating over five years.

The minister responsible for DREE gave absolutely no explanation as to allowing for inflation, which is running at about 10 per cent a year. Hon. members can see that in five years from now $25 million will just be a drop in the bucket. This is causing considerable concern, the delays and procrastination with regard to the CP rail relocation plan. There has been some suggestion that the province could have more studies and do more about it. However, rail relocation is a responsibility of the federal government under its rail relocation program on a 50-25-25 formula. There is no way a city or province can do more and more studies without a commitment from the federal government that it will pay 50 per cent of the cost.

There have been many refusals on the funding. Just this week we found out that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) knows absolutely nothing about this program. He is not even aware of the studies that Otto Lang ordered in 1979, which were completed in January of this year. He is not aware of the studies that have been done and who has been responsible for them. He tries to blame it on some other government, but it has absolutely nothing to do with the previous government.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) made it perfectly clear that he is not going to be providing any funds for rail relocation in—

An hon. Member: He didn't know what he was saying.

Mr. McKenzie: The hon. member points out that the President of the Treasury Board did not know what he was saying. If one looks at his answers in Hansard, they are certainly very strange. The sad part about this is that the minister seems to work in reverse with regard to his plans for obtaining funds for CP rail relocation in Winnipeg. He should have consulted with the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board and received some commitment from them first. Public meetings and press conferences are held. It is a serial in the newspapers. This business of CP rail relocation just goes on daily, and the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board have no intention of providing any moneys at all.

● (1530)

We received one statement from one minister. I think he was trapped. He came out with this five-year formula, this $5 million a year, which is absolutely ridiculous when we have to have a commitment right now of $80 million from the federal government before anybody can consider proceeding with the rail relocation. There still has been no explanation as to how Winnipeg traffic is to move in two years' time when the Arlington and Salter bridges are closed down.

We just simply cannot wait five years, so if the minister—considering the high unemployment we have in this country and the problems we have in Manitoba—could work on the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board to try to get a firm commitment, that would have tremendous economic benefits for the province of Manitoba, and particularly the Winnipeg area.

The study I have here was commissioned by a previous Liberal government and was just completed in January of this year. It goes into the costs of rail relocation which, at today's figures, is $168 million, so we need a commitment of approximately $84 million from the federal government. I found it very strange that the Minister of Finance knew absolutely nothing about this study at all. He thought it had something to do with the previous government, which it did not. It was commissioned by a former Liberal transport minister. That is another strange aspect of this. I would have thought that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) would at least have informed his colleagues about this study and let me know that it had been completed, including cost figures.

With the CP rail relocation there would be great economic benefits, and they are referred to in a study which was completed in 1972. It is called the "Winnipeg Railway Study". It is quite an extensive study into the benefits of rail relocation. The federal, provincial and municipal governments were involved in this study. Quite a number of officials of the Ministry of Transport were involved in this "Winnipeg Railway Study". We have the Dillon study which was just tabled in January of this year. We have the "Winnipeg Railway Study" which points out all the economic benefits. We have enough studies for the time being. We cannot be trying to con the province or the city into doing more studies until we have a firm commitment of $80 million. Then they can assess their positions and come up with more funding if more studies are needed at that time. However, the initiative lies with the federal government right now, not the city of Winnipeg or the province of Manitoba. It is ludicrous to suggest that.

I will just read out a few of the guidelines in the "Winnipeg Railway Study". It says:

> The technical report on the Winnipeg Railway Study has been received by the executive committee from the study team of consultants. We submit this summary of the technical report to you for your information and consideration.
>
> In preparing the technical report the executive committee has been assisted by a Technical Co-ordinating Committee of representatives from the Ministry of Transport, the Province of Manitoba, the city of Winnipeg, CN Railways and CP Rail. In the course of the study, a spirit of co-operation has developed between the participants in this study.
> Without your initiatives at the start of the study and encouragement throughout our work, we would not be able to report to you on the substantial progress which has been made toward the objectives of developing a railway network in Winnipeg which would improve the social, environmental and economic conditions for the urban community.

All the details are contained in this study, so we do not need any more studies for the time being. It was Damas and Smith Limited which conducted this study and completed it in 1972. The economic benefits would create many thousands of jobs in Winnipeg, and the study points out the following:

> Programs 3 and 4—

These are contained in the study.

> —create maximum opportunities to attain social and environmental objectives for Winnipeg. These objectives represent a higher quality of urban living in Winnipeg.

This has been one of the concerns of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He wants to revitalize the downtown area. Nobody has any objection to that. We all support that.

Damas and Smith also point out the following:

> We are of the opinion that the social and environmental goals and objectives can best be attained by a variant of railway relocation program 3 embodying the urban development concepts in both programs 3 and 4. Further, we believe that it could be demonstrated that the social and environmental gains would warrant the investment in the railway relocation program 3.

Just to give an idea of what we could do with this $80 million, they point out in the Damas and Smith report that, and I quote:

> The development of the main corridor is proposed to be staged, starting at the Assiniboine River with the development of park and residential uses south of the Provencher-St. Mary-York river crossing. Development would extend north into the corridor to include those lands served by CP industrial service tracks, after 1980. The residential uses could be fully marketed in the period to 1986, but the commercial development would be only 35 per cent complete.

So we can see that this study went into quite a bit of detail with regard to the different benefits we would receive. The study claims it would take at least ten years to absorb the remaining commercial land use created by this concept. There is no way the province or the city can do any further study ten years off into the future until we get a firm commitment for this $80 million which is the federal government's share in a proper rail relocation program.

In the Damas and Smith report there is a paragraph on real property, which is as follows:

> There are potential economic gains in real property values which would accrue to the owners participating in the Urban Redevelopment Program. If these programs are planned for private enterprise exclusively, then the gain in property value will flow to the private sector. If on the other hand, the corridors are redeveloped as a joint private and public enterprise, then the gains which will be derived as an effect of the investment of public funds in the two transportation systems—rail and road—would flow back to the public directly.

These are the types of meaningful programs we need to put in place, not these short-term tax credit programs. This would create employment and industrial benefits for years to come in the province of Manitoba.

The Damas and Smith report goes on to say the following:

> The urban development concepts explored under programs 3 and 4 are to a large extent interchangeable. In both programs railways are removed from the downtown. Program 3 indicates the magnitude of costs of almost complete removal of the CP tracks from the downtown.

That is what we are trying to accomplish.

> The CN facilities are removed in all programs.

I am not particularly asking to go into that aspect at the present time.

The Damas and Smith report goes on to say the following:

> In both programs 3 and 4, the objectives of the Urban Development and Transportation Concepts for the downtown were to seek a maximum total benefit—within the downtown and for Winnipeg as a whole. Program 3 approaches what might be a maximum in potential for the Nairn and Logan corridors. Program 4 indicates the potential maximum in the main corridor. Some amalgamation of the urban development and transportation concepts in Programs 3 and 4 for the downtown appears to be promising. Resident population could be increased over that proposed with the current development plan to between 25,000 and 35,000 people in this way. This would focus and integrate a wide range of urban activity; it would serve not only the increased local resident population, but also the recreational and leisure time activities which, at the present time, are dispersed throughout Winnipeg.

In another paragraph the Damas and Smith consultants state, and I quote:

> In CP programs 3 and 4, the main line would be constructed independently of existing operations and the new classification yard built at the appropriate location. On completion, operations would be transferred to the new main line and the yard tracks removed in the downtown. The CP Keewatin-Carberry subdivision main lines would still be retained to service industry in the downtown.

So you can see how extensive the study has been. We do not need any more studies, Mr. Speaker. All we need is $84 million in cash and we could get on with one of the greatest industrial plans you have ever seen going into effect in this country. That would create employment. As one member said, they would rather give it to Mexico. Well, let us give it to Winnipeg, Manitoba, Mr. Speaker!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: I should like to quote again from the Winnipeg Railway Study which states:

> Program 4 results in the removal of approximately 400 dwellings but adds 4,500 new units, a net gain of approximately 4,000 units. This will mean a gain of about 4,000 people in the downtown related corridors. Because most of the housing under this program would be in the main corridor and would likely be priced for the high income sector, the benefits to socially handicapped people will be appreciably less than potentially created by program 3.

They go on to list the economic benefits, but this is where we get great industrial benefits and meaningful job creation. This study also points out the following:

> These programs would promote lively residential fringes and recreational areas circling the north and east parts of the downtown, and will promote the fullest range of urban activities that belong in the centre core. They would have no serious or harmful effects on the development of suburban areas, however, it will mean a lesser function for the suburban shopping centres.

So you can see how extensive this was.

If the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is not familiar with this study, he can check with the officials in his department because four were involved from the Department of Transport.

I hope that this will clear up the need for more studies, and I hope we will not be reading more newspaper articles such as this. There is a headline in this article referring to the Minister of Employment and Immigration which reads, "Minister Raids Ottawa for Relocation Funding". This is where he has gone wrong.

As I pointed out earlier, this whole approach has been in reverse. Now that we have gone this far—we have discussed it—it is a serial in the daily newspapers, I hope that he will now take some time to meet with the President of the Treasury board and the Minister of Finance to work on obtaining the $80 million. This ridiculous proposal from the Minister of DREE (Mr. De Bané) for $5 million a year for five years is the most idiotic proposal I have heard in this whole series since it started about 15 months ago.

An hon. Member: They lead with the hind end.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, as the hon. member says, they lead with the hind end. So let us stop the nonsense. Let us not have any more press conferences and meetings until the minister can come to Winnipeg and say, "I have met with the Minister of Finance, I have met with the President of the Treasury board, and I have the support of the cabinet. They have finally agreed to supply us with $84 million because we will have a meaningful program which will create employment." If he does that, he will go down in history as a hero and he will make up for the blundering through which he has led us in the last 15 months.

I hope the minister is listening with interest to what I have said this afternoon because we are behind him on this. We all want rail relocation and we do not want to be talking about this two years from now and to find out that the Arlington and Salter Street bridges are closed and the only route remaining is Main Street—he knows how narrow it is—and all we have is McPhillips Street at the other end. People in Manitoba will be after him wanting to tar and feather him if he does not take some decisive action in the next two weeks.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I will address my remarks to you, sir. I hope you will remain in the chair.

An hon. Member: He has just left.

Mr. Fennell: I see that one of ours is in the chair for a change.

This legislation on the employment tax credit is, in my view, representative of Liberal programs over the last 12 years. It is another band-aid, another fix-up, a little piece here, another little piece there. Because of our defeat by members on the other side, we have not continued with construction. House construction has stopped. They would not have needed to worry about the tax credit if they had allowed construction to go on. We were thrown out for that.

The second thing the Liberals have done since they have been in power is in connection with the synthetic oil production which our government was going to act upon so as to make certain that this country became self-sufficient and so as to provide jobs, not only in Alberta but many more in Ontario and Quebec. Because of force majeure provisions that the government has put in, employment is down again in Ontario. This attitude amazes me, being from Ontario. They talk about money for Chrysler, money for Quebec for manufacturing vehicles, but they do not want any production in Alberta so as to make us oil self-sufficient and create labour in this country which is so desperately needed.

An hon. Member: Disgusting.

Mr. Fennell: Yes, it is disgusting, as an hon. member says. They boast about not re-introducing the 18-cent tax and killing the mortgage tax deductibility. The 18-cent tax would have allowed us to make this country not only oil self-sufficient but also manufacturing self-sufficient and create employment. We would not need these programs if we had a program that would overcome the unemployment problem before you start.

I congratulate the minister on the employment tax credit program. It is part of the total program, but it is only a little piece—it does not solve the problem. It does not help those big companies to expand and enlarge in a realistic way. It is a band-aid, a patch work. I urge the minister to work with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe), and come up with a solution.

This is only part of the total economic package. Our government put together a total economic package which would have made this country solve the employment problems. Let the minister look at it, copy some more of it, or take the whole thing and do it properly. I wish he would admit that we had a good program. We had an economic program which they could go on with. They took part of it. Let them finish the job and steal the rest of it. Let them do it properly. We had a good program. Let them give some incentive to the private sector, let them not always create government work. This is not working. During the election one party came up with the slogan "Control government, not people". I maintain that that is what we must do. By continuing to put in these patchwork programs, we will not be solving our over-all problems.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stated that there must be a gradual reduction of inflation and interest rates and that this is the only viable solution to this problem. Why does he not practise this at home in Ottawa instead of spending more of our money? Let the people spend it, let the individual, the private sector spend it, not the government. We are compounding our deficits; our children are going to suffer. The government is not supporting any proper program, it is only creating a patchwork of problems. How will it get the 50 per cent equity in our oil industry? There is only one way to do it and that is to nationalize it, which will again mean bigger government. It is the same as they did with PetroCan. They owe $2 billion now for PetroCan. They can go and borrow another $2 billion. Then we will not stand at an 18 per cent average of world borrowing; we will stand at 50 per cent of world borrowing.

What happened to all the tax breaks? When will they bring in some tax breaks for working Canadians? We have seen the working people worried about unemployment and their retirement. When will we care about working Canadians? They are the persons who are the guts of this country. We must pay attention to them. My party provided for working Canadians. We provided mortgage interest and property tax deductibility to give them a break against punitive tax costs.

I should like to refer to a document which contains just general things that could be done by this government. They should reduce the burden on the economy by reducing government. They should reduce the size of the public service. They should disseminate Crown corporations and Crown agencies. They should get some initiative back into the private sector to generate growth and jobs for Canadians. They should do it through the private sector, not through government subsidy. They should help Canadians to get a stake in this country, not only through their own homes but through ownership of stocks of Canadian corporations. I plead with the government to do something about getting the private initiative back into this country. This is part of a program from which I am reading. They should help the regions of this country. There are regions which need more support than other regions. They should look at it realistically. They should not just pick the little pieces here and the little pieces there. It must be done on a total global basis.

An hon. Member: It is pornographic.

Mr. Fennell: It is not pornographic. That is what I would consider their program to be. I will not use the term, but they are that. They are doing nothing to solve the problems of the citizens and the entrepreneurs of this country.

What about oil self-sufficiency? I have heard the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) talk flim-flam, mish-mash or whatever it is about this subject. What will they do? If they direct their energy toward oil self-sufficiency and manufacturing self-sufficiency, they would not need employment tax credit programs. That would solve it.

The five points I mentioned happen to be statements from the Speech from the Throne of the Thirty-first Parliament. They should steal more of our ideas. They were good ideas. They were excellent ideas that were going to turn this country around. Dealing with the oil industry, every time a synthetic oil plant was built approximately $3 billion would remain in Ontario because of related services. I never worked out how much it would be in Quebec. Alberta does not have these services. The services flow back to the east, and it is the east that is so concerned. They should look at the total picture. They should not worry about who is getting what here and there.

An example is DREE programs. The money usually flows back to the industrial base of the country. We know that it does not all stay where the DREE grants are given. It flows back. I am just saying that they should look beyond what they have in their employment tax credit program. They should develop a total program. They should develop an over-all strategy, an employment strategy. They have the people who can do it. They have the ideas they can steal and they have a lot of ideas they can create themselves.

Mr. McGrath: They sure know how to steal ideas.

Mr. Fennell: Working Canadians—and I must say that we contributed toward this—have been left with two pleasures. I am talking about the unemployed man whom they are going to help to get back to work. They picked two things out of our budget, which I do not think was very good. The man has two pleasures left—one, his beer, and two, his cigarettes. Now they are trying to tax that away from him. At least we were including that as part of a total package. It was relative to the 5 per cent tax on corporations. It was relative to the mortgage interest and property tax deductibility which would have created jobs. It was relative to the realistic price of oil. If there was a realistic price of oil, they would not need employment tax credit. They would have this country running, operating and working, and they would be as proud to be a Canadian as I am. We could have been proud. We should get back on the track. Instead of bringing in partial legislation, they should bring in a total package.

Mr. Siddon: You have to know where you are going to do that.

Mr. Fennell: Where is the youth employment program? There is double the number of people in our youth corps, that is, under 25 years of age. There is double the number there. Where is the youth program? Where is an apprenticeship program? Last year in Oshawa they were crying for trained personnel. They had to go to Britain to bring these people in. There is a program to which the government should be able to address itself to get these young people working, involved and particularly to give them a skill. This cannot be done by $2.50 an hour for so many weeks, or whatever it is. I am talking about learning a trade that may take a year, two years or three years, but it must be done realistically. This is a major program which the minister could introduce. It could do great things to solve the unemployment levels of this country and to get the country working again.

The government seems to spend more time investigating successful Canadian corporations to see what it can get out of them. Ministers should be encouraging those companies to develop additional manufacturing facilities. Instead they put punitive taxes on them. They do not give Canadians the opportunity to invest in those companies. They do not give the employees of those companies an opportunity. I am saying that they should get on with it. They should give them a greater chance to get this country going and to get private initiative going. That is what is missing. That is where the employment problems will be solved. They would get the country working—oil would be produced and iron ingots would be converted to steel products. They would have the country moving. We are just hewers of wood and haulers of water. It is time to change that. That is where an employment program could be very worth while.

As I have mentioned before, I maintain that it must be part of a total economic package. The government working together with others could accomplish this, but I plead with them not to do patchwork solutions to major unemployment problems. They should do a total package or a total frame. They should do a whole program. They have the time. They have the experience. They have a lot of friends. They have a lot of friends in the public service who have many ideas. An example is right in the Department of Communications with which I was fortunate enough to be connected. They are not addressing the problems there. There is employment there, but there are employment problems there too. I acknowledge that we should be addressing those.

As we are moving into the electronic age very quickly, they must realize that there will be a change in the labour force. There will be a reduction of people in the service industry. They will be investing an amount similar to the $50,000 per working person that is being spent in the manufacturing sector, or even the $70,000 per working person in the farming sector, instead of the $3,000 per working person which they are spending in the service industry at the present time. If we do not move on that now, we will be dependent upon Japanese and United States products. We have high technology. The public service with which they are now working has some very fine people who have developed high technology. They should find out about Telidon. Find out about Annex C, D and E. Those are job-creating works. Get the money put in there and become numero uno in this country with high technology; we have it, we are not using it and we are not investing it. This is one of the greatest areas that can be developed in this country, and it is probably one of the most important places in this century.

• (1600)

Mr. Knowles: Four o'clock.

Mr. Fennell: Thank you, Mr. Minister. May I call it four o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills. Pursuant to an agreement made earlier this day the House will now proceed to notice of motion No. 13.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the comments just made about an agreement made earlier this day, I should say, so it is legally tidied up, that we request that all private members' public bills and all notices of motions preceding number 13 be allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand the hon. parliamentary secretary has sought and received unanimous consent that all private members' bills and notices of motions now on the order paper shall stand. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations among the parties about the speaking order on Monday during the seventh day of debate on the throne speech. I should point out that the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) had the floor during the last consideration on the sixth day on the amendment to the main motion. While it is not obligatory that we allow the hon. member for Joliette to continue speaking on the seventh day on the main motion, it has been the custom and practice in recent years to allow the person speaking on the amendment to continue on the main motion. The hon. member for Joliette had five minutes on that particular amendment, and I understand that he will be the lead speaker for the Conservative party in the debate on Monday.

It has been agreed that the hon. member for Joliette will have an additional 30 minutes on Monday as the lead speaker in the debate after the question period, to be followed by a speaker from the New Democratic Party, who will also speak for 30 minutes, to be followed by a member of the government, a minister of the Crown, who will also speak for 30 minutes. After that point in time it is agreed that other speakers will be limited to 20 minutes so we can accommodate as many people as possible in the House who wish to make their views known in the throne speech debate. This has particular reference to making it possible for many people to speak before the referendum is taken in Quebec on May 20.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary is quite right in respect of the discussions that we have had. I hope that arrangement will commend itself to the House. If it does, I think it would be appropriate that a House order be made in the terms suggested by the parliamentary secretary. That certainly will give more individuals the opportunity to speak, a right that is sometimes difficult to acquire in the House. I think it is a first-rate suggestion. I commend it to the House and I hope the House is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has correctly reported the results of discussions we have had, and we agree to this proposition.

Since the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) has been given advanced billing to the effect that he will be speaking on Monday, may I say that the first speaker for the New Democratic Party will be the distinguished and hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

I believe there was one other understanding among the three of us, and that was that this arrangement will only work if no one seeks overtime. In other words, the 30 minutes applies to the first three, and after that no one asks for 21 minutes; 20 minutes is the limit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House has heard the proposal put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette). The Chair does not have a copy of it. I will rely, therefore, on hon. members understanding as to what has been said. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is agreed and so ordered.

THE CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED STEP TO PROVIDE FOR AMENDMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East) moved:

That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR THE AMENDMENT IN CANADA OF THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

Whereas the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of each and every province of Canada have requested, and consented to, the enactment of an act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom in the terms hereinafter set forth, and the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted addresses to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

PART I
POWER TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. Subject to this part, the Parliament of Canada may make laws repealing, amending or re-enacting any provision of the Constitution of Canada.

2. No law made under the authority of this part affecting any provision of this act or section 51A of the British North America Act, 1867, or affecting any provision of the Constitution of Canada relating to

(a) the powers of the legislature of a province to make laws,

(b) the rights or privileges granted or secured by the Constitution of Canada to the legislature or the government of a province,

(c) the assets or property of a province, or

(d) the use of the English or French language, shall come into force unless it is concurred in by the legislatures of all the provinces.

3. (1) No law made under the authority of this part affecting any provision of the Constitution of Canada that refers to one or more, but not all, of the provinces, shall come into force unless it is concurred in by the legislature of every province to which the provision refers.

(2) Section 2 of this act does not extend to any provision of the Constitution of Canada referred to in subsection (1) of this section.

4. (1) No law made under the authority of this part affecting any provision of the Constitution of Canada relating to education in any province other than Newfoundland shall come into force unless it is concurred in by the legislatures of all the provinces other than Newfoundland.

(2) No law made under the authority of this part affecting any provision of the Constitution of Canada relating to education in the province of Newfoundland shall come into force unless it is concurred in by the legislature of the province of Newfoundland.

(3) Sections 2 and 3 of this act do not extend to any provision of the Constitution of Canada referred to in subsection (1) or (2) of this section.

5. No law made under the authority of this part affecting any provision of the Constitution of Canada, not coming within sections 2, 3 or 4 of this act, shall come into force if such law is rejected by any combination of provincial Legislatures representative of not less than 20 per cent of the population of Canada (according to the latest census) within a period of 24 months after its passage by the Parliament of Canada.

6. Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution of Canada, the Parliament of Canada may exclusively make laws from time to time amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive Government of Canada, and the Senate and House of Commons, except as regards

(a) the functions of the Queen and the Governor General in relation to the Parliament or Government of Canada;

(b) the requirements of the Constitution of Canada respecting a yearly session of Parliament;

(c) the maximum period fixed by the Constitution of Canada for the duration of the House of Commons, except that the Parliament of Canada may, in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection, continue a House of Commons beyond such maximum period, if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such House;

(d) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate;

(e) the residence qualifications of senators and the requirements of the Constitution of Canada for the summoning of persons to the Senate by the Governor General in the Queen's name;

(f) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province;

(g) the principles of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the constitution of Canada; and

(h) the use of the English or French language.

7. (1) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution of Canada, in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to the amendment from time to time of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1) of this section, no province, through the passage of an act of its legislature, shall partially, or totally, secede from the federation of Canada unless such act of the province is approved by the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of each and every province of Canada.

8. Any law to repeal, amend or re-enact any provision of the Constitution of Canada that is not authorized to be made either by the Parliament of Canada under the authority of section 6 of this act or by the legislature of a province under the authority of section 7 of this act is subject to the provisions of sections 1 to 5 of this act.

9. Nothing in this part diminishes any power of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislature of a province, existing at the coming into force of this act, to make laws in relation to any matter.

10. Notwithstanding any conditions contained within sections 1 to 9 inclusive, the people of Canada, acting in consort, can petition the Parliament of Canada to hold a national referendum on any constitutional matter. Such a petition must be signed by no less than 5 per cent of the voting population of Canada and be validated and accepted by the Federal Government.

On the receipt of such validated petition, the Parliament of Canada shall, before the lapsing of two full years from the date of receipt of the validated petition, hold a national referendum on the substance of the petition and shall enact into law the substance of the petition if such petition receives a 75 per cent plurality of all votes in Canada and no less than a 50 per cent plurality of all votes in each and every province of Canada.

11. No act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the coming into force of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend to Canada or to any province or territory of Canada as part of the law thereof.

12. Notwithstanding the substance, rights or prohibitions, stated or implied, of the Constitution of Canada as revised, this act recognizes that Canada is a multicultural nation composed primarily of two linguistic solitudes, namely English and French. Furthermore, this act acknowledges the inherent right of self determination of each of these solitudes respectively and that each shall have the inherent right through legal and peaceful means to secede each from the other if so desired and duly and legally expressed through a referendum supported in a near unanimous fashion by the people of the solitude seeking separation.

Furthermore, that such separation, if and when decided upon by the solitude seeking separation, shall occur not along established provincial territorial boundaries but along such contiguous territorial boundaries that are duly and legally negotiated between the two solitudes but which fully respect the rights of large minorities and their expressed option to remain with the solitude of their choice.

13. Without limiting the meaning of the expression "Constitution of Canada" in this part that expression includes the following enactments and any order, rule or regulation thereunder, namely,

(a) the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964;

(b) the Manitoba Act, 1870;

(c) the Parliament of Canada Act, 1875;

(d) the Canadian Speaker (Appointment of Deputy) Act, 1895, Session 2;

(e) the Alberta Act;

(f) the Saskatchewan Act;

(g) the Statute of Westminster, 1931, in so far as it is part of the law of Canada; and (h) this act.

PART II
BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867, AMENDED

14. Class 1 of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1967, as enacted by the British North America (No. 2) Act, 1949, and class 1 of section 92 of the British North America Act, 1867, are repealed.

PART III
FRENCH VERSION

15. The French version of this Act set forth in the Schedule shall form part of this act.

PART IV
CITATION AND COMMENCEMENT

16. This Act may be cited as the Constitution of Canada Amendment Act.

17. This Act shall come into force on....day of.....

He said: Mr. Speaker, every member in this House has been humbled today by the passage of a motion stating that the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

Parliament must pursue this objective with haste. This is the beginning of a dream that so many of us have cherished for so long; a dream to make this nation whole, to give this nation a distinctiveness, a wholesomeness, a Canadianism that is our own, and sovereignty as a nation and as a people.

Let us hope and let us pray that this process which has begun here today will not falter and fail. Let us all be determined that we shall succeed in patriating our constitution with provincial unanimous agreements, but without, if necessary, for the Parliament of Canada can patriate the constitution with a built-in formula of unanimity for the subsequent amendment of the Constitution in Canada. The question is, has Parliament got the will to do it?

Let us also be determined that we shall succeed in adopting a less rigid formula for amendment so that we can preserve what is good in our constitution and yet change with some ease what needs changing to keep pace with the evolution of the Canadian identity and the Canadian reality.

Let us also be determined to stay united as a nation and as a people so that we can live in peace, in harmony, in prosperity, and in mutual respect of each other's cultures, each other's languages, and the rights and responsibilities of each and every one of us.

The history of our search as Canadians for identity, for distinctiveness and for fulfilment, has been long and sometimes filled with divisiveness, yet always there has been a common bond between us, for we were and we still are the children of adventurers, the sons and daughters of pioneers who laboured fiercely to give us a future, a future of opportunity and freedom beyond comparison with any other country in the history of civilization.

I plead with the people of Quebec not to cast themselves adrift from this most magnificent of human organizations where opportunity can and should be on the basis of equality for all, where humanism can be respected as the highest order of human organization. This House must act to follow up this motion. A properly structured address to the Queen must evolve. A meeting of first ministers must be convened to get agreement from the premiers. As I have said before, the first ministers should not only attend that conference some time in the near future, but the leaders of the opposition parties in each and every province, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in this House as well.

The reason I say that is because on this fundamental matter, the most basic law of this country, leaders of the opposition in some of the provinces indeed represent a greater percentage of the people in their province than the premiers. Indeed, in this House it is perfectly obvious that the one national force we have from coast to coast is the Progressive Conservative Party. The Leader of the Opposition in this House should be a full participant in that constitutional conference which will be convened in the next several months.

If agreement is not unanimous among the provinces after the conference of the first ministers and the leaders of the opposition, then the Parliament of Canada can act as it is obligated to act and should act to patriate the constitution with the built-in formula in the BNA Act, that is, unanimous agreement between the provinces and the federal government for any subsequent change to the constitution, the only change being that it will now be done in Canada.

It is well-known, and has been stated on several occasions by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, that if the Parliament of Canada approached the Parliament of the United Kingdom and the Queen, the Parliament of the United Kingdom would follow the dictates and the request or the submissions made by this Parliament to patriate the Canadian Constitution and make it an act of Canada.

There is a substantive history on the attempts to patriate the constitution and find an amending formula. It has been a history of failure, of smallness and of inadequacy on the part of politicians. It was during the federal-provincial conference of 1927 that questions concerning the constitution and its amendment were first debated. The search for an actual amending formula was reinitiated and addressed under the leadership of the late prime minister, the Hon. John Diefenbaker, in the 1960s. Debates emerging from that period centred on the search for a constitutional amending formula and resulted in the Fulton-Favreau formula of 1964.

At the conclusion of the federal-provincial conference held in Charlottetown on September 1 and 2, 1964, to commemorate the centennial of the conference of the Fathers of Confederation which took place in that city in 1864, the then prime minister, the late Hon. Lester B. Pearson, and the premiers issued a communiqué. In it the late prime minister and the premiers affirmed their unanimous decision to conclude the patriation of the BNA Act without delay.

The communiqué added that they decided to complete the procedure for amending the constitution of Canada based on the draft legislation proposed at the constitutional conference of 1961, which they accepted in principle. The attorneys general of Canada then met to complete the formula. At a conference of Canadian first ministers on October 14, 1964, the first ministers unanimously agreed on an amending formula. The communiqué issued by the late prime minister Pearson and the premiers from the conference states that when the amending procedures become law, all future amendments to Canada's constitution will be made in Canada instead of by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The communiqué added the following:

> As a result our constitution will have become, for the first time in the history of Canada, truly and wholly Canadian.

This occurred back in 1964 under the guidance of the Prime Minister of Canada at that time, who was the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

The bill contained within this motion contains an attempt to find an amending formula, a structured, multistaged amending formula. I had a similar resolution on an order paper of the Thirty-first Parliament which was well debated by myself, the now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), the NDP member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) and the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). That debate is well documented in Hansard of October 22, 1979.

Again, I would like to summarize very quickly the basic principles of this motion which contains a bill to patriate the constitution with an amending formula. The principles are as follows: The BNA Act of 1867 served this nation well and renewal should be gradual and step-wise. The whole logistic approach of evolving a whole new constitution has proven to be unsuccessful. The package is so large that politicians and the Canadian people find it hard to swallow in one lump. It is a lump created in the throat and we choke on it and we fail.

I am suggesting in this motion that the step-wise approach is the more appropriate approach. The second principle in this motion is that this bill would effectively patriate the constitution of Canada and provide a formula for subsequent revision in Canada. The bill incorporates a constitutional-amending formula which has in it at least five very distinctive and important parts. First, it requires the unanimous agreement of the provinces to amend certain provincial powers including natural resource ownership and the use of the French language and the English language.

The second part is that it generally permits the provinces to amend their own provincial constitutions and, thirdly, it generally permits the federal government to amend the constitution on purely federal matters only. Fourth, it provides the people of Canada with a mechanism for amending their own constitution. In my history, in government and in politics, which now spans over a decade, I have always been unimpressed with the fact that politicians seem to think that they have the only God-given right to change the basic laws of this country.

I want to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that when it comes to the very basic laws of this country, it is not only the politicians who have a right to change those basic laws, but like most other countries—for example, the United States—and federations, of which Canada is the third oldest, the people have the right to initiate a constitutional change. They have the right, for example, to tell their elected politicians that in certain instances they need a very basic change to human rights and to certain matters of the constitution which affect people in every walk of life.

Nevertheless, one must have the safeguards. If one looks at this bill one finds that it is full of safeguards to protect people's actions to change their own basic law. It says that it must start with a plebiscite or a petition, followed by a referendum, and that referendum must pass in each and every province to the extent of at least 50 per cent of the voting population; and furthermore, that the amendment should receive at least a 75 per cent plurality on a total basis. This amending formula provides a formula for amending the constitution generally in all other areas.

I want to speak on this matter for just a few minutes, Mr. Speaker. I know I can speak for at least an hour on this subject but I do not have too much time, and anyway you would not allow it.

What I want to speak about is the formula for changing the constitution in all other areas besides those I have indicated. We have had the Victoria Charter which said that Quebec shall have, in perpetuity, a veto; it said that Ontario shall have, in perpetuity, a veto; that two out of the four Atlantic provinces shall have a veto, and two out of the four western provinces, provided they have 50 per cent of the population of those four provinces shall have a veto—in perpetuity, all of them, until it is changed again.

This country is changing, Mr. Speaker. The population is shifting, and although one might set a constitution at any moment in time on a basis of population in Ontario, there is absolutely nothing to guarantee that that population and that percentage of the population in Ontario will exist 50 years hence. If a fixed formula in terms of veto power is provided for the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec or any province, in perpetuity, then how can it be changed? How can it be changed, regardless of what the population becomes 50 or 100 years hence? Constitutions are the basic law of the nation and this should apply equally to all parts of the nation. If the population of Newfoundland went up to 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 20 per cent of the population of Canada, would it not also then need a veto? Or British Columbia if the same thing happened there?

What I have suggested is that any combination of provinces across the nation, from the east to the west, from the centre to the outlying areas, any combination of provinces representing a minimum of 20 per cent of the population of Canada, should have a veto.

This type of formula is a futuristic one, Mr. Speaker, as well a formula for the present, so that if the population shifts, the formula shifts so that the little province can combine with the big province to get a veto; so that the Atlantic province which has an interest in offshore resources can combine with the province of British Columbia which has an interest in offshore resources, to say no—no way can central Canada take our resources from us for the good of central Canada, because the initial constitution provided those resources primarily for the growth and benefit of a region.

There is a certain degree of equalization in this nation and it is necessary, vitally necessary, but we can get into a process of over-equalization. Indeed, we are now in a process of over-equalization in this nation, such that the regions are stifled, such that the process of co-operation between the regions is increasingly under stress and strain. We have a country now that is moving toward falling apart because we do not respect the very basis of that constitution in the first place, and that is that the resources which come under section 109 of the British North America Act of each and every province should not be taxed by either one jurisdiction or by the Government of Canada.

But what does the government do? It taxes the resources of one province in interprovincial trade; it taxes the resources of one province in international trade. That is totally inappropriate under section 109 of the British North America Act, the existing constitution. It does not tax gold, it does not tax nickel, it does not tax asbestos, it does not tax hydropower and it does not tax all the other resources. I can tell you that 70 per cent of the world's nickel was sold by Ontario not so many years ago. The proceeds of the sale, in terms of total mineral wealth, was very high. I can also tell you, Mr. Speaker, that oil and gas now represent some $11 billion out of $22 billion annual mineral wealth in the nation and that the actual flow westward literally is only another $5 billion a year which, on the basis of the gross national product of this nation, is not high. It is just a few percentage points.

What is wrong with capital flowing west or east in such a way that the development of this nation is regional in scope and so that our young people can move from one end of the country to the other and find great opportunities everywhere? At the same time, that formula for the well-being and for opportunities for young Canadians from one end of the country to the other, can be maintained in such a way that our cultures and our languages can be preserved.

That is the future dream of this country—a future dream which says that people will not stay fixed in one area because they get handouts, when at the same time there are great opportunities in other areas of the country. That is the future dream of this country—a new constitution that will provide this entire nation with the dreams and aspirations and the future well-being of young Canadians. Young Canadians should enjoy this nation from one end to the other; young Quebeckers should enjoy this nation from one end to the other without giving up their culture, their language, their history, their roots, their traditions and their emotions. This can be done, Mr. Speaker. We can make out of this nation the most magnificent nation in all of civilization if we put our minds to it.

One of the things that makes my blood boil is the narrow politician, the politician with the narrowest perspective that one can imagine. That is what I have seen across this nation as the president of the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers, for example, in all the meetings I have had with ministers from all over this nation and, indeed, in meetings outside this country. With some latitude and some depth of thinking we can, in fact, make this a great country, Mr. Speaker, and I hope we do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) for his very eloquent presentation. He is probably one of those in this House who is most knowledgeable on the subject. In fact he presented the same motion in October, 1979, at which time he spoke with great eloquence as well.

It is also timely that this morning the hon. member presented a motion under Standing Order 43 concerning the patriation of our constitution, and now he has presented a motion for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

It is important that all the provinces and the federal government agree on this, so the hon. member's motion is very timely. He knows how difficult it has been in the past to change our constitution or, in fact, to patriate it. Many attempts have been made to patriate the constitution and I want to put some of those on the record in order to show how difficult it is to partriate the constitution, or even to change it.

The publication of the Balfour report in 1926 opened the door for Canada to remove itself completely from the legislative authority of the British parliament. The principal problem to be resolved was that of finding an amending formula for the British North America Act when patriated. That, of course, is what we are talking about today—the whole question of finding a magic formula that is going to patriate the constitution and allow Canada to change its constitution in Canada.

The first attempt to solve the problem occurred in 1927 at a dominion-provincial conference. That conference examined an opinion submitted by the then minister of justice, Ernest Lapointe, which involved patriation with a special amending formula. The agreement of all participants was not forthcoming and the matter was kept under consideration.

A second attempt to resolve this matter of patriation was at the dominion-provincial conference held in April, 1931, which was convened in response to representations by Ontario. Once again they were unable to reach any conclusion and the matter was held over once again for subsequent consideration and approval.

The third attempt to deal with the matter occurred in January, 1935, when the House of Commons established a special committee to inquire into the need to amend the British North America Act and a procedure for amendment. Apparently the committee held some ten sessions but did not propose a procedure for amendment in that report. It is strange that a committee of the House of Commons itself could not come up with any formula acceptable at that time, and apparently we are still in the same situation today.

The fourth attempt originated in the dominion-provincial conference of 1935 which established a subconference on constitutional questions under the chairmanship of the minister of justice, Ernest Lapointe. Following a recommendation of the subconference, a continuing committee on constitutional questions was convened on January 28, 1936. The committee devised an amending formula incorporating elements of flexibility and entrenchment, but once again it was not adopted. And so it goes on and on.

The fifth attempt to deal with the matter was limited to the question of the power of the federal Parliament to amend the constitution of Canada, except for five protected categories, the current situation with respect to constitutional amendment that we have. The federal Parliament unilaterally requested that the British Parliament pass the British North America Act, 1949, which would grant this power to the Parliament of Canada under the new section. This in effect did happen. But that only happened with regard to Newfoundland entering into confederation with the rest of Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And with the agreement of Newfoundland.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Exactly, with the agreement of Newfoundland.

The sixth attempt occurred in 1950 when a constitutional conference was convened in Ottawa in January and continued its work in Quebec City in September. It was subsequently suspended because of the Korean crisis and the work was not resumed.

The seventh attempt was in July, 1960, at the dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa. The conference of attorneys general met four times during the succeeding 14 months and could reach no conclusion. At first the minister of justice, Mr. E. D. Fulton, suggested that the authority to amend the constitution of Canada in all respects, not known amendable in Canada, be transferred to the Parliament of Canada, subject to the consent of the legislatures of all the provinces. It was generally felt, however, that a less rigid formula could be found. A formula was devised in November, 1961, but some differences of view remained and the plan was not carried through. Of course, we are all aware of the Favreau formula which has not yet been adopted.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Fulton-Favreau formula.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): An eighth attempt began at the suggestion of Prime Minister Pearson in 1964. This was mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton East previously. At that time nothing further transpired. At a federal-provincial conference held in October of the same year, a modified version of the 1961 proposal was approved in principle, but subsequently it failed to get unanimous support, and consideration was postponed indefinitely. That is what usually happens every time there is a conference on the constitution.

The ninth attempt began with the federal-provincial conference of February, 1968, which became a continuing constitutional conference. The constitutional conference with its various committees of ministers and officials and its subcommittees and so on operated from 1968 until the Victoria charter, in Victoria, in June, 1971. The charter provided for a patriation procedure, an amending formula, to which all governments there represented agreed, and a number of changes in substantive areas, as well as for the modernization of the constitution. Quebec, however, has not prepared to proceed with the full charter, and once again action was suspended. I think the Victoria amending formula itself is very important to orchestrate at this time. The amending formula as approved, basically provided that the legislative assembly of a province or either the Senate or the House of Commons could initiate a resolution for amendment of the constitution. If the amendment applied to one or more, but not all of the provinces, it might be made when authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and the legislative assembly of each of the provinces concerned.

For other amendments, the amendment would have to be authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and by the legislative assemblies of a majority of the provinces including: first, any province that had, at any time prior to the proclamation according to any previous general census, a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada—and that is where this differs somewhat from that proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton East, since he is talking about 20 per cent of the population; second, of at least two of the Atlantic provinces; third, of at least two of the western provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least 50 per cent of the population of all the western provinces. I assume when we are talking about the western provinces that we are really talking about Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

If the Senate, under either formula, did not pass a resolution within 90 days of a resolution being passed by the House of Commons, the House of Commons could pass the resolution again after the expiry of 90 days and thus authorize the Governor General on behalf of the Parliament of Canada to issue a proclamation.

The amending formula had been approved at the Victoria conference without the dissent of any province. It was because of that general agreement that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) hoped it could be reaffirmed and made the basis of early agreement on patriation.

On the occasion of the discussion in April, 1975, the Premier of Quebec indicated that his province could not agree to patriation on the basis proposed without cultural guarantees. In the course of subsequent discussions, other first ministers suggested further additions to patriation plus the amending formula. These included the parts of the Victoria charter concerning the Supreme Court and regional disparities. Some western first ministers queried the population qualification in the amending formula for western provinces. However, no such qualification applies to the Atlantic provinces.

If all provincial governments agree to the amending formula, with or without the population qualification for the western provinces, to appropriate cultural guarantees, to the provisions respecting the Supreme Court and to the provisions respecting regional disparities, one could proceed toward patriation according to the procedure outlined in February, 1971. This is the solution that is proposed by the federal government.

Now the matter has been of continuing concern to the previous Liberal governments from time to time over a period of years, as a matter of fact, for some ten years from 1968 to 1978. I recall that in 1975 the Prime Minister of Canada invited two provincial premiers to take part in a further attempt to bring control over the British North America Act from Great Britain to Canada and to agree on a new system for amending the act once it was brought home. At that time, once again, although the former leader of the opposition, the Hon. Robert Stanfield, agreed and felt, as he stated at that time, that he did not think it was too much to ask that there be agreement at least on an amendment formula during the life of the Parliament, of course, as we all know, nothing transpired further as a result of this attempt either.

However, in 1979, during the election campaign the hon. member for Mount Royal, on May 10 in Montreal stated:

> If you elect us, if you give us your support, if we form the government after the next election, we will have a Liberal government that will set in motion the patriation of the constitution.

That is all the more reason why it is so important today that this matter is before the House of Commons once again. I think it is fitting also that this matter was brought in by a member of the opposition to indicate that there is continued interest on both sides of the House to patriate our constitution. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> It will be a Liberal government that will do this. We will do it with the co-operation of the provinces, if possible. And if that co-operation is not forthcoming, we will do it with the co-operation of the Canadian people, by means of a referendum.

What he has really illustrated here is not too different from what was suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton East in that it may be necessary to have a referendum on this kind of matter in order to let the people of Canada decide for themselves if in fact they wish to patriate the constitution.

I would suggest that some form of referendum might also be considered when we are looking toward changes in the constitution as well in so far as it affects all of Canada and not just individual provinces.

As the Prime Minister said this morning, with regard to the motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, that, if possible, we want to deal with the provinces. The House leader for the opposition orchestrated the same thing: we do want to work with the provinces. This is an important matter, particularly since the powers of the provinces and the federal government fall under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. The provision is that there should be agreement if possible to reach any conclusions with regard to changes in our constitutional or patriation of the constitution itself.

If all this negotiation fails, it would seem to me that in due course some action would have to be taken, possibly through a referendum, and as I mentioned before, this has already been suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton East. When I look at this bill, and I do not want to go into it in detail, I see that it provides for amendments and not patriation. It is unfortunate the hon. member did not feel he should bring patriation into it at the same time. If we have an amendment to the British North America Act, we want to have the power to make it here and not through the British Parliament.

Clause 1 is very important as it states the power will be in the Parliament of Canada to make laws, repealing, amending, or re-enacting any provisions of the constitution of Canada. That is a very far-reaching and wide power. It would probably require a great deal of discussion and debate before we could reach a conclusion on it.

As far as clause 2 is concerned, all provinces must agree on changes affecting the provinces. There is no doubt that this is well taken. I am sure there would be agreement on all sides that the provinces should be able to have a veto vote if it affects them directly. By the same token, they should be able to effect changes in the constitution if they are affected themselves, even though other provinces may not agree. This could be controversial. I cannot think of any possible problem at the present time that would make it desirable for one province not to agree with another province. However, that remains to be seen.

Clause 5 speaks of 20 per cent of the population rejecting a vote. It seems that this is a very small percentage and it should not be too difficult to obtain.

An hon. Member: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): I really have not got much more to say. I want to say something with regard to clause 12 which talks about the right of self-determination. It is what you might call a selective right to determination only for people who are of either of the two linguistic groups, which he calls solitudes, French and English. This is something that might be considered unsupportable. It would have to be considered very carefully. Even if it were orchestrated by a referendum, I doubt whether it would carry.

When you look at clause 12, you must also look at clause 7(2) where the hon. member suggests that no province or even a part of a province could secede.

In summary, this is a very timely matter to be brought before the House of Commons. It is a matter we will be hearing much more of again. I am sorry there is not a longer debate so that more members could have the opportunity to say what they have to say about this very important matter. I again thank the hon. member for bringing it before the House of Commons.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying that today we are talking about something that is very important. It has been and will be with us for a long period of time. The first note I want to strike is one of caution which I do not think was really in the speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). In my opinion, it is very important that we not bring back the constitution to this country without the unanimous consent of all the provinces. That is very important.

It is also important that Parliament not pass any resolution or bill outlining the details of what we want to see as a Parliament without there first being negotiations between all the provinces and the federal Parliament of this country. I see some Conservatives nodding their heads in agreement. I am pleased to see that. Before we do something that fundamental, we must first have negotiations between the provinces and the federal Parliament and come up with something on which we all agree. That is the reason why I cannot support the resolution before us today.

The hon. member for Edmonton East asks, does Parliament have the will? I am sure that Parliament has the will to see a reconstituted constitution in Canada. However, I again underline the important part, that we only want to do that if we bring all the provinces with us. One of the basic laws of a federation is that all parts of that federation are treated as equals and all parts of that federation must meet together, plan together and agree on things together as one family. If we do not do that, there will be very serious problems within that federation.

There is another point, minor, and perhaps I should not mention it. The hon. member for Edmonton East, and it is typical of some of the oversights, said that at constitutional conferences all the first ministers should be there and leaders of the opposition. I say to him in passing that that does not include representatives of all the people. If we have conferences of the Parliaments and the legislatures, it should not only be of the two parties. I remind him that in this House, for example, his party represents 33 per cent of the people. Our party represents nearly 20 per cent of the people. Therefore, if there is any conference of any kind that involves more than just first ministers, it should reflect the legislative will of all the peoples.

That is why it is important to think of the province of Quebec as well. I cannot predict whether the Oui or Non votes will win. Regardless of who wins in the province of Quebec, there will be a large bloc of people not on the winning side and they must be represented in any conference held on the constitution of this country.

There are a number of things in terms of specifics that really concern me about the resolution before the House. The hon. member kept referring to it as a bill.

An hon. Member: It is a bill within a resolution.

Mr. Nystrom: Perhaps that is what it is. It might be bootlegging. In clause 2 he talks about those things that cannot be done without agreement of all the provinces. He talks about the power the provinces have already, the assets of a province and so on. In subclause (d) he talks about the use of the English or French language. You go to clause 6(h) and he again talks about the use of the English and French language, that nothing can be done there without the agreement of all the provinces. I differ strongly with him on this. His leader, the former prime minister, differs strongly with him as well.

This Parliament and all parties in it passed an Official Languages Act which states that the federal government has the right to enact legislation on the official languages of this country. What the hon. member is trying to do here is render Parliament into what could be called a parliamentary unit where it would not have any power or authority over legislation when it comes to official languages in our institutions. Therefore I can never support a bill on that account.

All you have to do is go back to what has already been agreed upon by the premiers. I go back to the Victoria charter, article 18, page 88, where it says that the federal Parliament has the right to enact legislation regarding the French and English languages in our institutions. I can also look at the special joint committee on the constitution in 1972 which said that we have that right. At the premiers' conference in 1978 the premiers agreed unanimously that we have that power. The government's bill, brought in by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1978, two years ago, also said we have that right. In this resolution there is a suggestion that clearly goes against the expressed wishes of the provinces, the people's representatives and groups that have studied the issue.

As I said at the beginning, the fundamental matter of importance here is that there be co-operation, agreement and consultation between all the provinces of this country and the federal Parliament.

● (1650)

The second thing which concerns me is section 6 of the proposed act, and here the hon. member is talking about the resolution, or the bill, as he calls it. It says:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution of Canada, the Parliament of Canada may exclusively make laws from time to time amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive Government of Canada, and the Senate and House of Commons—

I disagree with this too. I think we can make laws pertaining to the House of Commons and perhaps the executive of the Government of Canada, but I disagree when it comes to the Senate. I am not referring here just to the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the Senate should be abolished. I think that is a correct position.

Mr. Knowles: Midnight tonight.

Mr. Nystrom: I refer also to Claude Ryan's paper and the Pepin-Robarts task force. I refer to positions now being talked about by various provinces, including my own, the province of Saskatchewan, whereby the Senate should be abolished and perhaps replaced by some other institution. Such an institution might perhaps be a council of the provinces. The provinces would appoint or elect people to represent directly the provinces here in the Senate. I am not sure exactly what this organization should be; all I am saying is that when it comes to the Senate and the future of the Senate, the provinces should have some say. We should not have the unilateral say when it comes to the Senate, and for that reason too I cannot support the resolution before the House today.

The hon. member lists all kinds of things which are exceptions, and amongst them is not the Supreme Court of Canada. When we get to the Supreme Court, we are getting to something which is very dear to the hearts of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), myself and Quebeckers. I think now of the question of asbestos and so forth. I am talking about resources. The Supreme Court is appointed by the federal government, and we in Saskatchewan have some problems with rulings made by the Supreme Court when it comes to oil—the CIGOL case—and when it comes to potash. Now the Quebec government is having similar problems with the courts when it comes to asbestos.

We feel that the province has the right to tax resources or to nationalize potash, asbestos or what have you. Those matters are under provincial law. The Supreme Court has been taking differing positions on some of these issues, and I think perhaps one reason it does so is that the judges are appointed by the federal government. What we are saying, and what many provinces are saying, is that some of those judges should be appointed by the provinces because those judges have to adjudicate and make rulings on conflicts between the provinces and the federal government, and they should therefore be appointed, some by the federal government and some by the provinces. Otherwise there perhaps could be a bit of a conflict of interest. In his resolution the hon. member leaves this to the exclusive power of the federal government. I do not think the premier of Alberta would agree with that being in the resolution here today. I do not think he would agree at all.

Another thing the hon. member talks about here is the right of the provinces to secede from the union. He says that before any province can secede, an act of Parliament must be passed and acts in each of the legislatures must be passed. I will not try to speculate on what the solution should be, but again that is something which had to be negotiated amongst all the people of this country. I think, for example, of Newfoundland. Newfoundland came into this country as a result of a vote in Newfoundland, an act of the Newfoundland assembly and by an act of this Parliament. An act did not have to go through the legislatures of Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and all the other provinces of this country.

As I keep going along here in this resolution I come to No. 10. The hon. member talks about referendums, and he says that if the people of Canada petition, they can have a referendum on any constitutional matter, and if 5 per cent or more of the people petition for such, there can be a referendum on any constitutional matter. What is a constitutional matter? Here we are getting into a very sensitive thing. We are getting into constitutional matters which pertain to the federal government, to the provinces and to the territories. In constitutional matters there are concurrent powers.

Then the hon. member goes on to say that if 75 per cent of the people agree in a national plebiscite and 50 per cent of the people in each of the provinces agree, the federal government must then enact the law or the wish expressed in the referendum. I think this too is very dangerous in a federation because, for example, it might be easy to get that vote across Canada when it comes to authority over oil. The rest of the country may say, by 80 per cent, that perhaps Alberta has a little bit too much power. It might be a very divisive issue in Alberta, but it may pass because of the wording of the referendum question by, say, 51 per cent to 49 per cent. There might be immense division, but the federal government would then have the obligation to make the intent of that resolution the law of this country. I just do not think that that is the type of thing we should have in a resolution or in a law of this Parliament. I think that again is an infringement on the rights of the provinces.

There is another thing which I find very interesting, and that is the proposed section 12. The way it is worded in English and French is contradictory. In English it says:

—the Constitution of Canada as revised, this act recognizes that Canada is a multicultural nation composed primarily of two linguistic solitudes, namely English and French.

In the French version it says:

Cette loi reconnaît que le Canada est une nation multiculturelle composée essentiellement de deux groupes linguistiques, à savoir l'anglais et le français.

The hon. member is talking about two different groups, but in English he is talking about two solitudes. I think that is getting rather dangerous. I looked up the definitions of "solitude" and "solitary" in the Oxford dictionary, and I found out that "solitary" means living alone, without companions, secluded, single, lonely, sole, by yourself, and I just maintain that that is not the situation in Canada today. We have in this country peoples in two linguistic groups, but there is a tremendous amount of interaction between those peoples.

[Translation]

We are all in the same Parliament. We can speak either French or English.

[English]

Francophone members can, Anglophone members can and other people can. We have a tremendous interaction amongst the peoples. If there were two solitudes, in the first place why talk about the separation of the solitudes, because they are already separated? How can a solitude seek separation? I just do not understand how we can spend time talking about the integrity of Canada if this country is already being divided, as the hon. member implies, in the two solitudes. I just cannot buy that type of philosophy which is in the resolution before us today.

[Translation]

Another very important thing in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that paragraph 12 totally contradicts the principle of self-determination for Quebeckers. The New Democratic Party has always recognized the rights of Quebeckers to choose freely and without coercion their political future.

It is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that such an argument is put in the House, and I refer specifically to this sentence in paragraph 12.

[English]

It says here:

Furthermore, that such separation, if and when decided upon by the solitude seeking separation—

This could be either the English or French solitude.

—shall occur not along established provincial territorial boundaries but along such contiguous territorial boundaries that are duly and legally negotiated between the two solitudes but which fully respect the rights of large minorities and their expressed option to remain with the solitude of their choice.

I wonder if anybody can explain to me what all this fuddly, muddly gobbledygook really means. It only says that either solitude can, and I quote:

—secede each from the other if so desired and duly and legally expressed through a referendum supported in a near unanimous fashion by the people of the solitude seeking separation.

That means you can secede by a near unanimous fashion. What is a near unanimous fashion? What is a near unanimous vote?

I put that question because again there is no elaboration in the resolution before us on what the hon. member sees as a near unanimous vote.

Those are only a few of the things one could refer to in the resolution which I think do not make much sense at all.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are telling me to wind up, so I suggest that the best thing to do with the resolution before the House today is to send it down to the paper shredder so that it can be shredded and thrown into the garbage can. I think all the people of this country, including Premier Lougheed, would be very happy with that accomplishment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have three things to bring to the attention of hon. members, first, that the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired; second, that it being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(2); and the third is that the Chair wishes all hon. members a good weekend, une bonne fin de semaine.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

DISASTERS

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL FUND TO ASSIST VICTIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Given the fact that disasters such as hurricanes, tornadoes, fires, floods and other acts of God frequently strike without warning, causing extensive damage to life, limb and property; that in most cases the victims of such disasters, as well as the municipality are totally unable to provide the necessary financial assistance to rehabilitate the area and to help the victims of such disasters; and that the source of funds available to municipalities is limited almost entirely to municipal taxation, which is now a tremendous burden to the citizens of that municipality, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House urge the federal and provincial governments to establish a special reserve fund and adopt uniform criteria to administer and disburse such funds should disaster strike.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—ASSISTANCE FOR LOBSTER FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wonder if I might move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House calls upon the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to rise on motions, either later today or at his earliest convenience, to make a brief statement outlining the extent of losses suffered by lobster fishermen along the eastern coast of Nova Scotia and to give some indication to the lobstermen and the House as to the assistance, if any, that may be required to assist fishermen in the successful completion of the lobster season this year.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NEED FOR IMPROVED PENSIONS FOR SURVIVING SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It has been urgent and pressing for a number of years, and it is still urgent and pressing.

In view of the withering effect of current high inflation rates on fixed incomes, and particularly on the incomes of veterans on disability pensions, and because under existing legislation the disabled veteran's surviving spouse is especially vulnerable, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House recommends the immediate reintroduction of Bill C-28 from the Thirty-first Parliament, brought forward by the previous government, to alleviate this hardship, ensuring that the surviving spouse of a disabled veteran on a pension less than 47 per cent be afforded the relief that veterans, by their sacrifices, have earned for themselves and their families.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

FUNDS FOR DEVELOPING INUIT EXPERTISE IN HEALTH CARE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the report of the Advisory Commission on Indian-Inuit Health recommended that funds should be made available to the Inuit for purposes of developing Inuit awareness and expertise in the field of health care, and that these tasks should be entrusted to the Inuit Tapirisats of Canada and the Committee for Original Peoples Entitlement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That the minister responsible for National Health and Welfare contact ITC and COPE and make arrangements for the disbursement of funds for the purposes just stated.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDIZATION OF FARMERS TO MEET HIGH INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the urgent need of our farmers for assistance in meeting the excessively high cost of interest rates today, and as the government of Ontario has just announced a $25-million program to help farmers through the current high interest rate period and will subsidize interest rates above 12 per cent by up to 3 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House instruct the government to introduce a similar program without delay, so that farmers across Canada may benefit from the same kind of positive and imaginative program which has just been introduced by the government of Ontario.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

PETER TREU CASE—REQUEST APOLOGY SENT TO EDITOR OF "TORONTO SUN"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I too rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The government proposed in the Speech from the Throne that a freedom of information act would be introduced in this Parliament.

In view of the fact that the trial of Dr. Treu was the first secret political trial in English common law, setting a dangerous precedent for relations between the judiciary and the Canadian government, and was also an assault on the freedom of the press with the persecution under the Official Secrets Act of Peter Worthington, editor of The Toronto Sun, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this government send a formal letter of apology to Mr. Worthington.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EXPLODING POP BOTTLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a somewhat explosive issue of urgent and compressing necessity. I refer to the continuing dangerous matter of exploding pop bottles and the government's apparent lack of policy on the same.

In view of reports that the government had decided to rescind the ban instituted by the previous Conservative administration on the 1.5 litre soft drink bottles, and since the government reportedly faces a dilemma in getting the bottle manufacturers to agree on a test that will be politically viable, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

● (1115)

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs make a statement in the House at the earliest opportunity on the safety standards being considered by his department to protect consumers from the explosive force of all carbonated beverages in bottles of any size when they are tipped over, punctured or dropped.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SMALL BUSINESS

REVIEW OF FINANCIAL PROBLEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) has undertaken a review of financial problems experienced by small businesses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That the Minister of State (Small Businesses) ensure that this major comprehensive study include meaningful and extensive input from the branch level of Canada's chartered banks and from small business borrowers themselves.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL UNITY

NATIONAL UNITY CARDS ISSUED BY ROYAL BANK OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, pertaining to the making available by the Royal Bank of Canada through its branches to clients in all provinces except Quebec, what are termed "national unity cards", which speak out for the desirability of Quebec to stay within Canada, and also the fact that other companies—reportedly, among others, Bell Canada—will make available the same cards.

I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House praises the efforts of Mr. Paul Paré, who is the apparent initiator of this program, but expresses at the same time its regrets that such cards are not available within the province of Quebec, and asks that companies such as the Royal Bank give immediate consideration to allowing its customers in that province to have the same opportunity as other Canadians in expressing their loyalty to Canada at this time.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FISHERIES

IMPOSITION OF CATCH ROYALTY ON WEST COAST FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of recent statements by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) that he is, indeed, contemplating a catch royalty or landings tax against west coast fishermen, as confirmed in the throne speech by references to a program of partial cost recovery and reinvestment of enhanced earnings, and whereas the Minister of Fisheries has failed to deny that he is considering a surtax in the order of 10 per cent of the landed value of the catch—part of which would go to meet general budgetary costs of his department—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans be directed to clear up the confusion immediately with regard to his plans to impose a catch royalty upon west coast fishermen and, further, that he meet promptly with fishermen groups in British Columbia to hear their views as to the fairness of this form of supplementary income tax.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—EMPLOYMENT GUARANTEES IN AGREEMENT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the Chrysler agreement which was signed on Saturday.

It is noted that the employment guarantees are proportional to the level of Chrysler, U.S., employment. Bearing in mind the move to the world car market which is going on with other automobile manufacturers and Chrysler's desire to move into that field, and noting that components for those world cars are drawn from numerous sources, what discussions were held regarding the sourcing of components?

In other words, did the minister agree to a North American content for the Chrysler fuel-efficient cars which they will produce, bearing in mind that the aid package is almost totally North American?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, in our discussions with Chrysler we obtained from them a commitment for greater sourcing activities of parts and components in Canada than has previously been the case. We did not attempt to have discussions of the nature indicated by the hon. member.

• (1120)

I think that is a matter more for our intentions with respect to consultations on improving the operations of the auto pact from the Canadian point of view and is a matter of interest with respect to the entire industry not simply to Chrysler.

I think it is important to note that in return for our loan guarantees which will not have to be in place until 1982 we received from Chrysler commitments to an operating, financing and facilities' plan involving a $1 billion investment for Canada, aimed at restoring employment in Canada to historical levels; levels indicated in the plan of some 16,000 by 1984.

Mr. Kempling: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. We note that Chrysler has not met its commitment under the Canada-U.S. auto agreement to maintain a specified ratio between sales and production. Have the penalties been weighed and, if so, can the minister tell us the amount of money involved in this?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I have received as yet no formal report on the extent to which Chrysler has met its responsibilities under the auto pact for the preceding model year. We certainly have not waived any penalties, and as far as I am concerned, I will be insisting that Chrysler operate in a way which is in the best interest of Canada and Canadian workers.

Mr. Kempling: A further supplementary question, Madam Speaker. We note that on page 8 of the statement of the minister, he said:

> We have also required, in the agreement, that Chrysler Corporation transfer pricing practices will not work to the detriment of Chrysler Canada.

That implies that the practices in the past may have worked to the detriment of Chrysler Canada and, whether the minister is aware of it or not, they have not met their sales-to-production ratio. I wonder if this transfer pricing policy is part of the problem.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, that very important clause in our agreement with Chrysler was not intended to relate to whether or not Chrysler met its production-to-sales ratio under the auto pact but, rather, that Chrysler Canada's financial position and its equity base would not be impaired by any decisions of the parent company. We want to maintain a strong and more autonomous Chrysler Canada in the interests of the Canadian economy and Canadian workers.

FINANCE

ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL PLANT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that we apparently have now concluded an agreement for financial assistance to the troubled Chrysler operation, can the Minister of Finance tell the House when we may expect an announcement about the troubled Sysco corporation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, it is not possible to say when we may be able to respond to the most recent interest of the government of Nova Scotia.

I would point out to the hon. member, however, that a loan guarantee has already been made available by the Government of Canada in support of Sysco which, in its dimensions, is much larger in terms of relative productivity and investment than that made available to Chrysler.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Without trying to go through the balance sheet on the number of dollars involved between Chrysler and Sysco, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of his very interesting and professional answer of obfuscation last Thursday, as reported at page 831 of Hansard, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, do we understand that the position of the government and the minister is that the government is waiting for a concrete proposal from the government of Nova Scotia in the Sysco situation, or is the reality what has appeared in the press, that that proposal has gone to the government but was misfiled some time ago?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, what has happened is that the government of Nova Scotia forwarded a draft subsidiary agreement that had been submitted to the former Conservative government and which had not been acted upon. In our view, that subsidiary agreement does not constitute, in all its elements, sufficient information to make a response.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will be advising Premier Buchanan at an early date that the material made available in that draft subsidiary agreement is not complete, and that it would not be possible for the Government of Canada to act upon it.

I should add, Madam Speaker, that it is our intention at this stage to try to discuss with the government of Nova Scotia a proposal that would have the effect of making a significant contribution to the future of the Sydney Steel plant, and not, as has too often been the case in the past, making ad hoc responses which are subsequently proved to be fruitless and which lead to additional requests for funds. We would like to make sure this time that we are proceeding in the most responsible way possible that would provide the workers of that plant some assurance that there is a future there.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO INCO PLANT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last week, Inco Limited announced that it has closed the doors on its Sudbury iron-pellet operation, and gave lack of orders as a reason for the shut-down.

Will the minister explain what he is doing to help this Canadian operation, especially in light of the fact that 45 per cent of the iron ore used in Canadian steel companies comes from the United States?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to review this situation with the company to see what further steps we can take to help correct it. I certainly appreciate the seriousness of the situation. It is one that concerns not only me but government members from the Sudbury area.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I might point out to the minister that in Business Week of last month it was reported that the steel industry is riding high, and I quote from the publication:

—is riding high on a wave of expansion.

Will the minister agree that, since four large iron ore mines and pellet operations have closed down in Canada, that Canadian ore must be used in this expansion of operations?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member referred to the article in an American business publication confirming that the Canadian steel industry, which is 100 per cent Canadian-owned, is the most productive, efficient and technologically advanced in the world. It is for that reason that one of our policy commitments is to have greater processing of Canadian resources in our own country. I will be working further on this very matter because of its importance.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, it is nice to hear the minister say that the industry is so healthy. But if it is our industry and it is so healthy, why is it not using our resources? Will the minister call a meeting of the heads of the various steel companies in Canada and ask them, either by voluntary action or by compulsory action, if they will use only Canadian ore?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I think it makes good sense for our Canadian industry to use our Canadian resources. I will certainly be exploring this matter further with the heads of the Canadian steel industry.

FINANCING OF CONVENTION CENTRE IN TORONTO

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who we have been reminding for quite some time now about the Conservative government's deal in the financing of a convention centre in Toronto. This is the deal we had with the municipal and provincial governments.

There are 4,000 construction jobs at stake here and there are 10,000 new jobs to be created in an industry where there is 30 per cent unemployment right now. Will the minister, now that he is free from his preoccupation of saving jobs in his area by aiding an American corporation, give some attention to the equally great need of job creation in the all-Canadian construction industry, and state clearly, now, to this House that he will confirm the Conservative government's deal. Will he answer "Yes" or "No"?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has, tragically, forgotten that there are 2,000 jobs in Toronto right now in Chrysler plants there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, there are also 16,000 jobs in Canadian Chrysler dealerships across the country, Canadian small business, as well as some 10,000 jobs in suppliers to Chrysler in all parts of the country; not only in Ontario and Quebec, but all over, who are dependent upon the survival of Chrysler in Canada. So in the announcement that I made on Saturday, which we have confirmed today, our objective was to help the Canadian economy, help Canadian small business and help Canadian workers. I am sorry that my hon. friend seems to have overlooked this necessity and this reality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: The policy review with respect to the convention centre program I expect to have completed very shortly. This is a matter that we have been working on actively with our Toronto members and ministers, and I hope that either myself or one of my colleagues will have a positive announcement about this matter before too much longer.

Mr. Gilchrist: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. Even the resident Liberal in the Ontario legislature has recognized the need for this project. Stuart Smith said:

It is absolutely necessary to start construction of a convention centre in Toronto because there is a lack of growth in Toronto and the city's economy has become stagnant.

● (1130)

That is more than I have heard from any of the federal Liberal members, I might say. How can the minister continue to ignore this major Canadian construction business and ignore these jobs?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we are, simply, not ignoring them. We had a responsibility, on becoming the government, to make sure that financial commitments of the previous Clark government were sensible and in good order.

We are going to complete this review very soon. We certainly have not been ignoring this vital project. Our Liberal members in Toronto and Liberal ministers have been very active in seeking an early resolution of the matter. I am optimistic there will be one that is satisfactory to all concerned before too much time goes by.

CONVENTION CENTRE FOR OTTAWA-CARLETON

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I heard him speak, quite properly, of the importance of employment with respect to the development and use of convention centres. As he knows, the Liberal and Conservative members in the national capital area have been involved in that.

Can I have an assurance from the minister that in terms of the ongoing review with respect to a convention centre policy, the convention centre for Ottawa-Carleton is not being ignored, and that he is consulting with his seatmate, the Minister of Transport—who is the member for Ottawa-Carleton—with respect to the importance of that particular installation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member has confirmed the non-partisan, all-party support for the Ottawa project. In fact, my colleague, the Minister of State (Small Businesses), met with the Ottawa regional chairman just a few days ago to discuss the progress and consideration, so the project is certainly not forgotten: far from it. It is my hope that we will be making an announcement on the matter of convention centres. It will not simply be with respect to one project, but several. The Toronto and Ottawa projects will be part of that announcement.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

REPORTED SPRAYING OF AEROSOL CLOUD OVER WINNIPEG

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This past weekend, a previously secret report entitled "The Behaviour of Aerosol Clouds within Cities" was released under the provisions of American freedom of information legislation. That report detailed how, in 1953, Canadian authorities collaborated with U.S. defence officials in testing the most effective ways of distributing chemical and biological warfare agents by spraying an aerosol cloud over parts of Winnipeg.

My question to the Prime Minister is, when did he first become aware of this project and its astonishing implications, and does he sanction such projects continuing?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the Department of National Defence is looking into this alleged report very seriously indeed. However, I think it is important to point out that the department feels very strongly that if such an experiment did, in fact, take place, it was not harmful to human life. I think it is important to point that out.

Mr. Sargeant: In light of the fact that the information regarding this testing was made public only as a result of freedom of information legislation in the U.S., will the Prime Minister undertake to investigate and report to this House all other like instances in which Canadians have been unwitting guinea pigs in such hideous experiments?

Mrs. Appolloni: Here again, Madam Speaker, I would point out that we are speaking about a hypothetical case. Nothing has yet been proven by the United States government or by our department. I wish to point out that in speaking as he is doing, the hon. member is doing no justice whatsoever to the very high sense of integrity of our national defence.

TESTS TO ASCERTAIN HARMFUL EFFECTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): I have a supplementary question for the parliamentary secretary who is answering with regard to chemical warfare testing in Winnipeg.

Since aerosol spraying has now been banned because of its harmful effects, is the department conducting any tests in Winnipeg to see whether there have been harmful effects? Are there any more tests similar to this being conducted in Canada today?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I thought I made it clear in my first answer that the department is looking very carefully into this whole subject. I would assure the hon. member—indeed, I am repeating myself—that there has been no confirmation from our department or from the government of the United States about this experiment. Our department is looking into it. No doubt when the minister returns, we will have a much more full report.

PUBLIC WORKS

REASON FOR DELAY IN APPROVING HARBOURFRONT PROJECT IN TORONTO

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. The minister will know that the project in Toronto known as Harbourfront, a project which is before him for approval, has received the approval of all responsible authorities in metropolitan Toronto and Ontario.

It is a project which involves the employment of 3,800 person-years over the next six or seven years, and one which calls for a commitment from the federal government of $20 million and therefore holds in the balance $200 million of private investment. Why has the minister not yet given his approval of the project?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity yesterday with members from Toronto who are newly elected, as I am, to actually visit the site and to have a presentation—one that confirms many of the positive qualities that the hon. member opposite has indicated. It is my hope that within a very few short weeks an announcement will be forthcoming and, I am hopeful, approval of the project.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is aware that the project has already received the support of the city of Toronto council, the metropolitan council, the labour council and the Toronto Construction Association which represents construction companies. It has received all those approvals and has been opposed only by the two railroads and six Liberal MPs. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I am aware of the widespread support for Harbourfront. As a matter of fact, I understand the city of Toronto council voted 22 to 1 in favour of the project. However, a late development has been an introduction or intervention by the metropolitan Toronto board of trade who have indicated that they have some misgivings about the density of the project. However, I think in discussion with them, possibly their information was not up to date. As I say, after this review which was concluded on the weekend, I hope to have an announcement shortly.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EXPLODING POP BOTTLES—SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with the meeting the minister held last Friday afternoon with the bottling manufacturers on the exploding pop bottle question.

In view of reports that the bottling industry is getting impatient for the government to get its act together, is the minister prepared to announce now to the bottlers and to Canadian consumers a decent safety standard to apply to all sizes of carbonated beverages, not just the 1.5 litre bottles but all carbonated beverages in bottles?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am surprised by the question of the hon. member. The decision of my predecessor, the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, is the cause of the present problem. I am surprised that the hon. member is asking that regulations be issued to cover the entire area of bottling. I am surprised that my predecessor did not consider the matter. However, I can tell the hon. member that I met with the representatives of carbonated beverage companies and I will be in a position to announce later this week the new government policy in that regard.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, the minister should know there was a ban put on the 1.5 litre bottles by the previous government. I understand the ban is being rescinded by the present government. We did not have a chance to move on the 750 millilitre and other sized bottles.

I now ask if the department is having problems coming up with any sort of uniform standard because some bottles are not as good quality as others and there is a dispute within the bottling industry as to the kind of uniform standards that should be developed. Can the minister clear up the confusion before any more accidents happen?

• (1140)

Mr. Ouellet: I am very surprised by those remarks, Madam Speaker, coming as they do from a party which has advocated less and less government intervention.

I can assure the House, though, that later this week we shall announce clear specifications which will reassure consumers and remedy the unjust situation which has been imposed by my predecessor on the bottlers.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TOXIC CHEMICALS SPILL ON WEST COAST—LEGISLATION TO PREVENT REPETITION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. Is the minister aware that in the past few days a number of dangerous toxic chemicals with a flash point of only 83 degrees Fahrenheit have been washing up on the west coast of this country?

Would the minister confirm that the United States did not inform Canada of this spill and tell the House exactly what he intends to do about it and about future spills of this nature?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I was away most of last week at the meeting of the Council of Resource and Environment Ministers, in Halifax. I was not aware of the situation the hon. member has described. I thank the hon. member for having brought it to my attention. I will examine it and report back as soon as possible.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the minister's answer, and having regard to the fact that 85 per cent of the one million tons of toxic, hazardous wastes in Canada last year were improperly disposed of, and in view of the fact that the United States this month closed its border to acceptance of some toxic wastes, will the minister immediately introduce a west coast marine pollution act and a transportation and disposal of harzardous products act? If he cannot give the House such an undertaking now, can he tell us whether he will introduce such legislation this year?

Mr. Roberts: The question of toxic chemicals and their transportation was one of the major subjects which we discussed last week at the conference. What I am looking at is a way of finding some means of meeting these concerns at the committee stage of the transportation of hazardous goods legislation.

DISCUSSIONS ON PURCHASE OF SUNCOR

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister or the government, or any department, initiated or taken part in, through a Crown corporation, discussions with Suncor regarding its purchase and, if so, what stage has been reached in such talks?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Madam Speaker.

SYDNEY STEEL PLANT—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question supplementary to that addressed earlier to the Minister of Finance by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants. Are we clearly to understand from the response given by the minister that the government has rejected the proposals of Sysco and the government of Nova Scotia with respect to aid—that they have now rejected that proposal out of hand?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, we have not rejected the approach of the government of Nova Scotia. What we have said is that the material made available up to the present time is insufficient to allow a judgment to be reached on the question of a viable future for Sysco, and that we would wish to have further information and to hold discussions with the government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister, who has been responsible for this matter over the last ten years, cannot be quite as glib as that. Bearing in mind the seriousness of the problem in his own native island of Cape Breton, would he clarify the situation by indicating to the House, to the people of Nova Scotia and to those directly involved, the respect in which he considers the proposals of Sysco and the government of Nova Scotia to be deficient, so that those concerned might address themselves to that question?

Mr. MacEachen: I would be glad to tell the hon. member that a couple of years ago, I believe, the government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada entered into an agreement under which extensive studies were to be made into the question of the future of the Sydney Steel plant. These studies have been completed. They are very extensive, they cover a wide range of problems and I am advised they have hardly been used in drafting the proposal for the future of the Sydney Steel plant. This is one matter we would like addressed in adding to the breadth of the proposal.

Furthermore, as I understand it, hardly any attention has been paid in the subsidiary agreement which was submitted to the former government—and which was not acted upon—to a sales and marketing program and I gather this may have been the reason no action was taken by the former government even though the proposal was submitted in January; that it, too, found the agreement inadequate in detail and in content.

An hon. Member: That is false.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

UNDERGROUND WASTE DISPOSAL RESEARCH PROJECT IN MANITOBA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Committee of Concerned Citizens of Lac du Bonnet, Manitoba, has requested that further work on the underground waste disposal research project in the vicinity of Lac du Bonnet be suspended and that public hearings be held to provide a forum for the discussion of all the attendant scientific, economic, social and ethical issues.

Will the Prime Minister instruct the Minister of Energy to respect the tarnished but still viable idea of participatory democracy and grant this request for public hearings into this project?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The question of waste disposal procedures is under active consideration with provincial governments, particularly the governments of Ontario and Manitoba, and I shall be glad to report to the House any further developments in this area.

Mr. Blaikie: It is unfortunate, Madam Speaker, that the Prime Minister does not choose to speak for his government. Perhaps he will be able to answer the supplementary question.

The issue of nuclear power is one of the most serious practical, moral and, indeed, symbolic issues ever to be faced by the Canadian people. The former government recognized this to an extent in its intention to establish a parliamentary inquiry into the subject. Instead of just "business as usual", now that the Prime Minister is back in power, will the right hon. gentleman tell the House and the Canadian people whether he is prepared to acknowledge the legitimate concerns of a growing number of Canadians, and declare a moratorium on the development of nuclear power until such time as a proper public inquiry can be held and a conscious decision reached on this issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to discuss the question with the Premier of Saskatchewan, the province from which most of the uranium comes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD AGREEMENT—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is my understanding that the NORAD agreement either expired last night or is due to expire today.

Could the Prime Minister tell us whether there has been an extension and, if so, how it was arrived at, bearing in mind that five years ago his government accepted a report from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence that this matter should be referred to the committee well before the expiry date?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am happy to announce that this particular agreement with NORAD will be tabled today. I am also happy to announce that a reference is being made to the standing committee, of which we will hear more today.

Mr. McKinnon: I thank the parliamentary secretary for answering on behalf of the Prime Minister. I wonder if I might ask a supplementary. Does the agreement which is to be tabled today affect the subsidiary agreements and memoranda, particularly as to the continued employment of Canadian servicemen on American soil and, perhaps even more important, the continued custody of the nuclear weapons which are American-owned but are deployed on Canadian soil?

Mrs. Appolloni: Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to thank our Prime Minister for allowing backbenchers and parliamentary secretaries to have a chance to speak in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: In reply to the supplementary question, our department is, as usual, very grateful to the hon. member for his sincere interest in national defence. May I invite the hon. member to see the agreement today, once it is tabled, and then he will have full details. I repeat, he will have the opportunity to discuss the whole agreement later in committee.

AIRPORTS

VICTORIA INTERNATIONAL—ABSENCE OF RADAR EQUIPMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport, who on a variety of occasions in the House within the last two or three weeks has demonstrated that he has been unaware of a number of things such as the location of Mount Hope airport, and the weather ship situation on the west coast.

I am wondering whether he was aware, during his visit to Victoria international airport, of the non-existence of radar at that airport, or whether his officials made him aware of it before he landed there?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Yes, Madam Speaker, I am aware of the existence of Victoria airport—thank you very much—and I will send my friend a detailed analysis of improvements that will be brought about to that airport in the coming year or so.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I think we all know that there are physical improvements to the building. I am talking about radar at Victoria international airport. I think the minister is still unaware of the fact that there is no radar at the airport.

I should like to find out from the minister—if he has been aware of it, or since he has been made aware of it by me, if by no one else—if he would assign to the installation of radar at Victoria international airport the same high priority as was accorded it by the previous government.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do not want to emphasize the point, but it is quite apparent that my hon. friend has a personal reason for asking why there is not an adequate radar system at that particular airport. I am quite sure that if I were to question him on the existence of system radar at other airports in Canada, he would not know either. But this being said, let me assure the hon. member that in my answer to the question regarding improvements being made at Victoria airport, information on radar will be included.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S. FIGHTER AIRCRAFT CRASHES ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I wanted to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence, but since the minister is not here I had hoped to direct it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but he is not here either so I guess I would have to direct it to the minister for intergovernmental affairs, but the Prime Minister failed to appoint him so I will in fact put my question to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anguish: In light of the fact that during the last two weeks, two U.S. fighter aircraft crashed in northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan while on manoeuvres from the Canadian Forces Base at Cold Lake, and since the province of Saskatchewan has been assured that the manoeuvres will cease until the problems have been identified—and such action has not been taken on that and the manoeuvres are still taking place—will the Prime Minister assure the province of Saskatchewan that no further U.S. military manoeuvres will take place until an investigation is carried out and remedial action taken?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I should report to the hon. member something that I believe most hon. members know, namely, that the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are in Brussels attending the NATO meeting. I can understand that the hon. member, belonging to the party that he does, is not quite sure and should be informed of these things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But I will make sure that the ministers, on their return, investigate the matter raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Anguish: I have a supplementary question which the Prime Minister might also wish to direct somewhere. Since the fighter aircraft crash in Saskatchewan has been identified as causing an extensive forest fire, which is still burning out of control, will the Prime Minister assure the province of Saskatchewan that full recovery costs for firefighting will be reimbursed to the provinces as a result of the U.S. plane crashing?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not sure, Madam Speaker, if there is an agreement covering this kind of damage, but if it is damage caused by a U.S. plane I would suppose that the hon. member would want the damage covered by the Americans.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF BAND HOUSING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the continuing representations being made by Indian bands that the financial assistance available under the department's capital housing program be raised from the present totally inadequate level of $12,000, can the minister say when these changes will be made to a more realistic level, so that the bands can get on to the more urgent housing needs?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that the whole matter to which he is referring is now under active consideration by the government. I hope that a decision will be made fairly shortly.

GRAIN

MONEYS OWED FARMERS FOR DELIVERIES TO CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport who answers for the Canadian Wheat Board. Would the minister inform the House and the farmers of western Canada why they have not received, since the crop year 1972-73, the $28 million owed to them for the delivery of grain to the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I will have to take the question as notice, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McKnight: I wonder why that minister is called responsible and the other one is not. Would the minister explain, when he takes notice of this question, who received the payments for the net bushels acquired from overages and shortages and the adjustment since 1973-74, and why it was not the producer? Was this done with the consent of the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Pepin: I will do so, Madam Speaker.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

NORMAN WELLS-ZAMA PIPELINE—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. A week or so ago, a motion was introduced in the House by the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, opposing the construction of the proposed Norman Wells-Zama Lake pipeline.

In view of the need to encourage energy self-sufficiency in Canada, and in view of the need for an economic stimulus in the sadly-depressed Mackenzie district, can the minister tell the House whether he shares the same negative view as the former minister, or whether that hon. member was just expressing his own misguided ideas?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this matter is subject to the environmental assessment panel right now, and also the applications before the National Energy Board, both of which will probably come to culmination some time during the course of the summer. We will wait to see the decisions of those two bodies before any development takes place, in any event.

I hope that during that interval of time matters can be worked out to the satisfaction of all parties concerned. I do not believe it is advisable at this time, on the part of the hon. member or of anyone else, to try to polarize the situation by indicating that development will not go ahead at this particular time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT FUNERAL OF MARSHALL TITO

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Prime Minister with reference to the funeral of Marshall Tito of Yugoslavia at which the government was represented by, among others, as head of our delegation, the Governor General.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister why he failed to accompany the Governor General to the funeral, not only to show respect for one of the last of the great Second World War leaders, but particularly to take the opportunity, as so many other national heads of governments did, to meet with one another and discuss important, world problems with each other?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member does not intend in any way to downgrade the monarchy by suggesting that the Governor General was not a good representative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As to future contacts with foreign heads of government and heads of state, I will have occasion, with the encouragement of the hon. member, to make trips during my term of office.

Mr. Cossitt: May I say, in prefacing my supplementary question, that there was no intention to downgrade the Governor General. If the Prime Minister heard my question, he would have heard me ask why he did not accompany the Governor General who, by virtue of his position, is not empowered to talk to national leaders on the political level.

My supplementary question is as follows: If the Prime Minister could not go himself, why did he not assign to the delegation the Secretary of State for External Affairs? I see he is being prompted by his deskmate several times; I hope it works. Why did he not send the Secretary of State for External Affairs or—and I ask this in all seriousness—is it still government policy to keep the foreign policy of this country in the Prime Minister's office?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it was my view that the funeral of such an eminent statesman as Marshall Tito was not a place to do business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: That is an insult to Margaret Thatcher and the Premier of Japan.

Mr. Trudeau: What business did they do?

• (1200)

CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR POSSIBLE DROUGHT ON PRAIRIES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he inform the House what his department is doing, in conjunction with the provincial governments of the three prairie provinces, in order to put in place contingency plans for what appears to be a very serious drought situation this coming year?

In fact, if there is not substantial rain on a good part of the prairies within the next ten days, we could be into a crisis situation in which there would be some small towns really without water, and also a situation in which the livestock industry could be affected very seriously as well as the grain industry.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is as well aware as I am that we probably have in Canada one of the most unique systems of all where they know the moisture conditions, they know what water exists, both the sweet and sour waters and the alkali waters, and this type of thing. That committee is active and is meeting. Right at this present time the deputy ministers from all across Canada are in Ottawa.

I am told that there will be a special session, if time permits, with the deputy ministers from the three western provinces concerned about the dry conditions. But I can only repeat what I said before—some people scoffed in this House, including the right hon. Leader of the Opposition—when I asked the people to pray for rain, and it worked that time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We did not scoff.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, assuming the committee that is meeting will be doing more than just praying for rain, can the minister give some clear indication to the House as to just what this committee will be doing? Other than meeting in Ottawa, there must be more to what they intend to do. What are some of the specific steps they are putting in place, because it is a very, very serious matter?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, as far as making water available, etc., they do have contingency plans. They are available, and I will make them available again to the member to make sure he understands clearly what they can and cannot do. There are limitations on what they can do and I am sure he is aware of that.

PRIVILEGE

MR. YURKO—REACTION TO MOTION ON AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from statements made by members of this assembly outside the House, but pertaining directly to events which have taken place in this House and which reflect directly on the privileges of the members of this assembly. The motion adopted by this assembly last Friday was as follows:

> That the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty the Queen, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

One such statement made was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in which he publicly stated at a news conference that he took the motion under Standing Order 43, adopted by this assembly, as a sign of a "generosity of spirit" and did not feel particularly bound by it. I would suggest that such a statement implies a breach of the privileges of this House, and would invite the Prime Minister to explain his statement to the House.

Second, the Prime Minister, at the same news conference, was purported to have suggested that it was naive to regard the motion as "a new strategic approach" from the opposition benches, inasmuch as it was clearly placed without the knowledge and approval of opposition party leaders. May I simply state that in proposing and putting the motion last Friday, the internal procedure established within the official opposition caucus was followed by the mover of the motion.

Furthermore, I would bring to the attention of the House that on speaking to the motion prior to the putting of the question by Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister was essentially unconditional in his acceptance, with the following statement:

> Perhaps the House leaders of the other parties, our own House leader and myself could discuss the appropriate time to proceed with that. For my part, I think it would be appropriate if we consulted the provinces before acting unilaterally on that motion.

The implication is very clear, that consultation can be undertaken but unilateral action will be taken by Parliament on the motion whether or not the agreement of any or all the provinces is obtained. The same implication is definitely left by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in his statement, when he said:

> I also commend him for indicating the necessity and, indeed, if not the necessity certainly the propriety in our system, of consulting the provinces in respect of that matter before we act unilaterally.

Our hon. House leader then went on to state that the motion is worthy of the support of the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in responding, commended the introduction of the motion and went on to state that he was prepared to consult with the other House leaders on a suitable time for further debate on the issue.

Outside the House, the news reports suggested that the Prime Minister seemed to question the intent of the motion passed last Friday in my name. The intent is exactly what the motion said and what was unanimously adopted by this House, that Parliament shall submit—let me repeat, that the Thirty-second Parliament of Canada submit an address to the Queen for patriation of the constitution. The motion is not conditional; there is no "maybe" about it.

Therefore, what can Parliament submit, without the unanimous agreement of the provinces? However, as I have repeatedly stated, I strongly submit—as I said last Friday from four o'clock to 4.30 p.m. in speaking to motion No. 13—that a final effort must be made in terms of getting the approval of the provinces for patriation of the constitution.

I think it is important that I state on this question of privilege what my intentions were with the motion. As a result of that motion, I suggest the address should take the following form:

> Whereas the Parliament of Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom in the terms hereinafter set forth, and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted addresses to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose:
> Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled and by the authority of the same as follows:
> That hereinafter the following laws of the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall henceforth become laws of the Parliament of Canada amendable by the Parliament of Canada and the unanimous agreement of the provinces of Canada:
> (a) the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1979 inclusive;
> (b) the Manitoba Act, 1870;
> (c) the Parliament of Canada Act, 1875;
> (d) the Canadian Speaker (Appointment of Deputy) Act, 1895, Session 2;
> (e) the Alberta Act;
> (f) the Saskatchewan Act;
> (g) the Statute of Westminster, 1931, in so far as it is part of the law of Canada and;
> (h) any such other act or regulation pertaining to Canada.
> And henceforth no act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the coming into force of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend to Canada or to any province or territory of Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if I may at this point, I should like to draw two matters to your attention. If I followed the hon. member correctly, it is that he is stating on behalf of his party that, regardless of what the provinces say, after the consultation that both his House leader and I have mentioned—

Mr. Nielsen: That is not right.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I do not think he said that.

Mr. Trudeau: I have not finished my phrase. I do not know how the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) can know what I was going to say.

Mr. Nielsen: You are saying that he is speaking for our party, and that is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry. The hon. member for Yukon tells me that the hon. member for Athabasca, is it—

Mr. Shields: I am the hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Trudeau: —that the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) is not speaking on behalf of his party. Therefore, I do not think I will enter into any debate on this matter with him. I wish the party opposite would get its act together, and then we would know what we are dealing with.

[Translation]

But it seems, Madam Speaker, that when the hon. member presented this motion at the end of last week he did indicate that at least a few members of his party agreed with him. I am now told that it is not the case, that the party does not share the view of the hon. member or, at the very least, that the hon. member is not authorized by the Progressive Conservative Party to speak as he did.

As for me, I should like to bring up the statement of Quebec Premier Lévesque dealing with the motion presented by the hon. member and seconded, as hon. members know, by the House of Commons conditional upon prior consultations with the provinces. The Quebec premier stated over the weekend that, under the present constitution, the rights of Quebec are at the mercy of the federal Parliament which can alter them without the consent of Quebec. I should like to say, Madam Speaker, that this constitutional opinion is not shared by most constitutionalists, including myself. But even if it were the case, that is to say, if under the present constitution the federal Parliament could amend the laws of the provinces, I would remind the House and the Quebec premier that the amending formula we suggested in Victoria and submitted repeatedly to Premier Lévesque specifically gave the province of Quebec and other provinces the right to veto those changes. There is therefore that much more reason for the Quebec premier to consider those proposals for changing the status quo which the federal government put to him in the past, proposals that would require specifically the consent of Quebec before fundamental changes could be made to the constitution.

So, after the intervention of the Quebec premier last weekend, it appears that he is the one who wants the Parliament of Canada and the Canadian Constitution to remain the same, since we are making a specific proposal to change it, to give the right of veto to the province of Quebec.

• (1210)

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I do not want to prolong this debate in any way, but I do not think it is lost upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I am sure it is not lost upon members of the House of Commons, that in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) in respect of the kinds of things that could be included within it, he did say it would be amendable by Parliament with the unanimous consent of the provinces of Canada.

In what I gathered was the spirit of the House on Friday, and I think it was a rather good spirit, the Prime Minister indicated the importance in the constitutional sense of the consultation that must take place in the federal system between the provinces and the federal government. As I recollect, I commended him for that. I think that generosity of spirit is exceedingly important.

I believe too, Madam Speaker, that there is another, almost message—if I may put it in that way—in the motion made by the hon. member for Edmonton East, and that is that in respect of the constitution of this country there is a willingness, now expressed by Parliament for the first time, to engage in a renewal of federalism in this country. If the hon. member for Edmonton East has advanced that cause one inch or one foot, then the hon. member for Edmonton East has done a great service to Parliament and to this country, and I commended him for that before, as I do now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to say to the Prime Minister, on behalf of my party—and I speak as House leader of that party, as I did on Friday—that we are prepared, as a political party, to enter into consultations with the government House leader, as we said we would, in respect of this matter. I do not think there is any one of us in this House of Commons who wants to take any step in any partisan way to in any way fail to advance the cause of togetherness, understanding, compromise and agreement which is the essence of our federalism.

I believe that is the generosity of spirit that was displayed in this House by the fact that Standing Order 43 was the vehicle for an unusual agreement in the House regarding something that is important to Canadians, and that is the ability of Canadians to amend their own constitution.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, because of citation 19(3) of Beauchesne's fifth edition, I question whether this matter is a question of privilege. That paragraph reads:

> Statements made outside the House by a member may not be used as the base for a question of privilege.

There are also rules about reflecting on a vote, which in effect is what we are doing. We took the vote on Friday, and that is it. However, I should like to express the view that it is unfortunate that there has been some misunderstanding of that motion. I believe what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said just now is correct, that there was a generous expression of spirit on Friday to the effect that the members of this House would like to see our constitution in this country. Surely that was the essence of that motion.

Having regard to the positions that were expressed by the three parties, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by the hon. member for Neapean-Carleton, and by myself, we all supported the proposition that there would have to be consultation with the provinces before any such action could be taken.

As I say, Madam Speaker, I question whether this is a matter of privilege, but it is unfortunate that there was misunderstanding of a generous expression of spirit on the part of the members of this House.

Mr. Trudeau: Misunderstanding by whom?

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) led to a discussion which no doubt will prove useful to all those concerned and I had to listen to it completely in order to ascertain whether or not this was indeed a matter of privilege.

However, I must rule on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton East. It was based on statements made outside the House and over which the Chair has no authority.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—TABLING OF AGREEMENT REACHED WITH CHRYSLER

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) whether he can undertake to table a copy of the agreement that was reached with Chrysler and, presumably, with Ontario?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, when I made my announcement of the agreement reached between the federal government, Chrysler Canada and Chrysler Corporation on Saturday, I said I proposed to table the formal document setting out that agreement when the preparation of the documents is completed, and that I would also be tabling the Chrysler Canada financial and operating plan referred to in my statement and to be referred to in those documents at that time. I am happy to give my hon. friend, and the House as a whole, that undertaking.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DEANS—MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON AGREEMENT REACHED WITH CHRYSLER

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On May 7, in response to questions by myself to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), the minister said:

> What we are prepared to make available for Chrysler Canada will depend on what is agreed to by them on the matter of job guarantees and the other elements we consider necessary.

The important part of what he said is as follows:

> I do not intend that members of the House will learn through other sources of any arrangement that is worked out but, rather, through an announcement by myself through this House.

You can imagine my surprise and shock to hear, on Saturday and on Sunday, and to watch the minister speaking on television about the agreement that had been worked out prior to his having made any announcement in the House. In addition to that, the minister has now indicated to my House leader that he does not intend to make a statement in the House today with regard to the Chrysler matter. I do not know whether he intends to make a statement on some other day.

● (1220)

I do suggest that the minister misled me, at least, in this House on May 7 by saying that it was his intention to make a statement in the House and thereby to allow an opportunity for comment by hon. members. Would the minister reconsider, in light of what he said on May 7, and make such a statement in order that we can adequately deal with the proposals which he apparently has agreed to; and would he make that statement today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, obviously, at the time I made that comment I intended to make a statement in the House on this very important matter. However, things became so urgent that I thought it would not be in the public interest or in the interest of the thousands of workers involved to delay the matter but, instead, to seize the opportunity to wrap up the decision and communicate it to the public during the weekend.

I regret the situation, but events moved so quickly that my original intention could not be carried out. I did instruct my staff to make every possible effort to reach the hon. member and other spokesmen of opposition parties so that they would have the material and be in a position to comment on my announcement as soon as it would be possible during the weekend to do so. If the House would like me to make a statement, I would be very happy to do so. I leave that matter to discussions between the House leaders. I would be prepared to make a statement today or at some other time.

There are certainly many opportunities during question period to give out the kind of information sought by my hon. friend. As I have said, I regret that events moved so quickly. I decided that it was in the over-all public interest that I not hold back the information on the agreement which was reached. I would be happy to seek other opportunities to make a formal statement in the House.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, further to the statements just made by the minister, he indicated that his ministry made every effort to contact myself and members of the Conservative party. I can assure the minister that my telephone is on an answering service, I checked it every hour, on the hour, and up to this point in time I can find no evidence of any call—

Madam Speaker: Order. The House has heard the explanation given by the minister. I suggest that the government House leaders get together and decide on whether or not they would like the minister to make a statement in the House.

I feel that there is no question of privilege. It is a difference of opinion between the hon. member and the minister on a question which was raised during question period.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT FUNERAL OF MARSHALL TITO

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order of very few words. I had hoped to raise my point of order in the presence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It concerns something which he said earlier in this House. If there is to be any response to my point of order, perhaps it could be made by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen).

In all respect to our allies, I would think the government would want to withdraw the inference made by the Prime Minister that leaders such as Margaret Thatcher, the Prime Minister of Japan and including his Russian friends, took advantage of discussing world affairs while attending the funeral of Marshall Tito and that a funeral was not the place for a discussion of this kind. Some 80 or 90 other leaders had discussions at this time.

I think that we have insulted all these leaders and I am sure that was not the Prime Minister's intention. Nor would it be the intention of this House to insult such people as the Prime Minister of Japan, who spoke to us here in this House on May 5. I would like to hear the Deputy Prime Minister make it clear, on behalf of the government, that no such aspersions were meant against other governments.

Madam Speaker: The House has noted that the hon. member has expressed a grievance. It is a grievance, rather than a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKNIGHT—EXTRACTING ANSWERS ON CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, being a new member of this House I have difficulty in seeking and acquiring information at the best of times on behalf of my constituents. Considering the fact that in the throne speech, hon. members from the west were requested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to put a little more energy into representing their constituencies than members from other areas, I am finding it very difficult, because when I asked a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)—who is also the minister responsible to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board—I was told something to the effect that he could not supply the information. This is information which I requested so that I could better serve my constituents and fulfil my responsibility to them.

I have found it very difficult, also, when I have attempted to go through other channels for other pieces of information because the senator in the other House who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board never seems to be there. Because of the importance of the Canadian Wheat Board to the people of my constituency, I want to keep them informed; but I am finding it very difficult. All members on this side have the responsibility to keep their constituents informed so that we may represent their concerns and their feelings.

I am not criticizing the hon. minister. As much as he has travelled in the west, he must still find it very difficult to become familiar with the problems of the west. Perhaps he is facing the same difficulty we are in reaching the senator in the other place in order to get information. If you do find, Madam Speaker, that I have a question of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

> That if the inability to gain information about the Canadian Wheat Board from the minister responsible continues, my concerns be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to the concern of the hon. member, which I take to be a serious concern soundly based on his desire to serve his constituents. I heard the question which the hon. member addressed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) which involved failure to make a payment that extended back to 1972-73. The matter occurred some seven or eight years ago.

It may not be possible for every minister to have at his fingertips every piece of information that is current, let alone a matter that extends back some seven or eight years. There was a very simple way for the hon. member to receive a full answer today—which is what he wanted—and that was by giving the minister notice of his question. If the hon. member had given the minister notice, the minister would have had the information available and supplied it immediately.

Obviously, there are some questions for which notice will not be given. Members wish to score political points during the question period, and they do not give notice. The hon. member was not intending to score political points; he merely wanted some information. The quickest way to have received that information would have been to give notice to the Minister of Transport, who would have answered immediately. I suggest that if the hon. member follows that practice on future occasions, he will not have any reason to rise on a question of privilege as he has today.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a brief contribution to this very important question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kinders-ley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight). I listened with great interest to the comments of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to the lack of response by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). The minister was designated to answer, on behalf of the government, in the House of Commons on matters relating to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Deputy Prime Minister has tried to slough off the matter by suggesting that it would be appropriate to give notice and that an answer would then be received. I do not wish to introduce a partisan element into this debate, because that was not my purpose in rising.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: During the period when I was a minister of the government, I did not at any time receive notice of any questions from members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Evans: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Having said that, I must apologize to the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) who gave me notice of a question he intended to ask, but that was just a matter of minutes before the question period was to begin. I received no other such notice. This is a matter of great concern to western Canadians: the minister should not be unaware of that if he is to report on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board.

● (1230)

As my colleague has pointed out, this is not the first time this particular question has arisen. It is not merely the difficulty of getting an answer from the minister who reports on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board that is the problem; it is that we have never been able to get an answer to questions about the Canadian Wheat Board from any minister in this House.

My colleague also pointed out that, as the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board sits in the other place, this makes it more than difficult: it makes it almost impossible for the member of our party who has responsibility as critic of the Canadian Wheat Board to get information from the responsible minister. I realize there is a tradition in this House that it is not obligatory for a minister to respond to any question in the House, but I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that this particular instance transcends that rule.

There is a minister who ostensibly is designated to report to the House on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board, but what happens is that the minister who purports to have responsibility in the House takes every question as notice. This shows a lack of sensitivity to questions which are of great importance to western Canadians.

The Deputy Prime Minister does us a disservice by trying to suggest that this is an isolated instance and that giving notice would improve the situation. The cabinet is so insensitive to this matter that it has not appointed anyone to answer in this House. The rule of the House is, of course, that a minister need not reply, but this type of treatment of questions of importance to western Canadians offends the underlying principle that a minister, even if he is not going to answer, should at least be truthful and straightforward and indicate to the House that he knows nothing about the portfolio and that is the reason he takes the question as notice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): On the same question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I think there is some urgency about the matter raised by the two hon. members from Saskatchewan. The minister should realize that the people of Saskatchewan are facing a crisis situation. Costs have never risen the way they are doing now; farmers are facing a 40 per cent increase in costs. We think it is very relevant to the work of this House that consideration be given to these questions of concern to members from western Canada.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have a few comments on this question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight). Quite obviously, the hon. member is not satisfied with the answer he received from the minister. The Chair, of course, cannot pronounce itself on the quality of an answer which a minister has given in the House.

On the second point made by the hon. member, there are many precedents, as he no doubt knows, for ministers responsible for certain sectors of government activity who sit in the Senate to answer questions in the Senate. The Senate is also a place where information can be elicited by questions.

The hon. member is free to pursue his questions to ministers in this House who may answer them, but in no way can the Chair force a minister to give a member an answer he would like to receive. This type of exchange takes place freely between the two sides of the House, and the Chair does not intervene with regard to either the rigour or quality of the exchange.

Whether the grievances of hon. members are founded or not, the Chair can do no more than allow members to ask questions and permit ministers to answer them. If hon. members are not satisfied, they can pursue their preoccupations in subsequent question periods.

I have to find that there is no question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member who is supposed to speak in the throne speech debate—

Mr. Evans: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Would the hon. member please sit down. Before recognizing him I simply want to mention the fact that during the throne speech debate questions on the order paper are generally not answered since the throne speech debate has priority over all other business of the House except for routine proceedings. However, with the consent of the House, I will allow the hon. parliamentary secretary to answer some questions. Is there unanimous consent to allow the parliamentary secretary to answer questions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 90, 95, 275 and 279.

[Text]

ORDERS IN COUNCIL—NATIONAL SECURITY

Question No. 90—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Of all the orders in council passed between April 20, 1968, and the date the former prime minister took office, how many in any way concerned national security and on what dates were they passed?

2. In each case (a) how many are available for public scrutiny (b) how many are in any way classified (c) what was the general subject-matter?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. One. Order in council PC 1970-1808 of October 16, 1970.—SOR-70/444.

2. (a) It is available for public scrutiny.

(b) It was published in The Canada Gazette on October 28, 1970.

(c) Public order regulations, 1970. This order was superseded by the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, 1970 which remained in force from December 3, 1970, to April 3, 1971.

HOSPITALITY—USE OF CANADIAN WINES

Question No. 95—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, was it planned to serve, at the cancelled dinner for President Carter at Government House, in the latter part of 1979, a 1973 Puligny Montrachet and a 1971 Chambole Mussingy rather than Canadian wines?

2. Are Canadian wines served at receptions held at Canadian consulates or embassies abroad and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what was the total value of Canadian wines served at such locations in the last fiscal year and what percentage did they form of the total wines served?

3. Is the government prepared to take steps to increase its purchase of Canadian wines in any foreign country and, if so, what are the details in this regard?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. However it was also planned to serve a Canadian champagne during the dessert course.

2. In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the reply is as follows:

Yes. (a) not applicable.

(b) Statistics are not available as employees who host receptions identified in the question are not required to maintain records of the origin of commodities served at receptions.

3. The government does not purchase Canadian wines in any foreign country.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—STORES ACCOUNT

Question No. 275—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what amount was transferred to the Department of Transport stores account?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

1975-76—(a) Between October, 1975, and April, 1976, the aviation fuel at Baker Lake, Coral Harbour and Hall Beach in the Northwest Territories valued at $500,000 was transferred from the Air Transportation Program.

(b) Vote L3b, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1976, authorized the increase of the limit of the stores account from $13,000,000 to $27,000,000.

1976-77—On April 1, 1976, the telecom and aircraft parts peculiar inventories valued at $7,838,791 were transferred from the Air Transportation Program.

1977-78—Nil.

1978-79—Nil.

1979-80—Nil.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—STORES ACCOUNT

Question No. 279—Mr. Herbert:

As at March 31 in each of the past five years, what amount was outstanding in the accounts of Canada in respect of the Department of Transport stores account?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

March 31, 1976	$13,030,904
March 31, 1977	$22,069,330
March 31, 1978	$22,679,473
March 31, 1979	$24,628,302
March 31, 1980	$25,950,000 Est.

Notes: During 1976-77 the telecom and aircraft parts peculiar inventories valued at $7,838,791, were added to the stores account.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, you and I may be rising for the same purpose with respect to the House order for today which envisaged that the hon. member for Joliette would speak, followed by an hon. member for the New Democratic Party and then a member from the government side of the House, I suppose in that order, for 30 minutes each. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Joliette cannot be here because of the change in time. He is involved in his province, but he expects to be here later in the day.

● (1240)

There have been discussions between the chief government whip and the chief opposition whip which led to the note that you have in your hands, Madam Speaker, the essence of which would permit the hon. member for Joliette to speak for his thirty minutes some time later in the day. Therefore, our first speaker would be bound by the rules that we have established in the House order.

If that would be agreeable—and I believe it is agreeable and I see the chief government whip is here—and if the House order could be amended accordingly, we could then proceed for the balance of the day on that basis. I hope that is agreeable to all members.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, although the exchange was between those two whips, I believe I suggested that they have the exchange.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Therefore, we agree to the proposition that the hon. member for Joliette speak later, but that otherwise the terms of Friday's order shall stand: that the thirty-minute limit will apply to the hon. member for Joliette, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, and to a government speaker. Everyone else is limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): With no extensions.

Madam Speaker: The Chair was aware of the arrangement which had been reached between the two House leaders. I now have the agreement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it is agreeable that three speakers respectively will have 30 minutes and others will be restricted to the usual 20 minutes.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 22, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Côté for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I thank you for giving me 18 minutes to deliver a 20-minute speech. I shall do my best.

Since this is the first time I rise in this debate, I want to take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the occupants of the chair and my offer of co-operation at all times of impartiality and even-handedness.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty of speaking and appealing directly to my fellow countrymen from the province of Quebec, all those who sit in this House as well as those whom these members represent. I appeal to all those who live in the province of Quebec, Canadians who in a few days will be confronted with a decision which is extremely important for the future of this country.

Fellow countrymen from Quebec! You should not imagine that your problems with the federal government and with the other provinces are unique, or that difficulties, whether of an economic or constitutional nature, do not also afflict the people who live in other areas of this vast country of ours. I emphasize "ours". Do not be so megalomaniac, try to see further than your nose from time to time. You are not the only ones who complain and try to better their situation in our country to which I belong together with you and which belongs to me as well as to you. You do not have the right, and neither do I, to threaten the integrity of our country. You must consult me before even suggesting to tear the country apart. Since you and I belong to this great country and since I served it for 40 years or so, first in uniform, then as a diplomat and finally as a member of Parliament, I claim the right—it is rather an obligation—to speak frankly to you, my French-speaking fellow citizens of the province of Quebec, who will be faced on May 20 with a most crucial question concerning the future of my country; I repeat, the future of my country. In the circumstances, I have not only the right but the obligation to speak to you like a Dutch uncle, as we say, meaning frankly and without restraint.

Since my riding is not in Quebec, I feel I can express myself more freely than my Quebec colleagues because in this debate they must watch their steps carefully so as not to alienate their constituents who are still undecided whether to vote Yes or No. After all, their ridings are at stake. Separation would eliminate 75 seats from this Parliament. So, very frankly I would like to tell you how much, despite the " I couldn't care less" attitude that, we have to admit, exists in western Canada, where I come from, how much we in the west are against the Yes in the coming referendum. I shall say why.

First and foremost, as I just said, you have no right to dismember my country. I will not allow anyone to cut off one of my arms or legs. Is this arm or leg in a position to decide on its own what is to become of the whole body? I, for one, make no bones about replying No. For this reason, the reply on the referendum question must also be No. On the other hand, a majority of Yes votes would authorize the PQ government to avail itself of a "right" which it claims it has, a right which does not exist in my constitutional lexicon, to put forward concrete demands and start negotiating as an equal with the rest of Canada considered as a separate entity. I wonder if to "negotiate" is the proper word in this context. As far as an "equal" is concerned, when does one quarter equal half of the whole? No provincial government has the right to behave this way. That is my own point of view and I am strongly attached to it.

Secondly, your egotistic and introspective behaviour indicates to me that you do not pay any attention to the movements and activities of those here and there in Canada who want a new deal. For instance, are you aware that the western premiers met recently in Lethbridge, Alberta? First of all, they indicated their determination to work to improve federalism in Canada and then expressed their total and unrelenting opposition to a Yes vote on the referendum question. Were you fully aware of these various trends of thoughts out west, or did the PQ authorities choose to distort or cover them up?

Thirdly, do you know that several reports on the need to restructure the federation have been prepared and distributed over the past two or three years, not only at the provincial level, but also within the private sector?

For example, did you read the brochures on the constitution, providing a full range of proposals on the constitution, put forward in Victoria by the province of British Columbia? Have they, too, been concealed from you? Here they are in nine parts, in nine brochures, each dedicated to a particular aspect of the Canadian constitution, such as reform of the Senate, the Supreme Court and the federal-provincial institutions. Those brochures deal also with the distribution of legislative powers and the amendment to the constitution, including linguistic rights. Have they, too, have been concealed from you, and the elaborate study of our problems and concerns, with some proposals flowing from it, prepared two years ago by the Canadian Bar Association.

I might quote a third example of that concern, as serious as yours, over the constitutional dead end our beloved country is now in. The Canada West Foundation, a non-profit organization, published some time ago a thorough examination of this sad situation. I am showing it to you because I feel that such things are concealed from you.

It is obvious that we are all looking for a new agreement, a new federalism which will allow and even force us to live in harmony with one another. You are not the only ones looking for a new formula. For our part, we reject the formula suggested by the PQ government, according to which you have to accept—whether you like it or not—an absurdity like sovereignty-association.

Think things over calmly. Use your head. A fraud is being perpetrated. Look hard at those two words and consider the effect of their juxtaposition. Don't be fooled. Don't be hypnotized by deceiving and demagogic eloquence. The real question of the referendum, the question which is being put now and which could determine the future of my country, but on which you alone are called upon to vote on on May 20, is purely and simply separation-association. Do not forget it when the time comes to mark your ballot. Separation-association is what it is all about, despite the promise of a second referendum.

In my opinion, a single province does not have the right to decide by itself an issue of such importance. The whole population, under certain circumstances, should decide whether or not such a referendum is necessary. Let us consider these two terms in some detail.

As for sovereignty, the fact is that every province already enjoys it to some extent. Not full sovereignty in all areas, indeed not, but for the generation of electricity, resource and forest development, in the field of municipal government, there is absolute and unquestionable sovereignty. After all, sovereignty must be defined in pluralistic terms, since some areas are already unquestionably under the sovereign jurisdiction of the provinces, while others come under the responsibility of Canada as a whole and all its citizens. There is even a third sector of mixed jurisdiction. Under the circumstances, how can you be fooled by this outlandish concept, this idiotic nonsense that is sovereignty within a federation? Sovereignty-association is utter rubbish. I will come back to this issue related to political science after putting forward some arguments pertaining to logic. Let us consider for a moment the expression "sovereignty-association."

In my opinion, it immediately shows an innate contradiction. Being sovereign, as the Parti Québécois supporters see it, is to be able to regulate the life of the community in all its aspects through your own efforts, with no external constraints, which means, according to the Parti Québécois supporters, the "right" to negotiate as between equals with other sovereign states, such as Canada, and separately with each province. I wonder what right they suggest! On the other hand, association means acceptance of the principles that you must share with your associates in the conduct of your affairs and, all the more so, submit to external constraints.

How can you put together two such contradictory notions? I am really surprised and even shocked to see how people who are so proud of their cartesian training can be blinded by such an obvious contradiction. But let us go back to the concept just stated which is to examine more closely what I would call, for lack of a simpler expression, "sectorial sovereignty", and which is for me the essential basis of any true federalism.

What is essential in such a federalism, and a federalism renewed in the spirit already revealed, is to grant the participant total sovereignty in certain specific sectors and to ensure that they have the taxation powers to fulfil their responsibilities in these designated areas. As I understand it, this is exactly what you are looking for, my friends in Quebec. It is also what we are looking for in the west, that is, the certainty that in some specific areas we shall be able to have total jurisdiction with all related constitutional and taxation powers.

Do not be so myopic. You are not the only province seeking this federative formula. Open your eyes. We are all looking for a renewed federalism, a redefinition and a consolidation of federalism. There is no question of other jurisdictions holding a referendum on an absurdity to achieve this formula. We are willing to use the existing institutions, and to change them if required, to meet the exceptional needs of this time and to seek this renewed federalism which will include all the territories and the provinces and establish between all participants such bonds as will meet the aspirations of each of them. I see that my time is going fast, and before closing or being forced to close, I would like to say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. As the hon. member started at 18 minutes to one o'clock, is it agreed that we do not see the clock, and give the hon. member until two minutes after one?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We in the west are affected by an injustice, which I should like to explain and which we are trying to solve. This injustice is to be seen in the economic sector of transportation. Furthermore, it is only one of our complaints against the east-west lack of balance in Canada.

I am not the first one, I am sure, to note that the economic centre of gravity of Canada is shifting. An important sector is noticeably, gradually but surely moving west whereas the demographic gravity centre, and consequently the political centre of gravity remains in the east. This situation in itself creates an imbalance which is difficult to solve but if I am permitted, I shall say that we now witness discriminatory treatment toward the west which makes it far cheaper to send manufactured goods from east to west than the other way around. Suppose that we in the west have the manufacturing capacity to do the required processing. This capacity does exist in some areas, but under the circumstances it is extremely difficult to compete in our local markets with products from the east. Obviously, this discriminatory system interferes with the full development in the west of a processing industry in all sectors. We are fully aware of the historical explanation for that preferential system but we are not prepared to accept forever such an inequity.

We have the institutions needed to make the changes required by the situation. Let us use them. Reason always prevails for men of good will and rationality. Because of all this, I dearly hope that my fellow Canadians in Quebec will further study the referendum question and the effects of a majority Yes vote in Quebec and Canada as a whole, culturally and economically, not to mention the political consequences which are so serious and unacceptable that nobody can contemplate them without the greatest concern.

[English]

In terminating my remarks, I should like to place on record a version of a very famous speech which symbolizes for me the dilemma and even the solution to the problem which confronts us. It goes like this:

More than one century ago our forefathers brought forth on this continent a nation dedicated to the proposition that peoples of differing cultures and linguistic background could live together under one national roof and thrive. Today that proposition is being put to the test. I believe it can survive and that it can thrive.

Whether it does or not will depend upon the response of all Canadians to the preoccupations of their fellow Canadians and the willingness of all Canadians to work diligently toward the remoulding of the constitutional provision under which the people and institutions of this country are to be governed in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being after one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.03 p.m. the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak today in what I think is a very important debate because it comes very close to an important vote in the province of Quebec. I want to say at the outset four things which I think are very important and that we all think about when we are contemplating the future of our country.

First of all, I strongly believe that Canada should stay together as one country—that is a basic premise that all of us have, I think—that we should be economically independent, that we should be a sovereign country, that we should have a country united on the basis of equality and freedom for all, one country that is built on the philosophy of co-operation.

[Translation]

We need a solid country, a solid Canada, with a restructured constitution, a renewed federation with the ten provinces so they will be treated more fairly than they are now in this country. We truly want a restructured Canadian federation. We say not only to the status quo in this country but also to a renewed status quo. We need a completely different country from a constitutional point of view.

Second, Mr. Speaker, it is most important to start the negotiations for a renewed constitution as soon as possible after May 20, whether the vote is Yes or No. The NDP will not accept sovereignty-association but we want a restructured, renewed country and constitution. We need to have negotiations for such a constitution.

[English]

The other thing that it is very important to say is that all Canadians—certainly Canadians in western Canada—want Quebec to stay in the Canadian confederation. We think there is a very important place for Quebec in our country and most people want Quebec to stay. I want to refer to one particular issue when it comes to an appeal to Quebec to stay in our country, and that is that from time to time there are people across this land who make statements to the contrary which, I believe, misrepresent horribly the feelings of Canadians. I want to refer to an article which appeared in—

[Translation]

The Journal de Montréal of April 17, 1980, had a headline which read as follows:

If the hostages in Tehran were Quebeckers, people would say "leave them there", says a western MLA.

This is an article from the Canadian Press, and I quote:

If 50 French Canadians were held hostage in Tehran, instead of 50 Americans, the majority of western Canadians would say, "leave them there."

[English]

That was a quotation from the remarks of a member of the Saskatchewan legislature, a Mr. Dennis Ham. I say that such articles and statements misrepresent totally the views in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I will say more about him and his other colleague in a few minutes.

The other thing I wanted to say, the fourth thing that is very important, is that the debate we are having in this country now is really urgent; it is one of national urgency. It is not just the fact that many people in Quebec are very unhappy with confederation, for all kinds of social, historic and linguistic reasons; there are many other people in the country who are also unhappy with confederation. If Quebec decided to go, it would not necessarily follow that the rest of the country would fall into place and there would be harmony, because there are other problems as well.

Everybody knows there is a tremendous amount of unrest and dissatisfaction in Quebec. But I can look at western Canada and find some things there that are terrifying. A poll by the Canada West Foundation a short time ago showed that 4 per cent of westerners wanted to separate and join the United States and become the fifty-first to the fifty-fourth states. Also 13 per cent of westerners said that they wished western Canada would become an independent country, an independent nation. A CBC poll which was released about a week ago showed that in the riding of Swift Current, Saskatchewan, 19 per cent of the people who responded to the poll said that they hoped western Canada would become an independent nation. When one has statistics like this, it is evident that a lot of people in western Canada are very unhappy, as well as in the province of Quebec.

Also we have the unhappiness of the native Indian and Inuit people of this country. We saw the constitutional conference of the first nations of this country, the Indian people, about a week or so ago. They are now demanding that they have much more input into the affairs of Canada and a greater participation in the constitutional talks. Also we had the speeches made by Brian Peckford in Newfoundland that some journalists—such as Charles Lynch, for example—say sound more separatist than the speeches made by René Lévesque.

We can see that a lot of people are very unhappy—the Québécois, western Canadians, the people of Newfoundland and the native people of this country. It is a fact we will have to realize. Because of that, we will have to make a lot of changes in the structure of our constitution and in Canada as a whole. It is a bit like the movie "Network", where people were getting more and more angry all the time. They went out on to their balconies and they shouted that all-famous line: "I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take it any longer". That is what a lot of people in Canada are saying today from one half of the country to the other.

I think we can move now before it is too late to hold this country together. We have a lot of differences. In many ways those differences make us a greater, richer and better people. Also there are a lot of similarities between my province and the province of Quebec, for example. Both of those provinces put a great deal of stress and emphasis on co-operatives and co-operative development. We have credit unions, wheat pools and co-operatives in Saskatchewan; they have the caisses populaires and co-operatives in the province of Quebec. Both provinces have a great tradition when it comes to Crown corporations. One only has to think of Hydro-Quebec. One can think of the moves made in asbestos in the province of Quebec, in comparison to things like the moves to take over potash and make the operation a public utility in Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, Saskatchewan Telephone and the like. So we have great similarities. I think we can put together a nation which will be very, very promising in the years ahead.

There are some things we must look at with the referendum coming up. One of the most important things we should be talking about now is that there should be a willingness and an openness to renegotiate confederation. I am a bit concerned sometimes at some of the closed-door attitudes that I witness in this country. I think this is a time when we have to build bridges and open doors. We must say clearly to the people of Quebec, whether it is a Yes or a No vote, that we will have to sit down and negotiate this country, redefine and renew the Constitution of Canada. It is very important that we say that at this time. Our party at a council meeting held over the weekend in Ottawa passed a resolution to that effect. I quote that resolution:

[Translation]

(1) That the NDP reaffim its commitment to restructuring the Canadian federation through major constitutional changes;

(2) That the NDP call for negotiations to take place immediately to renew Canadian federalism, regardless of the result of the referendum;

[English]

I think that is very important. The other thing we should be thinking about is the process of negotiation. How do we negotiate a new constitution and renewed federation in Canada? Again at our weekend conference in Ottawa, we passed a resolution which indicated that the government of this country should commence those negotiations, but as those negotiations go on, the people of this country should be involved in a direct way, particularly the Indian, Inuit and the native people.

The reason it is so important to have the people involved is that there are more people in the country than just what the government could represent. For example, I think it is very important that we have perhaps members of the legislatures involved, members of the opposition in the House of Commons, the people represented in this House by parties other than the Liberal party, which makes up about 57 per cent of the Canadian electorate. I think it is very important that we become involved in that constitutional process, that we start communicating the desire about that process in the days and weeks ahead.

[Translation]

I would also like to remind Quebeckers that we never underestimated the significance of the referendum in Quebec, and our attitude should not be relinquished a few days before May 20. Quite the opposite, the resolutions passed over the weekend by the New Democratic Party reflect our special awareness at this most important time in this country's history. I have no hesitation in saying to the men and women of Quebec and to their elected representatives here that I look forward to seeing them, whatever the result of May 20, at the negotiating table with Canadians of every province. What needs to be built is a new Canadian constitution, a federal constitution recognizing this country's linguistic duality, a constitution recognizing a partnership between English-speaking, French-speaking and native Canadians. This is a prerequisite to more social, cultural and economic justice and fairness in Canada.

[English]

One of the things we should be looking at is the reasons so many people are unhappy with confederation as it is presently constituted. There are various historical, cultural and linguistic reasons for that in Quebec, but also there are some economic reasons in Quebec as to why so many people are unhappy with confederation. Some of those economic reasons are the same for people in the Atlantic provinces.

I went back and looked at some of the statistics concerning what has happened in terms of investments, jobs and unemployment in the country over the last ten or 12 years since the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected to office. For example, I looked at the Atlantic region and I found that 10 per cent of Canada's population lives in the Atlantic provinces, but only 6.6 per cent of the new jobs between 1968 and 1978 were created in that region. Also, 6.1 per cent of the investment occurred in the Atlantic provinces despite the fact that they have 10 per cent of our population. In the province of Quebec we find 27 per cent of the Canadian people, but only 18.1 per cent of the new jobs and 22 per cent of the new investments took place in that province.

It is very plain to see that in many ways opportunities are not becoming more equal in Canada between our regions, but are becoming more and more serious in terms of the inequalities between Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and the rest of the country. Between 1968 and 1979 unemployment in the Atlantic region went up by some 37.5 per cent, in Quebec by 34.4 per cent, in Canada as a whole by 33.3 per cent. Once again we see that the inequalities are growing rather than reducing in size in our country.

What about the west, the region where I come from? As I have always said to the House, there is a growing feeling of frustration in western Canada. When 13 per cent of the people say in a poll that they want to live in an independent country, then I think it is very serious. I remind hon. members that in all the polls taken in Quebec I have yet to see one where over 20 per cent of the Québécois want to be a totally separate and totally independent country. When the question is asked about sovereignty-association or about negotiating sovereignty-association, it is a bit different because a lot of federalists will be voting Oui. They will be voting Oui because they think it is the tactical thing to do and so on. But when one asks the Quebec question right to the core—whether or not they want to separate and become an independent country—one finds 15 per cent, 16 per cent or 18 per cent of the people saying Yes, while in western Canada 13 per cent are saying Yes. I wonder, if you were to fudge the question a bit, whether that figure would not be over 20 per cent, 25 per cent or 30 per cent. When you start getting statistics like this, that indicates a very serious problem and we will have to look at the reasons so many people are so unhappy.

• (1420)

I hear from behind me, for example, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), who can tell many stories about inequities in the freight rate system, how it cost more to ship processed livestock from the prairies to central Canada than it cost to ship the livestock themselves. He can show that it costs more to ship a ton of steel from Hamilton to Calgary than it costs to ship a ton of steel from Hamilton to the city of Vancouver. We have those inequities, and they must be done away with if we want to make the people in the west feel a part of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: We also need a western Canada where we process more of our raw materials and food products closer to where those food products are produced. We also need a tariff structure that does not discriminate against people in western Canada. We need all kinds of other things to be done in the west. People talk about interest rates. There is no one that interest rates affect more than the farmers of western Canada, because farmers are the greatest borrowers of short-term money, which is where interest rates are the highest.

We also have to make sure the government keeps the commitment to build the port of Prince Rupert in order to move our grain, to build the port of Churchill, and a number of other things that would enhance the economy of western Canada.

One of the unfortunate things that has happened in western Canada very recently is that for the first time in our history—and I stress, the very first time in our history—we now have members who were elected by the people and are sitting in our legislature as western separatists. Here I refer to Mr. Dennis

Ham and Mr. Dick Colver in Saskatchewan who were elected in October, 1978, as Progressive Conservatives. Mr. Colver was the leader of the party and leader of the opposition. In March of this year they left that political party.

I am glad to say that since then they have been denounced by their party because the Conservative party wants nothing to do with them any longer. They are now sitting as people who are advocating the separation of western Canada and the unification of our part of Canada with the United States. They want us to be the fifty-first, fifty-second, fifty-third and fifty-fourth states of the United States. I totally disagree with that. I think all the problems of alienation and the feeling that we do not have any influence on what is happening in the country would be even more accentuated as an even tinier part of an even greater and more powerful country. We would then really be but a small drop in a great big puddle or a great big sea. We would be sending eight senators to Washington and maybe eight or ten congressmen to the congress of the United States, instead of sending 75 or more MPs to the House of Commons in Ottawa. We would have all kinds of other problems.

One of the problems we have is that Canada has been developed in a sort of hinterland metropolis type of fashion where some regions are suppliers of raw materials to the industrial areas. That philosophy is even more pronounced in the United States. One only has to look at Montana and the Dakotas. You cannot name any big cities in Montana or the Dakotas because they are suppliers of raw materials to the industrial parts of the United States. We would really be Montana north and we would have the same problems, perhaps even greater problems than we have now. We would not have a Wheat Board, and the Wheat Board is very important to western Canada. It is an orderly marketing system for our grain, and they do not believe in that in the United States. We would not have a medicare system because they do not have a medicare system in the United States, and medical care is very important in this country.

Those are some of the reasons that we in this party believe we cannot go the direction of the Dick Colvers and the Dennis Hams of this world who have now formed their own party called the Unionist party. I want to say in all seriousness that if we do not want movements like this to grow, if we do not want straight western separatism to grow, or if we do not want to feed the flames of narrow parochialism anywhere in the country, we will have to respond to some of the regional demands.

The west is now demanding more say in confederation. As the western premiers have said, they do not just want changes, they demand changes, and they demand those changes soon. They have said they deserve them. They have said the west is going to have to process more of its raw materials at home, that it will require more technology and technological industries at home. They have suggested that we will have to change the freight rate system, keeping the Crow rate, and that we will have to improve the grain handling system. We will have to do a lot of these things if we are going to make western Canada feel part of confederation.

In respect to the constitution, the western premiers have made it very clear that they are not just interested in some economic or structural changes, they want constitutional changes as well. They have said they want them in the area of resources. They want it clarified that resources come under the authority of the provinces.

[Translation]

The same goes in the province of Quebec, where the desire is that all resources—

[English]

They say the same thing about communications. The western premiers want more power when it comes to jurisdiction over communications in Canada.

In respect of federal institutions, the western premiers again want more input. Here they give you two examples. The Supreme Court, for example, is often deciding a case involving a dispute between a province and Ottawa, but all the judges in the Supreme Court are appointed by Ottawa. If you are going to adjudicate a case that involves the two, then perhaps the two should be appointing some of the adjudicators.

The other example is the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada determines monetary policy for the country. What the western premiers are saying is that if it should determine the monetary policy for the whole country, then there should be some input by the provinces and by the regions. It only makes sense that there should be, because if you ignore the regions you are ignoring the reality. When Hydro-Quebec, Saskatchewan Potash, Crown corporations or Ontario Hydro go to the market, this affects monetary policy. It seems to me it makes sense that there be some direct input to the Bank of Canada through an advisory council or a commission of some sort on the policy of the Bank of Canada.

These are some of the things that are very important in the debate that is before us today. In this country we need a new constitution, a restructured federalism, a new federalism where there will be significant changes to make all parts of Canada feel equally wanted and represented and that their problems are being responded to. Really a federation is a situation where there is co-operation between equals.

We also feel we must have urgent negotiations now, regardless whether the vote is Yes or No in the province of Quebec on May 20. We should have the provinces and the federal government sitting down to try to draft a new constitution. More than those governments should be involved in those negotiations; they should include input from members of legislatures, members of Parliament, including members of the opposition; I am glad to see that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) agrees with that. They should also include other people in this country such as the indigenous people.

The last point I want to make is that even if we do equalize things more in this country in terms of development opportunities and more freedom in the regions, with a constitution that is more responsive, I think we are still lacking one very important ingredient in the development of a new Canada. If we are going to have a new Canada that is home for all of us and that we can all proudly call home, we need a Canada that we own and control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Mr. Nystrom: We now live in a country that is dominated and controlled, for the large part, by entrepreneurs and people outside our own borders whose main resource is manufacturing. Many of the things which are so important to this country are controlled and owned by others who live outside our nation. If we are to build a Canadian house, we must own that Canadian house. If we gain ownership of our house, I am sure that we can build one of the most progressive, forward and thoughtful nations in the world.

In closing, I would once again say that we need a new Canadian federation, that if we do not make the move now, then in a few years' time, in another generation or so, we might not have a united country to build. The feeling of disharmony is very strong in Quebec, in the west, Newfoundland and among our native people. If we do not put our house in order soon, there may not be a house to put in order.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by passing through you, sir, my congratulations to Madam Speaker upon her elevation to the very high office which she has assumed, one that she has already discharged with distinction in the short amount of time that the House has been in session and an office which I know she will carry through with even greater distinction as the months and years pass.

For me it is a great honour to return to this House after an absence of nearly 15 years. I had the privilege of serving as a member of Parliament from the spring of 1963 until resigning in the early autumn of 1965 to enter provincial politics. In returning here and representing the great constituency of Halifax, which has had the honour of being represented until fairly recently by the Hon. R. L. Stanfield, I am not only fully aware of the honour of representing that constituency, but I am distinctly aware of the honour of sitting in this House. While I was away from the House for those 15 years, I was cognizant of the very substantial contribution that was made by the members of all three parties in those years, and also by members of the Social Credit Party who are no longer here.

I note in returning to the House of Commons that of those with whom I served between 1963 and 1965, I can count only 23 or 24 members who are still in the House. Notable amongst them, of course, is the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the very able and distinguished member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He is going to outlive the whole works.

Mr. Regan: He may outlive the whole works and, indeed, if he does it will certainly be to the benefit of the Canadian people, because he has always made a great contribution.

Mr. Nowlan: That coalition is growing.

Mr. Regan: I might say to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) that when I was last here I had the honour of serving with his father, who I always found to be amiable, co-operative and helpful to a junior member like myself, and it is an honour now to serve in this House with the hon. member who has replaced his late father.

I find that our problems are much the same now on many subjects as they were 17 years ago and, of course, others have changed. Certainly, our country has made great material progress. Yet today, despite the material progress made in those years, we face more challenges than ever. A continued, sincere effort is needed by all elected representatives if we are to meet those problems and achieve success to the maximum degree that is possible.

I would like to plead that it is important in this House—perhaps as a newcomer I sound brash to say so, but perhaps as one who is returning to this House I might be allowed to say it—that we avoid as much as possible our preoccupation with feeling that getting the best of every tiny clash on the floor of this House is an earth-shaking, important matter to the nation, because it is not. It is important that we achieve gains for the public rather than that we make points in debate here on the floor of the House.

Mr. MacEachen: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Notice who is laughing.

Mr. Nowlan: The Deputy Prime Minister is blushing.

Mr. Regan: I must say, though, that the normal display of animal exuberance that must occur from time to time in debate is understandable, but it is best that it does not become too personal.

An hon. Member: You are talking about the animals on your side.

Mr. Regan: I would like now to say a word about my departmental responsibilities. I am doubly honoured to have the responsibilities of the Department of Labour and the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport. I am aware that the position of the Minister of Labour has been held by very, very many distinguished people across the years, people such as the present Minister of Finance, Mackenzie King, Michael Starr, and the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). It is with some awe I assume those responsibilities. I see the responsibilities of that office as being heavy ones, and they are, firstly, to protect the interests of our working people and, secondly, in a very connected way, to promote industrial harmony.

I know that the efforts which have been made nationally in this country toward developing consultative mechanisms between management and labour, with or without the participation of government, have run into difficulties because of other outside problems and considerations of recent years. I believe that it is time we attempted again to find new ways in which more constant communication and, therefore, understanding can be maintained between management and labour, at times when there is not the immediate strife of a collective bargaining dispute. In the long run our country would be better served if we could make substantial progress in that regard.

May I say just a word about the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport. This department is important to the welfare of our land and also important in a very different way. Our pursuit of excellence, which has been followed by a number of ministers, in amateur sport is not elitism as such. If we develop top performers nationally who are able to participate with success internationally, then they set examples which bring about the mass participation of our people to contribute to their fuller enjoyment of life and to their physical fitness.

Not only is it appropriate for government to be concerned about amateur sport, but it is appropriate for governement to be concerned with the rights of all Canadians to participate in sport, in the same way that it is our concern to protect the rights of all Canadians in other matters. I was distressed to see that the commissioner of the Canadian Football League, in reacting to statements which I had made here in the House, suggested that the government had more important things to deal with than the question of the right of quarterbacks who graduate from the universities of this country to have the same opportunity to participate in professional football as people who play in other positions. I think he misses the point in that regard; I will try to make the point to him when I meet with him next week. I think the commissioner should recognize that governments must try to do all they can to protect the rights of all citizens. I think it is an important responsibility of government, through such a department, to be concerned with the rights of a few Canadian quarterbacks in the same way as they are concerned with an injustice that affects any other citizen.

[Translation]

I want to take part in this debate in order to speak on the Quebec referendum issue. Like all my fellow Canadians, I think that this issue is the most important one of our time. I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this issue because in my province of Nova Scotia, we love Canada and we love Quebec.

[English]

There is something that separation would do that has scarcely been mentioned in this entire debate on the referendum in Quebec and beyond. I think it is something that is worth noting as we move into the last days of the referendum campaign in Quebec.

Let me begin by saying that obviously a Yes vote is a big step on the path to separation. Separation would result in the loss of an opportunity, unique in history, for one small state of seven million people drastically to change the linguistic pattern of half a continent; for that is what is in the process of occurring in Canada. That is what has been happening in Canada for the last 15 years. Traditionally, only English was spoken in most of Canada outside of Quebec. English was the language of commerce, even in Quebec, and that, of course, is part of the legitimate grievance which the people of the province of Quebec have in relation to the first 100 years of confederation.

I do not want to talk today about the change that has occurred in Quebec; that is well known to all. That change has been dynamic since the coming of the so-called quiet revolution in 1960. It is a change that has affected education, a change that has affected commerce, a change that has affected attitudes in almost every way. Rather, today I want to speak of the change that has occurred, is occurring and will continue to occur throughout English Canada if our country stays together.

I say that the people of the province of Quebec have the opportunity to cause Canada, the northern half of this continent, to change its linguistic pattern. I say that this has never happened anywhere in a free country before; that most of this process has been a consequence of the voluntary recognition of the people of English Canada and the governments of Canada—Mr. Diefenbaker's government, Mr. Pearson's government, the present government and the former government—that it is right, it is fair, it is possible for Canada to develop as a two-language nation.

Let me give a few examples of what that development has consisted of. First of all, you will find today in darkest English Canada—if I may use that expression—that English families are competing hotly to try to get placements in French language schools. That is the position, I know, in Halifax and I know that to be the situation in Calgary and many other areas of the country. There is a line-up of people trying to get their children enrolled in schools where French is the first school language. That is one indication.

We see in this nation senior as well as junior bureaucrats in provincial and federal governments daily spending time to learn the French language. We find them willing to leave their work, to go away from home on immersion courses in order to improve their ability in the French language. We find a vast percentage of people who did not have a word of French a few years ago now able to function and work at their governmental duties in the French language. That is part of the willingness that has been exhibited in this change that is occurring. You find provincial legislatures giving French lessons to their members and staff. You find government offices and large businesses building a French language capacity in every city of magnitude in Canada.

What do you find today compared to a few years ago? You find French language radio and television in Vancouver, Halifax and everywhere in English Canada. You find a tremendous line-up of people who want to have their children participate in youth exchanges with youngsters from the province of Quebec. There are few members in this House who have not known of such exchanges in their constituencies, or what a splendid success they were and how the bonds of friendship built by those exchanges have been maintained in succeeding years. You find parents seeking every opportunity to send their children to summer language courses in Quebec, in St. Pierre and Miquelon and, in my province, a line-up of people to take summer language courses for young people at Collège Ste. Anne. In Canada there is a vast increase in the number of people who are bilingual. The amount of French spoken in Calgary, Kentville, Chatham and Regina has greatly increased in the last 15 years.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, a tremendous effort has taken place across 4,000 miles to increase the usage of French and to make Canada a two-language country. If you consider the progress that has been made in this regard in the last 15 years, and if this progress continues for another 15 years, Canada will truly be a two-language country from coast to coast. That will not mean, nor will it ever mean, that every last person in our country will be able to speak both languages, but it will mean that enough will be able to do so that the languages will be interchangeable for all practical purposes throughout Canada.

What will it mean for the people of Quebec? It will mean that French-speaking families from Quebec will be able to accept transfers from their companies for periods in their careers to any part of Canada without risking the loss of the French language by their children or risking that their children will forget the French culture. It therefore means broadened career opportunities for the people of Quebec. That is what the process is bringing about and will bring about; it is what the process will bring about if Quebec remains part of Canada.

This will not happen, however, if Quebec separates. The desire and the main impetus to learn and to use French would be gone. A large part of the desire to learn the French language and to have one's children do so flows, in English Canada, from the recognition that the people of Quebec have been at a disadvantage elsewhere in Canada because of the lack of the use of French, and also because of the spirit of fairness by the vast percentage of people who feel that we can enrich ourselves and our country if we all speak two languages. Surely the bitterness of separation would reverse that process and we would go back to two linguistic solitudes.

I wonder if it is recognized in Quebec that the ignorant outburst of the bigot gains widespread notoriety while the widespread support for French Canada and the recognition of the French fact by the perhaps silent majority in English Canada can go unnoticed. Of course, the sensational remark always receives more attention than the quiet support for the growth and usage of two languages, the examples of which I have pointed out this afternoon.

● (1450)

In the course of this debate, I would like to remind the people of Quebec that elsewhere in Canada people have been showing this desire to have their children learn French, to have Canada become more of a two-language country than it has been in the past. I believe that the majority of English-speaking people are supportive of the constitutional changes within one united Canada that can make Quebec's destiny more secure within confederation.

English Canada, then, looks to the French Canadian people of Quebec for a No vote, not just in its self-interest of keeping the country together, but with a fervent desire to remain in a national affiliation with the French Canadian culture which they admire, and for whom they hold a deep brotherly love and respect.

What follows, then, if that No vote is achieved? A No vote is not the end of anything, it is the beginning of something. For the No vote must be followed by an urgent quest for constitutional reform, constitutional reform which, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) so aptly pointed out on the weekend, is not just needed by Quebec but needed and wanted by all of Canada.

We are a relatively young country, one hundred and a few years old; but what must be remembered is that while we are a relatively young country, we have a very old constitution. In the 113 years that Canada has existed as a country, we have stayed with that one constitution and very few constitutional changes. But remember that only Britain with its total common law constitution, which has its own way of achieving substantial change, has in that time stayed with the same constitution. France has had different constitutions in that period of time, as have most other European countries. Because a constitution that is divided between federal and provincial powers has a built-in rigidity that applies an aging process. That is why our constitution has aged rather substantially in that 113 years, and that is why I agree totally with the Leader of the Opposition and so many other people who said that Canada today at the federal and at the provincial level badly needs a new constitution. That is why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country has said that with a No vote we get on urgently and immediately with the development of an up-to-date constitution.

Besides the question of language and of the opportunity to build a two-language country that I have discussed, there are obviously many other practical reasons why Canada should stay together. I just want to mention one or two of them that seem important to me.

First of all, I think that confederation is such a good idea that if it did not exist, if it had not occurred, if we had grown up as different provincial, independent states, five, six, or seven of them across the area occupied by Canada, do you know what we would be doing today? We would be sitting down trying to put the states together to make a confederation because confederation is such a good idea. There are very obvious reasons why we would be doing that. We would be told that this would enable us to meet our aspirations better, to develop better the standard of living in the country, and that would be correct.

We live in a world in which all the tendency is toward larger nation units, not smaller ones, and for a very good reason. In Europe there is the development of the common market to overcome the disadvantage of the fact that over countless centuries that continent consisted of small nations and regions which meant that Europe was divided into too many units. But there are in the world many large countries today. Those large countries are not based upon one language or one culture. Nowhere have we seen the trend that one country should be based upon only one language or one culture. For instance, India, China, Russia and Yugoslavia all have either two or many more different languages as well as different cultures. Yet they remain together as countries. Indeed, as I said, the tendency today is toward larger units.

But of all the countries that have more than one language, Canada is the only one that has made a concentrated, purposeful movement toward establishing bilingualism, if you like, toward establishing an even, equal two language system. While that progress and the problems in achieving it have been frustrating sometimes, not only for French Canadians but also for English Canadians, nevertheless it has made the dramatic progress that I have outlined. So the question of size is yet another argument, why we should remain together.

The advantage of size provides not only a larger market in which a country is able, behind its own tariff barriers, to produce products and build a standard of living and therefore a better life for the citizens; it also provides a hedge against not having some ingredients essential to an economy. We have an example right here with the separatist party of Quebec talking about setting up a nation, a nation that would have no oil. The fact that Canada is so vast has provided us with oil in at least two regions. That is another argument in favour of countries of size, rather than a nation broken down into small parts based upon local interests or one particular language.

The proximity of the U.S. market also requires that we have as long a production line as possible even to begin making any products within this country that would be able to compete with those from the United States.

A Yes vote would bring uncertainty and a lack of investment. We have had uncertainty; we have had some people hesitant about investing in Quebec and some people hesitant about investing in Canada in the last several years because of what they perceive to be a threat of separation. A Yes vote would prolong and make that situation much worse regardless of what followed in the next two or three years. It would mean fewer jobs. It would mean harder times for the people because of that uncertainty—because uncertainty discourages investment at all times.

A No vote carries a message to all governments of this country to get on with developing a new constitution for Canada.

I believe we have a great country. Canada has one of the highest standards of living in the world. But working together we can make it a better and a fairer country. I believe that if Quebec separated eventually we might see the breakup of the entire country and the swallowing up of Canada by the United States, a country that has not shown much interest in protecting regional concerns or state governments.

Mr. Forrestall: Not Nova Scotia, not ever.

Mr. Regan: I believe that our destiny must be to work together. But I believe that if our destiny is to be achieved, we must approach the problems of this country, after a No vote is achieved, in a fair and broad manner, determined that we build as Canadians a richer and a fairer land.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, having hardly had time two weeks ago to offer the customary congratulations to the deputy speakers, Madam Speaker as well as the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne I would like also today to thank several Liberals who during the month of January came down to visit my riding and whom I have not had time to thank. They were like wolves, Mr. Speaker, they were everywhere. But still I am back here, and I am glad. I would also like to thank—

Mr. MacEachen: Like me.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance did not come to visit my riding but I invite him to do so anytime.

I would like to thank the voters of my riding who for the fifth time put their faith in me and I will try the best I can to look after the interests of my riding as well as those of my province which I think are not incompatible with those of my country as a whole. I would like to say that during my short term as minister I was very happy to participate in a decision which will enable my riding to benefit under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the next four years. I believe that, considering the rate of unemployment which is as bad in my riding as elsewhere, such a measure will enable us to have some new industries which would reduce a rate of unemployment which is a plague in my riding as it is elsewhere.

I would also like to congratulate all my elected and non-elected colleagues for the frankness with which they put forth the proposals that were contained in our budget and the courage they showed through their solidarity vis-à-vis those measures that were absolutely essential. Of course, Canadians decided that these measures were rigorous, but they will have to face the facts in the short and the medium term. The proposals of the Minister of Finance have already shown that they did not invent that much on the other side since some of our measures have already been reintroduced. However, as concerns our most interesting proposals, whether they be for mortgage interests, the tax credit or the forthcoming oil price increases, you are probably as convinced as I am, Mr. Speaker, that nothing has been done so far. I believe that my colleagues deserve congratulations for having always allowed Canadians to face the facts about the economic situation, and of course, I hope we shall soon have the opportunity to go to the people once more.

I would also like to note that in view of the weakness of my caucus, my duties will be important and heavy, but that I shall try to fulfil them with as much success as possible. I want to say to all Quebeckers and to my constituents that I shall spare no effort to raise the necessary issues as a member of the opposition from Quebec. Mr. Speaker, this Speech from the Throne puts us back once again in the traditional specious comedy that the cabinet of the present Prime Minister has been staged since 1968. Once again, we hear the eternal promise of better days to come and a virtual denial of the ruins that this government of incompetents has not stopped accumulating in 12 years.

We are hearing the same old songs about the greatness of our natural resources and the need for brotherhood and sharing. We are once again shown castles in the air while thousands of hungry and unemployed Canadians are waiting for these empty speeches to stop and for this government to get down to serious work.

It is meagre consolation for thousands of home owners having to renew their mortgages during these weeks to know that the government is commiserating with them and feeling the interest rates have climbed to unacceptable levels. I think those are the terms used in the throne speech. As for practical solutions to help them, we are still waiting for them, and if we are to believe the rumour, the help to be granted will be limited to very few cases and will be remarkable for the meanness of the solutions proposed. What a contrast with the generosity of the project the Progressive Conservative government had proposed, and which the Liberal and New Democrat partisanship prevented from implementing.

In other words, it is true they are harking back to the same old piece on the just society while social injustices are spreading, job opportunities are becoming scarce and the Canadian dollar value keeps going down. All in the same breath, Mr. Speaker, the government urges Canadians to live within their means yet keeps coming up with projects which can only mean higher public expenses and a wider bureaucratic empire. It turns a deaf ear to the representations and the criticism of the Auditor General and refuses to see the facts, namely, that the public service is unduly inflated and that it is important to reduce its size without delay. The government is concerned, and rightly so, about senior citizens who see their income constantly eroded by inflation, but it refuses to take efficient steps to put an end to that plague with social and economic consequences which cause ruin and rebellion everywhere.

The government which won the election through deceit, I must say it, Mr. Speaker, by letting Canadians believe that it will be able to avoid a rise in energy prices, is heading for difficulties if it thinks it can both deprive producing provinces of a fair return on their oil and their natural gas and maintain a subsidy system which is ruining the public treasury. Instead of recognizing the temporary character of any assistance to eastern consumers and instead of gradually letting oil price get closer to the U.S. price, if not to the international price, the government continues to dupe Canadians on the disastrous energetic situation we are facing now. The billions of dollars which are now being spent in maintaining prices artificially at a low level would be put to better use if spent in developing new sources of energy and convincing Canadians they should conserve rapidly diminishing oil and gas resources.

At this stage of the present session, Mr. Speaker, I would not want to dwell extensively on the text of a speech as both vague and empty. When the bills are introduced and the estimates are discussed, I will have the opportunity to express my views and to defend the interests of the Quebec people which have been disregarded up to now. But I would be remiss in failing to join with my leader to ask for the tabling within a few weeks of a proper budget. I should say within a few days, so that the Canadian people may find out what fate their federal government has in store for them and so that businessmen may know on what course the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) intends to put our economy.

Since the Speech from the Throne dealt in depth with the issue of national unity, I must congratulate the previous speaker on his masterly speech. As the throne speech mentions the national unity problem, I should like to deal immediately with this issue which is of paramount importance for the very future of our country. As a Quebecker, Mr. Speaker, you will not be surprised to hear remarks which are entirely different from those which you have heard until now. I should like to comment briefly on the parts of the throne speech which deal with the national unity problem and the dangers resulting, in the government's mind, from regional isolationism, and on the perils of Quebec separatism I fully agree with hon. members on the government's side. I do not question the Prime Minister's sincerity or his serious desire to lead Canada back on the road to unity and brotherhood. I was profoundly moved the other day by the Leader of the Government when he insisted on the need for all Canadians to share their wealth and respect their cultural differences.

I should be remiss if I denied that, under his administration, the practical recognition of the French fact has made considerable progress, but I wish to remind him that on this issue he has always received the unqualified support of the leaders as well as rank and file of the Progressive Conservative Party. I should be ungrateful if I did not mention in particular the Hon. Robert Stanfield's extraordinary contribution to bridging the gap between the Canadians of our two great founding peoples.

Finally, I am happy to see that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has recognized the invaluable contribution the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made to the unification of a strong and diversified Canadianism. However, eloquence and good will are not enough or shall I say no longer enough. There must also be concrete actions likely to draw Canadians closer together and to strengthen their feeling of belonging to a common entity. It has been the tragic error of the present government since 1968 to have constantly and systematically refused to see in the burgeoning regionalisms some dynamic elements which promote the sense of belonging I mentioned. Its blindness and its obstinacy in fighting them led us to the present impasse which does not exist in Quebec only. In my province, the alienation has reached the point where a major part of the people are repudiating Canada as their country and want to restrict their loyalty to the birth place.

The Prime Minister cannot deny that the Quebec independence movement has made steady progress under his administration nor that his government constituted one of the most violent ferment of disintegration in the country. In Quebec the situation has become so alarming that the leader of the government party himself feels the need to speculate today on the consequences of a majority Yes vote in next Tuesday's referendum. The man who not so long ago, Mr. Speaker, proclaimed the death of separatism in Quebec now realizes how the abyss has deepened and how he has contributed to its deepening. He must be held responsible for its deterioration. Just remember how dead set he was against any demand for constitutional and administrative changes made by the team of Jean Lesage, the Johnson government and, the one led by Robert Bourassa. Nobody can deny that because of those repeated frustrations, Mr. Speaker, the lack of co-operation of the Liberal government, Mr. René Lévesque cut himself off and advocated the political independence of Quebec.

Today, the Yes side finds some new followers every day even among federalists, and if I am asked to name some, I will only mention the names of Mr. Jean-Paul L'Allier and Mr. Drummond, the former Quebec minister of agriculture. How can you explain the behaviour of those former members of a Liberal cabinet who came many times to make demands in Ottawa, begging for what are considered crumbs today. After repeated refusals by this government on apparently quite legitimate matters, after repeated frustrations, deceit after deceit, those people have decided to work on the Yes side like thousands of Quebeckers, not because they want a complete separation, but because they no longer have confidence that this government will seek a renewed federalism which is now essential. They no longer rely on that kind of separatism advocated by the leader of this government. The past intransigence of the Prime Minister does not augur well for his alleged openmindedness toward a renewed federalism at which he was sneering during the last election campaign.

How are we to believe that the Liberal government wants to alter relations between the federal authorities and the provinces when it will not consider them as associates or partners of Ottawa and treats them as enemies, if not as enemies of the common good? The throne speech itself made thinly-veiled threats not only to the Péquiste government but also to loyal and truly Canadian governments like those of Newfoundland and Alberta, specifically referred to in the government statement.

Instead of seeing the Canadian mosaic as an opportunity for growth and dynamism, instead of promoting the birth of a community of communities, of which the opposition leader has so eloquently spoken, the Prime Minister, since taking office, has done all he could to subdue the provinces, to consider them as nuisances, and even accuse them of undermining Canadian unity. To these dynamic communities that only want to assert themselves and take part in the social and economic progress of this country, he has shown only the cold disdain of a person who believes only he possesses the truth and the secret of ensuring the unity of this country. But we simply have to look around us to see how terribly wrong the leader of the government has been and how, instead of promoting unity, he has only contributed to further dividing this country.

The Prime Minister does not respect the letter nor the spirit of the constitution. As far as natural resources are concerned, he confuses sharing and robbery; as for constitutional reform, he does not even make a distinction between dialogue and bludgeoning. We all know where that has led us, Mr. Speaker. But the situation will only worsen if the Leader of the Government refuses to accept the obvious and continues to treat the provinces as colonies and their premiers as servants of the central government. As if inborn arrogance were not enough, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) was not afraid of provoking those he should consider as his partners by appointing true agents provocateurs to key positions in his administration. Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). The latter I might qualify as the author of scary bogeyman stories; as to the former one can only think of the arrogance he so often displayed during the election campaign by urging Quebeckers to have faith in their representatives within the federal government.

Again yesterday in Shawinigan, during a more or less serious discussion at a meeting, he quite simply promised, with the arrogance that is so characteristic of him, to give PQ supporters unemployment insurance even if the No vote wins. At what point does such arrogance become an insult to Quebeckers? I am convinced that the 74 Quebec members know full well that Quebec will not be satisfied with measures that make them social welfare recipients but this is the type of answer the Minister of Justice deems fit to give in answer to our current needs.

And, as if this type of provocation were not enough, Mr. Speaker, the same government tolerates shameful speeches against the Yes voters, such as the one made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) who sees PQ sympathizers everywhere. If this were true, Mr. Speaker, we should congratulate them; otherwise I cannot understand how a minister of the Crown could say these things, or make scurrilous insinuations such as those voiced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) with respect to Mr. Biron. She had to recant but this is the type of statement that was made. However, I would like to congratulate the Minister of State for Small Businesses and hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe) who, in my opinion, has made a very relevant statement and intelligent and interesting remarks for the whole of Quebec.

Instead of viewing regionalism and the love felt by Canadians for their local areas as obstacles to Canadian unity, the right hon. Prime Minister should see them as valuable tools in the forging of a strong and diversified Canadian identity, as the required cement in the building of a common motherland. Instead of reviling the remarks of the Leader of the Official Opposition, he should use them, he should apply them. This would help reduce the tensions flared up by his calls for a form of centralist federalism that is counterproductive to his avowed aims and that up until now only caused suspicion, division and alienation.

The right hon. Prime Minister may very artfully refer to the dilemma in which the Lévesque government entrapped itself with its question. He may very well nonsuit any discussions were the Yes choice to win the referendum on May 20. He may very well enjoy the applause drawn by the logic of his attacks at the monstrous duplicity of the Lévesque government. But if the Yes choice wins the vote, which the Prime Minister already recognized as possible, there will nevertheless have to be discussions with Quebec authorities, if only to prevent the political impasse from leading to oral and even physical violence.

Whatever the right hon. Prime Minister may think, it will not only be a matter of saying Yes or No and laugh it off. He will have not only to play a tight game but to raise himself to the level of higher politics to prevent ultimate disaster. I have no illusions either on this government's real intentions relative to constitutional reform. Because two weeks from Friday last, the right hon. Prime Minister still refused to show his true colours. The throne speech deals at length with the Quebec referendum. It says that a No answer to Mr. Lévesque's plea will be interpreted by his government as a Yes vote for a renewed federalism. However, the declaration gives very scant details on where the government's constitutional policy is going.

Bearing the past in mind, as well as the unspoken threats contained in the Speech from the Throne, we are entitled to believe that the Leader of the Government is not interested at all in revamping the constitution in order to make room for a greater decentralization of power and for a more effective participation of the provinces in the development and the implementation of national policies. It is extremely strange to note that the government—after having spent millions of dollars to finance the study by the Pepin-Robarts task force—has not said one word of congratulation for the work accomplished by that team which it had insisted on choosing scrupulously. We notice the same contemptuous silence relating to the beige paper published by the Quebec Liberal Federation. Quite the opposite, the Prime Minister and his colleagues are openly hostile toward the reforms advocated in either of these two documents.

In order to make sure that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) will not be the source of any trouble to him any more by holding him responsible for that malaise, the Prime Minister simply put a gag in his mouth by appointing him Minister of Transport. This is why the former co-chairman of the Task Force on National Unity remains so quiet in this debate triggered by the Quebec referendum. The minister simply decided to hide his report and to follow blindly a ministerial team whose goal is to maintain the status quo.

That is why I am positively skeptical about the will expressed by the Prime Minister to reform our constitution, Mr. Speaker. I am convinced that it is not from him that we can expect the constitutional changes which will likely bring back harmony and equilibrium between the various parts of our country. Of course, I will vote No in the referendum, but certainly not because I will have been mesmerized by the mermaid's song with which the government is trying to dull public opinion. I will vote No on May 20 because I believe in Canada and because I consider the federal system as most likely to help every Quebecker fulfil all his or her dynamic aspirations, something which the people of Quebec will not be able to do by endlessly sticking to the same old grievances, legitimate though they may be.

When voting No on May 20, I certainly will not do so to support the kind of federalism advocated and practiced by the present government. I will do so in spite of this kind of federalism, Mr. Speaker, and because I know that some day this ill-fated government will be gone and all Canadians will then have the opportunity to start over again building our country in the respect of local loyalties and by virtue of the partnership advocated by my party between provincial and federal governments.

Before casting my No ballot, I want to remind the Prime Minister that I have no confidence at all in him being able to unite this country, I do not trust the legal subtleties he uses in an effort to justify his control over the ressources and jurisdictions of the provinces. I will not believe that the man who has brought about so much division around him is now capable of achieving unity around policies that are acceptable for all. I refuse to put the reconstruction of this country into the hands of this demolition contractor. However, I still call upon Mr. Lévesque and urge him to use his huge talent—and I reckon Mr. Ryan is equally talented—to build, together with our fellow Canadians from other provinces, a federation which will measure up to the dream of equality and fraternity envisioned by the people of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, we are given the opportunity during this pre-referendum period to study its implications and real meaning. It is a fundamental step we must take, as much for the sake of the survival of Canada as that of the fulfilment of Quebec. That popular consultation will surely leave obvious scars. But in view of circumstances, we must take a stand. The Progressive Conservative Party has committed itself, with the No committee, to protect the interests of this country and fight against its division.

● (1520)

May I say here, incidentally, that it is important to distinguish between disagreements on the orientation of the federal government policies, on the application of the principle of federalism in Canada, and the agreement of all political parties sitting in this Canadian Parliament on federalism as the foundation of the governing system in Canada. It is in that perspective that we join in this debate. Canadian and Quebec political parties are constantly brought into opposition on what steps should be taken or measures adopted, but all agree in promoting and protecting the collective geographic entity called Canada, with federalism as its basis, while at times adopting different attitudes or advocating different methods according to their political bent. It is in that spirit that we are participating in this debate, Mr. Speaker.

We suppose that federalism is a government system that can let Quebeckers determine their own cultural future, while monitoring the areas where they have jurisdiction and allow them to contribute with other Canadians to the development of our country, of its political institutions guaranteeing our basic freedoms, of its natural resources which ensure our economic prosperity. We all want Quebec to develop. But there is disagreement as to procedure. Some people believe that all powers should be vested in the same authority; others like us try to distribute the risks and the benefits. We believe that the constitutional, legislative and administrative responsibilities should be managed by a public administration system divided between two democratically elected assemblies. We think that our basic liberties will be better preserved that way. In other words, a new evaluation of power-sharing is needed, and this is urgent, Mr. Speaker.

I must recognize that federalism has not only negative but also positive aspects. The first advantage might be that it forces us to compromise continuously. When you have to share with others, you must consider their views, and it prompts you to question your own views, which might ensure a more balanced development. This is a positive aspect of federalism that should be maintained. This debate will give us a chance to demonstrate and throw some light on other aspects of our government system. This referendum period should give each side the opportunity to show the advantages of its option rather than to systematically destroy the option of the other side. Let us use the coming days to seriously and thoughtfully consider our options. I recognize that it will be difficult and as discussions tend to become more heated, each of us must keep a cool head.

If the Progressive Conservative Party joins the federalist forces in Quebec in spite of its differences with the present Canadian administration, it is because we believe in the future of Canada. We understand the frustration of many Quebeckers and we share it to a large extent. The majority of provinces and their governments want an in-depth reform of the constitution. If we refer to the history of French Canada and its relationship with all Canadians, we see that justice and the interests of others have not always been respected. The legitimate demands which were disregarded are a point to be raised in the debate. However, this frustration does not justify the intention to yield our joint ownership of Canadian territory at a time when there is a consensus on the need for important reforms.

It must be admitted that demands do not always entail confrontation. We must not hesitate to shape levers for tomorrow through debate. In this way, we will serve Canada. Let us acknowledge that Francophones have a national conscience and let us guarantee them through future reform; the means to attain self-fulfilment. Let us believe in the future of Canada which allows, under its much criticized constitution, a fundamental debate on its existence. In voting No to the referendum question, I admit that at heart I still remain a provincialist who believes in a federalism much more flexible than the one devised up to now. In joining the federalists, I must insist that I do not endorse in any way the status quo. I think, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that if Quebeckers give a No answer next Tuesday, the federalists sitting here will not interpret this answer as an approval of the present system. That is what I venture to believe. And it is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that many Quebeckers hesitate to comply with the request made here by the federal members, because after the last 12 years, we necessarily have very strong reservations to make about the honesty of this government, because the situation in which we find ourselves could have been avoided in the last 12 years.

Thousands of Quebeckers will feel like the ex-colleague of the present Prime Minister, our ambassador to Paris, who said that thousands of Quebeckers will vote Yes because they want to force this government to make a long-awaited opening. For this reason, unlike our colleagues who gave a blank cheque to their Prime Minister and who, after brushing aside a proposal made by the Quebec government, were not able or did not have the courage to make any proposals on this renewed federalism, we are concerned on this side of the House, because we have witnessed the refusal of this government to sit down seriously with the provinces in order to propose the amendments that are necessary, and not only for Quebec.

I am happy to see that from time to time my colleagues from other provinces show their concern for their province, because I feel my first duty in the House is to look after the interests of the province I represent, which are not inconsistent with the national interests as a whole. Even those failures and refusals over so many years—and I conclude, Mr. Speaker—have brought us today to a situation where Quebec is asking fundamental questions about its future. Those who are mostly responsible are not in Quebec, they are here, because they did not have the courage perhaps or simply the respect of a population that would not have liked anything better than to get along with the rest of the country, but in mutual respect.

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time a minister has addressed the House holding the two responsibilities I do, that is to say, that of Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. This combination, which to some seems bizarre, in fact reflects a strong logic of considerable merit. The responsibilities of both of these departments are tied essentially to the construction over the longer term of an economic strategy for our country. The responsibilities are complementary and not contradictory.

Clearly I do not have time this afternoon, in the time that is available to me, to deal with all the aspects of importance in these two departments, but I believe the House would like from me some indication of the steps we plan to take in various important areas and to explain how I and the government intends to approach these responsibilities.

Members of the House will already be aware that the Speech from the Throne has reaffirmed the objective of moving in Canada, as quickly as we possibly can, to having 1.5 per cent of our gross national product directed to research and development. In my view, this is something we can accomplish by the mid-1980s. I should say that I see no conflict between this objective and the one which has so often been expressed by members opposite of 2.5 per cent by the end of the decade. Both of these figures are on the same critical path.

The previous Conservative government had committed an increase of roughly $155 million of federal expenditure in an attempt to put us on that path. It is my belief that that figure falls short of what is needed if we are to proceed as quickly as we can to that desirable objective. My belief is that something much closer to $185 million in increased expenditure will be required if we are to achieve this objective. It is my confident belief that those resources will be found by the government to assist us in these efforts.

The 1.5 per cent of the GNP, as useful as it may be as a handy yardstick for measuring our progress in this area, is not an end in itself. Rather it is a means, it is the resources which must be devoted to a properly based research and development policy. Beyond this adoption of a 1.5 per cent figure are a variety of difficult decisions and questions which must be resolved if we are to have a comprehensive and coherent policy—the question as to what degree our effort should be directed to basic research; to what degree they should be oriented to mission-oriented research; the question of how our variety of institutions—government, industry and university—should be specialized in the research functions which they undertake; the question of the establishment of the various sectors in which our research and development should concentrate if we are to meet our over-all economic needs; and the question of developing systems for the distribution of information which ensure that the fruits of research are carried more effectively than they have in the past to those who will be able to benefit from them.

While those objectives and decisions still must be worked out if we are to have the clear and comprehensive policy we require, a policy which will have to be developed with considerable consultation of industry, the universities and scientists, there are in any case two clear immediate priorities. If we are to meet the 1.5 per cent objective, we have to bring on stream as quickly as we can the highly qualified manpower which will be required to provide us with the researchers and experts to meet that objective. Second, there is an outstanding and urgent need for the renewal of capital plant, laboratories and equipment if again we are to achieve that objective.

Basically these priorities will be attained through the activities of the federal granting councils. I am speaking of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, which are the main sources of financing for university research and for the training of new researchers. The councils have prepared five-year plans and have projected the levels of post-graduate scholarships and training grants needed to meet the manpower demands of a 1.5 per cent target. The Ministry of Science and Technology manpower model indicates that to meet the target by the mid-1980s we will have to train 30,000 people.

I recently announced, and I reaffirm today, that the government has confirmed an increase in the 1980-81 budget of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of $41.8 million to a total of $162.6 million. That is an increase of 35 per cent over last year. The council will be allocating a substantial share of this increase to new training programs to attract the best of our students into post-graduate research. These new awards will be available in both university and industry and, therefore, will also promote an improved transfer of technology and highly trained people to industry.

Also the funds will support other important objectives, such as the base of research competence, the replacement of obsolete equipment, which I mentioned earlier as an important priority, and the expansion of the council's strategic research programs in areas of national concern. The council has identified five areas of research activity where advances in knowledge or understanding or full-fledged technological innovations will improve our economic well-being. These are energy, oceans, food and agriculture, communications and toxicology. The council has had considerable success in drawing many of Canada's brightest scientists and engineers into these strategic areas.

My responsibilities in relation to the Department of the Environment at first sight seem to be of a rather different kind. I think most people view the responsibilities of the Minister of the Environment to be to find out what industry is doing, to find out what polluters are doing, and to tell them to stop. I believe the emphasis in the past in the public's mind has been in the environmental protection aspects of the Department of the Environment which indeed is a very important area of our activities. But our over-all purpose is larger; it is more global than that. Our essential purpose is really to consider how Canada's renewable resources can be maximized for the benefit of our population over the long term by development which will bring these resources to the benefit of our society and our economy and yet maintain a healthy environment on which they ultimately depend.

The environmental protection aspects have been most in the public mind and in the public view over the past two years, and

I believe there is a need for a clarifying and strengthening of the federal government's role in that area.

We are developing a new federal environmental protection policy which will require new federal legislation. That legislation will, among other things, protect us and our environment against the hazards of toxic chemicals. The policy and the legislation which I hope to introduce into the House within the next 18 months must recognize the environment as an entirety and not as a collection of disparate parts. It must increase the effectiveness of the environmental protection service which has the mandate to ensure that the federal responsibilities in environmental protection achieve national objectives. The capacities of all governments must be used to the fullest in addressing serious environmental concerns. The new policy and legislation will clarify relative federal and provincial responsibilities. Some tasks are clearly more efficiently led at the national level, and we believe that the management of toxic chemicals is one of these.

There are three immediate, urgent problems on which I should touch in this area of environmental protection. The first is that of toxic chemicals, which I have just referred to. At the meeting of the council of environment and resource ministers in Halifax at the end of last week, all provincial governments expressed their strong concern that we must do much more than we are doing now to control the transportation of hazardous waste. All governments at the federal and provincial level believe that what we need is a much more effective ticketing or manifest system to ensure that there is a knowledge from the cradle to the grave of the development and transportation of those wastes. We are intent upon moving in the direction, which the provinces wish us to follow, of establishing such a manifest system. It is my hope—and I am carrying on discussions to explore this possibility—that we may be able to reach those objectives by amendments to the present legislation on the transportation of hazardous goods, which is at committee stage in the House.

The second area which is of great importance is that of the testing and experimentation and knowledge of the implications of chemicals as they are developed. Hundreds of chemicals are developed each year within the world. Very little is now done to provide a standard testing and assurance of what the possible consequences of those chemicals may be. Canada, through my deputy minister who is chairman of a committee at OECD on this matter, is leading in the fight to establish an international system of testing and ticketing to provide a passport for new chemicals on a standard basis so that the implications of their use can be well understood.

The third matter of urgent and pressing concern is one which I have discussed in the House in the past, and that is the matter of acid rain. Members will remember, perhaps, that I have already told the House that we are pressing the United States as hard as we can to move as quickly as we can to establish an international accord to regulate the control of emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen composites which now pose an extremely serious threat to both our countries, the United States and Canada. We in Canada cannot resolve this problem alone. We must do it co-operatively with our neighbours to the south. But they equally have an interest with us in responding to that problem.

Many times I have been asked what are the costs of so doing. The costs are enormous. The costs in terms of Canada will be an expenditure of something like $400 million a year to the end of this century. The cost for the United States will be eight to ten times that figure. But the costs of not responding to the acid rain problem are even greater. It is difficult to earmark those costs, but we do know they are not hundreds and hundreds of millions, but are, indeed, into the billions of dollars each year. United States studies, for instance, have emphasized that the cost simply of the erosion and destruction of buildings in the United States attributable to acid rain problems is roughly $4 billion a year.

In Canada we have special concerns for tourism, for the fishing industry, the health of our forests and the hazards to life which acid rain involves. This is an urgent and pressing necessity and we must press the United States not only for an agreement internationally; we must ask them to give the same concern that we now do to the use of present regulations which are in place to diminish to the highest degree possible the emission of these dangerous contaminants to the air.

I said earlier that our concerns were not simply with environmental protection—though, as I have just described, those are extremely important—but that what we are really concerned with in the Department of the Environment is helping to establish for this country an economic strategy which exploits properly, prudently and sagely over the long term our natural and renewable resources. Canada's economic strategy for the eighties must increasingly recognize that resources represent our economic advantage. We must preserve and develop this advantage through intelligent resource management; through farming or renewing, not simply exploiting and mining, our forests, through preserving the best of our agricultural and forest land; through the wise use of our waters and through careful regulation and protection of our migratory wildlife. This wide use of resources has long been called conservation, and that must be the cornerstone of our approach to these departmental responsibilities.

The most important example of the use of that approach is the forestry sector, an extraordinarily important sector to this country. I recently announced the continuation and extension of the forestry policy which my two immediate predecessors had charted. We believe that the yield from our forests can be doubled by the end of this century if we do follow prudent practices of conservation, and it is our intention to push to ensure that, in co-operation with the provinces, we establish a situation in which reforestation and the renewal of our forest resources is placed on a much more satisfactory, long-term footing than is now the case.

All of these policies which I have described are policies which are designed to build the economy, but they will not be of much use if the building of our country, instead of continuing as it has over the past 110 years, is destroyed by factions, dissension and disputes between the provinces and the federal government, and between our two major language groups.

I would like for the last few minutes of the time I have available to me to say two or three things about the present crisis in our country, which is symbolized by the vote that will take place on May 20 on the Quebec referendum. Undoubtedly these are testing times for our country. There is perhaps one advantage to that testing, and it is that it proves the soul and character of a country. The advantage of the referendum is that it may bring to a head concerns of Canadians, Francophones or Anglophones, to determine once and for all the question of what kind of Canada they wish to have and whether that Canada can survive.

I believe that we must bring those issues to a speedy resolution. The rest of the world will not stand by and wait for us to manage the re-making of our constitutional arrangements, and Canada cannot afford to be so obsessed with these issues that it neglects its longer-term, urgent, economic and social needs.

We cannot afford as a country, I believe, to continue the kind of navel gazing, the obsession with our constitutional arrangements, that we have had for the past 17 years. In that regard, another 17 years like the past 17 will, I think, kill the country.

It is time, I believe, for a decision. Changes I think there must be in our constitutional arrangement, and changes I believe will take place. Those will be changes not simply of providing more powers to provincial governments, but also changes which will involve strengthening federal responsibilities in many areas. Whatever those changes, the essential quality and condition of the country will not change, and it is perhaps time we should say to Canadians, "What you see is what you get"; and what they see is a country with opportunities unrivalled by that of any other country in the twentieth century.

We have a chance with these opportunities not only to preserve or to hold on to the past, historic and rich though that may be, but the opportunities to build, not as in most countries simply to retain a heritage, but to construct a new society and a new way of living together.

The result of the referendum will not in itself resolve these issues. It will be the end of a stage. The next stage will involve, I believe, much more than has this first stage, the views of Anglophones and Francophones outside Quebec as much as those within it.

Whatever happens in the referendum, I believe our message to the Francophones of Quebec must be that we believe passionately in this country; we believe in it with a Quebec and the contribution of the Quebec people to that country. We believe in that for selfish reasons, because for us that makes more rich the diversity of our society. We believe in it also because we believe it is in the interest of Quebeckers to live within a society of 23 million people which is concerned to protect their language and culture; not simply for its survival, but that it may grow and thrive. The interests of Quebeckers, their language and their culture are better protected in that kind of Canada than they will be in an isolated Quebec Francophone state of 5.5 million people surrounded by a sea of 250 million Anglophones on this continent.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if there is one message I would like to convey to my Quebec and Francophone fellow citizens, this is it: we believe passionately in this country and we want to build it with them. This country has very important historical roots, that is recognized. But it is its future that is really appealing, what we can do together if we want to, because Canada offers more opportunities, more possibilities than any other country in the world.

We therefore want to see Quebec and the Francophones within our confederation, to make our society richer and more varied. But we feel as well that it is in the interest of the Francophones of Quebec to be part of that great country of 23 million inhabitants, a country that is willing to accept as its first objective, not only the survival of the French language, the French culture in Canada, but also the flourishing of the French culture and language in our country. That is our message. It is not only for our sake that we want to pursue the great adventure launched over two centuries ago, but also for the sake of Quebeckers, that their interests be better protected within a society like ours, within a large and strong Canada that offers better protection than an insular country, a small island of five and a half million lost in an Anglophone sea of 250 million people. History, the past, our roots, they are very important, true; what is more important for Canada is the future we can build together. The future is Canada.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of northerners, I welcome this opportunity to reply to the Speech from the Throne. There was very little in the Speech from the Throne about the north which one could agree with or disagree with, because in fact there was very little said about the north at all. The one reference to the Canadian Arctic region refers to the exploration and development of these promising frontier areas. The people who make their home up there are forewarned.

I mention this situation because it is an ongoing problem with which northerners are constantly faced. The national media have little interest in northern affairs, and consequently southern Canadians are afforded few opportunities to learn about and understand a large portion of their country. In the Speech from the Throne pains were taken to address the people of Quebec, western Canada, the Atlantic provinces and the industrialized Ontario core. We sympathize with these regions, but the federal government is the one institution which effectively controls northern affairs.

The federal government is a major employer in the north and retains control over mineral and fossil fuel resources and, this, over the nature and pace of any development which takes place. The federal government has a trust responsibility for native northerners as administered under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Yet the north is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. No province in Canada is controlled federally in the way that the Yukon and particularly the Northwest Territories are controlled, and yet no province is ignored as the Territories are.

This could be because the federal government still retains its patriarchal mentality in relation of the Territories. I sincerely hope that more progressive attitudes prevail in the 1980s. The pace of northern political and economic development is accelerating and the decisions which will be made during the next few years will have long-standing and far-reaching effects. One hopes that the representatives of the Government of Canada will take the time to orient themselves to northern issues and thereby enter into future negotiations and processes which will effect change in the north with an informed and conciliatory attitude.

In the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a commitment to a renewed Canadian federalism, and he went on to say that Canada should remain "a country that regards diversity as an asset, not a liability". In the context of constitutional revisions, I hope that the Prime Minister will adhere to the spirit of that statement by including Canada's first inhabitants, the native people, as full participants in any process which will effect constitutional change.

At this point I will digress for a few moments, Mr. Speaker, to put things into their historical perspective. Three hundred and ten years ago, on May 2, 1670, King Charles II issued a royal charter which granted the area which we now call the Northwest Territories to his German cousin Rupert and Rupert's friends in the Hudson's Bay Company. The royal charter granted the Hudson's Bay Company the sole trade and commerce of Rupert's land, and the company was empowered to make "peace or war with any prince or people whatsoever that are not Christians".

Two hundred years later, in 1870, Rupert's land was sold to Canada. In the recent Baker Lake court decision, Justice Mahoney ruled that property rights in the Northwest Territories belonged to the federal government. His reasoning was based on the process just outlined—King Charles II granting Rupert's land to the Hudson's Bay Company, which in turn handed it over to the federal government of Canada. This judgment apparently eliminates all Inuit property rights, and I should say northern residents rather than Inuit because there are many permanent residents of all ethnic groups in the north.

From the point of view of the original inhabitants of the land who have occupied and used the land since time immemorial, it is absurd that someone in England could initiate a process by which all property rights to that land are lost. Mr. Speaker, to put this in the present context, Justice Mahoney ruled that the Baker Lake area is "subject to the aboriginal right and title of the Inuit to hunt and fish thereon", but that their aboriginal title does not make the Inuit "holders of surface rights". Under section 146 of the BNA Act, aboriginal rights are not protected by Canadian constitutional law and, other than the guarantee to freely move about and hunt and fish, they have never been defined in Canadian law.

The increased pace of development in the north will inevitably lead to a conflict between industrial interests and the permanent inhabitants of the land. Justice Mahoney recognized this contradiction when he said that "the co-existence of an aboriginal title with the estate of the ordinary private land holder is readily recognized as an absurdity".

I would like to turn now to the recently released report of the special representative for constitutional development in the Northwest Territories. As hon. members are aware, Mr. Drury was appointed special representative by the Prime Minister in August, 1977. He was given the task of explaining options for constitutional development in the Northwest Territories and reporting the results of his investigations back to the Prime Minister. Among the options that Mr. Drury was asked to address was the division of the Northwest Territories into two or more political units.

I would like to comment on the Drury report by posing three important questions which are important to northerners: Why was Mr. Drury appointed, what are the principal features of his report, and what should be done with his report?

I would like to look initially at the first question as to why Mr. Drury was appointed. He was appointed at a time when the future of the Northwest Territories and its peoples was causing considerable contention in Ottawa. The Berger inquiry had been revealing to southern Canadians what many people in the north had known for years, that in many ways the Northwest Territories more closely resemble a colony of the south than an integral part of the Canadian political framework.

The popular sentiments expressed before Judge Berger were being stated to the federal government at the time by leaders of the Dene nation and the Inuit of Nunatsiaq. Both the Dene and the Inuit peoples had rejected Ottawa's interpretation of land claims negotiations as a process by which the federal government assumed clear title over areas of traditional use by aboriginal peoples in exchange for small strips of land and money—in other words, beads and blankets indexed for inflation. The aboriginal peoples of the Northwest Territories had stated clearly that land claims and negotiations could not be pursued to successful completion if they started on the premise that negotiations constituted some kind of giant real estate transaction.

Northerners wanted to accomplish what had not been attempted up to that point—an accommodation between the needs and aspirations of northern peoples and the concerns of the federal government, a government mandated to speak for Canadian citizens as a whole. I should like to be quite honest and say that statements made by many native citizens before Justice Berger and the ideas articulated by the leaders elected to head representative native associations scared many people in Yellowknife and Ottawa. The newly heard native leaders were perceived as a threat to the status quo, a status quo which may have satisfied Ottawa and the Yellowknife bureaucracy but which was less than satisfactory to the people whom it governed. Thus, late in 1977 the federal government faced the problem of what to do about land claims negotiations when the native peoples involved insisted on talking about political development as well as ownership of the land and resources.

● (1600)

The federal government tried to resolve this problem with the appointment of Mr. Drury as special representative for constitutional development in the Northwest Territories, thereby deferring questions of political development until completion of the report. At the same time, Dene and Inuit leaders were informed that matters of political structure brought up during land claims negotiations would, in the words of personnel employed at the office of native claims, be a "non-starter". This 1977 policy has resulted in a three-year impasse in negotiations between the federal government and the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, commonly known as the Eskimo Brotherhood of Canada, and the federal government and the Dene nation.

It is apparent that land claims negotiations in the north have been delayed by the Drury process. With this in mind, I would like to review the major features of the Drury report.

The report contains a wide range of recommendations with respect to the discharge of government services in the Northwest Territories. Many of these recommendations, particularly ones regarding the transfer to local government of as many functions as can be effectively handled at that level, are commendable. The report's concentration on the nitty-gritty of government services, however, is at the same time its chief strength and chief weakness. While the report contains many comments and conclusions about the need to build an existing experience and success with local self-government, these comments and conclusions were equally germane to any outcome of the debate on division.

The tone and substance of the report is based on Mr. Drury's acknowledged premise that the manner in which government programs are administered is more important to the people of the north than the nature of the political structure. This premise is totally at odds with reality. It is at odds with the events which have taken place in the north during the last few years. It is at odds with the position of the Dene and Inuit organizations that speak for the majority of residents of the Northwest Territories. It is at odds with the position endorsed by the eighth legislative council of the Northwest Territories, and at odds with the statements made by members of the ninth legislative council in seeking to formulate a consensus position on political change. It is at odds with the pronouncements made by all candidates for the ridings of Nunatsiaq and Western Arctic during the last federal election campaign.

People in the north have disagreed, sometimes bitterly, about the proper direction of political change and the kind of political structures that should be set into place, but seldom has there been disagreement on the fact that the political questions framing the north go far beyond tinkering with the provision of government services.

In his report Mr. Drury recognizes that the question of division is a serious one; nevertheless, he recommends that wide-ranging powers, including full or partial control over Crown lands and resources, should be transferred to Yellowknife. Following this he suggests that a debate should be initiated in the north to determine whether powers should have been transferred to Yellowknife or whether the Northwest Territories should have been divided.

This is an obvious case, we believe, of putting the sled before the dog team. The report suggests that the people living north of the tree line should suspend their age-old commitment to a new political unit called Nunavut, watch impassively as the Yellowknife bureaucracy is strengthened, and then question the appropriateness of this bureaucracy. The implementation of this report would be totally unacceptable to the people of Nunavut.

The Government of Canada committed itself to the settlement of native claims through a process of negotiation with the office of native land claims of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. All aspects of claims—political, economic and cultural—must be considered in those negotiations. The federal government's appointment of the special representative for constitutional development, Mr. Drury, in 1977 bypassed this legitimate process by demanding that the political aspect of claims be channelled through his office and not through these legitimate negotiations.

This was and still is unacceptable to the Inuit and is somewhat discouraging. Any attempt at a just and honourable settlement of native claims is impossible while the process has been compromised in this way. I believe that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), who unfortunately is not here, in his submission to cabinet on this report, will be aware of this shortcoming and act accordingly.

As Canadians, we are only too aware that regional disparity is not exclusive to the north. Canada is large, and regions have settled historically with their own character and their own perception of participation coming into play in the Canadian mosaic. Perhaps—and I speculate, Mr. Speaker—these diametrically opposed forces are directly attributable to the British North America Act, and these strains only point out the need for constitutional reform and development to meet the realistic needs of Canada's many groups. If this is true, and I believe it to be, then my people are not alone in their aspirations as Canadians.

In this context the people of the north are proposing a settlement with the government which will be negotiated fairly and justly. Although we applauded the Alaska and James Bay agreements, and more recently the Greenland home rule agreement with Denmark, we feel they were variations on what were fairly straightforward real estate transactions. That is, in exchange for extinguishing their rights, they received cash and a more conventional, if not a bit firmer, legal title to a much reduced area of land.

The Nunavut proposal, as it is called, is not intended as a real estate transaction. It is a contract proposal, but one principally of a social and political rather than a commercial nature. The basic goal of this proposal is the formation of a new government—a new government which would find its place within the constitutional framework and would, of course, be subject to the ultimate sovereignty of the Parliament of Canada.

In the context of self-determination as the major principle of that proposal, I would like to refer to the international covenant on economic, cultural and social rights, as well as the international covenant on civil and political rights. These covenants were passed by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1967 and were ratified by Canada in May 1976. Article I, subsection I, of both covenants proclaims:

> All people have the right to self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status, and freely pursue their economic, social, and cultural development.

Article 2 of the international covenant on civil and political rights says:

> Where not already provided for by existing legislation or other measures, each state party to the present covenant undertakes to take the necessary steps in accordance with its constitutional processes, and with the provisions of the present covenant, to adopt such legislative or other measures as may be necessary to give effect to the rights recognized in the present covenant.

Through the land claim proposal of the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, it is our feeling that we are providing the Government of Canada with an opportunity to give effect to the international commitments it has made.

It is understandable, given the present climate in Quebec, that the federal government shuns such terms as self-determination. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) made it explicitly clear to the Indian chiefs who met in Ottawa a couple of weeks ago that in his mind they did not constitute a province. I suggest to the Prime Minister and his government that self-determination is not in the least threatening; in fact, it is enjoyed by the vast majority of Canada's people. Self-determination is indeed possible under confederation, for it exists for some; the renewed federalism which the Prime Minister promises could extend this right to all Canadians.

I should like to end my comments, Mr. Speaker, by saying that, while I do not always understand members of this House and I believe that they do not always understand me, if we agree to try and understand each other, then perhaps some of these goals of northern people can be realized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech has spared nothing to set the priorities enabling our new government to take up now and not tomorrow or in the year 2000 the challenges which must be overcome with concrete steps. First, I would like to congratulate the previous government which soon realized that the Canadian people deserved another opportunity to decide—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) on a point of order.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, is it not the Conservatives' turn to speak now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I will point out something that I am sure is fairly obvious to the hon. member for Bow River. If no member on his side of the House stands to be recognized, I have to look to those members who do stand.

Mr. Taylor: On that point of order, the hon. member was standing. There was an agreement made between the House leaders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has an indication of who has sought the floor. I have twice looked to hon. members on my left to see whether they did, in fact, seek the floor. Certainly on the first occasion no member stood on my left. On the second occasion I gave enough time to recognize an hon. member who might speak on my left. There is no question but that it was the turn of a member of the Progressive Conservative Party to speak. But I saw no such member standing, and for the second time I have had to recognize someone other than a member from the Conservative party. However, I will certainly pay attention to the members on my left.

Mr. Taylor: Whether or not you saw him, he was standing.

[Translation]

Mr. Chénier: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing against the hon. member opposite speaking before I do. On the other hand, I would like you to recognize me when he has completed his comments.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier) has offered to step down in favour of the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) so that the proper sequence of speakers can continue. Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to thank the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier) for his courtesy.

It is with a great deal of pleasure that I congratulate you on your appointment, and to Madam Speaker I offer my congratulations on her election. I do not wish to place undue emphasis on the fact of her femininity because I am not a male chauvinist, but I would be remiss if I did not draw attention to the fact that she is the first woman to occupy the Speaker's chair. The fact that she is the first woman Speaker and a Quebecker I hope will be synonymous with the "Yvettes" and result in a resounding No vote in the coming Quebec referendum. This is a wish that I know is shared by Madam Speaker and by each of the members here assembled. Her record of accomplishment in the fourth estate and in government speaks for itself.

As this is my maiden speech in this chamber, I should like to take this opportunity to thank the electors of Simcoe South for the confidence they have placed in me by electing me to the House of Commons on two consecutive occasions. I pledge my devoted and undivided service to each and every constituent's needs as well as to the work of this House.

Last December I was to make my maiden speech during the budget debate but we all know what happened on that Thursday night. Now, instead of making my maiden speech during the throne speech debate, I find myself thrust back into a budget debate. For that is what this is as a result of a little back door end run by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) just over two weeks ago.

There was no formal notice given by the minister to the opposition of this mini-budget. In it there was no real economic direction, and the direction, if you wish to call it that, was without the traditional parliamentary approval. No six-day debate was allowed. Arrogance again rears its ugly head. Sidestepping the system is an abrogation of the rights of the Canadian people.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), the following evening, termed it not just a mini-budget but a Minnie Mouse budget. Well, I think it was a mini-skirt budget. It skirted economic reality, the home owners' dilemmas, high interest rates and the commuters' concerns for gasoline prices. A mini-skirt should be short enough to be interesting but long enough to cover the subject. The mini-budget was neither, as it was short on fiscal and social measures, other than those it emulated from the previous government, but very long on spending.

There was a $7.9 billion increase in expenditures, the greatest in Canadian history. Is that something of which we can be proud? And with no right of debate, this was the same situation as we had with the imposition of the metric system. There was no right of parliamentary questioning. The lack of debate on the metric system was eloquently outlined by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm).

It is not just a question of metric being right or wrong but that we are seven to nine years ahead of our neighbour to the south and our major trading partner, the United States. Again, it is circumvention of the traditional parliamentary system to debate metric conversion and to debate this mini-budget. What it all adds up to, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) so aptly stated, is a complete lack of responsibility from those across the floor of this House.

Years ago when Liberal arrogance and contempt for Parliament was first being test-marketed, Mackenzie King and his minions used to announce new tax measures on the radio. Being in the tobacco business, I waited with bated breath for the increase in tobacco tax. But I noted with great interest that the increase is again done in pounds in this budget by a supposedly metrified minister of finance. At least the Minister of Finance has enough respect for Parliament and enough personal courage to come into the House and outline some of his bold and brazen measures, some of them purloined, as I have stated before, from the Crosbie budget of the last Parliament.

I find the minister's new tax increases unacceptable. I find the minister's new forecasts of deficit spending unacceptable. I find the minister's methods of introducing a budget without actually calling it a budget unacceptable. I represent almost 100,000 people of Simcoe South and I believe that they, like the chamber of commerce and the manufacturers' association, find it unacceptable.

My constituency of Simcoe South is a microcosm of Canada. It is a melting pot of various ethnic backgrounds and origins. It is a cross-section of Canada. Yes, it is a melting pot, yet the quintessence of national unity. I represent six rich and beautiful townships, Flos, Vespra, Innisfil, Tecumseth and West Gwillimbury. I represent small businessmen, industry, tourism, agriculture with the black muck farmers of the famed Holland Marsh and Bradford area and the members of the armed forces with their dependants of Canadian Forces Base Borden.

My city is beautiful Barrie, Ontario's most progressive city situated on the shores of Kempenfeldt Bay. The CNR has wound its way all along that shore, for years despoiling it. But now our city has the opportunity of taking over much of that shoreline for municipal purposes if the CN will co-operate with the mayor and myself in trading industrial land, so that our lakeshore may be preserved in all its natural beauty.

My constituents like other Canadians are subject to the vagaries of patchwork quilt government. They are the innocent victims of high interest rates, near double-digit inflation, uncertain energy supplies and pricing and all the other major economic indicators which are out of whack because of the past 16 years of "true Grit" government. They are helpless to defend themselves against an unstable economic system. My constituents are powerless to plan for the future with any degree of optimism or certainty. They are caught on a treadmill trying to survive, trying to keep up with the hardships that fiscal and monetary measures inflict upon them.

Where in the minister's budget is there relief for the home owner? Where is the mortgage tax credit which would have cushioned the home owner against rising mortgage interest rates and property tax increases? The mortgage tax credit program proposed by the previous government would have lowered interest rates in many cases to 12 per cent. One might stand high interest rates but not the loss of one's home. In my riding there are 27,785 homes with 20,030 of them owned not by rich people but by people with mortgages who need help.

Where are the measures which would cushion the ordinary Canadian against rising gasoline and home heating oil prices? Yes, the Conservatives planned to raise gasoline prices by 18 cents a gallon, but the Liberals' new blending price will raise prices by two-thirds and by how much next year? Where is the fuel tax credit program that we had for families earning $21,380 or less who drive 20,000 miles and would have had $220 returned to them annually for a net saving of $40?

Where are the responsible measures we demand and need to reduce government spending? Where is the end to twisted economic thinking which believes that we can deficit-spend our way out of a period of economic slack? It is suicide. Our record of deficit spending is appalling. Our record of spending beyond our means is frightening.

It is a matter of public record that about 22 cents out of every dollar goes to pay the interest on the national debt. We are, in effect, running hard just to stand still and we will leave a legacy of debt to our children and grandchildren. The Minister of Finance is forecasting a budgetary deficit of $14 billion. The United States, the most powerful industrial nation in the world with ten times our population, is projecting a zero deficit. Who do we think we are, spending on such a grand scale and mortgaging future generations of Canadians with massive debt repayments?

If we are to provide the social and economic programs which this country needs, if we are to pay for these programs, we must put first things first. We must have the tax base with which to support government programs. We must have our house in order. Abraham Lincoln said that a house divided cannot stand, and this occurs on economic as well as geographic and political lines.

We must provide the economic climate under which free enterprise is able to cope with the growing demands of a growing population. Our manufacturing capability is declining. We are not providing jobs fast enough to keep pace with population growth. We lack industrial strategy. We lack an investment and a commitment in research and development.

Over the years, previous Liberal governments have promised and promised to provide more funds and incentives for much needed research and development. We heard that here today. They have done very little. In fact, during the years 1968 to 1979, the over-all level of research in Canada dropped by one third. The Lamontagne science commission recommended a target of 2.5 per cent of the gross national product be expended on research and development. That recommendation was ignored. I disagree with the minister opposite; we believe that anything less than 2.5 per cent of the gross national product is unacceptable.

Further to this, a few days ago the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) stated that if we raised our percentage of research and development by one percentage point, from .94 per cent to 1.94 per cent, it would have meant one million new jobs in this country and $20 billion in new manufacturing sales, not to mention the whole new generation of personal and income taxes which would have resulted. I noted with interest the minister opposite pledging his government's support to research and development.

If we are to survive as a nation, if we are to be a viable world trading nation, if we are to build a solid industrial foundation, we must begin with the basics, and industrial strategy and a commitment to building a strong research and development component. I await with interest his complete research and development strategy.

If we are to remain competitive in world markets, our manufacturing sector must grow. For far too long we have been vendors of raw materials. For too long we have allowed our valuable raw resources to leave this country either in the raw state or semi-processed. The trade figures show the legacy of neglect and stagnation particularly over the past 11 years and now projected as being almost nil.

Our trading deficit has sharply increased. By 1978, Canadians had bought $12.2 billion more in manufactured products from other countries than those countries bought from us. This is equivalent to a loss of 400,000 jobs. There is no excuse for that especially since, in many cases, those same products we bought were made from Canadian raw resources.

We need to work to develop a positive industrial strategy to make use of our resource potential and to create more jobs for Canadians, a policy not to import skilled labour but a strong apprentice program for our own unemployed young Canadians. Then, and only then, will we have the tax base we require for government programs.

Canadian Forces Base Borden, the hub of activity in two world wars to preserve our freedom, is located in my riding. It is my opinion that the treatment of our military is a national disgrace. Our armed forces are undermanned, underequipped and overextended. Most of the equipment being used by our armed forces today more properly belongs in museums.

Let me compare our military record with those of the combined Scandinavian countries, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland, with approximately the same population as Canada and one third-of our geographic sovereignty. The Scandinavian nations—hardly an aggressive, warlike people—have 178,600 men and women in uniform. Canada has approximately 80,000, down from over 100,000 when this Liberal government first came to power. Scandinavia spends 2.8 per cent of its gross national product on defence; we spend about 1.8 per cent. For every Canadian tank, Scandinavia has 7.4. For every fighter-reconnaissance aircraft they have 4.15. They have 202 fighter-bombers, we have none. Their ships of war outnumber ours two to one, and we with our hard won 200-mile limit. Let us not get into a cod war with Scandinavia or our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) will be known as the "late cod father". In order to achieve parity of spending with the Scandinavian nations, we would have to devote 1 per cent more of our gross national product annually.

Why is morale so low in our armed forces? Why are so many high-ranking senior officers taking early retirement? I would venture to guess that it is because they are tired of butting their heads against stone walls. They are tired of being denied the men, money and equipment to permit Canada to live up to its basic commitments to NATO and NORAD. They are tired of the lack of identity and pride. The external affairs policy review initiated by the former secretary of state for external affairs is now for naught. I am appalled, after being a member of this committee preparing a new white paper, that so much hard work and substance has been rejected out of hand by the present government.

I find it mind boggling that the government refuses to examine our foreign and military policies so that we can wisely chart our course for the future. But then, someone once compared the Liberal government to Christopher Columbus. When he set out he did not know where he was going; when he got there he did not know where he was; and when he got home he did not know where he had been. And he did it all on borrowed money—and the mini-budget bears this out.

The constituency of Simcoe South is comprised of some of the most beautiful countryside in the world. It is a tremendous tourist area in all four seasons of the year. We are blessed with Lake Simcoe on our doorstep. However, Lake Simcoe ails and she may never get better. She suffers from one of the very serious problems which threaten our environment, particularly the problem of acid rain. We have known of this phenomenon for many years yet we have done very little to cope with it. Acid rain is a potential killer. It is perhaps a form of apocalypse which is being visited on our lakes, on our forests and our agricultural crops.

Hanging in the balance is the cold water fish industry and the $13.6 million it generates. In addition, the tourism industry has significant local economic and social implications and relies on good water quality. I am pleased that the government of Ontario has taken the first steps to restore the lake to its original state. I hope in his remarks the minister will bring things to a head with the U.S. government on the problem of acid rain.

I wish to discuss something that has been discussed by most members, something that touches all our hearts, national unity. The subject of national unity is very much in everyone's thoughts today. The New Democratic Party would lead us to believe that it has a united philosophy. It pretends to be the champions of the pensioner and those on low incomes, and this is also the philosophy of the Conservative party. But where is this united front as, in reality, it cannot agree upon which side the party is in the Quebec referendum? We are all aware of their divided opinion when it comes to the most critical question in Canada today.

I would like to discuss a subject which causes me great distress. It is the lack of an official national anthem for this country. How many countries in the world today have no official anthem? Very few. However, we in this great nation of Canada are in that unique position. "O Canada" is not officially ours and the song that our children proudly sing in school is not official.

In this august chamber, 282 members are dedicated, I hope, to the principle of national unity. Many moving speeches in this throne speech debate have been dedicated to that end. I ask, is it not sensible to begin a new spirit of unity, a spirit of confederation, by officially embracing the national anthem "O Canada"?

On June 6 the Post Office Department will issue a pair of commemorative stamps, the subjects of which will be the music and stylized portraits of the composers of "O Canada". On each miniature pane will be the message "Issued to celebrate Canada Day 1980". Yet that anthem is still not official.

Can you picture the United States without the official "Star Spangled Banner"? Can you imagine the stirring "La Marseillaise" as not officially French? We have "O Canada"—a moving anthem in both languages but never recognized by Parliament in statute. I believe this to be tantamount to sacrilege.

I have introduced a private member's bill as the only effective way to correct this intransigence. I appeal to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party and all hon. members of this House to support this action and make the music of Calixa Lavallée, the French language words of Justice A. B. Routhier and the English language words of Robert Stanley Weir, collectively known as "O Canada", our official national anthem vested in the right of Canada, and that we promote it most vigorously in the name of renewed federalism.

I have mentioned but a few of the problems which confront us but to which there are solutions. I want to see a strong and united Canada. I want to see a vibrant Canadian industrial economy. I want to see a society with equal opportunity and social justice for all. I want to see a strong nation with all the symbols of nationhood in place and intact. I want to see a true spirit of confederation pervade this great land. I want to see our people protected and our environment preserved.

In short, I want to see the "true north strong and free"; and "O Canada", I thank God for the opportunity to "stand on guard for thee".

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech has spared nothing to set the priorities enabling our new government to take up now and not tomorrow or in the year 2000 the challenges which must be overcome with concrete steps. First, I would like to congratulate the previous government which soon realized that the Canadian people deserved another opportunity to decide what party could better face historical events in the eighties. Our constituents have democratically decided that the Liberal party alone led by the right hon. Pierre Trudeau had the necessary boldness and imagination to get us out of that constitutional dilemma and solve our financial problems.

My constituents who have constantly shown their loyalty and their confidence to the Prime Minister since 1968 were not long in showing their gratitude to the man who had sacrificed his personal plans to serve the interests of his country. Those feelings are also mine, Mr. Speaker. Scarcely two months after the election, on February 18 last, the Prime Minister realized that it was urgent to call Parliament and we saw that the new government intends to discharge vigorously its mandate during the Thirty-second Parliament.

The Speech from the Throne clearly establishes that it is this government's priority to introduce legislation to meet the present needs of this country: energy supplies; the necessity of setting oil prices according to indicators of our economy and markets; the urgency of exploring today for new forms of renewable energy; employment and the need to make available to certain groups like women and the handicapped the same opportunities as to the rest of the labour force; interest rates and the urgency to protect those who feel the security of their very home is in jeopardy. Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne also revealed the new government's determination to fight against the forces whose goal is the separation of our country. I would like to deal mostly with that problem, Mr. Speaker, by speaking to my brothers, sisters and cousins of Quebec.

I want at the outset to remind all my friends from Quebec that on February 18 last they elected a great friend who has never failed in his duty to defend their interests. I am talking, of course, about Pierre Trudeau whom 68.3 per cent of the Quebec electorate have chosen to lead them out of their current dire straits. One must not forget that only 41 per cent chose to elect Mr. René Lévesque on November 15, 1976, and that was because he had strategically decided to subtly modify the rules of the game of his grand project of independence. Since the advent of Mr. Trudeau, in 1968, Quebec has gained ground in Canada. Thanks to the aggressiveness and the hard work of this man, your province has gained the respect of her neighbours and an affluence never before achieved in her history, contrary to what the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) had to say. To my mind, he stands much closer to the PQ forces than the federalist cause.

Moreover, I remind the people of Quebec not to forget their numerous relatives who have settled outside your province ever since the turn of the century. In my opinion, the act you are about to make on May 20 next will represent the most serious threat to the very existence of your relatives who live outside Quebec. I am very much concerned by this dramatic moment and it goes without saying that my constituents are also concerned, since at least 40 per cent of them have blood ties with you. You think you are a minority outside English Canada, yet my family, my relatives and I live outside Quebec in communities with high concentrations of French Canadians, in an Anglophone province, and we have ever less reason to complain. Imagine, today we can live, work, attend university, have fun, shop and pray in the very language our parents spoke when they left Quebec to settle in another area of the country.

In leaving Quebec, our parents did not abandon their customs, heritage or traditions. To the contrary, our marvellous country made it possible for the Quebec roots, the roots of our founders, to spread everywhere west of your province. Travel around the country, dear fellow citizens, and you will discover small Quebecs outside your province, at Chapleau, Foleyet, Gogama, Timmins, Iroquois Falls, Hearst where most people can live exclusively in French, Kapuskasing, Sudbury, North Bay. In short, if you are not already aware of it, northern Ontario and other areas of the province are full of communities where people live just like you.

We can live and breathe the way we want today because of negotiations and compromise with our province. By nature, French Canadians do not give up easily. On the other hand, it is not their habit to provoke confrontations leading to violence, but they do not give up. Their determination and their patience tell them that in time they will acquire rights. It is precisely those rights that we, as a minority in Ontario, enjoy. Despite what our provincial elected representatives might say, they are not bestowing privileges on us, rather we are regaining the rights that the Fathers of Confederation gave us. Those rights will have to be enshrined in a new constitution in order to avoid any future misunderstanding.

We also live and breathe the way we want today because of perseverance and because of such events as the election of Pierre Trudeau to the leadership of this country. His sense of justice, his vision and his efforts in such a short time, because 12 years is indeed a very short time, have speeded up the development of the country and changed its character. First, there was the recognition of the two official languages, then the promotion of economic development in the so-called frontier areas of the country such as northern Ontario, where there are abundant natural resources to be found, and the decentralization of government services which is so important for us.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has certainly not stopped growing. Right now it is going through a critical period where its identity is being questioned because of the many changes that have occurred in the last 12 years. Canadians have come to a point now where they must take in all these changes and decide whether or not they will make the accommodations required to live in this new life style. That is the plain truth that English Canada is faced with over the Quebec situation. That is also the hard truth that English Canada must swallow, namely that it cannot deny the French minority its historical right to live according to its customs and in its own language. The battle is not over in Ontario, nor is it in Quebec for that matter. Both factions will have to compromise a lot, but I suggest that now is not the time to rush things unduly.

If our Quebec friends truly believe that a Yes vote on May 20 will result in a final solution, I advise them to examine closely all the factors in Mr. Lévesque's project. This man's strategy is smart and crafty. He will waste no time negotiating, you know that. Every time the provinces have taken part in a federal-provincial conference, he has refused to negotiate. He will hasten up the normal development of Canada and Quebec relations and lead us all quickly towards total separation. Moreover, he will abandon your relatives and friends who, after at least three generations, have succeeded in recovering to a large extent the rights they enjoyed when they left Quebec for another part of the country.

He who reads the history of Canada cannot fail to notice that Quebec over various periods experienced very difficult times. Your fathers may tell you about the difficult years of the depression and World War II when unemployment was endemic. It is thanks to confederation and the Canada we knew then and we know now that a great many families were able to retain their dignity and seek elsewhere in Canada a place to earn a living, a place where more jobs would be available.

They settled in flourishing areas of northern Ontario, for example. In those difficult times, Quebec was welcome everywhere in Canada thanks to that freedom of movement that was possible in a country as vast and rich as ours. By settling outside Quebec, those families grew up nearly as if they were living in their own native province. In fact, today they have gone beyond the boundaries of their province of origin. Your parents, like mine, showed a lot of courage in deciding first to leave their native land and to settle in an area that looked strange at the time.

They proved they had a lot of guts and it is thanks to their perseverance that they brought Canada to the point where it is today, as the Fathers of Confederation had envisaged. Those same families participated in the economic and social development of the cities and towns they chose, so that today they own industries or run businesses through which they contribute significantly to the economic health of our province and our Canada. Far from limiting themselves to their little corner of the country, they opened markets outside Canada and even returned to Quebec to open new branches. Is that not today the very success of those citizens of Quebec who have acquired unequalled confidence not only in terms of their identity but also with respect to industry and high finance? Every day new markets are being opened elsewhere in Canada from the province of Quebec. Beauce and Gaspe suppliers are driving on the roads of northern Ontario like never before. The time has come when Quebec can compete on the same level as all others. Would things be the same, Quebeckers, if you had been excluded from confederation without the protection of the federal government?

I think the Premier of Quebec is making a serious mistake in wanting to go back to a time in our history when parochialism prevailed. This feat of strength he is undertaking in wanting to turn Quebec into a ghetto within Canada and North America, in wanting to erect imaginary boundaries that will be more difficult to bring down than true boundaries and will jeopardize all progress made until now—if you look back a bit, Mr. Speaker, you will discover that northern Ontario and northern Quebec were linked by a rail line, by highways, by telephone, long before they were joined to the major centres of their own province.

I want to tell my brothers and cousins in Quebec that a Yes vote on next May 20 will put an end to the French Canadian heritage that their relatives were so proud to show when they settled outside their province only two or three generations ago. I believe that we forget too often that Canada as it now is has a short history. After all, Newfoundland joined the Canadian federation only 30 years ago and Alberta in 1905. One after the other, depending on their wealth, the poor provinces have benefited from the generosity of richer provinces, and this is why Canada has survived so well. Today's Alberta should not forget that it had its turn at benefiting from the wealth of Ontario.

Who could have predicted in 1867 that Canada today would be made up of ten provinces and two territories, that Alberta would discover a wealth of oil in its substratum, that Newfoundland would develop successfully it offshore resources, that Quebec would tame the energy of its majestic rivers and that northern Ontario, with its mineral wealth, would become an economically strong area? Who would have predicted at the birth of our country that there would be so many migrations of the Canadian people from east to west, from Moncton to Quebec, from Quebec to northern Ontario, to St. Boniface, to Gravelbourg? It is also because of all these events that we must all get along with each other and that all the provinces must agree on a new distribution of powers within a new constitution which would also guarantee the historic rights of both linguistic groups.

The provinces must continue to get along with each other, and it is only a strong central government which can ensure the Canadians of Prince Edward Island that they will be equal as Canadians to the people of Quebec or of Saskatchewan. It is also up to the Canadian government to undertake constitutional talks with all the provinces, as soon as possible after May 20, so that Canada can finally have a truly Canadian Constitution.

Canada's history is too short yet for anyone to conclude that it is too late to get along. Scientific and technological progress achieved in every area over a very short time have shaken Canada and in fact changed her lifestyle and direction. We recognize that, and it is time to consider some new arrangement with all the provinces rather than Quebec alone, in light of our evolution in those fields. A country is not known by its system of government or resources. The heart of a country beats to the way of life and the history of its people. Canadian identity traces its roots well beyond 1867.

At the time of colonization, Canada was called New France. We, the French Canadians of today, live according to the heritage transmitted by our ancestors since that time, from generation to generation, and therefore a major part of our Canadian identity traces its roots to the way of life of French Canadians in Quebec, in Acadia, in northern Ontario, St. Boniface and other areas throughout Canada wherever French is spoken. A Yes vote on May 20 would endanger this country's very identity.

Mr. Lévesque complained some time ago of a declining French Canadian population in Quebec. Does he not realize that a Yes vote on Tuesday next will permanently isolate French-speaking Canadians, and annihilate the future of such Canadians outside Quebec? I have difficulty in understanding that kind of narrow mindedness that not only wishes to group Quebec citizens under a single umbrella but also makes it a point to ensure that our minority numbers in North America proceed without further ado on the road to extermination.

[English]

Our nation at this point in history is accosted by many voices of divisiveness, voices which advance points of view which, if carried into effect, would mean a very rapid end to the fragile, beautiful unity of Canada. The voices of sovereignty in Quebec are but one example of narrow-mindedness and isolationism in our Canada. In all corners of our country, embittered groups preach parochialism, advocate intolerance and ignore the great joy of brotherhood among varied people.

In Acadia and in the west we hear the same advocacy of cultural and political isolation as we hear in Quebec. In such situations it is difficult to separate the genuine need for cultural protection from the self-interest of power hungry groups exploiting the natural incidence of human differences.

Ironically, while we have a group in Quebec seeking to lead that province out of confederation because of a perceived threat to cultural and linguistic assimilation, other groups in Canada fear the drowning of the English language in a Francophone sea. The rationale for the existence of such bodies as the Alliance for the Preservation of English in Canada and the One Canada Movement frankly escapes me. What threat do these people perceive in the existence of another man's language? Are they physically or psychologically harmed in any way by the spoken word? The fact that such groups exist, although there are many groups in Canada espousing different points of view, indicates to me a profound misunderstanding of the nature of our confederation.

I know some of the members of APEC, for example, and some of these people hold very responsible positions in the community. They are not deranged or mentally limited people, but for some reason they feel threatened enough to come out of the closet and form a public organization founded on the thesis that the English language and one's right to speak English is being challenged by the presence of the French language in our federal government. They feel that the 25 per cent to 30 per cent of our population who speak French somehow deprive them of their rights as Anglophones. One can only conclude that the barricading of the French language beyond the eyes and ears of these people is what is being asked. These people seem ready to deny their fellow-founding race the right to communicate with their government in their mother tongue simply because they do not want to hear a strange language.

I suggest that some Anglophones would benefit from a tour through Quebec. I believe the reality of a French-speaking population within the Canadian borders—the French fact—has never been accepted or even contemplated by many English Canadians. Bigotry is based on ignorance and I think that is the case with many Canadians.

I do not say this in a bitter or resentful way, but one must wonder if it is only now, now that our great nation is on the precipice of a tremendous tragedy, that English Canadians will be made aware of their brothers' rights and freedoms and, on an individual level, their feelings.

It is not too late to effect a reconciliation between our founding peoples. Canada's greatness is in the plurality of its culture and the duality of its language. This is our heritage, it is not simply a hollow cliché. English and French must reach out to each other and each man and each woman must seek out and bury his or her silly, ignorant and demeaning prejudices, the name calling, the bad jokes and the harassment. It is the little victories of tolerance, like the delicate balance in many communities in my riding sharing many cultures, that are part of the noble and worthy experiment that is Canada.

● (1650)

I appeal to my Anglophone and Francophone brothers and sisters to transcend petty prejudices and prepare themselves for the essential changes that must be made in a new constitution, changes to protect minority language rights, whether they be for the Francophone population of Chapleau or the Anglophone population of the eastern townships. If we balk at change now, we lose everything.

[Translation]

Before French Canadians in Quebec decide on their destinies, I would like in conclusion to make them realize one of the brutal repercussions of a Yes vote on May 20. It is not the future of one province you will be deciding upon, the future of individuals who live in it as that of your parents and friends, but also the future of those of us, a half million in Ontario alone, who live outside Quebec.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), I should deal with the late show for this evening.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman)—Atomic Energy—Effective and stringent international safeguards over use; the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm)—Parks Canada—Cancellation of proposed relocation of regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough; the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper)—Canadian Pacific Railway—Winnipeg—Request for commitment on rail relocation.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs Côté for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, indeed it is an honour to be elected to this noble gathering of men and women from across Canada. Many of us vary in our political viewpoints, but here in this House we can all be heard by each other and by the nation.

I represent the constituency of North Vancouver-Burnaby. It is on the lower mainland of British Columbia, and it is what I would call a heartland community. We are home owners, over 80 per cent own their own homes. We are basically middle class, hard-working, intelligent people who remain committed to the protestant work ethic, law and order and the individual right of a citizen to work out his own destiny in safety. We are taxpayers. Oh, do we pay taxes! In short, we are part of the great middle class of this nation that pay most of the taxes and worry about the future of our community, our province and our country.

We are a very long way from the nation's capital. In mileage it is 2,840 miles; in the time it is three hours earlier. In communications and understanding it sometimes appears to be light years away. We live on the other side of several ranges of mountains which are much more than a geographic barrier. They are a barrier to communication and understanding between east and west.

Our concerns, though, are the same as all Canadians. Whether in North Vancouver-Burnaby, Lethbridge, Brandon, Waterloo or Corner Brook, we talk about the same things and are distressed by the same problems which face all Canadians—unemployment, inflation which seems to go on unchecked, mortgage interest payments which are destroying many of our families, the critical need for housing particularly on the west coast, a national government which seems to be out of control and even now planning new bureaucracies in an attempt to be all things to all peoples, but at what cost! We are concerned about a government that for ten years has spent far more than it could collect, leaving a legacy for all of our children which we regret.

We are concerned about national unity. There is a rising whirlwind in the west that is only felt at this moment as a wisp of a small breeze in central Canada. It is a wind that may engulf this country if the insensitivity and neglect continue. It is no wonder why, despite some good candidates, there is no member of this government who was elected west of Portage and Main. Surely western Canada has given the clearest message possible to this old and unfeeling government. Surely now this government will listen and respond to the desires, needs and legitimate concerns of western Canada. It is a growing, building and developing western half of this nation. The arrogance of decision-making, the failure to listen, has planted seeds of secession in the west which will be difficult to uproot, but if left to flourish through neglect will certainly grow and overcome all of us.

In the Speech from the Throne I was given an extra task, like my colleagues from Saskatchewan, Alberta and, of course, British Columbia. I and the others were charged with the responsibility of representing my constituents to the nation, but also to represent the nation to my constituents. My constituents, along with all other Canadians, are the nation. Even the suggestion that the people of North Vancouver-Burnaby are something different from the nation is an insult to all Canadians.

If it means that I am to represent the nation and explain to my constituents why it was necessary to use anti-dumping rules to destroy over 200 British Columbia jobs for the benefit of Algoma, I will have difficulty. This case was a transfer of British Columbia jobs to Ontario in order to meet an Alberta demand. The wide-flange steel fabrication decision is one I will have trouble explaining.

If Atlantic fishermen are given subsidies and aid, and there is not an equal opportunity given to Pacific fishermen, I will have trouble explaining that. When the interprovincial ferries of the maritimes are subsidized and the national government cuts back the subsidy for northern transportation in British Columbia and up the coast, then I will have difficulty. Indeed, one Liberal cabinet minister had difficulty as well: she is no longer here.

The problem is not with the members of this House from the western region. The problem is a tired, old government that over the years has been so insensitive to the needs and desires of a region of Canada that they have sown the seeds of disenchantment, which is now manifesting itself as alienation. The insensitivity of that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne did not help Canadian unity.

I fear for my country. I fear the small groups of disenchanted that, like Quebec in the sixties, are now surfacing in every area of western Canada. Whatever name they may call themselves—and there are many—whatever differences they have in personality and desires, they are all calling for secession. These small groups lack credible leadership, but that could change overnight. They sit and await a spark, a spark that could grow to a raging fire in the west.

Despite what the press may say—and they have made little of these groups—they do have a large constituency in the west. There is a very real threat now. It is at the talking stage in the living rooms, dining rooms, coffee houses, restaurants, school rooms and business offices of western Canada. It is not yet fully organized. It is not yet articulated. But it exists to a far greater extent than most Canadians realize. Unless this government pays a greater attention to the western point of view, unless this government is prepared to listen to what the west is saying—and it has been notably lax in that over the past ten years—then I sincerely fear for my country.

The dissident westerner remembers that he was beholden to the railways because they controlled his destiny. The dissident westerner forgets that there are now western trucking organizations owned and operated by westerners, supplying excellent alternatives. The dissident westerner thinks about the jungle of freight rates in western Canada and how it often seems to appear totally unfair to the west. He forgets that the grain is still being moved at a price set before 1900. The dissident westerner talks about less than world prices for oil. Albertans, as a matter of fact, have contributed toward Canadian unity something like a $17 billion subsidy for national unity purposes. The dissident westerner forgets the billion paid by Ontario in eastern Canada when oil pricing was a different thing. He also forgets the tens of billions of dollars paid by Ontario in transfer payments for the benefit of all Canadians.

The list of economic points of bitterness and bickering is a long one. However, when you look at the new west, the western provinces of 1980, you must realize that most of the economic disparities have been solved or are being solved.

Old ideas and old concepts and resentments die hard. The west really has yet to take a very good look at itself and realize the growth, and the fact that the economy of western Canada is not what it was and that Ontario no longer dominates in an economic sense, as it once did.

My findings are that while alienation talk grows stronger in western Canada due to basic misapprehensions as to what the world is like today and not what it was a generation ago, here in Ontario there are also misconceptions and improper views as well as to what is going on.

In Ontario those who are thinking seem to be worried about the west. Ontario, too, has many misconceptions. As an example, the last wooden sidewalk was replaced 40 years ago in western Canada. Ontario does not seem to understand yet that its reliance upon the captive market of western Canada is becoming increasingly less important to the manufacturers of Ontario. What with reductions through GATT and the opening up of more markets by lowering trade barriers, Ontario can compete in the world, and Ontario must compete in the world, and the western Canada market becomes almost unimportant to Ontario.

As an example, the figures for 1974 are rather interesting and typical. Manufacturing shipments from Ontario to western Canada amounted to only 8.9 per cent of all shipments; shipments west from Quebec amounted to only 6.5 per cent; and shipments west to east represented only 4.8 per cent to Ontario and 3.8 per cent to Quebec, and most of them were of food, beverages, and forest products.

There is no danger either for Ontario because of the new skills that are developing in western Canada. There is no danger in terms of manufacturing; we are unimportant to the east and they are unimportant to us. When you talk about the sale of services, whether it be management skills, consulting, engineering or whatever, certainly the west will compete in the eastern market because transportation plays no part. We are talking about brains. Ontario has the skills too, and can certainly compete on an even basis with the new youthful service skills of western Canada. They certainly will be competing in the same fields of computer science, research, intellectual pursuits, microinstrumentation, automation, and all of those things.

Ontario can welcome a new partner. Ontario can welcome a new competitive source which will put it on its mettle, in the same way as westerners can welcome eastern expertise and use that expertise to develop other skills in western Canada. The point I am making here is that what will happen, as the western economy becomes even more similar to the eastern economy in terms of structure, aspirations and economic relationships, is that east and west will grow closer together for mutual benefit, in the same way as France and Germany grew closer together when the common market was set up.

The problems of western alienation will not be economic, because more and more people realize that the region has grown up and can stand on its own two feet. However, there is another side, and that is the political side. Here I have fear that we may not be able to solve the problems quite as easily. I can do no better than quote the words of Stan Roberts, the president of the Canada West Foundation, who, after a series of workshops held across western Canada a year or so ago, said:

> There is an urgently growing need for the goals and aspirations of western and northern Canadians to be recognized, supported and fulfilled. There is a serious challenge to confederation, not only in Quebec. The current structure of Canadian confederation has demonstrated a potentially fatal weakness; the inability to meet the development needs of its members. Years ago the Canadian family stuck together because it had to do so. In the coming years, only a meaningful structure and attitudinal change will hold it together.

It is difficult for eastern Canadians to understand and know the west and westerners. Westerners generally feel that only a small proportion of policy makers and implementers in Ottawa know the west. At these meetings I talked about, the concern was expressed that the majority in the public service in Ottawa, especially at the policy level, not only do not understand the west but inherently feel that there is nothing to know; that the west is simply an underdeveloped westward extension of Ontario that was satisfied in its colonial state until recently when it found a measure of prosperity.

Along the same line let me quote from the report of the Task Force on National Unity to Parliament in January, 1979:

> The attitude of politicians and civil servants in Ottawa towards their provincial counterparts is that of a superior dealing with an inferior . . . we cannot help but regard this as a significant cause of conflict between governments.

Some way must be found for there to be an equal partnership between the regions of Canada, and equal partnership means no senior partners and no junior partners.

Western Canadians, in general, want ways and means of ensuring regional input into national decision making. They want a precise clarification of the division of powers between provinces, municipalities, and the federal government. The westerner says that the west and the north have achieved maturity but Ottawa will not recognize it. The master-servant relationship between Ottawa and the west is unacceptable today. The force called western alienation is alive and well, and growing. The views expressed seem to represent the basic and fundamental needs of those living west of the Lakehead, including the north, to be an equal partner in all decisions affecting them. Those are some of the thoughts that are prevalent in western Canada, and those are some of the trends that I fear.

What are the implications of what is taking place out there for Ontario, in particular, and for the federal government and the rest of the country in general? The implications are clear. Decision-making must be brought home to the provinces. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is clearly on record as saying, and meaning, that every decision that can be made at the municipal level should be made there; every decision that can be made on a provincial basis should be made there; and only those decisions that affect all of Canada and are of importance to all of Canada should and can be made at the federal level.

In one way or another western Canada can no longer be and will no longer be the weak sister of eastern Canada. No longer are western Canadians prepared to accept a confederation in which a political party, by winning Ontario and by winning Quebec, could ignore the rest of the country. If the west has found this unfair, I pity the poor maritimers with their small populations.

I would like to give this government a shopping list of some of the things which it could do if it really wished to respond to the legitimate desires and requirements of British Columbia. Let us consider the port of Vancouver. Three times this old government has introduced legislation to give more autonomy to the port of Vancouver, and three times it has only gone as far as first reading. The port of Vancouver should be totally independent and operated by British Columbia people living in British Columbia. The bureaucrats of Ottawa should have absolutely no power in terms of decision-making authority over the port.

We live on the Pacific rim and look to the Pacific for our trade and markets. We neither expect nor desire civil servants in Ottawa to understand our problems. Nor should the bureaucrats of the National Harbours Board be telling us from a great distance what we can and cannot do. As an example, the port of Seattle is totally locally controlled and in the past ten years has advanced tremendously at the expense of Vancouver. What we want is local control of that port, not control by the National Harbours Board and long detailed correspondence with Ottawa. It is in the national interest that we be allowed to compete quickly with local decision-making.

The west coast fishery is another point. It is different from the inland fishery, from the Atlantic fishery and the Newfoundland fishery. What is required as a minimum is a deputy minister of Pacific fisheries located on the west coast and dealing on a daily basis with west coast fishermen, rather than by long distance to Ottawa. At best, there should be a minister of Pacific fishery in the government who deals with that area alone and who preferably comes from British Columbia. If the Canadian Wheat Board were in Ottawa, every prairie farmer would understand exactly what I mean when I talk about the Pacific fishery.

I have one other point. Every board, commission, task force, study group, advisory panel, Crown corporation or whatever should be examined very carefully with one point in mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am very sorry indeed to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, I need but one minute.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cook: Does each region of this country have full and proper representation in the decision-making? If not, it had better be changed if the government wishes to silence the secessionists.

What this country needs is a new national dream, and this time not steel rails to bind us together but a national dream of the heart and mind bound together, one to another, as equals, and each participating in decisions for the benefit of all. Is that not the dream of all Canadians, and is that not what most of Quebec is really saying and also the Atlantic provinces and certainly the west, that they want a new and true confederation of equals? That is the challenge to this government, to figure out how it can be done, how we can all feel equal and be equal in a united, new confederation.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the House of Commons, I am indeed honoured to have this opportunity to offer my contribution to the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. At the outset I would like to offer Madam Speaker my sincere good wishes and my hearty congratulations upon her elevation to the chair. Hon. members may have noticed that unlike other hon. members, I have very little difficulty in addressing her by the proper prefix. I am confident that in her career as Speaker she will continue to distinguish herself as she has in the past. Indeed, by her very presence here in this chamber she will strengthen the role of women in the affairs of this nation, a role which will greatly expand in the years ahead.

Before I begin my remarks I would like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté) for her eloquent speech in moving the motion for this debate, and similarly congratulate and thank my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith), who seconded the motion to begin the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I would indeed be remiss if I did not also thank the people of Nickel Belt who sent me here to Ottawa to represent them. May I simply say to them that I will do my best to ensure that the faith, the trust and the confidence they have placed in me will indeed prove well-founded. I can assure them that I will actively solicit their views and their assistance in the weeks ahead.

I am, of course, delighted to have been asked by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to serve my country in the cabinet as the new Minister of State (Mines). I look forward to this additional responsibility with anticipation. It is, however, an anticipation tempered with a sober humility, humility that stems from the responsibility which I now feel falls upon me, as a northerner, to bring a different perspective to the cabinet table.

I am well aware of the problems and hardships of living in the north and, likewise, I have a sensitivity to the issues of northern expansion and development. It is now my duty to ensure that the northern perspective is given a fair hearing when decisions are being made. Due to the increased concern and emphasis on the energy sector since the OPEC price increases, the mines and minerals sector of the Canadian economy has been somewhat ignored. This is unfortunate because this sector of the Canadian economy has far-reaching consequences in terms of Canada's future economic vitality and, indeed, it has been an important element in Canada's growth and prosperity in the past.

It is no secret that Canada is one of the most richly endowed nations in the world in terms of natural resources. Our northern frontier areas have barely been utilized, and the promise that they hold is vast indeed. I have just returned from a trip to British Columbia and Yellowknife and, contrary to the views of the member who spoke previous to me, the economy is very much alive and well in those parts of the country.

However, the 1980s will certainly not be an easy decade, and in economic terms the strength of our economy will be put to a severe test. In a world of frantic competition and increasingly isolationist national tendencies, Canada will need sound planning and a solid policy base. The mining sector will play an ever more important role in Canada's future economic growth.

There is much activity in the mineral sector today. During the past 12 months several announcements of mine expansion and new mine development have been made. Indeed, in British Columbia 11 new mines are opening this year. New discoveries in the Yukon and Northwest Territories provide the promise of another mineral boom over the next decade that will contribute to regional development, provide new employment opportunities, and add significantly to per capita incomes.

As Minister of State (Mines) I am dedicated to achieving the potential that exists in the Canadian resource sector. The problems that the resource sector faces may not be that evident to the general public, but they pose a real hardship to the eventual achievement of this potential. The mineral sector of the economy is cyclical in nature. It can experience highs of increased activity and economic strength as we are experiencing now, and it can experience lows of both activity and strength, as was evident a few years ago. The mineral secto: is first and foremost dependent on the world economy and world markets. This boom-bust syndrome has resulted in a very large degree of general uncertainty. This uncertainty acts to stifle the efforts of industry, governments and unions to solve the mutually-shared problems of the mineral sector.

The mining sector of the economy will generate 2,100 new job opportunities in the next decade. However, the industry in general has presently been experiencing considerable difficulty attracting and retaining qualified personnel. The government is working with the industry to develop training programs that will provide the necessary expertise for the future. The Department of Employment and Immigration has in place a program to provide mobility grants of up to $4,500, which directly relates to the minerals industry. I am happy to report that during my visit to the Lornex Mine in British Columbia I found that 45 families from Atikokan have taken advantage of the mobility grant and now are settled in the Logan Lake community, and more are to follow.

Of course the mines and mining communities themselves must undergo significant change. It is no secret that mining continues to have one of the highest fatality rates of all industries, and also relatively high injury rates. Person days lost from work related injuries on average exceed those lost through strikes and lockouts. Recently there has been increasing evidence concerning health problems which originate from the work environment—lung cancer, asbestosis, and heavy metal poisoning.

The general area of occupational health and safety is one of my primary concerns. It is clear that unsatisfactory health and safety conditions make the mining environment less attractive to new workers, and it is important that health and safety enforcement be carried out in the most effective manner. The full potential of the industry can only be reached if it is able to attract and retain a productive labour force over the long term, and this cannot be achieved with unsafe and unhealthy working conditions. We must work together, governments, industry and the unions, to develop new standards and new technology on occupational health and safety. Indeed I am confident that there will be an announcement with respect to this situation in the very near future.

I would like to reaffirm my personal commitment to improving the safety standards of federally regulated mines, in particular the uranium mines with their inherent problems with regard to radiation exposure. Working together we can change the negative public perception of the miner, and begin to attract young Canadians to this growing industry. They will realize that it does provide an interesting and challenging career option. Government will continue to assist mining communities to provide the level of services and community facilities that will attract this much needed work force. Again, I saw this type of action just this past week in Yellowknife, across Great Slave Lake in the community of Pine Point where all facilities are made available to the workers.

To this end, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see much more research directed specifically to the solution of societal problems associated with the mining industry. In addition to research in the general areas of health, safety and working conditions in mines, I would like to encourage research in the disposal and treatment of effluents from mills and smelters, and in the disposal and treatment of mine and mill waste, as well as more research in the area of nuclear waste disposal. The solution to those societal problems will not only permit a healthier development of the mineral industry, but the technology which is developed to arrive at these solutions can offer exciting opportunities in the manufacturing and service industries, particularly in my sector of the country.

It is the government's intention to use Canada's resource-base as a basic building block in a vigorous industrial strategy. The mineral industry, as one of Canada's foremost resource based industries, now provides considerable stimulation up and downstream in other sectors of the economy. However, if this industry is to achieve its full potential, in regard to its direct contribution to the economy, it must be a technological leader in mining, in mineral processing, and in metal fabrication.

The industry in 1977 spent $82.4 million on research and development, actually performing $91.2 million worth of R and D, with the federal government paying the difference. The federal government contributes directly about $23.9 million more through grants provided by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and through research conducted in EMR and other government laboratories.

This represents about 0.7 per cent of the total value of production, actually directly spent on research and development. I would like to see Canada's research and development effort considerably increased and I was pleased to hear, in the Speech from the Throne, a reaffirmation of the government's intention to increase Canada's over-all expenditure on research and development to 1.5 per cent of the value of GNP. Much of the increased research and development in the minerals sector should be directed to improving the competitiveness and the commercial position of industries in the field of mining, mineral processing, metal fabricating, and mining machinery and supplies.

[Translation]

My department will carefully look at a matter that I consider of prime importance, the increased processing of our natural resources at home in Canada. The time I have does not allow me, of course, to list all my concerns with respect to the mining sector. So I will be content to say that my department will continue to do everything it can to find solutions to the chronic problems facing this industrial sector.

My department and other departments involved will give particular attention to the following areas—the transportation of raw materials, the health and safety of workers, more advanced processing of our raw materials, an increase in our exports in this area and the elaboration of an infrastructure for the development of northern Canada. I expect to receive the open and full co-operation of all members of this Parliament, particularly those who are closely affected by such matters, and an active and eager participation on their part. So our twofold objective remains the same—the improvement and growth of the mining sector in Canada.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to conclude this speech by dealing with a very hot subject, a subject that can leave no Canadian indifferent—the confrontation that is now shaking Quebec and the adverse effect that confrontation can have for both that province and Canada as a whole if it does not come out right. There is no doubt that the French fact is one of the dominant characteristics of the very personality and character of the Canadian people. I strongly suggest that Canada could not exist without a strong presence of the French culture and language. It is time that all Canadians from coast to coast properly recognized and appreciated that wealth which is ours.

On the other hand, I warn all Quebeckers against the disastrous consequences that would result from the separation of Quebec. Outside the Canadian confederative pact, literally drowned in the English-speaking sea of the North American continent, French-speaking Quebec will not be able to keep its culture and language. So it is in the very interest of Quebec and all of Canada that there be a decisive victory on the no side in the Quebec referendum of May 20. A victory for the yes side would mark the beginning of the process of disappearance of the French culture and language on Canadian soil, even in America, and would endanger the very survival of Canada as a distinct nation.

I was raised and worked in a Francophone environment in northern Ontario. I represent a riding whose population is 40 per cent Francophone. Despite my English accent, my Finnish origins, my heart is French; I say it with fervor, with pride. The French fact in Canada blooms far beyond the boundaries of the province of Quebec. I invite Francophone Quebeckers, men and women alike, to visit the many authentically Francophone communities of my riding such as Noëlville, Monetville, Saint-Charles, Azilda and many others. They will see then that the French culture and language have dug their roots deep down in the soil of Ontario. Those men and women of Quebec will then be able to see what irreparable consequences a Yes in the referendum would have for the Francophone "pure laine" outside Quebec. By voting Yes, Quebeckers would be saying: Quebec is French, Canada is English.

Quebeckers would thus be tolling the bell for Francophones outside Quebec, for their culture and their tongue. In a way, Quebeckers would be perpetrating the cultural and linguistic genocide of their blood brothers.

Many ethnic groups, each with its characteristics and its own wealth, make up the Canadian mosaic, of which French Canadians are a jewel. Will Quebeckers decide to shatter that mosaic which it took so many years for Canadians to build together? I close, Mr. Speaker, paraphrasing the words of the Quebec song writer: When all Canadians live off love, leaving behind distress and woes, on better days the sun will shine, we'll still be full of life, brothers of mine.

[English]

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks by offering my sincere congratulations to Madam Speaker on her prestigious election as Speaker of the House of Commons. In acquainting myself with the responsibilities and obligations of my new role, I sympathize with Madam Speaker in acquainting herself with her new role. I am sure that she will easily master these new responsibilities and carry out her role in the tradition of excellence and impartiality of past speakers.

It is a great honour for me to rise and deliver my maiden speech today. I would like to use the occasion of my maiden speech to introduce members of the House to my riding of Hastings-Frontenac and to discuss the issues that are of concern to my constituents, both at the local and national level. I will make my remarks in the context of a reply to the Speech from the Throne and incorporate what I have to say in the form of a request for government action on the issues that I raise.

First, I will give a brief description of my constituency. Hastings-Frontenac is located in southeastern Ontario. Its southern boundary skirts the city of Kingston and runs south on the Frontenac-Lennox and Addington county line to the Bay of Quinte. It contains Hastings County from approximately Highway 7 just south of Madoc and Marmora, to the Peterborough-Hastings county line. It follows the line north to the Renfrew-Nipissing district and Hastings county boundary, then follows the boundary line south and east, bordering Renfrew county. Finally, it follows the Frontenac county boundary with Lanark and Leeds counties until it reaches its southern extremity at the Bateaux Channel east of Kingston in the Thousand Islands area. Thus, I represent one of southern Ontario's biggest, most scenic and historical areas.

There are several small villages within the constituency. Some of the bigger communities include Amherstview, near Kingston; Napanee, which is my home town; Madoc; Marmora, Bancroft, Sydenham, Northbrook, Cloyne, Denbigh, Sharbot Lake, Tamworth, Verona, Coe Hill, Maynooth, Eldorado, Harrowsmith, Parham, Kaladar, Arden and Plevna. As a result of the number of small communities within the riding, Hastings-Frontenac is blessed with many of the much cherished small town virtues.

My constituents are honest, hard-working, God-fearing and decent people. They are typical Canadians, and I am proud and honoured to represent them. The citizens of Hastings-Frontenac pride themselves on their self-reliance and their perseverance.

These characteristics are as much an inherited trait as they are products of the small town, rural environment: a heritage of our forefathers. Our area of eastern Ontario was settled primarily by United Empire Loyalists. They moved into the area following the American revolution and founded such communities as Bath, Ernestown, Millhaven, Sandhurst and Adolphustown. As time went on and the valuable land on the Bay of Quinte became scarce, they moved inland to settle such places as Odessa, Newburgh, Selby, Tamworth, Roblin, Yarker and Enterprise. These early settlers who made the journey north were a proud people and full of the strength of their convictions. To this day, the imprint they made on the communities they settled remains with their descendants, of which I am proud to be one.

My constituents and I believe that government interference in the economy should be limited to cases of necessity. The work ethic and incentives in the free enterprise system are fundamental elements of democracy, and exceptions to these conditions should be limited to cases of demonstrated need. Our country was built on these principles, and as long as they are allowed to flourish, Canada will be well served.

There are many issues about which my constituents feel very strongly. One of those issues is metric conversion. The frustration and cost of conversion to the producer are substantial. Likewise, the consumers of Canada end up frustrated and, worse, it is they who ultimately carry the producers' increased cost.

In the United States, which is our largest trading partner, conversion is voluntary.

I do not have to remind anyone that the actual need for the metric program was never established by debate in the House of Commons. This fact represents a callous and cynical affront to the parliamentary process, with implications for the future of this chamber greater and more significant than the actual metric program itself.

Another issue that is important to my constituents is capital punishment. Perhaps that is only natural when Joyceville and Millhaven penitentiaries are located in the riding. However, it seems to be an issue of concern to all Canadians, and indications are that a majority of them are in favour of its reinstatement.

Each of the regions of our country has its own particular natural beauty. Ontario is no exception. In eastern Ontario we boast of the splendor of the Canadian Shield, the Land o' Lakes. My riding typifies the beauty of the Shield, and many of my constituents make a living in the tourist industry, which attracts many people to the area.

It is a shame to note that with all this country has to offer tourists we are saddled with such a dangerous balance of payments problem in the tourist industry. I think a firmer commitment from the Government of Canada to promote and facilitate Canadian vacations, plus amendments in the tax laws that would make investment in this industry more attractive, would go a long way toward making Canada a major world tourist market. I also believe that this industry should be represented in the government by a minister of tourism.

It is my contention that if we are to get serious about developing a tourist strategy for Canada, we must also take seriously the very real environmental problems our country has. Environmentalists are only just beginning to comprehend the magnitude of acid rain, toxic waste, and our environmental negligence in general.

There are many people in my riding who have voiced their opposition to current gun control legislation. I am in total agreement with the opinion of those people who have told me they feel the present legislation is harder on the legitimate holders of firearms than it is on the criminal element of society.

Agricultural policies and programs have a direct bearing on my riding and its people, many of whom farm for a living. Dairy and beef farming are practised in the riding, and our cheddar cheese is world famous. I would like to see the government become more aware of the special problems of these Canadian farmers.

I would like to see the production of industrial milk stabilized so that further threats to the livelihood of the existing small butter and cheese processors in southeastern Ontario do not force them out of business. It is important that governments take steps to encourage the protection of our prime farmland.

I strongly urge the new Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to reintroduce his predecessor's tax measure that would allow farmers to deduct up to $200,000 in capital gains taxes on the sale of farmland. These measures would greatly enhance the potential of farming in Canada and would allow us to become an even larger producer of food for sale at home and abroad.

The cost of living is a very real hardship for people of low incomes. This burden is especially hard on pensioners who have made their contribution to our country and should be allowed to retire in comfort and dignity. The same applies to veterans pensions. In the last Parliament our government had introduced legislation to increase the veterans pensions and do away with serious inequities in the existing legislation. I feel it is important that we remember the sacrifices that many Canadians made on the battlefields in two world wars and other conflicts by defending our political system, and that we recognize that fact with appropriate veterans pensions.

It is important that the government contribute significant resources to youth employment and technical training programs. It is important that our young people be able to find employment so as to instil the virtues of hard work and its just rewards.

The forest industry has played an important role in the settlement and employment aspects of Hastings-Frontenac. It is an industry which has meant much to Canada in the past, and still has a significant contribution to make to our national livelihood. However, the forest industry is not as strong as it can be. Our share of the world market is decreasing, and demand in the United States for our products is slowly declining. The federal government should take note of this situation, and in conjunction with the provincial governments step up its programs of assistance to modernize the industry.

Members representing rural ridings like Hastings-Frontenac will agree with me when I acknowledge the importance of voluntary organizations to the local community. There is probably no voluntary service more important to a rural community than the volunteers that comprise its fire department. I am pleased to see the Minister of Finance agrees with me and has wisely reintroduced the former minister of finance's increase in tax exemptions for volunteer firefighters.

Recent hearings by the CRTC have demonstrated the need for better access to radio and television programming in Canada. The availability of this type of modern day communication is not limited solely to the far north. In my riding, some 100 miles west of Ottawa, in the northern areas of Hastings-Frontenac and Lennox and Addington, residents are extremely limited in the television and radio programming they can receive. If the CRTC is concerned with the amount of domestic programming available to Canadians, it does not have to look to the far north to see its deficiencies. I would like to see the CRTC make every possible effort to get better broadcasting available to the residents of Hastings-Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, particularly the Bancroft area.

In comparison with the so-called pressing issues of the day, some of the concerns I have just raised may seem trivial to some people, but nothing could be further from the truth. They are important not only in themselves but because they represent and symbolize the legitimate problems of ordinary people, and it is important that we respond, as elected representatives of the people, to their wishes, however minor they may appear in comparison with the great issues of the day. For that reason I have brought them to the attention of Parliament in the hope that the government will act on them.

The people of my riding are certainly not immune to the very real problems facing Canada, nor, for that matter, am I. I would like to take this opportunity to address some of these concerns.

I firmly believe that our country is at a turning point in its history. Events have conspired to present us with the most critical problems we have dealt with since confederation. The political and economic issues facing us today are, in my opinion, unprecedented. They require well-thought-out, long-range solutions that will have to involve short-term sacrifice by many of us. There are no simplistic socialistic solutions. Nothing less than the very survival of our country rests on the successful resolution of these issues. Consultation, rather than confrontation, is the only course to follow in this reform process.

On the economic front several pressing matters demand our immediate and undivided attention. Among the most important is the energy issue. The dependence on imported oil and the price it is costing Canadians and their government is a dangerous policy. Only a realistic Canadian price will be able to encourage conservation and allow the financing of alternate sources.

Steps must be taken immediately to get Canada on the road to energy self-sufficiency. The inevitable consequence of such a policy is an increase in oil prices. We cannot continue living in this fool's paradise that sees Canadian consumers subsidized and sheltered from the hard facts of rapidly rising OPEC prices, and production costs at home. The present government acknowledged that in the Speech from the Throne. Such a promise dictates that prices will go up.

An effective means of conserving energy is to develop rapid transit systems for urban communities. As the price of gasoline climbs, it will be more attractive for commuters to switch to mass transit.

The Urban Transportation Development Corporation is located in my riding. This corporation was established by the Ontario government to promote mass transit. Here is a case that warrants government action and support. It would be a crime to see such a corporation die, only to have the government turn to a foreign market three or four years later to buy the same product that could be produced here, sold here, and even exported.

We have to get serious about this country's energy future, and the sooner the better. We are in a unique position among the countries of the world to make Canada self-sufficient. Let us get on with the job.

The generally poor performance of our economy is cause for great concern among Canadians. Our unemployment record is totally unacceptable. Our employment record can be improved. In a country with human and natural resources such as we have, Canada should not have such serious problems. Yet we have, and they have persisted for a number of years.

Although there are no easy answers to our economic problems, there do exist partial remedies that many observers feel would contribute to the solution of our economic woes. One of the easiest and most readily accessible steps that the government could take to demonstrate the need to solve our economic problems is staring it right in the face. It is simply called cutting government spending, through good management. Most economists and financial analysts agree that government spending has been a major contributor to Canada's current economic status.

I find it difficult to believe the Minister of Finance when he says the government will restrain its spending. The House has heard that statement too many times to give it serious consideration. This practice of unlimited government spending simply cannot continue. The government debt has to be reduced. Federal spending has to be curtailed. Growth in the civil service has to be realistic. These measures will greatly improve the financial position of the federal government which, in turn, will help facilitate an upturn in the economy. One of the first economic indicators to reflect a healthier economy is the interest rate, which is currently too high.

The time for decisive action is upon us. The federal government must demonstrate that it is ready to sit down with the provincial premiers and discuss a renewed federalism. But the discussion will have to take place within the context of accommodation and conciliation, not confrontation. Needless to say, this approach has to be mutual.

It is clear our federal system as it now exists is not capable of accommodating the legitimate aspirations of our country's regions. Admitting that, and attempting to overcome it, does not mean that our federal system has not worked. It means that, as originally constituted, it no longer meets the needs of a country 113 years older and wiser. Change is a healthy prerequisite of any relationship, whether between individuals or people and their government. It must be clear from the start, however, that this change should still be made within a strong federal context. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers can and should be hard bargainers when they sit down to discuss constitutional change. But they must sit down and discuss present day Canada, and they must do so without dilatory tactics.

One aspect of our present federal arrangement which I feel it is imperative we maintain is the constitutional monarchy. Any attempt to alter or downplay this tradition which has made our country the best place in the world in which to live, will only worsen the division which some believe exists. It is unfortunate that we in this promised land, of which there is no equal, tend to deflect our attention from problems as they present themselves and concern ourselves with the way people look at the problems. The monarchy is too deeply rooted in our culture and history to be removed from our political experience. It is not the cultural aspect which is of concern to me but the threat by cunning people to upset political order and remake it according to their desire. Our forefathers have built the potential for a great nation—the greatest on earth. Why is it difficult for Canadians to appreciate how fortunate we are and what great opportunities exist for us to make this a great nation in the midst of a troubled world?

Madam Speaker, these are just some of the many pressing issues facing Canadians and their government. It is ironic that as we head into a new decade the challenges of the future are compounded by the failures of the past. Equally ironic, but no less deserved, is the fact that the administration which created so many of these problems should be the administration which is being asked to resolve them.

Now, when we are facing our most serious challenge since confederation, is the time to put those resources to work for us. We must reach within ourselves and rekindle the spirit that brought our country together over one hundred years ago. We must draw together as Canadians in an effort to save Canada as we have in other major conflicts in which many Canadians paid the supreme sacrifice. We must rediscover the common element which originally united us and lay to rest the destructive forces which now divide us. We must accept each region as part of Canada, and its people as our fellow Canadians. We must share and take pride in our common heritage, and not dwell upon our differences—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hate to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He can continue only if he has unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: I do not object, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member continuing for a minute or so, but it was understood when we established the 20-minute rule today that speeches would be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais).

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak today in the context of the throne speech debate. I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the two members (Mrs. Côté and Mr. Frith) who so generously accepted to move the motion in reply, in view of the intentions expressed by the present government regarding its legislative program for the coming session.

I would have liked to speak about the problems of my riding, in view of the size of the area I represent, which is 600 miles of coast line by 1,250 miles long. I would also have liked to speak of Fort Chimo, Blanc Sablon, Anticosti Island, Baie Comeau, and Schefferville, of the problems of television, of maritime transportation, of tariffs, of the difficulties we are experiencing with the postal service, but in light of the major debate now going on in Quebec, it is important, I believe, to try and define the problems facing Quebeckers.

First, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the people I represent are proud to be members of a country called Canada. But this pride has been marred by some frustrations during this referendum debate. It is to some people's advantage to exaggerate those frustrations, so that some of our English Canadian friends may wonder what are the true intentions of the people of Quebec.

I would like to answer those questions immediately by saying simply that Quebeckers for the most part want to stay in Canada but, given an ambiguous question, they are now in a period of deep reflection and perhaps contradiction, and if that is the way it is, it is because the government now representing them in Quebec does not have the courage or at least the honesty to ask them a real question.

So I think that the real answer of the people of Quebec was recently given twice to a man called Pierre Trudeau, and if the members of this House want to give me the time to do so, I would like at the same time to tell them that Quebeckers, as you may realize, gave their definitive answer on two occasions in the past 12 months and it was every time stronger than ever before. So I say that you must first admit that the people of Quebec are happy to be in Canada but would like to see certain changes made.

The area I represent is somewhat a Canada on a smaller scale. I have in my riding, of course, Francophones, Anglophones vis-à-vis Newfoundland—I have 5,000 Anglophones who are completely vis-à-vis Newfoundland—I have a good group of Inuits in Fort Chimo, extremely proud people, with a lively culture, happy of what they are, who would also want to continue to develop their heritage. I am thinking, among others, of Charlie Watt, who represents his group very well. I am also thinking of Mr. Gerry Paquin who has been in Fort Chimo for 15 years, a civil servant who is doing an extremely good job representing the federal institutions over there.

I am also thinking of Mr. Charlie McCormick who administered, who built the Anticosti Island, lost right in the middle of the St. Lawrence. I am thinking of Mr. Francis McKinnon, in St. Augustin, a fisherman, a contractor, a builder. I am thinking of people like Charles Bégin, Claude Ménard, people like Mr. René Coicou, who are mayors of their communities. Mr. Coicou is a very colourful man for the place, being himself from Haiti, but represents his community by being the local mayor. You see that people over there know what sharing means and are not racists. Mr. Charles Bégin who has been in Schefferville for 20 years and has been forging in that area a very flourishing area but also very difficult area to reach because there are no roads there. My constituents are builders. As I said earlier, they are native people, Inuit and Montagnais. There are Ben Mackenzie, of Maliotenam, and others who still cover 380 miles on foot and portaging to go fishing and trapping in Labrador. These are all elements of the same constituency, and I believe that a constituency like my own riding of Manicouagan is truly a microcosm of Canada.

However, what is extremely dangerous is to see people who want to destroy us and who, instead of stating clearly their intentions, use insidious words, comments or questions, so that all they are trying to obtain in Quebec on May 20 is a symbolic Yes, a booby-trapped yes, after which the government will take over and provide its own interpretation. I would like to tell the people of Quebec that until May 20 they still have control over their reply to the question, but that after May 20, the government will be able to interpret their answer to the question and that this is where the danger lies. This is why we have to fight as French Canadians to ensure that our rights will be respected and to prevent people from being misled because it will be too late to go back afterwards. I shall simply ask Quebeckers to think about Labrador. When Labrador became part of Newfoundland 30 years ago, there was a legal conflict, but very few people considered this issue important. However, in 1980, the Quebec premier is making a lot of noise to attempt to take back Labrador for its energy and mineral wealth. If Quebec separates, ten years from now will we French Canadians have to claim once again rights which have been ours in fact and in law for 300 years?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m., I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying just before the six o'clock adjournment, it is very important that Quebeckers keep the country because in a few years' time we might relive exactly the same scenario as now, in which Mr. René Lévesque is trying to secure the rights to Labrador knowing full well that it belongs to Newfoundland; this is the same man who is willing to do without three-quarters of the country. I want to tell my fellow citizens of Quebec that we can change party representatives, we can change the country's administration but we must not change the country. That is important. This, in my opinion, is what we must focus on in view of the Parti Québécois' question.

We must never do away with our rights to the country. That is our priority. That, Mr. Speaker, is what every man and woman in Quebec will think about. This formerly French territory, now called Canada, had Tadoussac as its first capital and we were the first to cross this land; one can carefully read the book by Félix-Antoine Savard entitled: "La dalle des morts" to realize that there are French names all across the country, that French blood was shed all across the country. We must succeed in proving to our fellow citizens that we are welcome everywhere. I myself had the opportunity to travel from Halifax to Vancouver and I was welcomed everywhere. But of course, in Quebec as well as in English Canada, one encounters narrow-minded people, but they comprise an infinite minority.

We must look at the future. How can we unlock it? Let me tell you that what people in my age group would like is the opportunity to learn the second language easily. For a French Canadian, this means an improved educational system that would allow one to go and communicate with the people in the other part of the country, people from the west. And the same should be asked for westerners, in other words that the provincial education system allow them to learn French, in order that a meaningful dialogue can be obtained. Ultimately, this country's major tragedy may be that we never had institutions under which people could go from east to west, we never had the opportunity to study in Vancouver or Halifax. Nothing allowed for that encounter that in my view would have developed a genuine understanding.

And here we are at this point in history mounting up a trial, whose real actors lived in Canada in the fifties. What I would ask of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) is that he call, not a constitutional conclave, but a meeting of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the NDP leader (Mr. Broadbent), the provincial premiers, the provincial opposition leaders in order that, outside of any personal political pride, in camera, people of good will evolve, that they build the foundations of a new Canadian constitution based on the Pepin-Robarts documents. This is what young people in our age group expect.

What we are seeing now, both in English and in French Canada, is the grapes of impatience. For too long we have been limited either in a French-speaking Quebec or in English-speaking provinces. But Acadia would like to have its particular identity recognized, so would southern Ontario, northern Ontario, the St. Boniface area and Maillardville. We want in earnest to meet. Maybe the government should provide more moneys under a plan called Katimavik, give young people the opportunity to truly implement our Canadian experience. This is lacking. Instead of always brooding over the past, instead of remaining self-centred, we should think of the coming generation. That one will really be the outcome of the 1867 confederation.

I would like to quote from an article published in Le Devoir under the signature of André Nadeau, a young Quebec student. It goes:

> I have no more desire to feed on words, whether of Marxist or nationalistic flavour. I want to read, I want knowledge to act, but first and foremost on myself, on people around me.

I do not want to change the world because all theories aimed at changing it have caused more deaths than all nuclear bombs together. To me, democracy is based on one principle: everyone controls his own life.

Social problems become more complex and wider, yes, but everyone must try to find specific answers without relating them to a system which is as theoretical as it is utopic. I cannot believe anymore that the status of women or the issues of underprivileged groups and ethnic minorities are related to the revolution. So we must pursue our fight about issues more specific than universal—

In other words, instead of great nights, let us have mornings in the sunshine and instead of a utopic future, a realistic present.

Our young people want to free themselves from the yoke of drawn out debates, they want to act, which means that this government shall find, in co-operation with opposition parties, formulas that will make self-achievement possible in our country. And if everyone had had a chance to live the Canadian experience, we would not be trying to find someone to blame but, on the contrary, to build a much stronger country.

I always like to refer to my own Manicouagan riding as we experienced that situation. I think of the Gallienne, of Jomphe, the poet, of Havre-Saint-Pierre, of people who succeeded in building a real country in a very difficult climate and under very harsh conditions. And the North Shore is now in full bloom.

I am thinking here of a fellow like Louis-Ange Santerre who has written about the North Shore. And also of a man like Leméac, and Jeannine Boisclair who have managed to make their way to areas where roads still have to be built, even in my own riding where, in some places, television has yet to come: still, the people who live there want to build. Instead of having the Canada we dream of, we spend our time discussing and recalling the battle of the Plains of Abraham. We need the will to change, but are we capable of making those changes happen? I say we do, Mr. Speaker, and the young of our generation are ready to act.

But it is up to the government to take the initial step that will allow the young, and the not so young, to fulfil themselves. We should stop going around in circles, and get to work without further ado and lay the cornerstone. At this point, I want to congratulate the Leader of the Official Opposition who, coming from the western plains, learned French, not only enough to speak it, but to master its meaning, and that is wonderful. The same applies to the Leader of the New Democratic Party who speaks French. That is what Quebeckers must understand. It is a matter of having our rights respected, while recognizing at the same time that others are making real efforts. Despite painful situations, there is obviously good will on the other side. And if that is possible at 40 or 50 years of age, I say to myself: Great guns! It is possible to achieve at 15 and 18 years of age, within a really good system of education, that will enable us to understand each other, to meet, to communicate! That is the greatest problem in this country: a lack of communication.

Once again, addressing my Quebec fellow citizens, I ask them to really look at the changes that have taken place in this country in the last 20 years. I ask them to ponder, in all honesty, on the extent to which the system has been good to us, to see how much more interesting it is for a Francophone, whether he be from Quebec or Acadia, to stay within Canada and make the most of his rights, because true equality lies in equal rights and not in numerical equality. That is what must be realized and the young, like to the old, must weigh the possibilities involved.

Think of a fellow like Gilles Vigneault who, instead of living his poetry, lives off it saying, "Human beings are people of my race". Yet, he is of among the first to want a fence around Quebec. That is what the people of Quebec should understand, that the people who would fence them in on a parcel of land are the very ones who sing of brotherhood, freedom, equality and sharing. I denounce that fact and I ask Quebeckers to reconsider the matter.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the time allotted to me is limited but I still have a few minutes left. At the very end of my comments I would ask our friends from English Canada on both sides of the House to come and meet Quebeckers, more often immediately after May 20. Do not hesitate to come to Quebec because it is also your home. I think that it is time that you cross the Ottawa River and that you really try to hold a dialogue. It is far from being too late, because Quebeckers are ready to listen and most of them have a practical attitude and are ready to walk together with English-speaking Canadians, they are ready to co-operate with our Montagnais and the Inuit, they are ready to build this country, but they will never give up their rights. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will read a marvelous poem written by Félix-Antoine Savard, the author of "Menaud, maître draveur", the father of our authentic poets who enabled the French Canadian culture to be recognized outside Quebec throughout Canada and even in Europe. The poem entitled "Hymne à mon pays" reads as follows:

HEUREUX les peuples épaulés sur le Nord!
Ô Polaire, Souverain diamant immobile!
Somptueuses aurores boréales qui présagez les soleils du matin, voici que notre avenir à nous s'est levé.
Que s'élève aussi
notre hymne viril et fraternel!
Je t'aime, ô mon Pays, épaulé sur le Nord.
Et de vous, je prendrai conseil,
ô puissante et belle nature,
plaines, fleuves et montagnes,
riches solitudes inexploitées encore,
terres des forêts, des minéraux et des blés,
patrie des nids d'amour
dans les roseaux de la toundra!
Pacifiques trésors de mon pays,
de vous je prendrai conseil.
Et j'écouterai l'appel de l'immense et jeune liberté.
Et désormais, à mon frère,
de quelque race ou langue qu'il soit,
je dirai:
Viens avec moi!
Ce pays par Dieu nous fut donné.
Viens! nous travaillerons ensemble, côte à côte, et nos cœurs rapprochés
battront d'accord,
au rythme des merveilles.
Ohé! voilà que l'avenir
aux innombrables soleils, voilà que notre avenir à nous s'est levé!
Et pour toujours, nous oublierons les vieilles, funestes querelles qui empoisonnaient nos cœurs.
Et désormais,
dans les chemins de droiture et de justice,
nous marcherons ensemble,
dans la paix d'un pays sans haines ni rancunes.
Et nous écouterons l'appel d'un Canada
riche et jeune encore.
Oh! oui! très heureux,
les peuples épaulés sur le Nord, et marchant
fixés sur l'imperturbable étoile

des intangibles, des sacrées vérités de toujours!
Je t'aime, ô mon pays!
Et, à toi, mon frère,
de quelque race ou langue que tu sois,
de nouveau, je dirai:
Viens avec moi! Regarde!
Cela nous fut donné, l'incomparable et libre terre,
et l'avenir matinal et beau, semblable à un héros de force portant d'une main l'aurore,
et de l'autre,
la nuit,
et chantant l'hymne viril:
Heureux sous le regard de Dieu et le signe de l'immuable Polaire,
Heureux entre leurs trois océans, les peuples comme le nôtre
épaulés sur le Nord!
Heureux les peuples accordés!

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker. shortly before the last election a well-known Liberal in my constituency published a book entitled: "How To Get Elected". He attributed it to a mythical Senator Plumtree as told to Arthur T. Doyle. It was intended to be a parody on political life. In it the non-hero stays perpetually in office by avoiding real issues and telling the majority of his constituents what they want to hear and what they wish were true. According to Senator Plumtree, who reminds me of the American cartoon character Senator Snort, the politician has no higher responsibility than to win and keep office. Little did the author know that the book would be adopted literally by his party as a national campaign guide. Of course, we really do not expect a humorist to point out all the possible dangers of a philosophy or program which he proposes in jest. But in the real world we cannot escape the consequences of political cynicism and irresponsibility, especially when this behaviour is rewarded at the polls.

I know that 20 minutes are not nearly long enough for a member to describe every blow dealt to the health and progress of this country by the last Liberal campaign. For that reason I will speak mostly of the impact on the province and the region which I represent. But, before turning to those concerns, I have one comment to make about the national implications of the last campaign. I refer to the Liberal party attitude toward Alberta.

Not since 1917 has a major political party set out so deliberately to vilify one section of the population solely to curry favour with the rest. There was no genuine policy issue involved in this attack on western producing provinces, particularly Alberta. The Liberals detailed no energy policy. It was a calculated attempt to offer maritime and Ontario voters a scapegoat for their fear and insecurity about energy, to legitimize what the pollsters told them was growing resentment of western prosperity. The Liberal candidate in my constituency came right out with a newspaper advertisement proclaiming that the 18-cent federal excise tax increase would go into the Alberta heritage fund. I grant you the appeal was frequently more subtle elsewhere, but the intention remained unmistakable. There was no acknowledgement that the west's resources are finite and that experience has taught westerners not to expect any help from federal Liberal policy in establishing the basis for permanent prosperity.

There is no mystery why western provinces feel obliged to guarantee their own future. Instead, we hear about greedy Albertans ready to let easterners freeze in the dark and about the un-Canadian attitude of the blue-eyed sheiks. Of course the end result is to reinforce the westerners' lack of faith in the fairness of federal policy and their suspicion of the term "national interest." The crowning indignity is all this pious talk about proportionate representation as if constituency democracy, not Liberal cynicism, is to be blamed for the lack of elected western representatives in the cabinet. This is an insult to the intelligence of westerners, and so I might add is the false analogy with the problem of representation in Quebec.

The west has specific current reasons for rejecting the Liberal party. Despite that rejection, the political system remains competitive. Canada's real political problem is that parties which represent Canada's most dynamic regions never have a genuine opportunity to govern. A party which won an absolute majority of seats in four of the country's five regions last May was given barely enough time for housekeeping legislation. A party virtually shut out in two regions now governs with a secure majority. I am surprised that the philosopher king of federalism will not admit that this is the real political time bomb in Canada.

The maritime provinces, too, have historic grievances and problems. The promise of confederation for this region was a sharing of economic opportunities and benefits with central Canada. During the first 60 years, natural economic forces, internal weaknesses, and insensitive federal policies, especially in the field of transportation, destroyed the potential for balanced trade between the two regions. The maritimes became a captive market for tariff protected central Canadian manufacturers, and paid for them by selling natural products to traditional foreign customers.

For decades the lack of economical opportunity at home forced hundreds of thousands of maritimers to leave the region. These included some of the most ambitious and best educated people. Maritimers need no lessons from French Canadian history to understand social decapitation.

Beginning in the Second World War the federal government developed a variety of expedients to mitigate the worst effects of this situation; direct social benefits, equalization payments to provincial governments, aid to traditional primary sectors, the military presence which have all raised incomes and the standard of social services. DREE's support for infrastructure and its industrial incentives have created employment, although a distressingly low proportion of it seems to be permanent. Worse still, DREE's own studies show that most of the federal money spent here flows back to the manufacturers, retailers and financial institutions based in central Canada.

The December budget took a more flexible and realistic approach to industrial development. The tax contracts offered to firms locating or expanding in the maritimes and Gaspé could be tailored to the nature of a specific project and would have rewarded only viable enterprise—a favourable contrast to the practice of subsidizing the capital costs of speculative ventures. The new provisions for research and development, combined with DREE's new emphasis on small industries using local products and workers, were further indications of a new realism and a determination to improve economic conditions in the maritimes.

Nor did the budget neglect the special needs of existing industries. The provision allowing farmers, fishermen and others to deduct salaries paid to spouses from taxable income would have had its greatest impact, proportionately speaking, in the maritimes. By offering substantial incentives for the modernization of our fishing fleets, the budget offered a hope of reversing the growing dominance of foreign fleets. The previous government was determined not only to build a modern fishing fleet, but also to create a substantial Canadian merchant marine. This project is of vital interest to all of Canada at a time when we spend $4 billion annually for foreign shipping services, and when the new United Nations Code for Waterborne Trade, which guarantees trading countries a proportionate share of the traffic, is about to come into effect. Obviously there are special opportunities here for coastal provinces because of their location, their port facilities, and the existing skills and traditions of their people.

Just before the election I was pleased to receive and endorse recommendations of the port of Saint John's master plan study. More than a year in preparation, it brings together all of the opportunities Saint John could seize over the next ten years, and spells out the requirements. The recommendations should receive serious attention and immediate action by the new government.

Naturally, I urge the present government to continue our initiatives in respect of the maritimes, and to accord them the same high priority. There is no logical reason why they should not. These are not partisan or philosophical questions at all. Still, I find it hard to be optimistic.

I was staggered recently when I re-read the speech I delivered at the first session of the Thirtieth Parliament in 1974. Then, as now, I faced a newly elected Liberal majority. I take the liberty of quoting myself:

> There must be more positive action taken by government now in meeting the energy problems of our Atlantic region and of the country as a whole. We must not only be concerned about the supply and the use of our non-renewable energy resources such as oil, gas and coal, but more thought must be given to our renewable energy resources such as tidal and conventional hydro power... which can be used or sold independently of the whims of the Arabs or any other foreign influence.

In five years the Liberals did virtually nothing to meet this obvious need. The same can be said about their failure to modernize the fishing fleet, their apparent failure to notice that economic incentive programs were not creating permanent jobs, and their indifference to visibly growing dependence on unemployment insurance. In fact their solution to the latter phenomenon was to disqualify claimants and thrust them on to provincial welfare rolls.

Did they learn anything from their defeat in May, 1979? I have yet to see the evidence. With their strange bedfellows, they brought the government down on a budget which addressed these needs, and fought stubbornly against reality on the matter of energy—long-term pain for short-term gain.

Will they now deal seriously with this region? The chances are not good. First, they have to wriggle out of their cynical oil pricing commitment to Ontario, to get a large share of oil revenues without raising the excise tax, and reach an agreement with producing provinces while overcoming the hostility and suspicion their campaign created in the west. I doubt that they can do this, no matter how much time they have. Within two years they will be back to governing by the month, from Gallup poll to Gallup poll. Half the cabinet will be out looking for leadership votes, and the other half angling for positions in the new régime. Neither preoccupation augurs well for the nation's most ignored political bloc.

Even before then, there will be other distractions: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) will be busy rationalizing his interest rate hypocrisy and appeasing the Foreign Investment Review Agency fans. There is a sad irony here.

So-called economic nationalists have no trouble recognizing the costs of a branch plant economy to Ontario, but they do not see that the maritimes suffer from the same kind of colonial status vis-à-vis central Canada, only more severely.

Finally, will the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) use his discretionary power with such alacrity in clearing up unemployment insurance anomalies in the maritimes as he has in helping workers in Windsor, which has three cabinet ministers? I desperately hope I am wrong about this and that, like Saul on the road to Damascus, a miraculous change of character can take place. But it is so much more convenient to maintain the state of dependency with welfare for the region and special crumbs for the party faithful.

Although York-Sunbury is generally more prosperous than most of its neighbouring districts, it has its own forgotten and disadvantaged citizens, as well as unique problems and special opportunities. In York-Sunbury we have Canadian Forces Base Gagetown, the largest army training area in the British Commonwealth. When the Clark government left power the base development plan called for a $40 million training facility to come on-line in 1985. It is important that this facility be moved forward to provide employment for a large number of Canadians who are seeking work in the construction trades. Increased use of the training facilities at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown is a matter of utmost importance to provide more trained soldiers for our armed forces and the very important spin-off for the military town of Oromocto, and, indeed, all of central New Brunswick.

Also in my riding is the University of New Brunswick, one of Canada's most outstanding seats of learning. Since 1973 a great deal of effort and planning has been devoted to the development of a forestry complex which would integrate federal, provincial and university interests related to that subject area in one cohesive set of facilities in our capital city. These efforts have culminated in a conceptual master plan that is in the process of implementation. The provincial government and the university were joined by the Clark government in a commitment to this important complex, and it will be my purpose to keep the federal government reminded of that commitment and urge its implementation.

One of the keys to the creation of a real dynamic for economic expansion in New Brunswick lies right now in the hands of the federal government. The New Brunswick electric power system produces 2,200 megawatts of power. Very shortly a project for the production of thermal power will bring on-line 640 megawatts from the Point Lepreau plant. This is a capital-intensive program and, if the federal government paid the total cost of this plant, the result would see 640 megawatts of very cheap power impacted on the system of 2,200 megawatts. Clearly, the resulting energy cost would be very low and would create a real climate attractive to industrial expansion in New Brunswick. Prince Edward Island is tied to the New Brunswick system by a submarine cable and that province, too, could benefit from such a grant.

Nova Scotia, on the other hand, has a system producing about 1,600 megawatts of electric power and is in the process of developing 300 megawatts of electric power produced by thermal plants at the mouth of the Lingan coal mines. Two other plants producing 300 more megawatts of power are on the drawing board. If the federal government paid the capital cost of these plants, it would confer a similar benefit on Nova Scotia.

The point I am making is that the federal government can reduce the cost of electric energy in the maritime provinces and that there is a direct relationship between the amount of its investment in capital cost and the resulting cost of electric energy to users in the maritime provinces.

I would like to refer briefly to development in the northern part of New Brunswick. The ports of Dalhousie and Belledune are the subject of an ongoing study to determine the future role they should play. I look forward to an early completion of this project because I believe there is an important development role for these ports. On a related matter I support the development of an efficient smelter to process ore and provide good jobs in New Brunswick. Can we expect the government to insist that ore from the Canadian Arctic will be processed here too, instead of in a distant land?

The gateway to commerce and development in the maritime provinces is found in the ports of Saint John and Halifax. These deep-water, year-round ports jut out into the Atlantic Ocean and provide excellent facilities for the largest ships in the world. The full development of these ports can see vessels from all over the world coming here in armadas of profit. Assembly plants will find it advantageous to locate in these two growth centres, and all of the maritime provinces, through a modern transportation system, can share in the prosperity by becoming staging areas for the increased commerce that has always followed port development, like night follows day.

The former minister of public works pledged to propose in his estimates an item for dredging the Miramichi harbour and river. It is there. Will the new government move ahead with dredging the Miramichi, and will it do it without a cost recovery clause, and will the former government's undertaking to repair the Chatham wharf proceed at once as planned?

The serious bread and butter problems which I have laid before you, Mr. Speaker, are within the competence of the Government of Canada to solve and, in arriving at solutions, to lay the foundations for higher standards of living and greater happiness for our country and, indeed, with our country. One province, seized with the despair of the failed attempts of the past, is witnessing its government providing a simple strategy for its residents, and that is to start over again, alone. We must prevent other parts of our country from reaching this level of despair, and we must ensure that the separatists of Quebec do not succeed.

It is not enough to point out the high cost of separatism or, through a brilliant exercise in semantics, to destroy the credibility of their leadership. These will undoubtedly help, but it must also be equally important for us to be prepared to change the status quo and enunciate the benefits of our confederation.

But first, what is the concept of Canada. The most attractive answer to that question was recently given by Premier Richard Hatfield of New Brunswick on March 21, 1980, when he spoke in the legislative assembly of that province. In closing, I would like to share his answer with the House:

> I believe it is that our country is one where peoples who speak one of two languages, and experience and contribute to one of two cultures, can share the pride and responsibilities of one nation and because we attach such importance to our own language and our own culture, and want them protected and enhanced, we respect the language and cultural aspirations of those whose mother language is neither of the two official languages of Canada. Mr. Speaker, for that concept and the political structure that has been designed and proven over the years to sustain that concept, I am prepared to negotiate and to support reforms to the constitution of Canada that will preserve and uphold the dignity and pride of being a Canadian.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to address this House at this time. I would echo the congratulations which many hon. members have expressed to Madam Speaker, a gracious and able person.

I represent the riding of Sault Ste. Marie, one of the northern Ontario ridings. Like most Canadians I am deeply concerned with the coming referendum. Much has been said about the impact of the referendum on French-speaking Canadians inside Quebec, but very little about the impact on those outside Quebec. As a matter of fact Lévesque seems almost indifferent in his speeches to the fact that there are French Canadians outside the province of Quebec living in Canada. To acknowledge this in any detail would perhaps take away from the logic of his grand design. But they exist, and they must be addressed.

In northern Ontario the French Canadian population of certain areas is significant. In Sudbury it is 36 per cent, in Timmins 45 per cent, Elliot Lake 35 per cent, Blind River 27 per cent, Sturgeon Falls 76 per cent, Kapuskasing 60 per cent, Hearst 78 per cent, Smooth Rock Falls 62 per cent, Cochrane 30 per cent, and Iroquois Falls, 51 per cent. Two of the northern Ontario members of Parliament are Francophones, namely, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) and the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier). The economic problems of northern Ontario are almost identical to the economic problems of northern Quebec—unemployment, one-industry towns, mineral exploitation, shrinking forests and isolation.

The hon. member for the riding for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) remarked to me that representing northern Quebec is almost like representing northern Ontario. We in northern Ontario have economic problems in confederation, but we do not feel that the economic solution will be any easier if we are separated. As a matter of fact the economic chaos on top of the existing economic hardships, with more uncertainty in the marketplace, would only cause more problems, not fewer. We need Canada as a whole.

The Franco-Ontarians are concerned. The Association canadienne française de l'Ontario, ACFO, estimates that there were 737,360 Ontario citizens of French origin in 1971. In 1977, ACFO estimated that of the 482,045 who said that French was their mother tongue, only 352,465 said that French language was the language of the home. In other words, in Ontario within one generation there was an assimilation of 26.9 per cent. This is a tragedy, nothing less. They have a right to be concerned. They are an island surrounded by 200 million English-speaking North Americans. There is no chance that English-speaking North Americans will be assimilated, but the reverse is possible.

The Hon. James Chalmers McRuer, in his introduction to his royal commission into civil rights in 1968, said:

> The concept of justice is elusive and developing. It has been the subject of debate throughout the history of religion, philosophy, ethics and social science. The individual, as the philosopher, may be hard put to define and describe the characteristics of justice, but even the humblest citizen may have an acute and often accurate sense of injustice when his rights are adversely affected.

When will the most humble French Canadian feel that there is social and economic justice in Canada? I will tell you when—when, anywhere in Canada, he is entitled to education in French; when, anywhere in Canada, he is able to deal with federal institutions in French and when, anywhere in Canada, he is able to deal with provincial institutions in French. It will be when, anywhere in Canada, he is entitled to be tried in criminal court in French; it will be when, anywhere in Canada, he is entitled to a civil trial in French; it will be when, everywhere in Canada, not just in some provinces, he finds French one of the official languages of each province; and it will be when, everywhere in Canada, he can progress in government and in business to the top because of his ability and not his place of origin.

● (2040)

That is when justice will, in fact, be done and that, Mr. Speaker, is when the humble French Canadian, whom Mr. Justice McRuer talked about, will find it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Irwin: Réal Thérrien, vice-chairman of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, once told me, "A country is not a piece of paper; it is a frame of mind." That definition has remained in my memory. What is the frame of mind of this country right now? I would say confused.

Last week 62 Ontario academics, unionists, clerics and artists said, "A Yes victory could lead to negotiation on the basis of equality between English-speaking Canada and Quebec."

In Saskatchewan, provincial MLAs, men of esteem, Dick Colver and Dennis Ham, have formed a party so that the west can have a vehicle to separate and join the United States of America.

The association culturelle franco-canadienne de la Saskatchewan has endorsed the Yes vote even though they are not in favour of separation.

These events happened in Saskatchewan and Ontario. But every province has had similar events recently. The frame of mind of the country worries me. We can no longer afford the luxury in Ontario of another Penetanguishene French school fiasco. We can no longer in Saskatchewan have only two schools in which more than 80 per cent of the courses are taught in French.

We can no longer turn a polite but deaf ear to the Franco-Manitobans. Time is running out. We are at a crossroad and we either sink or swim together. Simon Fraser, the great British Columbian explorer, wound up with a university named after him, but the other nine paddlers in his canoe were French Canadians! So, Mr. Speaker, it might be more appropriate to say that today we either sink or paddle together!

In this large country of ours there is a great need to know more about each other. I think the federal government must be much more positive in the field of communication. A. W. Johnson, the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, has made some excellent suggestions in his document, "Touchstone for the CBC." He writes:

> It is as important for Quebeckers as it is for Nova Scotians to be sensitive to, and aware of, Canadian folk heroes from any part of the country, Canadian mythologies, major political arguments in British Columbia or Newfoundland, the issues in the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, or the prairie drought.

He continues:

> Much greater use must be made for instance of French network correspondents throughout Canada.

He feels that French Canadian regions outside Quebec must have more locally produced news of their own communities. He says that we must develop programs popularizing Canadian folk heroes. He says:

The French network must accelerate its examination of others such as Champlain or La Verendrye, Alexander Mackenzie, or Banting, or events which have jolted our national history such as Batoche, Lundy's Lane, The Klondike, Leduc, the Plains of Abraham, the Battles of Louisbourg, and Lake George and Champlain.

He states that we must:

Search for younger Francophone writers and directors and those not only in Montreal but throughout all Quebec and other Francophone communities in Canada.

We must embrace, as a government, these positions. The problem that the CBC has is funding. We do not need change the British North America Act to provide that funding. We have the power. What we lack is the will. I suggest that when the CBC budget is up for review we increase it, specifically for the matters I am discussing, as espoused by Mr. Johnson, and that the CBC be directed to do exactly what he has set forth in the document. This is a positive step. This is the frame of mind that will give us a sense of country.

These are general goals of the CBC. In New Brunswick there is a more immediate goal that must be achieved. In Campbellton and Moncton, New Brunswick, many young Acadians have clearly sent us a message. At the moment the French programming in northern New Brunswick comes from Quebec. The Acadians feel that they have a distinct culture of their own. And they are right. They object to more U.S. signals coming into New Brunswick without first addressing their concerns. They feel, and have forcibly said so, that a signal in their own language must emanate, not from Quebec, but from New Brunswick. The CBC agrees and, I understand, is in negotiations with the relevant Carleton station in the Gaspé, and a Moncton entrepreneur. The over-all result could mean original programming emanating from Moncton. That is the way it should be. This is important to the Acadians, and again, this House needs no constitutional change to effect the aspirations of the Acadians.

The funds should be made available to the CBC, again on direction that the job be done. There is a certain irony here. If the provinces had had the control of broadcasting that they appear to want, I am certain that there would be no French CBC services on the basic service in at least three provinces. I am also certain that there would not have been the effort to establish French originating programming in certain provinces and regions that the CBC has attempted to do.

It is the federal government, through the CBC, that has set these goals. Generally these goals have been supported, not only by the government but by all members of this House. We should be proud of those positions, and at the same time press forward through adequate funding. Rhetoric will not solve the problems. The CBC needs the tools.

How do we reach Quebeckers? How do we convey our concern? How do we tell them that, as Canadians, they are our brothers? When Gilles Vigneault wrote:

Mon pays, ce n'est pas un pays, c'est l'hiver.

I can visualize his country because it is mine too. And when he writes:

Mon jardin ce n'est pas un jardin, c'est la plaine.

I know what he is talking about, as when he writes:

Mon chemin, ce n'est pas un chemin, c'est la neige.

Is there a difference in our homeland in northern Ontario and northern Quebec?

Mon pays, ce n'est pas un pays, c'est l'hiver.

I am not ashamed to tell you that the first time I heard this song sung in northern Ontario, I was deeply moved. A Quebecker in four short sentences touched the essence of my country. Vigneault goes on to write:

Ma maison, c'est votre maison.

Well, to Quebeckers, northern Ontario is your home too.

Is not the film maker, Claude Jutras, or the painter, Pelland, or the writer, Felix-Antoine Savard, as much a part of Canada as Quebec? Because Gabrielle Roy is from Manitoba, does she not write for all of us when she describes northern Quebec or the Inuit?

I do not understand Mr. Lévesque. I once called him a martyr; I once said he was a patriot, but I no longer understand him. I have tried to, but I cannot. How can one pull out a tooth and grow a new one? How can one sever an arm and replace it? How can an arm sever a head and then say, "See how much better off the body is now that I have my head in my hand?"

We in the federal Parliament do not own Canada. We are merely managers as elected from time to time. We have nothing to give, in the sense that it belongs to us. It does not. What we manage already belongs to all the citizens of Canada, including the citizens of Quebec. If anything is taken, it will only be taken from oneself to give to oneself, not necessarily in the same condition.

I would like to say this, Mr. Speaker:

[Translation]

I want to tell you that for a period of three years I had the privilege of travelling this country from coast to coast with the CRTC. More than ever I am now convinced that without French Canadians there would be no Canada today and I am not referring only to Quebec.

[English]

I am not only talking about Quebec, I am talking about Bathurst, Moncton, Kapuskasing, Sudbury, St. Boniface, and right across this land.

I can only say that within my power as a member of Parliament—

[Translation]

—so long as I am a member of this House, no French Canadian will ever be denied his rights in any province of Canada.

[English]

There will be times when it will be difficult, but it will be done. It must be done. We as Canadians, all of us in this chamber, will do it. And we as Canadians, throughout this abundant land of ours, will endure.

Our Canada will be our children's Canada and their children's Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2050)

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to convey my congratulations to Madam Speaker on her elevation to this high office as Speaker of the House. I would also like to congratulate you, sir, on your appointment as Acting Speaker. These positions that you and Madam Speaker hold are very important. I know that Madam Speaker as well as the Deputy Speaker and the Acting Speakers will grow in their jobs and in their experience.

I represent the riding of Nanaimo-Alberni which is located on the west coast of Vancouver Island comprising a midsection of the island, including the west coast and the east coast of Vancouver Island. The riding was previously represented by a very well-known Canadian, Mr. T. C. Douglas. I have often been asked how it feels to follow in the footsteps of Tommy Douglas, but I do not think I can really answer that question. I do not think I am following in his footsteps any more than many other people in Canada are doing in terms of the leadership he has shown in economic and social issues. I know that the people of Nanaimo-Alberni and Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, which was his riding before redistribution, are proud of Tommy and are proud that his riding is now represented by two members of the NDP, myself, and in the southern half of the riding by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly).

Before I pursue an issue in which I am particularly interested in my role as the New Democratic Party fisheries critic, I will take a few moments to describe my riding. It is a riding of which I am very fond and very proud. I do not particularly want to expand on the virtues of Nanaimo-Alberni all that much, because there are those who really do not want too many more people coming to the riding to live, to bring with them the kinds of problems that overpopulation may bring. It would also lessen my opportunity to represent both sides of the island because of its bigger population.

Nanaimo was built as a coal mining town starting in the 1850s. It got its start through coal, and it looks as though coal is going to be an important aspect of Nanaimo again.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Coal is king.

Mr. Miller: Yes, coal is king. Unfortunately for the 1850s and possibly the 1980s it looks as though coal will be shipped out and with it the jobs associated with the manufacture of steel products. The coal resource leases on Vancouver Island are apparently being purchased by oil companies. These are companies that have made profits in oil and are now looking for other resources to exploit and thus gain control of those energy resources, keeping the control of them away from the hands of the Canadian public.

There is a very important lumber, fishing and shipping terminal in Nanaimo. It is a wealthy productive town and shares with Port Alberni the distinction of being a very large and important west coast port for the lumber industry. There are over 6,000 woodworkers in the city of Port Alberni and the surrounding area. It is also an important fishing community, being a west coast port with a sheltered harbour and facilities for fishermen, recreational vessels and deep sea vessels.

On the west coast, communities called Ucluelet and Tofino, and many native Indian reserves share one of the most beautiful areas in all of Canada, that is, the west coast and Pacific Rim Park. Last year this area attracted 750,000 tourists to those two small communities on the west coast. These numbers are expected to increase this year. The riding is well represented and well financed through fishing, lumber and the tourist industry. It also has a large and growing small business community which is at the moment struggling under the burden of high interest rates and the experience of two consecutive governments which have been unable to alleviate the pains that high interest rates are causing to the people.

In my riding fishing is the area that is now of most concern in B.C. One must not forget the forest industry nor the fact that the two do not often go hand in hand. There are a lot of accusations that logging practices in B.C. have destroyed many of the natural producing streams for pacific salmon. I think that is a justifiable criticism of the forest industry. It is a lack of co-ordination of activities between the fishing industry and the forest industry. But, given the right kind of determination and programs, this co-ordination could be brought about.

Canada has a bright future in the fishing industry. We are all aware that Canada has adopted a 200-mile economic zone off our coasts, and that 200-mile zone gives us control over the management of the stocks. This is particularly so on the east coast of Canada where we have seen an increase in the cod stocks, hopefully back to the record periods. Estimates are that by 1985 we will have doubled the productivity in the cod stocks on the east coast of Canada.

The expectations of that have brought to the east coast fisherman an influx into the industry, and are probably causing a situation where we have too many fishermen chasing what will always be too few fish.

On the west coast, expectations in the fishing industry are also high. They are not so much because of the 200-mile economic zone because we are not fortunate enough to have a large continental shelf and the productivity this demonstrates in the eastern provinces. But in B.C. we have a very lucrative fish, namely, the Pacific salmon. This species is much demanded in Japan, the United States, and in Europe.

In 1977 we also implemented under the present minister the salmon enhancement program. The expectations of the program are that we will be able to produce by the year 2007 190 million more salmon per year than we are doing right now. That productivity is entirely possible if this resource is managed properly. However, if it is managed the way it has been managed recently, it will not be attained.

I would now like to deal with some of the problems I see in Canada getting to the position to meet the expectations fishermen and the general public have at the moment.

The salmon enhancement hatchery program initially was to be in its first phase a five-year program. This was at a cost of $150 million. But because of government restraint and other political factors, I would suggest, the program has been expanded to a first phase of seven years. We are now in the position where we are looking at phase two and what can be accomplished in the phase two program. On the one hand, Canadians should not be expected, however, to be putting money into one program to raise salmon and, on the other hand, to be abusing that resource. But that is what we are doing in British Columbia.

An example in my own riding is the Big Qualicum River Hatchery. This is a demonstration hatchery. The Department of Fisheries is very proud to bring Japanese and American visitors to show off the hatchery. This has been very successful. Student tour groups are paraded through the hatchery regularly. The hatchery flows from a pristine lake, a deep cool water lake, in which the department has built three intake valves so it can adjust the temperature of the water in the river. This allows for proper incubation in the spawning channels and in the hatchery throughout the year. The river is completely controlled in terms of its temperature, water control, and its level. It produces 40 million to 50 million chum fry a year, one million chinook fry, and three million coho fry for the commercial fishery in the Strait of Georgia and the sports fishery there.

● (2100)

Recently the land on either side of that river has been purchased by developers and logged right down to the river, resulting in silting and degradation of that hatchery to the point where, as a result, we are not going to reach the limit of its productivity.

An hon. Member: Sounds like Liberal management.

Mr. Miller: The fisheries department had the opportunity of purchasing the property in the area of the hatchery. The comment was made, "we are not in the practice, and we are not in the business of real estate." I suggest that maybe they are not in the business of protecting their own hatcheries and maybe they are not in the business of raising salmon. Coming after the logging operation is a subdivision proposal. We are jeopardizing a $4½ million project for the sake of subdivision, logging, and further development.

Riley Creek on the Queen Charlotte Islands is another example of how governments and their departments ignore potential hazards to the salmon industry. With regard to logging on deep slopes, a warning was given by one of the fisheries officers. In fact the fisheries officer, recognizing the damage possible from those steep slopes and slumping, slipping in, etc., actually laid charges against loggers and logging companies. My party objects to individual loggers being charged, loggers being told to go into an area and log and cut. We were certainly in favour of charges being laid as an example to logging companies to protect salmon spawning streams.

The fisheries officer was not backed up by the justice department. Consequently he quit his job. Subsequent to those charges being laid, there was indeed, flooding, slumping and blocking of that creek. We are destroying our creeks and rivers in British Columbia through poor management of the logging industry, through neglect in our municipal wastes and industrial wastes, yet the Canadian public is putting $150 million into salmon enhancement projects.

We are going ahead with hydroelectric dams in Canada that are destroying spawning streams and the runs of salmon. We are looking at the Garrison diversion which is going to jeopardize our inland fishery, a fishery that also has an exciting future in lake fertilization and new innovative techniques to raise more fish in our inland waters and provide more economic benefit to the prairie provinces.

What else are we doing in Canada? We are destroying our lakes in Ontario and Quebec through acid rain, with permission to industry to destroy our natural environment, destroy the habitat that our fish resources must have in order to meet their growth patterns.

The Atlantic coast is an extremely exciting possibility. My colleague, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie), made mention of a new program the Conservative government brought in for renewal of the fleet in the Atlantic provinces. I agree with him. It is a good program. It is required; it is necessary. However, I caution those people who feel we can get into a new fleet immediately in the fishing industry on the east coast without doing some planning.

On the west coast of British Columbia we now have a fleet that is four or five times larger than it needs to be in order to catch the available fish. That simply dissipates the income from the resource. In the case of this year where we have lower returns on all five species of salmon, it is going to result in bankruptcy to many fishermen who met the expectations that the minister, the public and, I suspect, the department felt for western Canada. The same kind of expectations are held on the east coast. I caution the minister before going into a huge new fleet on that coast that he table in this House a fleet development plan which will indicate what kind of fleet we require to meet the growing demands in the world markets for a better quality fish.

I attended the Fisheries Council of Canada meetings in Montreal just last week. The key to Canadian success in developing world markets for salmon, cod and other ground species is going to be quality. For too long Canadians have been able to sell their product to, maybe, undiscerning consumers. We are now having to expand our markets to Europe, Scandinavian communities, and other nations that are used to eating fish and know good quality.

The Fisheries Council of Canada have recognized that their obligation is to develop better methods of preserving, processing and shipping the product that they hope to sell on world markets. It is going to require very careful planning from the ship stage to the shipment stage, through the processing of our products right through to the sale on foreign markets.

The challenge to this government, this House and the fishing industry is very clear. We have to protect our environment in which those resources grow. We have to develop better techniques in fishing, preserving, and marketing. It is a tough challenge for Canada because other nations are competing for the same markets.

In closing, that kind of a challenge can be shared in almost every department of government. Certainly the challenge is something that all Canadians need. Canadians at this time are about to witness in Quebec a vote on sovereignty-association, separatism, a renewed confederation or a new federation. That is the challenge that we all need.

As a member as far away as any other member from Quebec where the referendum will be held on May 20, I want to say on behalf of my constituents that we all have some concerns about Canada. We all have things we would like to see. We would like to develop a national pride, a national goal, and a national determination. We in Nanaimo-Alberni encourage governments and the public to meet the challenge of a new Canada, a Canada of which we can feel proud, a Canada in which we feel some national pride, a Canada, and this is one of my particular interests, that sees a Canadian merchant fleet and Canadians travelling around the world flying their own flag and shipping their own products.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, first let me, as other members of this House have done, congratulate you on your appointment to this very important post and, through you, to congratulate Madam Speaker——and I am very proud, just as any Quebecker, of the role she is going to play in the House of Commons.

Tonight, Mr. Speaker, it is as the new President of the Treasury Board that I take part in this debate in order to bring some clarifications on certain important themes of the Speech from the Throne, and to make known some of my personal objectives, interests, convictions and priorities.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that, in accordance with the ritual we follow, the next speaker should be a Progressive Conservative member, and my hon. friend was on his feet. That is the schedule to which we agreed the other day and that is what we have been following.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I want to respect the intervention by the hon. member. As he probably knows, the Chair is made aware in various ways and from time to time of members who might catch the Speaker's eye. While it is certainly not officially the habit of the Chair to keep any particular list, I have tended to follow that recognition of speakers that appears to me to be consistent with the views of the various members of the House. In any event, I did not see a member to my left stand on this occasion—I may have made a mistake this time; I am not sure. But if I did, it happens that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) caught the eye of the Chair and, once having done so, that hon. member remains recognized. I will review my thinking and see whether or not some hon. member to my left has been displaced. If that is the case, the situation will be adjusted.

Mr. Johnston: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I promise to keep my comments short so as to give the hon. member ample time in which to speak this evening.

● (2110)

[Translation]

To summarize, I shall say that in the part of the throne speech which deals with the development of our economic potential, there is the following statement:

> It is the intention of my ministers to continue the policies of expenditure restraint and improved government administration.

The throne speech is right to make government administration part of our economic development. Let me explain why. If we want to reduce expenditures it is not because it would be wrong for the government to spend, but because we are asking Canadians to limit their expectations and demands. It is, therefore, essential for the government to do the same. We want to improve our government administration not only to save money, but because while we are asking Canadians to increase their productivity, the government administration must do the same. We want to reduce the deficit, not because of the magic of higher or lower figures, but because our deficits make it necessary for us to compete on financial markets, and because we realize that the costs of such deficits result in a heavier burden.

[English]

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my comments today, together with my past public statements and writings, will help those who inevitably pigeon-hole and caricature ministers, especially presidents of the treasury board. I want you to know, Mr. Speaker, that I am not a secret holdover from the previous Tory government, neither am I a "blue Liberal" nor a "closet slasher". As a Liberal of the radical centre I am continuing the strong tradition of responsible government management of my Liberal colleagues at Treasury Board, namely, Judd Buchanan, Bob Andras, Jean Chrétien, and Bud Drury.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thought this minister could do better than that!

Mr. Knowles: He is not ambitious!

Mr. Johnston: The formal commitment of the Liberal party to expenditure restraint, renewed in the Speech from the Throne, dates from 1975. It has been repeated several times in the ensuing years and, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in August, 1978, we must provide "more for less".

Restraint remains our commitment, but we must also recognize that inflation adds some cost to government which simply must be met. For example, are we to de-index old age benefits? I say, and the Liberals say, no! Are we to cut essential welfare programs to meet the temporary cost of higher interest charges on our public debt? Again, the Liberals say, and I say, no!

Another example is the emphasis we place on investment in the energy sector and on rail systems and port facilities—investments which society must make for future generations. Bear in mind that even such productive capital investments as these add to the deficit, because in Canada's accounts they are not capitalized as they would be by businesses or by individuals.

Before I comment on my principal goal of more effective and efficient government management, let me put the costs of government into perspective. Contrary to widespread belief, the costs of the federal government itself are a relatively small and diminishing part of the total costs of government. Subsidies and government transfers to individuals, other levels of government or businesses, made up 52.2 per cent of government costs in 1979-80. Public debt accounted for 16.5 per cent; defence for 8.6 per cent, and payments to Crown corporations made up 3.1 per cent. The cost of all other programs and agencies, including Parliament, amounts to less than 20 per cent of our expenditures. While I am determined to control these costs, I have no illusions that I can make sufficient savings through improved government management to eliminate the deficit. Efficiency can help, but, ultimately, to reduce the deficit we must either cut programs or we must increase revenues.

Let me move briefly to a central theme: the importance of adopting a sensible and strategic policy of restraint without making a fetish of the numbers. Such a policy has three main elements—first, to manage government well so that the direct costs of government at least do not grow in real terms and, hopefully, will be significantly reduced; second, to ensure that expenditures on social programs are focused primarily on helping those who are least able to help themselves and that expenditures on economic programs are focused primarily on investments which will promote economic growth, develop our economic potential and thereby increase our revenue base; third, rigorously to evaluate all programs from time to time to ensure that they are meeting their objectives and are being well administered.

In this three-part strategy, restraint is a goal, but not a goal in itself. Emphasis must be placed on the most effective and equitable use of our scarce resources. But we must not shy away from a good investment, one which will support economic growth and contribute to government revenues, just because it adds to the expenditure side of the column. No well-run business would do that, nor should our government.

I would like, but I do not think time will permit, to describe the new expenditure management system which we are putting into effect, so I shall leave those comments for a future date. However, there is one absolutely key area of management to which I must make reference tonight, it is so often overlooked, that is, the management of human resources in government. The government is currently reviewing a number of policies in this regard and I hope to be in a position to announce some of the government's conclusions in the very near future. I am particularly concerned that we review, update, and expand our policy for training employees—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: —especially to assist with the retraining of any employees whose positions are declared surplus. It is not the policy of this government to set arbitrary targets for the reduction of the public service. The size of the public service has been under control for several years and has been declining in numbers for the past two. It is our policy to have the leanest and most efficient public service, to evaluate each program and ensure that it is well administered, but we are not committed to reduction targets as such.

I have been particularly heartened to encounter in the public service of our country dedicated, competent, and responsible people who share my objective of good management and my determination to achieve it.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: In government management we should be willing to accept nothing short of excellence.

[Translation]

In spite of my considerable responsibilities, Mr. Speaker, as President of the Treasury Board my main interest at present is the future of my country without which those other matters would be irrelevant. The economic potential of Canada is far greater than the entire potential of regions.

Last week I had the great pleasure of going to Victoria and Vancouver in British Columbia. During exchanges of views with representatives of the federal government and businessmen, I was struck by the level of optimism and enthusiasm about the economic future of that area of the country. Well, needless to say the natural resources of western provinces will no doubt guarantee a very promising future not only for that area of the country, but for all of Canada.

We are sometimes inclined, Mr. Speaker, to forget that basic character of our federal system. If we must travel to western Canada to realize fully its beauty, it remains that its wealth can be ascribed to our national tax structure, that is the cornerstone of our federal system. Whether we live in a city like Kamloops in British Columbia or in Trois-Rivières in my own province, we derive substantial benefits from that wealth.

Laurier stated that the twentieth century belonged to Canada. He was right, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to prosperity, freedom, beauty, economic potential, Canada still ranks amongst the most fortunate countries in the world. Laurier was not referring to Quebec, Ontario, the western provinces or the Atlantic provinces, but to Canada as a whole. He always understood the enormous potential of a united Canada.

We are now nearing the end of the century. From what I see across Canada, the next century will also be ours as long as Canada remains united. Only our federal system could give us that opportunity. Mr. Lévesque uses every chance he gets to attack our federal system. He likes to blacken the picture. It is a considerable challenge as Canada is the envy of the whole world. Consequently, he cannot do so without distorting the facts and he does that systematically. Mr. Lévesque is urging us to turn our backs on Canada, to give up that enormous wealth that is ours, that Canadian heritage, he would like to take away from us our Canadian citizenship as well as all the security, protection and pride it gives us.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, those who support the No side and those who support the Yes side know full well that separation can only lead to negative economic consequences. Knowing full well those consequences and those enormous sacrifices, many of my Quebec friends are going to vote Yes.

Why, Mr. Speaker, should English-speaking Quebeckers not accept those same inevitable sacrifices? They have already accepted the Frenchification of Quebec society, often with enthusiasm, because they realize the advantages of speaking two languages, two among the most important in the world, and French probably the most beautiful, except maybe, Mr. Speaker, when I am speaking it. However, I do not apologize, I did not have the opportunity I am now giving my four daughters who are studying in French schools.

But why do they want to turn their backs not only on the Canadian territory but also on French-speaking Canadians living outside Quebec? And why, Mr. Speaker, do I and other Quebeckers, including my friends sitting on the government benches, why do we reject the PQ option? Why, in face of the same circumstances, the same facts, do we believe in the future of a united and strong Canada? Because, Mr. Speaker, we feel at home everywhere in Canada, our English-speaking fellow citizens are welcome everywhere we have relatives across the country—in my case, my father in British Columbia and my mother-in-law in Nova Scotia.

The whole country belongs to us and we are very aware of that. I would like it to be the same with all my French-speaking friends. However, that is not so. They feel at home in Quebec, but there are still obstacles elsewhere. Unfortunately, there are still some prejudices. I think they are one of the main reason why people will vote Yes. Yet, despite those prejudices, despite the criticisms voiced by our Commissioner of Official Languages, we have witnessed in Canada some profound changes in the last ten years. See what is happening in Quebec; a Frenchification of society and the acceptance of this phenomenon by the English community. Even outside Quebec, it is astonishing.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I like what I see across Canada as far as these changes of attitude and this acceptance of the Canadian reality are concerned, in other words the coexistence of two linguistic groups. Mr. Speaker, a rose by any other name is still a rose and it is not a new constitutional arrangement that is going to lead to a renewed federation but rather these progressive changes of attitude. These changes of attitude are well started and as the saying goes, all is well that ends well. Mr. Speaker, I ask you to consider that Canada's language glass is half full, not half empty, and I will fight with my colleagues to fill it.

[English]

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to please note that I am now standing in my place. May I begin, too, by congratulating Mr. Deputy Speaker on his appointment and by asking you to pass on to Madam Speaker my congratulations on her election to the distinguished office of Speaker of this House. I wish for her, as other colleagues in the House do, a long term marked with honour and distinction.

This is the second time in far too short a period of time that the people of St. Catharines have elected me to bring to this Parliament their concerns. I am grateful for that opportunity, and very honoured. I want to thank those constituents who made it possible, but also I would like to thank all the constituents in St. Catharines and assure them that, no matter what political persuasion they might be, as their member I am here to speak for St. Catharines.

While I do not wish to enunciate all those positive things which make St. Catharines such a great community, it is important to give some of the local background so that I might enunciate the real problems with which they are confronted. Nor do I intend tonight to reiterate the concerns put forward so well by so many of my colleagues in this House, as they concern themselves and worry about the Canada of tomorrow and the forces which tend to pull us apart. But I want to tell the people in this House and the people of Canada that the community of St. Catharines and of old Niagara are as chauvinistic in their Canadianism as they are anywhere else in this country.

In many ways my constituency is a favoured one. Situated in the banana belt of the Niagara Peninsula and surrounded as it is by vineyards and fruitlands, it is known as the "Garden City". With a delightful climate and more parkland than any other community of its equivalent size, indeed it is a beautiful place in which to live. As a consequence many of our senior persons tend to come to our home area and there take up their residence. Not surprisingly, the Financial Post in a very recent edition showed that St. Catharines citizens are second only to Victoria in their satisfaction of their city, in all of Canada. This satisfaction stems not only from the abundance of parkland, but it is an active integrated community rich in cultural activities. At this time I would have to say that our Folk Arts Council, comprised of some 33 groups of different national backgrounds, represents the cosmopolitan mix which we have in our peninsula. The Folk Arts Festival which is just about to start in the month of May draws thousands of people from Ontario, Canada, and indeed across the border from the United States of America.

St. Catharines played a far greater role in the early history of Canada than most people realize. It had its beginnings in 1790 when the United Empire Loyalists found refuge and a future in that area. One of those early Loyalist settlers was a man of great vision, William Hamilton Merritt. He single-handedly spearheaded one of the most ambitious early Canadian enterprises, the Welland Canal system. We have just finished celebrating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of this great waterway to which is owed so much of Ontario's, of our own, and indeed of Canada's economic development. St. Catharines has sometimes been known as a city which canals have built. Today ships from 75 different countries transport goods to and from the interior of our country through the heart of the city, through the Welland Canal system.

Shipbuilding and drydock repair were natural offshoots of this early canal activity and are to this day. Today 5,000 workers in the Niagara region are employed in jobs directly related to the marine industry, working aboard ship, at the Port Weller drydocks, and on the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority in the operation of the Welland Canal itself. With the longest coastline in the world, fronting as it does on three of the world's oceans, and with the longest most utilized deepsea waterway, Canada is most dependent upon marine transport. No one will deny that marine transport is the most efficient transportation mode for bulk cargoes. For many decades the marine policies of this country have failed to reflect this fact, and our fishing, shipping and shipbuilding industries have suffered accordingly.

During its short term in office, the Conservative government made a strong commitment to the restoration of a Canadian merchant marine fleet. An extensive study was carried out and a report was about to be presented to cabinet for approval just at the time the election was called. With the world's greatest inland waterway available to us and with access to all of the ports of the world, the people of my area continue to wonder why Liberal governments, past and present, over the years continue to sell our natural resources in bulk on a pick-up and carry basis. The opportunities for the marine industry, as well as the technological spinoff therefrom, will inevitably be lost to the Canadian economy with the continuation of this government's reluctance to support a strong marine industry.

While it is said that tolls on the Seaway have not been increased in its 20 years of operation until three years ago, the proposal of a 100 per cent increase over three years is already having a user deterrent effect. Already significant traffic diversions are being made away from the Seaway route, and any increase in tolls is bound to accelerate that trend. History has shown that Seaway toll increases are accompanied by a loss of general tax revenue, if they are and as they are, assessed against Canadian corporations.

But the major basis of our economy in St. Catharines is the automobile. Once 9,000 of my constituents worked for General Motors, our largest employer. The balance of the auto trade in our city is made up of parts manufacturing which in better times employed a further 3,000 persons. As we all know, the whole industry is in trouble both on our side and in the United States of America. Market planners made a grave error in failing to predict rising oil costs and buyer resistance to the large automobile, and now they are caught.

St. Catharines is fortunate in being a General Motors town, as the marketing of General Motors has been more effective than that of its other major competitors. It has progressively attracted a larger portion of the motor vehicle market. General Motors will be revamping its St. Catharines facilities in 1981 to provide component parts for a front-wheel drive small engine automobile in order to meet the shift in consumer demand, but that will be in 1981. There will be, then, even if only temporary, extensive lay-offs in our community while this change is taking place.

In the short term our automobile parts manufacturers will experience setbacks as most are still involved in the production of parts for larger automobiles. Some of these manufacturers supply Chrysler and so are doubly affected by the events of the last while. These manufacturers are looking for further improvements in the automobile trade pact and are crying out, as is the whole industry, for more government assistance to carry on research and development.

Research and development should be a key priority in the government's approach to the economic development of this country, and in no area is this more important than in the automobile industry today. It is well known that research and development are most effective when industry and universities work together. In St. Catharines we have that ideal working situation with General Motors, auto parts manufacturers and Brock University within a few miles of one another. To date Brock, which has a great interest in the industry, has been receiving very little in the way of grants or promotions.

General Motors pointed out to me the other day that, whereas between 50 per cent and 90 per cent of auto industry research and development in other countries, such as the U.S.A., France, Great Britain and Japan, is provided by their governments, our federal government funds only about 12 per cent.

The next ten to 20 years are going to be the crucial ones in terms of dramatic technological change in the automotive industry, and if Canada is to have a stake in the future of this industry it must act now and quickly. Studies have already indicated that other forms of energy, such as ethynol and methynol, which are based on feedstocks and on the forest resources with which Canada is so richly blessed, can be economically viable. The technical changes to our present automobile engine would be relatively minor, so conversion to these fuels could be made with a minimum of hardship to the automotive industry and to its workers. With our manpower, our energy resources and our industrial capabilities, there is no reason Canada should continue to see its future role in the world automotive trade as one of simply assembling American automobiles.

If I may digress a little further on this one important topic, I would like to mention that our already high unemployment rate, now approaching 15 per cent, is further aggravated by the lack of specifically trained workers not only in the automobile industry but in the marine industry as well. Both are continually seeking in Europe the highly-skilled workers needed to carry out certain specific technical functions. I find it odd that we should be recruiting overseas in times of such high unemployment at home. Surely we should be training the young people and upgrading middle age workers through apprenticeship programs to meet the needs of our developing technologies. Surely we should be anticipating the future needs of these industries. This kind of training was one important focus of the Conservatives' youth employment program outlined in the former minister of finance's budget. Niagara College, our local community college, is ready, available and just seeking government assistance and community support to enter into such a training program.

I have already mentioned the city of St. Catharines as being the "Garden City" of Canada. This is partly due to the fact that our city is surrounded by the most productive fruit and grape growing lands in the whole of Canada. As a result of the importation of different vine strains from Europe, grape growers have greatly improved the quality of our local grapes, and the wine industry is assuming increasing importance in our region. Typically, however, the improved wines have been making greater headway in foreign markets than they have right here in this country where the old Canadian adage "if it is imported, it must be better" still prevails.

The delighted reaction to our wines at a wine tasting reception held here on the Hill last fall was ample proof that we do not have to beg Canadians humbly to "buy Canadian"; we simply have to convince them to "try Canadian", and our work will be done. Three years ago there was not one Canadian wine on the top ten best sellers list in Canada. Today I am proud to say that two of the five top best sellers here in Canada are Canadian wines.

The fruitlands surrounding our area have proved to be a mixed blessing to our municipality. Efforts to preserve this productive land have been put to severe restraints by the urban growth and development of St. Catharines. Therefore, existing industries are not being expanded and new industries are being established elsewhere. The young, seeing little employment future locally, are leaving their home communities to find work elsewhere.

We have in St. Catharines a community of conflicts: the second most satisfied city dwellers of Canada, and a declining growth rate; a city with a well above average standard of living and one of the highest unemployment rates in Canada; and a community with great industrial potential and an actual no-growth local economy. You see, Mr. Speaker, by a funny twist of fate the wealth of our region, which attracted so many originally, is now working against its growth and prosperity.

It is easy for others in Ontario and elsewhere to speak out for the importance of the preservation of our fruitlands. We too believe this is important. This government must play an active, positive role if it wishes to preserve these fruitlands against the pressures of urban growth and development.

I feel that by the election of the Conservative party last May the people of Canada expressed their concerns about the economic dilemma in which Canada found itself at that time. When the minister of finance of that government presented his budget to Parliament last December, he did so knowing that a combined program of government fiscal restraint and long-term energy planning was the only way out of this dilemma. He knew that the government and the economy would be increasingly paralysed if the $11 billion budgetary deficit were not controlled and reduced. He knew that without a long-term energy policy the $9 million per day which the Canadian government was paying to subsidize oil could, under OPEC control and in the light of known Canadian oil sources, only increase dramatically. He knew that inflation must be curbed at all costs, even if the short-term cost meant a higher rate of interest.

That budget did not, however, forget those who would be hardest hit by the immediate impact of these measures; the mortgage holder, the small businessman, the farmer, the fisherman, and families with incomes less that $21,000.

If the Speech from the Throne and the mini-budget shortly following it are any indication, and they should be, it seems we can expect very much of the same kind of short-term policies, with no concrete plan of attack to begin reducing the national deficit, and no long-term energy policy to ensure Canada's energy future. For the most part the government offers only vague solutions to some problems, and measures intended to cushion Canadians from the impact of others which they feel are too tough to face—today, that is.

Nowhere is this more evident than in the government's proposal for an all new, all Canadian blended oil price. All this jargon means is that instead of paying for the oil increase at the gas pumps, Canadians will be paying it in their taxes.

What worries me is that if the real cost of oil does not hurt the Canadian's pocketbook at the gas pump, Canadians who are the greatest consumers of energy in the world will be encouraged to go on wasting imported and domestic oil.

What the government should be doing is providing policies and incentives to industry to develop quickly not only fuel efficient cars, as I mentioned before, but actual new types of fuel and corresponding engines.

Before closing I would like to touch on a very vital area, an area which was absolutely excluded from the throne speech. I have in mind the question of the environment. There are two environmental issues of particular concern to the St. Catharines region. One is the effects of acid rain; the other is the continuing pollution of the Niagara River.

Solutions to both problems are made more difficult by reason of our proximity to the United States. That great industrial segment of the U.S. is just over the river and across the lakes from us, and control on an international basis is a complicated matter, indeed. The former minister responsible for the environment considered acid rain one of the priorities of his ministry, and initiated the first international air pollution agreement with the United States late last year. I trust that this issue will be accorded the same importance by the new government and that no precious time is lost due to the change in government.

● (2150)

The pollution of the Niagara River continues to be a matter of real irritation to many on both sides of the river. Just recently we went through the troublesome time of granting a permit to a corporation in upper New York state, and yet this corporation would discharge its treated industrial waste into the river. It is my opinion that, although there must be at all times stringent controls on such programs as SCAs, such projects divert attention from other major fouling sources. Millions of gallons of waste, subject only to primary treatment, are being discharged daily into the Niagara River by riverside municipalities as well as by local industry. If as much zest were applied to the cleaning up of these sources as has been applied in controlling SCAs contribution, we would greatly improve the present condition of the Niagara River. Action against these older pollutants must be taken.

This is a crucial time in our country's history, Mr. Speaker. We are heavily in debt. We are in the grips of an unprecedented rate of inflation. We are heavily dependent on other countries for our technology and for our capital. We are lacking any kind of clear energy policy for our future. We are divided socially, and we are fragmented politically. If ever there were a time when this country needed strong, reliable leadership, it is now. The problems of this nation have been long identified.

The Liberal government now has the majority it needs to get on with the job. For the sake of our country's future, let there be no further delays and let there be no further misunderstanding at home or abroad.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as you know, according to the House order the allotted time for a speech is 20 minutes. The hon. member has not finished, but I understand that you, sir, are adhering strictly to that rule. I regret that the hon. member did not get a chance to finish his remarks.

This is the first time I have had an opportunity to address the chamber in a formal way in this Parliament, other than on points of order dealing with House business. It gives me great pleasure to talk on the seventh day of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mrs. Côté), and the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith). To you, Mr. Speaker, and to your cohorts in the Speaker's chair, I wish you every best wish and success for this parliamentary term.

I would like to associate myself with the words spoken this evening by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin), who spoke about the emotional commitment that people have toward keeping this country together. In particular, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie gave a perspective from my province of Ontario. I would like to associate myself in particular with those emotional sentiments that he put forth.

However, I want to take more of a hard-nosed and practical look at what the referendum means to people in Ontario. There have been articles in various newspapers saying that Ontario is asleep, that English Canada is asleep and is not really paying too much attention to what is going on in Quebec. That could not be farther from the truth. In my constituency office on Saturdays I meet with people, as do all hon. members. Many of them have indicated to me that there is a genuine disquiet, an anxiety on the part of the people in metropolitan Toronto, and I am sure it is throughout the rest of the province of Ontario, as to what will be the outcome of the vote next Tuesday.

There are definite feelings. Perhaps people are not writing letters to newspaper editors or they are not making a lot of noise, but they are in deep thought about the ramifications this vote will have for the future and integrity of the country. As a member from Ontario I would like to talk about Ontario's role after the referendum, no matter how the question turns out. I believe, according to the recent indications of support which seem to be gathering, that the No forces will win.

But what will happen after the referendum is of crucial importance to this country. Ontario has had too much of its own way for too long. We have been called the fat cat of confederation, the engine of confederation, or the one who has benefited most from confederation. That is the truth. That position has changed, is changing, and must change if this country is to survive. As a member from Ontario, I am prepared to go back to my constituency in the next election and talk about the new kind of Canada that we must create.

I want to talk about resources in that context but I do not know if I will have time this evening. Since we may not come back to this debate before next Tuesday, I would like to talk in particular about the whole question of enshrining minority language rights and minority rights in general in a new constitution. About two years ago, prior to the May, 1979, election, I remember sitting next to Premier Blakeney as I was flying back to Toronto. We had a very enlightening conversation about his attitude toward not entrenching minority language rights in the constitution. The friendly debate lasted all the way back to Toronto. It was Mr. Hatfield's contention that language rights and minority rights in general can best be safeguarded by legislatures.

It is my contention that that could not be farther from the truth. I think that this is a vital component, a question that has to be answered in the whole referendum debate. This is what bothers Quebeckers. I think that they are looking down the road 20 years when their proportion of the total population in Canada will decline even further. They want to know whether their children and their grandchildren will have their linguistic and cultural rights guaranteed in a Canada of the year 2000.

I share those sentiments, and I think that it is incumbent on all members of this House and all those who represent constituencies outside Quebec to make sure that in the lifetime of this Parliament—whether it be unilaterally by this House, as the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) proposed last Friday or, as I hope, by general consultation at a federal-provincial conference—we, once and for all, enshrine language minority rights in the constitution of this country, if we ever hope to look people of French language background in the eye and say that they are welcome in this country. I came back from forced retirement in private life to this House of Commons because I feel so deeply about the need for constitutional change in this country. I think that we must come to grips with this situation in the next three years before the next election.

Legislatures have not been good guarantors of minority rights or language rights. Let us go back to the Manitoba of 1891 and the schools' question which effectively blocked out the French language in that province and made the French there part of a dwindling minority. That is the effect of legislative action in 1891 in Manitoba.

In Ontario during the First World War, regulation 17 effectively meant the same thing for French language education in Ontario, to Ontario's shame. It is all very well for Premier Bill Davis to go around the country pontificating on the great things which he has done over the last few years. I will admit that Ontario has made great strides, but where was Ontario in the last 50 years?

Let us look at the legislatures and how well they guarantee minority rights. Let us look at Bill 101 in the province of Quebec and how it will treat the English language minority in that province. It is quite obvious that legislatures cannot guarantee linguistic and minority rights. Even this House of Commons was derelict in its duty. I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was sitting in the House in 1941 or 1942 when this House sat in silence as members of the Japanese minority in this country were interned. That was perhaps one of the most—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, we were not silent. In particular, the late Angus MacInnis was on his feet speaking out very strongly on that issue.

Mr. Collenette: I apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but it appeared that the House in general was silent on this particular issue, to allow this particular thing to happen.

Mr. Lambert: Not the Liberals.

Mr. Collenette: I will take the admonitions from the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and say that it was the Liberal party. It was not the finest hour for the Liberal party and there are members on this side who want to make sure that the Liberal party, the Conservative party, the NDP and members of this House will never again see a minority subjugated in the way in which the Japanese were during the Second World War.

● (2200)

Before you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you that only with an entrenched bill of rights, only with language rights enshrined for all time in this country will we have linguistic and cultural harmony. I do not accept the argument of the premier of Saskatchewan and I do not accept the argument of the premier of Manitoba who believe that this cannot be done.

If I get the opportunity to speak on this subject again before the referendum, I should like to turn to some other aspects dealing with how the referendum is impacting upon the province of Ontario, and how Ontario and English Canada in particular should respond.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ATOMIC ENERGY—EFFECTIVE AND STRINGENT INTERNATIONAL SAFEGUARDS OVER USE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a nation of 23 million people out of four billion people in the world. We have a small armed force of about 73,000 people, very poorly equipped with only conventional weapons. We are but one voice at the United Nations, and only occasionally are we members of the Security Council. In fact Canada's influence on international affairs is, in a number of ways, very limited, to say the least. We can, however, preach disarmament because in fact we are virtually disarmed. While we can preach moralistically on this line, we lack the power and influence because we are, in fact, not a great nuclear weapons state.

There are many areas, however, where Canada does have influence and power and moral consistency, and can show international statesmanship and leadership. Canada is a major supplier of nuclear technology and nuclear energy; Canada is a major player in this game, and a major factor in nuclear proliferation in the world.

This is one of the most important topics facing the world right now, and in the past Canada has shown leadership on the subject. For example, the late Prime Minister Lester Pearson showed an earlier initiative in 1965 when he said that the government had decided that export permits would be granted with respect to uranium sales only if uranium was to be used for peaceful purposes. Before such sales would be authorized the government would require an agreement with the importing country to ensure that the uranium was to be used for peaceful purposes only. That Canadian statesman set the scene and a tone of leadership for Canada that Canada has been fairly consistent in following over the years.

Canada reacted later to what was perhaps our failure in India and its use of a nuclear device exploded at the expense of Canadian technology and resource. They responded with a five point program that was found correct and right in its place in time. Later they talked in terms of full scope safeguards which were another advancement in the international scene and another initiative taken by Canada. Two years ago these initiatives started in the world and perhaps, culminating in a disarmament conference, people recognized more intensely the problem of nuclear proliferation. As a result of recognizing the problem they set up a very special committee, the International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation. This evaluation is now in and the results are pessimistic.

At the same time as these results arrived on our doorstep we see Canada, formerly a leading nation, weakening. At this time which is a pivotal point in the history of the world in this nuclear fuel cycle evaluation, this proliferation question is at a turning point and it is crying out for leadership, and Canada is in a position to give that leadership. That is why I am so alarmed at the position of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), who is an international statesman by all accounts. That is what I have been told; I keep hearing it. And what do we see him doing? We see him backing down. The Prime Minister, in answer to questions in this House of Commons, instead of replying yes, that he would take this report and lead new initiatives in this world, replied no, that we do not intend to lower Canada's export stance, that we are not going to raise our safeguards and we are going to try not to lower them. This is Canada reaching out in expediency, abandoning its position of moral leadership in the world in this important area where it can have influence. In how many other areas does Canada have some say, some power or some influence? We have this major technology and major supply of the product, and we can in fact take many new initiatives.

The Prime Minister asked me in response to my questions: "What new initiatives can we take?" I say that one of the major areas of weakness in our program is our incapacity to follow the leadership of the United States in the control of spent fuel. The United States in negotiating contracts has a condition of demand for the return of spent fuel in any contract signed. We could add that to our safeguards. We could call conferences. In fact at these conferences Canada has a voice and it has a power. We could threaten security of supply in the world because of our influence over supply, technology, raw materials and fuel, through temporary suspension of delivery.

We can bring control to the nuclear fuel cycle in purchasing states. We can control that area more tightly. I am surprised, in talking of sanctions with the Soviet Union, that we supply nuclear fuel to the Soviet Union.

I will finish with two minor points, Mr. Speaker. Fourth, atomic energy regional disposal and storage centres are other initiatives. Finally, is the return of spent fuel to the supplier nations. Our leadership role has been right and good. It is sound in this world of instability, but as the world becomes more unstable it becomes more important that our Prime Minister should take these new initiatives now, and not duck from them with the status quo.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in response to the comments made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), I should point out that Canada's nuclear non-proliferation policy is one of the most stringent in the world today.

In December, 1976, the Canadian government announced that it would only enter into a new nuclear co-operation with non-nuclear weapon states which have made a binding commitment to non-proliferation and have accepted international safeguards on all of their peaceful nuclear activities. The latter is frequently referred to as NPT-type fullscope safeguards.

In addition to this general commitment, Canada also requires under its December, 1974, safeguard policy, the negotiation of a nuclear co-operation agreement with all countries with which it is engaged in nuclear trade. These agreements incorporate a number of specific provisions such as prior consent right over retransfer with regard to nuclear material, equipment or technology of Canadian origin.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pointed out recently here in the House, Canada has been in the vanguard of those advocating effective safeguards. There is no question of Canada lowering its national safeguards requirements.

In this context it is worth referring to the International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation which was concluded by a plenary conference in Vienna in February. It must be emphasized that INFCE was an international technical and analytical study, not a political negotiation. Its primary aim was to identify effective measures which can and should be taken to minimize the risk of nuclear proliferation while enabling nuclear energy for peaceful purposes to be made widely available to meet the world's energy requirements.

INFCE, which as noted above was not a political evaluation, did not identify a "technical fix" for nuclear proliferation. It did, however, result in a consensus report agreed to by forty-six countries in which a considerable number of ideas were put forward for subsequent study by governments in developing their nuclear energy policies. It is Canada's hope that the international community will, on the basis of this consensus, be able to work together in promoting the continuing evolution of an effective international non-proliferation regime within the framework of which international commerce in nuclear items for peaceful purposes can take place. Canada is exerting its best efforts in this regard.

● (2210)

As already noted, there are a number of proposals currently before the international community for evaluation and possible implementation. Among these proposals are the question of fullscope safeguards as a condition of export, measures to minimize the risk of proliferation arising from sensitive phases of the nuclear fuel cycle such as reprocessing, international plutonium storage, international spent fuel management, regional fuel cycle centres and international waste depositories. All of these subjects are complex and have positive and negative aspects in varying degrees. Canadian officials are participating in international discussions on many of these ideas. It is, however, too early in those discussions to make a definitive judgment as to the ultimate merit of the various proposals.

PARKS CANADA—CANCELLATION OF PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight grow out of an answer in the question period given by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) to my concerns about the cancellation of the Parks Canada move to Peterborough. The minister's answer as to the justification for this cancellation of the move was, and I quote from Hansard for May 5:

My concern is primarily for the morale and the interest of the workers of Parks Canada.

I wish to read into the record the statement of the workers of Parks Canada in their bulletin of August 15, 1979, in which they say, and I quote:

It has been stated in the press that a majority of Parks Canada employees are opposed to the move and this supposition is being used to bolster the case for retaining the office in Cornwall. From informal conversation and through an institute meeting held today, I have ascertained that the majority of the PIPS membership—

That is the Professional Institute of the Public Service.

—are prepared to move to Peterborough and all are pleased that at last a definite decision has been reached.

I remind this House that this is just one more case of crass political politics, pork-barrelling, or whatever you wish to call it. In reality it was the Liberal government which initiated the studies that determined the facts that it would be more economical and feasible to operate Parks Canada in Peterborough, more centrally located to Ontario than in the southeast corner of the province in the city of Cornwall.

It was also the former Liberal government that made the first recommendation in 1973. The then minister, the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan), announced to the people of Canada that Parks Canada was moving out of Cornwall. It was further announced by the then minister of the environment, Hugh Faulkner, the Liberal member of Parliament for Peterborough prior to myself, that he had it in place, that it was a reality and that it was coming to Peterborough.

The only thing that went wrong in the Liberal planning of the Thirtieth Parliament was the fact they lost the seat in 1979 to a Conservative. The result of that election in 1979 caused the Liberals, after seven years of study, to review again the position of the Parks Canada office as to whether it should go to a Conservative seat now that a Liberal had lost the riding of Peterborough.

The net result of that study in 1979 reaffirmed through the main estimates committee meeting in the Thirty-first Parliament that the government could save $200,000 a year by having Parks Canada in Peterborough where it would operate more effectively and efficiently. That is in the minutes of the environment committee dealing with the relocation of Parks Canada.

The Quebec branch of Parks Canada moved out of Cornwall in 1975. The Ontario branch was to move out of Cornwall as soon as Cornwall received the ministry of transportation driver training branch. That took place. In the election of 1980 the Cornwall Liberal member, now a cabinet minister, campaigned that if he was elected it would go to Peterborough over his dead body. I remind the House that to keep this minister alive, it will cost the taxpayers of Canada $200,000 a year as they operate ineffectively and inefficiently from Cornwall. It will cost the relocation back to Cornwall of 23 families who have purchased homes in Peterborough. It will create a wasteland in downtown Peterborough where they have purchased a property and facility through an arrangement to operate Parks Canada on a five-year $800,000 lease.

● (2215)

I would remind the House that this is nothing more than crass political politics. It is pork-barrelling of the worst kind. It is moving not only Eldorado to a minister's area in the north from a Conservative riding in the southern part of Ontario, it is also moving Parks Canada from a Conservative seat in Peterborough to a Liberal constituency in Cornwall. For long enough we have watched this type of barnyard politics as the animals in the farmyard nuzzle in with snouts to the trough endeavouring to take every dollar out of the taxpayers of Canada, regardless of waste, regardless of planning, regardless of their own studies, in the interests of their own ridings so as to pork-barrel every dollar of the taxpayers' money into ministers' constituencies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the facts concerning the proposed move are these: The move was first initiated by a Liberal administration. It was deferred by a Tory administration and it was rescinded by the present Liberal administration, the present Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts).

In making the decision to rescind the move the Minister of the Environment took into account, of course, the morale of the employees. But he did not overlook the question of costs and the effects on the Parks Canada administration. Once a decision had been made on May 5 to rescind the move which the Liberals had initiated and which the Tories had deferred, the minister immediately directed that the cost be identified with a view to providing full compensation for any cost incurred or financial losses by employees. It is the minister's intent to return the employees as nearly as possible to the financial and career circumstances which would have prevailed had the move never been contemplated.

These are the facts, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure you have noticed, as I have, that the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) has not been very preoccupied with the facts in his address tonight. He talked, instead, about politics. I would remind him that two can play that particular game, the game of politics, and I would remind him also that even in the business in which he and I find ourselves there is room for scoring some honourable, legitimate political points. From what he has done tonight, I am aware that he is already quite familiar with how to score cheap, cowardly political points.

If the hon. member wanted to talk about the politics of the situation, why did he avoid telling the House what he knows very well to be the case—that it was the administration of which he was a part which deferred the move for ten whole months—ten painful months for the people of Canada? They had it in their hands to go ahead with the move but they did nothing about it. They only deferred it.

Mr. Domm: Not true!

Mr. Simmons: If the hon. member says it is not true, I would remind him of one other fact which he did not bother to tell his constituents in his convenient selection of truths: the announcement to defer made on August 3, 1979, was made by none other that the hon. member for Peterborough himself. The man who now wants to get on the side of right and justice is the man who announced the deferral last August.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member's time has expired.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT ON RAIL RELOCATION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise to deal with a matter which was first raised in a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) on April 25. This is the matter of rail relocation in the city of Winnipeg. At that time the minister answered in a way which I felt was unsatisfactory. His rationale for not making a complete commitment at that time to railway relocation had to do with the costs of such a project. He said that it would cost too much to relocate the rail yards in the city of Winnipeg, and in order to back that up he quoted figures from a study known as the Dillon report. This study quotes very high costs for rail relocation in the city of Winnipeg.

I should like, first of all, to question the validity of those figures. By and large, the study takes no account of the benefits of rail relocation to Winnipeg, and by and large the costs are unsubstantiated. In fact the consultants did not go to the CPR to get their facts, and this was reported to us by a CPR official at a public meeting on Sunday a week ago.

The land value in this study is for vacant land rather than developed land. There is no account of business taxes or property taxes which would accrue if the land were freed from use as a railway yard and were developed for other purposes such as residential and business uses. There is no mention in the study of the need by CPR for increased acreages in their new yards, although when the CNR yards were relocated they required less acreage in their new yards than in their previous yards. Also, the study makes little or no mention of the positive impact on the local economy.

I would point out that at present the Winnipeg Construction Association indicates—this was in the month of April—that unemployment in the construction industry was at 24.7 per cent. Certainly a move to rail yard relocation would be a stimulus to the local economy and would have benefits in terms of creating employment. Also, the study fails to mention the cost to small business of a major accident in these yards or of the possible evacuation of the city. In terms of Mississauga, the estimates were of $25 million a day lost in terms of small business, this is minus the costs of police, fire and ambulance services. Also, in this context I question, in the case of a city like Winnipeg, whether it would be possible to evacuate such a city. We have no major urban centre to which evacuees could be taken.

So the Dillon study upon which the minister relied gives an exaggerated picture of the costs and does not really outline the benefits. Recently we heard a new statement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) in which he indicated that he may be considering granting $25 million over a five-year period. While I welcome this crack in the wall, my question is whether or not it is a real commitment to rail yard relocation or simply a cosmetic, political manoeuvre.

We know that the Liberal government has made many public statements in favour of relocation, by ministers such as the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other members of the cabinet, but by focusing on the costs, perhaps we make it too easy for there to be bickering among the levels of government as to who will pay for rail yard relocation and we do not come to grips with the essential question. I think that a more valid focus which would test the commitment of the government would be if we were to ask for action under the Canadian Transport Act which would allow for the CTC to investigate any carrier which might be undertaking actions injurious to the public interest. This has already been called for by some citizens in Winnipeg. It would allow the CTC to investigate whether or not such incidents as the methanol spill in Winnipeg would merit the relocation of the yards in the public's interest and would get us out from under the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act which seems to have us embroiled in the question of who is going to pay, each government waiting for the other government to move first. So I think we should look at this question primarily from the point of view of the public interest.

• (2225)

If we use the Canadian Transport Act, we can get the CPR before a forum with some authority. That can get us the real information with regard to costs and also the real information with regard to whether or not it is in the public interest to move them out of the city. Certainly I believe that it is a necessary move at this point.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a similar question was put to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). I answered it on April 28, and the answer given can be found on page 504 of Hansard.

It is evident that all people concerned readily admit that rail relocation for the city of Winnipeg is the ideal solution. It is highly desirable, and to the benefit of the city, to revitalize an area which has been troubled by the impact of the railway in that neighbourhood. I would point out to hon. members of the House that the Rail Relocation and Crossing Act does not compel the federal government to undertake rail relocation projects. Rather, it provides the mechanism whereby these projects can be undertaken and it permits the federal government to assist financially in these projects, if and when funding is available. These mechanisms and procedures would also establish if the economic benefits outweigh the costs involved.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) asked if we had determined whether the economic benefits would not outweigh the costs involved. Really the onus to prove that point is on the applicant. The city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba have never agreed to file the prima facie case to prove their own priority rating of the proposed rail relocation. Until April of this year, the city and the province have simply indicated that they want a licence to proceed with the grade separation overpass at Sherbrook-McGregor. Then early in April of this year, sort of as a last ditch stand, council passed a motion that they would ask the federal government to proceed with rail relocation. They would allow the federal government to proceed with it. The province would put up one-sixth and the city would put up one-sixth, if the federal government would put up two-thirds. None of this is in accordance with the formula of a 50-50 sharing of the costs involved.

The previous NDP government did not want to file the prima facie case because it would only concur with the relocation of the yards and not the main line. The present provincial government has not indicated that it is prepared to participate in this rail relocation and does not eye it as much of a priority as the CN east yards or other developments in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: Where do you stand?

Mr. Bockstael: I am in favour of rail relocation.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

USE OF WINNIPEG AS SITE FOR TESTING TOXIC CHEMICALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of confirmation last evening that Winnipeg was used as the site of testing the most effective ways of distributing chemical and biological warfare agents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That the Government of Canada make public all details relating to this case, paying special regard to who conducted the tests, how often the tests were conducted, what chemical agents were used, and what steps have been and are being taken to determine whether any health hazards exist due to the program.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED EQUALITY OF SALARY AND ALLOWANCES WITH PRIVATE MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. I received today alone, some 16 pieces of mail from a variety of government departments, including the Department of National Defence, the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of the Solicitor General, the Department of Supply and Services, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and the Department of Agriculture, all addressed to me as minister of state for federal-provincial relations.

In the absence of the appointment of such a minister by this government, I have felt compelled and, indeed, mandated to resume this responsibility. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That in the interests of equity, uniformity and particularly cabinet solidarity, all cabinet ministers receive the same salary, expenses and other allowances and benefits that I presently receive.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF GRAIN CONSUMED DOMESTICALLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

With regard to the rising costs of operation inflicted upon the farmers of Canada this spring in machine costs, repair costs and fertilizers, making the total costs of operation the highest in the history of farming in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the government increase immediately the domestic price of grain consumed in Canada by at least $1 a bushel, in order to meet this crisis.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

STEPS TO IMPROVE AILING AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Chrysler Canada Limited announced a further lay-off of 1,400 employees just days after receiving a $200 million aid package from this government, thereby adding to the already swollen ranks of the unemployed within the industry, and because this government has shown to be completely ineffective, if not incompetent, in dealing with the massive lay-offs affecting not only Chrysler Canada but the industry as a whole, evidenced by the additional fact that the Canadian deficit in automobile trade with the United States rose to a record $535.9 million in the first three months of this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees):

That this House bring the matter of the ailing automotive industry before the appropriate standing committee forthwith, in order that all parties concerned may have an opportunity to consider and deal with such suggestions as: temporarily removing the 9 per cent federal excise tax on North American-built vehicles, implementing quotas on foreign-built automobiles, and in general reviewing and improving the obsolete and inadequate auto pact.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA DAY

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO DESIGNATE JULY 1—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Canada has been a free and independent nation for 113 years, and that it is long past the time when we should be acting accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger):

That this House directs that July 1 shall henceforth be known officially as Canada Day, and that the government urgently consider the necessity of introducing a bill to give Canada Day legal as well as symbolic status prior to Canada Day of this year.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROVINCIAL OWNERSHIP OF ARTHUR LAING BRIDGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the federal government has prevented commuter vehicles from using the federally-owned, $23 million Arthur Laing Bridge between Richmond and Vancouver, B.C., even though airport-generated traffic amounts to only one-tenth of the bridge's capacity, and since the former Progressive Conservative minister of transport had expressed a willingness to negotiate transfer of this bridge to the province of British Columbia, which would be better able to work out a solution of the problem of shared-use by commuters, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to commence negotiations immediately with the province of British Columbia with the aim of transferring ownership of the Arthur Laing Bridge to the province, so that the bridge can be used in a more cost-effective way by the commuters of Richmond and Delta.

VETERANS' STATUS FOR MACKENZIE-PAPINEAU BATTALION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That members of the Mackenzie-Papineau Battalion and other Canadians who fought with Spanish Republican forces in the Spanish civil war between 1936 and 1939 be given the status of veterans under federal legislation and be made eligible for veterans pensions and benefits.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LEADER OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has chosen to go against the motion that this Parliament should act on its own to patriate the Canadian constitution, a motion that was moved by a fellow-Albertan of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko), and received the unanimous approval of this House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin):

That the right hon. Leader of the Opposition advise this House and the people of Canada who speaks for the Conservative party in this House, the leader or the members of his caucus who approved this motion.

PARLIAMENTARY DISCUSSION PRIOR TO CONVERSION TO METRIC SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, concerning the forced implementation of metrication on the retail food sector in Canada as of January 1, 1981, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In light of the admission by the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) in this House on April 25 that no legislation on metrication has been passed by this House, and considering that several major food chains—including Loblaws, Dominion stores, IGA stores, Sunnybrook markets and Farmboy markets—have already announced their opposition to forced metrication, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That conversion to the metric system in the Canadian retail food sector not take place until such time as there has been a full parliamentary discussion involving all segments of the retail food industry and all interested Canadian consumers.

RAISING OF BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION TO FORMULA AGREED IN 1973—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I move:

That this House takes note of the continuing concern of veterans over the failure of the government to raise the basic rate of the war disability pension to the level of the formula agreed to in 1973, and calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to bring in the necessary legislation so that the said basic rate will be adjusted each year, without fail, to the average take-home pay of the five categories designated by Parliament in 1973, it being urgent that this be done without further delay.

TRANSPORT

STEPS TO REDUCE SHIP-BRIDGE COLLISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, lest there be any misunderstanding, the distinguished commoner for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) speaks for my party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Give him a star on his report card.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please read his motion, and only that.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, last week's very tragic accident in Tampa Bay, Florida, lends significant urgency to the need to reduce the possibility of further ship-bridge collisions. Given the large number of bridges in Canada which span busy national and international shipping lanes, and the high cost of minimizing the possibilities of potential further catastrophe in this area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

● (1415)

That this House direct the government to enter into detailed negotiations with the appropriate jurisdictions, with a view to devising an acceptable formula for the financing of pier-fendering and protection so that the risk of loss of life and prolonged traffic disruption, and other inconveniences, may be minimized and, hopefully, eliminated.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion may be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

COST OF RELOCATING ELDORADO NUCLEAR, PARKS CANADA AND DVA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board, who will know that in recent weeks this government has indicated it does not have enough money for urban transit in Ontario, for full grain terminal development in Prince Rupert, rail relocation in Winnipeg, small craft harbours in Atlantic Canada, Sysco in Cape Breton, or for a variety of DREE projects across the country.

In light of that, could the minister inform the House the combined cost to the Government of Canada of relocating Eldorado Nuclear and Parks Canada, and of moving the DVA site in Charlottetown?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am not sure of the relevance of the first part of the question as it was asked. The main estimates will be before committee and the right hon. gentleman will have ample opportunity to question the ministers in charge of those departments in the areas he has raised.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I can inform the minister, who should have known, that the combined cost of those three moves will be in excess of $50 million. The question I should now like to pose to the minister is whether the Government of Canada is considering moving other federal facilities to ridings held by Liberal ministers. If so, will he tell the House which facilities are intended to be moved, and at what cost?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, perhaps the right hon. gentleman would give us the answer to that question as well. I presume that the right hon. gentleman is referring to a program of decentralization which was a program of the previous Liberal administration, and has been confirmed where it is cost-effective and in keeping with the over-all efficient management of government resources.

Mr. Clark: What I am speaking of, Madam Speaker, is a program of Liberal patronage that so far has cost the taxpayers of Canada $50 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to know from the president of the pork-barrel; given a situation of high unemployment in this country, coupled with recent lay-offs at Sysco and with serious unemployment in the auto industry, will he assure the House that this practice of patronage—which has been evident with regard to Parks Canada, Eldorado and the movement of the DVA site within Charlottetown—by the Liberal Party of Canada will stop now and that, instead, priority will be given to helping people who are out of work in Sysco, helping people out of work in the auto industry and helping to get on with DREE projects across the country?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, in response to this charge of patronage, I would point out that one of the most significant announcements in recent weeks concerns the Vancouver trade centre. I am not aware that a Liberal represents that riding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LOCATION OF NEW ELDORADO NUCLEAR PLANT

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Ontario economic region No. 52, the area in which until recently it was planned to build a new Eldorado plant in southern Ontario, has an unemployment rate of 10.5 per cent, second only, in Ontario, to the Windsor area with 12.3 per cent which the federal government has just recently greatly assisted by bailing out the Chrysler Corporation.

• (1420)

Would the Prime Minister and his government now give serious reconsideration to moving this plant from an area with such high unemployment which desperately needs the jobs which the building of this new plant would provide?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, of course, the unemployment rate in the hon. member's section of Ontario is one of concern to the government. He will recall that the Minister of Energy did comment on action taken in that area by local people, with the co-operation of the federal government, and said we would consider it. But the hon. member, in his fairness, would also realize that it does make sense to process natural resources in that part of the country where they are produced, when that is possible; and that northern Ontario particularly is a part of Ontario that needs to be developed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I think it is obvious that the economic arguments that have been attempted to be put up by the Prime Minister simply do not hold water. He knows that perfectly well. It is obvious that the answers given recently to the question—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The question should be more obvious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We agree, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, from the answer that was just given to me and to the Leader of the Opposition, is it not obvious that with this Prime Minister and with this government the pork-barrel takes precedence over people?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I want to point out that my argument was not only economic, it had to do with the whole philosophy of this government, that is, to help develop regions which are less developed. The hon. member knows that in Ontario most of the northerners feel they have not been given an opportunity to develop equal to that of people living along the Montreal-Toronto axis. It is on that basis that we took our decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, would the Prime Minister not agree that an area that has the second highest unemployment rate in Ontario—the one I have just mentioned—deserves more attention at this time than any other region except the greater Windsor area?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I said in my first answer that, of course, an area where unemployment is high is the object of government policy such as Canada Works which attempts to bring employment to these various areas. But as a long-term concern of this government we have been for the last ten years attempting to encourage the development of areas of generally slow growth.

That is the whole purpose of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and it is on that basis that we have sought to bring to northern Ontario an industry which is based on the extraction of natural resources in northern Ontario.

INTRODUCTION OF UPDATED TRANSITIONAL ASSISTANCE BENEFITS PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, we will see how broadly based the government's concern is with people. I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister knows that over 5,000 Chrysler employees are now out of work. He also knows that there were an additional 650 lay-offs announced yesterday, and that an Ontario minister said late yesterday that 2,500 more are anticipated later this year.

Since the government has now come to the assistance of the Chrysler Corporation, and since the total number of workers directly affected by lay-offs now in the automotive industry is about 35,000, could the minister tell us, at long last, when the government is going to bring in an updated TAB program to provide assistance to the workers and their families?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this matter is being actively worked on by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I should also like to inform the House that Chrysler announced yesterday that, while there were to be further lay-offs at Windsor, it was also adding a second shift to the van plant, providing a further 800 jobs on June 2, and at about that time a further 200 jobs at the car assembly plant.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, that is about the fourth time the minister has told the House that the government is actively working on the problem, while some 35,000 Canadian workers are collecting unemployment insurance. Indeed, many of them do not have anything to collect at all. Can the minister give us a clear, definite date when the government is going to announce its assistance program for these workers who badly need it?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I hope it will be possible for a final decision on this matter to be made soon. I regret I cannot yet announce a date for any such decision to be made public. However, I remind the House that the Minister of Employment and Immigration has used the authority he has under the existing law to trigger extended unemployment insurance benefits in the Windsor area, in particular.

This will enable those who were laid off, in large measure—although not all, I agree—to have benefits over a longer period of time than would otherwise have been the case. During this extended period, it will be easier for us to give due consideration and to make the right kind of decision on this whole issue of additional benefits.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I remind the minister that the workers laid off are also in the cities of Toronto, Oakville, St. Catharines, Oshawa, Brampton—other than Windsor. Windsor is important, but all the workers in this industry surely have to be taken into account.

Finally, can he explain to the House why the Government of Canada is providing proportionately more money in financial assistance to the Chrysler Corporation than is the government of the United States? Why was the government of the United States able to get a better deal for its taxpayers in coming to the assistance of that corporation than was the Government of Canada?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I first want to remind the hon. member that we are not providing money to Chrysler Canada: we are undertaking, if certain commitments are made, to put in place loan guarantees starting only in 1982. While the amount of loan guarantees that we have agreed to is somewhat above strict proportionality, it is in recognition of the fact that Chrysler Canada has a much greater impact on the Canadian economy than the parent company does in the United States. Its failure in Canada would have a correspondingly greater adverse impact on the economy and on at least 40,000 Canadian workers.

I felt, and cabinet agreed, that to have slightly more than strict proportionality was in the interests of the Canadian economy and Canadian workers generally all across the country. I am sorry that my hon. friend, in spite of his earlier protestations about wanting to help the workers, does not agree with this obvious point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RELOCATION OF DVA SITE IN CHARLOTTETOWN

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that the federal government has a binding legal agreement with the province of Prince Edward Island, through the Charlottetown Area Development Corporation, to locate the Department of Veterans Affairs at the Charlottetown waterfront, and in view of the fact that the federal government has unilaterally changed the site from the waterfront to the centre of the city without consulting the province of Prince Edward Island and without consulting even the city of Charlottetown, my question to the President of the Treasury Board is, does the federal government intend to impose its choice of site on the people of Prince Edward Island, and does it intend also simply to ignore its obligations under a binding legal agreement to the people of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member undoubtedly knows, Treasury Board has very little to do with site selection.

But I will take his representation into consideration and look into the matter on his behalf.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the President of the Treasury Board, alias "the pork-barrel".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McMillan: The site in Charlottetown favoured by the federal government for the Department of Veterans Affairs would cost the treasury over half a million dollars more than the site favoured by the province of Prince Edward Island. The federal government's choice of site would cause huge traffic and parking problems in the city of Charlottetown, according to the mayor of that city.

● (1430)

Will the minister confirm that the real reason for the change of site was pressure from a small group of the city's businessmen who own much of the real estate near the proposed central core site, who are bagmen for the minister's party—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McMillan: —and who therefore stand to gain from the change of site, in terms of real estate, against the public interest?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer that question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member now formulate a very short question?

Mr. McMillan: Will the minister confirm to the House, and through this House to the people of Prince Edward Island, that the real reason for the change of site by the Department of Veterans Affairs from the waterfront in Charlottetown to the central core of the city was not cost or any other such consideration but, rather, favouritism toward bagmen of his own party on Prince Edward Island?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Another pork-barreller.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to advise you, the hon. member and all hon. members of the House that it was on the advice of my ministry's officials that the site selection, on the basis of cost implications and the total desirability of the site location, was made.

Indeed, it was the advice of my department's officials and my advice to the minister of the user department that those were the reasons—which are contrary to the conclusions, the information and allegations given to us by the hon. member—the site was chosen. It was the least expensive site that was chosen, and it was a better site for the people in the area—

Some hon. Members: That is not true.

Mr. Cosgrove: —and it is one that the officials say is better in view of all these qualifications.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO TESTING OF TOXIC CHEMICALS IN MANITOBA

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the fact that it has now been confirmed that not only the citizens of Winnipeg, but also the citizens of the Stony Mountain area in Manitoba were the unwitting guinea-pigs for chemical and biological warfare testing in June of 1953, in light of the fact that civic officials in Winnipeg were misled concerning the purpose of aerosol testing and, further, in light of the fact that the chemical compound used in the testing is indeed harmful to health, will the Prime Minister assure the House that his government will establish a full-scale public inquiry into the nature and extent of chemical and biological warfare testing in Canada?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having raised this matter again, thus giving me a chance to assure him and all members of the House that the Department of National Defence, as promised, is indeed taking a careful and thorough look at this whole matter. However, I should like also to caution the hon. member and all members of the House against paying undue attention to sensational reporting, the effects of which can only cause needless and cruel fear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sargeant: I will try to direct my next question to the right hon. Prime Minister. The important issue here is not whether the chemical and biological warfare tests took place unbeknown to the public in 1953, but whether such tests are still being carried out in secret. I should like to repeat my question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sargeant: Would the Prime Minister tell us when the last test took place, and when and where other such tests were carried out?

Mrs. Appolloni: Madam Speaker, may I answer this question also? Far from being held in secret, it now appears that there were at least two reports of those tests at the same time, one of which was just to ask about the feasibility of the reports and the other reporting a very angry letter from a member of the Canadian communist party at the time. Therefore, to imply that these tests were held in secret is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It appears from the answers of the parliamentary secretary today that the Department of National Defence is still conducting tests. How could she have said yesterday, when referring to this incident and speaking for the government, that these tests were not harmful to human life, if today the details are such that we do not know what the tests contained?

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, as well, by whose request these tests were conducted: were they requested by Canadian authorities or by U.S. authorities, and who authorized these tests?

Mrs. Appolloni: Because of the last few remarks of the hon. member, I am tempted to feel that there is some sexist bias in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: If that is the case, Madam Speaker, I should like to remind hon. members that another lady in history, a little before my time, made quite a splash in her national defence at the time of the Spanish armada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: By a strange coincidence, she also had red hair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: In answer to the hon. member for Provencher, I repeat what I said yesterday. Unfortunately, it appears that pharmacologists, perhaps just as much as economists, do not always agree with each other. The report that we have so far at the Department of National Defence is that, in effect, this substance was not harmful to human life. I repeat, studies are still under way, because my department is nothing if not thorough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I want to indicate to the parliamentary secretary that I am trying to get information and I have no interest in sexist bias which she has charged. I should like to ask, further, whether the Government of Canada has responded to the telex from the minister of the environment for the province of Manitoba in which he asked for full details to be sent to him immediately they become known to the department.

An hon. Member: That is what we always do.

Mr. Epp: We are in the habit of talking to the provinces, though you might not be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I should like to ask whether the parliamentary secretary or officials of the department have responded to the minister of the environment for Manitoba. Further, can the parliamentary secretary tell us whether any other Canadian cities were used for tests? Finally, could she tell us when this information will be made available, in view of the requests she has had from the province of Manitoba?

Mrs. Appolloni: Madam Speaker, instead of just speaking to the people of Winnipeg or any other part of Manitoba, I think we on this side prefer to assure them that there is no great danger, so as not to have them worried as they are.

The second point I should like to make, Madam Speaker, is that these tests took place some 27 years ago. Many of the people who were alive at that time have since retired or, unfortunately—

Some hon. Members: Are dead.

An hon. Member: Say it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Appolloni: If the opposition really wants to get some facts, they have to listen; I am sorry. Many of the people—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mrs. Appolloni: —involved in the tests at that time have since retired or, unfortunately, for other reasons, have passed away.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Mrs. Appolloni: It is a sad commentary on life that we all have to go somehow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mrs. Appolloni: Under all these circumstances, I think the fact that my department was able to respond so quickly yesterday was yet another proof of the tremendous vitality, speed and efficiency of the Department of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANCELLATION OF PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. If the cancellation of the transfer of the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough is not crass politics and pork-barrelling, and if the shift of the office to the riding of a Liberal cabinet minister in Cornwall is not barnyard politics of the worst kind, would the minister please explain to this House why a former Liberal cabinet minister, the hon. member for London West, announced the move from Cornwall in 1975 and why the entire Liberal cabinet confirmed this transfer of Parks Canada in 1977?

Would he also advise this House why a former cabinet minister from Peterborough announced the move in 1978? Would the minister please advise this House what factors have changed the government's position and decision on the move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough, other than the fact that the Liberals lost the Peterborough riding?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first three questions of the hon. member is simply no, it was none of those three things. I explained to him and to the House the basis on which we took that decision. It was his government which took the final deferral.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Roberts: It was the result of the consequences of that action on the interests and morale of the workers that I reassessed it and came to the conclusion that the interests of the workers of Parks Canada would be best served by rescinding the original decision which had been taken before his government came to deal with the problem.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Roberts: We have gone over these matters in the House a multiple number of times. I have explained the situation clearly. The hon. gentleman can continue to rise and try to stir up emotions about a very difficult issue, but the facts underlying the decision have been presented to him. I wish he would have the good grace to acknowledge that the decision is taken, and understand the reasons for which it is presented.

An hon. Member: Pork-barrel.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, the reason I keep rising on the subject of Parks Canada is that the decision has been taken so many times. I would like to address my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board: it also deals with the Parks Canada move.

In view of the fact that the Government of Canada is going to pick up the tab to move the Parks Canada families back to Cornwall from Peterborough, as well as the costs incurred in the leasing arrangements for the downtown section of Peterborough on a five-year undertaking, would the President of the Treasury Board advise this House how much that costs the taxpayers of Canada?

Second, will he also advise this House what assistance the government intends to offer the evicted tenants from the downtown section of Peterborough as it lays waste 40,000 square feet of office space? The government evicted the tenants in order to make room for Parks Canada, which it has decided now to move to a Liberal cabinet minister's riding.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, one of the reasons Treasury Board supported leaving Parks Canada in Cornwall is that it is cheaper. It will cost the taxpayers less money to leave Parks Canada in Cornwall than to continue with the move to Peterborough which had been planned.

If I may, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman, whose question is placed in a broader context, that I was delighted to learn that the Minister of State for Mines received a congratulatory letter from the Progressive Conservative riding association of Algoma for her efforts in ensuring that Eldorado is located at Blind River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Her efforts?

Mr. Johnston: So much, Madam Speaker, for the pork-barrel.

UNFAIR LABOUR PRACTICES

ANTI-UNION PRACTICES OF CHARTERED BANKS—CALL FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. As the minister is no doubt aware, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women has just recommended that the federal government initiate an investigation of the anti-union practices of Canada's chartered banks. Can the minister confirm that this investigation will indeed take place and, if so, when it will begin and what will be its terms of reference?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He will, of course, be aware that I am not responsible for the status of women and that that responsibility falls under another minister.

In relation to unfair labour practices, if complaints are filed then, of course, my department will take cognizance of them and take the appropriate steps.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, that reply is not adequate. In light of the fact that three-quarters of the workers in Canada's banking industry are women, and this government has given lip-service to women's issues in the throne speech, will the minister state here and now when he intends to proceed with this investigation?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I deeply regret that my initial answer was not satisfactory to the hon. member. I shall strive strenuously to give him answers which will satisfy him more fully in the future. However, I have not been contacted on the matter he brings to my attention.

In relation to the question of the organization of the banks, the hon. member will be aware of the fact that the Canada Labour Relations Board made a ruling which was very helpful to organization and which allowed each individual branch to be organized rather than having the necessity to organize the entire system. In that regard, extensive efforts toward organization have been undertaken. Some of them have been successful. In some instances there have been difficulties in achieving first agreements.

The hon. member will be aware that the question of six branches of the Royal Bank in the Saguenay area is at the present time before the Canada Labour Relations Board. There is an inquiry into the dispute under the legislation passed by the former progressive Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Regan: That board has the power, if advisable, to settle the terms and conditions of first collective agreements. In that instance, the question is under consideration at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COST OF RETAINING REGIONAL OFFICE IN CORNWALL

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Just a moment ago the minister said the reason he had gone along with retaining Parks Canada in Cornwall was that it would cost less. I am sure the minister would not want to mislead this House intentionally.

Is that the information he received from the Department of the Environment, and Parks Canada itself? If it is, there was a sudden change in the information available to ministers between the time I made the decision last summer to move on economic grounds and the decision the President of the Treasury Board made the other day.

An hon. Member: Get your act together.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, my act is very much together. I am relying on the information which I had developed for me by my officials with respect to the cost of cancelling the lease, relocating the employees back in Cornwall and ensuring that they will be well taken care of, as indicated by the Minister of the Environment in his press release of, I believe, two weeks ago.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—USE OF FUNDS GUARANTEED BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Having followed with great interest the negotiations of the minister with Chrysler Canada, and being personally pleased with the decision he has taken to provide federal aid equivalent to an investment of $1 billion till 1985, is the minister in a position to tell the House or to make public the proposal or recommendations made by his Quebec counterparts about the purposes for which part of that $1 billion would be used before 1985?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I do appreciate that the hon. member for Joliette acknowledges the fact that we have concluded a satisfactory arrangement with Chrysler Corporation. Perhaps he knows quite well that the arrangement will enable them to maintain at least 6,000 jobs in Quebec. According to our information, the Quebec government wrote to former industry minister de Cotret stating that in its opinion it would be a good idea to have guaranteed loans and to restore jobs in circumstances such as those related to Chrysler Corporation in Canada.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I was well aware that the decision of the minister could save a number of jobs in Quebec as well as elsewhere in Canada. Now, with regard to that $1 billion investment I wanted to know whether the minister can tell the House if it will create a surplus number of jobs. In light of the answer of the minister, I understand that his cabinet or caucus colleagues did not make any recommendations; therefore, as a member from Quebec, and on behalf of all my hon. colleagues, may I be allowed to ask the minister to look seriously into the possibility of using part of that $1 billion in the province of Quebec, where it would be highly appreciated at this point in time?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, that $1 billion will be spent on new equipment for the Chrysler plants in Canada. That is exactly what the Quebec government suggested, that if the federal government gave any assistance to Chrysler it should be to renew its plant equipment. That is exactly what the agreement which we signed with Chrysler stipulates. Through that agreement, I want to repeat, we have saved at least 6,000 jobs in the province of Quebec.

NATIONAL UNITY

TRANSPORT POLICIES—CONTRIBUTION TO WESTERN ALIENATION

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In the context of the Quebec referendum debate that this House has been hearing so much about in the last few days, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he is aware that a distinct sense of western alienation lies behind such western separatist political movements as the Saskatchewan Unionist Party, a party dedicated to the break-up of Canada just as surely as the Parti Québécois is dedicated to the ending of confederation.

Is the minister aware that his government's transport policies are contributing greatly to western alienation? Would he give an undertaking to end branch line abandonment, as his government's positive, tangible gesture toward the strengthening of confederation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was not aware of that. Indeed, I thought the happy solution of the Prince Rupert terminal question and the negotiations which took place in Vancouver last week on the subject of coal development would enhance the reputation of the Minister of Transport in these matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: With respect to branch line abandonment—not having made any particular decision yet—whatever conclusion has been reached would be, at the least, premature.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Could I ask the minister if he accepts the premise of several major farm organizations, including the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, that there be guaranteed rail service on any line which the elevator companies will agree to keep serving?

Will the minister demonstrate his government's willingness to act in the interests of efficiency and in accordance with the expressed wished of grain producers in the west by guaranteeing this service?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I do not know how I can answer this question in one sentence, but I will try.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Say "yes".

Mr. Pepin: The subject of the rehabilitation of branch lines is one that is dear to everybody's heart. But in doing so, some priority has to be established, and I think everybody would agree to that. When the basic network system was established, I think in 1975, about 60 of the branch lines were identified as being part of that system. We are now up, by a number of additions, to 82 per cent of the branch lines. So to my simple mind, as a thinker on these matters, if one identifies all branch lines to be retained, one abandons the priority system and destroys the very principle which is at stake.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

RELOCATION OF ELDORADO NUCLEAR—COMPENSATION FOR COSTS INCURRED

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. With respect to the announced move of the Eldorado refinery from Port Hope to northern Ontario, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether or not the government's policy is to compensate Eldorado with respect to the very substantial extra costs that are involved in this move, so that their balance-sheet will not reflect the additional increase and they will remain competitive in terms of international markets and, in fact, in their operations in the sale of uranium and uranium products.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have no advice that anything will be done which would prejudice Eldorado in terms of its commercial liability, as the hon. member suggests.

An hon. Member: It is costing money.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, therefore, can the minister advise the House whether or not, in his thorough investigation before giving his support and approval to these moves—which I am sure he must have done—he consulted with the board of directors of Eldorado, or whether they were left out in the cold and are now feeling very concerned because they have not been brought into this particular decision and it is, in fact, contrary to their recommendation?

Did the President of the Treasury Board, in the performance of his duties, in fact consult with the board of directors who were given the mandate to carry out the responsibility of policy with respect to that company?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that Eldorado reports to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and not to the President of the Treasury Board.

FINANCE

CAPITAL GAINS TAX—EFFECT ON INVESTMENT—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The minister stated in an interview in the Toronto Star on October 18, 1979, that the tax on capital gains has stifled investment in many sectors and frozen assets in others.

In view of the study that the Minister of Finance is allegedly having into capital gains, I wonder if the minister could indicate to this House what input he is having in that study.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, if the Minister of Finance is conducting such a study, I will look forward very much to receiving the results.

Mr. Clark: If?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is, of course, directed to the Minister of Finance. The "if" involved makes it interesting.

The Minister of Finance has said that he has a study on capital gains. Would he refer that study to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs? Will he allow the President of the Treasury Board, who wrote a book on "Fiscalamity", the disaster of capital gains, how it was hurting business, causing inflation, and so on—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Blenkarn: —to appear before that committee?

Mr. Hees: With his book under his arm.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can remove the "if" from the hon. member's question and advise him that there is a study under way on the subject of capital gains. As I recollect, it was begun by my predecessor and was, therefore, well-launched. When it is completed, I will consider whether to send it to the committee. It sounds like a good idea.

PUBLIC WORKS

COST OF RELOCATING DVA OFFICES IN CHARLOTTETOWN

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I would address my question to the Minister of Public Works. In his reply to an earlier question, he indicated that the move in Charlottetown of the DVA proposed building from the waterfront to the downtown area would cost less money.

As that is contrary to information available to us, would the minister table in the House his figures to show why the move would save money? If he cannot do that, would he withdraw the statement and admit his error?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I indicated, the decision was made on advice received by officials of the Department of Public Works.

An hon. Member: Table it.

Mr. Cosgrove: Yes, I will table the information in order to make it available to the hon. member who asked the question, and to members of the House.

DEFERRAL OF MOVE TO PETERBOROUGH

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and it centres on similar questions to that member of the cabinet earlier in the question period.

In response to a question, the President of the Treasury Board indicated that it was the Clark government which had decided not to defer the move to Peterborough of the Parks Canada office. Would the President of the Treasury Board confirm if that is correct and, if so, would he explain why that is inconsistent with what the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment said, that in effect it was our decision to defer the move? Who is correct?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I might refer the hon. member to Hansard of last night where he will see the answer to that question presented by the parliamentary secretary in response to a question on the "late show".

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOMM—RELOCATION OF PARKS CANADA OFFICE—STATEMENT MADE BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY IN ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege respecting statements made last night in the House by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons). The hon. member made a specific assertion about a statement I made on August 3, 1979, which is completely untrue in its description of that statement, and anyone in the House will verify that.

I should like to read the statement, and it was referred to just a moment ago by an hon. member on this side of the House. Last night in the House of Commons during the late show the parliamentary secretary to the minister stated:

—I am aware—

He was referring to myself.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think we will require a bit more silence in the House so we can hear what the hon. member has to say.

Mr. Domm: I can understand, Madam Speaker, why they prefer not to listen.

The parliamentary secretary to the minister stated:

—it was the administration of which he was a part—

He was referring to myself.

—which deferred the move for ten whole months—

Continuing to quote the parliamentary secretary:

If the hon. member says it is not true, I would remind him of one other fact which he did not bother to tell his constituents in his convenient selection of truths: the announcement to defer made on August 3, 1979, was made by none other than the hon. member for Peterborough himself. The man who now wants to get on the side of right and justice is the man who announced the deferral last August.

In making my case for the question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I would cite three of the several statements by your predecessor which clearly establish that a member has a right to refute untrue statements made concerning him and which establish that privilege is involved if an hon. member has deliberately misled the House. I would cite the ruling of November 15, 1978, at page 1153 of Hansard. The Speaker at that time stated:

Order, please. I have given the hon. member the floor . . . .The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) described the position of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) to the House. If he has been inaccurate in describing that position, the hon. member for Rosedale has the opportunity to say so—

Then on another question of privilege on the same day the Speaker at that time said, as reported at page 1159:

The procedural case is quite simple. Unless I am able to find a deliberate attempt to mislead, I cannot find a question of privilege.

I would like to point out unequivocally that this House has been intentionally or unintentionally misled by the government, both through remarks made last night during the "late show" debate and in this House during the question period today by the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), and by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). They stated two things: First, that it was cheaper to keep Parks Canada in Cornwall than in Peterborough, and that is untrue; and, secondly, that it was the member for Peterborough, that is myself, who cancelled the move, or deferred the move for ten months. I would remind members opposite that we were not in office for ten months so we could not have deferred it that long.

In reality, what happened was that this government was sworn in on June 4. We implemented this proposal with Treasury Board approval in August of the same year. We notified the employees shortly thereafter that the move was a reality, and they confirmed the receipt of that notification and acceptance of it overwhelmingly.

This lobbying has created one of the most blatant cases of pork-barrelling, the like of which I have never seen before. I am sure that hon. members tend to discredit my position as a member of Parliament representing my constituents of Peterborough with untruths, statements unfounded by fact, not in accordance with the position of their own party, yet the minister stood up in the House today to say in respect of the statements made by the hon. member for Peterborough that no, they are not true.

I would remind this House that it was the Hon. Hugh Faulkner, a former minister of the environment, who put Parks Canada in place in Peterborough. It was the Hon. Judd Buchanan who first recognized it, and it was the cabinet of the Liberal government of the Thirtieth Parliament that enacted legislation and informed employees that every move of Parks Canada to Cornwall was temporary. That notice was on the wall when the employees accepted jobs in Cornwall, and they accepted their jobs on that basis.

In reality, what has happened here is that I have been discredited as a member of Parliament representing my constituents in Peterborough. There has been a complete disregard for parliamentary procedure. Questions have been ignored in the House and the members on this side of the House, whose duty it is to question the government on the decisions it makes, have been abandoned, ignored, given false answers and told untruths.

I expect that this House will give favourable consideration to the view of a backbencher who feels that he is accused of telling his constituents not all the truth, as stated in Hansard of last night by the parliamentary secretary, who said it is cheaper to keep Parks Canada in Cornwall, which is not true; as when the President of the Treasury Board stands up and says it was our decision to defer the question for that period of time, and when the parliamentary secretary to the minister says it was the hon. member for Peterborough who decided to defer the move.

In reality, it was their own government, their own ministers, their own cabinet, including the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment, who put it in place. All we did as the government, not to take credit, was to endorse their recommendation. If they continue to discredit backbenchers in the House, members of the opposition, as they are doing, then I suggest that our system of government is in serious likelihood of deteriorating to the point where the constituents of Canada will lose faith in our parliamentary process.

I would like to move:

That the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment during the adjournment debate on Monday, May 12, 1980, in which, knowingly or unknowingly, he made statements which were the reverse of the truth, namely, that the hon. member for Peterborough announced on August 3, 1979, that the Parks Canada move to Peterborough would be deferred, when in fact the announcement on that date confirmed that the move would take place, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, rising again to speak on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) regarding the move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough, I want to advise the House of this fact. The move was announced last summer by the Conservative government, by myself jointly with the hon. member for Peterborough. It was not a deferral, it was a decision which was made by a government of this country. The statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons) is made mischievously, or out of ignorance, or out of deceit. As he speaks for the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) then I am sorry to say this, Madam Speaker, but the Minister of the Environment is, for one reason or another, clearly misleading this House.

● (1510)

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member knows that he cannot use those words. They are considered to be unparliamentary, and I am sure that the hon. member can find other ways of saying what he has to say either to the minister or to his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, what I said that you find obnoxious was that "for one reason or the other, the minister is misleading the House." Earlier I said that this was being done out of mischievousness or ignorance or deceit. If Madam Speaker decides that "for one reason or another" includes deceit then, of course, I will abide by the rules of this honourable House and withdraw them.

I will say this, that what has been said by the parliamentary secretary and by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) this afternoon is just not the case. If that is not misleading the House, then I do not know what is. It may have been unintentional and I will give the hon. members the benefit of the doubt, which is more perhaps than the rest of the House will give them. But I want it very clearly understood by all hon. members, including those on the government side, that the move was contentious because the hon. member from Cornwall who is now the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley) did not want the move to go ahead. It has been well known for a long time, because during the life of the Liberal government before our Conservative government the hon. member from Cornwall made representations to the effect that he did not want the move to go ahead.

I must tell the House, through you, Madam Speaker, that on the information given to me as minister in the last Parliament it was clearly cost advantageous—

Mr. Harquail: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: This is a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may have the floor later, but for now I have given the floor to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. Fraser: I am telling the House, through you, Madam Speaker, that on the information that was given to me by my officials it was clearly cost advantageous to the public interest to make that move. I am also telling the House that hon. members opposite, who formed the Liberal government just prior to our government, ought to know very clearly that it was the same advice that was given to their minister. The information, if I can call it that, or the representations made last night by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, are clearly not true.

Let me repeat, Madam Speaker, that the decision to go ahead with the move was made last summer. There were representations brought to me and I listened to those representations. They were brought to me by the hon. member from Cornwall and by people from the town of Cornwall. After listening to these people, I made it clear to them at the turn of the year that I saw no need to change the decision which I had made last summer.

The suggestion that is being made here by the parliamentary secretary, speaking on behalf of the Minister of the Environment, is just not so. The decision was made and that decision was confirmed later, after I had received, as the then minister of the environment, certain representations from people of the town of Cornwall. These people were entitled to demand that I listen to what they had to say, but I made it clear at the meeting that anything they had to say was taken as representations, and I confirmed that I was not changing my mind.

The Minister of State for Trade has a copy of my letter which makes that point clear and which was made public at the time. The suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary about the hon. member for Peterborough is clearly not correct. No member of this House should have to take those kinds of statements made on behalf of the minister without your intervention, Madam Speaker.

I want to add one other thing. The President of the Treasury Board said a few minutes ago that his officials had advised him that there was a cost advantage in keeping Parks Canada in Cornwall. I repeat, if that is so, then there was a remarkable change in the advice given to me as the then minister of the environment by my officials as compared with the advice given to the President of the Treasury Board by his officials. I do not wish to trespass into the bounds of impropriety, but it is extraordinarily difficult for me to believe that there was such a sudden change in the cost assessment, a change that was brought about by the election of February 18.

I think that a question of privilege has clearly been raised, and the public of Canada has a right to accurate statements on events from the government of the day.

Mr. Harquail: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order for clarification purposes. The House seems to be labouring under abuse of the rules or delaying tactics. You ruled, Madam Speaker, last week that the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) was not a question of privilege but a matter of disagreement. We heard all these arguments last week and now, once again, we are taking up the time of the House to hear belaboured arguments. I would like to know from you, Madam Speaker, whether or not there is a question of privilege here.

Mr. Siddon: We are talking about last night.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first I would like to respond very briefly to what the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) had to say.

Mr. Fraser: Respond accurately; that is all that we ask.

Mr. Simmons: I will make my speech my way, not in the undignified, low manner in which the hon. member for Vancouver South made his speech.

An hon. Member: Tell the truth.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. We are all interested in clearing up this question of privilege as rapidly as possible so that the House may resume its normal program of debate. Therefore, I would ask the hon. parliamentary secretary to make his remarks as briefly as possible.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I would like to come directly to the comments made by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm). As I was saying, what the hon. member for Vancouver South had to say should not be given a response because it would only dignify his remarks.

The hon. member for Peterborough has raised a matter with regard to what I said last night. He quotes me correctly. He makes long protestations about whether he has been discredited. Yes, he has, but by himself, not by me.

Mr. Kempling: What arrogance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member quotes me correctly. It is my understanding, based on information that was given to me—I was not here at the time, as hon. members are aware.

Mr. Beatty: You won't be here for long either.

Mr. Simmons: Thank goodness that the hon. members who just spoke do not have a say in that matter, but some other people. I will be here and I will outlive most of those guys over there.

An hon. Member: Watch your blood pressure.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I am attempting to respond directly to the gist of the matter which, I must say, is not the manner in which the hon. member for Vancouver South responded. He engaged in a full ranging debate which was extraneous to the matter under discussion, whether or not there is a question of privilege.

I am saying to the hon. member for Peterborough that he did quote me correctly. The hon. member reads Hansard well. The statements which I made last night were made on the basis of information with which I have been supplied. I would be pleased to make that information available to the hon. member and, in so far as I know at this moment in time, the information is correct. It was given to me by senior departmental officials, and until I have been shown otherwise I will stand by that information.

• (1520)

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has just made a very important point; that is, that he was given that information by senior departmental officials and that he put that information on the House record. If that is the case, then I think there is an even stronger matter for a question of privilege.

What has happened is that the hon. member has not denied what he said in the House. He has, in fact, told the House that this was the information he was given. On the basis of the statement of the former minister of the environment, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), that information is false. Therefore, the hon. member who is the parliamentary secretary has said that there is a possibility that he has misled the House inadvertently.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A "possibility". He was just talking about that.

Mr. Harquail: You said that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Let us look at the real issue, Madam Speaker. The real issue is these statements. First, the parliamentary secretary said, as reported at page 995 of Hansard:

> The move was first initiated by a Liberal administration. It was deferred by a Tory administration and it was rescinded by the present Liberal administration, the present Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts).

The second statement that the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) takes objection to is that it was the administration of which he, the hon. member for Peterborough, was a part which, the parliamentary secretary said—

> —deferred the move for ten whole months—ten painful months for the people of Canada. They had it in their hands to go ahead with the move but they did nothing about it. They only deferred it.

I want to quote from a letter which the former minister of the environment, the hon. member for Vancouver South, wrote to the member for Stormont-Dundas, the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley), dated December 31, 1979. This is the letter which the hon. member for Vancouver South alluded to in terms of the final decision. The letter is available to members of the House; there is nothing to hide, but in the interests of time I shall quote only part of it. Referring to the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas, he wrote:

> You have consistently with both the former government and this government—

By "this government" he was referring to the Conservative government.

> —opposed the move on economic arguments. You well know that the former minister, who represented Peterborough—

That was the Hon. Hugh Faulkner.

> —was in favour of the move and only delayed because he did not want it to appear to be politically motivated. I understand this, but it should also be understood by yourself, the media, and the citizens of Cornwall. I was not persuaded, and am not now persuaded, that it is in the interest of Parks Canada or the public to delay the move any longer.

I am not persuaded by your economic arguments. I believe that the decision to move is the correct one from an administrative point of view, and will prove to be correct on economic grounds. The question of the move has been causing a good deal of uncertainty for a number of years. A decision had to be made, and I have made it, and, I believe, for sensible reasons.

The decision he made was to confirm the decision that had already been made by a predecessor minister and which had been deferred because of the understandable representations by the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas. The important thing, Madam Speaker, is that this decision had been made, not by the government of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), but that the statement had been made by a former government. It had merely been carried out and confirmed by the then minister of the environment on the grounds which the letter sets forth.

It could be, as the parliamentary secretary has said, that he was put in the position of inadvertently leading the House because his statement, which he has just told us was based on information from officials, is completely the reverse. His statement is as follows:

The move was first initiated by a Liberal administration. It was deferred by a Tory administration—

That is absolutely wrong according to the statements that we have, so we have a conflict. He continued:

—and it was rescinded by the present Liberal administration—

I respectfully suggest, Madam Speaker, that if you read the complete statement made by the parliamentary secretary, you will see that there is an implication in it that somehow or other the hon. member for Peterborough was involved in a way in which he says he was not involved.

I think it is important that we find the facts, particularly in view of the final statement made by the parliamentary secretary about what officials may have told him and which may have given rise to the question of privilege in the first place.

On those grounds, Madam Speaker, I think it is important that we go to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that the matter can be settled, and if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) has information which is relevant, that he be brought to the committee. Also if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has information that is relevant, that too should be brought to the committee; and documents which are now with the Department of the Environment and which have been referred to by the parliamentary secretary to the present minister and by the former minister should be laid on the table so that we can get at the truth of what has occurred.

I suppose if questions of privilege mean anything at all with respect to members of the House, they mean searching for the truth when there is a difference of such an important dimension. I should like to commend to you with respect, Madam Speaker, that you consider that and that you look at the statement made by the parliamentary secretary last night, the questions answered by the minister today, and that you defer your decision with respect to this question of privilege.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I rise on the same question of privilege, Madam Speaker. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) suggested that I was intentionally or unintentionally misleading the House with respect to my statement regarding the costs of cancelling the move from Cornwall to Peterborough. If I may, I will take a moment to clarify the statement I made to the hon. member as I intended to make it, and I undertake to the hon. gentleman to provide him with the information to which I was making reference. If I was wrong, I apologize, but these are the costs I was talking about and I thought I made it clear in my response.

I was talking about the costs of that move in terms of the lease cancellation in Peterborough, in terms of basically dealing with mortgages on homes, in terms of dealing with employees who had to be moved and relocated; in other words, the direct costs of that move. I thought my answer was clear on that point.

The hon. member says that his officials advised him that it was cost advantageous to the public, and so on, for Parks Canada to be situated in Peterborough. That, Madam Speaker, I did not intend to include in my response. That is a judgment that obviously his officials made and gave to him. I would presume that is prospective in terms of whatever advantages, in their view, might accrue to Parks Canada from being located in Peterborough.

My comment was limited to the cost of that move and its cancellation, Madam Speaker. The hon. member may wish to raise some doubt with respect to that statement and I would be happy to verify that that is my recollection of the numbers which I examined, and which I do not, unfortunately, have with me today.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, if I may also join in support of my colleague's question of privilege, I think it is most important when an allegation is made by a member of the government against a member on this side, or in fact against any member of the House, that is so obviously untrue, that the motion of my hon. friend be granted and that there be a proper referral to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I say this because I am most startled to hear a serious suggestion in this House that it was our administration that deferred the decision to move the Parks Canada office from Cornwall to Peterborough. Madam Speaker, it was our administration that agreed to the move, and up to the time that we left office that move was to go ahead, was to progress at a priority rate and was hopefully to be completed by September 1 of this year.

In support of what I am saying, I think it is perhaps wise to review the background of what led up to our decision last fall to approve the move from Cornwall to Peterborough. I would point out that, speaking historically, the proposed move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough was not, for example, part of our decentralization program. I think at the time there was some confusion on that, but this move was deliberately not referred to in my statement of July 27, 1979, at which time we reversed certain decentralization moves that the previous government had put in place.

● (1530)

The proposed move resulted from a Parks Canada administration decision that its Ontario regional operations would be more efficiently handled and its clients better served from a more centrally located regional office.

Prior to 1973, the Cornwall office served as regional office for the combined Ontario and Quebec regions, and as such it was centrally located. In 1973, however, a Quebec regional office was opened in Quebec City. As Cornwall was no longer centrally located, a study was undertaken and a cabinet document prepared in 1975 proposing that the Cornwall operation be relocated in Guelph. Cabinet approved that plan but postponed that actual move.

In 1977, in order to minimize the economic impact on Cornwall, the move was postponed until the new Transport Canada training facility became operational in Cornwall.

A second study was undertaken in 1978 in collaboration with the Ontario government which resulted in the suggestion that Peterborough should be the new location. The move, however, did not go ahead at that time, and I stress that. That was the former administration's decision, notwithstanding the recommendation from the province of Ontario that the move go ahead.

In August, 1979, the minister of the environment, and my colleague from Peterborough at that time, announced that the relocation would in fact go ahead on schedule, and that was to be completed by September 1, 1980.

As a former president of the treasury board I feel that I have a duty to this House to rise and state that there has been a totally untrue allegation made. There is misinformation before the House at the present time, and I hope, Madam Speaker, that in your wisdom you will have this matter referred to the appropriate committee so that my hon. friend's position can be clarified and substantiated. It was our decision to make the move to Peterborough. We did not defer that decision. It is the present government's decision to reverse that.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, you are being presented with two versions. On the one hand, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) and his colleagues claimed that there has been a sequence of events. On the other hand, the parliamentary secretary exposed his views; as a matter of fact, the opinions of both parties differ, and I respectfully submit that this issue should not be referred to a committee of the House and that there has been no abuse of privilege.

Madam Speaker, this is not the first time that the Progressive Conservative Party claims that it has not delayed anything, while in fact I could mention a whole series of projects which were delayed during the period that party was in power a few months ago, and I feel that the remarks made today by the parliamentary secretary deserve consideration. What he suggested, Madam Speaker, is to verify again the previous denial. It is the hon. member for Peterborough himself who, on August 3, 1979, announced the intention of his government to postpone the move. He generously offered to check that allegation and even correct it should it turn out that the information was wrong.

I think that he is open-handed, that there is no question of privilege, that the House has enough work to do without wasting its time further and that owing to that difference of opinion, even if you could generally reject outright the question of privilege, it would perhaps be advisable to wait until tomorrow when the parliamentary secretary may provide further particulars about the matter.

[English]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) is obviously not satisfied with the several answers that he has received on the matter which has been brought up in this debate. He is not satisfied, and that is a legitimate complaint, of course. But I must remind him that it is a complaint.

The question which we are now debating under a question of privilege was raised originally as a question in the House and resulted in a question of privilege on which I have ruled. Then the hon. member brought the matter up in an adjournment debate of the House, and now again he has brought it up as a question of privilege.

The fact that many of the procedures used by the hon. member did not succeed in satisfying him in the answers that he has received, of course, does not automatically qualify the matter for a question of privilege. There have been several differences of opinion and attempts on both sides to try to clarify the facts, and perhaps these facts do need to be clarified further.

Members at this point have had quite a lengthy debate on the question, but it can be pursued. There are several other avenues where debate can take place in this House. The hon. member, if he is still not satisfied with the explanations that he has received, might, for instance, put a notice of motion on the order paper, he could use the supply procedure, or bring it up on one of the days which are reserved for the opposition.

There has been reference to some documents which might help to enlighten members on the question that has been debated. There are also procedures to obtain those documents, under certain conditions, of course. But if those conditions are met and the minister is capable of tabling those documents, I suppose that they could be obtained through the normal procedure.

I have already ruled, therefore, that there was no privilege in the circumstances, and unfortunately I have to rule again that there is no question of privilege at this time.

MR. RAE—LETTER CIRCULATED BY ROYAL BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, earlier today I gave you notice and sent you a copy of a letter which, in the view of our party, raises a prima facie case of privilege on which I would like you to rule. In the event that you do so find that there is a prima facie case, I would then move a motion that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some time last week the provincial office of the New Democratic Party in Manitoba received a photocopy of a letter under the signature of a Mr. D. H. Beattie, manager of consumer and commercial banking services for the Royal Bank of Canada. This letter was drawn to my attention. I have spoken with Mr. Beattie and he confirms that this is in fact an authentic copy of a letter which he sent out. It bears the date February 22, 1980, and is addressed to the managers of all Winnipeg branches. It concerns members of Parliament.

With your permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to read the letter into the record.

> Last year, we, along with the other banks, were asked to provide information concerning close contacts which members of the banking industry had with members of Parliament. As a result of the February 18 election, the Canadian Bankers' Association is updating their information and have again solicited our support.
> Accordingly, we should appreciate hearing whether you or, where applicable the assistant managers have any business or personal contact with the two newly elected federal members of Parliament for Manitoba, Messrs. Cyril Keeper and Laverne Lewycky.
>
> In your reply, it would be appreciated if you could elaborate on the extent of the relationship, if any. In the event the manager of one of the other chartered banks in your area, in your opinion, has a better or closer relationship with the member involved, please so indicate. If you know where the MP in your area conducts his banking, this information would also be helpful.
>
> A reply by March 10, 1980, is requested, if you have any information regarding these new members.
> Yours truly,
> D. H. Beattie
> Manager
> Consumer/Commercial Banking > Services

Earlier today I took the opportunity of giving copies of this letter to the House leaders of the other parties and I gave them notice of my intention to raise this as a matter of privilege. I do not intend to make a lengthy representation but I would just point out one or two things.

First of all, the categories of contempt or of privilege are not closed. While I have been unable to find a precedent in either Erskine May or Beauchesne which would make a prima facie case of privilege, I wish to quote from page 136 of May's where it reads:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

I would point out that under the provisions of the Bank Act—the one still in force, not the one which is yet to be born—section 68(2) which deals with the statutory rights of the Inspector General of Banks reads:

> The inspector or any other person appointed or employed under section 64 or any person to whom any powers are delegated under subsection 65(4) shall not disclose to any other person, except the minister, the Deputy Minister of Finance or the governor of the Bank of Canada, or a representative of the latter if authorized by him in writing, any information regarding the business or affairs of a bank.

It would seem that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections would like to hear from the writer of this letter and indeed the Canadian Bankers' Association, which is apparently compiling information on members of Parliament. They would like to hear precisely what information they are compiling. Why do they need to know, for example, in which area or in which bank a member conducts his banking, and precisely what information on the financial relationships between a member of Parliament and his bank are now going to be subject to the lobbying activities of the Canadian Bankers' Association and its member organizations, fed into the computers and who knows where it will go?

It is obvious that systematic information on members of Parliament is being compiled. I do not think it is an exaggeration or an exaggerated extrapolation from this letter to question the extent of these lobbying activities and the way in which systematic information is being gathered, particularly at a time when matters of such importance to the people of Canada as well as to the banks of Canada are being discussed in this House.

Madam Speaker will know that our chartered banks have a long history of lobbying in this city. The Canadian Bankers' Association is a very old organization. It has been heavily involved in the lobbying behind each and every decennial review of the Bank Act. Indeed, at one time many observers thought it was the bankers themselves who were writing the legislation and not the members of Parliament.

Whether that be the case or not, I respectfully submit this does raise a prima facie case of privilege and, if you so find, Madam Speaker, I would then move:

> That the subject matter of this letter and indeed the lobbying activities of the Canadian Bankers' Association and their compiling of information on members of Parliament be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I want to say a few words on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member. To my knowledge, and I will have to defer to the record, when we were going through the Bank Act I do not believe anyone from the NDP attended any of the meetings. There were members of the Canadian Bankers' Association sitting in the audience. I do not know whether they were monitoring what was being said, but certainly any information they took down was available in the public record that was kept of those meetings. They certainly were not included in any of the meetings that were held in camera.

As far as the members of the banks gathering information on members of Parliament is concerned, I am sure anything they took down there was readily available in the public record and other records of information on members. In fact, if someone would like to consult the committee records, I had occasion during consideration of the Bank Act to comment on the fact that members of the Canadian Bankers' Association were sitting in the audience when we considered a certain part of the Bank Act.

When I went home on the weekend, I received a call from my friendly banker who informed me that I was wrong on some comments I had made in the committee. When I came back, I commented on this at the next meeting of the banking committee. Therefore, I do not see that there is a matter of privilege in so far as members of the Canadian Bankers' Association being at the meeting and taking down information that is readily available in the public record is concerned.

An hon. Member: You missed the whole point.

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, as one of the members specifically mentioned in this letter, I rise on the same question of privilege. This is a rather lamentable and questionable practice that seems to have been in existence, according to this letter, since at least 1979. It appears there is a file on all members of Parliament and systematic surveillance of all MPs. I feel this matter should be examined by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that representatives from the Canadian Bankers' Association and the banks can appear before that committee.

What we need to know is why there is such a list. What is the purpose of its compilation? What is its intended use and why was it originally initiated? What letters have been written by the Canadian Bankers' Association, to which financial institutions, what other kinds of dossiers are being kept on members of Parliament, and what is their intended use?

I am somewhat concerned that attempts might be made by the Canadian Bankers' Association to influence members through such dossiers. Perhaps we might want to consider whether consideration of the Bank Act should be held up until this question is reviewed and cleared up. I consider this a serious matter of privilege. I hope it receives the appropriate serious consideration from you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I too was mentioned in the letter. The part that concerns me most is the reference to "where the MP in your area conducts his banking." I suggest at one level my concern might be more by way of potential embarrassment. Perhaps I may not have the assets or sufficient liabilities to qualify for the new high status I now have and for the new interest in my financial affairs.

On a more serious note, clearly it is important to know just how much information is being asked for. A lot can be read into this letter. What we really need to know is whether the fears that can be read into this letter are justified. There is no way we should sweep this under the carpet and not take a serious look at it.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I did read a few minutes ago the letter addressed by Mr. Beattie to all managers of Royal Bank of Canada Winnipeg branches. There are two things to be considered. First, the letter indicates that the banks are gathering information, in this case on two members of Parliament. So we are in a situation where we know that some banks are collecting and sharing information about hon. members. I suggest this in itself is not enough to justify the question of privilege. However, there is still a second question to be raised, and that is what do banks use this information for, or what did they use it for in the case of the two hon. members concerned in the letter.

Of course, this second aspect of the matter could be clarified by a committee, but I must admit the decision Your Honour will have to make is not an easy one. The situation in which you find yourself, from a procedural point of view, is not to decide whether or not there is a matter of privilege, as you are well aware, but rather to decide whether there is a prima facie question of privilege, and then it is up to the House to decide whether privilege is involved or not.

Is there a prima facie case of privilege here or not? In the fifth edition of Beauchesne, in citation 18 on pages 11 and 23, we find a rather precise though brief definition of what constitutes violation of a member's privilege, and we see that there is violation of this privilege when certain matters "involve a member's capacity to serve the people who have chosen him as their representative" and when something is "contrary to the usage" and "derogatory to the dignity of the House of Commons."

Just before this in Beauchesne, it is said that:

> A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in Parliament.

It is also said that:

> As Parliament has never delimited the extent of privilege, considerable confusion surrounds the area.

This does not make matters any clearer, Madam Speaker. The author then adds:

> Recourse must therefore be taken, not only to the practice of the Canadian House, but also to the vast tradition of the United Kingdom House of Commons.

In this case, the hon. member who raised the question of privilege admitted with his usual honesty that there was no precedent. I do not know whether after my comments he will be able to say that there is a precedent or not, but I must repeat for your information, Madam Speaker, that we are discussing a letter circulating among banks. It is, therefore, not a letter which is being distributed among the public, at least according to present evidence. What we have to determine is whether this internal distribution constitutes or not a prima facie case of privilege. On this point, I consider that there is no violation of the members' privileges.

However, there is the second point that I have mentioned. This letter makes us wonder about the use that banks make of this information. A committee investigation could throw some light on this matter, but are we going to order investigations in all areas where there is a fear that there might be a violation of members' privileges without the House having at least serious grounds for believing that there has been a specific violation of a member's privileges or that this information now circulating among banks has been misused?

It seems to me that according to the facts which have been stated until now, there is no indication, not even a slight one, that the rights of the hon. member have been infringed upon by the internal circulation of this information. But whatever the case may be, I am very liberal when it comes to interpreting the privileges of members of Parliament. I believe that these privileges are of major importance. Your decision will not be easy to make, Madam Speaker. However, I wanted to make these few comments to show what principle Beauchesne suggests we should follow in such a matter.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to make a brief comment. I think the essence of the question is whether the information has been used to intimidate members of Parliament. If that is the case, then definitely it is a question of privilege; if not, there is no case at this time.

I understand that the Bank Act will shortly be going to committee where, I am sure, the hon. member can pursue this matter and there will be ample opportunity for it to be ventilated appropriately to ascertain the facts.

You may wish to defer your decision, Madam Speaker. It is a wonderful thing sometimes to defer decisions on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege; it is a power that the Chair has. You may want to defer your decision until there is evidence brought out before the committee, at which time it might be appropriate to raise it again. However, although there is concern, I do not see a question of privilege at this time. It could very well be that we are not under surveillance, as one hon. member indicated we are. It could be that we would be subject to a marvellous lobby. All of us are subject to lobbies from time to time. I have been lobbied by the Canadian Consumers' Association and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. Other members have been lobbied by the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Anglican Church and the Kiwanis Club. If it is that, it is innocent. But if there is other evidence which should come out before the committee, then it is not innocent and I think it might be appropriate if your Honour deferred your decision until the case develops.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I should like to lend my voice for whatever assistance it might bring in considering this question of privilege. I suspect from the context of this letter that the two members who are mentioned are not the only ones who have been scrutinized by the Canadian Bankers' Association. It is indicated in the letter that this practice has gone on for a period of time. I suggest that the letter presents a threat to members of Parliament in carrying out their duty, and therefore constitutes a breach of privilege.

What concerns me more than anything else is that information which I have discussed with my banker concerning my financial past and future may be available to those who lobby me and to other members of the House. This is dangerous. It has gone one step beyond what other members have suggested is a simple lobby. The fact that my banker might be privy to discussions with other members of the banking community about the advisability of my contributions in the House is of concern to me. I would see this as an attempt to coerce, for lack of a better term, the outcome. I consider this to be a very serious matter.

In my opinion it is fairly significant that this letter comes from the Royal Bank of Canada. I happened to be glancing through a record put out by a Philip Agee concerning the Central Intelligence Agency and I find that in the record he suggests that the Royal Bank of Canada was a funding agent for that organization. So I think we should all be vitally concerned about what happens to information given in trust to bankers regarding the activities of members of Parliament.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Madam Speaker, I would have to dissociate myself in this instance from the government House leader. It seems to me—and this has been conceded—that in all probability this is not a question of privilege. However, it is certainly a matter of serious concern, and when the Bank Act is discussed in committee obviously this question will be raised. I think it is incumbent upon the government not to wait for a question of privilege to arise. I think the government is in a position to make an order of reference to the committee to have this specific matter considered exclusive of the Bank Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The question is indeed a difficult one, nobody doubts that, but it is also very important because it could affect, it seems, the privileged communications and conversations that members can and should have with their constituents or other people, besides their constituents, who may have to provide them with information on certain issues. Since this question is not an easy one but rather a complicated one, because of prevailing trends in modern countries whereby information of this nature circulates rather freely and generally, we must, in light of these new facts, examine whether or not this constitutes a breach of members' privileges. This is, therefore, an important question and I thank the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) for raising it and especially for providing a copy of this letter to the leaders of the other parties who were thus able to provide me with informative arguments on the matter. But I will not rule today on whether or not there has been a prima facie breach of privilege. I will instead take the matter under advisement.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CANADA—STATEMENT REGARDING AGREEMENT REACHED WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I wish to inform this House in a formal way of the agreement reached between the federal government, Chrysler Canada and the Chrysler Corporation following extensive negotiations.

Chrysler Canada has presented to the federal government its corporate financing and investment plan for the years 1980 to 1985. This plan calls for an investment of approximately $1 billion to convert and expand certain of its existing Canadian facilities. This investment will enable employment in Canada to return to historic levels. The average annual employment levels included in this plan are 9,800 in 1981, 10,100 in 1982, 11,300 in 1983 and 15,900 in each of 1984, 1985 and 1986.

The government recognizes the difficulty of projecting with absolute precision employment levels that are in large part dependent on economic and market conditions, particularly in the automotive industry. As a result, one condition insisted on by the federal government is that Canadian employment will be maintained at no less than the historical average of 11 per cent, expressed as a ratio to United States employment, for the years 1982 through 1986. During 1980 and 1981, recognizing that Chrysler is now in a restructuring process, the figure shall be maintained at no less than an average of 9 per cent.

Deviation from the investment, financing, facilities or products outlined in the plan or from the proportional employment commitments will occur only with the consent of the minister.

In return for these investment and employment guarantees, the Government of Canada will guarantee loans to an amount of $200 million by financial institutions in support of Chrysler Canada's investment of about $1 billion in its operations. These loan guarantees will not begin to come into effect until 1982.

The government's offer to Chrysler Canada is also conditional on the successful achievement of the over-all financial package now being sought in the United States by the parent company, Chrysler Corporation.

Before elaborating on additional conditions and safeguards that the federal government has attached to its assistance, I wish to outline the background and considerations that were taken into account.

Chrysler Canada's difficulties arise primarily from the plight of its parent, which has been well publicized. Chrysler Corporation, until recently the tenth largest company in the United States, has suffered proportionately more than any other auto company as a result of the dramatic switch of consumer preference to smaller cars.

In 1979 Chrysler Corporation approached the United States government for help to meet the very large program of investment necessary to convert its plants to smaller car production and to meet engineering and design costs of these new products. These costs will amount to about $9 billion in the period 1980-85.

The United States government's response was to pass the Chrysler loan guarantee act, which will make available to Chrysler Corporation up to $1.5 billion in United States loan guarantees, provided comparable amounts of credit can be raised by others with a stake in the future of the corporation. These others include banks, suppliers, dealers and state, local and other governments.

Chrysler Canada approached the Canadian government last year for assistance. Although not in as serious a financial situation as its parent, Chrysler Canada sells about 80 per cent of what it produces in the United States market. It is thus unable to finance by itself the necessary investment to modernize its facilities to take part in building the next generation of vehicles needed to re-establish itself in the market.

In weighing the Chrysler request, the government had a number of considerations in mind. First, a refusal by the government to assist Chrysler Canada would have had an adverse effect on the ability of the United States parent to achieve the over-all financial package it requires. Chrysler Canada is integrated so closely to its parent's activities that demise of the parent would inevitably lead to termination of Chrysler activities in Canada.

Chrysler Canada is our country's seventh largest company of any kind. The impact of its failure on Chrysler dealers, suppliers and their employees as well as on the entire economy would be such that the government cannot ignore the implications for the country. Estimates of direct jobs at risk if Chrysler were to fail run as high as 40,000 across Canada. These include 14,000 jobs in Windsor, Ajax and Mississauga prior to recent lay-offs, close to 10,000 parts supplier jobs nationally, and some 16,000 jobs in more than 600 dealerships across the country. For example, more than 4,000 people are employed by the 160 Chrysler dealers in Quebec. There are 1,700 such jobs at stake in Alberta, 600 in Nova Scotia and some 1,200 in British Columbia. The costs of these direct job losses in terms of taxes forgone and unemployment insurance payments alone would be considerable.

These are the direct jobs at stake. Also, if a company having 40,000 employees directly depending on it should fail, the impact on indirect jobs and the economy generally would be equally substantial.

Arriving at the $200 million level of guarantees for third party loans is the result of an extensive period of negotiating with Chrysler Canada and the parent corporation. Their original request was much higher.

In addressing the question of how much assistance is appropriate, the government had specific objectives in mind. We, the federal government, wanted our contribution to ensure that Chrysler would make investments in Canada so that a new product line competitive in the market of the eighties and beyond in terms of size and fuel efficiency would be built. We wished to restore employment over time to a level comparable to that before the recent lay-offs. We felt that the federal government assistance should not be out of proportion with that being offered by the United States government. Also, we wanted Chrysler's commitments to cover its entire operations in Canada. Our objectives have been met.

In considering the form of our assistance, the government did not feel that the solution would rest in taking an equity position in Chrysler Canada. It is not a stand-alone company and is dependent on its parent and the United States dealer network for its survival. Equity participation also implies other obligations which, as a government, we do not consider appropriate to take on.

The Government of Canada will, however, receive warrants to acquire shares of Chrysler Corporation common stock in the same proportion to those received by the United States government, on the same terms and conditions. In this way, Canada will have the opportunity of sharing in the future success of the corporation whose Canadian subsidiary it is assisting.

The federal government decided against making a grant. Our assistance will, therefore, only be in the form of loan guarantees.

The money will come in the form of loans to Chrysler Canada from the private sector and not the government, but the government will insure those loans to make them possible. Obviously, some risk is involved or guarantees would not be required. However, the government has minimized its risk in the following ways.

First, the guarantees will not be drawn down until January 1, 1982, at the earliest, and thus the government is not at risk during the early stages of Chrysler's recovery. Second, the guarantees are tied to investment in Canada only. Third, conditions involving the company's entire operations in Canada, including appropriate security, have been obtained.

Repayment of the insured loan by Chrysler will be over a five-year period in equal quarterly instalments commencing six months after the launch of the van-wagon, which I will describe in a moment, but not earlier than June 30, 1984.

A specific project to which the loan guarantees will be tied is the production in Canada of an all-new, small, fuel-efficient vehicle. The vehicle is the T-115 van-wagon aimed at the market now supplied by large passenger cars, station wagons and lighter compact vans. Chrysler Corporation has granted Chrysler Canada, until the insured loan is repaid in full, an exclusive worldwide mandate to produce this vehicle. The agreement provides that, where practicable, research and development activities, including engineering support for the production of the T-115, will be conducted in Canada.

Upgrading and expanding the existing van facility in Windsor will require some $400 millions of the total of some $1 billion in investment. The Government of Canada's $200 million of loan guarantees in 1982 are to make this investment possible, but our loan guarantees are conditional on Chrysler's proceeding with its full $1 billion investment program for Canada.

In addition to the investment for the van-wagon, Chrysler Canada will spend about $250 million to improve its existing facilities for car production and to build one of the new lines of small, front wheel drive cars to be introduced in 1983. Also more than $300 million will be invested to expand and improve several existing assembly and manufacturing operations, including the Etobicoke aluminum casting plant.

The government, as a condition of assistance, has required that Chrysler Corporation restructure its operations so that Chrysler Canada operations are in large measure autonomous with respect to purchasing, marketing and production while remaining cost-effective with its competitors. This would help carry out another condition agreed to, and that is that Chrysler Canada will make every reasonable effort to source materials and components in Canada. Of course, Canadian suppliers will have to meet normal competitive requirements.

Also we have required in the agreement that Chrysler Corporation transfer pricing practices will not work to the detriment of Chrysler Canada. Under the agreement the minister has the right to appoint a director to the board of directors of Chrysler Canada Ltd. In addition, the Government of Canada will be supplied with the same reports that Chrysler Corporation has to provide to the United States Chrysler Corporation loan guarantee board.

The details of these and certain other financial conditions will be set out in formal documents. As I informed the House yesterday, I will be tabling these documents following their signing, and I will be tabling in the House the Chrysler Canada financial and operating plan, to which I referred previously in my remarks, at that time. During the negotiations the views of the Canadian director of the United Automobile Workers were obtained on certain matters relating to the agreement.

Finally, I should like to emphasize three important aspects of this agreement. We have as a government for the first time, as far as I am aware, insisted on a condition that none of the facilities of Chrysler Canada can be closed permanently without obtaining the approval of the minister. Also we have insisted, again, as I understand it, for the first time, upon a condition that employment levels in Canada will be maintained at levels at least proportional to those in the United States. Third, the Chrysler Corporation has agreed to review with the minister, once the van-wagon plant is in operation, the concept of moving the relationship between employment in Canada and the United States closer to the relationship between sales in Canada and the United States.

In addition to the federal package I have just outlined, the Ontario government has obtained the agreement of Chrysler Canada to establish a research and development facility related to aluminum and plastic applications. This facility will represent an investment of $20 million, of which Ontario will provide $10 million in the form of a grant.

[Translation]

In short, Madam Speaker, the federal government's decision to grant Chrysler loan guarantees of $200 million in return for investments of about $1 billion before 1985 will help save 40,000 jobs distributed across Canada. For example, at least 4,000 people are employed by Chrysler dealers in Quebec only, not counting the employees of Chrysler parts suppliers in that province. This decision fits into a national industrial policy which emerged recently in the electronic and aeronautical sectors and of which one of the main objectives is to ensure balanced development of all areas of Canada.

Although some risk remains I believe that on the whole the result of our negotiations with Chrysler is an equitable arrangement for Canadian workers and for the economy of the whole country.

[English]

I want to repeat that, while an element of risk continues to exist and while there are serious problems of adjustment in the entire North American automotive industry, I believe our negotiations have resulted in a fair deal and, therefore, a good deal for Canada's economy and Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, the minister has just taken 15 minutes to read into the record a press release that was made last Saturday. I wonder, other than wasting the time of the House, why he did this.

Mr. Laniel: So that you would have all the facts.

Mr. Kempling: The facts were available in the minister's statement on Saturday. They were covered in the Saturday, Monday and Tuesday newspapers. I am quite amazed that the minister would rise today and make the statement he did. In fact, we did not get a copy. We were not made aware that he would make a statement in the House until question period had begun. Usually it is courteous to inform members in other parties ahead of time that a statement will be made.

What the minister reviewed in his statement to the House is the sad state of the automotive industry in Canada. He said to the House in fact that the difficulties at Chrysler resulted from the difficulties of its parent in the United States. But the fact is that there are difficulties in the Ford Motor Company, and General Motors have difficulties this year as well. The minister knows those facts as well as I do.

We are the only country I know in the western world that produces automobiles which does not have an annual report on its automotive industry. In fact, we get most of our information on the Canadian automotive industry from the report produced by the secretary of commerce of the United States for the President of the United States. I recall this matter was discussed in 1974 in the House of Commons with the minister of industry, trade and commerce of the day. He told us that a committee of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and American automotive officials were getting together to try to rationalize the figures, because each year when the report was produced for the President there was a rhubarb in the House of Commons because of a difference in the figures that were presented.

Indeed, when one looks at how this information is gathered, one finds some very strange things. For instance, one finds that automotive parts are produced and brought into Canada in bulk. They are then broken down at the Livingston company facilities in southwestern and central Ontario. Those parts that are required for production in Canada are sent to the respective automotive plants, and those that are not required are exported out of the country. Those exports are shown on the figures from Statistics Canada as the export of an automobile when in fact they are not. In fact, the figures shown in Statistics Canada for exports and production of automobiles in Canada are quite false. Of course, this has not been attended to. We know of other instances where cars produced in the United States have been brought into Canada, the wheels are removed from them, they have been crated, exported out of Canada and are shown as a vehicle produced in Canada. We know that that is wrong.

The point I am getting to is. Had the government in 1974 put together a means of gathering the information on the automotive industry in Canada, perhaps we would not be in this position today. Perhaps the trend to which the minister referred of the Canadian consumer moving to a smaller, lighter, more fuel-efficient vehicle would have become apparent long before now. We know—everyone in the country knows—that the difficulties the Chrysler Corporation in the United States ran into were just bad management decisions. I do not have too much sympathy for bad management decisions.

I appreciate the fact that we cannot allow the number of workers involved to be thrown out on the streets, which is what would happen if Chrysler went bankrupt. I respect the fact that we have to take some move to help alleviate this situation. But the reality is that there has been talk and talk and talk for eight years about the auto pact, about the automotive parts industry, about straightening out the figures and the numbers, but virtually nothing has been done as far as I can find out.

We know, for instance, that 75 per cent of the operations of automotive parts manufacturers in Canada are American owned, yet I do not see anything in the statement made by the minister that indicates we are going to move in any way to see that the new van and the new fuel-efficient car Chrysler is going to produce will have some sort of North American content, so the aid package for Chrysler is totally North American. We do not know, for instance, whether Chrysler in its decisions will find that it can buy certain component parts cheaper outside of North America, and then come back to the government saying that is the fact of life. In fact, that is more or less confirmed in the minister's statement when he says that, of course, Canadian suppliers will have to be competitive, which we expect they will.

Looking at the employment side, the minister has tied his guarantee of employment here to a percentage of the employment in the United States, and the numbers beyond that are not too firm. The key element or key operating point is the fact that we are going to tie the employment of Chrysler Canada to a percentage of what it is in the United States.

Reading through the press release and articles that have been written about this matter, we notice that when the United States president of Chrysler and Mr. Iacocca announced that they could not guarantee job levels in Canada as Ottawa, Ontario and Chrysler officials had previously understood, they sat down on May 1 and federal officials assured Chrysler that guarantees were needed, that Ottawa would not unreasonably withhold ministerial approval if Chrysler could not approve the jobs because of the general downturn in the automotive industry. I do not think that is really a guarantee at all.

The minister has given us some numbers. He has thrown some percentages at us. In fact, what he has done here is say that we are really not going to give Chrysler anything until 1982. I assume that when the contract comes out it will indicate the terms, but in fact this world marketing facility we will have in respect of the van-wagon will end, as I understand from the statement, when the loan is repaid. I suppose we will find out, when the contract is tabled, what that term in fact will be.

The minister did not say in his statement whether the financial institutions that are to be guaranteed by the Government of Canada will in fact be Canadian institutions, institutions in the United States, in Japan or elsewhere.

We believe that some action had to be taken. In spite of the fact that my remarks have been somewhat critical, more of the way the automotive industry has been kicked around by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for a number of years, I think probably this was about the least that could be done, and in all probability exposes Canada to the least possible risk.

I do not think the guarantees that have been put forth as far as employment is concerned are really worth very much in the final analysis. We hope, of course, that Chrysler with this assistance and the assistance that will be given by the government of the United States and the province of Ontario, which is giving a sizeable $10 million grant rather than more loan guarantees, will help Chrysler find its way back into the marketplace.

The world automotive industry is in a very serious competitive position. We find that most European manufacturers are getting together and talking about using a common engine and common components. In fact, the projections in the industry indicate that in the next decade we will see about five major manufacturers of automobiles in the world. We will have to wait to see whether Chrysler will be one of those. I certainly hope that Ford, Chrysler, General Motors and American Motors will form part of that complex.

The fact is that they are all moving toward world cars or a world car design. If you consider the Chevette today, the components in that vehicle are supplied by 32 different countries in the world. The same applies to the Fiesta being made by the Ford Motor Company. In other words, the automotive industry is moving toward a car that can have components supplied by several countries. The companies go to those countries and get a duty remission, and if the market is large enough to support an assembly plant they will put one in there for this type of world car.

This is something we will have to address ourselves to when we look at the automotive parts industry, because that industry should be moving toward supplying that world market. We should not fetter that prospect in any way. We should allow them to develop and encourage them to go after the world market for some of the offshore manufacturing of automobiles in order to assure ourselves that we will have a fair share of the world market down the road.

Let me conclude my remarks by saying I am sorry that the minister chose to do things in this way. We had this statement last Saturday. I gather that what he is trying to do is get two or three kicks at the cat. Probably when the contract is made public in due course, he will make another statement and get a third kick at the cat, and in that way get the maximum publicity.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to clear up an obvious misunderstanding on the part of the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling). I asked the minister if he would make a statement in the House and he said he would. I asked him because I thought it was appropriate that, on a matter of importance such as this, he should put on the record of the House of Commons the position of the government with regard to the expenditure, in one way or another, of considerable sums of money. This is a matter that has significant impact on a very large part of the Ontario economy, if not the economy of the whole country. I thank the minister for making this statement. I think this is a much more appropriate way to deal with this matter, and I am pleased to have it.

I also want to say something to the minister lest he misunderstands. I do not for a moment downgrade or depreciate the problem that he must have had in trying to get a settlement of this matter. I do not envy him a bit, in fact, for having to deal with Chrysler. Chrysler is not one of my favourites to begin with because its record over the years has left a lot to be desired. I do not think it was an easy task for the minister. I make that point because I also do not think that what we got was very good, and that poses a problem for me.

Let me say to the minister that on a matter of principle I am becoming increasingly more concerned about the tendencies that are developing in North America whereby major corporations who, up until this point in time, have been telling us that they knew how to run everything, that if left to their own devices they would manage just fine, telling the government to keep its nose out of their affairs year after year, are now standing in line, nose to the trough, trying to get at the taxpayers' money. It concerns me, frankly. It is a very bad state of affairs.

I hope at some point we will be able to rationalize all of this, and that what we are now doing is not just simply laying the groundwork for further raids on the public treasury. The people of Canada cannot afford either to underwrite or to give by way of gift or loan to the major corporations from their tax dollars. Those tax dollars just do not go far enough. The very people who are standing in line asking for the money are the same people who were, not many months ago, screaming very loudly about the size of the deficit in the Canadian economy and about government spending. I suggest that there is an inconsistency in the way the corporate sector views its responsibility to the communities of Canada and to the people of Canada, and in the way the government views its responsibility to develop an over-all industrial strategy dealing with a major industry.

● (1630)

I do not like giving to one company in this way. I do not like this isolated, piecemeal approach. I did not like it in the case of Michelin, and I do not like it in the case of Chrysler. I do not think that this is how a government should be run. Having set up this loan guarantee operation based on a number of factors, the government has now established, I am sure, in the mind of Ford what it will have to do when it comes to get its share.

At some point the people of Canada will suddenly wake up and realize that they are paying not only for the product when they buy it, but also to finance the company when it is being developed, and that they get nothing from either one because these companies up and leave when there is a downturn in the market.

The minister said some two or three months ago that the three major items which he wanted to see in any agreement were an increased R and D component, that parts manufacturing should take place in Canada, and that employment levels should be guaranteed.

With regard to employment, I wish that simultaneous with the tabling of this document the minister could have tabled a document which set out quite clearly how this government intends to live up to its obligations to the many thousands of workers who are presently laid off in the auto industry and who are likely running out of unemployment insurance benefits.

I am not at all impressed with the proposal made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) that his department will shorten the work period in order that a person may requalify for unemployment insurance. There is no point telling someone in a community which has something close to 20 per cent of its work force unemployed that all they have to do is to find a job for a few weeks and they will be able to go back to unemployment insurance. The fact of the matter is that with an employment rate of 20 per cent they are not able to find a job at all and, therefore, that program is of very little consequence and does nothing to help people who must be helped.

It is also interesting to note that discussion is taking place in the United States at the moment with regard to assistance to workers who are laid off during this transitional period. Again, I would have hoped that the minister could have made, as he often did during the election, a statement about the need for a TAB program like the one which was in place some years ago, that he might have seen such a program as one of his priorities and made sure that it was in place at the same time as the contract was being negotiated for aid to the Chrysler Corporation. That did not happen and it disappoints me.

I have some questions, Madam Speaker. I think the easiest way to deal with them would be if the minister were perhaps to note them, and then he could respond to them. The statement which the minister tabled today and which I have had for two or three days raises more questions than it provides answers. It may well be that the answers to the questions asked in these documents will ultimately be tabled, but I hope that we can get a handle on them between now and that time so that we may better understand the document.

The minister has indicated that he is happy that some of the R and D will be done in this country. I do not read the document in the same way the minister reads it. I do not know what emphasis one puts on the words "where practicable", but I have read them so many times in so many documents, and I am not at all sure who it is who will determine what is practicable. I suspect that it will be Chrysler. If that be the case, then the term "where practicable research and development activities, including engineering, will be conducted in Canada", is not really of any major benefit to us unless we are sure that we can enforce that term.

Initially, I would like to know how the minister intends to enforce this clause. My experience in dealing with the auto pact tells me that the companies provide no more than is absolutely required and, in most instances, considerably less. If we do not have clearly set out exactly what it is that we propose should be done in Canada—for example, where it should be done and how we will monitor what is being done—then I can almost assure the minister, as I stand here now, that "where practicable" will become the operative phrase and will prove never to be practicable.

I am bitterly disappointed that we did not get a share of the K car for Canada. I have some serious questions, which I have expressed before, about the saleability of this van-wagon affair that they are talking about building. Incidentally, this promise is very much like the promise that Chrysler made to the United Kingdom in 1975 when it was looking for loan guarantees and grants from the British government. They promised to build a van then, and Britain is still waiting for it. I suspect that we might be waiting a while too. I would rather have had as significant share of the manufacturing of the K car with a mandate to move out into the world to sell that car, to source the parts for the manufacturing of that car and to tie the research and development of that car, rather than to saddle us with something that may or may not sell.

In addition to that, I notice that the front wheel drive operation offered by Chrysler Canada, as I understand it, is to be something called a down-sized Cordoba. I see the minister is shaking his head. If it is not the case, then I am delighted to hear it. I hope that when the minister rises he will tell us what it is. Is it in fact to be a down-sized Cordoba, which is what my colleague from Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and I were told by the president of Chrysler Canada about six or eight weeks ago? We were told they intended to build this down-sized car here, and we were also told that they intended to build a V-6 engine, but that has gone by the wayside as well for some reason. I would like to know more about this down-sized car and what it is we will be building. If we will be building part of the K car, then I think that we can be happy; but if that is not the case, then we must take a very serious look at what it is we will be getting. I do not see Chrysler being able to market a car in Canada other than a small car.

On page 8 of the document there is an indication that Chrysler Canada will make every reasonable effort to source material and components in Canada. I suppose one could interchange the wording and say "where practicable", because that is the same phrase. They are just new words with the same meaning. I would like to know what will be the term in the contract, that will be the proportion and what are the parts that they intend to source in Canada. Has a listing been made of the parts which Chrysler will be able to source in Canada? Has anyone looked at the various suppliers that they presently have in place, and has Chrysler suggested to the government in the course of the deliberations how much of the car in total, either in terms of dollars or numbers of parts, will actually be sourced in Canada, and where?

There is a grand opportunity here, if this car were to be successful, for the manufacturers to be successful and for the development of manufacturing processes right across this country. This car or its parts could be manufactured in any part of the country—for example in Alberta or on the east coast—where we might not have to put money into Michelin but instead into the sourcing of parts, thereby diversifying the economy of Nova Scotia, which would not be such a bad idea.

With regard to autonomy, I would like the minister to tell the House how Chrysler intends to establish this autonomy. He will remember, I am sure, that when I made my statement a week ago about how I thought we might deal with the Chrysler matter, I suggested that Chrysler Canada should be set up at arm's length from the parent company and should issue new shareholdings in Canada, and that the company should be given a mandate to operate here independent of the parent company. This would be in order that the benefits of the great expertise of Canadian workers could flow to Canada; in order that there could be some pride in the vehicle produced; in order that we could take full advantage of the opportunity; and not only that, but also in order that we would not be tied to whether or not the company is successful in the United States.

I think the minister knows, as I do, that there is very little in the way of an indigenous manufacturing process that goes on within the Chrysler Corporation. They buy most of what they use for the manufacture of cars from outside sources in any event. The tie-in between the parent company and the subsidiary operation in Canada could therefore quite easily have been set up at arm's length. They could then have purchased from the same sources because the sources are independent operations in most instances.

I think the minister might address himself to why that did not happen. Before he says it was too difficult, I want to point out that Chrysler Canada told my colleague and me at the meeting that although it would be difficult it certainly was not impossible. They said that not only was it a sensible suggestion but one which they did not find offensive, and that they might have enjoyed the independence which would have resulted from that kind of structural change. We might even have ended up with something that could be identifiably Canadian. It does not have to have—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I can hardly allow the hon. member to make his statement in reply to a statement longer than the statement itself of the minister. The hon. member has been speaking for 15 minutes, as did the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). I would therefore ask him to conclude his remarks very briefly.

Mr. Deans: I will go through the other points but not deal with them right now, Madam Speaker.

I want to go to the matter of employment very quickly. What is contained in this document is really a farce. It is simply a statement of what ought to take place as a result of the auto trade pact in any event. If the auto trade pact section 1(d) had been enforced over the years, we would have had a higher level of employment in any event. If Chrysler hopes to take advantage of the auto pact provisions, they have to provide employment in Canada.

If Chrysler does not want to pay duty on the sale of its cars in Canada, they have to provide employment in Canada. The levels of employment set out in this document provided by the minister are even lower than the levels of employment they would have had to provide under the auto trade pact in any event. The fact of the matter is that this is not a commitment from Chrysler but simply a restatement of what would have taken place even if we had never entered into any agreement. I suggest to the minister that there is something farcical about that aspect of it. It does not speak to what could have been done here.

There are many other things I should like to talk about, Madam Speaker, but perhaps the minister could answer those questions. I will be happy to hear his reply.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has made some very interesting comments by way of questions on various parts of my statement. I am glad he confirmed that I made it in the House at his specific request so that it would be formally on the record of the House of Commons. I offered to do this if the House leaders agreed. I gather there was agreement just before question period, which is why the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) did not receive the statement earlier, although, as he said, it was identical to the statement I made to a rather interested and attentive audience of journalists last Saturday afternoon here in Ottawa after the agreement with Chrysler had been confirmed that morning in Toronto.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has asked in particular who will define, for example, what "where practicable" means in the clause regarding research and development, where this development will be done and the nature of it. I want to say, first of all, as the statement points out, that it will be done in Windsor in connection with the production of the new T-115 van-wagon. It will certainly include engineering support activity. The definition of what is sufficient to meet requirements, in short, who will decide whether what is being done is practicable will be up to me or the minister of the day.

With respect to this clause and the other clauses dealing with sourcing and autonomy, if what Chrysler is doing or intends to do is not to my satisfaction or the satisfaction of the minister of the day, Chrysler will not get the loan guarantees if we are talking about what is being done prior to 1982. If we are talking about the period after 1982, since the loan guarantees are to be drawn down in instalments linked with the pace of the drawing down of loans for the construction and equipping of the van-wagon plant, if what is being done with respect to any and all clauses in the agreement does not satisfy me or the minister of the day, then the instalments of the loan guarantees will not be allowed to be put in place and those portions of the loan guarantees already there can be withdrawn. I or the minister of industry, trade and commerce of the day will certainly have a very powerful weapon to ensure that those clauses have real meaning for Canadian workers and the Canadian economy.

With respect to carrying out the agreement generally, there will be a special group of officials very closely monitoring the activities of Chrysler Canada in carrying out the agreement, an additional source of access to information will be available to us. We will be appointing a member of the board of directors of Chrysler Canada and will have exactly the same reports as Chrysler Corporation has to give under American law to the U.S. federal loan guarantee board which is responsible for administering the loan guarantees to the parent corporation under that law.

The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain asked a question about the small front wheel drive car referred to in my statement. It is my understanding that it is to be built on a K car platform. I would be happy to get further information for my hon. friend. Whatever the car ends up being called, I understand it is to be built on the K car platform.

In our negotiations I pressed Chrysler very hard about having small front wheel drive cars in production in the assembly plant in Windsor prior to the date mentioned in my statement. They replied that they had already begun retooling two plants in the United States and that the production of those plants would meet the estimated market demand, that the production of those plants was, in effect, tied to the availability of the power train components. They said to have made changes would mean, in effect, losing the investment that Chrysler had already made in beginning the retooling of those two plants in the United States. I hope that demand for these cars will grow so that we can validly raise again with Chrysler the matter of advancing the manufacture of a small front wheel drive car in the Windsor car assembly plant.

My hon. friend also asked about the matter of autonomy for the Canadian company. This will be pursuant to a restructuring plan which has to be worked out in a form regarded as suitable by me or the minister of the day. I want to repeat that this gives us a tremendous leverage to have real meaning in these clauses because, without such meaning the loan guarantees will not be available in 1982, as I have said; or if instalments have begun to be drawn down over 1982, further instalments do not have to be drawn down if the requirements of the minister are not met and existing instalments could be revoked.

The hon. member has suggested that the figures in the statement which will be in the operating plan of Chrysler for Chrysler Canada regarding employment would be lower than those they would have to meet in any event under the auto pact. I would say that the hon. member is quite wrong in this. In order to meet the requirements of the auto pact, it would be possible for Chrysler Canada to do just about what it is doing now, or less. Without the investment plan to which Chrysler is committed of $1 billion and the product mix also outlined in the financing, facilities and operations plan, we would not have the opportunity—indeed, more than the opportunity—to have employment at Chrysler Canada at the level of close to 16,000 by 1984.

It is quite possible and would be very easy for Chrysler to operate indefinitely at levels where they are operating now and meet the requirements of the auto pact, which are essentially that Chrysler produce finished vehicles in Canada at the same ratio as their sales in Canada.

I would say to the hon. member that, as far as the government and I are concerned, what we have negotiated would enable the restructuring of Chrysler Canada to take place, not simply to keep them afloat, not simply to enable operations to continue at present levels, but to enable Chrysler Canada to have products on the market that will be competitive in terms of fuel efficiency and size to meet the demands of consumers in the 1980s. This would therefore enable the restoration of employment in Chrysler plants in Canada to above pre-layoff levels and to a level of close to 16,000, with all that means in terms of employment in supplier firms, in dealers and employment in an indirect way in all sorts of other companies in Canada.

To conclude, while my hon. friend suggests that the job guarantees were—I think the word he used was farcical—this is certainly not the view of the Canadian director of the United Automobile Workers of Canada, Mr. Bob White. I see he is quoted by the Canadian Press as having praised my efforts in achieving job and investment commitments from Chrysler. I do not think that Mr. White, being a tough and skilled negotiator and a very outspoken person when it comes to putting his views on the public record, would have said that if he did not believe that the agreement was a lot better than what was suggested in the remarks of my hon. friend. In fact, I could be mistaken, but I recall a radio report indicating that Mr. White had said that the agreement which the federal government negotiated with Chrysler Corporation and Chrysler Canada was the best agreement that could have been achieved under the circumstances.

These circumstances are very important. They involve the present situation of Chrysler Canada and the situation of the parent, as well as the reality of the very uncertain automotive market, not just now but for a number of years to come.

I say that on balance, and again repeating the words of the Canadian director of the UAW who represents the interests in terms of collective bargaining of the workers at Chrysler and its supplier firms, that this is a fair deal, and therefore a good deal for Canadian workers and the Canadian economy.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few comments. First, I greatly appreciate the efforts of the government. I said so during oral question period and the minister has surely received, as I did, the views of dealers in our respective constituencies who surely welcome the agreement, the government proposal which will finally allow us, as he said, to maintain 6,000 jobs, especially in Quebec.

I refer now to page 8. I hope that Chrysler Corporation will be in a position to find a source of materials and components in Canada. My question this afternoon—I now take this opportunity to refer to it—dealt with supplies and the minister will understand that we are talking about 6,000 jobs in Quebec, jobs which are directly or indirectly related to Chrysler Corporation. He also speaks of saving 40,000 jobs across Canada. Granted that is a high figure for the province of Quebec but it is still relatively low compared with the over-all Chrysler work force. I wondered to what extent representations were made to the minister. I should like to take this opportunity and ask him about the possibility of perhaps giving some consideration to subcontracting industries because, as the minister knows, where Quebec is concerned, there is very little direct participation in the manufacturing industry. I should like to know, in view of that $1 billion investment, just what could be considered as a legitimate and reasonable share of those investments for Quebec, in terms of manufacturing parts, if not the whole automobile.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I trust one of the results of the agreement between Chrysler and the federal government will be a sharing of the opportunities to manufacture parts throughout the country. Of course, that will depend in a way on the willingness of suppliers to tender for making such parts. Once again I want to mention to my hon. friend that Chrysler Canada already has important suppliers in the province of Quebec. For instance, Goodyear Canada Inc., at Valleyfield, supplies tires to Chrysler; Waterville Cellulose Products of Waterville, in the province of Quebec, supplies parts to Chrysler. I must not forget, above all, to mention Firestone Canada Ltd. which also manufactures tires for Chrysler and is operating out of the city of Joliette in the very riding of my hon. colleague.

[English]

Madam Speaker: It being so late, perhaps we could terminate the questioning after the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. I see there is another member rising, and I will recognize just one more after the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I have three brief questions for the minister.

Could the minister confirm my understanding that up until this time there were in fact three major plants in Windsor, a van plant, an engine plant, a V-8 plant, and the Cordoba-Newport car assembly.

With respect to the van plant and the transfer to the new T-115, the world product mandate for the van, according to the minister's statement, runs out as soon as the company pays back the loans which the government is guaranteeing. Can the minister tell us whether he tried to get the world product mandate extended beyond that time so that Canada would be producing at least one world product, not just for a short period of time but for a longer period of time? Could he tell us why he was unsuccessful in that regard?

Second, can the minister confirm that, as of August, 1980, there will be no engine production in Canada?

Third, I noticed that he tells us with respect to the car assembly plant that none of the facilities of Chrysler Canada can be closed permanently without obtaining the approval of the minister. Now, the question as to what is a permanent closure will be an interesting discussion. For example, when one looks at permanent lay-offs in an industry under the employment standards act of Ontario, this is a subject which has gone all the way to the Supreme Court of Ontario. It has been ruled that a permanent closing can be one that lasts for as long as a year, or even two years, under certain conditions.

If the market for larger cars continues to collapse the way it has collapsed, will the minister agree that there is a possibility that there will be very dramatic lay-offs in the car assembly plant until the time, 1983, for the construction of the K cars? Those are my three questions, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the world product mandate will extend not simply to the period of time ending when the plant is in production, but during the time of repayment of the loan, which I believe is at least five years after the plan begins operation. I think that that is quite an extensive period to market several models of a product of this type.

It would seem to me that if this product is successful, Chrysler would be most unlikely to discontinue the world production mandate for this van-wagon in the Windsor plant. As to whether anything additional could be obtained, there were very arduous negotiations and I can tell the House that if it were left up to Chrysler there would be no job guarantees whatsoever in the agreement. The words "jobs" would not have appeared anywhere in the agreement. There would have been no employment figures in it whatsoever. I refused to accept that on behalf of Canadian workers and the Canadian economy. In spite of what Mr. Iacocca was saying at that press conference in Detroit the other week that there would be no job guarantees, we have job guarantees which the Canadian director of the UAW said were the best that could be obtained under circumstances that we are all so aware of in the North American automotive market.

● (1700)

With respect to engine production in Canada, it happened that before a final decision was made by the government of the nature and extent of aid to Chrysler Canada, Chrysler Corporation decided not to make the V-6 engine, which had been contemplated for the Windsor plant, anywhere in its operation. It decided it would purchase that engine elsewhere. The reason was it felt that to stay alive it had to cut $1 billion from its investment plans for North America, and the engine plant was included in that. I suppose that if the government had wanted to put up a couple of hundred million dollars more, it is theoretically possible that the plant might have stayed. But once—

Madam Speaker: Do I have the consent of the House not to see the clock for a few minutes so that we can hear the answer of the minister and entertain a question from the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray: I thank the House for its courtesy. I will conclude my answer in a couple of minutes. Once the government had decided that our assistance to Chrysler should be in the same form as, and generally proportional to, the kind of assistance provided by the U.S. federal government—that is to say, loan guarantees in the amount of $200 million—then I had to negotiate to get the best possible deal within that mandate for Canada and Canadian workers.

Frankly, what we have here will create, if everything works out and the products are accepted in the market, more jobs for Canadian workers in total than if the package had been built around the engine plant. On balance, I have to opt for restoration of jobs and for better, if everything works out, than simply some obviously interesting form of technology that would not have provided the jobs which, in my view, have to be our first priority and were my first priority at the outset.

To conclude, I want to answer my hon. friend's third question about the closing of plants. As I said in my statement, for the first time in any agreement that I am aware of between the government and a company, the agreement covers all the facilities of the company. It is not like the Ford agreement which applied only to the new Essex engine plant; it applies to all the facilities. I said when the content of the Ford engine plant agreement became known that there were lessons in that which I was trying to apply to the Chrysler situation, and it is obvious that I did so.

As to the definition of the word "permanent", I would again say that in my view that is up to the minister because it is the minister who decides whether the company is living up to its agreement such that it can get loan guarantees, or whether loan guarantees will remain in place.

The agreement has two very important aspects—and I am just coming to my conclusion, Madam Speaker—that will prevent that clause from, in effect, meaning a permanent closure of any plant. In fact, first of all there is the requirement to maintain employment in Canada proportionate to the employment of Chrysler in the United States. If a product, in my view, that is being manufactured in a Canadian plant is not selling and, as a result, it would mean that the employment in that Canadian plant would not be proportional to employment in the United States, the minister could require that steps be taken by Chrysler to have products in that plant to bring employment back to the proportional level, or he could refuse to authorize the loan guarantees to be put in place or remove them.

There is another very important aspect in the agreement, and that is that it is based on the total product facilities and financing plan which deals with product mix. There is no way that Chrysler could meet the obligations it has entered into by committing itself to the operating plan with respect to product mix if it did not use generally over the period of time covered by the agreement, in my view at least, all its facilities. This does not mean there could not be lay-offs or even temporary closings in response to market conditions, but in my view it would not be possible for Chrysler to meet the requirements of the plan with respect to product mix and the requirements of the agreement with respect to proportional employment if it intended to close permanently the plants that are covered by the agreement.

I repeat, in conclusion, Madam Speaker, there are many points that could be debated in this agreement. One could always argue that one clause might have been better or another clause might have been better; but looking at the balance of the agreement, after very arduous negotiations on behalf of Canadian workers and the Canadian economy, I repeat that I believe we have a fair deal, and therefore a good deal for the Canadian economy and for Canadian workers.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I just have one and a half short questions. The part of the minister's statement that has really concerned me, and I raised it as part of a question the other day, was the statement on page 8 where he says: "Of course, Canadian suppliers will have to meet normal competitive requirements." I believe the minister is aware that about 75 per cent of the automotive component producers in Canada are subsidiaries of American companies, and those companies in many cases have no sales staff. They merely have a production facility here. They build upon demand order from their parent company in the United States.

Under those circumstances, I do not see how they can possibly be competitive. If the minister had said in his statement that they were going to encourage the Canadian automotive parts industry to move into a large orbit so that they could have larger and longer production runs in order to be competitive, that would be something else again. I am concerned about that.

Secondly, I am still not happy with the suggestion here that we also required in the agreement that "Chrysler Corporation transfer pricing practices will not work to the detriment of Chrysler Canada." I question why that statement is in there. There is a lot of hanky-panky can go on in transfer pricing. There are a lot of head office charges that can be transferred from the United States to Canada. Almost every component that goes into an automobile bears part of the cost of research and development, part of the overhead, part of advertising and a myriad of other charges.

I want the minister to comment on this. Transfer of pricing practices is something that is going to have to be watched very closely, because therein lies whether or not this company is going to fly or fall down the tube in Canada.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quite right when he says the transfer pricing practices between Chrysler Corporation and Chrysler Canada will have to be watched very carefully, because there are various ways that transfer prices with respect to goods and services between a parent company in another country and a subsidiary in Canada can be adjusted—I was going to say manipulated. Perhaps I will. I will say manipulated in a way that is adverse to the interests of the subsidiary. It is because of these considerations that we insisted that a clause that transfer prices could not be developed in a way adverse to the interests of Chrysler Canada be put in the agreement. This is one aspect along with all the other aspects that will be monitored very closely.

● (1710)

My hon. friend has raised an interesting point with respect to purchasing by Chrysler Canada from Canadian parts manufacturers. I think that the aspects about which he is concerned will be dealt with in two ways. First of all, the restructuring plan on which we will be insisting under the agreement to make Chrysler Canada more autonomous will have in it the requirement for a Canadian-based purchasing department which will be in a position to seek out more actively than is the case at present Canadian suppliers for the production of Chrysler Canada, and that of the parent corporation for that matter.

Second, this agreement is not intended to cover the whole range of improvements we want to see in the Canadian automotive industry. This deals with what is almost an emergency situation, but obviously we have a number of other objectives we wish to accomplish for the Canadian automotive industry as a whole, for the Canadian parts industry in particular and its Canadian-controlled component.

We intend to have in place measures to make it easier for Canadian parts manufacturers, whether they are subsidiaries of foreign parent companies or Canadian-controlled firms, to be more competitive in terms of longer production runs, in terms of having the capital necessary to take advantage of sourcing opportunities to be made available as automobile manufacturers, including Chrysler, retool in order to meet product demands of the eighties. It is in this direction that we will respond to concerns raised by the hon. member which are the concerns raised by myself on a number of occasions which form part of my priorities for the Canadian automobile industry.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I said previously that I would recognize only the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling). It being so late, I must keep to that. Now I am in the hands of the House as to whether we should continue with routine proceedings or proceed to private members' business, or whether we should defer it until eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Do it now.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 53, 330, 400, 564 and 565.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Question No. 53—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Between April 20, 1968 and the date the former government resigned from office, how many orders in council were passed?

2. (a) How many are available for public scrutiny (b) how many are in any way classified?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. 37,535.

2. (a) Except for pardons, all orders in council are available for public scrutiny. In the case of salaries, the salary range is public information but the actual salary of the incumbent is not made available.

(b) One.

NORDAIR LIMITED—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 330—Mr. Herbert:

How many (a) permanent (b) other employees were on the payroll of Nordair Limited as at March 31, 1979?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: (a) 1,113; (b) 71.

YELLOWKNIFE TRANSPORTATION COMPANY LIMITED—REVENUE

Question No. 400—Mr. Herbert:

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1977 (b) 1978, what was the total revenue and net earnings or deficits of the Yellowknife Transportation Company Limited?

2. For each year, what was the total (a) of direct or indirect subsidies or other benefits conferred by the government on the corporation (b) of loans, advances or guarantees extended by the government to the corporation (c) investment by the government in the corporation both before and after any write-off?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yellowknife Transportation Company Limited has been inactive since 1966.

2. Nil.

ROUMANIA—DIPLOMATS IN CANADA

Question No. 564—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names, job designations and dates of arrival in Canada of all persons who are accredited diplomats from Roumania?

2. What are the names, job designations and dates of arrival in Canada of all persons serving the Roumanian diplomatic service who are either non-Canadians or Roumanian Nationals?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

Accredited Diplomats from Roumania

Name	Title	Date of Arrival
Barbu Popescu	Ambassador	November 30, 1975
Gheorghe Baltac	Counsellor	September 29, 1979
Iaon Sebastian Anastasescu	Second Secretary	October 31, 1974

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That a sum not exceeding $20,003,428,213.05 being the aggregate of:

(a) nine-twelfths of the total amounts of the items set forth in the Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1981, laid before the House of Commons on April 22, 1980, with the exception of Social Development Vote 1, $18,701,054,379.72;

(b) an additional three-twelfths of the total amounts of Energy, Mines and Resources Vote L35, External Affairs Votes L35, L40 and L45, Regional Economic Expansion Vote 30, Transport Vote 35 and Treasury Board Vote 10 (Schedule A) of the said Estimates, $77,607,000.00;

(c) an additional two-twelfths of the total amounts of Agriculture Vote 10, Employment and Immigration Vote 30, Energy, Mines and Resources Votes 1 and 15, External Affairs Vote 15, Finance Vote 5, Indian Affairs and Northern Development Votes 15, 30, L35 and L40, Industry, Trade and Commerce Votes 10, L30 and L40, Justice Vote 5, Labour Vote 5, Public Works Vote 35, Secretary of State Votes 20, 55, 80 and 105, Transport Vote L95 and Treasury Board Vote 5 (Schedule B) of the said Estimates, $675,361,325.00;

(d) an additional one-twelfth of the total amounts of Communications Vote 10, Employment and Immigration Votes 15 and 20, Energy, Mines and Resources Vote L80, Environment Vote 30, External Affairs Vote 25, Indian Affairs and Northern Development Votes 20, 45 and L50, National Defence Votes 1 and 5, National Health and Welfare Vote 10, Privy Council Votes 1 and 20, Public Works Vote 30, Secretary of State Votes 15, 30, 50, 65 and 85, Supply and Services Vote 1 and Veterans Affairs Vote 25 (Schedule C) of the said Estimates, $549,405,508.33; be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1981, be read the first time and be printed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Johnston thereupon moved that Bill C-29 be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

[English]

Madam Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I ask that all bills preceding Bill C-209 be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO SHORTEN PERIOD WITHIN WHICH BYELECTIONS TO BE HELD

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot) moved that Bill C-209, to amend the House of Commons Act (vacancies), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, in all fairness to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), and if there is unanimous consent, we should allow private members' hour to continue after six o'clock.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, the intention of Bill C-209 is to bring some order to the calling of byelections where there is the appearance of there being no order. At present the situation is such that not only members of the House but also their constituents are led to believe that there might be some playing around with the calling of byelections.

It happens that from time to time an extraordinarily long time elapses, sometimes exceeding three years, before a vacancy in the House is filled. At other times there would appear to be a parallel between the calling of a byelection by the government and the result of a Gallup poll which might be favourable to the government party and thereby trigger the initiation of a signal for a byelection. It is certainly not for me to impute motives to the government in the calling of a byelection at a given time, but so long as that suspicion remains among members or, what is more important, among constituents, it behoves us as members of Parliament to establish a system whereby byelections are called in accordance with an organized plan rather than at the whim of a government, whichever government it might be.

The intention of my bill is that, in the case of a resignation, a byelection would be called no later than 90 days following the resignation; and in the case of a death it would be called no later than 135 days following the death of a member. The reason for the difference in the number of days is that it seemed prudent, as well as courteous, in drafting the bill to ensure that in the case of a death a period of mourning be allowed for in a constituency. This would allow constituents to have a period of mourning prior to the calling for nominations before a byelection takes place.

The intent of the bill would be nullified six months prior to the normal termination of a Parliament.

I think it is fair to say that byelections should be for the benefit of constituents who are without representation. They ought not to be for the purpose of serving a government in power, whatever its motives might be. In moving this motion I want it to be understood that our first and primary concern—and I hope it would be that among members of all parties in this chamber—should be the citizens of Canada who in some instances have gone unduly long without representation.

I bring this bill forward as a result of some personal experience.

Mr. Benjamin: Don't talk out your own bill.

Mr. Malone: When I was first elected to this House by the constituents of Battle River, I came here following the unfortunate death of my predecessor, Harry Kuntz. For more than a year his riding was without representation. I recognized the great frustration there was in my constituency when constituents did not have a member to whom they could go or someone upon whom they could call.

Because I come from a province which has traditionally voted for a party not aligned with the government of the day, the appearance was that the reason my constituents did not have representation was that such representation would not be of assistance to the government. Therefore, a byelection was held off.

In Canada presently the writ must be announced within six months of the time a seat is declared vacant. The unfortunate part is that even if that were adequate, the government could announce the byelection for any date, including four or five years down the road. That means that we could wait as long as six months to hear when a byelection would take place. That can and does happen, as it did in the case some years ago when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) came to this House. He came following a byelection which was the result of the passing of his predecessor, but the byelection was called for a date which would have to be at a time in which a general election would already have had to have been called.

Under today's parliamentary system the government is not bound at all ever to fill a vacancy if it should so choose. I think that leaves us in a position where our citizens are not well served. They are given no assurance or guarantee of their parliamentary system, and I think it behoves us to take into account the fact that constituents across Canada require a greater guarantee.

I have been a member of Parliament for six years. I have reflected for that period of time upon bringing some information to this House with respect to byelections. During the time I have been a member of Parliament 18 constituencies have been without members of Parliament for more than 200 days. In that same six-year period seven constituencies were without members of Parliament or representation for more than 300 days, and five were without representation for more than a year.

We should take into account the frustration there is in constituencies. All of us here need simply to reflect upon our own workloads to know the number of people who contact us each day and the sense of frustration there must be among constituents who have the same concerns as any other citizens in Canada but who have no one to whom to turn or relate.

That is why this simple amendment to the House of Commons Act would provide that, in the case either of a death or a resignation, there would be a period of not more than 90 days or not more than 135 days in which a byelection would be called.

It is also interesting to note that the average number of days before elections were held in ridings which were held by Liberal members was 205 days. This is during the period of time I have been here. When a Progressive Conservative, New Democratic Party or Social Credit seat was vacant, the period was 287 days. When we consider that, we can say that it took longer for an opposition member to have his byelection called. I do not think the number is significant enough to reflect a charge that it was purely for partisan reasons that a government would call a byelection at some particular time, but the fact is that, be it for government members or opposition members, the time is simply far too long to allow a constituency to be without a member. When we combine the figures both for the government side and for the two opposition parties and average them, it should be noted that seats have been vacant before byelections an average of 251 days. There have been some 27 byelections in that six-year period, 23 the result of resignation and four the result of death.

By contrast, we should look at other democracies around the world. In the United States, upon the death or resignation of a senator or congressman the governor of the state affected is empowered to appoint someone immediately to fill the vacated position.

In Great Britain the Speaker issues a warrant to the clerk of the Crown, who immediately issues a writ for byelection as soon as the Speaker notes that the seat has been vacated, and nomination papers must be filed—and this is interesting—no later than nine days after the writ has been issued.

In Sweden every member has an alternate candidate who immediately takes the seat as soon as it is declared vacant.

In The Netherlands the seat is immediately filled by the first person who is priorized on the list of the party which forms the government. As soon as a seat is vacant the other person on that alternate list takes his place.

In countries such as Australia and New Zealand, when a seat is vacated it is almost immediately filled so that constituents can have representation.

When a bill somewhat similar to the one I am presenting today was proposed on November 25, 1977, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) responded in part with the following words: "The cost of byelections is something which has to be taken into consideration because they are extremely expensive." Surely that is one argument we can dispel. Considering the money spilled every day in the operation of government, surely it does not make any sense to leave a seat vacant and people without representation for more than 200 days. In my six years the average has been 251 days. It should not make sense to us as parliamentarians to say to constituents that we would like to give them representation but it costs too much, because I do not think that washes in a democratic society, nor with the constituents who are without representation.

Further, the hon. member for Trinity argued against the bill on the basis that, without the government's prerogative of flexibility, we might be forced into a winter election, and how could we hold an election in places such as Yukon? If that was a valid argument in 1977, surely after the experience of 1980 it no longer is valid. Otherwise, members of the Liberal party would say that the last election should be thrown away because it was a winter election.

If we held an election again this summer, I think we would get better results. Nevertheless, we have had winter elections in Yukon and in the two Northwest Territories constituencies. In most of those northern provincial ridings, they all had elections this past winter. Simply I would say that when the argument comes as to representation versus whether you hold it at some time of the year, the fact of the matter is we are Canadians and we have winter every year. That is something which should not bother us. It might be chilly, but nevertheless the ink still goes on the ballot.

My good friend who is a member of the government party now, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette), in that same debate of November, 1977, indicated that one of the advantages of the present system is that it allows the government to call byelections in a group which affords the government and opposition parties an opportunity to sound out public opinion. I think it is a blatant use of the byelection to say that we will hold them off and have them all in a group and that, when we hold them in a group, it will be some signal to the government or the opposition as to what some feeling or mood is out among the constituencies of Canada. The purpose of Parliament is to give a representation to the citizens of Canada. The purpose of holding byelections is to allow those citizens to continue their representation. The purpose of byelections is not to serve government or opposition parties, because there are other means and mechanisms for doing that.

If any members of this House, in reviewing the bill I have drafted and presented to the chamber, find that in some way they want to make some amendment to it in time or in some choice, I would be agreeable to that. But I am sure that on principle virtually all Canadians feel this is the kind of system we ought to lock into our parliamentary forum for the purpose of giving some sense of continuity and some sense of order to the calling of byelections, so that at least there will be the belief in the public that those byelections were called for the needs of the constituents and not for the purpose of a government holding on to power, extending its power, or doing whatever it might that would appear to be self-serving, even if that were not the motive of the government of the day.

With that in mind, I would simply want to say that there are other advantages to this bill which I could extend. There are many other countries we could reflect upon that have systems in place which assure that seats do not go vacant for extraordinary periods of time. I have had some private conversations with members of all parties in this Parliament. At least I know there is a private desire among many members of different political persuasion that such a bill be passed. I hope and urge that members will not talk this bill out until 6.15 p.m. or whatever time is allotted.

Mr. Rose: That is what you are doing.

Mr. Malone: I hope this bill will pass and go on to committee stage, so that whenever there is a vacancy the constituents will be assured, by the guarantee of Parliament, that they will have the right very quickly to have representation in a continued way, rather than this appearance at the present time that it is simply the will of the government that calls the date of a byelection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the bill before us, Bill C-209, an act to amend the House of Commons Act with regard to vacancies.

The present law with regard to the timing of the issuing of a writ for a byelection to fill a vacancy in the House of Commons is set out in subsection 13(1) of the House of Commons Act, which stipulates the following:

> In the event of a vacancy occurring, a writ shall be issued within six months after receipt by the Chief Electoral Officer of the warrant for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member of the House of Commons.

It should be noted that the six-month period referred to in subsection 13(1) is the maximum amount of time within which a writ must be issued. Although the writ must be issued within that six months, there is no limitation on when the polling day specified in the writ must be.

Subsection 13(1) does not apply where the vacancy, in respect of which the warrant has issued, occurs within six months of the expiry of the time limited for the duration of the House of Commons.

Section 107 of the Canada Elections Act provides the following:

> Notwithstanding anything in this or any other act, where a writ has been issued ordering a byelection to be held on a date subsequent to the dissolution of Parliament, the writ shall, after a notice to that effect has been published in The Canada Gazette by the Chief Electoral Officer, be deemed to have been superseded and withdrawn.

A final provision of the Canada Elections Act that should be kept in mind in any discussion on the timing of byelections to fill vacancies in the House of Commons is rule 27 of Schedule A to section 18 of the act which, by prescribing by statute that the ex officio revising officer must, not later than the forty-fifth day before polling day, appoint substitute revising officers, requires that the length of a byelection campaign must be a minimum of 45 days. The bill now before us would reduce the time within which a writ for a byelection to fill a vacancy in the House of Commons must be issued from six months to 45 days. It would also require that the polling day specified in the writ be within a certain time after the happening of the event causing the vacancy.

Subsection 2 of the proposed new section 13 of the House of Commons Act would require that the polling day named in the writ be no more than 90 days after the day a member tenders his resignation or accepts an office under the Crown. Subsection 3 would require that the polling day named in the writ be no more than 135 days after the date of the death of a member.

Similar bills to the one now under consideration have been introduced in every session of Parliament since the opening of the Thirtieth Parliament, particularly in the fourth session of the Thirtieth Parliament. The need for such legislation to require that vacancies in the House of Commons be filled in the most expeditious manner in order to ensure that all Canadians are properly represented in the House, is best illustrated by examining the vacancies that occurred between June 25, 1977, and May 2, 1978, which in turn were filled by byelections held on October 16, 1978. The usual practice is that when the Speaker of the House of Commons is notified of a vacancy in the House of Commons, he immediately addresses his warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy. The Chief Electoral Officer usually receives the warrant on the same day the Speaker has been notified and has issued his warrant.

The writ specifying polling day for the byelections must be issued within six months after the receipt by the Chief Electoral Officer of the Speaker's warrant. However, in the case of the vacancy in the electoral district of Lotbinière in the province of Quebec, although the vacancy occurred on June 25, 1977, the Speaker was not officially informed of the vacancy until October 27, 1977, on which date he issued his warrant which was received by the Chief Electoral Officer on the same day. The writ for the byelection in Lotbinière was issued on March 1, 1978, and specified October 16, 1978, as polling day. Therefore it is evident that in the case of the vacancy which occurred in Lotbinière, there was a time period of approximately 18 months in which the people of that constituency were without representation. It can be seen that although the writ was issued just over four months after the Chief Electoral Officer received the Speaker's warrant, it was issued just over eight months after the seat actually became vacant. That is far too long for the people of Canada to be without representation in this House.

If we examine the other 14 electoral districts where byelections were held on October 16, 1978, we find that writs of election for Lotbinière and eight others were issued on March 1, of that year. The relevant dates with regard to the eight electoral districts other than Lotbinière are as follows: Fundy-Royal, New Brunswick, the date of vacancy was September 1, 1977; Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, British Columbia, September 5, 1977; Hamilton-Wentworth, Ontario, September 14, 1977; York-Scarborough, Ontario, November 9, 1977; Halifax-East

Hants, Nova Scotia, December 9, 1977; Westmount, Quebec, January 27, 1978; and Rosedale, Ontario, March 1, 1978.

On September 1, 1978, writs of election were issued for seven additional electoral districts, with polling day to be on the same day, October 16, 1978. The relevant dates with regard to those seven electoral districts are as follows: St. Boniface, Manitoba, the date of vacancy was March 23, 1978; the date of the warrant was April 3, 1978, rather quickly again, and the warrant was received by the Chief Electoral Officer on April 3 as well. For Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, Newfoundland, the relevant dates were March 23, April 3, and April 3 respectively. Likewise for Parkdale, the relevant dates were March 23, April 4, and April 4; for Saint-Hyacinthe, Quebec, the date being April 21, and so on down through to Eglinton, Ontario, the date being May 2, 1978.

● (1740)

It can be seen from the above that in the case of the last of the 15 vacancies to occur, in Eglinton, in Ontario, the writ of election was issued almost exactly four months after the vacancy occurred, and the byelection was held approximately five and a half months after the seat became vacant.

It should also be pointed out that in the case of the last seven vacancies referred to earlier, the byelections were held within the absolute minimum amount of time after the writs were issued, namely, 45 days. The last seven writs were issued on September 1, 1978, and the byelections were held on October 16, 1978.

Even though seven of the byelections were held within the minimum possible time after the writs were issued, the minimum amount of time between the date of the vacancy and the date of the byelection, in the case of Eglinton, was approximately five and a half months. That again is still far too long for people to be without representation in this House.

Bill C-209 would reduce the length of time which an electoral district may remain without representation from an indeterminant time to a maximum of 135 days in the case of the death of a member of Parliament and a shorter time of a maximum of 90 days in other cases such as a vacancy occurring as a result of the resignation of a member or by his accepting an office under the Crown. Those time limits seem reasonable to me.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although there is always room for discussion of what precisely the limits on the discretion of the government in regard to the timing of byelections should be, I would like to indicate my support for the principle expressed in this bill put forward by the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I only want to rise briefly to support the bill of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone). I hope the government will accept it. We have had crazy situations occur in respect of byelections when vacancies resulted in this House. I remember that in 1971 almost six months elapsed, and finally a colleague of mine gave official notice to the Speaker of the vacancy. Then the government had six months more, or longer, to call the byelection.

Many of us have felt for a long time that when a vacancy occurs it should be the responsibility of the Speaker to give notice of the vacancy, because the Speaker and the administration of the House of Commons know when the pay allowances stop and a pension starts. That should be sufficient notice of the vacancy, and the Speaker could so advise the House. The government would then have a very limited period of time in which to call a byelection.

We agree with the legislation and hope the government will accept it so that it can proceed to the committee where, I am certain, it will be dealt with quickly. It can then come back here and become the law of the land. We will then no longer have those spectacles which have occurred in previous decades, resulting from the playing around with the calling of byelections to fill vacancies in this House. I agree with what both previous speakers have said. Every constituency in the country is entitled to representation full time in this Parliament. While I might feel that the length of time the hon. member's bill provides is a little bit too long, we will not argue over details. Let us get it done.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to say a few words on Bill C-209. The sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), has cited a number of precedents in other jurisdictions, giving examples of how it is done elsewhere. I want to respond quickly to one or two of the points he has made before addressing myself to the substance of the bill.

He cites what is the practice in the British system, and, while that certainly has some merit from his point of view, I would caution him about the British system where the calling of a byelection is automatic, with the result that there is no interference or decision required by the government of the day or the prime minister. Because of the automatic nature of the British proceeding it is possible for a member to be returned in a byelection, as ludicrous as it sounds, after the House has been dissolved. Indeed, that very circumstance happened in a most recent case where the Labour government fell and there was a member returned three days after the government had been defeated in the House and a date has been set for a new election. While he may see some merit in systems elsewhere, he should be aware of the weak points of those practices.

An hon. Member: We can fix that up in committee.

Mr. Simmons: I am sure we can fix it up in committee.

I find members of the NDP suddenly very co-operative. They are in a co-operative mood and are suddenly for something. They suddenly have a position on something, and that alone makes history in this particular chamber. I am not sure what it is they are for. They are for more talk in committee, and they are very good at that. They have often come down on both sides of things. I advise the hon. member for Crowfoot not to hold his breath in terms of getting support from the NDP on this particular issue. All they are saying now is that they will talk about it, but they may come down on both sides of it as they did on the guns and butter issues last February, and as they are doing on the referendum issue right now. Unfortunately they are on both sides of that one too. They will help the hon. member in committee. They will do some talking for him, but I hope he does not count on their vote.

I say to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Crowfoot, that he can count on my vote if it comes to the committee because I support the principle of the amendment he proposes in this chamber today. The principle is good, and I agree with his sentiments that the people of any particular constituency in this country should not be victimized by being without representation in their Parliament because of circumstances beyond their control, such as the death of the incumbent or the resignation, for whatever reason, of the incumbent. I do not think anybody in this chamber can dispute the principle of his bill.

I want to raise with the hon. member one other matter. I listened very carefully to what he had to say in respect of Bill C-209, and he did not say where his party stood on this particular piece of legislation. I waited to hear that. We all know what happened to the gentleman who rose to speak at the same time I did, that hon. member who sponsored what may well be, or would have been but for his leader, a history-making resolution in this chamber late last week.

Those two members, the hon. member for Crowfoot, and the hon. member who proposed the resolution the other day, ought to get together, because I suggest to my friend, the hon. member for Crowfoot, that his colleague had a very bitter experience the other day. He moved a resolution which had the unanimous support of those in the chamber at that particular time, and I say to him that is what is important. Those who were in the chamber at that time, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the opposition House leader and the House leader for the New Democratic Party, supported the resolution unanimously. However, the hon. member's mistake, and I wonder if it may also have been the mistake of the hon. member for Crowfoot is that he did not check with his interim leader.

● (1750)

His mistake is that he did not ask the interim leader, the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), where he stood on the issue. But then he found out, to his sorrow, where his interim leader stood. Not only did he find out, but the whole country found out that the hon. member for Yellowhead wanted to bog the issue down further. He, too, wanted to be on both sides of the issue. With that kind of unqualification, the Leader of the Opposition should be leading the NDP.

What I would like to ask the hon. member for Crowfoot, who sponsored this very commendable piece of legislation, is where does his party stand on this bill? Is it unanimously for his bill? Does that unanimity include the Leader of the Opposition? The hon. member nods in agreement.

Mr. Malone: You will recall that he called the last two byelections.

Mr. Simmons: I am glad that the hon. member for Crowfoot has reminded us of the two byelections. I, together with my good friend, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), was involved in those byelections. The hon. member has done his homework on those points very well. I was very impressed with his knowledge of who had died and when, and why they died. One thing which the hon. member avoided saying was that in the one or two cases where, during a Tory government in this country, there were byelections in this country one of them was in the riding of Burin-St. George's, which I have the honour to represent.

The byelection was made necessary by the resignation of the Hon. Don Jamieson on either May 29 or May 30, as I recall. The election took place fully six months later. I say to the hon. member for Crowfoot that if he has the unanimous backing of his party now, including the backing of his interim leader from Yellowhead, congratulations, because he has arranged for the member for Yellowhead to have yet another about-face. It will pale into insignificance in terms of the Jerusalem about-face, the flip-flop on the embassy.

The other flip-flop which we could talk about is the flip-flop on no tax increases. Indeed, that party intended to cut taxes by $3 billion until "merchant John" for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) got hold of the Department of Finance and threw all of the budget cuts out the window. Instead of the $3 billion in cuts, we were suddenly hearing about great tax increases. That party is good at flip-flops, but that is another issue.

An hon. Member: What does it have to do with the issue?

Mr. Simmons: It does not have a lot to do with the issue. It is just a simple little example for simple little people so that they may understand what I am talking about, particularly the people in the NDP. Sometimes one must talk in parables in order to get one's point through to certain people, and if that becomes necessary I will do so. I am making the point that if the hon. member for Crowfoot has indeed succeeded in getting unanimity within his party on this matter, then I say congratulations to him, because he has done something which the people of Canada could not do with this particular leader of that party.

Last week I and everybody in this chamber were party to what could have been a history-making resolution. But then outside this chamber the hon. Leader of the Opposition scuttled the entire action of this Parliament. Before I can vote for this bill before us today, I would like to know whether he intends to continue that kind of despicable practice. The hon. member is not here to speak to the bill. Is he conveniently absent? Does he agree with it? I know what the Leader of the Opposition did in the case of the Burin-St. George's riding—he held off for six months, and all the time I was itching to get here. For six full months he held off.

Now what are we told, that he has had another change of heart, another Damascus Road experience? Has he suddenly seen a blinding light? Has he suddenly been awakened to what is the right thing to do? Where is the hon. member? Is he in the environs of the House? Could he come into the House and tell us where he stands? We have learned a lesson in the last week, that in so far as the official opposition is concerned, it is not enough to have the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) tell us where he stands on banking definitions, because that is not necessarily where his party stands at all. It is not enough to have the hon. member who sponsored the resolution last week about patriating the constitution tell—

Mr. Yurko: Edmonton East.

Mr. Simmons: I thank the hon. member for letting me know his constituency. I apologize to him for not knowing it. It is not enough for the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) to tell us where he stands on patriating the constitution, unless we know where his party stands. It is the same with this particular case.

An hon. Member: Let's get it to committee.

Mr. Simmons: What goes on in those committees, Mr. Speaker? This gentleman down here is all excited about getting this bill into committee. He just had his chance. We have heard his views, such as they were. He supports the bill. The hon. member probably did not hear me, but I said that I support the bill.

Mr. Benjamin: Then sit down.

Mr. Simmons: In order for this bill to get through this House, I want to know where the official opposition stands. The hon. member for Crowfoot, who is in the caucus of the official opposition, avoided saying where his party stands. I do not suggest that he avoided saying so deliberately, but he did not say where the official opposition stands. Perhaps he, like I, learned a valuable lesson last week, thanks to the hon. member for Edmonton East, that if one wants to know where the official opposition stands on any particular minute—and it may change from minute to minute—the very least one should do is insist that the Leader of the Opposition be dragged into the chamber, and dragged to his feet to tell us where he stands.

The Leader of the Opposition is at that point in time where he is concerned, as we all are from time to time, about security of tenure. He is not sure how long the job will last. But in the interest of making it last as long as possible, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is doing some fairly unpredictable things these days. The one place where the hon. member knows that he can have the undoubted support of his caucus is in this chamber when he stands up to say something. For that reason hon. members will notice that he is not saying much in the chamber these days. Could we have the Leader of the Opposition come into the chamber and tell us where he stands on Bill C-209? Is he for it? Can the member for Crowfoot indicate that he is for it? Let the records show, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Crowfoot has informed this House that his leader, the hon. member for Yellowhead, is in favour of this piece of legislation.

Now we should all watch, with bated breath, the television news tonight because, even as I talk, the Leader of the Opposition is probably out there undercutting his friend from Crowfoot, just as he undercut the hon. member for Edmonton East, all in the interest of getting his face on television and having another television interview.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: He is back—no, that is not the leader, it is the gentleman from Alberta, but not at the moment at least, the leader. I am sure he is aware of it. I am talking about the present Leader of the Opposition. I would note that at this moment he is for the legislation; that is good news indeed, but I warn the hon. member for Crowfoot that as we speak, as he rises and supports the bill, his leader is out there somewhere, wherever he can find a camera, doing something to cut the very legs from under the hon. member. I hope not, because this bill is a commendable piece of legislation and I invite all hon. members of the House to give it their vigorous support.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, this bill brings back some memories, particularly the fact that the first time I was elected it was in a byelection held on the resignation of one of the most distinguished senators in this country, Senator Manning. That happened in a winter when we had the coldest period in the province of Alberta on record. So, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing to suggest that there cannot be a byelection in the wintertime.

Bill C-209 is, I believe, sound in principle. It can be applied administratively without difficulty. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the question regarding second reading of Bill C-209 and referral to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be now put.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is moved by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) and seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the question regarding second reading of Bill C-209 and referral to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be now put.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: A point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion is debatable. I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, this is highly irregular.

An hon. Member: No, it is not.

Mr. Collenette: If we get down to brass tacks, we made a special order in this House less than an hour ago out of courtesy to the opposition and the hon. member for Crowfoot

(Mr. Malone) to allow him extra time. Most of the afternoon was taken up on motions, routine proceedings, statements by ministers, and the question period was an extremely long one, so we sought unanimous consent to continue until 18 minutes past six and we are proceeding—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor for a point of order. When I have heard him I shall listen to any other points of order.

Mr. Collenette: We are proceeding in the normal way for private members' hour. If hon. members on the other side do not agree with remarks made by members on this side or of any other party, that should not enter into the question at all.

I would say it is only natural courtesy that we continue until we dispose of this question, either by referring it to the committee for second reading or by the expiry of the hour. That is the way we do business around here, Mr. Speaker. If the opposition is going to come forward with motions at private members' hour—and I am not sure whether this motion is in order and can be put at this time and I would ask you to rule on that—then the whole complexion of private members' hour debate will be changed.

Private members' bills and motions are not always talked out. Some of them reach committee. In fact last week we dealt with a motion or a bill of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on the question of Canada Day, which in the Thirtieth Parliament had been sent to the standing committee for consideration. Yet, when it was brought back last week hon. members on the other side talked it out. It works both ways, Mr. Speaker.

If there is a fundamental disagreement it is sometimes the government that talks the motions out. That is not to say that this particular bill would be talked out. I think it is an extreme discourtesy in this House, after we have made a special order—

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Collenette: —in deference to the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has risen on a point of order and I recognized him. I am inviting him to comment on the motion which is before us. I have accepted the motion; it appears to be in order according to the rules and it is a debatable motion. If the parliamentary secretary has any further comment, I would be interested to hear.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I think there are many members on this side of the House who will want to speak to the motion now that you have accepted it. If you have accepted it, obviously I do not have a point of order because I was really arguing about the whole question of its admissibility at this point.

If you wish, I shall now sit down and rise again and speak on the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) is rising on a point of order. Does he want to state his point of order?

Mr. Yurko: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I find that the procedure in the House is somewhat irregular according to my understanding of procedures in legislatures and the House of Commons. You were in the middle of a vote, Mr. Speaker. You asked for "yes" and we responded, and in fact we voted. In fairness to everyone concerned—

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair had a motion placed before it. The Chair has ruled that the motion is in order. The Chair is recognizing those who want to speak to the motion. I will call it again.

Mr. Simmons: I should like to speak to the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons).

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the motion now before the House is that the question be put. That is a debatable motion. I want to speak to the merits of putting the question at this time and I submit that is my prerogative.

I happen to know that there are at least two other members on this side of the House—

An hon. Member: Three.

Mr. Simmons: I am now informed there are three members. Do I hear four?

Mr. Knowles: Sold!

Mr. Simmons: There are three or four members on this side of the House who have made exhaustive preparations in order to address themselves to Bill C-209. For some reason an effort is being made through this motion to apply a guillotine and force a vote. We all know that is perfectly legitimate. I submit it is railroading, but it is a legitimate motion under the rules of this House. We have a legitimate option in this chamber to vote against the motion that the question now be put. That is our right, and I give notice now that although I have spoken in the debate I have enough loyalty to my colleagues that I would like to hear what they have to say.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against the motion now before the House, the motion that the question now be put. I do not think it is fair. We have only been discussing the bill for 50 minutes or so and it involves a fairly important change in the legislation. It is a change with which I agree and I said so, but nevertheless I do not think we do justice to this piece of legislation if there are others who want to speak to it.

We ought not to apply a guillotine and deprive members of this chamber of the opportunity of addressing themselves to Bill C-209. I would therefore invite my colleagues on all sides to vote against this guillotine motion and allow other members of the chamber to be heard on the subject. There are three or four members on this side who wish to speak, and I am sure there are others on the other side who would like to address themselves to the resolution.

I invite members of the chamber to vote against the motion now before us that the question be put, in order that we may hear our colleagues.

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that private members' hour is an opportunity for us to present suggestions and to move private bills and that it allows members who want to take part in the discussion to do so. That is why today, because I am in favour of the bill before us, I spent long hours preparing what I would say. But if at every debate during private members' hour there is a proposal like the one made tonight I think it will become quite dangerous because whenever a member wants his bill to be passed all he will have to do is to propose it.

That will end the debate and will force a vote. But I think that limits the freedom of members of this House to take part in an extremely important and legitimate debate. It is our role to participate in debates. I think that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) indeed tried to impose on us a system which, to my mind, is not democratic because it is precisely our role to consider bills and to try to weigh all the pros and cons. Today, we find out that we cannot speak in this House which is supposed to be a place for debates. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I find I must reject the proposal put forth by the hon. member for Crowfoot.

[English]

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those other members who wish to speak on the bill, but now I will have to address myself to the motion. The first thing I must say about this motion is that it strikes me as being one of the most hypocritical acts I have seen in this House in a long time. As the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader said, we agreed to extend the sitting hours this evening in order that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone), who introduced a very worth-while bill, would have the full hour to discuss this bill. Then we had a stunt pulled on us, a swifty.

On various occasions between 1974 and 1979 when the government brought in rule 75 to limit the time of debate, I recall the howls of outrage, the wringing of hands, the crocodile tears, the screaming of "guillotine" from the other side of the House, were something that would bring tears to the eyes of a blind sow. But now we have the very same people, or at least one of them, doing what they condemned over and over again when we were in power for doing it in a legitimate fashion after many hours of debate in every case. Yet in the last parliament we saw the government of that day bring in the guillotine rule, or limitation of debate, at the very moment of introducing a bill.

There is just no consistency in the way that party behaves. Not only is their interim leader inconsistent, but it seems that many of their members are inconsistent as well. This is an outrage against this House after the House agreed to an extension of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is a discourtesy to the members of this House. This should not go unchallenged, and I will now have to vote against this motion even though I had intended to speak briefly on the bill and to support the principle in the bill presented by the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I think it should be made very clear that the motion is perfectly in order. The motion was put after two members—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot speak again on the motion that he has placed before the House.

An hon. Member: Learn the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House has a motion before it. The House is debating the motion, as is its right to do. I will now recognize another speaker. In this case I am recognizing the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Laniel).

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up the remarks just made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). Having been here for 18 years I have heard the Tory opposition and even sometimes the NDP complain about the arrogance of this government which on a few occasions, to run the business of the country, had to resort to Standing Order 75C or what the other side used to call closure to make progress in the government's business. Here they are now, unexpectedly, at the last minute, without any warning, calling for the question early in a debate interesting all members.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that even in the case of Standing Order 75C, the rules call for notice to be given, and if the hon. member wants to refer to Standing Order 33 and read it carefully, even then, a minister must rise to give notice of closure, and I want to quote Standing Order 33, at page 26, which reads as follows:

Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice—

—he has to give notice at the previous sitting—

—of his intention so to do may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[English]

Order, please. It being 6.15 p.m. and the hour provided for the consideration of private member's business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6.18 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation which is facing this Parliament, recognizing full well that this is not the first Parliament that has dealt with this particular piece of legislation. Many of my constituents, both individuals and small businesses in the municipality of Burnaby have expressed their serious concerns about a number of aspects of this bill. I hope to deal with some of those in the course of my remarks this evening.

There have been a number of important points made by previous speakers in this debate, and a number of statements which I feel I should make some reference to in the course of my remarks. I should also indicate, in view of the proceedings earlier today and the letter which was sent out by the manager of Consumer and Commercial Banking Services of the Royal Bank of Canada, that I do not have any bank accounts. I conduct my financial transactions through the Vancouver City Savings Credit Union.

Referring to some of the remarks made earlier in this debate, in particular certain remarks made by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), I believe he was attempting to skate around a very important point which was made by my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). I would like to clear up that particular concern briefly.

My colleague reported quite accurately that since 1976 the Canadian chartered banks have doubled their assets and profits. The member to my right, in each sense of the word, tried to obscure this by declaring that the increased profits of the banks was due to inflation, and stated that all prices had doubled since 1969. In the meantime, he claimed "that profits of the major banks have in fact declined in the past year." The hon. member might be forgiven his inability to hear or understand my colleague's argument, but his claim with respect to bank profits must certainly be corrected. In fact, as my colleague pointed out, bank profits have increased by some 480 per cent since 1970.

In our consideration of this bill we have to address ourselves to a number of important questions, including the scale of banks, their crucial role in the Canadian economy, the effects of their overseas operations and their conduct in this country. It is important that the economic power of these institutions must be employed in the interests of all of the people of Canada and not merely in the interests of a few large corporations and their controllers. We should press for a significant public presence in the banking field. We should press for responsible disclosure of the activities of the banks, both at home and abroad. We should require the banks to conduct themselves more equitably in their relations with their employees.

Let us look for a moment at these institutions to see what an important part of the Canadian economy they represent. The Canadian chartered banks held among them assets of more than $235 billion on February 29 of this year. The five largest chartered banks had among them about $212 billion of these assets or more than 90 per cent of the total. I might point out that this has increased from some $163 billion that the five banks held in assets in 1978.

These same five banks, the big five, have increased their profit position, in contradiction to the statements made earlier in the House by the hon. member for Mississauga South. In 1979 the profits of the big five banks increased by 21.9 per cent over the preceding year. I might point out that is an increase in total profits from $904 million in 1978 to $1.102 billion in profits last year.

The Toronto-Dominion Bank, for example, raised its profits by 24.1 per cent, the Bank of Nova Scotia by 17.5 per cent, the Bank of Montreal by 18.5 per cent, and the Royal Bank by 15.7 per cent. The only one of the big five to have an off year was the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Its profits increased by only 4 per cent over the $193.5 million it had earned in 1978 when it was second in profits only to the Royal Bank's $233.9 million. Not only have these firms amassed great reserves of wealth, but very importantly they are also able to affect which spending projects will go ahead and which will not. This directly affects the futures of Canadian small businesses, farmers, working people and their families.

The banks control the future of these people, not only because of very large cash reserves in investment portfolios, but also because of the very carefully placed directors whom they share with the nation's large resource, manufacturing and agricultural corporations.

As one diligent Canadian sociologist points out, and I quote:

> The boards of all the major banks consist of representatives of all the top 100 corporations. The Royal Bank includes members from Abitibi Paper, Algoma Steel, Asbestos Corporation, Canadian Pacific, B.C. Forest Products, Imperial Oil, Imasco and Noranda.
>
> The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce includes representatives from Bell Canada, B.C. Telephone, Canada Cement Lafarge, Canada Packers, Crown-Zellerbach, Domtar, Falconbridge Nickel, Hollinger Mines, MacMillan Bloedel, Massey Ferguson, Noranda, Simpsons, TransCanada Pipe Lines; and the Bank of Montreal includes representatives from Alcan, B.C. Sugar Refinery, Bell Canada, Brinco, Canada Cement Lafarge, Canadian Forest Products, Canadian Pacific, Eatons, Seagrams, International Nickel, Molsons, Rothman's and the Steel Company of Canada. In addition, other financial corporations, such as Power, Argus, Brascan, the insurance companies and other financial institutions are well represented. Indeed, each is many times represented both through the main holding company and through the subsidiaries.

● (2010)

It is through this network of companies and through their own subsidiaries and connections with foreign banking firms that the big Canadian banks channel funds into some very dubious activities indeed, both in this country and abroad.

Before I mention some of the activities of Canadian banks in countries overseas, I should like to point out some of the dubious places where bank funds are being channelled right here in Canada, and I am referring specifically to the Liberal and Conservative parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): In 1978, the last year for which records are available—I will be looking with interest at the updated figures this year—the following contributions are recorded in the Liberal party receipts. These are gifts to our friends on the other side of the House. The Bank of Montreal, $25,000; the Bank of Nova Scotia, $20,000; Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, $25,000; the Royal Bank, $25,000; Toronto-Dominion Bank, $20,000—all five of them in the pockets of the Liberal party. We have all heard the tale that he who pays the piper calls the tune.

Not to leave the Conservatives to one side, let me point out that these gifts matched almost exactly those that were received by the Tories from the same sources. The only difference was that the Conservatives received $20,098.75 from the Bank of Nova Scotia and $25,351 from the Bank of Commerce. All the rest were the same. So now perhaps we understand somewhat more clearly why both the Liberals and the Conservatives are conspiring to push this legislation through the House as quickly as possible. I do not have to add that there are no such receipts from the banks in the records of the NDP, which is a party which is democratically financed.

It is worth keeping these investments by the banks in mind when we hear the government and Tory members in the House eagerly calling for rapid passage of this legislation and telling us how many times it has been before committees and before the House.

Let us look at some of the many investments that Canadian banks have made beyond this nation's borders. Earlier in the discussion of this bill we heard the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) describing vividly some of the effects of Canadian bank loans in a country like Jamaica. Although the banks are extremely reluctant to release information about their overseas loans, they have certainly been active in some of the more, shall we say, interesting parts of the world. Tonight I will mention only two, namely, South Africa and Chile. In the latter country, researchers have turned up a number of recent loans by Canadian banks acting as members of international consortia. Canadian banks are known to have participated in some 68 consortium loans to Latin American countries in 1978, and 75 in 1979. Of the $10.6 billion and $13.9 billion lent in those respective years, the Canadian component is difficult to determine. However, we do know that there have been recent Canadian loans to Chilean agencies, for example, the Bank of Nova Scotia's recent participation, a $70 million loan, to the Compania Manufactura Papeles y Cortones, CMPC, advertised in the periodical Chile News in October, 1979.

Others include the Bank of Montreal's participation in a consortium that lent $81 million to the Chilean national electrical company, ENDESA, advertised in Chile Economic News in August, 1979. Another one is to the National Bank of Canada and the Toronto-Dominion Bank, members of a consortium which lent $105 million to the Banco de Chile.

An hon. Member: What are banks for?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I hear some speakers for the banks in the Tory party who are attempting to justify these loans. If they would stand up and do that, they will have their chance, Mr. Speaker. The same two banks, namely, the National Bank of Canada and the Toronto-Dominion Bank, were also members of a consortium which lent $53 million to the Banco de l'Estado de Chile, reported in the Financial Times of London on December 13, 1979. These are only a few of the recent loans that Canadian banks have made to the bloody, repressive Pinochet regime in Chile.

I should like to point out that earlier, in 1976, the Royal Bank on one occasion made a $125 million loan to a Chilean agency, even though British and European banks had refused to make a similar loan.

Efforts to find out the extent of bank dealings in foreign countries have not been very fruitful. The Parliamentary Library, the Bank of Canada, and the Inspector General of Banks all reported that they could not say how much money Canadian banks have invested in individual countries overseas. A member of my staff, for example, was told by an official in the Inspector General's office that even though such information had been compiled, the statistics cannot be made public.

Indeed, he said that the Bank Act prohibits the release of such information. I do not see anything in this bill being defended so vociferously by my friends to the right which would lift this cloak of secrecy surrounding the lending policies of Canadian banks.

Information about South African investments has been particularly difficult to obtain. However, the Montreal Star reported on May 19, 1979, that:

—since 1970 South Africa has borrowed more than $7 billion from western banks, but the extent of the financial role played by Canadian banking institutions is cloaked in secrecy.

The Montreal Gazette reported in March of the same year that during 1976 banking consortia with Canadian participants lent about $250 million to South Africa, and by the end of that year outstanding loans to South Africa totalled about $2 billion.

On February 27, 1978, the Toronto Globe and Mail reported that:

—secret documents released in the United States . . . show that three Canadian banks lent a total of $19.5 million to the South African government and two of its agencies in the early 1970s. The Bank of Commerce lent $6 million, the Bank of Montreal, $7.5 million and the Toronto-Dominion, $6 million as participants of banking consortia.

The task force on churches and corporate responsibility estimates, in a brief it submitted to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in November, 1978, that between 1972 and 1976 private Canadian financial aid to the South African government—the estimate does not include loans to private firms—amounted to approximately $684 million to that government which is promoting apartheid and which is condemned in other forums by the present government and, indeed, by representatives of the previous government.

In March of this year the same organization reports that the Toronto-Dominion Bank lent $2.68 million to the South African State electrical sytem, ESCOM. As my friend, the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) stated earlier in this debate, the bank has since said that it will not renew this loan or any other similar loans to South Africa. So far it is alone in that policy. However, this loan was made without any sort of review of its effect on South Africa, on Canadian foreign policy or on the Canadian economy.

That is the point, that the banks are taking decisions of this sort in secret without any review by the Government of Canada, the representatives of the people. The evidence at hand points not only to the bad effects that some of these loans have on the people of the receiving countries, but also to the bad effects they have on the Canadian economy. The effects of Canada's bank investments overseas and their effects on the Canadian economy go hand in hand. They can be seen right at the core of the act that the Liberal government and its Tory predecessor have placed before the House. The bill will allow foreign banks to compete with domestic banks. It will speed up the process of penetration of the Canadian financial market, which my Conservative friend is supporting, by foreign banks, which was begun after the 1967 Bank Act revision.

The government has justified this penetration in the name of increased competition. I submit that this is just so much veneer, that the real reason for the government's and the private banks' willingness to open the door to foreign banks is what is known as reciprocity. What this means is that the Canadian banks, which do about one-third of their business outside the country, want to get more leeway to operate in foreign countries, and to do that they are offering the Canadian national market as a bargaining token.

I refer to the Canadian Business magazine supplementary "Focus" for April, 1980, which states that the five major Canadian banks operate more that 300 branches, agencies and controlled subsidiaries in about 60 countries. The same article quotes the Royal Bank head and outgoing president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, Mr. Frazee, as saying that the big banks' "appetites are clearly growing" for foreign investments.

Banks that were once merely national players are now being catapulted into international competition because the world opportunities for business and the needs of their customers force them to move out—

So, and I quote:

—Canada as the most trade-dependent of the industrialized nations, has no other realistic alternative.

This places the question in a somewhat different light. What the Liberals are asking us to do is to approve and make legal the banks' own rationalization for the necessary evil of letting foreign banks have the same rights here that our banks want to obtain in other countries. You will note that the reasoning so far is not made in terms of the interests of the Canadian people or the interests of the Canadian economy but, rather, in terms of the increased profitable operations of the Canadian banking system. This does not look particularly good for the banks or the government, so we are slipped the guise of improved competition. Foreign banks, we are told, will increase the competitiveness of the Canadian financial system. The fact of the matter is that the Canadian banks' foreign operations will not help the performance of the Canadian economy, nor will the invasion by the foreign banks themselves.

Canada is already in the peculiar situation of having large financial outflows which are severely damaging our balance of international payments. Even though the large banks are able to channel large amounts of investment capital into overseas investments, Canada continues to experience a chronically severe balance of payments deficit. For example, during the period between 1976 and 1978 this deficit averaged $4.48 billion on current account, and of this deficit business services such as insurance premiums, other insurance transactions, consulting and other professional services, commissions, scientific research, product development, equipment rentals, franchises and similar rights and other services accounted for a net average outflow of over $1 billion annually.

Even more serious is the outflow, averaging more than $3.5 billion annually, of interest and dividend payments. The fact is that even though we have in this country some of the world's largest banks, Canada's local, regional and provincial governments and firms have to go outside the country to borrow.

The Canadian chartered banks are asking for increased leverage to expand their foreign operations at a time when the cost in terms of the balance of payments of Canadian borrowing outside our country has reached almost $4 billion a year, up substantially from approximately $3.5 billion last year and $2.7 billion in 1977, according to statistics just released by Statistics Canada. These are interest payments. Between 1976 and 1978 Canadian governments borrowed an average of $5 billion on international—mainly New York—money markets. Even though the banks claim that there have been compensating returns from foreign loans, this does not appear to be the case so far. Over the same three years the balance of payments statistics reveal that inflows of interest payments, that is, flows into Canada, totalled only $230 million, $224 million and $266 million in the three preceding years, so there has been an actual decline in the amount of the inflow of interest payments. The outflow of funds for foreign borrowing and the outflow of funds for the establishment of bank branches and subsidiaries in other countries do our country no good whatsoever.

What we do need is significant public involvement in banking itself and in the regulation of banks' lending and investment policies, and I am pleased to see the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is supporting that policy. This would ensure that these large financial intermediaries are channelling funds not merely for the sake of their own private profit but also in the interests of all Canadian people who depend on their investing and lending decisions. What is needed is not increased participation in the Canadian economy by foreign multinational banking operations. Such firms will only duplicate the services already offered by Canadian banks and squeeze existing competitors such as caisses populaires and credit unions. What is needed is government support for caisses populaires and credit unions. These are responsible local and community-controlled organizations.

Statistics from the Bank of Canada show that in 1979 foreign banks already operating in Canada concentrated their activities in the high profit business loan area. Some 51.6 per cent of their loans were of this nature, while only 16.9 per cent were in short-term paper, 10 per cent in leasing, and 8.8 per cent in real estate and construction loans and a similar amount in loans to their foreign parents and affiliates.

Because of their connections with other foreign firms in their home countries, the foreign banks are likely to win the business of foreign firms away from the Canadian chartered banks. This would increase the strength and size of foreign owned capital in this country if this particular provision in the bill were permitted.

Foreign banks are not likely to create any more business in this country, and what they are likely to do is compete with the Canadian banks, but there is not much possibility or hope that new Canadian banks are going to be growing in the already overcompetitive soil not taken up by the big foreign and chartered banks.

In fact in some financial markets the big banks are already being pressed by domestic competitors. As of December 31, 1979, Canadian credit unions and caisses populaires numbered 3,693 with 4,477 branches across the country. Their savings totalled $25.51 billion; loans, $21.24 billion; and assets, $27.73 billion. The growth of credit unions and caisses populaires has been dramatic. In 1967 their assets stood at only $3.382 billion, so this means that these co-operative financial institutions have expanded their holdings more than eight times in the intervening period.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Very healthy.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Absolutely. The credit unions of British Columbia introduced daily interest rates more than ten years ago, something some of the chartered banks only began last year as a result of competition. Some still do not offer these daily interest rates and, rather than allowing foreign banks to come into the country in a big way, surely what we should be doing is promoting these indigenous financial institutions as models of co-operative Canadian economic development.

There have been some other areas in which the record of the chartered banks has certainly been less than impressive and which the new Bank Act would do absolutely nothing to rectify. I would like to turn for a moment to the labour relations practices of the banks. Banks have been consistently intransigent in dealing with employees seeking to unionize. Most bank workers in Canada are not unionized, despite the poor working conditions and low pay. The reason is that the banks have resorted to force and manipulation in trying to discourage union organizing. In a decision of last November 30, members of a Canada Labour Relations Board arbitration board ruled that the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce had contravened several sections of the Labour Code in its dealings with unionized employees in St. Catharines, Ontario, and Creston, British Columbia.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A good ruling.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): In its decision the board reported, and I quote:

> It has become apparent throughout the organizational attempts at various branches of the employer across the country, by various unions, that this employer has embarked on a campaign designed to discourage its employees from exercising their rights under the code. Some attempts were blatant blundering, others more sophisticated and subtle.

In the matter under review by the board, a system-wide general salary increase that was withheld from unionized workers, the board observed that the bank's unfair labour practices were not attributable to overzealousness on the part of lower level managers but were, rather, decided at the very highest level. These were the same levels which decided how much money to give the Conservative and Liberal parties in preceding years.

The board went further, finding that the bank's labour relations practices had had "disastrous results". The board members reported, and I quote:

Besides the chilling effects on the union's organizational campaign, the parties, including the employees, are living in an impossible labour relations atmosphere.

Although the board did not find that the specific complaints brought by the Union of Bank Employees against the Bank of Commerce necessarily applied to the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Nova Scotia, its members said they would be willing to hear submissions from workers employed by those companies as well. That is hardly a vote of confidence in the Canadian banking system.

The November decision was not the first time that the chartered banks had been found in contravention of the Canada Labour Code, either. In her report to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women released last month, staff member Julie White notes that the banks have been found in violation of the code for firing workers for union activity and transferring staff involved in a union from one branch to another. They have been found in violation of the code by denying promotions to union members for union activity, having additional workers at a branch in the process of unionization in order to undermine the majority of union members required for union certification, holding both group and individual meetings during working hours to apply pressure on employees to prevent them from unionizing—at these meetings were unknown, high-ranking officials of the bank involved whom the workers had not known before the meetings—requiring workers at unionized branches to make up cash shortages at the end of the day out of their own pockets, contrary to practice in non-union branches.

If Conservative members want to justify this kind of conduct, they will have their opportunity shortly. I see that they support it. That is very unfortunate. This is hardly the conduct of organizations which we should allow to operate in secrecy and confidentiality. We should be requiring the banks to provide more information about their activities, and we should subject them to more public scrutiny.

As noted earlier, it is very difficult to obtain information on the foreign operations of Canadian banks. Even highly-skilled analysts, who make it their business to know about such matters, have reported that they have difficulties getting such information and, when they do, it more often comes from American or host country sources than from the chartered banks themselves.

I might just pause to say that I hope the freedom of information legislation, which has not yet been tabled in this House, will be tabled very shortly to assist us in dealing with this veil of secrecy surrounding the banking system in this country. The banks should be made to own up to their foreign lending because this lending often vitally shapes the de facto foreign policy of this country and shapes Canada's overseas image. I do not believe that our image is particularly good in the Caribbean, where the chartered banks have been so active; in Chile, where their loans help support a regime that has been twice denounced by the United Nations for human rights violations; or in South Africa, where a United Nations Commission on Human Rights study reported in 1978 that four of the Canadian banks are active supporters of the apartheid regime.

One other area I should like to mention is that of profit rates. A recently released Economic Council of Canada study reported that the chartered banks had earned excess profits during the study period, 1968 to 1973, of between $219 million and $425 million, depending on the method of calculation. Certainly if my friend on my right in the Conservative party who has been defending the anti-union practices of the banks wants to defend the excess profits as well, he will have that opportunity at the conclusion of my speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): If these excess profits resulting from the monopoly organization of the banking system had not been gained, this objective report by the Economic Council of Canada argues that more firms could have entered into the banking field to compete for the available share of the market, and banking services would have been less costly.

If the government really wants competition, I suggest that regulation of the banks and competition with them will do more good than allowing foreign, oligopolistically-organized corporate banks to enter the country. Along the same vein was the Bryce commission report. The hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) will recall well the Bryce commission report, this whitewash of corporate concentration, because when it came out he said proudly that it was Tory blue, that it was their report. That is the kind of corporate concentration they support. He recalls that well, no doubt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The Bryce commission report even suggested that the oligopolistic banking system does not achieve any significant economies of scale whatsoever. In its discussion of the chartered banks, the commission noted that the five largest banks control more than 90 per cent of all banking business in the country. Also it reported that the banks had rates of return between 1968 and 1975 that were larger than those of non-financial industrial firms in this country and of the banks in the United States. The Economic Council of Canada study comes to the same conclusions. Also the Bryce commission points out that the banks enjoy the blessing of a self-correcting mechanism which allows them to profit in times of both slow and expanding economic conditions. It indicates the following:

Bank profit performance over the past decade has not been exceptional in good times.

The commission report indicated that it has been much better than average in bad times because of the following:

In a buoyant economy the banks make money on volume, while in a declining or stagnant economy they make money on spread.

That is the difference between interest rates received on loans and paid out on deposits. So, while ordinary working people, small business people, are hurting as a result of these interest rate policies, it is the banks that are profiting. This is not a built-in stabilizer that is enjoyed by these workers, small businessmen and farmers of Canada. Perhaps what we should be doing, rather than debating giving away more of the shop to the chartered banks, is aiding workers and small business people in this difficult time.

Another pertinent finding of the Bryce commission was that there are no noticeable economies of scale which attach to the size of Canada's chartered banks. In other words, the banks have not improved their service to customers noticeably, even though they have greatly expanded the size of their operations.

I hope I have given the impression that there are serious problems with the Canadian banking system, its effect on the workings of the Canadian economy, and with the bill which is attempting to defend the status quo in the banking system. Surely the approach we should be taking is this: the large chartered banks must channel the reserves of finance capital they have at their disposal into projects which benefit the national interest, not just those firms with which the shareholders and directors happen to be involved. This most certainly would require much increased regulation of the investment planning and lending policy of banks and financial institutions, both at home and particularly abroad. Also it would require the development and creation of federal government financial institutions, both to plan and co-ordinate banking procedures and to ensure a public presence in this most crucial of economic sectors.

Governments are already involved in protecting the interests of their citizens in a number of countries through their involvement in banking. In France, for example, public and semi-public financial institutions already handle about 85 per cent of all bank deposits. The Japanese Trust Fund Bureau collects a major part of all savings and life insurance payments, which are redistributed through government financial institutions according to a government loans and investments plan, reflecting the priorities of the people of that country and not of the shareholders of the banks. The Italian state holding company, IRI, controls three of the country's largest banks and has holdings in a number of local banks as well. Co-operative banking, much like our own caisses populaires and credit unions, is a major part of the public banking systems in West Germany, Belgium, Denmark and The Netherlands. Of course in Norway there have been some sweeping changes to the structure of boards of directors of banks, reflecting the importance of public involvement in this critical economic sector.

I do not produce these countries as any particular example of socialist economies. Indeed, for the most part, they are dominated by production by large corporations. But in each of these nations the state has accepted a degree of responsibility on behalf of its people for ensuring that the public interest is represented in the banking system. And so it should be; financial institutions should be required, by public ownership where necessary, to be made more responsive and more accountable to meeting needs in capital availability.

A responsible government in this country would control and direct investment through a combination of stringent regulations and public ownership of financial institutions. A prerequisite of national planning must surely be a firm grasp on the financial mechanisms of the country. This must include control over major investment decisions of large corporate interests. Public ownership should be an important tool in national development. Public ownership and solid support for the co-operative and credit union movement and stringent control of the banking system should be a major first step in such development now. Canada's banking system must serve not just the narrow and increasingly concentrated corporate sector, but all of the people of Canada. As New Democrats we are committed to fundamental changes in the economic and social fabric of our society.

I can do no better than to quote from the words that were first written down in July of 1933 in Regina by a group of people who founded the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. They said the following:

> We aim to replace the present capitalist system, with its inherent injustice and inhumanity, by a social order from which the domination and exploitation of one class by another will be eliminated, in which economic planning will supersede unregulated private enterprise and competition, and in which genuine democratic self-government, based upon economic equality will be possible.

Those words ring as true today as they did in 1933. In conclusion, I should like to say that it is imperative we bring our banking system under control.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer) on a point of order.

Mr. Dantzer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order, but will the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) entertain a question?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I will proceed with my speech, and if there is time for questions at the end I will attempt to deal with them.

In concluding, then, we must bring our banking system under public control if we are to pursue and realize these essential goals, goals which more than any other constitutional changes or tinkering with the constitutional system will surely help in this critical period in our history to keep Canada a strong and united nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) on a point of order.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken made reference in his remarks to comments which he alleged were made by myself at the time the Bryce commission report was tabled. I would just like to correct the record. He was not here, so he does not really know. I cannot say that he did it purposely, but let me say that the colour of the book was blue. I was asked what I thought of the Bryce report and I said that it was blue, because I had not read it. I didn't say it was Tory blue, navy blue, little boy blue, Fauntleroy blue, or anything else.

● (2040)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has not made a point of order. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak about the Bank Act. As a former administrator and mayor of a municipality for eight years I saw what has happened to small communities. When people try to bring industry into the area, the first thing they do is go to the community and look at the number of banks to determine what banking facilities are available. In my riding the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce gave notification last year that it was closing its branch at Radium. This is a heavily touristed and industrial area. It has a large lumber mill. Had this happened, these workers and small businessmen would have been forced to bundle their money each day and travel to another community to deposit it. The workers would have gone to the other community to cash their cheques and purchase their goods there.

Members of the Conservative and Liberal parties stood up at election time at meetings of chambers of commerce and told these small businessmen they were there to protect their interests. They said they were the ones who were fighting for the free enterprise system.

There are no regulations in this Bank Act which would stop this kind of centralization of the banks. These banks in small communities have a responsibility to those communities whether they are making a profit or not, because these banks are given special banking privileges throughout Canada. They must fulfil those responsibilities in those communities.

I should like to touch upon another matter as I do not think we have paid enough attention to it, and that is in relation to the organization of bank workers. This is a very serious matter. In 1977 the Canada Labour Relations Board ruled that banks could be organized on a branch by branch basis. Since that time banks have vigorously opposed any move to unionize their workers. Only 65 of the 7,500 branches in Canada have been organized. Most of the workers in banks are women, and the banks have successfully used that fact to intimidate those workers. They have intimidated them in a way they would never have dared had they been dealing with seasoned industrial workers.

Some 67 complaints of unfair labour practices have been registered with the Canada Labour Relations Board against banks. Banks have more complaints against them than any other industrial sector. In 1977-78 complaints against banks comprised one-third of all those received by the Canada Labour Relations Board. It is a disgrace for any elected member who establishes regulations for banks without setting the working conditions for the people working in those banks.

The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has touched upon some of the tactics these banks rely on, including the firing of staff for union activity. Can you imagine going to work in the morning and finding that because of some of your activities you are no longer employable? Some banks transfer their workers who are involved in union activities, from one branch to another. The hon. member for Burnaby has said this already, but I think it is worthy of repeating because these things happen in banks, and we cannot allow them to continue.

Banks hire additional workers at branches involved in certification, in order to increase the number of votes, thereby stopping any certification program. The banks hold group and individual meetings during working hours to apply pressure on the workers not to unionize. Often those meetings are attended by high ranking officials of the bank. Some branches require the workers at unionized branches to make up cash shortages at the end of each day, a practice not followed in non-unionized branches. Can you imagine going to work and finding that you have to make up a shortage at the end of the day? Banks have withheld annual pay increases at those branches which have been organized, or branches that are awaiting a first contract, and the banks have been careful to inform all employees of this distinction.

Let me quote from a recent report on women and unions issued by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women:

> While these employer tactics are not unfamiliar in any union organizing attempt, the banks have applied them in a particularly centralized and co-ordinated manner with obvious co-operation between different banks. Extensive legal advice has been obtained and profitably used, so that proving illegality is very difficult. The banks have the time, money and personnel not only to mount a strong anti-union campaign, but to maintain the opposition for years if necessary. Needless to say branch workers feel that it is difficult to oppose these wealthy and monolithic institutions. They are right.

The banks do not stop their intimidation once a branch has been certified. As I have already pointed out, they were found guilty of withholding pay increases to unionized workers and forced to pay them back wages. That is not all. I should like to recount the history of the bank workers' struggle at a branch right here in Ottawa.

In February, 1979, Local 2104 of the Union of Bank Employees was certified at the Commerce Bank on Carling at Preston. After certification the bank began to apply what a former shop steward described as subtle pressure. The bank was sticky about time schedules and converted to an hourly wage from a weekly salary so it could dock pay for lateness and absences for such things as mid-day doctors' appointments. In March the bank was decertified by the workers. The workers could not take this kind of harassment any longer and decertified themselves. It is shocking for any of us to stand here and discuss the Bank Act while allowing the workers of that kind of an institution to be dealt with in that way. The women workers simply did not feel they could successfully compete against one of the largest corporations in the world.

Many of my colleagues have already spoken of the incredible profits being collected by Canada's chartered banks. In the three months immediately prior to January 31, all five of the major banks registered after-tax profits in excess of $40 million. The Royal Bank registered profits of nearly $80 million. The banks are very reluctant to share this wealth with their women employees, but they are not hesitant to give it to the other political parties represented in this House. In 1975 three of the five big banks donated $60,000 to the Liberal party and three of the five banks donated nearly $70,000 to the Conservative party.

What can this government do if it is at all interested in living up to the lip service which it has so far provided to women's issues during this Parliament? First, it should immediately launch an investigation of the anti-union tactics being employed by the chartered banks of this country. Such an investigation has recently been called for by the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and it is long over due. The investigation must have some teeth and the government must be willing to take some positive action once the investigation is complete.

This morning I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) if he was prepared to do something about this matter. As a result of the negative response which we received from that minister, I would strongly urge every member of this House to assure that something is put in the Bank Act that will bring the standard of working regulations for employees in the banks to a level that can be respected in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: Second, Mr. Speaker, the government should live up to its commitment under the Canada Labour Code, to promote the organization of workers. Some of the women who work in the banks have been quoted as saying that they were led by their employers to believe that belonging to the union was practically illegal and most certainly disloyal. The government has a responsibility to make these women aware that unionization is not only legal but that it is actively encouraged.

In this speech I have raised two issues which at first glance might seem unrelated. I have said that the banks must not move out of the small towns, and I have said that the banks should cease and desist from their active union busting campaign. But these issues are not unrelated. They both point to the fact that the banks in Canada have become the robber barons of the twentieth century. They have no sense of decency or fair play. It is time that this government sends the banks a message. The banks must clean up their act.

The banks in Canada are in a very lucky position because Canadian governments have refused to encourage the type of anti-trust laws which are prevalent in the United States. They have very little competition. They must not abuse this special privilege. They must think a little bit more about the people who keep them in business and who work for them, and a little bit less about establishing the highest corporate profits in recorded Canadian history.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few moments this evening to talk about banking, a subject with which I am very familiar. I suppose that it could be said that I am almost expert because no one has been to the bank more often than I. The problem is that I am usually taking money out. Rarely am I ever saving it, and it is getting worse.

It seems appropriate to talk about the Bank Act because it will be a number of years before I will have another opportunity. In fact, knowing politics, one can never tell. One may only get four chances such as this during one's terms of office. I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has only had about seven chances to speak on the Bank Act, which says something about his longevity.

This is a very important piece of legislation, perhaps the most important piece of legislation with which this House will deal. As one looks around at what is happening to the economy, at the people in the economy as they are affected by the changes in interest rates and by the dramatic shifts in credit, and at the changes in the way society is developing, one can appreciate that unless we pay far more attention to the financial institutions, particularly the banks, it could well be that the lifestyle to which most of us have grown accustomed, with which most of us have grown up, and which we look forward to passing on to our children, will not in fact be available.

We are about to give, once again, a right by charter to a half dozen privately-owned institutions. We are about to give those institutions the right by law to manage the economy of the country, to establish, for all intents and purposes, the way in which credit will be meted out, to establish the interest rate policy, and to determine the cash flow for the greater number of people in this country. We are allowing the banks to do all that for profit.

Anyone who looks at the banking system will appreciate that there must be careful regulation governing that industry. If it was ever more evident than it is today, I cannot imagine when that might have been. Banks must be regulated carefully. They must be made to behave because of something called national interest. Banks of late have a poor public image. Many people are very skeptical of the way in which banks have behaved over the course of the last three or four years.

The government has an equally poor public image because of the operations of the banks and of the way in which the banks have behaved; and the government's reluctance to come to grips with the problems of banks. As many of my colleagues have said, the banks have made massive profits, profits that are bordering on usury. Therefore it is time that we in this House of Commons make some very careful decisions about the role which the banks are to play from now until the next time this legislation is brought before the House.

We have elevated banks to a status far in excess of what they deserve. As a child, I did not go to the bank very often, but my grandfather owned a public house, a drinking establishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: In another period of his life my grandfather owned a dairy, so he tried to satisfy both ends. My grandfather often went to the bank, and he talked about his banker in terms which most people reserve for discussions about their priests. It was just about that level. One can almost imagine the kind of sense that he had about his banker. Quite frankly, he was probably more afraid of his banker. I think that that feeling persists today. We are afraid of the banks. We are afraid to demand that they exercise some caution and discretion. We are afraid of the banks in terms of the way in which they implement policy. Most of us do not understand the workings of the banking community.

● (2100)

I think you cannot talk of the banks without talking about the central bank, the Bank of Canada, the bank that should be setting policy, the bank that was established for the very purpose of providing some over-all policy. Unfortunately the Bank of Canada has not been responding well to the needs of the country as a whole. The Bank of Canada has not been responding to the domestic requirements of Canada, and for some reason or another up until the last few days, and even now, I suppose, is following policy that is not established in this country. It is following policy that was established in other parts of the North American continent—Washington and New York. The establishment of bank rates and interest rates for the Bank of Canada, which are passed down through the chartered banks to the consumers in Canada, was almost in locked step with the banking interests of the United States.

As we look at that situation we have to try to understand the problem it creates. We had an opportunity in Canada to use a very strong banking establishment to develop, in social and economic terms, the kind of economy we would like for ourselves. We could have had interest rate policies that were, as my leader said during the election campaign, "made in Canada." We could have had interest rate policies that reflected the needs of Canada; interest rate policies that recognized the problems of families with mortgages that had to be renewed; interest rate policies that understood the dilemma the small businessman faces as he attempts to maintain some kind of equity in his business. We could have had interest rate policies that took into account the distinctive difference in lifestyle and goal of the Canadian population compared with that of the United States. We could even have had, maybe, an interest rate policy that was humane, an interest rate policy that showed understanding.

For reasons that escape me entirely, the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, never seemed to sit down and determine what was best for Canada and the Canadian people. His interest had something to do with cash flow; his interest had to do with strengthening or weakening the dollar; his interest had to do with matters over which he really exercised very little jurisdiction; yet in matters where he could have had jurisdiction and have made an impact, he refused to take action.

When we talk about what banks are supposed to do, Mr. Speaker, we should realize that they are supposed to be an instrument of economic and social policy. They are, perhaps, the single most important instrument. With careful direction the banks could be used as a means of stimulating the economy; they could be used as a vehicle for the development of Canada; they could be used to unite the country in terms of the creation of economic opportunity all across the land, yet they have not been so used for a number of reasons. In the majority of cases there is no evidence from the banks that they care very much about impact. In the main, they have been a major contributing factor to the ever-increasing credit problems that confront people.

From the time we gave the banks the power to advertise and encourage direct lending, they have in fact encouraged people to go into debt. They have not taken the time to try to establish a counselling service that would keep people from running up charges on credit cards to three or four times their limit. They have not taken the time to understand that there is nothing within the educational system that enables people to learn how to handle money.

As you drive down the street you see the sign on the bank window which reads, "Come on in and borrow; we have the lowest rates in town."

An hon. Member: Seventeen per cent!

Mr. Deans: The lowest rates in town are still out of reach of the majority of people. The bank tells you how much it is going to cost if you want to borrow money and spread the payments over 18 months, 24 or 36 months. "It is only" going to cost you, is the way they put it, without any consideration of whether or not you can afford to pay it.

My colleague has handed me a letter from the Bank of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: Where do you stand on the referendum?

An hon. Member: Is that a note from Mr. Nystrom?

An hon. Member: Take it easy; keep your trousers on.

Mr. Simmons: Where do you stand on the referendum?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would expect hon. members to show the usual courtesy that is extended to members who are addressing the House.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I really desperately require your intervention to keep hon. members opposite from heckling me so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: For a leadership candidate you are not putting on a very good show.

Mr. Deans: The Bank of Nova Scotia decided it is not making enough money so it has to solicit some additional customers. It sent out letters and, of course, they all do it. I have had them and I am sure Your Honour has them too. This one states:

If your ideas are bigger than your bank balance, we might be able to balance things out for you.

A low cost Scotia plan loan lets you keep your savings intact for emergencies and get the things you want now, without waiting any longer. That car, television, boat, snowmobile, furniture—

See how far down the list furniture is.

—or holiday idea could become reality.

Borrowing money makes good sense when you can repay a loan regularly and a Scotia Plan Loan costs less than many other loans—

That does not say what those interest rates are, of course. The letter continues:

—in fact, 50 per cent less in some cases. It's fast too, and life-insured at no extra cost.

So if it's cash you need, just drop in and see us about a low-cost Scotia plan loan.

It is signed "Sincerely, Scotia plans."

An hon. Member: I am sold! I am sold!

Mr. Deans: At a time when people are struggling, the banks dangle out, "If you need a boat or car, don't use your money, don't save money and buy it—no, no, come in and borrow from us."

Mr. Simmons: At least a bank keeps a promise.

An hon. Member: You guys should take your straitjackets off.

Mr. Deans: Then we wonder why so many families are facing personal bankruptcy. Why is it that so many families—

Mr. Simmons: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. parliamentary secretary seeking the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Simmons: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am trying desperately to hear what the hon. gentleman has to say. I wonder if you would restrain his NDP colleagues so that I can hear what is going on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Deans: I am glad the hon. member is interested. I will do my best to say it all in single syllable words so that it will get through.

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that with this kind of letter it is no wonder that families are being faced with personal bankruptcies; it is no wonder that their standards of living and expectations have been raised in excess of their ability to meet their obligations; it is no wonder that you can go into a bank and get a Visa card, into another bank and get a Bank Americard, you can take your Esso and Shell credit cards, you can go and get an Eaton's card, you can go and get a Simpsons-Sears card, you can have a card from any number of the other chain stores—so is it any wonder that people are having a very difficult time trying to manage their own economics? Is it any wonder families are being faced with problems? Credit is too damned easy to get. Then, once you get it, up go the interest rates.

Whatever happened to the day when people used to save a few dollars and then use that as collateral to go out and to purchase? Whatever happened to the day when being in debt over the top of your head was considered to be something unusual and unacceptable? And yet the banks, the very institutions to which we give the power to manage the affairs of the country, are encouraging people day after day to go out and borrow and become part of the debt-ridden society. The end result of it all is, of course, larger and larger profit margins year after year for the same banks, without any consideration for the people and whether they have the means or the ability to meet the obligations thrust upon them.

I think credit counselling must go along with credit. Along with the extension of credit, the banks have an obligation to make sure that the people who borrow the money have the ability to repay it. We have to find ways to have some control over the amount of credit people are able to get, because the majority of people cannot manage credit.

There is no point in allowing this situation to continue as it is, and in encouraging more and more people to the point of bankruptcy. That is what the banks are doing. That is partly what is wrong with the banking system. It is about time that we took a serious look and called upon the banks to answer for their actions because they have to answer for them. They, and they alone, have the power to redirect the kind of purchasing that has taken place in the last few years.

In any event, what I am saying is that I see the banks in a little different way from the majority of people, it is not that I see them as an enemy necessarily, although some people might wonder at that. Frankly I think they could provide a great deal more. I think they could be a much more important part of the economic policy-making process in the country if only they were not so interrelated.

I heard my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), outlining last week the directorships and the interrelationship between directorships and the major corporate sector. When the board of directors of a bank is meeting, and the directors there represent the major corporate sector of the country and they are talking about consumer interest rates, and they are trying to encourage people to buy the very products the firms that they represent manufacture and sell, I ask hon. members would they not think that there might be a conflict of interest there as these directors set rates and policy for the consumer borrowing that takes place? Would hon.

members not think there is a conflict of interest there as these people encourage more and more people to borrow more and more to buy the products which they, in their own private companies, manufacture? I ask hon. members whether they do not see some room for a conflict of interest in that situation?

Quite obviously if the director involved is in a company manufacturing durable goods and is then faced with a decision of sitting down and establishing consumer borrowing for the bank, he is going to encourage a more open and freer consumer borrowing policy in order that he can sell more of his goods. Therefore we will have to look at how directorships are set up in banks because that conflict carries right through the system. It carries right through in the decisions as to whether or not money will be loaned to major developers in order to develop, and where that development takes place. It carries right through in terms of whether they want to encourage development to take place where their competition might get the inside track or the upper hand. It carries right through in terms of whether they themselves want to see expansion take place in one part of the country over the other, or whether their primary company, the one from which they come to sit on the board of directors, will make decisions in the best interest of the economy as a whole, given that their own private company may suffer some detrimental effect as a result of policy established at the bank level.

There is something wrong with the relationship between the way we establish directorships in banks, and the tie-in of those directorships with the private operations they conduct on a day to day basis. I want to suggest, as we go into committee, that we take a serious look at severely restricting who can sit on boards of directors of banks. It is about time that we understood just how boards can in fact manipulate the policy to the advantage of the companies represented on the boards. If hon. members do not believe this, I would suggest they sit down over the weekend and give it some thought.

In addition to that, I think we have to try to get the banks to understand where their primary obligation is. As they would tell you, it is to their own shareholders. This is wrong in a private system like this where that becomes the area to which the directors and the banks must answer. It is not merely enough to do that because the bank and the banking institutions together probably control most, if not all, of the opportunities for development; or most if not all of the opportunities for growth; most if not all of the opportunities for balance in terms of the economy of the country. Therefore we must try to write into this legislation the terms and conditions under which the banks will act in the best interests of the country as a whole; what kind of social and economic responsibility they have; what kind of social responsibility to parliament and to the direction set by parliament, and also what kind of social responsibility they have to the communities all across this country.

With respect to mortgage rates, the banks could quite easily, with the direction of the central bank, have had a major influence in bringing mortgage rates to a level that people could afford. We said in January that the interest rates could have been dropped 2 per cent right there on the spot. People now in the government and some in the Conservative party thought it ridiculous at the time. I remember statements such as "it could not happen, it would be outrageous, it would destroy the system." But it has happened. Had it happened in January untold numbers of people would not have faced the kind of hardship that they have faced in the intervening months. The interest rate could drop by another 2 per cent right now without detrimentally affecting the economy of the banks. It could be done tomorrow morning with a direction. It is time it was done. It is time that we understood that the welfare of people and their families is as important, if not more important, than the unusually high profit margins being enjoyed by the banks.

When I was speaking in the House the other night I mentioned that I was in the bank cashing my cheque and I was talking to a friend of mine who owns a business. On that day I told hon. members he had told me that he was becoming desperate because he did not know how he was going to finance his business over the next month or two. He said that, as he carried his inventory, the carrying cost of the inventory has reached a point of almost 20 per cent. That is 20 per cent in addition to the value of the inventory.

He put it to me that it made it almost impossible for him to compete with the larger operations. He did not understand why it was that the government, a government that pays lip service to small business, could not find a way to establish some reasonable interest rates that he could use for short-term borrowing, in order to maintain the inventory he must carry to serve the public, to create and maintain the jobs that he had.

Mr. Corbett: What about the small business development bond which you defeated?

Mr. Deans: The small business development bond which we defeated? Unfortunately, it would not have been of help in this instance.

• (2120)

What he asked me was why is it, since it is generally recognized that small business employs by far the vast majority of people, that the government does not seem to be able to direct, either through the institutions or directly, the interest rates in order that he, and many like him, can take advantage of it in order to maintain their business?

This is when we were talking about giving Chrysler $700 million. He said, "I do not understand. How can the government find $700 million to give to a company that is damn near on the verge of bankruptcy and cannot find $20,000 to loan a guy in a little business that employs five people and maintains an operation in this community?"

I met another man the other day. He came to see me last weekend when I was home in my constituency office. He had the same kind of problem. All he needed was $4,000. That is all he needed. He had inventory valued at $44,000. This man had a loan from the Federal Business Development Bank of $8,600 and an overdraft of about $5,000. He needed this because of some changes he wanted to make in his business. It would have returned for him probably 30 per cent more than he was currently making. He needed some capital just to tide himself over. He cannot get it.

He cannot get it at the bank because he cannot get any more on his overdraft. Do you know why he cannot get it at the bank? Because the Federal Business Development Bank has attached all of his assets, all $44,000, for the $8,600 loan. When he went to try to borrow the additional amount that he needed, he could not get it. The government could find $200 million to put up for loan guarantees for Chrysler, but for $4,000 this man will lose his business.

That is a reflection of a lack of policy on the part of the government. It is a reflection of the inability of the banking institutions to recognize the problems that confront small business people and to deal with them in an adequate, sensible, and sensitive way. That speaks volumes of what is wrong with our system.

Our system turns on credit. The banks have decided that they are going to get everything they can out of the system. They do not have any sense of responsibility in terms of trying to make sure that the people who are coming to them can, in fact, meet those obligations, and that that obligation heaped upon the other obligation will not finally sink them.

The banks are so interrelated with so many of the largest corporate entities in the country that there is a definite conflict of interest on a day to day basis taking place; credit, the lack of it for small business people, and the banks do not respond to it. I said when I started that the problem with this—and this is probably the single most important piece of legislation that we will have—is it unfortunately speaks in traditional terms as to how you manage the financial affairs of the country. It speaks as if it were being written in the early thirties rather than the eighties to meet the needs of the eighties and nineties.

There has been much written about it. It is very difficult to feel any sympathy for the banking institutions because they have had it all their own way for such a long time. They have had many opportunities to correct the problems they have created and they have refused. Unless this government is prepared to put quite clearly into this legislation the kind of performance that it requires from the banking institutions, we are going to have to take another look at another way of managing the financial affairs.

We cannot trust people who up to this point in time have betrayed the trust they have been given. We cannot further entrust them with the finances of the country unless they show definitely, by example and by direction, that they now understand the role they must play. We cannot just give them carte blanche for another ten years.

I suggest there is more wrong with the legislation than one may believe at first glance. If you take a very hard and serious look at it, you look to see whether at least some of what I have said reflects an accurate picture of what happens within the banking structure. You take into account my colleagues' remarks about the hiring practices, and the problems of the relationships that were brought up by many other colleagues, and you have to come to the conclusion that it would be ill-advised to hasten this legislation through. It should be carefully thought out. The restrictions have to be in place. Banks cannot even manage the endeavour they are in in the best interests of the country. For heaven's sake, don't give them more to do. Make sure that they at least live up to the responsibilities they have been given before granting them the power to infringe on areas that other people can look after at least equally as well and perhaps even better.

Do not give them any more power. Do not give the directors who, in my judgment, exercise some rather strange power, further opportunity to infringe on their competition in other areas. It is time we took a look at this act and restructured it in an effort to re-establish the banking institutions in a way that will meet the social and economic needs of the next decade as we go towards the year 2000.

Times have changed. The old image of the banker with the banker's hours is no longer there. The banks manage the affairs of the nation. They have more power and more influence than any other structure. They have more power and more influence than we do in the House of Commons. They even have more power and more influence than the Senate. That is hard to believe, but true. Therefore I suggest that we not rush this through, that we take our time and look at it very carefully and, if need be, restructure it, because it has to be restructured if it is going to meet the needs of the next generation.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Mr. Speaker, you will remember that on May 1 I had the honour to launch the second reading debate on the Bank Act and I will take a few minutes to conclude that debate. I have listened carefully to the speeches delivered by all members of the House and in my opinion the interventions were constructive and mostly very serious. They have enabled us to throw light—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Do hon. members agree that if I recognize the minister, he will be the last speaker at this stage of the proceedings. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, those discussions helped shed some light on several extremely important questions. I am convinced that basically we have the same objectives, mainly the establishment of a financial system that is strong, competitive, efficient, fair and controlled by a majority of Canadians. Following the comments heard in this debate, I am convinced the proposals contained in Bill C-6 will help a lot to achieve those objectives.

I am under the impression that we are not fully aware of the competition taking place in Canada among banks, credit unions, caisses populaires, trusts and loan companies and a number of other financial institutions. Maybe I should have mentioned that very great competition in my opening speech. As I already suggested, it is the purpose of this bill to allow for that competition to be increased. A number of members pointed out that the entry of banks in the business of financing leasing of automobiles and trucks would probably force a number of car dealers to drop their leasing operations. That is not at all the intention of the government, Mr. Speaker. We are worried about the concerns of small businessmen and it is quite obvious that the purpose of the provisions dealing with financial leasing and the intention of the government is not to do away with car dealers engaged in the business of leasing automobiles or trucks in Canada.

What the government seeks is greater competition in this field as well. Regulations have already been made public and I am sure the members of the committee, particularly after hearing the speeches in this second reading debate, are going to look very carefully at those regulations and that we are going to be able to find together, if those regulations are too broad, a way to alleviate in theory and in fact the fears of car retailers.

Another question raised on several occasions has to do with representations made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and beef producers about the provisions in clause 88. Here again I am convinced that committee members will look at that clause very attentively and that we are going to try altogether to find a way of protecting adequately both farm and beef producers. In concluding, I would have liked to go over certain criticisms that were made about this bill. It is obviously very tempting to use the consideration of this bill to criticize the profits of banking institutions. Or again it is easy to use this opportunity to criticize the present situation with respect to interest rates entirely outside the particular economic context in which we live, not only in Canada but in North America, but that is not the purpose of this bill. And I would urge the members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to use the few days they have before consideration of this bill in committee starts to review the general provisions of this bill and perhaps take a little time to go over the discussions that already took place in previous committees both in the House and in the Senate so we may continue the consideration of this bill in a rigorous but also very serious and attentive manner.

It has been said at times that we should not hurry too much to pass this bill, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not agree with those who have taken this position. I think that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and certain of his colleagues as well as members on this side of the House and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) have repeatedly spoken about the urgency to pass this legislation. It has been studied in depth and examined very seriously.

The expiry date has been postponed several times and if we use the forthcoming examination by the committee to correct the point which have been singled out as creating the most difficulty, I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that with the co-operation of all members who sit on the committee, we shall be able to conclude very rapidly the study of this bill and proceed very soon to its third reading and final passage.

I wish to thank hon. members who have contributed to the debate at the second reading stage, and once again, I am counting on the co-operation of the members of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to give this bill rapid and effective consideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Bussières) (for the Minister of Finance) which was agreed to on the following division:

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—CAMPAIGN PROMISE TO IMPROVE FACILITIES AT MOUNT HOPE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, on three different occasions in this House during the last week in April and the first week in May, I questioned the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) about the government's plans for Hamilton civic airport. I thought it strange that since the Liberal government came to power, we in the greater Hamilton area—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I started off with Madam Speaker, but I thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, I thought it strange that since the Liberal government came to power we in the greater Hamilton area have hard heard nothing from the Minister of Transport nor from any of the Hamilton area Liberal members, ministers or otherwise, about their administration's intentions with regard to upgrading and expanding the airport facilities at Mount Hope.

I was astounded to hear the Minister of Transport say that the government would follow up on the previous Conservative government's commitments to spend $45 million on Hamilton's airport "if it makes sense to do so." Subsequently, in replies to the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), and myself, the Minister of Transport told this House that the previous Conservative government had not really committed $45 million to the Hamilton airport expansion. Rather, says the minister, we on this side simply passed a resolution in cabinet expressing the wish, the desire, for such a project, and the previous Conservative government had only made funds available for consultants on the proposed layout of the airport.

Three things are obvious from the minister's answers. First, he does not know what the Mount Hope expansion is all about, or even where Mount Hope is; second, the minister has been badly briefed on the decade-long saga of studies, consultations and endless delays in expanding Hamilton's airport, and third, even giving the minister the benefit of the doubt that he knows what he is talking about, you can fly a 747 jumbo jet between the positions of this transport minister and that of his cabinet colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), on the government's future role in this interminable odyssey.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that when we talk of our ticky-tacky terminal in Hamilton, the government seizes on the word "terminal", and that is the probable forecast for this very important expansion for the southern Ontario air traffic: terminal. At the very least the Minister of Transport is being devilishly clever in playing word games in answers to my questions in the House, and almost certainly the Government of Canada has relegated Hamilton airport expansion to a very low priority on the Richter scale of campaign promises.

I might just remind you, sir, of one specific campaign promise, straight from the horse's mouth—I think it was that part of the anatomy—when the hon. member for Hamilton East last January 25 during the election campaign, told the Hamilton Spectator that the $45 million would result in primitive facilities at best and that the Liberals would stand by their commitment to a $100 million expansion at Mount Hope.

There is a far more serious aspect to the confusion that the Minister of Transport has tried to sow in connection with campaign promises and commitments. The minister has repeatedly alleged that we, on this side, simply approved in principle a $45 million expenditure on the airport, that it was never a government-approved funding, and that it was simply an allocation for consultants. I think I can prove with the documents that I have in front of me that this all came from a recommendation from the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), which went to the Treasury Board and was subsequently approved by the full cabinet, and that in fact an investment of $45 million had been allocated for the purposes of developing Hamilton Civic airport. As far as the minister and the Air Administration Act were concerned, and as far as we were concerned as a government, the airport expansion was "go."

There was a government commitment to the program officially announced by the then minister of labour, my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton West, on January 25. The consultants' fees of $220,000 which the Minister of Transport has mentioned, was the amount for the first stage only of the proposed development, that is, the firm conceptual design.

I want to make one last point in connection with this hold-up, Mr. Speaker. Nordair has been providing Hamilton with an excellent, regular air service for some years. Nordair is not going to sit around forever with existing facilities. The airline has made it clear that it has contingency plans, and now flight routes, to operate from Toronto international airport, which could be implemented at any time. Sooner or later, and on the basis of evidence I have received from very reliable sources which gives me every reason to believe it will be sooner, rather than later, Nordair will bail out of Hamilton. Unless the airline has concrete evidence, an absolute commitment that Hamilton airport facilities will be upgraded and expanded, then I am convinced that two million people in my area will be adversely affected by Nordair leaving Hamilton.

Throughout this whole process I have been kept totally in the picture, both as a reporter and as a member of Parliament for Hamilton-Wentworth. I also kept the former minister of transport physically in the picture by bringing him to Mount Hope. He made his decision. The enlarged airport would not be a Taj Mahal, another Mirabel, but it would become a first-class regional facility of benefit to the greater Hamilton area. In short, sir, everything was "go" until the election and the arrival of the new Minister of Transport. Now it appears that the government is trying to weasel out of, not only the previous government's, our government's, $45 million commitment, but also the former Liberal government's $100 million promise which was reiterated by the hon. member for Hamilton East. Mr. Speaker, the people of Hamilton and I want a clear and definite statement from the ministry of transport on the future size and use of the Hamilton civic airport.

• (2215)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on May 1 the hon. member for Hamilton Wentworth (Mr. Scott) raised the matter of the government's plans for the expansion of the Hamilton airport in a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

As the Minister of Transport noted in his replies, the previous government had announced approval in principle of a plan for the expansion of this airport at a total estimated cost in the order of $45 million. Commitments such as this one are now being reviewed by this government to see, as the Minister of Transport so aptly put it, if they make sense. In this context I think it would be useful to provide some background to the current situation and to elaborate on the review to which the minister referred.

There is no doubt that the people of the Hamilton-Niagara-Brantford area require access to convenient and adequate air transportation service, and this government intends to see that this need is met. At the present time most of the people from this area use Toronto international airport with its many flights and same plane connections to numerous destinations. Thus, simply to provide new airport facilities for Hamilton will not necessarily ensure the provision of better service. What is required is to identify the additional service that existing or new carriers may wish or be persuaded to offer, and plan the development of the airport commensurate with the resultant operational requirement.

At the present time the only scheduled carrier servicing the Hamilton airport is Nordair. To obtain an appreciation of what additional services might be offered, inquiries are being made of other air carriers, including Air Canada. Once these inquiries are completed we will have a better understanding of the potential for new or expanded air services and the consequent level of investment.

This government fully recognizes the need to provide convenient and adequate air transportation services for the people of the Hamilton-Niagara-Brantford area. Our review is designed to ensure that what is proposed for the development of the Hamilton airport is consistent with the likely improvement in air transportation services.

The Minister of Transport stated in this House that the review, or assessment, of what is needed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his allotted time of three minutes has expired.

ENERGY—ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I rose in the House on May 2, 1980, and addressed a question to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Pepin) concerning the provision for an assistance program for Atlantic Canada in respect of electrical rates.

Let me explain very briefly the background for that question. In Nova Scotia and other Atlantic provinces, particularly Prince Edward Island, prior to 1974 electrical energy was primarily based on imported crude oil, that is to say, foreign crude oil was used to supply electrical generation to the extent of 70 per cent of the total output in Nova Scotia. The rising price of foreign crude oil in the years following 1974 had an effect on the price of electrical generation to the extent that it escalated prices well beyond those prevalent in other parts of Canada. In fact, in Nova Scotia electrical energy rates are almost twice as much as those of the average price imposed in the rest of Canada, and in some parts of Canada more than 100 per cent of the price of energy.

Our problem then was to provide and seek assistance from the Government of Canada in order to offset this increase in the cost of electrical generation. The budget introduced in December, 1979, by the Clark government made very specific provision for this problem in Nova Scotia and in other parts of Atlantic Canada. The budget provision promised assistance to the extent of $300 million for Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and other parts of the Atlantic provinces to offset this tremendous increase in the price of electrical generation caused by the escalating price of foreign oil.

The purpose of my question to the Acting Prime Minister at that time was to ensure that the government would make a similar provision for the Atlantic provinces, and particularly for Nova Scotia. I did not get an answer from the Acting Prime Minister, but a few days later on May 6, 1980, in Halifax the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) at a press conference indicated very definitely that there would be no guarantee of such financial assistance for the Atlantic provinces and that any subsidy would depend upon the oil pricing agreement reached with the western provinces, particularly Alberta. This uncertainty leaves Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and other parts of the Atlantic provinces in a very uncertain position.

Let me explain the case for Nova Scotia very briefly. That province has taken very definite steps to relieve itself of the difficulty caused by the escalating price of foreign crude oil. In particular, Nova Scotia has set about to develop its coal reserves and convert the electrical generating plants that were dependent on foreign oil to coal. This has resulted in a very substantial reduction in the amount of crude oil used for electrical generation.

The over-all conversion program would have six and a half million barrels that were consumed in 1977-78 reduced to less than half a million by 1988. The program to replace the oil fired generation will involve approximately an eight-year period before the complete reduction can be made. The net result will reduce Nova Scotia's dependence on foreign crude oil as a source of electrical generation from a 1981-82 high of 76 per cent to less than 40 per cent by 1980-81.

For these reasons I think Nova Scotia is entitled to the kind of relief that has been suggested by the government of Nova Scotia. The steps that have been taken to reduce the consumption of foreign oil for electrical generation has led to tremendous savings for the Government of Canada. The net drain on the funds used to subsidize the price of imported foreign oil will be greatly reduced by the conversion to coal.

It is in the interests not only of Nova Scotia and other parts of Atlantic Canada, but of all Canada in achieving self-sufficiency in energy, to apply these saved funds to support alternate energy programs and to subsidize the price of electricity in Nova Scotia. Only in that way can Nova Scotians receive and pay a fair price for electrical generation, which everyone will regard as a necessity of life.

The point simply stated is this. Nova Scotia has encountered an energy problem of devastating proportion. The escalation of the price of foreign crude oil from $2 per barrel to $36 per barrel over a five-year period has resulted in a tremendous increase in the cost of domestic electricity. Rates in Nova Scotia are already almost twice the Canadian average. Help is required. It was promised; it ought to be delivered. If it is, Nova Scotia can maintain rates until alternate sources of energy can be brought on stream.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the members of this House are aware, this government is committed to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of where they reside, share in the benefits of our energy opportunities. Certainly we include the Atlantic region in our commitment to equitable treatment for all. In fact our energy strategy meets particularly pressing needs in Atlantic Canada which has a very heavy dependence on oil for generating electricity.

Over the years the federal government has assisted the maritime provinces in a variety of ways in meeting their electricity requirements. More recently support has been provided through federal loans to aid New Brunswick in the construction of the nuclear generating station at Point Lepreau. When this nuclear unit comes into service later next year, it will have the potential to displace six million barrels of oil consumption annually.

More recently also, federal funds for the Nova Scotia program for oil displacement have supported the construction of the second coal-fired unit at Lingan and provided funding for a small-scale hydro development as Sissiboo.

In large measure the solutions to reduced oil dependence must be supported by co-ordination within the region itself. The initiatives of New Brunswick in negotiating contracts to import hydro-generated electricity from Quebec are an example of this. More generally, the federal government has indicated a willingness in principle to provide financial support for the development of a broader degree of regional co-ordination and planning through the Maritime Energy Corporation, but it is disappointing that this opportunity has not made greater progress. Clearly the Atlantic provinces should, in their own interest, attempt to achieve the highest degree of co-ordination so that the disadvantages of smaller scale systems and generating facilities are reduced to a minimum and so that through co-operative effort the displacement of oil-fired electricity generation takes place as rapidly as possible.

• (2225)

In Newfoundland the dependence on oil for electricity generation is less significant at the moment, with only 16 per cent of production for provincial needs coming from oil. The concern is that this dependence is likely to grow because the more economic hydro resources on the island of Newfoundland have already been developed. For this reason the federal government agreed in 1978 to become a partner in a joint federal-provincial enterprise, the Lower Churchill Development Corporation, which was charged with the responsibility of developing proposals for hydroelectric development in Labrador and the transmission of electricity between Labrador and Newfoundland.

The policy of the previous government, which would have imposed much higher prices for oil on the consumers of Atlantic Canada, also would necessarily have involved a greater palliative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted three minutes have expired.

EMPLOYMENT—SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROJECTS—REASON FOR DELAY IN APPROVING APPLICATIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I sought to follow up my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) of May 22 because the answer which I received from him on that occasion did not do justice to the spirit in which the question was originally asked, and because it did not do justice to the facts.

I rose in my place to ask the minister whether there were any pending announcements which would explain the delay which groups seeking funding under the summer youth employment program were experiencing. I knew of these delays because I had been telephoned by a group, not from my own riding but from a riding represented by a Manitoba Conservative member, a point which will be worth remembering when I get to the minister's comments on the alleged relation of NDP members of Parliament to the delay.

So, after being notified of the delay, I asked if an announcement was coming, not an announcement of who was to be funded but an announcement on a change of the program which would both explain and justify the delay.

Instead, the minister replied, first, that the announcement of funding was coming and that "there really is no delay." Yet the group I talked to expected to hear on April 30 whether they were to start some time after May 5 with their funding. They were concerned that people who lined up for this date would begin to look elsewhere for work. The minister said there was no delay and that his department was aiming at a May 15 target date, consistent with the schedule he announced in a press release some time in early April. In fact that press release of April 3 gives not indication of any time frame.

First, there was no delay, according to the minister's first answer, but then in the answer to the supplementary question, after being pressed a bit, the minister admitted that he was having problems. However, instead of telling the House why, and acting as a minister of the Crown should, he slipped into that petty, partisan attitude for which he is so famous and tried to take a cheap shot at the NDP, that party which he so despises for actually believing in justice and for having credibility in areas of concern in which he so futilely tried to get the Liberal party interested. Here I give the minister the benefit of the doubt, granting him status as a sincere eunuch in a harem that will yet be the ruin of him, a harem which ignores his public pleas, and one hopes there are private pleas, for rail relocation, among other things.

In a letter originally sent to members of Parliament asking them if they wished to recommend projects for their ridings, the minister said that if he did not hear from us by a date several days before my question in the House, he would proceed. In fact he did hear from us collectively and individually as we severally asked that our input be taken more seriously and not second guessed by a Liberal patronage committee, and that we be allowed to return to a system where community advisory committees had a significant say in what was to be funded and what was not.

• (2230)

The minister said in the House on the same day as my question on another occasion on the same subject, that New Democrats did not have the same respect for the role of a member of Parliament because we would not adjudicate projects the way the minister had suggested. We have more respect, not less, for the role of member of Parliament because we do not try to play God as members of Parliament. However, it is not surprising that the minister, a Liberal, should say this about the role of a member of Parliament, for that is really all that Liberal members of Parliament have ever been about, the dispensing of government money.

My question remains. Many groups are still waiting to hear about their funding. It is now 11 days since I asked my question in the House of Commons. I await an answer, and an explanation of this increasingly mysterious delay. I await an indication of whether the minister and his department intend in the coming months or in the fall to reinstate the community advisory process for deciding which projects are going to get funds and which projects are not.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to elaborate on the earlier comments by the minister to the hon. member on the summer youth employment program and the approval process established for that program. The hon. member will be pleased to hear that we have been able to adhere to the original schedule and that, to date, there have been no delays in the approval of projects. In fact more than 80 per cent of the projects to this date have now been approved, which is much higher than the schedule we had earlier programmed.

I expect that in most regions commission officials have already advised a number of project sponsors that their projects have been approved, or will be doing so very shortly. The approval of projects began several weeks ago and is now proceeding quite smoothly. Those projects which have come highly recommended and which emphasized a need to begin very early in the program time frame, are now being given priority attention.

[Translation]

It is expected that most of the projects which have been approved will be made known before the weekend, that is earlier than had first been expected. In fact, at this time nothing allows us to say that including consultation with hon. members has caused or will cause any serious delay in going ahead with the projects approved under the program.

Mr. Speaker, I understand there can be concern about the applicants being advised their projects have been approved, because it took longer to process the first projects than the ones approved under the Young Canada Works program. However, I should like to point out to the House that the situation had been foreseen from the start, as the Progressive Conservative government which was unable to announce the summer youth employment program for this year, had planned to do so on January 8, 1980, contrary to the Liberal government in previous years which announced them in early December. Of course, since the job-creation program for the fall and winter of 1980 under Canada Works program was announced on December 12, on the very day before the Progressive Conservative government was brought down, it is not surprising they waited till January to announce their summer job-creation program.

Mr. Speaker, for a program of that importance, the announcements are usually made in the fall preceding its implementation, but this year the staff of the commission had to work within very narrow time slots. Fortunately, they found ways of shortening the normal time period necessary to implement the program so that, in fact, students will be able to avail themselves of job possibilities at the time when most of them are looking for summer jobs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.34 p.m.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BULLET-PROOF VESTS FOR POLICE OFFICERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which I hope all members will support.

In view of the fact that the latest statistics indicate that the incidence of murder is on the increase, and that police officers across our country are being seriously wounded or killed in the performance of their duties, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Government of Canada take the necessary steps, through legislation or any other means, to make available to members of all police forces in the country the new, bullet-proof vests which are comfortable to wear and weigh only three pounds to five pounds, so that each and every one of them will have some measure of protection while protecting and defending the citizens of our country against all unlawful and criminal elements.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLITICAL FREEDOM OF EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on an issue of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the plans of the federal government to reintroduce legislation to end public servant exemption from wage garnishees, and whereas public servants do not have full political freedom in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House unanimously support and resolve to remove from all acts those sections that infringe on the full political freedom of public servants in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF COAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, recognizing the importance of the $5 billion coal and industrial package now pending between Japan, British Columbia and Ottawa and its potential for thousands of new jobs and investment in the Pacific region of Canada.

In view of the disastrous expedition to British Columbia of eastern cabinet ministers, during which the federal government offered to put up $70 million in capital development out of $675 million required, and that ministerial assistants were quoted regarding "Social Credit turkeys" and "Now we know what kind of dinks really run this place", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That in order to assure that Canada begins to present a substantial and united front in negotiating with Japan, the government apologizes for the assistants' remarks, consults with elected members from the west before making any further expeditions, and increases the federal contribution toward capital development in proportion to the eastern Chrysler standard.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC WORKS

HARBOURFRONT PROJECT, TORONTO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

● (1410)

In view of the fact that 3,800 person-years of employment and some $220 million in financial investment for metropolitan Toronto is waiting for the federal government to proceed with the Harbourfront project, and in view of the fact that the project, after years of planning, is supported by the Harbourfront board, Toronto city council, metro council, the provincial government, the Toronto construction association, the metropolitan Toronto labour council and, indeed, literally hundreds of social, cultural, recreational and business groups, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist):

That the Minister of Public Works advise his colleagues—the six Liberal members from metro blocking the project—that land use planning in Toronto, as it should be anywhere in this country, is the responsibility of local planning authorities in open discussion, not Liberal members of Parliament in closed meetings and, further, that the minister proceed with this project forthwith.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

RELEASE OF SWYER REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas fishermen lose their lives each year in our country because of the capsizing of their vessels, and the government itself has become a financial victim of this same phenomenon because of the questionable stability of the fishing vessel Rio San Lorenzo, the CIDA ship that will not float upright, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That this House order the immediate release of the Swyer report, prepared in 1973 and hidden by this government for some seven years, the publication of which report might have saved the lives of a number of fishermen and prevented the embarrassment and waste represented by the construction of such vessels as the Rio San Lorenzo.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DISASTERS

CALL FOR TASK FORCE TO REVIEW POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, I rise, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that two days ago the hon. member for Erie across the way, was unable to get unanimous consent to a motion to establish a special reserve fund for disaster relief, given the fact that in most cases the victims of such disasters, as well as the municipalities, are totally unable to provide the necessary financial assistance to rehabilitate affected areas and to help the victims of such disasters, and in view of the fact that in the last three years there have been several major disasters causing millions of dollars damage and personal loss, particularly in smaller communities where these kinds of losses are beyond the normal capacity of communities to respond adequately without a co-ordinated federal and provincial disaster relief program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to establish a special task force to review federal and provincial government policies with respect to disaster relief in this country.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ENSURING OF GOOD LABOUR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada has, over the years, fostered good labour-management relations between public servants and the Government of Canada, and today celebrates its sixtieth anniversary. However, the job security of its membership is now threatened by lay-offs and staff reductions. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House direct the President of the Treasury Board to consult with the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and other representatives of public servants to establish fair rules respecting job security, to ensure good labour-management relations in the public service.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPPOSITION TO APARTHEID IN SOUTH AFRICA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, concerning the forthcoming Floralie International Festival of Flowers being hosted jointly by the city of Montreal and the government of Quebec this weekend.

Considering that the federal government, which issued the invitations to the festival, has invited South Africa, considering that as a result the government of Cameroon is seriously thinking of withdrawing from the festival, and considering that the Canadian government has in the past gone on record as condemning apartheid in South Africa, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the federal government issue a statement to the effect that, notwithstanding its invitation to South Africa to attend the Floralie International Festival in Montreal this weekend, it remains committed to its policy of opposing apartheid in South Africa.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity affecting small businesses throughout Canada.

Given the fact that the small business development bond provisions introduced in the December budget were defeated in this House and, since the present government has not yet proved the sincerity of its intentions, after giving notice in the economic statement of April 21 that it would reintroduce these provisions, potential purchasers of these bonds are understandably reluctant to invest in them and small businesses are uncertain how to issue them, and since the situation which these bonds were intended to address was urgent and pressing when the last government introduced them, and remains so, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to introduce forthwith amendments to the Income Tax Act that will provide a legislated basis to the small business development bond provisions introduced by the last government and presented again by the present government in its April 21 notice of ways and means motion to amend the Income Tax Act.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

APPLICATIONS FOR MONTREAL-HALIFAX NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—REPORT THEREON

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wonder if the minister can tell the House whether he has received a report, or any other information, from the National Energy Board relating to applications for a natural gas pipeline from Montreal to Halifax.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, such a report has been received and it will be considered by cabinet tomorrow morning.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, can the minister tell us whether the government is considering a recommendation to construct a Q and M line to Quebec City only at this time, consequently leaving the maritime provinces without the benefits of secure access to western Canadian gas, and without the benefits of a significant pipeline construction project and the jobs that go with it?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the report will be considered by cabinet tomorrow, and as soon as cabinet makes a decision I hope the report will be made public and the cabinet decision also. The Leader of the Opposition will then be able to reach his own conclusions as to the content of the report and the nature of the cabinet decision.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, could we have a commitment now from the Minister of Energy that any announcement regarding government policy on a gas pipeline to or beyond Quebec City will be made here in the House of Commons before it is made elsewhere?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Madam Speaker, but I will be in the House tomorrow afternoon and I will be very happy to answer any questions. Moreover, the estimates are before the House and I will be quite happy to appear before the Committee of the Whole and answer any question on the subject once the decision has been made.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, just to be clear on this, the minister is telling the House categorically that he intends to make this announcement of a major policy decision outside the House of Commons. Will he tell us how he can justify that? Will he not reconsider and respect the rights of Parliament and recognize his obligation to make an announcement of that kind here in the Parliament of Canada and not at some other forum?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, I will be here for question period, I will be here for the estimates, and I will be very happy to answer any questions that may be asked.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH ALBERTA

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question with respect to energy supply. It is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has just returned from Alberta.

Within the limitations existing in question period, can the minister comment on the progress, if any, that he made in Alberta? Particularly, will the minister take the opportunity to assure us, or guarantee to the country that an agreement will be reached by the end of June?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had a very fruitful and friendly meeting with my colleagues, particularly with my colleague in Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: However, as my hon. friend knows from the experience of his own government, these negotiations can be lengthy and sometimes difficult. It took them, as he will remember, six months not to have an agreement, so he should not be surprised at the necessity of one or two more meetings before I can answer the question raised by my hon. friend.

● (1420)

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I am even less surprised that we have not received the assurance or guarantee I asked for when I put my supplementary question to the minister. The present agreement, as he knows, ceases to exist on June 30. Can he confirm that, in the absence of a new agreement, one of two scenarios will exist: one, unilateral action by a level of government, one or the other, within the confines of its constitutional jurisdiction; or two, in the absence of such government action, that free market conditions will prevail—market conditions of supply and demand? Will the minister confirm that will be the situation on July 1?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I have to pay homage to the perceptive analysis of my hon. friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HEALTH AND WELFARE

UNIVERSALITY OF MEDICARE PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last November, the minister said two important things about the need to maintain a universal system of medicare. First, she said, "Medicare should be free and when I say free, I mean free; not two bucks here and two bucks there." She said in the same speech, "We can't wait six months; we have to take measures now."

Since the government of Alberta recently increased their health premiums once again—this time by 13 per cent—will the minister now practice what she preached and take immediate action to restore medicare as a universal right across Canada?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member could immediately contact the New Democratic Party of Alberta and ask them to exert local pressure to explain to their provincial members that they will not accept that, in order that the population at large in Alberta can do what the people of New Brunswick were successful in doing, namely, eliminating user fees and additional financial barriers to medicare.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, what a classic Liberal cop-out that is!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: For the minister's information, the leader of our party in the Alberta legislature has already done what she said should be done. Since the problem with medicare does not just exist in Alberta, but there is double-billing in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario—

Some hon. Members: And Saskatchewan.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Chair cannot even understand what is going on. There is too much noise in the chamber. Would hon. members please keep their comments until after the question period.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister said, in the same speech, that the then government—which was a Conservative government—should take immediate action to terminate such practices, and this was Liberal party policy. I now ask her, while she has the authority to so act, what is she waiting for?

Miss Bégin: The Leader of the New Democratic Party should give us the example, instead of copping-out of the referendum campaign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: That would be a good start. To get back to medicare, I do not know why the hon. member suddenly wakes up today. We have often discussed this in this House, and we said that all parties were going to make an effort—which some have not adhered to—to restore medicare as the best institution at the service of Canadians as a result of efforts by everyone.

The hon. member knows very well that the tool provided to us by a piece of legislation approved by Parliament some time ago is a very heavy-handed one for the situation. The previous government, not the present administration, instituted a commission of inquiry presided over by Mr. Justice Hall. I have informed the House that Mr. Justice Hall has agreed to report in one month with recommendations. We shall make these recommendations public and try to act as soon as possible to restore medicare.

● (1425)

Other than that, the best exchange we could have—which, by the way, would not be and should not be confrontation—would be in this House, through television, to ask the local population and community to react to financial barriers being imposed when they should not be imposed in the light of the huge payments being made by taxpayers in all of Canada for medicare in Alberta, as everywhere else—though not in Saskatchewan, by the way.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister is now hiding behind a royal commission.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The chorus is at work again. She is hiding behind a royal commission report. Last October, when a Conservative government was in office, she said, and I quote her words, "We should not await the publication of the Hall report before acting." These are her words, not mine.

Having said last October that we should not wait for the Hall report before acting, why is she waiting now for the Hall report to come in before her government will make further studies and do something about it?

Miss Bégin: For an excellent reason, Madam Speaker. When we were in opposition, the party in power did not send us a telegram with the information pertaining to the commission, how much money it had, what its mandate was, and so on. The hon. member may recall that it was appointed on September 17, 1979. We did not know what the mandate was; nobody knew. Nobody knew the amount of money made available; nobody knew the status of Mr. Justice Hall or the tools at his disposal to conduct a proper inquiry.

I was not in the government, neither was the hon. member. Where was he that day? We stated very clearly that in light of the information in our possession, we did not think that a commission of inquiry was needed. I still feel that way. But a commission exists, and we shall support it in order to get the best possible report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): A supplementary question to the minister. I tried to follow her answer, but I would be pleased if she would repeat it. Let me put it this way: did the minister say that the matter was not public from September 17 on?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I shall reply in French so as to be absolutely sure the hon. member understands me perfectly. I must be cautious because we are talking about a royal commission of inquiry and the most important matter in Canada.

I want to repeat that when the minister instituted what appeared to be a commission of inquiry on September 17 of last year, if I remember correctly, we from the public did not know under what legislation, what legal or administrative instrument or what authority of Mr. Justice Hall, that was done, and we asked many questions of the government to find out what was really the mandate of the commission. We finally found out that the terms of reference were ten pages long, which does not mean anything, and covered everything under the sun. We eventually found out months later, or at least weeks later, during SOS medicare that Mr. Justice Hall was simply under contract with the minister or the Department of National Health and Welfare, which in no way constituted a royal commission of inquiry.

ENERGY

DATE OF NEW OIL-PRICING AGREEMENT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It follows a question by my hon. friend from Perth.

● (1430)

Given that the minister has admitted that failure to reach a new oil-pricing agreement by July 1 would create a lot of confusion, at best, can the minister assure the House that there will be a new oil-pricing agreement in place by that time?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As I have often indicated, I think, in the House, Madam Speaker, there can be no agreement without some form of understanding between at least two parties. I cannot guarantee that parties out of my control will endorse an agreement. All I can say is that I will do my utmost to try to achieve an agreement. I have already had two meetings with each of the ministers of the producing provinces. I have met the ministers of the consuming provinces at least once, except in the case of Quebec, and I expect to meet their representative by the end of this month or in early June. We will therefore pursue our discussions to try to arrive at an agreement.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, given the fact that there could be this confusion on July 1 if there is not a pricing agreement, could the minister enlighten the House about just what plans he has in mind?

Is it his intention to let market forces—in other words, the world price—dictate? Is it his intention to let Alberta unilaterally set the price? Is it his intention to have the federal government unilaterally set the price? If it is the latter choice, under what legislation? Is he contemplating bringing in the Petroleum Administration Act?

Can he enlighten the House and the country as to what his plans are? That date is very rapidly approaching and, given the minister's record, one is not being unfair in assuming that he will probably not reach that target by July 1.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, there is little to add to what I have already said, namely, that our objective is to reach an agreement. We must proceed step by step. I think it would be irresponsible on my part to speculate on events which have not yet taken place and which, hopefully, will not take place. In any case, I hope we will reach an agreement by the end of June and I am working with this objective in mind.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

JUSTIFICATION FOR CERTAIN DEPARTMENT STORES INCREASING FINANCE CHARGES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is asked in the context of the destructive level of interest rates in this country and the fact that those interest rates have started to come down, no thanks to the government.

Would the minister undertake to investigate and report to this House what justification exists for Sears and The Bay to raise their finance charges from 21 per cent to 23 per cent effective October 1 this year, at a time when their profits are running at about 80 per cent over last year?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, obviously the question raised by the hon. member is a matter of concern not only for my own department but for the Canadian government as a whole. I would suggest to the hon. member that he put his question to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, who has broader powers than me in this regard.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, in the interest of protecting the consumers of this country, I also refer to the minister the question of possibly looking into Master Charge and Chargex interest rates—since these are consumer affairs—which have run at roughly 18 per cent to 20 per cent. In the case of Imperial Oil, its finance charges are increasing from 21 per cent to 24 per cent. Will the minister call in the heads of these companies and ask them to stop literally gouging the Canadian public?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, the answer I gave to the hon. member on his first question applies to the second question as well.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

DIRECTIVES TO MINISTERS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. In the Speech from the Throne, the government committed itself to the introduction of a freedom of information act. However, to date no such act has been introduced in Parliament.

May I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether, pending the introduction of such an act, the Prime Minister has issued any directives to member of the cabinet to the effect that they should conduct themselves in strict adherence and compliance with the principles of freedom of information?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker. We expect to bring in a proposed freedom of information act or have it passed as soon as possible. In the meantime, the government is adhering to the policy guidelines with respect to communications to the public by public servants.

Mr. Nielsen: Ours, or yours?

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Communications, who has responsibility in the government for the whole issue of freedom of information.

May I ask the Minister of Communications whether, in keeping with the principle of freedom of information, he will follow the practice established by the previous government of making available to Parliament and to the public the membership of cabinet committees?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, my responsibility in the matter is to introduce freedom of information legislation. We are looking at the matter very closely at the moment. We are reviewing the bill which in many respects was a very good bill and which was introduced by the former government. We are examining the criticisms made of that bill, and hope to come up with an improved bill in the near future.

Concerning the question of publication of lists of cabinet committees, that is obviously a question which should be directed to the Prime Minister and not to the Minister of Communications.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, following the question raised by my colleague about freedom of information, I should like to address a question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In view of the ringing endorsation of freedom of information contained in the Speech from the Throne and the commitment of this government, I wonder how the Deputy Prime Minister can justify the statement in the Speech from the Throne with the fact that the government is now shutting off access to government information, particularly with respect to the list of order in council appointments. Will the Deputy Prime Minister now reverse that unfortunate decision, and continue the practice started by my leader of giving that information to the public?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in assuring the hon. member that the information to which he refers can, and will, be made available. There will be no effort to keep it confidential or secret.

As I understand his question, it relates to vacancies which occur in various bodies of the federal government. That information will be made available and open to the public.

Mr. Clark: The composition of cabinet committees?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I hope the Deputy Prime Minister will extend that as well to cabinet committees, as requested by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe.

In view of the commitment to freedom of information, and also the statement in the Speech from the Throne, that section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act would be removed, how can the Deputy Prime Minister justify the fact that on March 13, 1980, the Secretary of State for External Affairs used this particular section to withhold documents from an inquiry being held by Mr. Justice Gibson of the Federal Court with respect to Canadian Dairy Commission policies? Also, will the Deputy Prime Minister indicate tomorrow to this House, or table a list of other instances in which this government has used the provisions of section 41(2)?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the particular case to which the hon. member refers. It would certainly be my wish, even before the legislation which is to come forward, to have the government act in accordance with the spirit of that legislation. But in the meantime we will attempt to do that and I will look into the point with respect to the particular case raised.

Oral Questions

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

FUNDING OF CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. The Canadian Conference of the Arts is meeting in Ottawa this week: a meeting, incidentally, which the minister has declined to attend, I understand.

Can the minister tell the House what immediate plans he has to meet the crisis in arts funding and to meet the needs of major cultural institutions such as ballets, symphonies and even the Stratford Festival which now find themselves desperate for funds?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I simply want to reply in part to the preamble of the hon. member's question. I was unable to accept the very kind invitation from the conference to address it tomorrow evening, for the simple reason that there happens to be a referendum campaign in the province of Quebec. Maybe the hon. member has not heard about it. The future of the country is at stake, and if there is to be a conference of the arts next year, there will have to be a country. It also happens that on Thursday evening I will be addressing a number of people in the province of Quebec and all day Friday I will be engaged in the referendum debate.

I would, of course, very much like to attend the meeting of the Canadian Conference of the Arts, and I hope to have the opportunity of meeting with the executive of that conference in the immediate future to review some of the problems the hon. member has raised.

● (1440)

Mr. Rose: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I hope the minister is not suggesting that no questions should be put on any subject other than the referendum while it is in progress. I am not suggesting the referendum is unimportant—but surely we are entitled to raise other questions during the referendum!

Since the minister appears, at the moment at least, to have no firm plans to protect and expand Canadian cultural institutions, can he tell the House whether or not he intends to follow the commitment of the previous government and follow the Applebaum preliminary blue paper on cultural development, with a parliamentary committee, to examine and review the whole matter and come up with a comprehensive cultural policy for Canadians?

Mr. Fox: I thank the hon. member for his question. Unfortunately, he was not in the House last week when I responded to the very question he is putting which was put then by the hon. member for Rosemont. I would suggest to the hon. member that he refer to Hansard.

However, I would like to respond to the question in detail. I have already indicated that it was my intention, and that of the government, to pursue the work of the Applebaum committee. I met with that committee on two occasions and I find that the work they have done until now is most worth while.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Fox: If the hon. member would let me complete my answer and if he would stop interrupting, perhaps he would learn some of the things that are going on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: The hon. member mentioned the blue paper which will be published by the Applebaum committee. The blue paper originated with my predecessor in this portfolio. The members of the Applebaum committee tell me they are not in a position to produce a policy paper at this stage; that they need more time before they can present the government with a complete policy paper in that regard.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, fortunately there is one Quebec member who now and then raises questions about that province. My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. A month ago I asked him if he would soon announce the sale of Nordair and I would like to ask him today whether negotiations have progressed and what groups or individuals in Quebec are apparently interested in the purchase of Nordair.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, consultations are being carried out in that case. I could not name from memory all Quebeckers interested in Nordair. There are a great number and I will send a complete list to my hon. friend if he would like me to do so.

INQUIRY WHETHER MAJORITY OF SHARES WILL BE HELD BY QUEBECKERS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I wish to point out to the minister that I would like very much to know who is interested. I would also like to ask him if he is prepared to tell us, supposing that the sale is concluded in the not too distant future, whether he will make sure that most of the shares will belong to Quebec interests.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I cannot give a percentage, but I can very clearly indicate that there is no doubt in my mind that Quebec interests should play a very important role in the corporation set up as the result of that sale.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GRAIN—INITIAL PAYMENT TO FARMERS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Will the minister confirm that the members of the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board were present, and can he say whether they were consulted about the reduction of the initial payment to western Canadian farmers of 50 cents a bushel from the October adjustment price set by the past government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I assume that my hon. friend is referring to the question he asked me the other day about payments going back to 1972-73. If that is the case, let me tell him that I inquired about this from my immediate advisers and was told that they were very surprised at the existence of such a situation, which explains why I was not aware of it. A further inquiry is being made now, I understand, from the Canadian Wheat Board in Winnipeg and I am awaiting a report on that subject.

What I am trying to indicate, Madam Speaker, is that the subject is a very, very complex one, so that even my immediate advisers were not aware of its existence.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I should like to repeat my question to the minister. I will be very slow and will read it very carefully.

Will the minister confirm whether the members of the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board were present when the decision was made to reduce initial payments to producers by 50 cents a bushel from the October 15, 1979, initial payment adjustment level set by the past administration?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, again, this is a very detailed question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: I will consult immediately with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and I will report on it as soon as I can.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROVISIONS RESPECTING ORPHANED CHILDREN

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: it is on a subject on which she is very well informed.

Has the minister been able to approach her colleagues and receive permission to change the regulations under the Family Allowances Act and also the child tax credit section of the Income Tax Act that ends discrimination against orphaned children in Canada? In other words, has she had the time to put forward the regulations?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am afraid not, Madam Speaker. I, too, have been involved for weeks now—every evening and even during the week—with the referendum campaign. I am sorry, but I have not yet had a chance since I took office on March 3 to proceed with a possible correction of the Family Allowances Act. However, I am aware of the problem and will give it my attention as soon as possible.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, in view of the injustice to orphaned children over the last number of years, would the minister attempt to bring in, with her colleagues, some sort of retroactive period at least back to the time of the introduction of the child tax credit under the Income Tax Act?

Mrs. Bégin: I hope to bring in that recommendation when we study the question with the hope of resolution.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COST OF LIVING INCREASE LESS THAN RISE IN INFLATION

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. I am sure that in keeping with the non-partisan policy of maintaining a strong, united Canada, the minister is aware that at present the Treasury Board is negotiating with about 65,000 employees in four different groups at the bottom of the public employee pay scale, a large majority of them being women, and about 75 per cent of them in the clerk's area. They are earning less than $10,000 a year.

Can the minister tell the House why they were offered increases of only 5 per cent a year on a two-year term contract, when inflation is running at nearly 10 per cent, members of Parliament received on the first of this year 7 per cent increases, and corporate profits are running at over 50 per cent in the first quarter of this year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the philosophy of the employer—the Government of Canada, through the Treasury Board—is to establish comparability in all these areas with the private sector.

In the case in point, negotiating procedures are under way, there is a mechanism established, and I am confident that a satisfactory settlement will be reached eventually and that the employees will be treated properly.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is aware that unless the Treasury Board changes its policy immediately, the government will be facing a very important and crucial strike.

Can the minister give us an assurance that the current stand of the Treasury Board will change, so that many employees who are living on incomes below the poverty line will at least be offered increases comparable to those which members of Parliament have received or, preferably, up to at least 9.1 per cent which was the increase in the consumer price index in 1979?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, in my first answer I expressed the philosophy which guides these negotiations. At the moment, as I understand it, the designated procedure is progressing, and eventually, I presume, the conciliation board will be appointed. I think that in the process of collective bargaining we have a responsibility not only to the government but also to the employees to let the negotiating procedure, the collective bargaining process, run its course.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—SUPPORT OF PROVINCES FOR "NO" VOTE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister is attending an important meeting this evening in Montreal, would the Acting Prime Minister convey to him the very best wishes of other Canadians, that is, the best wishes of hon. members from other provinces of Canada who support him fully in saying No to the referendum?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the interest he and his colleagues of all parties in the House are showing in the cause of the No in the Quebec referendum campaign. I thank him for the show of solidarity he has just expressed and I assure him that I shall be only too happy to convey those wishes to the right hon. Prime Minister who, I am sure, will want to publicize them even more. The hon. member can rest assured that his comments are very much appreciated. I want to take this opportunity, Madam Speaker, to thank the House leaders of both opposition parties who, since the beginning of the referendum campaign, have been flexible to the point of allowing the government to fulfil its obligations in governing Canada and hon. members and ministers, specially those from Quebec, to go to that province and work for the cause of Canadian unity.

SMALL LOANS ACT

CO-OPERATIVES—REGISTRATION UNDER LEGISLATION

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Finance). It involves the Small Loans Act which was passed in 1939 to serve purposes which are no longer with us.

If the act is kept in force, it will require some 4,400 co-operatives to be registered under federal legislation. My question to the minister is: Is the minister considering repealing or amending the Small Loans Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance and I have received many representations from several hon. members, as well as the hon. member who has just put the question, with regard to the difficulties posed by the Small Loans Act. As the hon. member pointed out in his question, we are looking into two possibilities, namely repealing the act completely or amending it. All hon. members will surely understand, Madam Speaker, that we must take a very close look at the consequences of either amending or repealing the act. As soon as that study has been completed we will reach a decision. We want to act quickly because we are aware of the problems the current situation is creating for the caisses populaires and credit unions. As soon as a decision has been made, we shall advise the House of our intentions.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: I appreciate the answer by the minister, Madam Speaker. I wonder whether he has a suggested time-frame with regard to when this change might take place—either repealing or amending.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Madam Speaker, the time-frame is as soon as possible.

ENERGY

OWNERSHIP OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY—POLICY ON COAL

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I am somewhat tempted to ask my question in the tongue of my ancestors, but I will resist that temptation.

Some hon. Members: Please do.

Mr. Yurko: It is not an official language. Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Mines. In light of the stated specific goal of the government in the throne speech, that at least 50 per cent Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry will be effected by 1990, could the minister advise the House whether she, her government or any of its ministers are contemplating a similar policy, or have under review a similar policy for the coal industry?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, there is no similar policy under consideration at the moment, although we are encouraging Canadian ownership as much as we can of the mineral industry. We are, therefore, looking at ways to encourage the junior mining industries in some tax ways; but at the moment there is no policy of 50 per cent ownership.

Mr. Yurko: Madam Speaker, the export tonnage of coal, particularly to Japan, is expected to rise substantially in the next few years. Can the minister advise the House whether all new coal export contracts will be subject to federal government agreement, either through the National Energy Board or directly by the government, as to the price of coal—and is the federal government considering an export tax on coal?

Mrs. Erola: The coal deal, as you know, Madam Speaker, has not been finalized, but the federal presence will be very much there. As a matter of fact, negotiations will include a federal as well as a provincial presence during the negotiations.

DISCUSSIONS ON PURCHASE OF SUNCOR

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if I can get his attention.

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, I am listening.

Mr. Shields: Last Monday, while the minister was walking all those extra miles, I directed a question to the Prime Minister that I should like to redirect to this minister. Has his government, or any department, initiated or taken part, through any Crown corporation or, indeed, PetroCan in discussions with Suncor regarding its purchase and, if so, what has taken place so far?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I want to confirm for the hon. member that I am not aware of any such discussions and my department has not been involved in any such discussions.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, would the minister inquire through Crown corporations or, indeed, PetroCan, if discussions are taking place, and will he report back to this House soon?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would raise a serious question as to whether it would be appropriate for me to inquire from PetroCan at this time whether they are carrying on negotiations and with whom.

As the hon. member knows, these types of discussions of a business nature are usually kept to a very, very limited number of individuals, even inside a corporation; and I, frankly, do not think it would be wise for me to even try to attempt to get this information at this stage.

NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO VANCOUVER ISLAND

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, "Je voudrais poser ma question au Ministre de l'Énergie." I think the minister is aware that Vancouver Island is the largest market in western Canada not presently served by natural gas. On Monday, in Vancouver, the minister refused to support British Columbia's proposal to build a natural gas pipeline to Vancouver Island. My question is, why?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had an excellent meeting with my colleague, the minister of energy for British Columbia, and I do not know where my colleague got the information that I was not supporting the notion or the principle of a pipeline to Vancouver Island.

• (1500)

On the contrary, I told CBC radio and the press which interviewed us at the end of the meeting that I thought it was an excellent initiative on the part of the British Columbia government and one which we welcomed very much. We will follow the developments in this regard with great interest and my colleague, the minister of energy for British Columbia, and I are due to meet again and discuss these issues at a later stage.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, according to press reports the minister has said that he could not afford, right now—with the $14 billion deficit—to put any money into this project.

Is the minister aware that such a project, while costing about $200 million, would replace 80 million to 100 million barrels of oil over a 20-year period, which would amount to something like $450 million to $500 million? If the minister can agree with those figures, is he then prepared to take another look at this matter and to commit himself, as he said a moment ago, to some federal support for this project?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would have thought that with the experience the hon. member has had in this House as a parliamentarian, he would not believe everything he reads in the press.

Mr. Broadbent: It is more reliable than the minister.

Mr. Lalonde: For instance, it is reported that I did not attend the opening of a windmill experiment near Victoria, when in fact I was there with my colleague, the president of B.C. Hydro and, I think, four networks. I suggest to the hon. member that he check the press reports very carefully.

THE ADMINISTRATION

RECOGNITION OF CANADIAN ETHNIC ORIGINS

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): "Ya Paunyi dooju krausno dynak-kooyou stcho dalishtee mnie nahodu skazaty paro sleeu."

Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the President of the Privy Council. This is the fourth level of government I have served on in my many years as an elected representative of the people. With regard to the federal level of government, I am very disappointed and frustrated with the present structure and effectiveness of parliamentary committees.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Resign.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It being very close to the end of the question period, I ask that the hon. member put his question very rapidly.

Mr. Kushner: Approximately two years ago a procedural organization committee was struck to look into the situation. As a result, two reports were tabled. Is the President of the Privy Council reviewing the reports with the intention of making recommendations to Parliament for much needed change?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the frustrations which the hon. member has expressed could also stem from his feeling that the speeches in the House are too long, that the House should sit in the morning and not at night, and that perhaps he should like to spend more time in his own constituency and deal with his constituents' difficulties. I am pleased by his interest in the changes to be made to our Standing Orders, and I shall give serious consideration to any idea he may care to submit possibly to streamline Parliament and make it more human and efficient.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SARGEANT—TEST OF TOXIC CHEMICALS IN MANITOBA

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from information provided by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni) in response to questions by myself and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) concerning chemical and biological warfare testing in Canada. The parliamentary secretary, in response to questions on this issue over the last two days, has misled the House; whether it was inadvertent or not, I am unable to say.

In response to my first question on this matter on Monday, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence replied, as reported at page 930 of Hansard:

—I think it is important to point out that the department feels very strongly that if such an experiment did, in fact, take place, it was not harmful to human life.

Yesterday, in response to the hon. member for Provencher, the parliamentary secretary said, as reported at page 1005 of Hansard:

The report that we have so far . . . is that, in effect, this substance was not harmful to human life.

Madam Speaker, the zinc mixture that was used in the Winnipeg test, according to available data, was zinc cadmium sulphide. Cadmium sulphide is a long-known poison and an experimental carcinogen. According to the Handbook of Poisoning, "the ingestion of as little as ten milligrams will cause marked symptoms." The handbook further states that cadmium is damaging to all cells of the body. In Japan since 1962 some 230 cases of degenerative bone disease have been attributed to cadmium poisoning. This disease progresses very slowly so that symptoms may not appear for decades. Furthermore, Dr. David Penman of the Saskatchewan department of the environment told me that to suggest today the spraying of zinc cadmium sulphide throughout a city would simply be beyond question. Surely the parliamentary secretary does not wish to contend that this is a substance that is not harmful to human life.

In response to my call for a full-scale public inquiry into chemical and biological warfare testing in Canada to determine the nature and extent of this kind of operation, the parliamentary secretary insisted that this operation was not a secret at the time. She cited two reports concerning the tests which were carried in the local press in 1953 as proof. I have copies of those press reports in front of me, and anyone reading those news reports and comparing what they claim is the purpose of the tests and what we now know to be the truth would have no doubt that Winnipeg civic officials and the population of that city were misled about these tests at the time.

Let me read the first report concerning these tests. I am quoting from the Winnipeg Free Press of January 22, 1953:

Civil defence authorities from Ottawa are going to study smoke behaviour in Winnipeg.

—committee granted the Ottawa request to make the study which was part of a national program to study air currents in built-up areas.

The tests are made by spraying the air with small quantities of fluorescent powder which adheres to smoke particles and makes them visible.

Later that year, on June 23, 1953, the Winnipeg Tribune reported that:

Winnipegers will be walking with their heads in the clouds next month—clouds of zinc powder which are to be released in civil defence experimental smoke tests.

Tests are to determine the feasibility of smoke screening the city and its vital installations in the event of enemy attack.

Nowhere is there reference made to testing for chemical and biological warfare. Even the communist councillor to whom she made reference yesterday believed that the tests were indeed to demonstrate the feasibility of smoke screens. This is quite obvious to those who have read his letter.

No one knew the real purpose of these tests. It is clear from the admission of the Department of National Defence that Canadians have been used as test subjects for experiments in chemical and biological warfare. Canadians have the right to know whether they are still unsuspecting test subjects, and they have the right to know the nature of the chemicals or bacteria to which they have been, and for all we know are still being, exposed.

The types of answers provided by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence do this House a grave disservice by misleading all hon. members as to the nature and significance of this important issue. I would repeat my request that this government establish a full-scale public inquiry into this matter. It is a sad commentary on our governing process that Canadians must go to another country—in this case the United States—to find out what goes on in our own land, sanctioned secretly by our own government.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mrs. Appolloni) said yesterday, as reported at page 1005 of Hansard:

—these tests took place some 27 years ago. Many of the people who were alive at that time... or involved in the tests at that time have since retired or, unfortunately, for other reasons, have passed away.

Madam Speaker, I am alive and I was involved in those tests.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: I was a member of the city council at that time. I would like to reaffirm what my colleague the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) said. He said that not only were the people of Winnipeg and the elected officials of the city of Winnipeg not told the truth, but in fact they were deliberately misled about what was taking place.

● (1510)

Let me quote from the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary yesterday as reported at page 1004 of Hansard. She said:

I should like also to caution the hon. member and all members of the House against paying undue attention to sensational reporting, the effects of which can only cause needless and cruel fear.

In reply to a further question she answered, again referring to the tests, as follows:

Far from being held in secret, it now appears that there were at least two reports of those tests at the same time—

Later she said:

—to imply that these tests were held in secret is wrong.

And later in answer to a further question, referring to the people of Winnipeg she said:

—we on this side prefer to assure them that there is no great danger—

I have a summary of the letter sent at the request of the Department of National Defence through the metropolitan director of civil defence in Winnipeg, Mr. M. H. S. Penhale, to the city clerk. The letter was transmitted to the city council and on the basis of it city council gave approval to the tests. The letter said that the proposed exercise was to investigate the behaviour of smoke dispersal in built-up areas. City council was told that a communiqué had been received from Ottawa, through the civil defence agency, which indicated that climatic conditions in the area of Winnipeg showed that valuable data for civil defence purposes could be obtained by studying smoke particles under varying conditions, and that this would involve the release of small quantities of fluorescent particles.

On that basis the city council gave approval but it was not told, according to a spokesman for the Department of National Defence, Major Haswell, as reported in yesterday's Globe and Mail that the tests were to determine how radioactive fall-out from a nuclear explosion would be dispersed by the wind currents around an urban centre. It is clear from what Major Haswell said yesterday that the civil servants in the Department of National Defence in 1953 hid the real purpose of the tests from the elected officials of the city of Winnipeg.

I submit, Madam Speaker, that such action is completely inexcusable. It is completely unacceptable that some group of civil servants, whether in the Department of National Defence or the RCMP, should deliberately lie to the elected representatives of any body in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: In a democratic society it is the elected representatives who have the right and the responsibility to make the decisions. If they make wrong decisions, the electorate can determine that and, if necessary, elect another group of people at the next election. It is not the right of any civil servant or of any bureaucrat to decide that it is in the interests of somebody or other that the truth should be kept from elected representatives.

Today's Globe and Mail reports Major Haswell, the national defence spokesman in Ottawa, as admitting that the U.S. army misled residents of Winnipeg about the spraying in order to avoid creating anxiety. Madam Speaker, I suggest that there is no way in which United States officials could have misled the people of Winnipeg except with the knowledge and co-operation of officials of the Department of National Defence in Ottawa—our officials.

Yesterday's Globe and Mail also reports Major Haswell as saying:

—the substance is considered harmless and that the Winnipeg and Manitoba civil defence agencies were aware of the tests at the time.

Madam Speaker, I think we have a right to know just what the civil defence agencies in Winnipeg and Manitoba knew. Did they know that these were tests for radioactive fall-out? If they knew that and did not tell the elected officials in Winnipeg, they are just as guilty as the people in national defence.

The other point I want to raise is that yesterday the parliamentary secretary in the House and Major Haswell in The Globe and Mail today said that the tests were considered harmless. The same article in The Globe and Mail today quotes Professor Frank LaBella, a very well-known medical researcher at the University of Manitoba's pharmacology department, as saying:

—both cadmium and zinc are toxic and could be dangerous to babies, old people, asthma patients and sick people.

He went on to say—

—the metals are more dangerous when used in aerosol form, as in the Winnipeg experiments.

He also said—

—there have been a number of deaths and reported cases of brain damage in industrial workers dealing with cadmium sulphide.

This is a very serious matter, Madam Speaker. It was a very dangerous way to mislead the people of Winnipeg and it ought not to have happened. I think the way the parliamentary secretary answered the questions yesterday was shoddy, to say the least, and I should like to be assured not only that steps will be taken to ensure the same kind of thing will not happen again, but that there have not been other tests and that there may not be tests in the future without the people of my city or any other that is affected being told what is going on.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to speak for very long on this question. The point made by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant), namely, that information that has been given in this House has left an incorrect impression, is one with which I agree. I think the hon. member made that point very well.

The problem is obviously that this incident took place 27 years ago and the question now arises after the fact. It may be asked why we are raising it as a question of privilege now. The point that I have tried to make in my questions and which other questioners have tried to make is that it is the responsibility of government and those who speak for government, if they intend to give information—and, of course, they have the right to withhold information—to see that such information is accurate. On two different occasions the parliamentary secretary stated that, while the full details are not known about the tests and that tests are continuing or research is going on, they were not harmful to human life.

I find it rather incongruous that she is able to make the unequivocal statement that the test was not harmful to human life, while at the same time tests or research are still going on.

The hon. D. L. Campbell, who was premier of Manitoba in 1953 and is a very highly respected person, pointed out in an interview on Manitoba radio two days ago that, first, he could not recall ever having been informed of the tests taking place when he was in Winnipeg as premier; and, second, that at that time civil defence came under the aegis of municipal governments rather than provincial governments.

I think all of us know now that records of the committee of health for the city of Winnipeg in 1953 have now been found and that they make reference to these tests. The records do not show that the tests involved chemical or biological warfare but, rather, were tests relating to a smoke cover for the city of Winnipeg.

Another point concerns me deeply and that is the question of who made the decision for Canada to get involved in this kind of activity. The parliamentary secretary has tried to assure the people of Winnipeg that the tests were not harmful to human life and that we should simply take her good word on behalf of the government. I should like to do that. But the information that we are getting from those doing the research in Manitoba is such that in fact the information that was given to Manitobans in 1953 was given in such a way as to mislead the population. Also, no information has been given on questions relating to whether other cities or areas were used for the tests.

To clarify this matter as quickly as possible, I think it would be of benefit to the country and to the government if a responsible minister would rise in his or her place and give us the details in terms of clarifying these matters, which started in 1953 from a false premise.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on this matter. Some very good points have been raised, but I want to point out that the concern is that even if it is 27 years later, the material, zinc cadmium sulphide, in those days was not believed to be poisonous. Today we know that ten milligrams of cadmium sulphide is poisonous. Therefore, there could be some danger even if it is 27 years after the event.

I understand that the Department of National Defence is searching the archives right now looking for all of the background material with regard to this testing that took place back in 1953. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that she discuss this matter with the minister and that all of this background material be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for a thorough review, and this would enable us to find out the extent of the tests, whether they were done in other cities, and whether there are any harmful effects even 27 years later.

I would emphasize to the parliamentary secretary that she obtain this information as soon as possible and I suggest to the minister that it be referred to the standing committee.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I think the issue in which we are involved, as has been indicated by a number of hon. members already, is extremely serious. It cannot be lightly dismissed, as I regret seemed to be the attitude which the spokesman for the government took to this problem yesterday.

What is involved now is that tests taken back in 1953 in terms of existing medical knowledge may have led to some people now having cancer. I use those words with care and say "may", because I am informed that the germination period, the period over which such results would show, is 20 to 25 years.

Because this took place back in the mid-1950s, it cannot be lightly dismissed by saying that people in the city of Winnipeg experienced no consequences. That is an important medical reality, as I am told. Therefore, we just cannot bury the issue today. It requires very thorough investigation in terms of medical investigation. Perhaps this can be done on a selective basis or by random sampling of people who were in Winnipeg in order to find out whether people who happened to be in town at that time were affected in a significant way.

I see Liberal members on the other side laughing. Obviously it is a joking matter to some people on the other side of the House, but I can tell the hon. member from Toronto that it is not a joking matter at all to the people who might be affected by this test.

Second, I would like to point out that it has been made clear today, contrary to what the House was told yesterday, that the Winnipeg city council was not informed, nor were the people of Winnipeg, as to the real nature of the tests. In fact, to put it bluntly, they were lied to. They were told that the tests had absolutely nothing to do with what turns out to be the reality, but rather had to do with some kind of smoke clearing devices or their effectiveness.

An hon. Member: A smokescreen.

Mr. Broadbent: That is simply wrong, and the spokesperson for the government had better make it clear today what the reality is. Can she deny that the letter which was sent out misled the city council of Winnipeg who gave approval to the decision, or did it not? Certainly the evidence that has been produced is that it was misleading, profoundly misleading.

This letter came from Canadian officials, but were the Canadians themselves informed as to the reality by the Americans? That point has not yet been made clear. Was it an instance in which the United States government that was responsible for conducting the tests did not pass on to Canadian authorities the real nature of the tests, or did the Canadian authorities in Ottawa know what the tests were about but lied to the people in Winnipeg? Whichever answer turns out to be the case, the implications are serious.

Finally, I think the government has an obligation now to produce to the House of Commons all information about communities across Canada, at that time or since, that have been involved, consciously or unconsciously, in similar tests. Were other municipalities sent, on the surface, innocuous letters describing certain events that would take place that they thought would be perfectly harmless, but which in fact turned out to be tests of a similar nature? Those, Madam Speaker, are a number of the issues involved that are extremely important and cannot be dismissed by the government.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, obviously I will await your ruling to see whether or not this is a question of privilege. I rather doubt it, but if there is a question of privilege involved at all, it could well be my privilege and not the privilege of a member on the other side of the House. In fact, I shall and will reserve the right to rise on a question of privilege, if I may, when I have checked the records of today. I especially want to check the exact words used by the hon. member, particularly when he referred to whether or not I misled the House. I am extremely interested in the words that he used before the word "misled". If I do have a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, you can be very sure that I shall ask your permission to rise on it tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They want to yell at the lady, but they do not want to listen to what she has to say.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have been listening to the remarks of all hon. members and I can reassure the parliamentary secretary that there was no unparliamentary language used.

Mrs. Appolloni: The Leader of the New Democratic Party, with his usual rhetoric, asked for, indeed demanded, a thorough investigation.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mrs. Appolloni: I would like to point out to this House that for two solid days that is exactly what I have been promising this House on behalf of my department. There will be a thorough investigation. So much for some of the pious rhetoric of the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I must point out yet again that these tests took place 27 years ago. That means that they took place before some members of this House were even born.

An hon. Member: To get an issue they can agree on, they had to go back 27 years.

Mrs. Appolloni: Madam Speaker, this explains to some extent, I hope, the difficulty in finding details immediately of an event which occurred 27 years ago. In fact, my information is that one person particularly involved in these experiments is extremely ill. He is in a coma and has been so from another disease totally unrelated to these experiments. Unfortunately, we cannot get information from him because of his own health problems.

● (1530)

There are other problems. The Leader of the New Democratic Party suggested that this investigation should extend to all of Canada. I agree with him. The department fully intends to make it extend to all of Canada. However, I am sure that even the Department of National Defence, marvellous as it is, perhaps the best in the free world—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: —will need a little more than two days to come up with all the details of something that happened 27 years ago.

I noted some of the comments of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). Here again I should perhaps check the written Hansard. It occurs to me that he made reference today and yesterday as well to the supposition that these tests had not finished, that they were still continuing. I repeat, as I have said for the past two days, the tests in Winnipeg were stopped in 1953 after, I believe, the July to September period in which they were taking place.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) I believe was a member of the municipal council at that time. I do not have copies of the minutes. I do not even know if that hon. member was present at the meeting on the day this discussion was conducted. However, to say that he was not aware of it and to say that, in effect, the authorities themselves did not know about it is quite a long step to take. I would say that just because the hon. member did not know about it does not mean that the authorities, the competent ones, did not in fact know about it. Therefore, to imply that just because of lack of personal knowledge the whole practice was secret is a fallacy.

Reference has been made to Professor LaBella. Without in any way impugning the integrity and reputation of Professor LaBella, I wish to draw the attention of the House to my remarks the other day when I said that pharmacologists, I think my words were, just as economists, unfortunately do not always agree with each other. What Professor LaBella says he may stand by, but it is my information that other pharmacologists have assured the Department of National Defence that there was no hazard to human life.

I come to my final point, Madam Speaker. If those members who stood up in their places today to protest my reply are truly concerned about protecting their constituents, I ask them why they do not give the department the information they are supposed to have so that the department can go further and move quickly with its own investigation. They would do that if their concern is genuine. However, if their concern is only to make "brownie points" and continue to scare people, then I rest my case. I do not know what else to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: There is absolutely nothing, but just nothing, in the rules which allows a member who is not satisfied with an answer a minister has given to one of his questions to raise the matter as a question of privilege. Today we have another example of a question of privilege which flows from an answer given by a minister to a member and the member not being satisfied either with the quality of the answer or the kind of information that has been given.

Hon. members know there are other procedures that can be followed if a member is not satisfied with the information he has received. I urge hon. members to use these other procedures rather than take up the time of the House after question period when that time should be taken up by something else.

I am in the position that I must listen to members in order to assure myself whether there is or is not a question of privilege. Therefore, I have welcomed some of the interventions. Today I listened mostly to members who come from the region where this incident occurred because I felt they probably had a specific interest in raising the matter. However, all of them were debating the question.

Therefore, I must rule that this is not a question of privilege. I will shortly no longer be formally telling members, when they are not satisfied with an answer given by a minister, that they may not raise it as a question of privilege. I ask for the co-operation of hon. members in this regard.

Privilege—Mr. S. Robinson

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—RESPONSIBILITY OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO TABLE REPORTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects the rights and responsibilities of all members in this House. I might add that it is a question of privilege of which I have given the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) notice, although he has unfortunately left the chamber. The question of privilege concerns the responsibilities of the Solicitor General under the statutes by which his department is governed.

Pursuant to the provisions of the Department of Solicitor General Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter S-12, section 5, on or before the 31st day of January next following the end of each fiscal year or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first five days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting, the Solicitor General is required to table the annual report of his department.

In addition, the Solicitor General has a statutory responsibility pursuant to the Penitentiaries Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter P-6, section 30, to table the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries at the same time.

In each case the Solicitor General has failed to carry out his statutory responsibility to table these reports. This is a serious matter. This House and individual members of Parliament have a responsibility to carefully scrutinize the reports of the work of particular departments. That is our responsibility as members of Parliament. There is a statutory responsibility on the minister to table these reports, and in the absence of that tabling we are unable to perform our function as members of Parliament and critics of these particular departments.

In this particular case, Parliament has mandated that this department table reports at certain times. The most recent annual report was for the year ending March 31, 1978, over two years ago. Particularly in view of some of the important issues which this department has to deal with, areas such as the RCMP, the parole board and penitentiaries, it is critical that we have this information and that we have a basis upon which to question the minister both in the House and in committee.

Should your Honour find that this is a breach of the privileges of members of this House, I would move:

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for a full and comprehensive review.

This is a serious matter. We are unable to perform our function as members of Parliament without the information that the government is statutorily required to lay on the Table.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, judging from the question raised by the hon. member, he has two grievances. The first, that the Department of the Solicitor General has failed to table a report in the course of the first five days of the new Parliament and if I understand correctly, that the commissioner of penitentiaries had not done so either within the same period.

First, I would ask that the question be stood until the Solicitor General can give explanations, if need be, as he had to leave a few minutes ago for very good reasons. However, may I point out to the House that in the course of the last year we have had two general elections as a result of which in one year's time Canada has been administered by three different governments. I do not want these circumstances to be underestimated; they could have influenced the preparation of these reports and their tabling by previous governments. And it could be that such reports do not exist precisely because for the last year we have been without a Solicitor General and a Parliament. This might explain the fact that they could not have been tabled at the proper time.

Be that as it may, Madam Speaker, in view of this exceptional situation and the temporary absence of the Solicitor General who was compelled to leave, I ask respectfully that this question be stood until the next meeting of the House at which time the Solicitor General might give us his comments.

Madam Speaker: Exactly; as the Solicitor General is not in the House at this moment, it would be wise, I should think, to put this question to him at a time when he could give the explanations the hon. member wants.

MR. CROMBIE—REMARKS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege relates to some remarks made in response to a question by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). As I heard them, I gained the impression that the House was being misled. I should like to have an opportunity to consult the record and reserve the right to raise a question of privilege tomorrow.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, since the hon. member, who was my predecessor at the Department of National Health and Welfare, is kind enough to proceed as he has just done, let me indicate very briefly to the House, because I consider it important, that the beginning of my answer, when I said I would answer in French, was to get the message through and to protect myself from mistakes I could make in the English language, and not the way I expressed it. In any case, I should like to thank my predecessor for the kindness he has shown in understanding that even in saying so, I did not express myself very well in English. As for the point he wants to raise and for which, so it seems, he wishes to wait for the blues of Hansard in order to ascertain the precise content of my answer, in turn I reserve the privilege of answering him and defending my own rights.

CN-CP—NUMBER OF RAILWAY CARS

Question No. 207—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of April 30 (a) 1976 (b) 1977 (c) 1978, what was the total number of Canadian railway cars and how many were owned by (i) CNR (ii) CPR?

2. For the same years, what was the number and type of Canadian cars located in the United States and how many were owned by (a) CNR (b) CPR?

3. What was the average percentage of Canadian-owned cars located in the U.S., at any given time, over the past five years?

4. What charges do American railway companies have to pay for retaining and utilizing Canadian-owned cars?

5. What legal, diplomatic and other mechanisms are in place to expedite the return of Canadian cars to Canada?

6. Did the government, or its agencies, take steps recently, aimed at strengthening the powers to expedite return of Canadian rolling stock from the U.S.?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

4. Charges are made in accordance with the Association of American Railroads (AAR) car service and car hire agreement. Each subscribing railway promises and agrees to abide by and enforce the rules prescribed for the handling of, and settlement for, freight cars. These rules are included in the codes of car service and car hire rules promulgated by the association. The rates for use of freight cars are based on time (by the hour) and actual line-haul mileages charges as specified in a car hire rate table. In addition, incentive hourly rates, specified in an incentive charge table, are applicable on certain mechanical designations and car type codes. Further, appurtenance rates, as specified in AAR appurtenance rate table S—time charge—are paid for the use of certain railroad owned multi-level auto-rack superstructures.

5. There are no legal or diplomatic mechanisms in place to expedite the return of Canadian cars to Canada. Through the railway directorate of Transport Canada, informal contacts were made in Washington last winter with the interstate commerce commission, the Association of American Railroads and federal railroad administration officials. Within these groups, as well as with the United States Customs, mechanisms are in place for expediting the return of Canadian railway owned equipment to the owner. The railway directorate monitors the situation through its contacts with the above groups and ensures that Canadian concerns are communicated to the United States government.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Question No. 584—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, at page 515 where it is stated: "We found a number of internal control weaknesses in the way DSS-Services performed the function of the Receiver General . . . they require prompt attention and correction", to the knowledge of the Department of Supply and Services what are these weaknesses and are steps being taken to give them "prompt attention and correction" as mentioned in the report?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The department is fully aware of the specific control weaknesses observed upon by the Auditor General. These concern five items as follows: keeping signature cards up to date, documenting the reasons for altering client prepared data, reducing the number of types of cheque requisition, more timely reconciliation of cheque issue differences and a change in procedures to ensure cheque issue differences are not carried forward beyond two years. More detail is provided in sections 17.143 to 17.153 of the Auditor General's report. All items are being addressed by the department and, in fact, corrective action has already been completed on two items.

Question No. 585—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, at page 517 where it is stated in relation to the Department of Supply and Services: "Included in the monthly reconciliation of outstanding cheques were some long-outstanding unreconciled differences which had not been satisfactorily cleared or resolved", what steps is the government taking to deal with this situation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The steps recommended by the Auditor General are that services "—should strengthen their procedures to ensure timely follow-up and explanation of differences between cheques issued and accounted for." At the time of the initial response to this recommendation, implementation activities were already in progress (reference page 533). Subsequent to this report, implementation was completed and the new procedures are in operation.

Question No. 590—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1979, at pages 494-95 where it is stated: "We found a number of internal control weaknesses in the way DSS-services performed the function of the Receiver General . . . they required prompt attention and correction", what is the government doing in this regard including all the details and what are the weaknesses?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The statement on page 494-95 of the Auditor General's report is a summary of the detail given on pages 515-17 which is the subject of question No. 584. The answer given to question No. 584 applies.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1, 1980-81

House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certains sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Johnston—Mr. Ethier in the chair.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1981.

On clause (2)—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to debate the clause but rather to clarify the plans we have for this afternoon. I believe it is understood that, since we are in Committee of the Whole, the time limit on speeches by members is 20 minutes and that this would include the time which might be taken for answers by ministers.

It has also been arranged that certain ministers are to be here and that questions may be directed to them. I think it is further understood that if any member who gets the floor on clause 2, since it covers everything, wishes to address his remarks to some other section of the estimates, he is free to do so. We leave in your hands the order of speakers to be followed.

● (1550)

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, that is a correct understanding. It is already embodied in the rules. As long as there is no implication that the speakers will be limited to one 20-minute period. There is a repetitive nature to proceedings in the Committee of the Whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, the agreement effectively provides a certain order for the ministers who will be questioned or whose estimates will be examined. However, as my colleagues will understand, all hon. members are equal, and on this side of the House, we intend to use all the time to which we are entitled, so there is no agreement about who should take part in the debate. I am certain that you will use your judgment well, but I want you to know that there is no agreement on who will take part in the debate. Members on this side of the House enjoy the same rights as those on the other side and we intend to use the time to which we are entitled. However, it is true that there has been an agreement about the ministers to be questioned and they will be here.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: From what I gather, there is an understanding. It has been quite usual that every member has 20 minutes to present his remarks, and he may also have another 20 minutes if someone else is not seeking the floor; but eventually if someone from the government side of the House wants to answer some of the interventions, he is also allowed 20 minutes. I think that will be recognized.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, my 20 minutes will be spent mainly in putting questions to the President of the Treasury Board. My first question will center on a booklet he published. It is called "Fiscalamity: How to survive Canada's tax chaos." It was published by the present President of the Treasury Board in 1974. In that year the minister stated:

> This book is dedicated to all Canadians who share my belief that Canada, with its beauty, its resources, its people, and its legal-political heritage, could be a country of unequalled opportunity and happiness, were it not for too much taxation, too strong a bureaucracy, too much government, too much welfare, too many politicians, and too few statesmen.

Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate whether those are still his views?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased that the hon. member has upgraded his reading habits. As the hon. member indicated, the statement was made in 1974. I have been concerned about reform in government. I was concerned about reform in government. I believe the hon. member will find in those remarks and elsewhere in that book some of the sentiments which subsequently were expressed by the Auditor General, I believe in 1975 or 1976. I am delighted to say that in my view improvements have been made in all those areas, but again I suggest that there is always room for improvement.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I would also like the President of the Treasury Board to confirm or otherwise a report by Bob Reade which appeared in The Ottawa Journal published March 4 of this year which stated that the President of the Treasury Board favours four-year economic forecasts as a means of forcing economic planning. Would the minister confirm whether he believes in the four-year or five-year forecasting program which has been suggested in such reports as the Lambert report?

Mr. Johnston: Most definitely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to hear that answer, and I would bring the minister back to that dreadful evening in this House when during the throne speech debate the present Minister of Finance introduced what has since been called a mini-budget. In that budget the President of the Treasury Board undoubtedly noted that expenditures had gone up some $800 million as far as the government was concerned compared with the figure last seen when the then minister of finance in the Clark government brought in his budget, and the deficit had widened on a budgetary basis from $10.4 billion to $14.1 billion. In view of that, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance did not give us a five-year overview as to where the ongoing expenditure, revenue and deficit figures were taking us in Canada, and in view of the confirmed—and I am pleased to hear this—attitude of the President of the Treasury Board, would he now table a five-year review as to where the assumptions used by the Minister of Finance when he entered the throne speech debate in this House would lead the country in expenditure, revenue and deficit terms?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of tabling any such projection at this time. In addition, that question should be put to my colleague the Minister of Finance, who, after all, is in charge of the fiscal framework. I believe his remarks on that evening to which the hon. gentleman made reference were quite clear in that regard.

Mr. Stevens: Once again I think the House must remind the President of the Treasury Board of what his responsibilities are under section 5 of the Financial Administration Act passed by the Parliament of Canada. The minister, through the Treasury Board, is specifically required to pass on all matters relating to financial management, including estimates, expenditures, financial commitments, accounts, fees and many other items which are set out. In view of the fact that the previous Clark government set the pattern and tradition of showing ongoing expenditure and revenue levels for the Government of Canada—as recently as January 22 an update was done to show what would have been the expenditure and revenue levels without the Crosbie budget and what the expenditure levels would have been with the Crosbie budget—would the minister indicate what justification he has, other than being beaten back by cabinet colleagues, for not showing those figures to the Canadian public at the present time?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is given to theatrics far more than substance. He knows full well what was said that night by the Minister of Finance. He also should know full well, since he is my predecessor in office, what the responsibilities of the President of the Treasury Board are. He is asking me here when we are studying the estimates for 1980-81 to furnish not only an expenditure forecast for the next four years but also to furnish a revenue forecast for the next four years. Perhaps the hon. gentleman enjoyed playing the role of minister of finance and president of the treasury board when he occupied that latter post, but I have no intention of doing so. If he wishes to discuss the estimates, which we are here prepared to do, that is the purpose of this Committee of the Whole this afternoon.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, perhaps if the most temerarious President of the Treasury Board in history is unwilling to give us both expenditure and revenue figures which are going to affect all Canadians, would he at least give us his own expenditure projections—and let him not tell the House that he does not have them—based on the assumptions used by the Minister of Finance when he introduced his mini-budget? Would he give those expenditure levels for the next five years?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as I have indicated, I have no intention today of furnishing any expenditure levels. We are here to examine the 1980-81 estimates.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, would the President of the Treasury Board, then, say whether there is any reason why members of this House should not assume that the figures which were published by the Treasury Board on January 22 in a press release are not true today? They indicated that total spending by the year 1984 would reach $82.731 billion if the Crosbie budget was not passed. The Crosbie budget figures showed a saving to the Canadian public of $7 billion on the basis of the assumptions used. Can he deny that if there is not some change of events, approximately $83 billion will be the spending level authorized by his department, as forecast on January 22?

• (1600)

Mr. Johnston: As I recall, the hon. gentleman is referring to some political propaganda which was prepared by his office in the course of a general election campaign, and I am not prepared to accept such propaganda, if you like, which was not even prepared by the Treasury Board but by his own office, as having any relevance to the fiscal framework of the present government.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am rather startled at how ill-informed the President of the Treasury Board is. I am specifically referring to Treasury Board of Canada press release 80-3 which, as I stated, was issued on January 22. So far as expenditures are concerned, the figure was based on projections given at that time by his secretariat. Does he wish to clarify this and to state that he misled the House unintentionally, and that in fact the expenditure figures were prepared by his secretariat?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that the figure may have been obtained from the Treasury Board because clearly the hon. gentleman was incapable of preparing that kind of information himself; but in so far as the assumptions underlining those projections are concerned, the hon. gentleman must admit that they were his own.

Mr. Stevens: In plain English, then, we have it established that, on the basis of figures prepared by the Treasury Board, the expenditure level, if something is not done, will hit approximately $83 billion by 1984. I leave it on the record that an open request has been made to the President of the Treasury Board, who professes that he believes in five-year planning, to give the figures to the Canadian public as to where he sees expenditures, and, we hope, revenue figures and deficits, will take us, on the assumption that were behind the mini-budget introduced by the Minister of Finance.

Let me touch on another question, one which is of grave importance to the people of Canada. I am referring to the question of cost overruns. On December 3, I moved a motion that a special committee of the House be appointed to inquire fully into the measures necessary to prevent recurring cost overruns on major government projects, defined as those involving expenditures in excess of $1 million, and in particular to carry out a review and an analysis of the measures already taken by the Treasury Board to prevent cost overruns on major government projects and to assess their impact.

There are various other matters covered in that motion, but my simple question to the President of the Treasury Board is: When does he intend to introduce a similar or, we hope, identical motion so that such a special committee can be established?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. gentleman will recall that I spoke on that motion at the time, in fact, quite passionately, inasmuch as I was chairman of the public accounts committee and I felt that the public accounts committee was the established forum, with the support which we know is available to it from, for example, the Auditor General's office, to continue the kinds of investigations which it had undertaken in the past quite successfully.

The issue raised by the hon. gentleman enters into the whole area of good management practices in terms of the control of costs on these various projects. We have, of course, a policy in place with respect to major projects. We are attempting, I think, to implement those procedures which, we hope, will prevent the kind of horror stories, of which undoubtedly the hon. gentleman is thinking, that are now part of our history. So I wish to reassure him that we will be taking all the initiatives possible to improve those practices, establish accountability and to do our best to bring these cost overrun projects completely under control.

With regard to whether or not we should have a special committee as opposed to having the public accounts committee study that matter, I would prefer to wait to see whether the public accounts committee has the time and the resources to carry out the kind of investigation to which the hon. member makes reference.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am indeed sorry to hear that the President of the Treasury Board is now reneging on a commitment into which this House entered in the former Parliament to set up such a special committee. I suppose we will now have to do it the hard way because, as a result of the Treasury Board directive, circular letter 1979-20, issued in July, 1979, we requested, among other things, that all departments report to us on their projects of $500,000 or more, indicating how the projected costs were running in relation to budget.

Let me start now the long process of taking the minister through those reports. The Department of Agriculture indicated that there is a laboratory in Lethbridge with an approved budget of $3,204,000. They reported to Treasury Board that the estimated cost to completion was $19,340,000, for a cost overrun of $16,136,000. Will the President of the Treasury Board tell us what he has done to stop that overrun?

Mr. Johnston: I apologize, but with respect to specific projects, did the hon. member make reference to one specific project? I am sorry, I was looking at a cost overrun document in front of me, and I would appreciate it if he would repeat the last part of the question.

Mr. Stevens: If it takes today and tomorrow, we have several hundreds of millions of possible cost overruns to review. The President of the Treasury Board has hesitated to set up a special committee which would have the job of doing an overview of these cost overruns. To be specific, the Department of Agriculture, so far as the Lethbridge laboratory is concerned, had a budget of $3,204,000. At last report, they said it could have a cost to completion of $19,340,000, a $16,136,000 overrun. What has he done to correct that overrun in view of what he told the House?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, in order to save the hon. member the pain and suffering of going through every project that has been examined with respect to cost overruns—

An hon. Member: It is the taxpayers who are suffering.

Mr. Johnston: —let me tell him that there are 497 projects now reported upon which show original budgets of $4.752 billion with potential overruns of $1.062 billion. The major reasons for incurring these overruns in the opinion of the various departments include inflation, approval in constant dollars, project deferment, change in scope, project control, currency exchange and technical difficulties. System improvements are planned, as the hon. gentleman well knows, and each of these areas will be addressed with regard to those system controls in the various problem areas. A report to the Treasury Board at the present time with respect to those systems is in preparation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I feel that if the President of the Treasury Board is so unwilling to turn this matter over to a special committee of the House, presumably he should be asked to deal case by case with many of the overruns to which he has referred in passing. To be specific, would the President of the Treasury Board confirm or otherwise that the Department of the Environment, on its spending plan of $801 million, is now reporting that it could have cost overruns of $282,337,000, an overrun of 35 per cent in that one department alone?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to comment on those numbers put forward by the hon. member for York-Peel.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Johnston: However, I should like to clarify something he said. He said that I seemed to show some lack of concern in my unwillingness to refer these matters to a special committee. That is not the issue at all. For some reason the hon. member does not seem to have confidence in the public accounts committee being able to deal with cost overrun problems.

• (1610)

Cost overrun problems fall squarely within the mandate of the public accounts committee. Why should he attempt to usurp the role of the public accounts committee? That was what I took issue with last year. That is what the public accounts committee is there for. It has appointed several subcommittees in the past. You will recall the investigation in the case of HMCS Bonaventure overrun some years ago, long before I was a member of this House. I do not object on principle, but I am saying we have a committee. The hon. gentleman would like to heap committee upon committee upon committee, as he attempted to do last year. We simply, in my view, do not have the time in this House to engage in that kind of exercise.

I have complete confidence in the public accounts committee under the chairmanship, I believe, of an hon. member of his own party, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who I am sure will do an outstanding job as chairman of that committee. I suggest that these matters be placed on the agenda of that committee. I am sure the committee would entertain representations from the hon. member to that effect. It is not a lack of concern but rather a question of what forum these should be dealt with in; in my view we have such a forum, and it is the public accounts committee of this House.

The Chairman: Order, please. I would point out to the hon. member for York-Peel that his time has almost expired. He has another minute.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think the committee should note that what we are asking for here is that something of a current nature be done to arrest overruns the Treasury Board was informed of this spring. To suggest that it is all right simply to refer that matter to the Public Accounts Committee of this House in due course, is totally missing the point. We can save possibly hundreds of millions of dollars if we act now in response to what the Treasury Board has been informed may be cost overruns. Departments have been informed, Mr. Chairman, that in view of such overruns, contracts or projects may be terminated, postponed, reduced or very much changed.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. According to the rules he may speak at a later stage, but I must recognize another member at this time.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue with the President of the Treasury Board some of these questions, those dealing mostly with efficiency and effectiveness in relation to expenditures of funds and resources; and there is one other matter that I think is very important, as I have mentioned before in this House and which I think hon. members recognize to be important. That is——human resources management. This is an especially important area in view of the fact that, in the last few years, public servants in general have been criticized, sometimes with reason and sometimes not.

Mr. Chairman, the Treasury Board is responsible for determining human resources and the way they will be used to meet the objectives of the government, and I believe that this issue is important enough for us to be allowed to discuss it at length this afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by recalling that the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates has discussed supplementary vote 115a which comes under the heading of the Secretary of State. This is a renewable fund for staff improvement and development in the Public Service of Canada. I wanted to bring this up today because the Treasury Board is the employer and determines the specific personnel needs of the government and the training programs required to improve the operation of the government. It is well understood that the commission acts only as the agent of Parliament, and on the order of the Treasury Board, provides the instruction, the development and the training required. Of course, between what is called development and what is called training—

[English]

I want to talk about this matter as I think it is rather important that we distinguish between effectiveness and efficiency. Many of us sometimes confuse those two terms, but I would like to approach them at least from my interpretation. My interpretation of the word "efficiency" is "doing the job right", versus my interpretation of the word "effectiveness", which is "doing the right job." Doing the right job is what I think the Treasury Board has to do for the Government of Canada. Doing the job right is perhaps what public servants in general have to take care of and produce.

In the development and implementation of government policies and programs, as I have said before and will repeat again, human resources are just as important as any other resource which the Treasury Board or the Government of Canada have at their disposal. They are critical because it has been a practice in this House and outside, and in the press generally, to bash public servants for inefficiencies in their operations. Possibly it is very easy for people outside direct involvement in the Government of Canada and the public service to go around and suggest that public servants are inefficient.

I would like to suggest that, without a set policy of government administration or a philosophy of management, something we have not got at this time and which I think the President of the Treasury Board must address himself to soon, there can be criticism. He should follow up on the Lambert commission report as well as Mr. D'Avignon's report which was tabled last year, and which we are aware represents an important contribution to parliamentarians in their obligation to answer to their constituents.

One of our first obligations to our constituents is to make sure that government and Parliament have, indeed, effective control of the public purse. There is no doubt about that. We must also assure ourselves that the human and physical resources of government are being managed well, with due regard to economic efficiency and effectiveness.

I come around again to those last two words, efficiency and effectiveness, because they are most important. People sometimes confuse what is meant by efficiency. What are managers supposed to be doing except, perhaps, following the philosophy of management, which is non-existent to them? Therefore, they do not know exactly what the government and the Parliament of Canada want them to manage. How do they manage? What is the stick and what are the carrots? There are lots of carrots around but not many sticks. I find that to be a lack, or something that is missing within the whole concept of government. What I mean is that managers within the public service sometimes do not themselves know what Parliament wants them to do. To me this is an essential point.

We have had in other years numerous commissions, task forces, committees and studies that were asked to tell parliamentarians how to improve government's effectiveness and public servants' efficiency. Last year we had the Lambert commission report and the D'Avignon report.

A few weeks ago we had a very interesting report tabled by the Auditor General which addressed, among many other things, management of human resources, accountability, productivity and improvements required. We must come to grips with these things in order that we can succeed in our efforts to restore public confidence in the management processes of this government.

It may have been popular politically to bash public servants over the head—and I have seen this during the last two or three elections—to threaten them with cuts, to be obsessed with numbers and to suggest that we should cut civil servants by 60,000 and reduce the number of Crown corporations by 400. That was an obsession with numbers which in fact did not attack real problems in respect of efficiency and effectiveness.

● (1620)

Five thousand positions are being abolished by Treasury Board, or there is to be a cutback of 60,000 public servants, either by attrition or some other means. Some 400 Crown corporations are to be privatized. Such policies often become obsessions. The press love these kinds of policies because there is something there to grab, to use to bash public servants over the head and to say, "You are the result and the cause of a lot of our problems." In fact that is not true. They do not address themselves to the important questions of good management, competent public servants and effective programs.

I would like to read from the Auditor General's report of March 31, 1979. It states:

> Our findings should not be taken as an indictment to public servants for ineffective management of public funds and resources, because their mandate wasn't clear and their training was inadequate.

Once again, we do not have a global approach to training and development. The report goes on to say:

> Both Lambert and D'Avignon, in their respective reports, confirmed that managing public funds and resources economically, efficiently and effectively has not been an important part of a difficult mandate of most managers of the public service. Nor have most managers been adequately trained in applying the principles inherent in good business management.

The maintenance of a competent public service depends in large part on the availability of adequate training and development programs, especially in these days of new programs, new techniques, new skills and new approaches to general management. I do not know how many different techniques have been used over the years. They come from the private sector and are given such names as "management by objective." There have been all kinds of processes and techniques proposed to better improve the management of the public service.

Yet every time there is a change we must realize that the public servants must adapt and that the structure which is being put in place, if it is to change anything, must be recognized by public servants as being put there to make them more efficient and to make the system more effective. In the last eight years in which I have been there, I have not seen this problem approached with, first of all, positive management by telling them what we want to do or, second, with a comprehensive training program which will adapt to the needs of the system.

One need only think of the Post Office. A program costing, I believe, $1 billion was introduced in order to mechanize or computerize or automate the Post Office. But did anyone ever think that those same employees would have to adapt to new techniques and acquire new skills? To provide these employees with these skills, we must train them as any employer would do. When an operation is changed, it is incumbent upon the employer to train and develop the skills which are required to do the job.

God knows, we have had in the systems of administration and government a great need for adequate training and development of skills. It seems to me that we have not addressed the problem seriously enough to actually produce the results that are to be expected. It would be presumptuous of me to dwell at length on the subjects. Their importance and seriousness present a challenge that make it imperative that this government and this President of the Treasury Board give inspired leadership quickly in establishing, first of all, global policy for training and development for public servants and, secondly, a philosophy of the government somewhat in keeping with what Mr. Lambert and Mr. D'Avignon proposed with regard to change.

The basic objective of this policy should be to maintain a public service of the highest quality with employees who have the personal and professional skills to develop and implement government policies and programs.

The second objective should be a plan for the future needs of the public service for talented and skilled manpower.

The D'Avignon report mentioned that we need a management philosophy. I think that this is something which must be addressed seriously by this government. Management must be told what is expected of them and must be given the tools to lead effectively and manage efficiently all the resources at their disposal.

Just a couple of weeks ago I was saying that the government spends $100 million in training and development each year. According to the Auditor General's report, we spend $170 million per year in training and development. The report goes further and implies that we may be spending twice that amount. To me, that is an indication of a large expenditure of money without set objectives, proper planning or a philosophy which attacks training and development with a comprehensive, global approach to the problem.

I know that the Public Service Commission is not responsible for all the training. However, Treasury Board is. As my first question, I would like to ask the minister if he is thinking in terms of presenting soon a comprehensive, global approach to training and development and, if so, how soon can we expect this document to be either tabled in the House or discussed publicly in committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, because he talked about several of the existing problems, problems and challenges for the Treasury Board, if you like. At the same time, I should like to give him the assurance that we are making an in-depth and active examination of the recommendations of the D'Avignon and Lambert commissions. As everyone knows, a few weeks ago, I received from the right hon. Prime Minister a mandate to direct those studies because we give high priority to the questions raised by the hon. member.

[English]

I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that within the very near future we would be able to bring forward some specific proposals with respect to training and retraining. As I mentioned during my comments in the House the other night, one of our primary concerns is in the area of retraining personnel who are declared surplus. But the whole area of training is one which is actively under review. It appears to me that it has been unsatisfactory in the past for a variety of reasons. As I said, I hope that we will be bringing forward something in the very near future which will meet the high standards that I know the hon. member and many other of his colleagues will insist upon.

In terms of the over-all philosophy of management of human resources, I would like to assure the hon. member that we are pursuing the D'Avignon report and the Lambert report actively. Specific committees have been established which report to me as President of the Treasury Board and which will bring forward recommendations with respect thereto in the very near future.

I hope that we will see rapid progress in this direction because the management of human resources has been neglected in the past. It is essential for the efficiency and morale of the public service, and I am confident that this House will be very responsive and, I hope, supportive of the initiatives that we intend to take in this regard.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow up on that question. I understand that the minister has the Lambert commission report and the D'Avignon report. Could the minister tell the House whether or not he is also utilizing the report of the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which sat for 18 months studying amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, yes, indeed we are.

• (1630)

Mr. Gauthier: Who is doing the study? I understand the minister is co-ordinating it but exactly who is doing the study? Is it an in-House study by the department, an interdepartmental study or a public study? Are members of this House going to be involved in giving advice about what should be done, or is it going to be something cooked by Treasury Board, presented to us and then we must eat it whether we like it or not?

Mr. Johnston: If I may, I should like to expand somewhat on the mechanism as we now envisage them for bringing these reports and studies forward, Mr. Chairman.

There are two groups, one in charge of the D'Avignon recommendations which will put them in a certain form, in dialogue with me, acting through a co-ordinating member of Treasury Board. That group is headed by Mr. Orser.

In addition to that, General Anderson will bring forward recommendations to discuss with me. He is out of the country at the moment but I hope this will take place within a few weeks. The work is well advanced. I must pay tribute to my predecessor who agreed that these were priority areas and made an effort to ensure substantial progress was made.

I am, then, responsible for bringing these matters forward to a committee of cabinet chaired by the President of the Privy Council, the government operations committee. In other words, I report to that committee and the committee would ultimately make the decision with respect to our analyses and the packaging of the recommendations.

As hon. members will appreciate, there is a certain amount of overlap in the area of human resource management, in particular between the D'Avignon report and the Lambert commission report. That is the mechanism that I see at the present time.

Mr. Gauthier: Do I take it that the minister is telling us that apart from the D'Avignon and Lambert commission reports and the Public Service Staff Relations Act review—which is very important and which I think hon. members recognize was the object of serious study by this House and the Senate some three years ago—there are seven technical amendments concerning very important things to be done with reference to the Public Service Staff Relations Act? Am I to take it that the President of the Treasury Board is responsible for those amendments? In years past the President of the Privy Council was responsible. Do we take it that this has been changed and that Treasury Board is now responsible for reviewing its own Public Service Staff Relations Act?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as I believe I indicated, the chairman of the cabinet committee with which ultimate responsibility rests in this regard is the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Gauthier: One last question, Mr. Chairman, which deals with the question the minister alluded to a few minutes ago, and that is the retraining facilities offered to public servants who, due to either lack of work or for other reasons, are laid off. I know the minister is aware that the manpower retraining programs which apply to the general public do not apply to public servants who are laid off. I understand the reasons for that. As an employer, government was told to do its own retraining. Sometimes, however, there is a situation where a public servant is laid off because of lack of work or for other reasons and is not eligible for the retraining programs offered by Manpower.

Could the President of the Treasury Board give an assurance that this whole problem will be cleared up soon and that public servants will be offered retraining facilities and allowed to use Manpower programs?

The Chairman: The hon. member's time has expired. Under the rules he may ask questions later.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairperson, I agree with many of the things that the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier has said. We sit on the same miscellaneous estimates committee and some of the concerns he has expressed about the Public Service Commission are also my concern.

I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether, in order to stop the overruns for training and development within the Public Service Commission, he would consider making departments responsible for paying for training which they indicate they require or sometimes request, so that the onus and accountability for spending for training and development are on the department and not on the Public Service Commission?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as I recall, that very matter is under review at the present time. I understand the validity of the point and I believe it should be followed up in order to put cost and responsibility together.

Mr. Anguish: At the present time the amount that is being reviewed by the miscellaneous estimates committee on overruns is almost three-quarters of a million dollars and is projected to be over $1 million for the next two years and each year following. I think it is necessary that there be some change in the accountability for training that is offered and that it is placed on the departments. I hope the minister will see fit to do that.

I should like now to turn to the Auditor General's report, the main thrust of which I felt was in the area of government spending and ineffective management. The media, however, seemed to place the blame on the inefficiency of public employees. I should like to know the minister's impression of the Auditor General's report and what it was trying to say to Parliament.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. gentleman knows, I have attempted, and I think successfully, not only to think through the comments of the Auditor General but to discuss them with my colleagues on both sides of the House.

In my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of the Auditor General, the problems of inefficiency in the groups examined, which were classes 1 to 4 of the clerical and regulatory groups, are management problems. In some of my answers to questions in this House I have emphasized that it is important that we not try to make the clerical and regulatory group the scapegoat of inefficiency. As anyone knows, if that group is not performing, not doing work assigned to them, or if they are inefficient, then we believe that is the responsibility of management.

The question the hon. member raises must be placed in the same context as the question raised by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, namely that we have a management problem, a human resource management problem. That is what we are attacking through the reforms which we hope to put in place and through the implementation of the D'Avignon and Lambert reports.

Mr. Anguish: Would the minister agree that it is being said of the Auditor General's report that ineffective management is the problem and not, in fact, the inefficiency of public employees?

Mr. Johnston: As a generalization that is my impression, Mr. Chairman. The management problem is the one to which we must address ourselves. I would not suggest for a moment that one does not find inefficiency here and there among employees, as one does everywhere, probably even in this House of Commons. We are going to address ourselves to this problem in terms of management, and I am satisfied that the Auditor General will support us in that because I believe that is what he would like to see.

Mr. Anguish: I thank the minister for his answer. I was sure that was his stand on the report as well as the stand of the Auditor General, but I just wanted that to go on the record to show that it is not inefficient public servants or inefficient public employees that sometimes make the systems go astray.

It has been mentioned that the problem of human resources and personnel management will be addressed and given a lot of consideration. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the Treasury Board to become responsible for personnel management and human resources as well as money management?

• (1640)

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question, we are responsible for human resource management. We are responsible for the management of the human and financial resources of the government. What we are not responsible for at the present time is the staffing function, which rests with the Public Service Commission.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, to rephrase my question then, is it the intention of the Treasury Board to become involved in the staffing function of this government as well as the management of our money?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. gentleman probably knows, this question of where the staffing function rests has been addressed by the Lambert commission, by D'Avignon and by the Auditor General himself. Those three recommendations are that the staffing should rest with Treasury Board in terms of the over-all accountability of government for personnel and human resource management.

I would simply say at this stage that this is one of the recommendations which we are studying and which is under review, but we have not at this point in time made any firm commitment one way or the other with respect thereto.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, it was indicated in the public accounts for the year 1978-1979 that come out prior to the Auditor General's report that the spending deficit of the federal government for that year was $16.185 billion. That is the difference between the amount the government actually took in in revenue and the amount it actually spent out of the taxpayers' pocket.

I should like to know if the minister in fact finds this acceptable, and assuming that he will not find it acceptable, what the government plans to do to curb this deficit. Does it plan on increasing revenue or decreasing spending to lower that $16.185 billion deficit from 1979?

Mr. Johnston: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I cannot verify the number which the hon. member has put forward. He is talking about last year. The hon. member for York-Peel a few moments ago was talking about what he thought was the projected deficit, but I hasten to add that there has been no fiscal planning projection put before this House. I think that point was made clear during the comments of the Minister of Finance.

With respect to the role of Treasury Board as it addresses itself to a problem such as the deficit, our mandate and our responsibility is to ensure that public funds are expended in a most effective and efficient manner. So the extent to which we can reduce expenditures will have an obvious impact on the deficit. As I pointed out many times, one can reduce a deficit either by reduced expenditures on the one hand or increased revenues on the other. That is a statement which requires no proof, if you like.

That being said, I can assure the hon. member that at Treasury Board we are consistently following policies of restraint, trying to identify inefficiencies and improve management practices. The Comptroller General, as you know, has his IMPAC study under way—that is, the Improvement of Management Practices and Controls—whereby effectively a survey is made of all major departments of government. That being done, then a report is made and eventually an action plan is agreed upon between the office of the Comptroller General and the deputy of that department. That action plan would then be implemented and monitored and address itself to all these various areas of management improvement practice with a view to obtaining greater efficiency, and with a view also to permitting us to establish techniques of evaluating programs in those departments so that informed judgments can be made by deputies and ministers with respect to the validity, the value of particular programs, and as to whether or not they are achieving their intended objectives.

So in this whole area of improved management, Treasury Board has a very active role to play, and to the extent that we can get at reducing the deficit through that role, we will certainly do so.

Mr. Anguish: I thank the minister for the answer; I am not sure what he said there. The $16.185 billion is an actual figure and it comes from the public accounts for 1978-1979. I am surprised that the three gentlemen the minister has brought in here cannot substantiate that figure.

I should like to ask the minister this. If it is in keeping with government policy to reduce that deficit—and he did not say whether it would be increasing revenue or decreasing spending—are the cuts in the public service of some 5,840 person-years of employment that he announced when tabling the estimates in fact part of that policy?

Mr. Johnston: I apologize, Mr. Chairman. I did not pay as much attention to the latter part of that question as I should have. With my apologies, I would appreciate it if the hon. member would just repeat the last part of that question, please.

Mr. Anguish: With respect to the policy just stated in response to my question about the $16.185 billion deficit, I asked if the 5,840 or so person-years of employment were part of that new policy that he is planning on implementing to reduce the huge deficit.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I indicated in this House earlier this week that it is not our policy to establish targets for employee reduction. We do not intend to follow a policy, as my predecessor did, by saying, for example, that we are going to eliminate 60,000 public servants over a three-year period, partly as he suggested at the time by privatization of Crown corporations and then some in the control sector and some in the non-control sector of the public service. We have no such intention. What I am content to do is to attack inefficiencies and to evaluate and evolve programs.

In the course of that, it may be that by eliminating a program we will in fact lose some employees. At the same time, as I pointed out, we are very concerned about the position of employees who find themselves in surplus and subject to lay-off. It is for that reason, among many other reasons, that we are putting, I hope, a renewed and increased emphasis on retraining so as to find other positions for those employees in the public service.

That is the basic philosophy. It is not a question of saying that we are going to eliminate 5,000 or 10,000 jobs; it is a question of saying that we are going to attack inefficiencies. Surely the hon. gentleman will appreciate that a program which is being evaluated turns out basically not to be delivering a service to the public or to whomever it is intended to deliver to in the private or the public sector, it then behoves us to eliminate that program or to replace it with a more effective one. It is not unlikely that, in the course of doing that, the person-years would be affected. That is why we have this complementary program that I mentioned earlier of improved—and substantially improved, I hope—training and retraining.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the minister would answer this question. How was the criteria set, or what criteria was used to eliminate the 5,840 person-years of employment?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, again I apologize. Could I have that last sentence again? I am attempting to uncover where this $16.7 billion deficit which the gentleman referred to in 1978-79 occurred.

An hon. Member: $16.1 billion.

The Chairman: Order, please. The President of the Treasury Board has the floor.

● (1650)

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairperson, what criteria were used to eliminate the 5,840 person-years of employment that were cut from public employees?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the person-year reduction the hon. member is referring to is that reduction which is contained and referred to in the main estimates which were tabled. I presume that is what he is referring to, namely 5,840 person-years, which reflects the policy of the previous Conservative administration.

Mr. Stevens: Good policy.

Mr. Anguish: Mr. Chairperson, I would like to have the President of the Treasury Board tell me if in fact some of those cuts were in the Canadian Transport Commission in areas of safety regulation, in fact areas where we had two unfortunate accidents lately, one at MacGregor, Manitoba, and the other at Mississauga, Ontario, in which lives were endangered and which involved great cost to the Canadian taxpayer in the clean-up. Have some of those cuts been made in that area? Whether or not it is the policy of the former Conservative government, does the minister not think this should be rethought and that possibly there should not be cuts in the Canadian Transport Commission, since Mr. Macdonell, in his Auditor General's report, said that is one of the areas that should be beefed up and not cut? The minister has in fact chosen to ignore that, I would guess, and will continue to make cuts in areas of safety regulations within the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the Canadian Transport Commission cuts, those cuts, in the view of the commission, were made to achieve operational efficiency. I think it is presumptuous to assume that because of these cuts the safety of the Canadian public has in any way been endangered, or to attribute any accidents to the fact that these cuts took place. The hon. member is making an assumption which is certainly not warranted on the evidence before us at the moment.

Mr. Anguish: I assure you, Mr. Chairperson, that the evidence is there. I would like to ask if the estimates that were tabled reflect any money to be paid out by way of incentives to senior bureaucrats to be attracted to this government.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some clarification as to what the hon. member means by "incentives to attract senior bureaucrats to the government." I am afraid I would need somewhat more information in order to respond to that in a meaningful way. What kind of incentives is the hon. member suggesting? Is he suggesting that we offer hiring bonuses to management groups? I am just not clear on the object of the question.

The Chairman: The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake has less than a minute to comment on that.

Mr. Anguish: To my understanding, Treasury Board or officials under the President of the Treasury Board have discussed the possibility of making available large loans at extremely low interest rates in order to attract people to very senior public service positions. Is this in fact true and is it reflected in the estimates?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member's time has expired. He may have an opportunity later to pose his question.

Mr. MacBain: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak about my impressions as a new member of this House. I want to put before this committee what I perceive to be the position of the people I represent on certain vital issues and what they expect of me, of this government and of the Thirty-second Parliament. I want to do so in the context of the debate on public accounts. I hope hon. members will accept what I have to say as relevant to the issue under debate and the constructive manner in which these remarks are tendered. Some of the things which I feel I have to say may not be well received on either side of this House. This is most unfortunate because in my caucus—and I hope in saying what I do I am not breaching caucus secrecy—I am known as "Mr. Nice guy."

One thing I must say will be well received; it is easy for me to say and I mean it most sincerely. Speaking of members of all parties, I have been most impressed by the calibre, dedication and compassion of all members of this House. I say that without equivocation.

That having been said, may I now move on to my personal concerns and those of my riding, concerns which are strictly relevant to this debate this afternoon, concerns which, if justified, should be addressed by our Thirty-second Parliament and hopefully remedied. The perception of government today in my riding is that it is incapable of efficient legislative action; that it is so busy fighting fires it has no time for long-term planning; and that government today does not accept as its mandate development and control of its estimates and expenditures.

My remarks are not addressed to the problem of accountability of management to the responsible minister, important as that area may be. My brief remarks address the problem of parliamentary and government control of expenditures and programs.

My concern is that the present House rules, the legislative structure and processes, and government itself are inadequate, time consuming, inefficient, cumbersome and uncontrollable. People in our ridings perceive that an administrative monster has been created which devours almost $58 billion a year and is growing. The budgetary process, I suggest, has long since been free of any real input and control by Parliament.

I am also so bold as to suggest that a further step has been taken, and that is that meaningful input and control by cabinet over our expenditures has passed from the cabinet to deputy ministers and their senior staff. The proposition can be sustained that budget development and control has passed from cabinet to the senior civil servants.

All governments today have become large and their poblems numerous and complex. Their size and problems have increased but no real steps were taken to modernize and streamline government to enable it to deal efficiently with its new responsibilities. Governments have allowed themselves to become bogged down by administrative details, archaic rules and saddled with budgets they did not prepare in whole or in part and have no mechanism to control, except possibly after the fact.

Our 1980-81 estimates, which have been tabled, were tabled after the fiscal year began and will not be approved until the fiscal year end is close at hand and most of the funds already expended. I ask the members the question, who in fact prepared the budget and who is controlling it? I want hon. members to ask themselves whether they really feel the estimates as tabled will be significantly different when they are finally approved by this Thirty-second Parliament in the fall. We all know the answer to that question.

As a new member, it is my position that our Parliament plays no meaningful part in the development and control of our annual estimates, even after the fact. It is also my position that the cabinet itself has lost, to an alarming degree, meaningful input in the development of our projected annual estimates and control of our expenditures. Only a revamping of our rules and modernization of the role of Parliament, its committees and the cabinet can give back to Parliament and the cabinet real control over the purse strings of this nation.

The Speech from the Throne says in this regard:

> To increase the confidence of Canadians that their national institutions can respond effectively to their needs, my government would propose a program to make Parliament both more efficient and more responsive.

As a new member it is my position that Parliament plays no meaningful part in the development and control of our annual estimates, even after the fact. It remains to be seen whether the remarks I read from the Speech from the Throne are transformed into action by the Thirty-second Parliament.

What part has this loss of meaningful input into and control of expenditures played in the drastic increases in our annual expenditures and our national debt? Let me give hon. members just two examples of expenditures which in their conception were modest and acceptable but which are now out of hand and out of control. The items I have chosen were selected at random. One is large, the other small.

I wish to discuss our foreign aid program and use the expenditure in this direction as an example of lack of control. In 1950 our foreign aid expenditure amounted to $10 million. By 1960 the amount had risen to $82 million and in 1967 it stood at $279 million. In 1980, Mr. Chairman, our foreign aid exceeded one billion dollars under the auspices of the Canadian International Development Agency or CIDA.

Some will say a large portion of our foreign aid is "tied" and that it brings back some benefits to Canadian industry and Canadian workers. That is correct, but we must remember that the industries concerned are the ones which are telling us every day that government is too big. We must also remember that the dollars coming back from "tied" aid go to industry, not to the government which granted them.

We must also bear in mind that our government is in a serious deficit position; it is borrowing money at high interest rates so as to make available foreign aid which this country cannot afford, using Canadian dollars which are borrowed and which drive up interest rates, thus causing inflation and driving up our deficit and national debt to serious proportions. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this item of expenditure is out of control and has been for some time. This is an example of a good idea which has gone wrong.

I do not suggest we should in any way duck our fair responsibility for foreign aid to developing nations. I ask only that the expenditure be controlled having regard to our deficit, our national debt, our unemployment and the general conditions of our economy in 1980. More than 15 per cent of the people in my riding are unemployed. We are borrowing to service our annual deficit and the national debt. We offer new programs or continue old ones on the basis of need, not on the basis of our ability to pay for the same. To explain: a family may "need" a new automobile but they put off the purchase until they can afford to pay for one. If national governments such as ours do not act in a similar manner, they will put in serious doubt the fiscal integrity of the whole country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacBain: The same can be said about many of our provincial governments, for example, Ontario.

The second expenditure item I want to discuss as evidence of lack of control is the annual expenditure for the support of our peace-keeping forces in Cyprus. Mr. Chairman, in 1964 Canada agreed, quite rightly, to supply a portion of the peace-keeping forces in Cyprus. This was to be a temporary assignment—a matter of months involving a limited expenditure. But what happened? The six-month mandate for the force has been renewed by the United Nations Security Council 36 times between 1964 and 1979, and I am told by those close to the scene that there is no end in sight. The island remains just as politically explosive as it was in 1964 and all attempts to negotiate a settlement have failed. These peace-keeping forces have more or less become accepted as a permanent fixture by the Cypriots and, I am afraid, by many Canadians.

What has been the total cost to Canada of this item of expenditure since 1964 over and above the pay and allowances of the military personnel concerned? The answer is more than $36 million. In the fiscal year 1980-81 alone it will exceed $4 million and the annual cost is rising fast. I put the question: Who has been controlling this vast expenditure since 1964?

Some hon. Members: Pierre Trudeau!

Mr. MacBain: It is an expenditure which in 1964 and perhaps for a few years thereafter was right and proper. Today it is out of control, as it has been for many years.

In December of 1978 when the Canadian ambassador to the United Nations spoke to the Security Council on the Cyprus question, he said:

> We wonder how long the parties to this dispute can expect the international community to pour money and resources into a situation which they themselves do not seem to be working energetically toward alleviating . . . our limit of patience is approaching.

Again I cite this small item of expenditure merely as an example, chosen at random, for discussion purposes today.

It is my position that we, as members of Parliament, and the government itself, have abdicated responsibility for the development and control of these massive expenditures amounting to almost $58 billion annually.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacBain: I say to all members of this House, in all seriousness, that this Parliament and this government must regain control over our annual expenditures. We must control our expenditures before the fact, not after the fact, and, needless to say, strict accountability is necessary and expected.

In my opinion, the next two decades will be years of no real growth in our GNP at best, and if there are reductions in the level of our GNP we ought not to be surprised. If growth is to level off or decrease, as I suspect it will, economies in government resulting from sufficiency in the supply of goods and services will not alone be the answer. There will be no landslide of new tax revenues—there is no need to look in that direction. We must gain control of expenditures both when they are in the process of being set and when they are being used. I have picked out only two expenditures at random to show that our expenditures are out of control.

Higher taxes are not the answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacBain: Better business management of departments of government would be helpful, but again that is not the answer, as I have said. We must get all expenditure items in line with our ability to pay for same. I have merely picked out two items in passing, so to speak.

How much time have we in which to take corrective action? In my opinion, the maximum time available to us is, at best, the normal life of this Thirty-second Parliament. The situation cries out urgently for remedial action. Time is fast running out. Moreover, in the timetable I have proposed no notice is taken of Russia's future oil shortage and that country's possible action to satisfy this shortage, or of any other scenario which would severely limit our oil imports. That is another story for another day.

● (1710)

Our national government collects and spends our taxpayers' hard-earned dollars. In our inability to control that process meaningfully our taxpayers, our business community and our Auditor General have little confidence. I for one—and I must say so regretfully—share that lack of confidence.

I am encouraged, as I have intimated, by the reference in the Speech from the Throne to steps which will be taken by this government, and I quote, "to make Parliament both more efficient and more responsive." I welcome such steps, as I know all hon. members will welcome them. As members of Parliament on both sides of the House we must work together to make our national government more efficient and more responsive.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make two comments, essentially. The first comment is one I have made before, and I am sure hon. members of the House will agree with it. That is that we are all concerned about efficient and effective management of government resources, both human and financial, and I think the hon. gentleman who just delivered some interesting comments would be somewhat heartened if he had seen the progress which has been made, which is being made and the role played by the public accounts committee of this House in that regard under the very able chairmanship of the hon. member for Capilano, with you as vice-chairman, Mr. Chairman. I was there very briefly and I hope that progress will continue under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

As hon. members know, there is much being done, but it has not all yet come to fruition. The Auditor General has told us, and I think all hon. members will agree, that information is fundamental to re-establishing the control of Parliament over the public purse.

It was under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Capilano that a report was made by the Public Accounts Committee with respect to a new form of estimates. This proposal was designed to give information to parliamentarians, to the public and to the media in order to make dialogue in this House meaningful, because it will be informed dialogue. I believe we are making good progress in terms of the new form of estimates, and I hope that we will have some experimental forms for review and consideration, if not later in the current calendar year, at least in the current fiscal year.

I remind the hon. member that we do have responsibilities to make certain kinds of expenditures and not to waste money. There are certain productive expenditures which we are committed to making. The hon. member has singled out the foreign aid program as an example of a wasteful expenditure. Hon. members will recall that it was under Prime Minister Pearson that targets were established to which Canada aspired to raise its commitment to foreign aid. I do not regard this as being a matter of an expenditure out of control. In fact, we have fallen substantially short of the target which was then set not just by Canada but by all countries which are concerned about the Third World and about problems associated with the plight of people in the Third World. Foreign aid is an essential part of our foreign policy, and I think it is important that we not downgrade its role by suggesting that foreign aid, which is now at something like .42 per cent of gross national product when we intended it to be much higher, is one of those kinds of expenditures which is out of control.

All I say is that the message of efficient government is well received. We are moving rapidly in that direction. But let us not attack expenditures at random. Let us not attack expenditures which are absolutely necessary to maintain some of the fundamental social programs which are so desperately needed by our citizens.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that the minister does not think we ought to take programs at random. I want to ask the minister some questions.

I have here 12 CIDA projects. One is overrun $3.5 million in a $12 million project in connection with a railway in the Congo. There is another $4 million on a transmission line in Tanzania, and roads in Sudan. These are all overruns of enormous amounts. The minister has copies of these. What is the minister doing right now to go back to departments to find out why there are overruns? What is he doing to insist that people who caused the overruns or who made misappropriations or "mis-estimates" on programs which were conducted are replaced in the public service because they are incompetent managers? What is the minister doing in this regard?

While the minister is looking at that, I remind him of section 5 of the Financial Administration Act, which deals with personnel management in the public service including the determination of terms and conditions of employment, which are his responsibility. Responsibility for all people who are employed in the public service is the minister's. People have given us cost overruns on a host of jobs. What has the minister done to get at that problem? When the minister finds out these overruns are likely, is he doing anything with respect to the personnel involved?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, first let me point out that CIDA has been the subject of an IMPAC survey, as I recall, and we hope, through the technique which I indicated earlier of signing off an action plan with the head of that agency, to bring about substantial or important changes in the management and efficiency of the funds which the agency disposes of. CIDA is in a particularly difficult position because many of the projects to which the hon. gentleman makes reference are shared cost or shared responsibility projects with foreign governments, and sometimes in those circumstances CIDA does not have the control which perhaps it should have in order to have a well managed program.

Remedial action has been taken with respect to particular projects which have been brought to our attention, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that as President of the Treasury Board my concern is every bit as great as his. I am glad to see that he has those concerns because when we bring forward proposals in this House to attack these inefficiencies and to improve these areas of management, I trust that we will have full support from all the other parties.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to hear that, and I am glad that the minister is in fact looking particularly into CIDA and cost overruns. However, he did not answer the question. The question really is, what has he done about it in terms of replacing people involved in the departments, in the ministries—in CIDA, if you like—who were responsible for approving projects which have cost overruns in some cases double the original amount estimated, in some cases triple the original amount estimated and in many cases 30 per cent and 40 per cent over the original amount estimated? Surely that is a matter not just of simple inflation or something of that nature. That is a matter which smells of malfeasance. What is the minister doing to replace those people?

• (1720)

Has he a program in mind to change that management type, as brought out by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake who asked him about management? It was suggested that we have some of the finest working people in our public service, and the President of the Treasury Board suggested they were management people. What has he done about these management people who, in many cases, have worked on projects which have cost the government enormous overruns?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member was a member of the public accounts committee, but I am not certain of that. In any event, I should like to point out that evidence has been put before the public accounts committee pointing to a lack of control in the past. This has happened on a number of these projects because of the inability to identify a person or several persons who are actually responsible for carrying forward a project. In the past, that has been a major problem. Under the major Crown projects policy, the project manager should be identified and accountability established. As I recall, the same is true under the policy on cost overruns which was published by Treasury Board when my predecessor, the hon. member for York-Peel, was there in August or September of 1979.

So the first step, before one can deal with personnel in terms of these cost overruns, is to be able to identify those persons who have been responsible. In the past that has been a problem. I hope that under the guidelines which we are establishing and the monitoring which we are carrying on that will cease to be a problem in the future.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I was pleased when I heard of the appointment of the hon. member as President of the Treasury Board, particularly in view of some of his remarks in his book "Fiscalamity". I should like to quote from that book and ask if it is still his opinion. On page 15 of that book he wrote:

> The act of 1917—
> Referring to the Income Tax Act.
> —was the head of the proverbial camel that finally occupied the whole tent. While it is true that there has been another war, the continuing need for increased taxes has not been brought about by war efforts alone, nor by a series of national emergencies, but rather by the attempt to fill the bottomless financial pit created by the welfare state since the Second World War.

Is that still the minister's opinion of the problem?

Mr. Johnston: Of course, I was quite young when I wrote those words.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: At least I had the courage to commit some of my thoughts to paper at that time. I think that that particular sentence taken out of context—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: —is somewhat simplistic, but I do think that at one point in history, we moved too far too fast relative to our GNP. I think that the financial management of the affairs of this country in the early part of the decade left something to be desired, and, quite frankly, that is one of the reasons I became involved in politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I must say that since 1975 I believe that the government has been on a responsible road, that gradualism was introduced to bring the growth of the public sector under control, to establish a trend with respect to government expenditures relative to the gross national product. So I like what I have seen in the past, and I hope that in my present role I will have some influence over continuing that trend in the future; in other words, in identifying social needs, ensuring that scarce funds are spent effectively in helping those Canadians who are most in need of help, and ensuring that in economic areas our priorities are on productive investments in the economic development so as to eventually increase our revenue base in this country and keep us on the road to prosperity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: I would say that most of us on this side hope that the President of the Treasury Board has some clout in the cabinet, but clearly some things have happened, such as the presentation made by the Minister of Finance last April 21, which indicate that the minister has no clout in terms of any reduction in expenditures.

We have a situation where the amount contemplated to be spent this year is over $60 billion, with a deficit of $14,165 million forecast. Clearly the only progress we have had since 1975 has been larger deficits, larger and larger public debts, and larger and larger amounts required to be borrowed.

If that is what the minister says is progress in the management of the affairs of the country, I wonder what he has been smoking. Surely if he still believes in what he said in his book "Fiscalamity", perhaps he should read his book again and get back on track. Perhaps at this point the officials in his department, or officials in the other ministeries, have captivated him, taken him over, or destroyed his sense of purpose in controlling accounts.

I should like to make some reference to the Auditor General's report, in particular to page 27 of the report, where the Auditor General indicates that on his test of a group which consists of up to 50,000 employees in the public service, the efficiency of their work was 60.8 per cent, as compared to the average performance in industry of 87.7 per cent.

While the minister is commenting on that, perhaps he would also comment on the transcript of an interview given by James Macdonell to Bruce Phillips, Ottawa bureau chief, on CJOH-TV on Sunday, May 4, at which Mr. Macdonell said he thought we have a fine public service, but that the system was totally upside down. Would the minister comment on Mr. Macdonell's remarks with regard to the wampum theory of government, if he remembers it, and would he say what he has done in the three months since he has been appointed President of the Treasury Board to attack the problem of reducing the number of people involved and achieving efficiency? Could he also say what he has done with respect to the comment in the Auditor General's report that the public service, in terms of how it is operating at present, is operating only at 61 per cent efficiency?

Mr. Johnston: I must say I am flattered by the references to my book. I would not want to accuse hon. members opposite of infringement of copyright, but they seem to have photocopies rather than the original.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Those are briefing notes.

Mr. Johnston: In any event, with respect to the point raised by the hon. gentleman regarding inefficiencies in the public service, the Auditor General did not say that the 61 per cent factor which he developed was applicable across the public service.

Second, the hon. member asked what I had done in that respect. Obviously I was concerned for a number of reasons, first, to determine the methodology, to determine whether one could extrapolate, as the hon. member has sought to do, to apply this across the public service at large. As I have said on innumerable occasions in the House, I am satisfied that one cannot make that extrapolation and that it is unfair to do so.

Going further as to what I have done, as he suggests, since the Auditor General tabled his report, I have held discussions at length with the Comptroller General to determine his appreciation of the Auditor General's findings. I convened a meeting with the Auditor General and the Comptroller General, with the opposition House leader, with the other hon. member whose constituency I do not remember, and with the hon. member from the NDP who has expressed interest and concern in this area. I believe we had a very informative and frank exchange of views on this subject.

Mr. Stevens: What is your conclusion?

Mr. Johnston: I am coming to my conclusion. The conclusion is one which I already expressed earlier this afternoon, and that is that there is much to be done in terms of the management of our public service, that the problem is a management problem. It is not one that exists because we have lazy clerical and regulatory personnel sitting around deliberately being inefficient. The problem is our problem as management and, hence, it is our problem as government and my problem as President of the Treasury Board. I inted to do something about it as soon as possible, hopefully through the implementation of the recommendations, to which I also made reference, in the D'Avignon and Lambert commission reports.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister in a press release, when he tabled his budgetary figures, indicated there was a total of 318,435 authorized person-years in last year's estimates, and that he was reducing that to 312,575. The minister, I am sure, is also aware of a table prepared by his department which indicated the total number of public servants at the end of February as being 290,206.

Why has the minister budgeted or produced in his news release an indication that the public service needs to be increased from 290,000 to 312,000, an increase of 22,000, when in the entire year commencing April, 1979, continuing through to February, 1980, an 11-month period, at no time did the public service exceed 302,937 employees, even to the end of June, 1979? Why has the minister gone along with the departmental estimates of the number of people required when his own figures prepared by his compensation analysis branch indicated that in no way do we need that number of authorized people and have not had that number of authorized people for over a 12-month period?

While the minister is talking about that, will he continue to file and supply members of Parliament, as they were supplied by the president of the treasury board of the last government, with the quantum and numbers of people in the public service on the basis of their various categories of employment, so that we as members of Parliament can be brought up-to-date as to what in fact is happening and how many people are in fact being employed by the government?

It strikes me as rather strange that this minister would bring estimates to this House of Commons calling for the total employment of authorized persons of 312,000 people when at no time did he have anywhere close to that number working last year. Indeed, the maximum was 10,000 less than that at one point, and at the end of the year it was 22,000 less than he now requires. That is an enormous difference and I think the minister must explain that. He must explain his incompetence in this requirement. Why has he asked for this kind of money, particularly in view of the Auditor General's statement about inefficiency? There is something wrong here and we need an explanation.

The Chairman: The President of the Treasury Board has a short period in which to reply.

Mr. Johnston: It will be very short, Mr. Chairman, because I think the hon. member is comparing the proverbial apples to oranges. We are talking about two different things. We are talking about continuing, ongoing personnel on the one hand with the lower figure, and we are talking about person-years in respect of the other figure, which includes temporary help and so on. The authorized person-year figure is the figure I made reference to in the material which I tabled with the estimates several weeks ago, and that explains the discrepancy.

I will be happy to furnish the hon. member with an explanation. I think probably there is confusion in many minds because of that distinction, but the distinction seems to be obvious once it is explained.

Mr. Masters: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to remind the President of the Treasury Board that as we all seek to control the expenditures in this country, and we must do so with determination and with zeal, we must keep a certain perspective as to how these dollars will be used. In trying to save money we must be careful that we are saving it in the proper fashion and that we do not as a government retreat from some very important principles and ideas as to how to get real value for our money. That is another aspect of financial responsibility.

I suppose what I am really getting around to saying is that I wish to speak briefly on the decentralization process, where it applies properly in this country, because it has a specific significance to the Thunder Bay-Nipigon area, a very vast region, as we are so fond of saying, but an important one, as are all the regions of Canada.

Decentralization has a role to play not only for Thunder Bay but for the many regions of Canada which really want a potential for development. We talk about a strong Canada, and our Prime Minister has said we will have a strong Canada, but only as strong as are the many regions of Canada. I am trying to make a small point in relation to decentralization as it affects our part of the world. In the parochial sense we would benefit from some parts of the decentralization planning, but in the larger sense I think it is in the interest of the country to have these very strong regions.

We must take an area such as northern and northwestern Ontario as one of the many important regions of the country, recognizing that it is on the cusp, if you will, between east and west, and, therefore, decentralization is an investment potential for our area which would not only serve the people of Thunder Bay-Nipigon and northwestern Ontario, but also Canada as well in tying together the east and the west. We are the centre and we are a little of each; therefore we want to be strong in the centre. If we were a hockey team we would say that that is where a good team begins.

Therefore, I would ask the President of the Treasury Board to keep in mind in his deliberations, as we in Parliament must do, that while we must practise fiscal responsibility, we must think in terms of what decentralization can mean to the country.

It is foolish to overdo that principle, but there are certain offices—DREE would be an example—that function better when they are moved out into the country where we can have people in position, living in the area with an understanding of the area and the distances, for instance, of northwestern Ontario, those who have a feeling for the people, thereby being in a position to make far more rational and sensitive decisions for the area. That is one of the things I feel speaks well for the decentralization process. This is not a make-work process, because that is wrong and it defeats our attempts at fiscal responsibility. If we can legitimately put those governmental functions into areas where they have an opportunity to serve a real purpose by being closer to the people, then the people will in fact recognize this Parliament and this government as being more sensitive to the people, and that will help to increase the potential for development in areas of this country of ours.

So when we talk about expenditures, we must also think in terms of some expenditures which are not expenditures in the true sense but are, in a business sense, investment dollars. They are the dollars that will help each area to grow and play a real role in Canada. As I say, decentralization has been a principle that has been expounded by this government, one I am proud to be a member of now and in the past.

I would like to reinforce the thinking in that area because we can truly bring the government closer to the people without creating more government. That too is not what we are after; we are looking for value for our dollar and the building of the regions of the country. From the point of view of northwest Ontario or Thunder Bay-Nipigon we feel there are a number a projects coming up which will rightfully have a role to play in the decentralization process. I hope that as we deliberate on the cost, on how we will use the moneys from the public purse and on how we will deploy our resources and the excellent manpower we have in our civil service to be of the most benefit, we remember that decentralization is an opportunity to expand the potential for growth and solidarity in this country.

I make it a very strong point to the President of the Treasury Board that, with all the trials and tribulations he will have and the questions from all sides that he will face as to why we are spending money here and there, he will recognize that there will come a time when he can legitimately say, "I can support this project because it is part of a necessary, logical and legitimate decentralization process that will serve the country well."

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I would like to reassure the hon. member that we share the views he has expressed, tempered, of course, by our concern with the cost effectiveness of every decentralization project. Each project must be examined on its own merits.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier as he pointed out the unfairness that some people engage, from time to time, in bureaucrat bashing. Unlike most Canadians I have had an opportunity to read the minister's book, "Fiscalamity." It has long since been remaindered at Coles, and it is very difficult to obtain a copy, but I would be very glad to pass my copy around and show it to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier. At the bottom of page 6 and at the top of page 7 the President of the Treasury Board dealt with the passage of what was Bill 259 by this Parliament. The sentence extends over those two pages and reads:

> This was indeed the moment of triumph for the faceless technocrats and bureaucrats who lurk ambitiously behind Ottawa's political façade.

Does the minister feel that this is an apt description of the public servants for which he is responsible?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the book was published in several editions. I am not sure to which edition the hon. member is referring, not that I deny the accuracy of what he has quoted. I am delighted that he derives pleasure from reading some of the things which I have authored. I have written a number of other papers, but not many books, if any.

The hon. member's quote must be placed in the context of the particular legislation with which I was dealing, the tax reform bill of 1971.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, Treasury Board would not be in the mess that it is in today if Don Johnston were still alive!

I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board a question with regard to the statement made in Toronto by the Prime Minister on January 12 while speaking to the Liberal campaign college. I have asked this question of the Prime Minister in the past and I have been unable to get a straight answer. The Prime Minister, while speaking on behalf of the Liberal party at that time, committed the Liberal party if it were successful in gaining the Government of Canada to holding down increases in spending to less than the increase in the gross national product. Will that commitment be kept, yes or no?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I had interpreted the Prime Minister's remark as basically a repetition of the remark which was made, and which was written prior to that, I believe, back in 1976, when the view was expressed, and I believe it is still the view of this government and the Treasury Board, that the increase in expenditures would be kept within the trend line of the GNP. That is a significant undertaking, because it has been adhered to. One will find that expenditures from that period on have been substantially less than the cumulative GNP over the period.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about tax expenditures.

Mr. Johnston: I am sure that the hon. member will have an opportunity to put his comments on the record in a more formal way. I think I have responded to the question, that it falls squarely within the context of the objectives set in the mid-seventies.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, after criticizing the spending plans of the Conservative government, the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister, committed this government which is in office today to an increase in spending which would be less than the increase in the growth of the GNP. Will that target be achieved this year? In other words, will federal government spending increases for this year, 1980-1981, be held to less than the increase in the GNP?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, on the basis of the evidence that I see, I would doubt that that could be the case. It could not have been the case under the fiscal framework of our predecessors in office either. But we do not know what the GNP for this year will be, and it is a bit premature for me to say whether it will or will not be more or less than the GNP. Certainly I intend that this government will try to attain the objective of staying within the trend line, and I think it will be within the trend line.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, we now know what Liberal promises are worth after they get into office. It is worth asking the minister about this point because Canadians are entitled to a straight answer as to whether or not this government intends to keep the solemn commitment which it made to Canadians. My colleague from York-Peel has asked for five-year projections on federal spending. I will not even go that far. I will ask the President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible to Parliament for outlining the spending intentions of the government, what indeed will federal spending be for 1980-1981?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as you know, we are dealing with the Main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A). The Minister of Finance indicated during his speech in this House some weeks ago that the projected total outlays could be in the neighbourhood of $60.4 billion. He also indicated at the same time that, depending upon the establishment of the blended oil price—which has been the subject of some discussion in this House—that figure could be decreased by as much as $1 billion, which would bring us down to $59.4 billion. That is the projection which was given by the Minister of Finance and I have no reason not to accept it at this time.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, would the minister then give a straightforward answer. The minister went out of his way when he tabled these estimates to say that they did not constitute the spending plan of this Liberal government. The Minister of Finance, when he smuggled in his mini-budget a few nights ago indicated that the projections which he was putting before Parliament did not indicate the spending plan of this government. Does that figure of $60.4 billion, with a possible decrease of $1 billion if the oil plans of the government are brought in, constitute the spending ceiling? In other words, will expenditures not be allowed to go beyond that ceiling?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is well aware of the new expenditure management system under which the government is operating. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the established envelopes will be within those ceilings and that that amount of $60.4 billion does provide for a reserve.

At an earlier time I took hon. members through the difference between the projection of $58.4 billion of the then minister of finance in December and the $60.4 billion. I think the hon. gentleman would have to agree that the events which have raised the amount to $60.4 billion have been in large measure beyond the control of this government and would have been beyond the control of the previous government with the exception of the $345 million assistance through the guaranteed income supplement payment. That is a new Liberal initiative which is included in that amount.

Mr. Beatty: Let us make sure that the record is very clear so that we can look back at it in a few months time. Is the minister saying now that he will not come back to Parliament to ask for authorization to spend more than the $60.4 billion in this fiscal year?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I may be an inexperienced politician but I am not sufficiently naive to ever say "never" on any subject. I hope I will be able to come back to Parliament and report that we have spent less than the amount in question.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, this minister is a one-man fiscalamity. Last Friday I put a question to him in the House relating to an unauthorized attempt to get into some 21 Canadian databanks operating from a location in New York City in the United States. Two of those databanks were located within the federal government. I asked the minister at that time whether he would table in the House a list of all federal government databanks which are hooked into the Infodat or Datapac systems.

Will he do that now and will he indicate what the contents of those data banks are? At that time the minister indicated there was nothing of a security or confidential nature in terms of the substance of the material contained in those databanks, so surely he should have no objection to tabling that material in the House today.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, following upon the request from the hon. member I have asked for that information to be compiled with a view to tabling it in the House. I might add that I am glad the hon. member asked the question because I intended to raise a point in the House and it is this. When I read my answer to the question posed by the hon. member, I saw that I had stated there was no sensitive material in any databank which had dial-in access. If I did not state that in those words, I certainly left that impression.

I should like to correct that impression, not by saying that there is sensitive material in those databanks, but to make it clear that the guidelines under which those databanks are operated do not permit sensitive material to be stored in them. I am not in a position, however, to give an assurance that there is no sensitive material in those databanks. That distinction should have been made at the time I answered the question. I am sorry it was not and I apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I know that members of the House will be very anxious to follow up on this question as to the nature of the material contained in the databanks for which there is a dial-in access.

May I ask the minister now about another matter. The Lambert and D'Avignon reports have both recommended stripping the Public Service Commission of its staffing functions and have argued that those staffing functions should be rolled into a reconstituted Treasury Board. In his 1979 annual report released a few weeks ago the Auditor General stated that he agreed with those recommendations. What is the position of the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I touched upon the subject in some of my earlier comments. I have heard representations supporting both positions. I have not made up my mind with respect to that particular recommendation but it is obviously one of significance. It has been considered by the three sources of which the hon. member makes mention, namely, the report of the Auditor General, the Lambert report and the D'Avignon report. We are seriously studying this matter along with the other recommendations contained in both those reports and I hope we will take a position with respect thereto at a very early date.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister about another aspect of his responsibilities. Two Parliaments ago, in her previous incarnation as minister of national health and welfare, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare responded to questions in the House about the use of the social insurance number as being "bizarre." She did not recognize the concern that many Canadians had about the abuse of social insurance numbers.

The government of which I had the honour to be a part put together legislation which it was intended to introduce to Parliament around Christmas or early in the new year which would have significantly rolled back the use of the social insurance number within the federal government. Does the President of the Treasury Board accept the decision made by the previous government to limit to six or seven the authorized uses of the social insurance number which may be demanded by the government from private citizens?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member knows, since he had responsibility in this area, there is a study by the privacy commissioner on the use of the social insurance number. I understand we are to receive a report with respect thereto by next August.

Mr. Beatty: Is the President of the Treasury Board aware that the study by the privacy commissioner which was requested by my colleague Senator Flynn and myself dealt with the use of the social insurance number outside the federal government, namely, by the private sector and the provinces? What is the position of the President of the Treasury Board as the minister responsible for the use of the social insurance number within the federal government?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that we have accepted the recommendations made by the hon. member himself with respect to the use of the social insurance number within the federal government. I understand that those recommendations were adopted by the previous cabinet, and as far as I am concerned at this stage those recommendations are being carried forward.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, when will we see the bill that was drawn up by the previous government to put into law the policy previously decided upon by the Treasury Board?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I would have to consult with the government House leader, the President of the Privy Council, on that point.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, dealing with another aspect of the minister's responsibility, the Lambert report, the public accounts committee and the Auditor General have each expressed concern about the whole question of accountability and direction of Crown corporations. The previous government of which I was a member introduced Bill C-27 which was designed to bring some control and accountability to federal Crown corporations.

What has the minister done about that bill? There has been no indication that it is being reintroduced since he took office and assumed his responsibility. What is the status of that bill? Does he accept the recommendations of the Auditor General in his 1979 report that action is urgently required in this area?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I am currently reviewing the bill, plus recommendations and reactions to it and its proposed terms and conditions as they affect a large number of areas. A number of objections have been raised to certain parts of it, as the hon. member knows. It is my intention to bring forward a Crown corporations bill incorporating such amendments to the proposed legislation as may be necessary to resolve some of the difficulties which have been raised. I hope to do that at an earlier date. I also regard that, as the hon. member does, as a priority item.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, does the Crown corporations task force still exist and has the minister met in person with it?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the Crown corporations task force does exist and I have met personally with Mr. Hy Calof.

Mr. Beatty: Have you met with the task force?

Mr. Johnston: I have not met with the task force but I have met with Mr. Calof and discussed the work of the task force. I look forward to receiving—

The Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request to leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I just wish to confirm some discussions that we have had among the parties involving the hon. member for Yukon, the deputy House leader for the Conservatives and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Because supply business is coming out of government time today and tomorrow as opposed to opposition time, and as a rule private members' hour would normally be held tomorrow, we have agreed that we should suspend private members' hour tomorrow to continue through with the supply business in the spirit of the order that was made covering supply for the whole year, 1980.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is correct that all three parties have agreed to this proposal.

While I am on my feet, may I also ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council if we can be given the assurance that the other three ministers whose attendance we requested will be here tomorrow, namely the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Mr. Collenette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be here tomorrow and as well I hope the Minister of Transport. He was prepared to answer questions this afternoon, but I am reasonably well assured that all three ministers will be here tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I hope there is no inference drawn from the remarks of my colleague to my left and from the government representative that the President of the Treasury Board will not be here tomorrow, because we have many more questions for him. Hopefully we might get to one of the other ministers in due course, but we have almost a full day for the President of the Treasury Board for tomorrow.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, that is clearly the option of the parties. But perhaps members of the New Democratic Party would like to question another minister, and I think that was why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the question. Hopefully those ministers will be available; I am pretty sure that they will be available. But whatever the Conservatives want to do is entirely up to them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The proposal has been made for the suspension of private members' business tomorrow. Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.03 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS PIPELINE FROM MONTREAL TO MARITIMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the Prime Minister's election promise as stated in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on Friday, January 25, 1980, that a Liberal government would immediately ensure the construction of a natural gas pipeline from Montreal to Quebec and the maritimes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That steps be taken immediately to begin construction of this vital and necessary natural gas pipeline extension in order to eliminate our dependency in Nova Scotia on expensive, imported foreign oil which is presently required to generate about 70 per cent of our electrical requirements.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

ASSISTANCE FOR SYDNEY STEEL AND DONKIN MINE, NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It centres on the problem of the Sydney Steel Company that has been forced to lay off hundreds of workers as a result of antiquated machinery, despite the fact that there is an adequate demand existing at the moment for the product the company manufactures.

In light of the fact that with federal assistance the development of the Donkin Mine in Nova Scotia could reduce eastern Canada's dependence on imported oil and employ something in excess of 1,100 workers, and given the fact that this government has, on numerous occasions, given and then withdrawn its intention in regard to assistance to both these enterprises, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this government table in the House immediately its plans to assist these two vital enterprises.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—REQUEST CONSTITUTION BE AMENDED IF VOTE IS "NO"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Quebeckers who will vote No on the referendum question next Tuesday will indicate their wish for a thorough reform of the Canadian constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson):

That the House indicate its agreement with and support for the promise the right hon. Prime Minister has made, should the No-side win, to set up a process to amend the constitution and renew the Canadian federalism in consultation with the provinces.

INCOME TAX ACT

DEDUCTIONS FOR CHILD CARE EXPENSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recognizing that the restrictions on deductions for child care expenses under Canadian income tax law impose great hardship on wage-earning mothers, especially in cases where they are the only source of family income, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

● (1410)

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to review section 63 of the income tax law relating to deductions for child care expenses, in order to provide more realistic allowances to wage-earning mothers.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AIR TRANSPORT

REGULAR AIR CARRIER SERVICE TO BATTLEFORD, SASK.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the Battlefords, an area serving a population of 30,000 people, has no regular air service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That the Ministry of Transport commence immediate discussions with the town of Battleford, the city of North Battleford, the Northwest Economic Development Council, the rural municipalities of the area and an air carrier to assure regular air service to the Battlefords.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LOCATION OF DVA OFFICES IN CHARLOTTETOWN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Public Works yesterday tabled in the House the analysis on which the government based its decision to move the site for the Department of Veterans Affairs from the Charlottetown waterfront to the centre of that city, and in view of the fact that the analysis is riddled with factual errors, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House condemn the minister for tabling and acting on such a document, and that the minister appear before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to explain the errors and inaccuracies in that document.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

NEW BRUNSWICK—SALE OF ELECTRICITY TO MAINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

According to recent reports, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has initiated action within his department which would alter an agreement between New Brunswick and Maine whereby New Brunswick sells electrical power to Maine from its oil-fired thermal generating station in Saint John. In view of the fact that the contract has enabled New Brunswick to construct the facility which employs 140 workers, and was entered into in good faith, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the minister assure the province, through this House, that he will not jeopardize either the contract between New Brunswick and Maine nor the future operation of the plant by fiddling with oil subsidies as they apply to generating stations.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

RECOGNITION OF "O CANADA"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that Canada does not have a national anthem, a fact not known by many Canadians, and in light of the fact that the year 1980 has drawn much attention to national unity and to the patriation of the constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member from Verdun (Mr. Savard):

That this House officially recognize "O Canada" as the national anthem and "God Save the Queen" as the royal anthem.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CONSIDERATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): I rise under the customary provisions of Standing Order 43. On March 6, 1980, the Hon. C. M. Drury, the special representative for constitutional development in the Northwest Territories, presented his report and conclusions to the Prime Minister who had appointed him in the first place.

Whereas the reaction of the Prime Minister to this substantial and well-regarded document on a subject which is of the same measure of importance in the Territories as is the referendum in Quebec has been one of complete silence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

● (1415)

That the northern constitutional issues raised in Mr. Drury's report be brought forward for consideration and debate by this House without further delay.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATUS OF JOB EVALUATION REPORT—EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY FOR WOMEN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. The minister is undoubtedly aware that the federal government appears to be in violation of a federal law, a law that ensures equal pay for work of equal value.

Given that this principle cannot be equitably applied until the relative value of all jobs within the public service is determined, can the minister inform the House of the present status of the master evaluation plan which has been under way in Treasury Board for some time? Further, can he assure us that the highest possible priority is being given to the rapid completion of this important work?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I will look into the current status of the report and report back to the House.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I must express my surprise and alarm that the President of the Treasury Board would not have at his fingertips an answer and knowledge of the state of consideration of a report that is so essential to the application of equity and the obedience of the law of Canada within the Public Service of Canada.

Let me direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the minister may recall, in the throne speech the government indicated that it would "play a leadership role relative to the status of women by implementing affirmative action measures in the public service." Can the minister tell the House today whether those measures will include a move toward compulsory contract compliance?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is quite correct in saying that we did make a very firm commitment to pursue the goals of greater equality by using the public service of the federal government as a lead agency. I can tell the Leader of the Opposition that we are presently preparing a paper that will be submitted to cabinet, I hope by early summer or late spring, which will contain a number of the options available in the implementation of affirmative action programs.

One of those options is obviously the use of compulsory compliance. We are meeting with American officials who have that kind of program in effect. We also want to meet with people in the private sector, the employers and unions, before we make any firm recommendations. However, it is one of the options being examined. As soon as we complete those kinds of consultations, and cabinet has had a chance to review it, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will be notified.

Mr. Clark: I note with interest that the minister promises this matter will come before cabinet in the late spring. I would be interested in knowing when, in his mind, that season occurs. The minister a few weeks ago—in fact, on May 7—indicated, in answer to a question in this House, that his department would be "initiating a number of new programs within a week or two to meet the employment needs of women in the work force."

I am interested in knowing whether the minister intends to introduce piecemeal programs, one or two at a time, or whether instead he is looking at a comprehensive employment strategy for women. That is what he talked about when a week ago in this House he said that he would be taking measures within a week or two weeks. What we need here is, first, an indication of whether there will be piecemeal programs, or a comprehensive employment strategy for women, brought forward. Second, we need to know precisely on what dates the House of Commons and the public of Canada can expect to have a statement of the policies or the firm intentions of this government in relation to the employment of women.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I should tell the Leader of the Opposition that when you are a Liberal it is spring all the time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: That is when the sap runs.

Mr. Axworthy: I would say, Madam Speaker, considering the winter of discontent that the Leader of the Opposition has just gone through, he should probably join in that point of view.

In answer to his question, I would indicate—as I have on several occasions in this House—that we do intend to make announcements on job-creation programs within a matter of two to three weeks. Those job-creation programs are designed to replace or fill the vacuum that was left when many of the programs were cancelled by his government.

● (1420)

At the same time, when we make that announcement we are also undertaking a major review of employment strategies which would suit this country for a decade ahead, which would take a comprehensive look at the labour market needs as we see them in the future. We hope to present a paper to Parliament this year on that sort of comprehensive strategy. In the meantime, we will be introducing programs to make up for what was left in abeyance by the previous government.

Mr. Clark: We have now been told by the minister that spring is any time. We have been given an indication that he would have announcements by late spring, which means the deadline which used to be "soon" or "within two weeks" is now "late anytime".

Would the minister give the House a firm commitment—not a hope, not something he hopes will have happened—as to a date by which the Government of Canada will present to the House of Commons and to the people a clear and comprehensive employment strategy for women in this country?

Mr. Axworthy: I would like to tell the Leader of the Opposition that his caucus and the opposition itself could be of great assistance in this regard, because they have been debating for an overly long period the employment tax credit program which would be of major assistance in creating employment in this country. To the extent they are prepared to permit bringing that legislation to a vote and getting it on the statute books, we shall be able to go forward with our plans.

As I stated in my previous answer, we intend to make announcements on our further job-creation program within about two or three weeks. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will find it satisfactory and that it will be of great assistance to women. In the longer term, we will be providing a comprehensive strategy to cover not just women but all who have special problems in the workplace.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment mentioned the fact that the Conservative government had cancelled some job-creation programs. He forgot to mention that we had intentions of replacing those programs which were cancelled with what we felt were better programs.

My question is directed to the Minister of Employment. He informed me the other night that he was busy reading the research work I did for his department on employment in the early half of the seventies. There is a document entitled "Reflections on the federal government's role in employment creation." The dilemma posed in that document is whether or not jobs created with tax dollars should go to those who are best qualified but who perhaps do not need them, or whether the jobs he is intending to create should go to those who experience the greatest difficulty in securing employment or have the greatest need for employment. Will the jobs he is bringing down go to those who do not need them, or will they go to those who do?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I should like to begin by complimenting the hon. member on the evaluations he did for the Department of Employment and Immigration: I think they were of a high calibre, and we appreciate his ability to make assessments. I hope he will find that our job-creation program reflects some of his own thinking and that those evaluations have been of real value.

I must tell him, though, that in this party we do not intend to select one group as against another. Our job-creation program is a mixed program designed to help different problems in the workplace; not simply to zero in on one group, but to provide a mixture of programs to assist those who have special needs in the workplace and also to assist those areas and regions of the country where there are generalized unemployment difficulties.

Mr. Hawkes: We have heard a great deal from many ministers on the other side about financial difficulties resulting in limited funds and a consequent need to use dollars in the most effective manner possible. There are three ways to create jobs.

● (1425)

Madam Speaker: Order please. Would the hon. member please ask his question.

Mr. Hawkes: I would like the minister to indicate to the House of Commons which of the three major methods of job-creation he intends to employ, and what the approximate costs are for creating jobs by fiscal measures, direct subsidization or direct employment creation. Which costs the most in relation to the number of jobs produced, and which of these three mechanisms does the minister intend to employ in the coming months?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I would very much like to satisfy the curiosity of the hon. member, but as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, I intend to be able to make a statement in Parliament in two or three week's time when details of that program are completed and the consultations are finished.

The hon. member would want to recognize that a comprehensive program of that complexity requires a proper statement by a minister, and not an answer in question period. I give the hon. member every guarantee, if he is concerned about the use of dollars, that we will be making the best use of dollars we possibly can within the budget which was set by the previous government.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

OIL EXPLORATION IN BEAUFORT SEA—DANGER OF SPILLS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows that the government has received a confidential report, a copy of which I have here, from its officials which makes it clear that neither the government nor Dome Petroleum has adequate plans or technology to prevent and cope with an oil spill resulting from exploration in the Beaufort Sea.

In this light I would like to ask the Prime Minister why the government has just approved this year's drilling activities in the Beaufort Sea. Why is the government, after receiving such a report, prepared to gamble in such a dangerous way with the environmental implications of going ahead with drilling at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party would send me a copy of that memorandum in confidence, I would read it with interest. There may be partial information given in some memo expressing one point of view. I do know the matter was discussed in cabinet and that we had assurances from the Minister of the Environment. Not only in this recent time but in previous years, contrary to what that memo says, we had the assurance that technology does exist to take action against any potential spills.

Mr. Fulton: There is not even a bag of sponges in the Beaufort Sea.

Mr. Trudeau: I see that one of your backbenchers is trying to help you, Ed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He needs a lot.

Mr. Trudeau: We had the assurance that technology does exist, provided it is exercised at the time of the year when the Beaufort Sea is free from ice. That is the basis of our decision to restrict drilling to certain periods of the year which are ice-free.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I say quite seriously that I would be delighted to send a copy of the report to the Prime Minister because it points out that, quite contrary to regulations, Dome Petroleum had no fewer than 22 fuel spills last year, during the drilling season, which it refused to report or did not report as it was supposed to. The report also says, and I quote: "The government has still not produced its own oil spill contingency plan." That is from an important subcommittee of the government.

The report was made recently, and I understood that it had in fact been discussed by the cabinet. Is this the case, or is the Prime Minister saying it is not the case? Is the Prime Minister telling us that he does have a contingency plan which did not fail to comply with the regulations last year, and that he has every confidence that we should be proceeding now with drilling in the light of last year's experience with Dome and in the light of what this report tells us?

● (1430)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think I will ask the minister responsible, the Minister of the Environment, to deal with the substance of the question. But in so far as my position is concerned in trying to answer this question, I can only point out to the hon. member that if the anonymous civil servant who sent him confidential documents in unmarked envelopes would do me the same courtesy, I might be in a position to answer his questions.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, on seeing newspaper stories about this report, I made some inquiries. Although those inquiries have not been entirely completed, my understanding is that this, rather than being the report of the subcommittee, is the view of one member of that committee. I want to check that further.

Clearly, in considering the drilling proposals brought forward, there was consultation with my officials. In this kind of activity inevitably there is a risk, but it was our belief that the risk involved was supportable within the limits of necessary environmental protection. We are concerned in a continuing way that more research be done into these kinds of problems and we have indicated, or are in the process of indicating, our strong concern to the private sector, to the companies involved, our belief that more research into this kind of potential problem should be undertaken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I will go back either to the Prime Minister or to the minister directly responsible. The question should be dealt with by the Prime Minister because my understanding is that the decision to proceed with drilling now was reached in cabinet.

Since the report, to pick up the phrase used by the minister, says that last year "unacceptable risks" were taken, and it seems that the same procedures will be used this year, I should like to obtain, either from the Prime Minister or from the minister responsible, unequivocal assurances that in the government's view the negative opinion expressed in this report is not shared by the government, namely, that they will proceed under circumstances that are very safe to the environment in the north.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I can only repeat what I said earlier, that my understanding—but I must check it further—is that this is not the report, but the view of one member of the committee. I have no reason to believe that unacceptable risks have been taken in the past.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ARCTIC WATERS ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Will he table in the House the report of the Arctic Waters Advisory Committee, and will he also table any previous drafts as well as an explanation of the discrepancies between earlier drafts of the same report and the final report?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): As I indicated in my earlier answers, there is some uncertainty in my mind as to the exact status of the document to which the Leader of the NDP has referred. Upon seeing newspaper reports which I think are part of the basis of the hon. member's question, I asked that some inquiries be made and information be provided to me.

As to the terms of the question of laying something before the House of Commons, I would much rather know exactly what it is we are referring to, what various stages it has gone through, and whether these are the views of one member of a panel or of the whole board. I need more information before I would consider taking the steps which the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, in view of the confusion, at least in the minister's mind, surrounding this whole issue and his confusion about the various reports, if the minister will not table in this House the documents, consistent with the freedom of information principle, will the minister at least call before the relevant standing committee of Parliament on the environment, members of the Arctic Waters Advisory Committee so that members of Parliament can pose questions on this matter to these members and get the issue clarified in a way which the minister obviously cannot do himself?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, it is quite clearly not my responsibility to have witnesses called before parliamentary committees. Parliamentary committees control their own work and it is not for me to direct them in that activity.

TRANSPORT

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR DEVELOPMENT OF COAL RESOURCES IN B.C.—REASON FOR GOVERNMENT'S REFUSAL

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport and it deals with the issue of equity in allocating federal economic support programs.

In view of the recent $200 million loan by the federal government to Chrysler Canada, and also the fighter offset program, both of which benefit mainly the economy of central Canada, how can the minister justify the government's failure to accede to the request by Premier Bennett of British Columbia that the federal government provide 50 per cent of the $215 million required to build the rail line which will enable coal from northeast British Columbia to be shipped eventually to Japan, particularly since the federal government would recover all the money advanced back from its share of the surcharge that will be levied on the coal shipments?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, first to answer the question regarding Chrysler, it was not a loan; but the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce might wish to explain it further.

On the question of the northeast coal development in British Columbia, we held extensive negotiations with a good number of members of the British Columbia government on this matter. Arguments were put forward from all sides, one of them to the effect that the federal government was not in the habit of contributing to railway development with regard to resources, but a compromise was reached and a good amount of money was indicated as the federal contribution. Details of that are now being further defined.

Miss Carney: My supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Transport, Madam Speaker. The Premier of British Columbia has made it very clear that he considers that the federal government is not in the habit of funding anything to do west of the lakehead.

Since the province of B.C. transferred the administration and control over the Ridley Island site, the port site—B.C. transferred the control to the federal government in order to facilitate the development of the port—and since no development by the National Harbours Board has taken place, could the minister explain his reluctance to give the control back to the province so that the proposed coal port site could be developed in time for coal shipments to Japan to proceed on schedule, which is in the third quarter of 1983?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my impression was that the land at Prince Rupert was federal land in the first place, that there was no transfer in this respect. But be that as it may, the negotiations between the National Harbours Board and the consortium have progressed to the point where an announcement will be made any moment now. All matters of discussion have been resolved and the project will go ahead as planned. So I do not understand the reason for the alarm because, as a matter of fact, everything is in line.

CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I should like to call his attention to the crude blackmail tactics implicit in the announcement from Revelstoke this morning by the executive vice-president of CPR, that the corporation would not proceed with the $322 million expansion project in the Rockies unless the federal government repudiates its statutory guarantee on freight rates to western farmers by reneging on the Crowsnest pass agreement. May I remind the minister that the Canadian Pacific Railway corporation—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hovdebo: —made $158 million more last year than the year before.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hovdebo: Would the Minister of Transport indicate what action he intends to take in the face of such crude corporate blackmail in determining the transportation policy of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, one of my dedicated assistants was in touch with the CPR this morning, and I am somewhat amused by the result of that call as the CP rail authorities maintain that they have been misquoted on this subject. So, for a change it is interesting to see that businessmen can also be misquoted. This is not what they meant to say.

● (1440)

I presume that changes to the Crowsnest Pass might help the railway in making this project at the Beaver tunnel a viable one. But I presume that it has something to do with capital cost allowances also. Anyway, I am meeting with the president on May 29 and will explore that to the fullest extent.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, in view of the possibility of this freeze on the mountain expansion project, and in view of the fact that the Hall report has not been instituted as yet, would the minister assure this House that the Hall report on Crowsnest Pass rates will be implemented, to ensure that this kind of blackmail cannot take place?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the Crowsnest Pass is a problem which has been with us since 1897.

An hon. Member: The problem is you guys.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: It became statutory in 1925. My information, substantiated by some conversations I have had, is that the mood of western Canada is changing with respect to the Crowsnest.

An hon. Member: It is not.

Mr. Pepin: I am planning now to get fully involved in the subject, to consult extensively in the coming weeks and devise a general strategy to cope with this particular issue.

ENERGY

SECURITY OF SUPPLY OF FEEDSTOCK FOR PETROSAR AND SUNCOR

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given the fact that the Alberta government has been less than happy with the fact that Petrosar produces residual fuel as a byproduct of its operation, and also Suncor and other operations in eastern Canada, given the pressure that has been brought to bear by the federal government requiring these companies to do something about this particular problem, and given the fact that Petrosar and Suncor announced today an expenditure of some $500 million to upgrade their facilities, will the minister now be able to get from the Alberta government a commitment giving these operations security of supply of feedstock?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the officials of the two refineries concerned in Sarnia and also Ultramar in St. Romuald, near Quebec City, for their co-operation with the government when we made very strong representations to them encouraging them to upgrade the oil that was going through the refineries, so as to have a much more efficient use of oil in our energy strategy.

As far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned, I should like to advise him that I have discussed this matter twice already with my colleague from Alberta, and that the Alberta government welcomed the developments I have announced today. Also, I want to assure the hon. member that I have raised with the minister for Alberta the question of the supply to Petrosar in particular, and I was assured again at my meeting early this week that there will be no discrimination against Petrosar.

If Petrosar cannot get supply directly, it can be assured at least that there will be nothing to prevent any person or company supplied with oil by Alberta from reselling to Petrosar. So there is an assurance that no measures will be taken to discriminate against Petrosar in its supply.

EMPLOYMENT

NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED FOR WOMEN, YOUNG PEOPLE AND NATIVES

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I am my party's spokesperson on matters relevant to the status of women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McLean: But I want to assure the House that my concerns are broader than that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McLean: I have had a lifelong commitment to helping people, and it is in that context that I want to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration about his job-creation plans. Women, young people and natives are the people who are most often unemployed in this country. Would the minister tell us how many jobs he intends to create for women, for young people and for natives? Could he tell us whether the numbers he will be using are targets that he will try to achieve, or will they be firm commitments in quotas which he will meet and which he hopes to exceed?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I should like to begin by complimenting the hon. member on the very important responsibilities he has. As one who shares those responsibilities on the government side, I would say that it is one of the most important tasks of members of this House to ensure that women receive proper, fair and equal opportunities in the work force.

Mrs. Bégin: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: In saying that, I would want to point out to the hon. member that he should recognize we are not, in the job programs we intend to announce, exclusively attacking the program in that respect, because there are already in place a number of programs available for those very groups about which he spoke.

An hon. Member: Don't make a speech.

Mr. Axworthy: We have major commitments under the LEAP program to help native people. We have major job-creation programs that are before the House in the employment tax credit program. There are substantial training programs where we have close to 200,000 people in the country being trained under federal government programs. A large percentage of those people are women, young people and native people. So there are already in place a number of very effective programs.

What we intend to do in our announcements is to supplement those programs to deal with special problems in the work place where we have identified them. If the hon. member can wait for a matter of two or three weeks, I think he will be able to see exactly how effective those programs are.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, my question was: How many jobs? In terms of the context of developing this strategy in the next few weeks, and following his confirmation to this House of the appointment of the vice-president of the Liberal party, Lorna Marsden, to an advisory capacity on job creation for women, I wonder if the minister will now tell the House whether that appointment was taken in consultation with the Advisory Council on the Status of Women?

Mr. Lalonde: What about Pat Carney?

Mr. Clark: She was elected. You are not accustomed to people being elected in British Columbia.

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women has a fair degree of independence. It is designed to provide advice to the minister, not necessarily working in reverse. Its advice is very welcome and is very helpful, but it sets its own agenda and its own priorities.

As far as the case of Miss Marsden is concerned, I think it is important to point out to the member that in previous periods Miss Marsden was the chairman of the National Action Committee in this country, one of the foremost pioneers in the area of women's rights, and is one of the foremost demographers looking at the labour market in Canada. It is upon those qualifications that she is judged, and I do not think anyone should be discriminated against just because they are a Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHEN AND HOW AMENDING PROCESS WILL BE IMPLEMENTED

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the commitment made last night in Montreal by the Prime Minister on behalf of the 74 Liberal members from Quebec, to begin at once the constitutional amendment process, can he inform hon. members how he plans to proceed; that is, does he intend to call a federal-provincial conference of first ministers or, as suggested by the hon. Maurice Lamontagne, will be establish a committee which would consolidate the various studies or reports now in existence or published in the past, and does he plan on launching this process even before the House adjourns for the summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the methods mentioned by the hon. member in his question are indeed among those that we are considering. I am unable to announce today which of these various procedures we shall choose or whether there will be others.

As for the second part of his question, I can assure the hon. member that decisions will indeed be made and steps taken before the summer recess.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

REQUEST FOR LIST OF PROJECTS WITH ANTICIPATED OVERRUNS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of an answer given by the president yesterday in which he stated:

—let me tell him that there are 497 projects now reported upon which show original budgets of $4.752 billion with potential overruns of $1.062 billion.

Would the President of the Treasury Board give the House of Commons a list of those 497 projects that have an anticipated overrun of $1,062 million?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position, nor would I take the time of the House, to furnish that list at this moment. But I will provide such a list to the hon. member. I would like to point out that the $1.062 billion overrun figure which I cited was the total overrun for the 497 projects calculated back to the original budgets. About $500 million of that amount has already received Treasury Board approval as of December 31, 1979. The remainder will require specific Treasury Board approval on a case-by-case basis.

That, I hope, gives the hon. member some indication on how we are moving with respect to those projects. As I said, I will not take the time of the House to provide the hon. member with a list, or more detailed information at this time, but I will be happy to comply with that request.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of his statement that approvals are still being made with respect to these possible overruns, would the President of the Treasury Board indicate if he is not, in fact, enforcing Treasury Board circular letter 1979-20 which dealt with cost controls and which specifically said, "Submissions for retroactive approvals will be entertained"? Why is the President of the Treasury Board contemplating approving, post facto, overruns which have been drawn to his attention by departments?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to look into the matter raised by the hon. member. I understand we are looking at projects, some of which are continuing, and we are obliged to examine these on a case-by-case basis in accordance with Treasury Board requirements or in accordance with departmental authorizations where they exist. As I say, I would be more than pleased to furnish the hon. member with a complete breakdown.

ANTIBIOTIC AND DRUG RESIDUES IN MEAT—ABATTOIR INSPECTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister made a statement in a news release regarding the presence of drug and antibiotic residues in meat for human consumption which is federally inspected at abattoirs across Canada. The minister stated in part:

Meat reaching the consumer is entirely wholesome and judging from the facts the system is working very well.

In view of the fact that in a letter which I received from the minister on May 13 he stated that in fiscal 1979-1980 only 781 normal looking beef were tested for antibiotic residues, out of a total beef slaughter of some three million head, and that only 302 normal looking hogs were tested out of a total hog slaughter of some 12 million in federally inspected abattoirs, how can the minister say to the consumers of Canada that as far as the presence of antibiotic and drug residues in meat is concerned, that the inspection system is working very well?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, perhaps I should have written a longer letter to the hon. member.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Don't make your speech any longer.

Mr. Whelan: After a conversation with the hon. member the other day, I made a double-check and found that there have been tests on over 10,000 different samples. I know that the hon. member knows about this situation better than I, because of his background, which is that of an educated veterinarian—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Are there any other kinds?

Mr. Whelan: I am sure that many of the hon. members' colleagues are ignorant of the fact that many farmers classify themselves as amateur veterinarians although they do not have a degree in veterinary education. I am sure that he would also agree that they do a darn good job, because he has worked with such people all of his life.

I challenge the hon. member to challenge those 10,000 tests which have been taken and the educated veterinarians in my department who gave me that information, and I will abide by that information if they tell me that it is one of the most efficient, proficient, in-depth testing programs of any country in the world.

Mr. Mitges: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that of the normal cattle tested, nine-tenths of 1 per cent showed traces of antibiotic residue, and of the hogs tested, six-tenths of 1 per cent had traces of antibiotic residue. Even if we include the 10,000 cattle mentioned by the minister, it would mean that some 26,000 additional cattle and some 74,000 additional hogs would have been condemned for the presence of residue. I am referring to the entire cattle population bought for slaughter and—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please put his question.

Mr. Mitges: In view of the tremendous additional cost and manpower that would be involved in testing every animal for antibiotic and drug residues, and in order to bring to an end this very difficult problem, would the minister get together with the Minister of National Health and Welfare and, under the authority of the Food and Drugs Act, make sure that all animals shipped for slaughter to abattoirs are, in fact, free of any trace of antibiotic or drug residues when they arrive for slaughter?

Mr. Whelan: Again, Madam Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member knows that in the program introduced by the Health of Animals Branch of our department they work very closely with the Department of Health. They are very concerned about this matter. It must be recognized that much of the concern comes from the producer area. I am sure that the hon. member has as much confidence in those producers that they themselves do not want to ship any product to market that will be damaging to anyone. We all have that concern, and my department will be stepping up that surveillance.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS SUFFERING FROM CANCER BECAUSE OF EXPOSURE TO ATOMIC BOMB TESTING

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Recent reports indicate that a number of men who served in the armed forces believe that they are now suffering from cancer as a result of being exposed to radiation while assigned to duty at atomic bomb explosion test sites in the United States during the 1950s.

Would the minister tell the House the action he is taking to determine the state of health of Canadians who were assigned to duty at those atomic bomb explosion test sites?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, my department has this matter well in hand. Much work as has already been done by our Canadian Pension Commission and the research people in that commission are looking into these cases. There has been some detection, and detection of other people supposedly involved should be made in the near future.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Has the minister contacted all the people involved, has a program of monitoring their health been approved, and does the government intend to assume the liability which naturally flows as a result of its negligence in not protecting our armed forces personnel at those atomic explosion test sites?

Mr. MacDonald: Madam Speaker, when the analyses and diagnoses are completed by the people within our department who are qualified, such as doctors, that determination will be made.

ENERGY

TRANSMISSION OF HYDROELECTRIC POWER FROM NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to which I would like a "yes". The question has to do with the development of the hydro potential on the Lower Churchill River, not with the contract on the Upper Churchill River. In his speech in Toronto on May 6, the minister said:

> There will be free flow of goods and services in this country. No province has the right to dictate development outside its borders, and the federal government will fully defend this basic constitutional principle.

The Premier of Newfoundland wrote to the Prime Minister and the government on April 16 asking them to act to ensure the free flow of hydroelectricity out of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, across the province of Quebec to other provinces and customers. He pointed out that for eight years negotiations have gone on with Quebec and no solution has been reached. The two provinces cannot reach a solution themselves.

• (1500)

Would the federal minister tell me whether he is going to take action in the government to ensure that Newfoundland can transmit hydroelectric power across Quebec, without having to sell it to Hydro Quebec, through section 92(10)(c), works for the general advantage of Canada or otherwise. If he is going to take that action, when will he take it?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, if the question had been a little bit shorter, I might have been able to answer by "Yes" or "No", but the way it has been asked I have, first of all, to remind the member that the development of the Lower Churchill—I am sure he is aware of this—remains a matter that is under consideration and study.

We are awaiting a report from the federal provincial group that is examining the feasibility of the project and the economic advisability of proceeding with it. I met yesterday with my colleague, the minister of energy for Newfoundland, and I believe we had a very fruitful meeting. I said that I would get in touch with my provincial colleague from Quebec, whom I have not been able to meet as yet, but we are planning to meet at the end of this month, or early next month, to review this particular subject and some other issues.

I said that I would again be in touch with my colleague from Newfoundland and see what would be advisable, especially once we have received the report that is expected from the joint federal-provincial task force which is examining the advisability of proceeding with the Churchill Falls No. 2, or Lower Churchill project.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. There are 2,500 megawatts of hydro power in the Lower Churchill alone, and this is badly needed so that they can displace the use of oil power, oil-generated electricity in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or in other parts of Canada. It is a question of great urgency.

I ask the minister again, has the government got this under active consideration, and will it treat hydroelectricity—which is a form of energy—in the same way as it treats the interprovincial distribution of oil and gas, that is, as a national project? The provinces cannot block it going across their borders. Will the same principle apply to hydroelectric transmission if there is surplus power in the Lower Churchill that can be sold outside Quebec?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, if the realization of the Lower Churchill project was so evident to the hon. member, I cannot understand why he did not abolish the federal-provincial task force that was studying, and has been studying for a while, the advisability of this project. I have already told him we have to wait for the report of this group as to whether the problem is even likely to arise or not.

Once we have this report, and if the report is positive as to the advisability of proceeding with the project, then obviously we will have to get down to hard negotiations. I would hope, however, that both the government of Newfoundland and the government of Quebec, once they have seen that report, will be willing to really sit down and negotiate—as has been the case in the past with every province—the transmission of electricity without any interference and without undue objections or obstacles to the realization of this project.

With us, it is indeed a matter of great concern and high priority. I can assure the hon. member that as far as we are concerned, we will do everything we can to help the two governments involved to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion soon.

Mr. Crosbie: I want you to act, not the two governments.

CANADA DAY

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION DESIGNATING JULY 1—NATIONAL ANTHEM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance for any nation to have its own national symbols, will the Prime Minister have his government give priority consideration to bringing in a bill prior to July 1 this year to make Canada Day officially known as Canada Day? Also, will the government also consider bringing in a bill to give Canada its official national anthem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, both of those objectives have been the government's, and I was appreciative of the hon. member's motion in the House a few days ago to attempt to get unanimous consent for such sensible motions. Unfortunately, that consent was not forthcoming, and this is the kind of difficulty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that leaders of the opposition party are now saying that the objection was on this side.

An hon. Member: That's right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It sure was today.

Mr. Trudeau: I think we perhaps might ask, right at this moment, the unanimous consent of the House to return to these motions and have them voted upon now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Beautiful!

Mr. Trudeau: If I have to get consent, Madam Speaker, I move to revert to motions, seconded—

An hon. Member: You can't do that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Don't you know the rules?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question period is the time to move motions. I am not sure that I am on proper ground—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I apologize, Madam Speaker. I asked for unanimous consent and I heard a lot of "yeses". I thought I had it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I think the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi now has his answer: the Tories are opposed to such a motion.

Madam Speaker: I had notice of a question of privilege from the hon. Solicitor General and I would recognize him now.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—RESPONSIBILITY OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO TABLE REPORTS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises from a statement made by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) in the House yesterday on a question of privilege to the effect that I had failed to supply, as required by law, within five days of the commencement of this session, the annual report of the Solicitor General and the annual report of the Correctional Service of Canada. I left the House yesterday, as I informed the hon. member, because I was attending a meeting of a cabinet committee. I note with regret that he is absent today. He told me that he was returning to his constituency for the weekend.

It is true, Madam Speaker, that I have failed to file these annual reports. I have checked with other ministers and I find that, in general, most of them have been unable to comply with this statutory requirement. In my case, although I regret it, I am doing everything I can to bring the annual reports forward quickly. Last week I signed both annual reports and they have been sent out to be printed but have not been printed yet. As soon as they are I will bring them forward and table them in the House.

MISS CARNEY—ALLEGED COMMENT MADE BY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding the Prime Minister's remarks which were addressed to me when I was questioning the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). During the course of the question, I repeated the remarks of the Premier of B.C. which expressed his frustration in dealing with the federal government on any cost-sharing arrangement. While I was asking the question I heard the Prime Minister say, and I am supported by my colleagues: "She talks just like Lévesque, always being gypped by Ottawa."

Madam Speaker, as a western MP I find the Prime Minister's remark unacceptable. I am advised by my colleagues that, since it imputes motives to me, it does involve a question of privilege. I should like to serve notice that I am prepared to move a motion that he be instructed to withdraw his remark once your Honour has a chance to check the record.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not have the benefit of the blues here and I cannot recall the exact words used by the hon. member in her question, but I did hear her say words to the effect that this federal government spent no money west of the Ontario-Manitoba border. That is the kind of remark which I said is exactly the kind of remark Mr. Lévesque makes when he says no money is spent by the federal government in Quebec.

If the hon. lady did not say that or words to that effect, I will withdraw my remark, but I ask you, Madam Speaker, to give us both time to check the blues. I am quite certain I heard right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, might I ask the government House leader if he could indicate the business for the balance of the week. I understand that it is his intention to designate next Thursday an allotted day. Could he tell us beyond that what his intentions are with respect to business?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, tomorrow the order of business will be as follows: the first item will be Bill C-27, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, followed by C-15, the Livestock Feed Assistance Act and if we have time, Bill C-28, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

[Translation]

As far as the business for next week is concerned, the House shall not meet Monday, pursuant to Standing Order 2(3). Tuesday we will be discussing on second reading the Municipal Grants Act and, if possible, the Relocation of Government Agencies Act, also on second reading.

Wednesday, we wish to initiate and hopefully complete the discussion of the old age security legislation, to increase the guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens. Thursday, will be an allotted day, and I understand the New Democratic Party will be addressing a matter of their choice.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I could perhaps discuss this later, but in anticipation I wonder if the government House leader might be prepared to entertain discussions with respect to shifting the business to the item which is third in line for Friday, that is to say, from Bill C-28, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, to Bill C-7, to amend the Saltfish Act. It is a matter that I did discuss with the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. Would he be prepared to consider that change in the event we do reach that stage on Friday?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have no objection to informing my hon. colleague of the reasons why I cannot accept his request.

However, if my colleague objects to Bill C-28 being discussed tomorrow, surely I can compensate by proposing another matter in consultation with him.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I hope that there is still some room for arranging the business tomorrow. The government House leader has taken me a bit by surprise in announcing the farm legislation first. I understood from our discussions this morning that the fisheries legislation was to come first, and that if something was needed to fill up the time, it would be additional farm legislation, and I had advised my colleagues accordingly. Perhaps we could sort that out.

May I confirm that our party is prepared to take Thursday as an opposition day and we shall put down a motion for debate on that day.

I have one other matter I should like to raise with the government House leader. I hope that I will not have to do it every week, month in and month out, throughout this session. As he knows, we do try to co-operate, especially when matters are urgent, and I press upon him the urgency of the legislation that would do something for veterans' widows.

As the House knows, the previous government made a breakthrough in terms of drafting a bill that dealt with this matter. I believe the department is seized of the situation. Last Thursday the House leader told me he would discuss the matter with the Minister of Veterans Affairs when he returned from Holland. I hope that he will bring forward this very urgent piece of legislation within the next couple of weeks.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, with respect to the first part of the remarks made by my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it is correct that we had discussions this morning to the effect that we were to deal with the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. But after that meeting, I had a note from my colleague in the Conservative party saying that he would like to see the Saltfish Act discussed. Unfortunately, this is impossible. I thought that I could then put the fisheries loans act at the end of the day and just bring forward Bill C-27 and Bill C-15. That is why we will be discussing farm bills first, and if necessary the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. If my colleague has serious objections to that, I am willing to consult later on today and find something else for discussion. In any event, those bills were discussed this morning; only the order has been changed. I did this in an effort to accommodate my colleague from the Tory party. I did not think at the time that it would create some inconvenience for my other colleague.

As far as his second point is concerned, I want to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that his remarks will be made known to the minister responsible. I hope that my colleague will not have to ask the question again next week.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, first may I thank the government House leader for the note of assurance in his last remark, namely, the one about the legislation respecting the veterans.

With regard to the rearranging that has been done for tomorrow, I certainly do not intend to make a point of privilege or to raise a fuss about it because the three of us get along pretty well. But I would remind my two colleagues that when an order of business is changed after we have agreed on it, I wish they would remember that there are three of us involved in these matters. I had discussions with my colleagues involved on farm and fisheries matters, and it just means that we have to change our plans. I hope that we will follow the usual custom of full consultation among all three parties in this House.

Mr. Roche: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, may I ask the government House leader when it is his intention to call Bill C-5, the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, for second reading debate. I was under the impression that it had a higher priority than apparently it has.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, this bill has priority, and I hope to be in a position to bring that bill forward some time next week or the week after, if possible.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board during today's question period said that he would produce a list of 497 projects having an initial budget estimate of $4.7 billion, but a possible overrun of $1.62 billion. Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate if he intends to table that list later today or at the latest tomorrow?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I will attempt to find out immediately what work is involved in preparing such information for the hon. member, and I will bring it forward as soon as possible. If it can be done later this afternoon or by tomorrow, I will see that it is done.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, yesterday the President of the Treasury Board, in reply to a request from me that he table a list in the House of all federal government computers connected to the Infodat or Datapac systems, was reported at page 1092 of Hansard to say the following:

> Mr. Chairman, following upon the request from the hon. member I have asked for that information to be compiled with a view to tabling it in the House.

Will the minister table that material today or tomorrow?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, again, I am not in a position to furnish the hon. member with a timetable at this point. I told him that such a list was being prepared with a view to its being tabled. My answer will be as it was to the other hon. member, that I will look into the matter and report to him as soon as I know when it can be tabled.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

Ministry Secretariat:

(a) 194;

(b) 28.

The Correctional Service of Canada:

(a) 9,545;

(b) 383.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police:

(a) RCMP Members	16,057
Public Service Employees	3,279
		19,336;
(b) Police Casuals	1,920
Public Service Casuals	334
		2,254.

National Parole Board:

(a) 254;

(b) 21.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—DEFICITS

Question No. 313—Mr. Herbert:

For each of the past five fiscal years, in which Defence Construction (1951) Limited has had a deficit, how much was the deficit and what was the reason why the funding of costs by the Department of National Defence was inadequate to cover the net expense for the year?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

1. 1978-79	$241,974
1977-78	45,105
1976-77	164,208
1975-76	90,788
1974-75	165,310.

2. Funding by the Department of National Defence covers Defence Construction (1951) Limited's net Cash expenses such as personnel pay, administration accommodation etc., however, net expenses also include depreciation on furniture and equipment, as well as accrued expenses such as vacation pay for employees and termination pay benefits at cessation of employment which only require funding in future years when they become payable.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—EMPLOYEES IN THE SX CLASSIFICATION

Question No. 349—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Department of Transport (b) how many were (i) Francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the Department since March 31, 1979, and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SX's employed?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

1. (a)	90;
(b) (i)	15,
(ii)	1.
2. As of March 31, 1980
(a)	92;
(b) (i)	26,
(ii)	3.

3. The only significant change made to departmental structure since March 31, 1979, was the integration of research and development with strategic planning. This change resulted in the deletion of the former position of assistant deputy minister research and development and the creation of a new director general research and development position, with the latter reporting to the assistant deputy minister strategic planning.

AGRICULTURE CANADA—EMPLOYEES IN THE SX CLASSIFICATION

Question No. 351—Mr. Herbert:

1. As of March 31, 1979 (a) how many persons in the SX classification were employed by the Department of Agriculture (b) how many were (i) Francophones (ii) females?

2. What are the present totals?

3. Was there a structural change in the Department since March 31, 1979, and, if so, what effect did such a change have on the number of SX's employed?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

1. (a) 36;
   (b) (i) 9,
   (ii) None.
2. (a) 41, including 2 in acting capacity;
   (b) (i) 9,
   (ii) None.
3. Yes, however it did not affect the number of SX's employed.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—ASSISTANCE

Question No. 379—Mr. Herbert:

Does the Export Development Corporation restrict the assistance it offers to Canadian business in cases where the exports are to countries that are not diplomatically recognized by Canada?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Export Development Corporation advises: For business carried out by the corporation for its own account, using the corporation's own funds and at the corporation's risk, insurance and guarantees under section 24 and loans and guarantees under section 29 of the Export Development Act, diplomatic recognition is not a factor in determining whether the facility should be provided in the case of a transaction where the risk is purely commercial. However, it has been EDC's practice not to offer its loan services in support of an export transaction to a country not diplomatically recognized by Canada where the creditworthiness of the transaction would require a guarantee by the government of the country involved or by an agency thereof. Transactions which the corporation has undertaken for the government's account following a decision of the cabinet, have involved countries diplomatically recognized by Canada. The transactions in that category are insurance and guarantees under section 27 of the act and loans and guarantees under section 31 of the act, in all of which government funds are used or are at risk.

AGRICULTURE CANADA—NUMBER OF LAWYERS ON STAFF

Question No. 607—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Department of Justice has assigned six lawyers to serve Agriculture Canada, its boards and agencies.

Order Paper Questions

CFB GAGETOWN—MILITARY PERSONNEL

Question No. 646—Mr. Howie:

What was the total number of military personnel stationed at CFB Gagetown on April 1 (a) 1980 (b) 1979 (c) 1978 (d) 1975?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): (a) 3,111; (b) 3,273; (c) 3,271; (d) 2,741.

LABOUR—STUDIES ON ALTERNATIVES TO STRIKE ACTION

Question No. 665—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, to date, did the Department of Labour conduct studies into alternatives to strike action?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): The Department of Labour is continually researching and reviewing innovative ways in which to improve labour-management relations in the federal private sector and in doing so, reduce the incidence of strike and lockout action. Over the past few years, Labour Canada has attempted to improve the industrial relations system through legislative amendments to the Canada Labour Code as well as through a variety of program initiatives. In addition, the mediation and conciliation branch of the federal mediation and conciliation service of Labour Canada has carried out a program of "preventive mediation", involving themselves in the resolution of industrial relations problems which surface during the life of the collective agreement. In an effort to assist existing and potential union leaders to acquire additional knowledge and skills necessary to effectively discharge their collective bargaining responsibilities, the Labour Education Support Program was introduced to provide financial assistance to legally-constituted union organizations in Canada to develop and promote educational activities. These and other initiatives undertaken by Labour Canada are aimed at fostering a sense of joint responsibility in making the industrial relations system work more efficiently and with less disruption.

CFB BORDEN—PERSONNEL

Question No. 679—Mr. Stewart:

1. During the year (a) 1976 (b) 1977 (c) 1979, how many civilian personnel were employed at CFB Borden?

2. For the same years, what was the total number of military personnel stationed at CFB Borden?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

1. As of April 1
   (a) 1,403;
   (b) 1,813;
   (c) 1,591.
2. As of April 1
   (a) 3,141;
   (b) 3,352;
   (c) 3,283.

AGRICULTURE CANADA—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 696—Mr. Clarke:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, how many contracts were let by the Department of Agriculture for professional services, to persons who at any time within the past five years, had been employed in indeterminate positions under the Public Service Commission?

2. How many contracts were (a) for less than one year (b) for one to two years (c) over two years?

3. How many contracts were let outside the National Capital Region?

4. What was the total cost of all such contracts?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

1. 18.

2. (a) 17;

(b) 1;

(c) None.

3. 8.

4. $85,000.94.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Collenette: I would ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1, 1980-81

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 14, consideration in committee of Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1981—Mr. Johnston—Mr. Francis in the chair.

On clause 2—

The Chairman: I believe the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe has three minutes left of his time.

Mr. Beatty: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but the President of the Treasury Board is not here to question. Oh, he just came in. I hope my three minutes will not be docked for the minister's tardiness in arriving.

The Chairman: It being Committee of the Whole, the procedures are such that the hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Beatty: Yesterday I quoted from a book written by the current President of the Treasury Board called "Fiscalamity". He was kind enough to send me this morning a copy of the revised version of his text which is entitled "How to Survive Canada's Tax Chaos, by Donald J. Johnston". On the front cover it says "Should be required for every Member of Parliament". The minister in his note to me recommended that I read the author's note, which I had the opportunity to do. I want to quote to the minister one sentence from page 9 which reads as follows:

The growing list of government "white elephants" that have consumed billions of taxpayers' dollars, the failure of government to establish and abide by accepted financial controls as illustrated by the recent revelations of the Auditor General, the unacceptable level of remuneration, perquisites and retirement benefits enjoyed by certain of our "civil servants" which are virtually unmatched in the private sector, and the seeming disregard for the people's priorities, have all contributed to an attitude of hostility towards governments at all levels.

May I ask the minister whether he feels that the phrase "the unacceptable level of remuneration, perquisites and retirement benefits enjoyed by certain of our 'civil servants' which are virtually unmatched in the private sector" describes the situation in the public service for which he is responsible?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I did take the liberty of forwarding a copy of the latest edition of that book to several members on the other side so that they would not be charged with infringement of copyright by using photocopies of an earlier publication. The phrase referred to, relating to civil servants, I believe was valid at the time those remarks were written, which is some years ago. I only have to refer the hon. member to the Conference Board study which was published this week. It in fact shows that the public sector is now lagging behind the private sector. As I indicated yesterday, I think that a number of the views expressed there were valid. I am delighted to see that improvements have been made and I am sure the hon. member would agree with that.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Chairman, the author's note was dated December 21, 1976. May I ask the minister whether he is saying to us today that the comment he made referring to "the unacceptable level of remuneration, perquisites and retirement benefits enjoyed by certain of our civil servants" is no longer applicable and no longer valid in any way at the federal level?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the information I had before me at the time I was writing those comments had to do with a public perception, and had not only to do with the federal civil service. I believe the hon. member referred to a growing list of white elephants. I was thinking of a number of projects where there had been cost overruns not only federally, but provincially and municipally right across this country.

I can assure the hon. member that at the time those words were written in December, 1976, I was quite conscious of some of the cost overruns being experienced in my own city with respect to the Olympic projects. When he asks if I share or believe in those same comments today, I cannot remember the specific instances, persons or quotes that I was referring to in December, 1976, but that was a perception of the public. I was pointing out how the public was concerned with how their tax dollars were spent. They want value for money. That philosophy is shared, I hope, by everybody in this House, including the hon. member. That is what we in Treasury Board are going to achieve.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity today to speak on the estimates, not having spoken in this chamber for almost a year. I wish to direct some of my questions to the Minister of Transport. I will wait and see whether he needs any officials.

I welcome this opportunity to talk about the concerns of the constituency of South West Nova, concerns regarding transportation and how they relate. The Department of Transport is well aware of some of the concerns that any member of Parliament from that area would have. In particular, we have CN Marine which operates three ferries out of ports in that area. We are concerned about the direction CN Marine will be taking in this new Parliament along with the Department of Transport in order to provide better service to and from Nova Scotia to Saint John and Maine.

Today I want to talk about a couple of areas, Via Rail and the arrangements that have been made to provide service from Halifax to Yarmouth. I congratulate Via Rail. It is a Crown corporation that was given its powers during the time I was in office. I would like to ask about the financing of this one-year program that will come into effect in June.

I would like the minister to direct his attention to the Via Rail set-up in the area between Halifax and Yarmouth, going through the valley, and to tell me the cost that the department or the CTC will have to bear for the new arrangements to see whether the service will be improved and whether people will use it. The fact that there will be a return service daily as well as reduced fares, which I and many groups have advocated, will encourage people to use the service. This should be an energy saver for the province.

The next area of concern is the highway upgrading agreement between the province of Nova Scotia and the federal government which was entered into in early 1978. The purpose of that agreement was to upgrade and reinforce the highway in Nova Scotia. South West Nova was quite fortunate—

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. If I understand the hon. member's remarks properly, she now seems to be directing her remarks and possible questions to the Minister of Transport. As I understand it, the general understanding was that we would be dealing with the President of the Treasury Board, and when questions had ended with respect to that minister, we would then shift to another of the possibly three other ministers.

● (1530)

There is likely to be utter confusion if speakers direct questions to various ministers, and I should like a ruling. Are we going to deal with the President of the Treasury Board or do we shift to somebody else? As I indicated last evening, I sense an inference that people, especially on the government side, and, possibly, in the NDP, were wanting to shelter the President of the Treasury Board, that somehow they had no questions for the President of the Treasury Board; they were not concerned about spending levels in this country or about rising deficits. If the hon. member is saying, in effect, that she has no concern about the cost overruns which have been revealed, no concern about these rising expenditures, I think we should get the air cleared. Is it not true that we are supposed to be dealing with the President of the Treasury Board in Committee of the Whole at the present time? If so, let's get on with it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the hon. member for York-Peel is a little "off" in his understanding of what is happening.

Mr. Stevens: You speak for yourself.

Mr. Knowles: I shall tell the hon. member for York-Peel that we are now discussing in Committee of the Whole clause 2 of the bill and clause 2 provides for fractions of every estimate in the book. So any member who gets the floor can speak to any aspect of the estimates he wishes.

As opposition parties we have said we would like four ministers to be here—the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In other words, we cannot complain if the other ministers are not here, but the member who gets the floor nevertheless has the right to speak to whatever section of the estimates he pleases. Having spent yesterday with the President of the Treasury Board we have decided that our speakers who get the floor today, in their turn, will deal first with the Minister of Transport, then with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and finally with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I believe Your Honour will have to recognize, considering what we are debating under clause 2 of the bill, that that procedure is perfectly in order, and so is the hon. member for South West Nova.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Chairman, I wish to confirm what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am sure the hon. member for York-Peel has inadvertently forgotten the rules.

Mr. Stevens: Oh, no. Agreements mean something over here.

Mr. Collenette: First of all, the rule is that on consideration of an appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole it is within the right of any hon. member to question any minister. The hon. member spoke about agreements. It was agreed among the House leaders that the opposition would designate several ministers whom they would like to question intensively. Yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board was here all afternoon. Other ministers were present but there were indications from the other side that they wanted to stay with the President of the Treasury Board. I scurried around during the question period making sure that things were properly organized. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be here at 4.30, the Minister of Transport is here now, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be here at five o'clock and remain until ten o'clock this evening to answer questions. Basically I am supporting the agreement made between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the House leader for our side and the House leader for the Conservative side.

The Chairman: Order, please. I am hoping we can minimize these comments. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: On the point of order, I am somewhat amazed at the steps the government is taking in order to protect the President of the Treasury Board. As I understand it, and as a matter of fact, your list indicates—

An hon. Member: Question!

Mr. Alexander: Why don't you smarten up? There is no question. I am on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Arrogance. I thought you were leaving.

The Chairman: The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, I am leaving. Sometimes I have mixed emotions about that. What I noticed was this. We see the President of the Treasury Board sitting with his officials, which gives some indication that he is rarin' to go. He was prepared to go on but it is only the President of the Treasury Board who is going as far as the agreement is concerned. As I understand it, there is an agreement in existence right now that it is the President of the Treasury Board who was to be questioned today, notwithstanding what the hon. member to my left has said.

The Chairman: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member, the committee now has before it consideration of clause 2 of the estimates. The hon. member for South West Nova has the floor. Before the adjournment last night I understand there was an agreement, as recorded in Hansard, concerning the ministers who would be present today. I am not privy to any other details of that agreement except that the Chair has taken note of the fact that certain ministers, by arrangement, would be present in the House, and two of those ministers are here at the present time. It seems to me the Chair has no other course than to recognize the hon. member for South West Nova and she has the right to place whatever matters she wishes before the committee at this point.

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for Longueuil to be as brief as possible.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Chairman, I will be quite brief. I merely want to remind the House that my colleague opposite when he was minister made his officials answer in committee while today he is asking the opposite. I wonder how he can do so now.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I am sure hon. members are anxious to proceed with consideration of the estimates presently before the committee. The hon. member for South West Nova.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I will continue my remarks concerning the upgrading of highway agreements entered into by the province of Nova Scotia and the federal government early in 1978. When I was interrupted I think I was saying—it is hard to recapture one's trend of thought—that the purpose of the agreements was the upgrading and reinforcing of the highway system in Nova Scotia and, in particular, the 100 series—101 and 103—which are directly related to South West Nova.

I would like to find out from the minister what has taken place under the agreement, how much money has been spent by the province and how much the federal government has contributed. At the same time there are many areas through the southern part of the province which are getting better highways affording better access to and from Halifax and the southern end of Nova Scotia.

Before asking further questions concerning the highway agreement, I wonder whether the minister could tell me how much has been spent, how much is to be committed this year, how much is left under the agreement, and which projects have been agreed to under the agreement for the coming season. I ask these questions as I believe we are entering the final year of the agreement. Perhaps I could have the answers before proceeding further.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I must admit to feeling a little solitary at the moment. I would appreciate it if my hon. friend would kindly continue her remarks as I would like to make a number of comments before proceeding to answer specific questions which she raised. So if she would do so, I would appreciate her continuing her remarks. I assure the hon. lady that I am making extensive notes.

• (1540)

Miss Campbell: I thank the minister. I hope he remembers the questions. They were about Via Rail and the amount of subsidy. On the highway upgrading agreement it was particularly with respect to the amount spent to date by the federal government in contrast to the cost-sharing agreement. In addition, what highways will be upgraded in the future, particularly as they relate to South West Nova?

I would also like to go back to the decision to go from Kingston down through the valley to Annapolis Royal. At that time there was much concern among the people in the valley—both pro and con—as to the route. Most people would like to have a highway. I think it is an understated fact that the highway must proceed. However, at the time the decision was made it seems to me that under the agreement the decision to decide on the highway was left with the province, as it is the right of the province to make those decisions.

Is the minister aware of any environmental impact study which was done at the time? I think this came under the provisions of the environmental protection assessment, which should be done because it was a funding government agency giving money to the province. If so, were there concerns on the part of the federal government regarding environmental aspects with respect to where the highway was going?

I take it the minister's officials are coming. I would like to know what role the federal government played in the environmental study and what federal departments were involved in the environmental impact study.

I will go on to another transportation aspect which concerns me, and that is buses. About the same time that the highway upgrading agreement with the province was being entered into, the minister of transport of the day, the Hon. Otto Lang, brought forward a bus improvement plan. I would like to know what has been spent under that program—particularly in Nova Scotia—toward getting a more effective bus service.

I would also be interested in knowing what has been spent under the municipal airport improvement program which was brought in at the time.

The last thing I suppose one should talk about is transportation in the southern end of Nova Scotia. The people of Nova Scotia have always been very concerned about how to get from Nova Scotia to the United States or New Brunswick and about going to or from Halifax. Transportation has become a very important aspect in the lives of individuals in the southern end of the province.

I would like to know if the minister is prepared to proceed at this time to give me any answers. If he is not, I am sure I could go on to talk about the Bluenose, but before getting into the matter of the Bluenose I would like to get answers on the matters I have already discussed in terms of the local problems of South West Nova and the rest of southern Nova Scotia. I can talk quite a lot about transportation, but I would like to hear what the minister has to say.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if I may I would like first to make some very brief and general comments on the 1980-81 estimates I am introducing today. After that I shall attempt to the best of my knowledge to answer some of the questions, while officers from my department try to find the figures for each of the items referred to by the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell).

Mr. Speaker, the 1980-81 estimates for the Department of Transport show a net expenditure requirement of about $1,852 million or 3.1 per cent of the total federal government estimates, which will give an idea of the importance of the department. The $1.8 billion include $1.595 billion for the department proper and $253.7 million for the Canadian Transport Commission.

Departmental needs increased $156 million over 1979-80, or 10.9 per cent. The main increases are on personnel expenditures.

The authorized number of person-years for the department is 20,747, as compared to 21,147 for last year. It will therefore be realized that the number of my officers is decreasing. I shall make some of these points later on while answering some specific questions.

The Departmental Administration Program totals $80.9 million, reflecting an increase of $11 million over last year. The main capital expenditures in that program are for the Coast Guard College in Sydney, Nova Scotia, with a total estimated cost of $19.5 million, including $8.3 million for 1980-81.

There is also the Transport Training Institute in Cornwall, Ontario, with a total estimated cost of $61.3 million including $4.5 million on the 1980-81 budget. These two projects will be or should be completed in 1981-82.

[English]

The second item in my budget has to do with marine administration, and that is for an amount of $356 million. Here we have an increase of $35.4 million over 1979-80. Of this increase, $13.9 million relates to higher operating costs and $13.5 million to increases in the capital program.

There are two major projects of significance with respect to the national harbours board, of which my hon. friends are all very much aware, and those are the Roberts Bank development at the port of Vancouver and the Ridley Island development at the port of Prince Rupert. These are two very important matters which have been in the news recently, and I hope that there will be questions on them.

The third item of importance to an hon. member at whom I am looking at this moment is the air transportation program. Here we see an increase of $39.9 million over the 1979-80 estimates, but—and please notice this very carefully—the increase is mainly attributable to operations and maintenance items, mainly salaries and price adjustments. It is important to underline that fact.

I want to underline further the fact that the capital budget for the air program is $124.6 million.

I look at hon. members from the Hamilton area. That capital budget is down from 1979-80 by $3.7 million. The budget of the air program has now decreased annually since 1975-76 when the estimates level was $245 million. I want to observe that because I am developing the reputation of being rather tight and Shylockish about airport developments. It is rather useful for the Canadian public to be aware that the amounts of money in the budget are on the way down, not on the way up, so consequently when distinguished members of this assembly come up with suggestions that the number of airports should increase, that facilities should be built all over the place and that radar should be doubled up and improved, there are limitations to that.

I do not want to cry here this afternoon on the floor of the House. It is not the right thing to do.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Pepin: I just want to inform hon. members. My hon. friends might ask me the reason for the reduction in the capital program on the air side. There are a number of reasons for that. First, the number of projects has been completed, and they are important ones. I am thinking about Calgary and Mirabel, built in recent years. A number of programs have been postponed because of controversy, and I am thinking about Pickering, for example, and the general restraint program of the government. So I want to emphasize this fact again to prove that it has limitations. Sometimes when I answer questions in the House I have the feeling that the demand is bottomless and ceilingless with regard to airports that could be built or improved.

● (1550)

The final section of my estimates has to do with the surface transportation program. There is a lot of money here because half of the departmental estimates are in this section. We see here an increase of $70.3 million over 1979-80, for a total of $802 million.

With reference to the speech made by the hon. member for South West Nova, $52 million is attributable particularly to Via Rail. Attributable to the payment for the urban transportation assistance program is $26.7 million, and the amount attributable to the acquisition or leasing of hopper cars is $10.8 million. These amounts are partially offset by reductions in other programs, the largest being the highway improvement program where you find reductions of $12.6 million in the Atlantic highway strengthening program, $16.5 million for the prairie highway improvement program, and $10 million for the western northlands program.

We will have somewhat of a philosophical debate here because it seems to me—and my hon. friend on the other side, the hon. member for Joliette, might agree—that there has been a developing trend in Canada according to which the two levels of government should not try, whenever it can be avoided, to do the same thing. Most of these highway development programs have to do with intraprovincial road development, and consequently hon. members will see a decline in that area, so that the federal government will have money to allocate on projects of a federal nature. It is a very difficult decision to make and I expect to be chastized occasionally by members of the House for not being sufficiently sympathetic to local situations. That is a point of constitutional philosophy or theology which one might bear in mind when criticizing the Minister of Transport.

I have a few notes on the urban transportation assistance program which is so popular with members of Parliament. It is included in the estimates with $57.7 million as compared with $31 million. The money on this one is going up. As is well known, this program provides assistance for urban transit capital projects as well as the construction of railway grade separations under the terms of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act. Again hon. members see $57.7 million only, but the demand is unbelievable. It seems that in recent years every major municipality in Canada worth its salt has had an urban development plan, including a railway crossing, grade separation and relocation, and to do all that my department had only $57.7 million. Again I am trying to assess the possibilities in relation to the demand.

Support to rail passenger services in Canada, including assistance to employees affected by the establishment of Via Rail Canada in March of 1978, is provided for under the amount of $424.3 million, which compares with $277 million last year. There is a very substantial increase here.

I point this out to the committee so that hon. members will be in a position to assess where the money is going. Much of that money is going to Via Rail. I want to emphasize immediately the fact that, out of the $424 million, $307 million is for operations and $117 million is for capital projects. This is equipment that Via Rail is acquiring. Some of it is LRC, that is, a light, rapid and comfortable train system which has been developed by the Bombardier-MLW-Alcan group and others. I point this out in an effort to indicate where the money allocated to the Department of Transport was going.

If someone else would like to make a little speech now it would give me an opportunity to collect my notes to answer the specific and detailed questions asked by the hon. member for South West Nova.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, my line of questioning and my comments this afternoon are directed to the President of the Treasury Board. I wonder if he could indicate whether he is acquainted with the proposal that has been made by Michael Pitfield, the clerk of the Privy Council, with respect to the employment of an electronic transfer of funds system, and if he is, does he contemplate the establishment of such a system?

Mr. Johnston: No, Mr. Chairman, I am not acquainted with that project. I do not have the information with me and, as the hon. member knows, I do not have my officials with me at present because we are alternating officials between the Department of Transport and my department. But if the hon. member would like me to obtain that information, I shall be pleased to do so within the next several minutes.

Mr. Gamble: Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I would be in a position to explain some of the advantages of the proposal that has been made with respect to the implementation of the electronic transfer of funds system.

One of the most intriguing advantages of this system would be the potential elimination of what at one time the clerk of the Privy Council indicated to be in the neighbourhood of 60,000 public service positions. I am fully aware of the great reluctance of the President of the Treasury Board to speak in terms of goals or target numbers, but having regard to the fact that most of these positions might well be in the postal service of Canada, and having regard in particular to the fact that we might be faced with a strike in the public service as it relates to the postal service, I wonder whether, under those circumstances, it might not be advisable to examine the potential use of the system.

While the President of the Treasury Board is awaiting his officials so they might acquaint him with this system, let me recount an incident which occurred yesterday in my office relating to a constituent with whom I had been dealing for about three weeks. Near the end of April this constituent was in need of a substantial refund cheque from Revenue Canada—I am sure the President of the Treasury Board is well acquainted with the delays that take place when those cheques are in issue, and he communicated with me. I had a promise from the deputy minister in Revenue Canada that my constituent would receive the refund in the mail on or before May 10. Of course, the cheque did not come and I was once again confronted with a concerned and upset constituent.

● (1600)

Thereupon I communicated again with the office of the deputy minister of Revenue Canada, taxation division, to find out the explanation; it went something like this. From and after May 23 various other government departments, dispatching much-needed pension cheques and family allowance cheques, decided that it would be more appropriate if their cheques were dispatched in a priority situation over regular revenue refund cheques. Under the circumstances they opted to use the facilities of the postal service in priority to the use of that service by Revenue Canada.

It appears that the emergency which was implanted as a consequence of the fear of a postal strike has passed and now the cheques can be issued. But it strikes me that under the circumstances the dispatch of cheques of this nature, together with the dispatch and transfer of funds generally, might well be undertaken through this system. I suggest it is incumbent upon the President of the Treasury Board to examine the implications and the apparent advantages. He should undertake to place before the House an explanation as to why, if after examination it appears appropriate and advisable, such a system is not in fact put in place.

I can well understand the concerns of some members of this House, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in seeing that those people for whom he so often speaks, the pensioners, cannot receive regularly in an efficient fashion the cheques upon which they so desperately depend. It may well confront the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with a bit of a dilemma when he realizes that, in order to implement a system which is both efficient and effective, it may well occur that members of CUPW may not have the same numerical strength they had before.

I am reminded of a comment made by the President of the Treasury Board in the House on May 12 when he said the following:

> I have been particularly heartened to encounter in the public service of our country dedicated, competent, and responsible people who share my objective of good management and my determination to achieve it.

I recall receiving just the other day a letter from one of my constituents, a company called Con-Drain Co. Ltd. from Concord, Ontario. Earlier that company had written to me complaining about postal service which took 11 days for the transmission of a letter the great distance of four miles. Of course, I communicated directly with the Postmaster General raising my concern at the tardy mail delivery. As a result of that response, the delivery of mail deteriorated, if one can imagine it. Now I have a letter dated May 7 in which my constituent indicates the following:

> You will note that the dates on these being April 15, April 30, May 1 and May 5—

The date of the letter addressed to me was May 7. It continues:

> The first three were posted at Don Mills, the fourth and the one with the fastest service was posted in Montreal.

It took a full three weeks for the delivery of a letter. I presume these are the same people for which the President of the Treasury Board has such dedication. The state of the public service in this country is deplorable. The Auditor General has commented on that.

Earlier in the House I had occasion to direct some questions to the President of the Treasury Board with respect to this very issue. The remarkable response I received was that, as a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I would be in a position to in some way magically rectify the absurdities with which we are confronted. That is like suggesting that, as a result of something we might do here today, we can affect the outcome of the battle of Waterloo.

There is absolutely no possibility that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, as it is presently structured under the rules of this House, can do anything but agonize over the past. The President of the Treasury Board well knows that because he was the chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in the last House.

It is no answer to praise the public service. Doubtless there are thousands of competent, dedicated, hard-working people therein, but what I fail to hear from the President of the Treasury Board is one word of condemnation for those who in fact do not do their jobs, for those who perpetrate the kind of slovenly service to which I just made reference. At some point in time the President of the Treasury Board must acknowledge his responsibility for the control of the public service in Canada and do something concrete, other than coming to the House and saying, "I find in the public service people for whom I have nothing but the greatest of praise". I know it is easy and it may be delightful for members of the House who have public servants in their constituencies to praise them regularly, but when will the President of the Treasury Board, and indeed his other colleagues, come to recognize that there is a higher good and a greater demand placed upon government by the people of Canada who are offended by the way in which they are served by the public service? We need a concrete proposal for the way in which we ferret out incompetents and those who perpetrate inefficiency, and in fact dismiss them.

In the last Parliament I had occasion to question the chairman of the Public Service Commission. At that time I was told that before 1978 the Public Service Commission had gone to the Treasury Board with specific recommendations for rooting out incompetents and dismissing them. We discovered that it took 15 months, under the worst of circumstances, to get rid of someone who was not performing adequately. The public deserves a break, not only those who work for the government. Unfortunately when the whole public service recognizes that there is no disadvantage to being slovenly and there is no disadvantage for not performing, it becomes infectious and spreads like a cancer throughout the whole system. It is the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board to do something about it. Quite frankly it is insulting to members of the House to have the suggestion made that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts will in some way rectify the error and solve the problem.

I now see that the President of the Treasury Board has before him the gentleman for whom he has been waiting. Presumably I may get some answers now to the first questions I asked.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, regarding the first question that was asked, the question of electronic fund transfer apparently is being actively discussed between the Department of Supply and Services and the Canadian Bankers' Association. It would appear that the responsibility for carrying this forward rests with the Minister of Supply and Services.

• (1610)

My understanding is that before such a system can be introduced, we must await certain amendments to the Bank Act in order to pay Canadian banks for the services that would be rendered in that regard. But I cannot help but respond to some of the comments made by the hon. member. I have the impression that he was not here yesterday, otherwise he would have heard my comments with respect to management practices and the improvements which we are actively pursuing and intent on introducing. I think that any one of us is prepared to condemn any particular person who does not do his job, whether it be in the public service or in the private sector.

If I at any time left the impression that I was not critical of people who do not perform, I would like to assure the hon. gentleman that that is not what I intended. The point is that his analysis, like that of my predecessor in office, the hon. member for York-Peel, is simplistic in the extreme. The hon. member for York-Peel intended to solve the problem of efficiencies in the public service by eliminating 60,000 employees with one bold stroke of the pen. We all saw how far that program got him. We know what kind of moral problems it created and how ineffective it was as a technique of dealing with hard-working people who were wondering and asking, "When is the axe going to fall?" As a result the hon. member for York-Peel became known across this country as the "happy slasher".

I want to assure the hon. member that we have no intention of following irresponsible policies of that kind. If the hon. gentleman is concerned about agonizing over the past, which he has said he intends to do in the public accounts committee, then he should be at home in those circumstances because that is the cornerstone of Conservative philosophy—agonizing over the past.

What we are trying to do is establish sound management practices in this government for the future, to introduce the Lambert commission recommendations, to establish accountability and to be able to ferret out inefficiencies where they occur, but not at the expense of destroying what is probably what is one of the finest public services in the western world and acknowledged as such by most foreign observers. I suggest that the hon. member cease indulging in what I regard as irresponsible charges and get down to finding out what the facts are for himself. He should meet with the Auditor General, examine the studies and the methodology in order to ascertain whether the studies made by the Auditor General were appropriate under the circumstances.

The hon. member has had that opportunity, but unfortunately he was not available for a meeting with the Auditor General which I convened. I am sure, though, that he will have that opportunity before the public accounts committee, and that is the forum in which those issues should be raised.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the President of the Treasury Board that I was in this House and that I did hear his explanations yesterday. It is for that very reason that I raise the matter again. It seems that it is impossible for the President of the Treasury Board to bring forward anything concrete that will change the course of the history which he and his government has set for the people of Canada.

With respect to the answer which the minister gave us earlier, can he tell the House whether or not the required changes in the banking system have in fact been incorporated in the draft bill which is presently before this House? If the answer to this question is yes, as I suspect it will be, let the President of the Treasury Board explain why it is necessary to establish the cost factors that are involved in making payments to the chartered banks.

Mr. Johnston: Briefly, Mr. Chairman, I will verify the stage of the proposed amendments to permit that service to be carried forward to which I made reference, and I will report back to the hon. member.

Mr. Gamble: As I recall, Mr. Chairman, there was a direction from the Treasury Board which is dated, I believe, July 19, 1979, which penalized government departments for cost overruns. Is that program and that direction still in place?

Mr. Johnston: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is still in place.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, my comments and questions are directed to the Minister of Transport. I would like to speak very briefly and then ask some questions about the minister's plans for the Toronto international airport and some of the proposals which I have heard for its expansion in the near future. I would like to begin by referring to what I consider to be a good balance between the community and the airport. The balance is somewhat uneasy whenever aircraft change their flight patterns or come in slightly lower; then the community worries. Whenever rumours start that a fourth runway will be built, the community worries. Whenever rumours start that additional pressures and additional numbers of aircraft will be used, the community worries.

On the other hand, we enjoy having the service. Our riding receives 12,000 jobs directly and all the benefits which come with them from that airport. We certainly do not want to lose those jobs or the benefits. At this stage, however, I think that the people living in Mississauga, Peel and western Toronto need some additional assurances. We have heard that additional ground level facilities will be put in place. The general manager of the airport has spoken to a couple of our community groups and outlined the various proposals.

At the time the general manager stressed that these proposals are still in the discussion stage. They include facilities for a hangar for Wardair, a possible location of terminal three, which is a passenger facility, additional aircraft taxiways and additional cargo facilities. Some time ago a commitment was made to the residents of western Toronto and Peel that a fourth runway would not be added at Toronto International Airport. That commitment was taken very seriously by local planners. They allowed homes to be built near the airport in places where the noise and the fumes were not serious. They placed industry in other less suitable, less desirable areas.

The residents who purchased homes close to the airport do not now want to live under a fourth runway. Therefore, would the minister describe in detail the expansion plans that he knows of for Toronto airport, and could he give us some assurances that these plans will not add to the growth patterns for aircraft at that airport?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to answer the questions raised by the hon. member for South West Nova. She asked a great number of questions which will require some detailed answers.

The first series of questions had to do with CN Marine. Three contracts have been approved with regard to ferries. The first contract is Digby-Saint John, which will receive a subsidy of $3.772 million. The second contract is for Yarmouth-Bar Harbour, Maine. This is a summer service and the run which is made by the Bluenose. The level of subsidy is $2.362 million. The third contract is Yarmouth, Nova Scotia to Portland, Maine, which is a year-round freight carrier, and has a subsidy level of $4.542 million. Those are the figures for 1980, and they are at about the same level as the figures for the previous year. I understand that there is no major change.

The second point which the hon. member raised was with regard to the operations of VIA Rail in her area. Here we have a current subsidy for trains between Yarmouth and Halifax of $1.529 million. Apparently CTC decided last fall—there is no way that I can have all these facts in my mind; I need my officials to help me—to look at the service on an experimental basis. This is presently being done and it is being handled by VIA Rail. VIA Rail is going to report with a detailed analysis of the experiment soon. It is not yet available.

Now we come to the third question which concerns highway upgrading in Nova Scotia. As the hon. lady said, it is a program which was initiated in 1977-78. It is a shared-cost program on a fifty-fifty basis between the Government of Canada and the government of Nova Scotia, each government putting in $32 million for a three-year period. The government have still to pay to Nova Scotia $3.57 million in 1980-81 to meet the federal commitment. A number of projects come under this program but the bulk deals with highway 101.

On the subject of environmental safeguards which the hon. member raised, this is really left to the responsibility of the provinces. No environmental commitment was made in the agreement itself, although I understand that a report on alternative routes was prepared by the province. I understand that hearings and public meetings were held in the area and that the cabinet of Nova Scotia approved the northern route and so on. The idea is that the federal government provides the money and the provincial government takes care of the environment.

The fourth area of questioning had to do with a bus program which exists in Nova Scotia. The level of support is $4 million, and $2 million has already been committed. It is my understanding that this program was dropped by the previous administration. I think there was some justification for this. Coming back to what I said a moment ago—I am being totally non-partisan—there must be a limitation to the degree of involvement of the federal government at the local level. This is not a reflection on those who have used this program. I am delighted that they found it useful but it seems to me that this may not be the best use of public funds and of the federal government as an institution.

Be that as it may, it seems to have been dropped. I am going to try to find out if, for the purpose of being honourable, we could not find some unspent money in other programs to dedicate to this particular one so that at least we will end en beauté without having reneged on some good federal commitments. You see how accommodating I can be, Mr. Chairman.

There was also reference to the urban transportation assistance program as a general program. I have a few words of information on that. The Nova Scotia share of this UTA program is $8.287 million. There has been one large project funded under UTAP which is now under construction. It has to do with a maintenance facility for the Halifax-Dartmouth regional transit commission; total estimated cost is $7.1 million. The federal contribution is $5.6 million. There are five other projects on Nova Scotia's primary list and four projects on their secondary list which have been given approval in principle. All this is to say that Nova Scotia appears to be making good use of the urban transportation assistance program.

The big difficulty I have, as the hon. member for South West Nova is aware, is the simple fact that this program is not funded at a level needed to proceed with the amount of work that municipalities from Vancouver to Halifax would like to see. This is regrettable but there are, unfortunately, limitations.

The hon. member also mentioned something about small airports. I do not know if she had a particular airport in mind but I thought the question was fairly general. She asked what was spent on municipal airports in Nova Scotia. I find that in Nova Scotia, for Liverpool it is $57,600; Waterville, $56,000; Digby, $80,200; Trenton, $183,100; in Debert, $60,500.

The capital funding aspect of this program was shot down in August, 1978, but the operations aspect is still alive at the level of $10.7 million. This is to support the operations at small airports. However, the capital funding no longer exists.

Members of the House who have such projects will regret this but "to govern is to choose", and there are so many major expenditures in major airports for which the federal government has stronger responsibility and which need capitalization for equipment that the federal government had to slow down its involvement in municipal airports.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the minister for his answers on South West Nova. I wonder if we could come back now to the Toronto international airport. I was intrigued by the minister's comment that he has to take money away from small airports to spend on needed projects in big airports. I want to assure him that if he has to slow down expansion plans at Toronto international, then I and the residents in my area will help him do that.

I asked the minister whether the extension of ground facilities at Toronto international would lead to expanded use of the airport and greater numbers of aircraft landing and taking off at Toronto international.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if anybody would like to ask something else on transportation, I could collect the bits and pieces of paper necessary to give an answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I will add a couple more questions. If it is not possible for the minister to answer at the moment, I will be happy to wait until he is able to do so.

I am obviously concerned about the addition of the fourth runway at that airport. I should like to stress to the minister that a commitment was made, subdivisions and homes were built, local planners responded in trust to the federal commitment and home owners have purchased homes there in response. The addition of a fourth runway would be an intrusion on those subdivisions and in a sense would be a violation of trust with the home owners who accepted our commitment. It is the addition of the fourth runway that concerns me most.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Mississauga North has a very interesting theory, and I was delighted to hear it. It seems to be a new theory which relates the number of people living in a certain area to the number of passengers, at least the way I understood it. No? I will start again.

The straight answer is this. Extension plans are in response to normal growth of traffic only. So there is no great philosophy behind it. You have the traffic, you have the needs, they are assessed and then you build whatever needs to be built. Presumably some people would like to build for the needs at hand, for today's needs, while others who think in more sophisticated terms would like to build for what will be needed in years to come.

The Department of Transport has sometimes been accused of looking a bit too far into the future. But at the moment we cannot afford it anyway. So the first answer concerns the relationship between normal growth and capacity.

The second answer, which is the most important from the member's point of view, is that there is no study now under way concerning a fourth runway. That is one for the future. I do not know what will happen but some day when the Toronto area needs have to be met, needs which cannot be satisfied by Malton, perhaps something will be done. In the meantime, a number of studies are being done to find out how the traffic can be decongested at Malton and rerouted to other airports in the area. Some people have mentioned that Hamilton might take some of the traffic. This is the kind of thinking that appears to be going on now.

The third question asked what is being done about noise abatement. The first thing is the way a runway is oriented. That is to say, the way in which different runways are used at different times in relation to winds, the time of day and such factors. The second point, which I had already started to answer, is that there are special takeoff and departure techniques. I was given an illustration of that the other day. The third is installing a noise monitoring system. I hope this is sufficient information, but if not I will exchange correspondence with the member for Mississauga North of the type which we have already started on another subject.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Mr. Benjamin: My riding is Regina West now, Mr. Chairman. They took a lot of my farmers away from me but I am going to say something for them anyway.

I have a number of questions for the Minister of Transport and a couple of hours ago I sent a note over to him listing them. He has answered one of them.

The first three questions I would like to put to him are of a local nature, but their ramifications concern many places in the rest of Canada. First is the issue of rail line relocation. The minister knows that a few days ago my colleagues the hon. members for Winnipeg North and Winnipeg North Centre, and I believe one of the Conservatives from Winnipeg, raised the subject of rail line relocation of the CPR yards in Winnipeg. I hope that is being actively planned and prepared for. However, I hope the minister will also say that Winnipeg will have to wait in line. Regina has been waiting for four years. There have been four announcements from two different ministers of transport committing the federal government to the proper share of the cost of relocating railway yards in Regina. Phase one is the CNR yards in northwest Regina. Everything else is held up. Funds have not been allocated.

Is any of the amount of $8,816,000 as payment under the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act in the current estimates, to go to the rail line relocation for phase one in Regina?

My second question is this: Two years ago in February or March the then deputy minister of transport for air—I do not know if he is still there or not—gave me a time frame for either the expansion or the construction of a new airport terminal in Regina of three years. Two years have gone by and nothing has happened. We are managing to get another air conditioner in the old building, but that is all that has happened. Can the minister tell me where that matter stands, when something will happen and what is the new time frame?

The third question is one which the minister and I have had correspondence and discussions about, and I know he has had exchanges with many others as well. It concerns multi-modal downtown transportation centres and the use of present CN or CP railway stations and the station property that is adjacent to those rail lines to be used as combination rail and bus terminals, airline ticket offices, city transit stops and so forth. VIA Rail has probably looked at two dozen communities from Moncton, New Brunswick right through to the Pacific ocean where this could and should be done.

In the case of Regina, this is a matter of extreme urgency. If the plan is going to proceed, Regina will have to be the first one served because the Saskatchewan transportation company, the main bus company that wants to move into a multi-modal station with VIA Rail, has been waiting three years. There has been a three-year delay in building a new bus terminal in order to be able to co-operate and join in with this one at the CPR Union Station in Regina.

Negotiations have been going on between VIA Rail and Canadian Pacific for something like 15 or 18 months. Canadian Pacific has been stalling. I am informed now that Canadian Pacific tells VIA Rail that it will only sell at book value that portion of the railway station that was used for rail passenger service at the time of the inception of VIA Rail. That is a little ticket counter, the baggage room and the walkway to the railway tracks. That is what will be let go at book value. Canadian Pacific will not let the rest go except at commercial value.

Canadian Pacific is trying to hold up VIA Rail and the travelling public in Canada to ransom again. The land on which those mainline railway stations are located was acquired for nothing. The buildings have paid for themselves two or three times over. The one in Regina was built in 1912. It is a beautiful marble building but it needs refurbishing.

There is a refusal by Canadian Pacific to co-operate on a necessary and worth-while project in many Canadian cities about which, by the way, all parties agree something should be done, including city councils, bus companies, provincial governments, chambers of commerce and labour councils. There is agreement across the board that something should be done. It is now a case that the minister and the government have to tell the CPR that it is not running this country. Will the minister now consider requesting CTC to issue an order to Canadian Pacific to turn that property over to VIA Rail at book value?

If the minister will answer those three questions briefly, I have three more for him.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will try the three of them. The first one with respect to relocation is not a new one. There seems to be a running debate as to who got there first, whether it was Winnipeg, Regina or somebody else.

Mr. Benjamin: It was Regina.

Mr. Pepin: I will agree with that until someone else from Winnipeg disagrees.

Mr. Knowles: We have needed it for 25 years.

Mr. Pepin: But a number of promises or commitments—and I do not know how to describe them—were made. If my memory serves me well, the one at Regina was at the level of $16 million.

We had a conversation the other day with ministers in charge of these matters, including Mr. Smishek in Regina. I explained the difficulty that I had under the UTAP program. We suggested that he uses the UTAP program in phase one of the relocation of CN lines, and we hope that more money will be found later on when we have UTAP 2, or son of UTAP. Anyway, it was an interesting exchange of views.

● (1640)

I want to praise the government of Saskatchewan because they are trying hard to accommodate us in the same way as we try to accommodate them. My understanding is that the provincial government now has a proposal. We have to be able to reach a conclusion on that subject. I cannot be more specific today. We are trying to distribute the expenditures in such a way as to accommodate both governments.

With regard to the multi-modal transportation centre in Regina, unfortunately I do not have anything of major value to announce. Like my hon. friend, I understand that conversations are going on. I hope that CP reads me. I was hoping that some agreement would be reached relatively rapidly, but I am told that it has not yet, the approach being different. CP is hesitant to let go of the property of the whole of the station. It is willing to accommodate, but only with a section of it.

I just received a note that I will read. It is not from the other place! "The rail passenger program provides for the transfer of stations from CN and CP to VIA." This was a discussion between CP and VIA which all members understand. "Basic principles are at net book value."

[Translation]

Well, well, that's interesting.

[English]

"These matters are still being negotiated"—I have said that already—"and I hope that a satisfactory settlement will be reached". I said that too. "If not, we will look at other means." I was thinking about that. "The Regina multi-modal project is strongly supported." The hon. member for Regina West said that very well indeed. There will be more discussion on this project, interest in which is shared by a great number of people, including the present speaker. We will do whatever we can to help.

An hon. Member: You have about two weeks left.

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget Winnipeg.

Mr. Pepin: I said during question period that the president of CP Rail was coming to see me again on May 29.

Mr. Benjamin: Take your gun out next time.

Mr. Pepin: I will give him a candy bar! On Regina airport, on June 13, 1978, the Minister of Transport and Saskatchewan minister of municipal affairs announced acceptance of the recommendation of the Regina airport study. The study recommended extension of the air terminal building, land acquisition and development of the runway and a taxiway complex. The current status is this.

Action is now under way to incorporate the major changes recommended by the study into a detailed master plan for the development of the airport and this master plan is anticipated to be complete by August 1980. Meanwhile, concepts for the extension of the air terminal building have been prepared and reviewed by the airlines and the province and the required program approval documents are now being prepared. Design completion is scheduled for 1981-82, provided the necessary approvals are obtained. Construction would commence in 1982-83, with completion of the facility expected in 1984-85.

Mr. Benjamin: One quick point, Mr. Chairman. The minister referred to the use of UTAP for the rail line relocation. We must remember that the Saskatchewan allocation for UTAP is $8 million for the entire province. It would hardly be fair for the provincial government to use all of that in one place, leaving out other places in the province that require funds under UTAP.

Can the minister tell us if there has been a quick decision in the last few days or if there will be in the next few days to implement the Hall report recommendations pertaining to the Crowsnest rate and the compensatory rates, because this ties in with the whole matter of rail line rehabilitation, the upgrading of rail lines generally and obtaining more railway equipment.

According to the wire story I have, Canadian Pacific says that the three hundred and some million dollar construction project in the Rocky Mountains will remain frozen until Ottawa agrees to revise the freight rates on grain shipments. The CP vice-president went on to say that the company would not finance the project without assurances it would not have to continue suffering heavy losses on its grain shipments. If the government would implement the Hall commission recommendation on the Crow rate, that matter would be solved right then and there.

The point is that CP has again acted as though it and not the government is running the country, blackmailing the people of this country, holding us up to ransom. They have a record over the past number of years of refusing to buy railway cars, not just for grain but for other commodities. The hon. member for Medicine Hat can talk about the 50 per cent shortage of stock cars.

CP refused to rehabilitate railway cars until a previous minister of transport had to make them get involved. They refused to properly maintain their rail lines and railway equipment and to provide year round service on branch lines.

Their profits last year were something in the order of $258 million. In addition, they received another $200 million in deferred corporate taxes last year. They now owe the people of Canada almost a billion dollars in deferred corporate taxes and they will not fix their tracks. Is the minister going to allow Canadian Pacific to operate in that manner? Is he going to enforce section 262 of the Railway Act, which states that the railways shall provide suitable accommodation for all traffic offered? That means tracks, roadbeds, equipment and everything else.

The Crow rate issue hinges on this. If the government would implement Mr. Justice Hall's recommendation, there would not be a new expenditure by the government. They could quit paying branch line subsidies and paying for rehabilitation of rail lines and other subsidies. Almost all of it that would go into the difference between paying the Crow rate and the compensatory rate would be money that has already been spent on other things. Then we could make the railways perform, make them fix the tracks and buy equipment.

I would appreciate if the minister could give us a breakdown of what rail lines and branch lines on the prairies will be rehabilitated this year, CP and CN, for $71,350,000.

My final question is on the matter of the awarding of the air route from Toronto to Halifax to CP Air. Many members have received representations from a lot of groups and individuals in Nova Scotia protesting that, asking that the government reverse its decision and give it to Eastern Provincial Airways. I recall a previous minister of transport, Mr. Marchand, announcing the division of air routes. I described him as a fifteenth century pope dividing the world between Portugal and Spain. He was dividing the world between CP and Air Canada.

CP does not need this route. This award would be harmful to Eastern Provincial Airways, jeopardizing some of the local routes Eastern Provincial Airways operates at a loss, cross-subsidizing from routes that are profitable. Will the minister advise whether the government will agree to reverse the decision of the board and award the Halifax to Toronto route to Eastern Provincial Airways?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member referred to three subjects. The first is the statutory grain rates, the Crowsnest rates. I do not want to engage in the debate the hon. member raises on the role of CP in Canadian history. There is no way I am going to try and change his views this afternoon. I will repeat what I think I have already said about the Crow rates.

● (1650)

I am intrigued by the whole debate on Crow rates at this moment. I meet a number of people who say: Don't touch it; everything is all right as it is. I have got it from very highly placed authority that I shouldn't "mess with it". Then I get it from another side that since the Snavely report western farmers have realized that there is a problem—that the railways have been losing so many hundreds of millions of dollars a year because of the Crow rate of half a cent per ton mile. The figure of $173 million in 1979 is one which is sometimes used. Consequently people holding this view say something has to be done.

An hon. Member: Mr. Justice Hall has told you what it is.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Justice Hall has given his views on the subject. Others have expressed views which are slightly different from his. I am told by some people to stay away and by others to come in. I think I will not resist the second invitation because it seems there is something abnormal about the way the railway system operates when it comes to grain; there must be a better way of doing it than the present one. That is generally recognized.

What is also generally recognized is that the farmers of western Canada have a right in the Crow rate, and that right must be respected. So everyone is looking for the correct formula, one which would both respect the right and permit better operation of the railway system. And that is what we are going to try to find out. A great number of people have tried to find this formula—I know I am not the first but I hope to follow them along that line.

On the subject of the situation at Eastern Provincial Airways, the situation is that an appeal has been made to me as Minister of Transport by both EPA and Air Canada under section 25 of the Transportation Act. Under that section I am supposed to allow intervenors to make representations, so we shall, of course, permit that to happen. Canadian Pacific is due to implement the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission early in July, so the objective would, of course, be for the minister to come to a decision either accepting the ruling of the commission or rejecting it before then. I should not talk about it further because it is somewhat sub judice.

The third question had to do with the prairie rail rehabilitation program, if I remember correctly. To give me a few moments for reflection before I answer it, perhaps the hon. member would like to continue his remarks.

Mr. Mazankowski: I was intrigued by the response the minister made to the hon. member from Regina. In connection with the Crowsnest freight rates, could I ask the minister whether it is his intention to refer this matter to a commission or to a committee of inquiry? Rumour has it that this is one of the options the government is considering. Is this a course which is actively being considered?

Mr. Pepin: To answer that question by my distinguished predecessor, let me say I really do not know what would be the best strategy, the best approach to take. Some people suggest the kind of commission to which he has referred. They even suggest names of people who might be asked to head it. Others look in the direction of something less formal, something of the type of commission I myself was connected with, the national unity group, though, possibly, less flambuoyant—a group of wise men, the "wise men" approach. And women. Wise persons. Oh, my God!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: It takes a little time. Such a body would be less formal and its job would be to listen to views, massage them and help formulate them. I must say I am attracted to that approach and I would like to know the views of the hon. member for Vegreville if he cares to teach us a bit.

Mr. Mazankowksi: I suppose I could express a view or make a comment on that subject but there are a number of other questions I wish to pose at this time. I gather from the minister's answer that he is in fact considering some kind of mechanism to review the whole subject of the Crowsnest Pass rates. Could I have a simple yes or no to that question? I see the minister responding in the affirmative.

I should like to ask another question. It involves an area of general policy or general philosophy. I note that this reference emerged when there was some uncertainty expressed about whether the Prince Rupert project was going ahead or not. In the context of that discussion the cliché "user-pay" came up. Can I ask the minister this. Does he intend to go back to the user-pay concept of a former minister of transport—the Otto Lang user-pay concept?

Also, can he tell the House whether he has given any consideration to the application of this policy with respect to the marine sector, the coastguard? What is the over-all view of the government on cost recovery with respect to the St. Lawrence Seaway? I suppose the subject extends beyond that to the area of air administration, the operation, maintenance and provision of infrastructure in connection with airports. Is the minister considering at the present time any substantial increases in user fees and landing fees in connection with airports specifically, and can he tell the committee what position he will be taking with respect to the application of the user-pay philosophy as it relates to cost recovery in the marine sector?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if I had wanted to be a philosopher I know what I would have done: I would have stayed in university.

Mr. Stevens: Good idea! When will you go back? You will do less harm.

Mr. Pepin: Are you serious about that? I am just trying to understand the impact of that interruption. I do not think it is funny, that's all. If the hon. member has a joke to make, he should make it on himself.

• (1700)

Coming back to the serious subject of user-pay, I was saying that I did not want to be committed firmly in favour of it or of the other. I think one cannot be. There are different circumstances which need different treatment.

With respect to Prince Rupert, I came in with an inherited situation. One of my predecessors twice removed appeared to want to implement a cost recovery approach. My predecessor once removed had given the impression that he did not want to do that but wanted the whole thing to be given a grant. That is the impression he gave, at least in western Canada. Having looked at it, having looked at the viability of this terminal and having looked also at the precedents elsewhere in matters of grain and other commodities, it seemed to me that there was room for give and take. It seemed to me that this project, Ridley Island, being a viable one—otherwise people would not go into it—deserved to be supported by way of a grant, and the amount of money involved is $22 million. However, at the same time it seemed to me the consortium could pay back by way of cost recovery the price of the wharf.

This has been done. I must say that the consortium was not too surprised when I took that approach. Maybe they expected it.

Mr. Mazankowski: It was part of the agreement.

Mr. Pepin: It was part of the agreement. I am delighted to hear it now. I am very pleased to hear it, as a matter of fact, because in many places on the west coast I am considered to be—I will not use the word—

Mr. Orlikow: It's true. Use it.

Mr. Pepin: —because I was not as generous as my immediate predecessor was. We are told now that he would have done the same thing I did, so why should I be seen as unsympathetic to western Canada because of the Prince Rupert case when my immediate predecessor has just said or appeared to be saying that he would have done the same thing I have done?

Mr. Blenkarn: You should have gone out there and said you were going to do the same thing in the first place.

Mr. Pepin: Well, I did not know.

Mr. Blenkarn: You could have talked to him.

Mr. Pepin: This was not common knowledge, and that is rather important.

Mr. Blenkarn: You should have talked about it.

Mr. Pepin: That is rather important.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I might entertain the conversation later, but right now the hon. member for Vegreville is questioning the minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wish the minister would get around to responding to my questions direct. He has gone into a long discussion of Prince Rupert. My question did not pertain to Prince Rupert; it only arose as an example. Quite frankly, the fact is, as the minister has now indicated, that the memorandum of understanding and the press release are consistent with the agreement which has now been put in place, and I am glad that the minister has now reviewed it to the extent he has and understands it.

While the minister is responding to the question of cost recovery with respect to the coast guard and as to whether he is planning an increase in landing fees and user charges with respect to airports or an increase in an airport transportation tax, I might also ask the minister to comment on what his plans are with respect to the future of the grain transportation co-ordinator. Is the minister planning any changes with respect to the terms of reference? Is he planning to bring in legislation? Can he give the House the assurance that the present grain transportation co-ordinator, Dr. Horner, will remain in that position?

If the minister answers those questions, I might have some more questions to pose to him.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I am doing my very best to go at this very rapidly. I was trying to say that, to me, cost recovery or user-pay is not a point of philosophy. It is a practical thing, and each case must be assessed on its own merit. Is that clear? So, when it comes to the seaway, we have now implemented the third tolls increase on the seaway, and these lead to full cost recovery. When it comes to air fees, there will be a discussion with the companies in order to come to conclusions on that.

On the marine side it is more complex. It is more difficult to take a cost recovery approach, so again it will depend on circumstances and on the ability of the clients to pay back. However, as a general proposition I think that the idea is to try to recover as much as the circumstances permit. Why? Simply because with the money recovered great new things can be done. In view of the limitations of the Queen's purse, whenever we can get money from services duly rendered, I think it should be encouraged; but again I do not want to be tied to a philosophical approach to that, each case having specific circumstances.

On the subject of Dr. Horner, the grain co-ordinator, I have met with him a couple of times. We got along fine, and I approve 100 per cent the purpose at hand. The discussion was as to whether he needs more powers, whether his activities should be structured and incorporated in laws, and matters of that kind. I think we agreed that it is too early to say and that he will move seriatim, progressively, to find out what he needs as far as powers are concerned. If the powers that the minister can delegate to him are sufficient, so much the better, but we have decided to take a very practical and down-to-earth approach to that. Is that sufficient as an answer?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, another question which was included in that series was whether the minister could assure the House that Dr. Horner would continue as the grain transportation co-ordinator inasmuch as he is on a contract basis which expires annually.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, he will continue. He expressed to me his willingness—his eagerness, I was going to say—to do so, so there is no question at least in my mind, that Dr. Horner is there to stay.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister will know, I am sure, that last year in November a very successful event took place at the Port of Churchill, the sailing of the MV Arctic into the Port of Churchill about two or three weeks after the season had closed. It was the intention of our government to attempt to repeat that voyage prior to the opening of the normal season at the port of Churchill and, hopefully, arrange for a similar voyage in late June or early July. Is that something which is currently under active consideration, and can the minister give us any indication as to what plans are in effect?

Mr. Pepin: The answer is a simple yes, Mr. Chairman, the ship will go to Churchill again this year.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister give us more details? I understand from his answer that plans are under way. Can the minister give us an approximate sailing date? Can he give us some idea whether we have a cargo? I think these plans are important as an indication of whether in fact that voyage will take place.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, the answer is in June, but I cannot be more specific than that. As my hon. friend is aware, there are some protests coming from rivals of the MV Arctic re the transportation of goods in the area. It seems that these protests will be accommodated and that there will be work for everybody. Consequently, the MV Arctic will not be competing unfairly against other carriers in the area.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, can the minister indicate whether in fact there is a cargo secured, which would have to be done under the auspices of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Pepin: I understand that it is being actively worked on.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister give us some outline as to his position or that of the government with respect to the gradual development of a deep sea fleet, a merchant marine? As he knows and I am sure would recognize, a fair amount of preliminary work has been undertaken by the previous government with respect to considering various ways and means and incentives toward the gradual redevelopment of a deep sea fleet for Canada. I think the minister knows the importance of that in economic terms and in terms of opportunities for Canada. Can he give us some indication that he will pursue, in a vigorous manner, the course of development of a deep sea fleet for Canada?

• (1710)

Mr. Pepin: Yes, I will do so as rapidly as I can. I am working now, with a lot of advice from others, on a speech which I will be giving to the national marine conference ten days from now. Of course, I have discussed this subject quite extensively with officers in my department. I think I share the view of my predecessor on the gist of the case they are making.

Until now Canada, which is a major trading company in the world, has relied on the market place to do the job of deep sea transportation. I presume this was the right policy to follow because there was competition and presumably we were benefiting from it. Not being forced to use our own ships, we could make sales in countries which had a deep sea fleet of their own and wanted to use it to carry our exports. So perhaps that was an advantage for a period of time, but I think my friend will agree that things have changed very much since then. We have seen in deep sea fishing the same kind of evolution that has taken place in general trading, that is that trade is still generally free but tends to be monopolized by governments, by groups of countries and by groups of people—the "collectivization of international trade", if I can put it this way. The same thing is happening in deep sea fishing.

The eastern European countries, the Soviet Union, have taken a very important position. Also, the developing countries in the world have staked their ground through UNCTAD and are working it out in their own best interests. The United States, because of its power in these areas, can manage to walk both sides of that street. As I understand it my hon. friend is telling me that Canada should make a major decision in these matters.

I would like to say that having seen these changes taking place on the trading side as minister of industry, trade and commerce ten years ago, I am in a good position now to see similar changes taking place in the area of deep sea shipping.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I am encouraged by the minister's response. I hope that in the course of his deliberations he will consult extensively with industry, and I am sure he will, because I think there is valued input that can be gained from that sector. I think it is very important, in taking such a quantum leap forward, for industry to be involved.

I should like to ask another question of the minister, Mr. Chairman. Can he indicate whether it is his intention to follow along the course which our government took in the establishment of a seaway advisory board or the seaway advisory council which could very well be the forerunner to a board of directors? With regard to air transportation, can the minister bring us up to date with respect to the matter of air access to western Canada by British and other European carriers, particularly Lufthansa? Clearly westerners are demanding that additional service. Clearly the British want access, and so does Lufthansa Airlines. In many respects westerners feel they are being treated as second-class citizens. The traffic is increasing substantially and there is tremendous potential in generating additional tourist traffic.

Furthermore, it is fair to say that there is a fair amount of traffic being diverted to the United States as a result of that freedom of choice. When the minister gets to Calgary and probably meets with a very effective and efficient transportation authority in that city, he will find that a lot of business is going south of the border, which is not doing us much good. I hope that the minister will accelerate the bilaterals in that regard and will work toward opening up that access, because I think it is important for western Canada. It is clearly very important from the standpoint of the over-all Canadian economy, particularly as it relates to our tourist trade.

Mr. Pepin: First, with regard to the seaway, I must say that when I looked at the project which was left on my desk for the creation of a seaway board and possibly of a seaway advisory council which might lead to the creation of a board, I was extremely attracted to the idea. Although it will present difficulties when it becomes a board because, after all, some of its potential members will be interested parties and would have a vested interest in the operation of a seaway, I have come to agree, despite my uncertainty, to proceed through the advisory council. Since then I have had meetings with people from the industry and somewhat to my regret I have found that it might not be what they are looking for. They are looking for a direct nose to nose, belly button to belly button contact with the seaway authorities so that they can really get to know what the planning is, and so on. This is not exactly in the nature of a traditional advisory council. So I am uncertain about the idea but I am considering it.

With regard to the international air negotiations, the hon. member mentioned their importance of which I am very much aware. They are important to Canada, they are important to western Canada, they are important to Canada's national carrier and to a great number of people. So I am assigning the importance to it which it deserves to have.

Frankly, I did not think feelings in western Canada are as strong about this as my hon. friend is making them out to be. I did not have that impression. My impression was that governments and people in the three western provinces were quite willing to accept the fact that negotiations would be very difficult and that a great number of things had to be balanced, such as the interest of regional carriers, the interest of the national carriers, the concessions made in the past and the advantages to be gained in the future.

When I went to the western provinces, my impression was that people were quite willing to accept the proposition that the matter was very complex and that it needed much attention and a lot of hard bargaining. In any case, the negotiations are proceeding. Negotiations with the United Kingdom did not start off too well, and that is admitted, but I understand that difficulties have been patched up and a normal type of meeting will take place very soon, if it is not in progress now, and the others are waiting.

I realize my predecessor knows these things, but I thought I would put them on the record, at the same time, just so that other members will be aware of them.

• (1720)

The discussion in these matters goes through three phases. First, there is the conversation between the companies, between the air carriers; second, the regulators come in; and the governments come in at the end. Two main areas of Canada are now being debated from the point of view of international transporters; that is, western Canada and the Toronto area. Entry to these areas is very important to them in economic terms. We are approaching it in a very realistic, down-to-earth manner—let us see the colour of your money and we will show you the colour of ours. It is negotiation. Canadians should not be troubled unnecessarily if there is a bit of flak in these negotiations, because that is the normal pattern.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to be able to contribute a few words to this particular debate. It interests me, in this kind of session where we have the ministers in front of us, that we spend the first day trying to give the President of the Treasury Board a hard time on government spending, and then we spend the next day, each with our own particular plans on how we can spend some more money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I say that in defence of the President of the Treasury Board, but I must say that he needs very, very little defence. I think he handles himself extremely well. However, I think this is as it should be. Certainly I will be talking a little bit about how we can spend money in Thunder Bay very profitably, to the advantage of the country.

I should like to address the minister on the whole subject of grain movement and particularly as it affects the port or harbour of Thunder Bay. Last summer there was one large article in the Toronto Star and an editorial in The Globe and Mail within a couple of weeks of each other. Both of them talked about grain movement and the difficulties we were having with grain movement in the country. They were long articles, long editorials and so on. They described the port of Churchill, the port of Prince Rupert, Vancouver, and the difficulties being encountered there. It was interesting that in both the editorial and the article there was not one single mention of the port of Thunder Bay, yet two-thirds of all of the grain moved through this country is moved through the port of Thunder Bay. It is just incredible that this happens.

One of the reasons it happens is because it is a very efficient port. There have virtually been no labour problems, no strikes, nothing like that, so things go on. People just forget about it; it has to be a port in trouble or something like that to get that kind of attention. I am using this time to bring that to the attention of the minister, because I think it is important to realize that at this particular point Thunder Bay is moving about two-thirds of all the grain moved through the country. It varies from second to third as the largest bulk-handling port in Canada. It is an extremely important centre, especially in terms of grain movement.

To give an example, we have calculated that in four days through Thunder Bay we can move the same amount of grain as can be moved in the whole season out of Churchill. This is not to put Churchill down but it does focus a little bit on how this grain is actually moved and on the port that does most of it. Also we have been told by senior officials of the CPR that if it was not for the Crowsnest rates—in other words, if grain movement was handled on a cost basis—it would be considerably cheaper to move grain from each of the prairie provinces, through Thunder Bay, by ships around to the Panama canal and to Asia, than it would be to move it across the Rockies. I think this is significant information which the minister must use when he is calculating how one moves grain efficiently.

Some time ago I was involved, as many other members have been, in a railway relocation project. We were involved back in 1972, 1973 and 1974 when we were trying to get this act together so that we could have relocation in lieu of overpasses. I have stuck with this for a considerable number of years. A small study was done, financed by the last Liberal government. This rail relocation study was rather interesting so far as the city of Thunder Bay was concerned. The interesting thing was that we came to the conclusion the problem could be much better solved by looking at grain movement in the community. When we did that, we found it was not as efficient as it should be, particularly the rail side of it.

As I say, the study was based on a proposal for rail relocation, and in the study we found that really what we had to do was amalgamate the two railways, set up new yards, get rid of a diamond which was creating some serious problems, and this would achieve a great deal more efficient grain movement to Thunder Bay. I present this study to the minister not as a scheme for rail relocation, even though that is how it started, but rather as a move whereby we can improve the movement of grain in this country.

I am not asking the minister today to say what they have decided, where it stands and so on. I think that is something which must be looked at over a long period of time. But I am asking him to take a look at that $30 million to $35 million, to put that with the $700 million or $800 million for hopper cars over the next ten years, to put it with the money for double tracking, for additional sidings and all kinds of things that will be required, and say, "Look, this one fits and it is one of those things which will give us good value for our dollar". Only in that respect should it be considered.

In conclusion, I should like to make one other comment. One of the difficulties we face in this country is the kind of division we have between the east and central Canada. I should like to make a very strong plea in this House of Commons to the people of Canada to recognize the port of Thunder Bay as being basically a western port. It is the port with the access to the west. I think a good deal can be done to achieve that result. I am not in any way downgrading ports like Prince Rupert, Vancouver or Churchill, but I would hope that we can establish the fact that indeed Thunder Bay is a western port.

I have asked my community to take a look at themselves to see in what way we can begin to look at the west. I would ask the minister if he would please consider the following small proposition which I think is worth while looking at. We have a Harbour Commission which is not part of the harbours board, it is a separate entity. I would very much like to see the commission enlarged so that the western provinces felt they had a position on that Harbour Commission board.

There are several possibilities in that respect. I might suggest that each of the western prairie provinces appoint or have in some way appointed a member to the board so that we can become in truth a western port. Having lived very close to the west, I can understand the feelings that westerners have when they feel isolated and that central Canada is too powerful. I am saying to them that we in Thunder Bay have that same feeling very much in the province of Ontario with respect to Toronto. We feel very much that this big city in this "Golden Horseshoe" overpowers us. In very many ways, we must look to the west and look upon ourselves as a western port. I hope that westerners will do the same.

I close by asking the minister if he would seriously consider the responsibility of enlarging our Harbour Commission and working in very many ways so that the people of the west will see Thunder Bay as their harbour and so that we in Thunder Bay will look to the west as a source of our wealth. This will bring us much closer together.

Mr. Chénier: Mr. Chairman, Timmins-Chapleau over the past few years has become one of the important airports of northern Ontario with regard to passenger traffic. The area is served by Air Canada, NorOnt Air and Austin Airways. Austin Airways is the largest third level carrier in Canada, and its planes fly to the Arctic. It averages between 12 and 40 movements per day.

At the present time we rely on the Vassis system for landing aid. Over the past two years the government has invested money in the preliminary work for an instrument landing system at the Timmins airport. In the fiscal year 1979-80 land was purchased for the beacons at the three-mile site and the seven-mile site. It would appear that the ILS would be completed by 1981-82.

Also, because of the large amount of air traffic at that airport, it has been suggested to the minister that new taxi ways be built on the longer of the two runways. Because of the large number of passengers coming and going at that airport, the parking facilities at this time are very inadequate. Most of the passengers at the Timmins airport are coming or going north, and having flown those long distances there seems to be a shortage of space in the waiting room and restaurant. These were part of the projections made by the Ministry of Transport. Would the minister comment on the projections for the Timmins airport in the next two or three years?

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct my questions to the President of the Treasury Board. I was curious about the minister's statement which he made last night, that he was in full accord with the concept of putting forward the expenditure projections for the next four or five years. Yet he was not prepared to produce those estimates for the projections to this House. I am curious to know why, if he is in favour of that concept, he declines to provide that information to the House of Commons.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I think that I made it clear in other statements that I favour long-term financial planning, which requires long-term financial projections. That is what the Lambert commission recommended. I simply said that I supported that recommendation.

Mr. Thomson: That was not my question. My question is simply this: is the President of the Treasury Board in favour of presenting those estimates and, if he is, will he present them? What reason does he have for not presenting them in the House?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, we are still in the same Committee of the Whole as we were last night. It seems to me that I answered that question completely. The question which was put to me asked whether I was in favour of long-term financial projections. The hon. member knows, as does the hon. member for York-Peel who is here with us, that the expenditure management system is dependent upon multiple year planning. It can operate in no other way. It seems to me that that has nothing to do with the issue as to whether I should be tabling expenditures or forecasts of any kind.

We are here to discuss the 1980-81 estimates. I was pleased to see that the hon. member for Vegreville at least was prepared to address some serious questions to my colleague, the Minister of Finance. It is now going into the second day and I have had officials here ready to respond to any serious questions with respect to the appropriation act in front of us, and I have yet to receive one question. I have been asked about issues, some of which should be properly addressed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I do not see what multiple year planning has to do with the concept and failing to produce projections in the House, if indeed the minister is in favour of that concept.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, if I may go back to yesterday's discussion, the hon. member for York-Peel asked whether I believed in the four-year or five-year forecasting program which has been suggested in such reports as the Lambert report. In reply to that question I said that I believe in four year or five-year programs. With regard to the question about tabling, I said that I was not prepared to table any such reports during the hearings before this committee.

Mr. Stevens: Why not?

Mr. Johnston: Because I am not prepared to table them. That is my right.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, is the President of the Treasury Board responsible for expenditures, or is he not? If he is, why can he not table those projections in this House, or does he not have them?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a dialogue of the deaf, the deaf being the hon. members on the other side. This same question was put to me last night. I answered by saying that I favour multiple-year projections. I indicated again today that multiple-year projections are necessary for an expenditure management system.

When asked if I was prepared to table any such projections, I said that I was not prepared to table them at this time. I am not giving any commitment with respect to the tabling of those projections, because, as I pointed out, the fiscal plan is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for York-Peel has made much of the fact that the former minister of finance—which he thought he then was, but it was the hon. member for St. John's West—came forward with some projections last December. I do not recall those projections being tabled by the then president of the treasury board. I may be wrong, and I stand to be corrected.

Mr. Stevens: There was a press release on January 22.

Mr. Johnston: My recollection is that these projections were tabled by the then minister of finance who was responsible for projections of that kind.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, does the President of the Treasury Board consider himself to be responsible for all government spending or does he not?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, it appears that the hon. member is not aware of the expenditure management system developed by the hon. Bob Andras when he was president of the treasury board. It was adopted by the previous government, the Conservative administration. The purpose of the expenditure management system is to place policy committees in a position to determine their priorities. The purpose of Treasury Board in those circumstances is to be the over-all manager of those envelopes. Treasury Board's role will hopefully change from what it has been in the past. Over-all management and responsibility for those envelopes, the monitoring of those expenditures, and the approval of the operational and strategic plans that come forward, are the responsibility of Treasury Board.

● (1740)

Perhaps the hon. member is not fully familiar with the expenditure system, although I am sure the hon. member for York Peel is. Under the new expenditure management system the intention is to place responsibility from the top down, by putting responsibility for savings in the same envelope as the responsibility for spending. Responsibility for control and ordering priorities, cutting programs and substituting programs, should, under an expenditure management system, properly operated, be within the jurisdiction of the ministers who form part of the policy committee dealing with that envelope.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the other hon. members of the House gained anything from that statement. I asked a very simple question: is the minister responsible for spending or is he not? It requires only a "yes" or "no" answer. I do not want to hear about envelopes. Is it the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board to put a certain sum of money in the envelope and then that is all that particular minister has to spend, or is it the responsibility of some other official in the government?

Mr. Stevens: He is just a token.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly clear—

Mr. Blenkarn: Be careful now.

Mr. Johnston: I require no protection as the hon. member has suggested. He requires protection from himself, Mr. Chairman. He is his own worst enemy. I would appreciate it if he refrained from any comments until he has an opportunity to question me further at eight o'clock this evening.

The expenditure plan of a government, the fiscal plan of a government, is prepared by the Minister of Finance in consultation with the President of the Treasury Board, myself.

Mr. Thomson: I take from that, Mr Chairman, that the Treasury Board is no more than a bookkeeper for all the spending that takes place in the government. In effect there is no accountability in Treasury Board for money spent; they simply account for those moneys with no control over them.

Let me go on to another matter. The Auditor General has stated that the estimates in their present form are confusing and uninformative. I am sure the minister, if he has been exposed, as many of us have been, to the form of the estimates presented to members of the House, will concur. The Auditor General has made specific recommendations with respect to the form of the estimates so that they will be presented in an intelligible form to members. We are not all accountants or bookkeepers. I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board could tell the House specifically when he intends to produce, for members of the House, the estimates in a form as recommended by the Auditor General.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will be pleased to know that the new form of the estimates, absolutely essential to an adequate information system for members of the House, for the media, and for the public at large, is, I hope, now under way. The new form was recommended in a report from the public accounts committee, I believe in March, 1979. There were delays; there was an election, as hon. members will recall, in May, 1979, and it may not have been as major a priority item as it is in my mind—I should start that sentence again so there is no confusion about it. It is a major priority item with us; it may not have been with my predecessor.

In any event, the Comptroller General now has assumed responsibility for this program. I understand that we will be producing pilot projects for examination by members in, say, five specific departments, late this year. These pilot projects will give members an opportunity to assess their value. I am sure they will be pleased with the result.

I understand that in the 1981-82 year we will be presenting the same five or a number of parallel estimates showing those departments but based upon, as I recall, the prior year. In other words, they will be there in a form which will permit hon. members to make a comparison, to evaluate, and, if you like, understand the difference between the existing estimates and the new form of estimates which we hope to introduce. This has been put on a timetable. It is being monitored by my office and I shall do my best to ensure that the schedule I have indicated today is adhered to.

Mr. Stevens: It was our schedule.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to hear, after many years of recommendations by the Auditor General that the estimates be presented in a readable and informative manner, that we are finally to see this.

The Auditor General also made another recommendation, that the actual expenditures be presented, as against the detailed estimates. As the President of the Treasury Board is well aware, we have here the book of estimates for the year ending March 31, 1979, and also what we actually spent for the year. The object of the Auditor General's recommendation is to match these two, so that members of Parliament will know where there is deviation, where we have overspent, and where we have underspent, and so that we can have an intelligent approach to examining the money actually spent and the estimates for the ensuing year. Could the President of the Treasury Board please tell me when he expects to have that comparative information available?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the project with respect to the public accounts and with respect to the same pilot project is proceeding in parallel so that there will be public accounts available for examination by comparison with the new form of estimates, following the 1981-82 year. Members of the House will be able to do as the hon. member suggests, that is, make a direct comparison between the new form of the estimates and the new form of the public accounts designed to reflect the spending done pursuant to those estimates.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, one of the most important proposals that the Auditor General put forth was the hiring of a comptroller general. At the same time he recommended that departmental financial comptrollers be hired and placed in each department. The Auditor General said recently that the Comptroller General had completed his IMPAC program but the program could not proceed because there were no financial comptrollers in the individual departments to implement it.

Could the President of the Treasury Board address himself to that matter?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the office of the Comptroller General will be producing the departmental comptroller projects this year. There is no doubt that the office of the Comptroller General, which reports to me, and I, as President of the Treasury Board, are committed to proceeding with the implementation of this part of the program which is so necessary to establish proper financial controls in the various departments.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the President of the Treasury Board understood my question. We need the departmental financial comptrollers in place before the program can be implemented. Are these men in place, or when will they be in place to implement the program?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I did understand the question. I think the issue is twofold. First, of course, is the question of finding proper and capable people to fill the role of departmental comptroller in these various departments. That in itself is a challenge. Second, of course, it is a matter of establishing and signing off action plans pursuant to all the various IMPAC studies, which are currently proceeding.

● (1750)

A departmental comptroller is a financial officer with a greater breadth of experience and discipline in certain areas than is readily available in many of the departments at the present time. The office of the Comptroller General is addressing itself to that problem, which is in part a manpower problem. We will probably be looking at it also through such programs as executive interchange and other techniques designed, hopefully, to be able to acquire some of the talent and professional disciplines needed from perhaps the private sector in order to move ahead with this very important aspect of the management control systems in departments, as the hon. member has indicated.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, the point I am trying to get at here is that the Auditor General has stated in his report that the Comptroller General has completed his IMPAC studies and he is ready to move ahead on implementation and he does not have the manpower to do so.

The President of the Treasury Board is saying that the IMPAC studies are continuing to go on in tandem with looking for people. That is not the case as presented by the Auditor General. He is saying that the IMPAC studies are completed and now we need the people to get on with the program and to implement it, and we do not have the people. My question is: when are we going to have the people?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should go back and review what the Auditor General has said. I would be surprised if he said that the IMPAC program was completed. In fact action plans have been signed off now with, I believe, seven departments and agencies. We hope we will be able to sign off approximately 25 by the end of the fiscal year.

But the point that should be borne in mind is that proceeding with many of the recommendations, new procedures and new management practices that will be called for under those action plans, can be carried forward without there being a departmental comptroller in place. Many of them do not require his presence. What I am saying to the hon. gentleman is that we are moving ahead rapidly, as rapidly as we can, with that other aspect as well. He can rest assured that I intend to give full support to the office of the Comptroller General in bringing that part of the over-all management control program to fruition.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the President of the Treasury Board should have a discussion with the Auditor General. In this document dated May 2, 1980, the Auditor General is talking about a discussion between himself and the Comptroller General. He said that "We discussed where his IMPAC program is now which he has had in motion for 18 months and they are ready now to go into implementation. However, they cannot implement the program because they do not have the departmental comptroller in place."

Those are the words of the Auditor General and I will be happy to supply the President of the Treasury Board with the source of the quotation. It is dated May 2, 1980.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should bear in mind that that statement of the Auditor General may be somewhat dated in that progress has been made.

Mr. Stevens: It was May 2.

Mr. Johnston: The Auditor General's report that we are discussing here is the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1979. There are financial officers in all of these departments and good solid progress has been made. If the hon. gentleman wants any further information on it either here or in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts or the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates where I will be appearing, I will be glad to cover the matter in detail, or I am prepared to forward him a report. One is never satisfied with progress and improvement of management. All I can say is that we are doing, I believe, everything that reasonably can be done at this stage to satisfy the criticisms that the Auditor General has put forward.

The Deputy Chairman: The Minister of Transport is seeking the floor but time has expired.

Mr. Pepin: In the event that I am not able to be back after eight o'clock, I would like to answer a couple of questions, the first from my Siamese twin, the hon. member from Timmins-Chapleau. This is with respect to the Timmins airport. The government has recognized the need for this airport, and in the fiscal year 1979-80 $20,000 was spent to purchase land. For 1980-81, this year, $90,000 is assigned to the site preparation for the instrument landing system, and in 1981-82, $1.7 million for the instrument landing system, plus $229,000 for electronic equipment. The program should finish by 1982-83 with $613,000 for the conclusion of the instrument landing system program.

I want to thank my hon. friend from Thunder Bay-Atikokan for his positive and even enthusiastic contribution to the grain situation. He told us that Thunder Bay was in some ways part of western Canada. I was going to suggest that if referenda were more popular, he could run one in Thunder Bay to find out how people would feel about it. But seriously, I agree with him entirely. Grain is moving. The capacity is there now. Fortunately we have no labour problem at this particular moment although we had one in Churchill which was resolved a few days ago.

Thunder Bay has opened for navigation 23 days ahead of what is considered to be the normal period. The Ridley Island grain terminal on the west coast is going to be built. The grain co-ordinator is in operation. Hopper cars are now on stream. Box cars are being rebuilt and, branch lines are being rehabilitated. The CN and CP are improving their rail lines, and double tracking is taking place here and there as needed. So, this is a great situation.

Mr. Knowles: "God's in his heaven: all's right with the world."

Mr. Pepin: I think we should rejoice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: If hon. friends on the other side want me to say that the minister of transport in the previous administration had something to do with this good climate, I will not deny that, but only under one condition, that is, that they would add that Mr. Lang was there previously and had more to do with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: Be that as it may.

With respect to the prairie railway rehabilitation program, to answer the hon. member for Regina West, the program for this year has now been approved and an announcement will be made in a few days on that subject.

I do not know if the hon. member from Kindersley-Lloydminster intends to take part in the debate—yes? Then I will be back at eight o'clock.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I have the report on the breakdown, as it were, of the projects on which the cost overruns that I referred to were incurred. I undertook to table such a report as soon as possible. I am prepared to table this report, but I would point out that, due to the period of time in which I had to obtain it, it is in the English language only—only the headings. It is all numbers and is a computer printout. But with the unanimous consent of members—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on this point of order, it cannot be tabled in Committee of the Whole. It should not be tabled until we go back into the House tonight.

The Deputy Chairman: This would have to be done with unanimous consent. It would not be tabled. It would only be filed with the committee. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock p.m., clause 2 of Bill C-29, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1981, was under consideration. The hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe had been given the floor.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments and a question for the Minister of Transport. As the Minister of Transport knows, there is presently under way in my riding a review of transportation services in western Newfoundland, the riding of Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe. The two airports in question in this review, which the bureaucrats lovingly refer to as rationalization of air services, are Stephenville and Deer Lake. As the minister also knows, the two airports provide an air service to two different geographical regions in my riding. Because of the rural nature of the riding, the two airports became necessary in the first place.

I would simply like to say and put on the record that while I accept, encourage, and welcome a review of the air transportation service in western Newfoundland, I would like to make it perfectly clear to the minister and his department that it is my position and, indeed, the position of the vast majority of my constituents in Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe and, in particular, the officials in both Deer Lake and Stephenville, that the two airport concept should be embraced by the Department of Transport and that two airports are necessary for the economic well-being of my riding.

Having made those few brief comments, I would now like to come to my question. A few weeks ago, Mr. Harry Steele, the president of Eastern Provincial Airways, the regional carrier that operates out of both Deer Lake and Stephenville, while addressing the Stephenville Chamber of Commerce indicated to his audience that while there is now an ongoing review process of air transportation in Newfoundland, he has inside information that the Department of Transport has already made up its mind to close one of the two airports in western Newfoundland. If Mr. Steele's comments are to be taken at face value, and I have no reason to believe them, the efforts of the Department of Transport are nothing but a farce. My question to the Minister of Transport is simply this. Has the minister or any of the officials in the minister's department informed Mr. Harry Steele that indeed an airport will be closed in western Newfoundland? I have one supplementary question for the minister.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, this question as to the advisability or otherwise of maintaining the two airports, namely, Stephenville and Deer Lake, is indeed with us. A quite extensive study of this area of Newfoundland will be made to gather all possible facts and figures. A decision has not yet been made. I do not know where the president of Eastern Provincial Airways got this information. I think I have discussed this before with the hon. member. There should be no doubt about our good intentions.

At the same time, this situation is not peculiar to western Newfoundland. There are a number of other cases in Canada where airports are located a relatively short distance from each other. Quite frankly, I must look at this from the point of view of possible savings. I thought I was sufficiently clear on that subject this afternoon, that is to say with regard to the limited resources which are available. I look at it, also, from the point of view of the operations of the regional carrier. I am told that, quite naturally, it costs the carrier more money to keep facilities at two airports. So I want to assure the hon. member that we go into this with the greatest of good intent, and hopefully we shall make the right decision in due course.

● (2010)

Mr. Tobin: I have one further comment, Mr. Chairman. When the president of the regional carrier operating in Newfoundland tells a public meeting that a decision has already been made in advance of a review of air service in western Newfoundland, and when at the end of this month the Ministry of Transport proposes to go to western Newfoundland, to Deer Lake, Cornerbrook and Stephenville, the towns concerned; when these people come to public meetings being held by the Ministry of Transport to express their views on air service with the preconceived notion that the ministry has already made its decision, I think we will find in these public meetings a confrontationist kind of atmosphere, with one town presenting its case against the other town, one town suggesting why the airport of the other town should close down.

So it seems to me it would be in the best interests of the Department of Transport—perhaps the minister might endeavour to do this himself—to make a public statement to the people of Newfoundland. I have done it, but I suggest the minister and his departmental officials could do it, that is, make a public statement to the effect that Mr. Steele does not speak on behalf of the Government of Canada, that he does not dictate the policy of the Government of Canada, that the question has not yet been decided, and that those who intend to take part in these hearings should do so from the standpoint that no decision has been made. It is my hope—and I will be attending the hearings—that we could end up with two airports continuing to operate in western Newfoundland. I shall be making this case. Unless the minister clarifies the issue by stating that no decision has yet been made, a situation of conflict is likely to arise where, instead of discussing air transportation in a rational, objective manner, we are likely to see two towns clawing each other to death, each trying to show why its airport should remain open and the other should close.

Mr. Pepin: I want to repeat emphatically that a decision has not been made. The inquiry is to be a proper one, objectively carried out. I would think that the hon. member, who was present during one of the conversations we had involving Mr. St. John, the deputy air administrator, gained the impression that Mr. St. John wanted this to be as objective an exercise as humanly possible. Mr. Steele, however charming and dedicated he is, obviously does not decide what the department should do. Otherwise, a number of decisions would already have been made which would be quite advantageous to EPA. Finally, through the member of Parliament for the area I would invite people to come to these hearings and attach to them all the importance which, in my view, they deserve.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Chairman, my few comments this evening will be directed to the Minister of Transport who, I trust, will attempt to answer a question of vital importance to my riding, namely, the twice-promised expansion of Mount Hope airport. Even if he cannot offer my constituents some satisfaction, as Minister of Transport, he might offer some sympathy to me as one of his own constituents because I do spend a considerable amount of time in his riding of Ottawa-Carleton. I hope he can offer me and my constituents, as I say, some satisfaction, given the utter confusion that he and his cabinet colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East, are causing throughout the Hamilton and Niagara area. As my MP the minister is causing me no end of frustration and genuine concern in connection with this long-standing matter of the expansion of Hamilton airport.

My agitation has been compounded by what the Minister of Transport said this afternoon in one of his typical Maurice Chevalier soft-shoe routines. I am quoting from this day's preliminary transcript of Hansard—the minister started off by saying, and I might add, looking benignly at me, "Distinguished members of this assembly"—and I thank you for that—"come up with suggestions that the number of airports should increase, that facilities should be built all over the place, that radar should be doubled up, and improved." Then he added, "There are limitations to that." Mr. Chairman, you want to believe it! There are also limitations to the patience of the people I represent and, indeed, to the patience of those in the entire Hamilton-Wentworth region and surrounding areas with this government's stalling, foot-dragging, constant delays, and as the hon. member for Hamilton-West is fond of saying, bamboozling and flim-flamming about what should be done, about how much should be done, and when it should be done at Hamilton civic airport.

Quite frankly, I was further angered this afternoon when the minister, trying not to cry his crocodile tears on the floor of this House, told us "I expect to be chastised occasionally by members of this House for not being sufficiently sympathetic to the little local situations." Well, as one Hamilton M.P. who has duly chastised the minister, without success, I fear—dealing with the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton is something like shovelling smoke—I am sorry I cannot accept the minister's point, as he put it, of constitutional philosophy or theology when criticizing the Minister of Transport. I am afraid the minister's remarks this afternoon amounted to the kissing off of just about two million people in my area. He is not only breaking a commitment by the former Conservative government to upgrade and expand Mount Hope, he is also breaking a promise made by the previous Liberal government through his predecessor, the Hon. Otto Lang, reiterated recently, during the campaign and since, by his cabinet colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East.

My question is: are our fears well grounded? Is this little local concern, as the minister puts it, in the greater Hamilton-Niagara region, really so far down on the government's list of priorities? I ask it because industry, planners, and government have to know.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I am obviously not getting anywhere with the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth and I regret that very much, because one of my greatest desires in life is to please him and all the members from the Hamilton area in particular. But what I am trying to say is this: we have every desire, every expectation, every hope of accommodating the airport in Hamilton. My distinguished parliamentary secretary referred to this the other night, as reported in Hansard on page 1052, of May 13:

> There is no doubt that the people of the Hamilton-Niagara-Brantford area require access to convenient and adequate air transportation service, and this government intends to see that this need is met.

I can only repeat that in emphatic terms. But before spending whatever amount of money is needed, be it $50 million or $30 million or $60 million, we have got to know more clearly what we are trying to do and what is the objective. Circumstances have changed. Promises made in the past are subject to the internationally known rule of facta sunt servanda—promises must be honoured. Promises must be fulfilled, but they are also subject to the other well-known international rule of rebus non sic stantibus. Things do change.

In this particular instance, as I have repeatedly said, we need to know more about the situation. We need to know what is the proper orientation to be given to the runway, for example. We need to know the possibility for Air Canada to move some of its services from Malton, which is surchargé—very, very busy at this time—and the possibility that some of these flights might go to Hamilton. We need to know that in order to find out what it is that has to be done and what it is that has to be spent.

My hon. friend would like me to repeat the two promises which have been made in the past, and I can make only one promise: that proper expenditures will be met in order to develop services at Hamilton airport.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Well, Mr. Chairman, we just received another soft-shoe routine, this time in Latin, from the Minister of Transport. He has covered about 15 points which are angering the people of the Hamilton area, and I am going to have to try to bring the minister's attention to these points.

First, one of the biggest fears in our area is that the Hamilton airport could become the Pickering that never was, a kind of international refuse dump from the congested Toronto international airport. That is what I have been jumping up and down about ever since I was elected to this chamber to try to explain to the people of Hamilton-Wentworth would not happen. We have had assurances from the previous minister of transport that indeed Mount Hope would not become the Pickering that never was. I hope the minister is not suggesting that that is what he is looking at when he is talking about Air Canada and other air carriers going into Mount Hope. I just leave that thought with him for the moment.

The other thing is that we have had many studies. We talk about the need to assess the need for an airport. The need for an airport has existed for well over a decade. The people of the Hamilton area have been demanding, crying and pleading for some sort of expansion of our ticky-tacky facilities which we, as a Conservative government, were on the very brink of undertaking. We allocated $45 million for that airport. I will get to that in a moment, but in the meantime is the minister talking about yet another study, an eighteenth study, a twenty-eighth study, a thirty-eighth study—I am not sure which—to assess the need for facilities in Hamilton?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I was trying to indicate to my hon. friend what needs to be done.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Another study.

Mr. Pepin: I mentioned the investigation and the discussions with Air Canada on the possibility of—and I do not want to continue—I have said it already. My hon. friend is the first man in the history of Parliament who has apparently refused the thought that the presence of the great people's airline at his airport would be a desirable objective.

Again I do not know how to deal with my hon. friend, because I am trying to be as constructive as one can possibly be. I am trying to help the progress of the Hamilton airport, but I do not seem to be able to reach the hon. member.

In his own contribution to the debate I was referring to a moment ago, he said as reported at page 1052:

> The consultant's fees of $220,000 which the Minister of Transport has mentioned, was the amount for the first stage only of the proposed development, that is, the firm conceptual design.

These are going on. What needs to be done is the assessment of what further expenditures need to be dedicated to this airport.

So, I give up, because I have tried everything.

With respect to the commitment of $45 million I do not want to go over it once again. I have done so. What appears in the books to which I have access is that this was an acceptance in principle of the project by the cabinet, so dear to my hon.

friend, of the previous government, and it had not been submitted to the rigours of Treasury Board approvals and so forth, so I can only repeat that, and I have said it already three times.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Chairman, may I challenge the minister on the last point he made first? He has made it repeatedly in this House and, with the greatest of respect to the Minister of Transport, he is dead wrong. That $45 million was in fact submitted to the Treasury Board. It did go through the rigours of Treasury Board approval. It did go through final cabinet approval. It was "go", and it was totally committed. The $220,000 that we spoke of was the first stage of the consultant's firm conceptual design. The minister is correct on that. At least we can agree on that. The $45 million indeed was allocated for Hamilton civic airport.

I might say that since the minister suggested this afternoon that it was because of the restraint program of the government that he is taking another look at these priorities, Hamilton civic airport has obviously sunk very low on the list of the government's priorities. The minister was talking about restraint. He was quite right. That was what we were looking at with a former minister of transport, Otto Lang. The present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the hon. member for Hamilton East, talks about adhering to a $100 million campaign commitment by the Liberals of that day. We scaled that down to a $45 million expansion of Hamilton airport for a good, first-class regional facility. I wish the minister would check with his colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton East and, as I said in one of my questions, please try to get his act together in terms of what amount of money the government is willing to spend on the airport.

There is one other point I would like to raise with the minister. I have it on very good authority, and it was confirmed today by an official from Nordair, that that very worth-while regular service into Mount Hope airport may not continue for much longer. Indeed, there was a statement today before an airport committee in Hamilton that Nordair can no longer guarantee that its existing service will be maintained in Hamilton. We have here a very strange situation. As the minister has told this House, he is negotiating with Air Canada. Air Canada says it will move into Mount Hope when and as soon as there is a commitment to expand the airport facilities. However, Nordair—which, incidentally, is owned largely by Air Canada—is saying that unless it gets a commitment very soon, it will pull out of Hamilton airport. That is creating a tremendous amount of confusion, as I think the minister can understand, in the whole Hamilton area amongst civic officials, and the people in the municipalities which I have the honour to represent.

Quite frankly, I am getting fed up with the delays, the confusion and the uncertainty. The minister says he cannot get through to me but, as I say, dealing with him is like shovelling smoke. I cannot get through to him in terms of a commitment which was made not only by the previous Liberal government but also reiterated by our Conservative administration, albeit scaled down from $100 million to $45 million. Now the minister is suggesting that the whole thing be put on the back burner again, and both promises are broken. I think the minister owes this House, me, and certainly the people of the greater Hamilton-Niagara region an explanation as to when this confusion is going to be cleared up.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I am getting a bit fed up also, so that makes two of us. I want to repeat emphatically that the decision of the previous cabinet was a decision in principle by the cabinet, but it was not the subject of a Treasury Board decision. That is quite clear. If my hon. friend has proof to the contrary, let him bring it to the House and we will fight it out again.

● (2030)

The second point I want to make is that I am almost as dedicated as he is to the success of this project. The necessary amount of money will be allocated to it. If it is $50 million, it will be allocated. So there is no intention on my part to be disagreeable. I am just trying to be responsible, and that is the point I am making now. So whatever amounts of money need to be spent, will be spent. But first we have to find out how much needs to be spent and that is what, humbly and responsibly, I am trying to do.

With respect to the Nordair and Air Canada situation, I will take at face value what my hon. friend is saying. We will explore it, we will talk with the two companies to ensure that the possible decision of Nordair not to stay will not be taken, and that the decision of Air Canada that they might not go on if the facilities are not built will be contradicted by events.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): The final point that I will make, Mr. Chairman, is that I hope the minister does not really mean what he says, as he will find when he reads back Hansard on the last statement, that even if the facilities are not built, Air Canada's statement not to move in there will be contradicted. I think that would be upsetting to Air Canada and certainly to the people in my area.

In terms of how much needs to be spent, may I again suggest respectfully that the minister consult with his colleague in cabinet, the hon. member for Hamilton East, to see how they can reconcile the $100 million that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has talked about. Who knows about what amount the minister is speaking? Incidentally, in connection with the $45 million, yes, sir, I do have proof, and I can provide documentary evidence that indeed that was cleared by Treasury Board.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, if there was such a decision, the $50 million would be in the present estimates because these are the estimates of the previous administration. So there must be something wrong with the information which my hon. friend is being given.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to turn to the supplementary estimate under Energy, Mines and Resources, in particular to the contribution to the Tidal Power Corporation for a demonstration project for a low-head hydroelectric installation of $12.5 million. It is my understanding that the Annapolis tidal project has been discussed for several years, and I am glad to see today that we are in the process of ratifying, in the supplementary estimates before the House, part of the federal contribution to this project. The grant and contribution come under the item for energy research and technology development, and we are being asked to pass $12.5 million of a total grant of up to $25 million to the Tidal Power Corporation for a demonstration project for a low-head hydroelectric installation.

This power project at the Annapolis causeway is a hydro demonstration program initiated jointly by the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia. The Straflo turbine is a new design of a hydraulic turbine which has been awaiting since 1978 the opportunity for large scale demonstration. This hydraulic turbine has a potential for reducing considerably the capital cost of low and medium-head hydro plants in Canada, as well as improving the economics of tidal generation. At least it should provide some learning lessons on tidal power.

The federal government and the province of Nova Scotia reached an agreement to instal a demonstration project at an estimated cost of $46 million at the Annapolis causeway. Energy benefits to Nova Scotia are estimated at $17.5 million, and a federal grant of up to $25 million is being offered.

The design concept of this unit has been developed by Escher-Syss in Switzerland, and so far it has not been demonstrated at a physical scale that would prove its suitability for the larger generating unit sizes which would be employed in major tidal development or in major river installations. The primary object of the demonstration is thus to obtain its validation of the design in larger sizes and to create the degree of confidence that would allow committing major projects of this design of unit.

The advantage of this design is expected to be substantial savings in the capital cost of civil engineering work required to install the unit in hydroelectric plants, in comparison with the more conventional turbine designs that are now available.

Nova Scotia is to be commended for providing the site for this demonstration and undertaking to make a capital contribution commensurate with the energy benefits that are expected, mainly through the displacement of oil fuel that would be used in the oil production of an equivalent amount of electricity. It should be noted that Nova Scotia takes a financial risk in putting up this capital and being responsible for the cost-management of the project in the unlikely event that the demonstration is unsuccessful.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, that this project is justified on a national basis, but I wonder whether or not the project is dependent. I have been told that this project will replace 85,000 barrels of oil a year out of today's Nova Scotia use of five million barrels of oil a year. I wonder if this benefit of displacement of oil use is dependent on whether the total project is a success. In other words, there may be other aspects of the project that might not be a success due to not being able to use that turbine, but I am wondering if the project will be a success for Nova Scotia on the basis of benefits returned for the displacement of oil.

The other aspect of this funding by the federal government was that it would be given on the basis of an initial environmental assessment. Before the federal government would go along with this investment by the province and the federal government in the Tidal Power Corporation, the federal government approved the Martec assessment of environmental and other related issues involved in this project. My concern is that they gave formal approval, and since this project is in my riding, I can say that they gave the formal approval subject to four conditions which I would like to bring to the minister's attention. I should like to hear his comments on whether or not these conditions are being met by the Tidal Power Corporation. As I said, the formal approval of the project was given subject to these four conditions.

The first one was assurances that the Tidal Power Corporation will incorporate reasonable measures to limit the loss of presently productive agricultural land, including losses due to potential increased bank erosion. It is my understanding that in the month of April a survey was done on water levels.

My second question to the minister tonight is on whether we have the results of this water level survey. My understanding is that, due to the spring thaw conditions, perhaps we did not have the level of water necessary to give a full evaluation of the amount of water which would be in the basin necessary for the turbines to be fully operational. I wonder what is tied into this commitment given to the federal government from the Tidal Power Corporation, because the federal government is committing itself tonight to this money under an agreement which was signed in January during the election.

The second condition for giving formal approval to the funding of this project was to undertake, in concert with local and provincial authorities, to plan construction to minimize the strain on the local socioeconomic infrastructure. Again I should like to know whether or not the Tidal Power Corporation is following through on this.

● (2040)

The third matter was to extend a planning role to the existing local farmers' committee to work with the corporation in the planning and running of the early water level tests.

This week I spoke with one farmer who went to a lot of trouble to tile his land. During the month of April his tiles were approximately one foot under water. I am wondering if anyone went to the farmer's land during April while the testing was going on. I would like to know if the Tidal Power Corporation is following through on liaising with the farmers. I think there are about 250 marsh owners in that area.

The last request was to ensure that all reasonable steps were taken with respect to the fish ways. If the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans were here, I am sure he would realize that when one puts a tide gate or blocks any entry way, one must provide a passage way for the fish to go through. According to the concerns of the Department of Fisheries, too many fish may be caught in the turbine. The fishway should be attractive enough and large enough to bring the fish up that way. I wonder what the force of the water will be and how the fish will manage to get up there. However, these are some of the things for which I thought formal approval was given, pending these four conditions.

I want to save a bit of time in order to get answers to my questions. I really have only two questions, on whether or not the conditions are being adhered to by the Tidal Power Corporation, and what they have done. Also I should like to know whether or not the benefit in oil displacement for electrical energy by this hydro power plant is there, regardless of whether the project is a success in terms of the use of low head turbine.

I suppose another question one would ask is whether we know of any provision for flooding, the process the flooding might take, and its effect. I think this would come under the first condition as to the water levels.

Before asking the minister to comment, one other matter which came to my attention today was a press release or a telex in which the premier of Nova Scotia seems to be using extremely strong terms concerning the decision of the federal government not to extend the western natural gas pipeline into the maritimes. Being a member of the government side, I should like to indicate that I have not heard this decision. I wonder if the minister would like to comment on the decision that the Government of Canada does not plan to extend the pipeline to the maritimes, as was indicated by Premier Buchanan in his telegram. If that is the case, then perhaps Premier Buchanan is right. But there are a couple of other items in his telex to which I would like to refer.

He implied that the Canadian Transport Commission is refusing EPA. My understanding of the application before CTC is that EPA has appealed and that a decision on the appeal has not come forth. It is somewhat unfair to allow the people of Nova Scotia to think the federal government is oppressive when the procedures have not yet been followed. The premier ended up by saying that he will be in Ottawa next week and that he will be trying to convince the federal cabinet to overturn the decision of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on the recommendation of the National Energy Board. If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources needs any convincing, I am sure we can do it ourselves. I am sure we do not have to do it ourselves because, after all, we are as concerned as the rest of Canada as to how the energy policy will fit in across Canada.

Mr. Rae: You do not need any of the other parties at all.

Miss Campbell: Perhaps I have taken it out of context, but I think it should be read into the record. I cannot quite imagine if this is Halifax CP Press or CP Telex, but it begins by indicating that "Premier John Buchanan said Thursday"—if the term "said" is used, it has to be CP Press, or it could be CP Air. It reads as follows:

> Premier John Buchanan said Thursday the federal government's decision not to extend the western natural gas pipeline into the maritimes will greatly sour relations with Ottawa.
> "Nova Scotians are a rather quiet people"—

I agree; we are nice.

It continues:

> —"and we like to negotiate . . . in a friendly fashion", Buchanan said of the announcement by federal energy minister Marc Lalonde. "But I'll tell you there comes a point when we are ready to dig in our heels and fight. If the federal government of this country will not recognize the unique problems we have here in Atlantic Canada"—

I am pleased he sent this telex right now because we are about to approve a grant of up to $25 million for a project in Nova Scotia; $12.5 million will automatically go toward this tidal power project.

It continues:

> —"the unique problems we have here in Atlantic Canada, then quite frankly and honestly I think we're coming to that point right now." He said relations have already been strained because of the continuing confrontation over control of offshore resources. He also criticized the recent decision by the Canadian Transport Commission to give Halifax landing rights to CP Air, although the Nova Scotia government publicly opted for a competing bid from Eastern Provincial Airways.

Certainly everyone in this House would like to support Eastern Provincial Airways; it is an Atlantic company. But there is an appeal procedure, and we will have to wait and see.

It continues:

> Buchanan said he will be in Ottawa next week and hopes to convince the federal cabinet to overturn Lalonde's announcement, made on the recommendation of the National Energy Board.

I would like to hear the minister's comments on this matter, but in particular I should like to hear what he has to say on the Tidal Power Corporation which we are funding to the tune of $25 million, as well as the conditions given on formal approval of that agreement.

Really I am concerned about three matters. First, is the oil displacement by this project conditional upon whether or not the total project is a success in terms of a national interest? Second, have the conditions been agreed to by the Tidal Power Corporation in Nova Scotia? Third, will the minister indicate whether or not he has abandoned the idea of a pipeline going east from Quebec?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to congratulate the hon. member for her knowledge of the situation concerning the tidal power project in her own area. As a matter of fact I must say that she appears to know a lot more than I do about this project, and I congratulate her for it.

I should like to make a comment on this general question. It has to do with the fact that this particular project concerning Annapolis tidal power was signed by the previous government during the election, on January 29, 1980. Indeed that agreement provided for the experiment which the hon. member mentioned. It implies a contribution of $25 million from the federal government toward a total cost of $46 million for this particular project. The plan is to have $25 million paid to Nova Scotia by the federal government in two annual payments of equal amounts, hence the reference in these particular estimates to $12.5 million. This is indeed a significant contribution to the project which is taking place in Nova Scotia. As the hon. member will have noticed, it is well above 50 per cent. This government intends to proceed—provided the House endorses this amount—with contributing to the realization of that particular project.

● (2050)

The hon. member asked a question about oil displacement. Obviously, the oil displacement possibility to which the hon. member referred will take place only if the project is a success. If the project were not a success, we would be back at the drawing board, I suspect, and the Tidal Power Corporation of Nova Scotia would be required to develop alternative techniques to use the particular development that will have taken place in the Annapolis Valley. The project is under the direction and control of the Tidal Power Corporation in Nova Scotia.

I am advised that this corporation is a provincial corporation and does not have federal government representatives on the board. The hon. member will understand therefore, that, although I would like to be as well-informed as she is about the details of this particular project, it is essentially a matter which is under the direction of the provincial government of Nova Scotia. I am advised, though, that there is a general agreement providing for federal funding and that federal officials are consulted occasionally about the evolution of this particular project.

As to the specific conditions to which the hon. member referred, I must confess that I am not aware of the details. I will inquire, particularly from the government of Nova Scotia or Tidal Power Corporation, as to exactly what they have done with regard to those conditions and as to what point they are at with regard to this matter. I will be very happy to provide the hon. member with any information I can obtain from the authorities in Nova Scotia. I can tell the hon. member that an environmental advisory board and technical committees will be established to interface with the corporation to ensure that a number of studies dealing with the environment are carried out with the best possible advice.

I am also advised that the particular corporation has committed itself to keep the local public informed and to seeking their views as planning progresses on this project. I am sure that the hon. member will not hesitate to bring this matter to my attention if, for any reason, she were not getting satisfactory information either from myself or from the provincial authority or Tidal Power Corporation.

As to the hon. member's last point concerning the gas pipeline project to eastern Canada, as she may know, and as hon. members no doubt know, by law, reports from the National Energy Board can be either accepted or rejected by cabinet, but they cannot be modified as such. We have received a report from the National Energy Board which has recommended that the natural gas system be immediately extended beyond Montreal to Quebec City. However, with regard to the other part of the project, which was an extension to the maritime provinces, the National Energy Board has raised two concerns or objections which they felt should be resolved before considering and approving the extension of the pipeline to the maritime provinces.

The first point involves environmental studies which, in the opinion of the board, have not been fully carried out by the Quebec and Maritime Corporation. It is the view of the National Energy Board that they should obtain better environmental assessments before giving consideration to the Q and M project. They have indicated that, in their opinion, the Q and M Corporation had not carried out sufficient environmental studies. Indeed, we hope that Q and M will proceed as quickly as possible to developing the necessary work in order to ensure that any extension of the pipeline meets our environmental standards.

The second point raised by the National Energy Board was to the effect that the application put forward by the Quebec and Maritime Corporation did not adequately consider potential offshore development. They also stated that there should be an extended pause in order to obtain further information about offshore potential, particularly with regard to Sable Island, and at that point it would be more appropriate to consider the application of Q and M. Then everybody would be in a better position on what would be more advisable, whether the gas pipeline should be built from Quebec City to Halifax with immediate reversible capacity, or whether in the end gas would be flowing, not from west to east but, instead, the happy development of natural gas flowing from east to west.

These are the reasons which are given by the National Energy Board in their report to the government. The government has considered that report and has accepted it. As I indicated, as a government we had the option of either rejecting the report or accepting it. We have accepted it, and this means that at least part of the pipeline, that part from Montreal to Quebec City, can be undertaken without further delay. We still consider the maritime extension of the pipeline a matter of high priority.

We indicated in the Speech from the Throne that the government favours the earliest possible construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritime provinces. We indicated that we were awaiting the report of the National Energy Board on this project. Naturally, I would have been happy if the recommendation had been to proceed immediately with the extension to the maritime provinces.

I raised this issue with the premier of Nova Scotia last week and with the officials and ministers of New Brunswick. I must report that the New Brunswick government has indicated before the energy board, and reiterated last week, the concern that things are proceeding too fast and that there is no time to examine all the alternatives available to the pipeline itself. The government of New Brunswick wanted to be sure that any pipeline that was built would indeed bring to the consumers of the maritime provinces an alternative to oil, that that alternative would be the most efficient and that they would not pay more for what they would get in the end than what they would pay for another alternative.

I also raised the possibility of a report along those lines with the Premier of Nova Scotia last week. He did not indicate at that time the feelings which he seems to have indicated in the CP story. I will certainly be happy to meet with him if he comes to Ottawa next week. I want to tell him he should realize, however, that such a project does not affect only Nova Scotia, that there are two other maritime provinces involved.

There have been some views expressed by the government of New Brunswick. I have noticed, even in Nova Scotia, that there are people who are concerned that the development which takes place be good for the consumers and workers of that province, and not just a project imposed upon the maritime provinces. I noticed, for instance, that the steel workers in Cape Breton, showed their support today for the position of the federal government by saying in effect that the Nova Scotia government should bear in mind the interests of the workers, the advisability of further coal development, and a careful examination of all the alternatives. They also said that careful attention should be given to the possibility of a substantial gas find off Sable Island.

● (2100)

As I said, this government still believes that the construction of the pipeline to the maritimes is a project that should receive priority consideration. I hope that the Q and M Corporation is going to proceed with the work that is required from it in the environmental field and that we will also be able to have further information as soon as possible concerning the possible discoveries of natural gas off Sable Island. It is our intention to try to develop ways and means to speed up explorations in this area and to try to get the relative information at the earliest possible moment, after which I hope we will get a positive report from the National Energy Board.

I hope these few comments will answer the points raised by the hon. member. I shall not comment further on the more histrionic part of the statement by the premier of her province at this time.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Chairman, my comments tonight are again directed to the Minister of Transport. I have to say that I enjoyed some of the very humorous remarks this evening and the sort of soft shoe approach. I admit that I got lost in the fog along with the Canadian merchant fleet.

I should like to return to the topic of search and rescue on the west coast and the department's role in that particular endeavour.

An hon. Member: Two rowboats!

Mr. Skelly: Before doing that I should like to go back to an incident that occurred off the east coast of Newfoundland where 13 Dutch seamen drowned from the Dutch ship, The Gabriella. I would remind the minister that as the result of the tragic death of those 13 people, his government built a search and rescue base and equipped it with three helicopters. They also took some action to rationalize search and rescue in Canada. There were attempts to co-ordinate the S and R committee and things along that line.

I should like to refer to another incident which took place on the west coast of Canada in British Columbia and compare it with the incident in Newfoundland. In the two weeks over the Christmas period in 1979, just a few months ago, 42 people died as a result of the sinking of a Panamanian freighter, a fishing vessel, and a few other incidents.

One of the things that came out of this, which matches the event in Newfoundland, was the complete failure of government capability to provide a rescue platform into the area. Again, figures become a problem but, as I recall, the distress call came in about 9 in the morning. They managed to get one of the helicopters of the Department of Transport to the site at 1.15. The problem was that, after four hours in the water, any who survived the sinking were dead from exposure. The sinking of the vessel, the Lee Wan Zing, was a tragic event. From anything that people in British Columbia can determine, the department has done absolutely nothing about this; it has sat on the case for four months. I believe the Department of National Defence has taken what appears to be some concrete action by cutting back the search and rescue helicopter upgrading program. The minister had the courage the other day to say it was adequate and even improving!

I should like to ask the minister one very simple question. As Minister of Transport can he assure the House that the government has done nothing, or the fact that the government has done nothing about those 42 deaths has nothing to do with the fact that those people were Taiwanese seamen and Canadian Indians? Can the minister give the House the assurance that the government has done nothing and it is related to that fact?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend seems to be in a pugnacious mood—"said nothing," "done nothing," and what not. I just want to repeat what I heard this morning, that the search and rescue facility is a major preoccupation of the Department of Transport and it is still a major one for the Department of National Defence. As my hon. friend knows, the first responsibility is theirs. We support that effort to the best of our capabilities.

I do not think he should emphasize so strongly that nothing is being done. As a matter of fact, in the present estimates nine vessels are being added to the search and rescue support facilities, one of them in Campbell River, B.C., a crash boat in the west Strait of Georgia, B.C., and one of them at Prince Rupert, so the effort is expanding. In a nutshell, we do the best we can with what we have, and what we have is improving. Canada is tremendously—

An hon. Member: There is money for fighter planes.

Mr. Pepin: If ever they need to use those planes, the very people who say we do not need them now would be hiding somewhere. The situation is improving and the estimates tonight demonstrate that. We are trying to improve our relationship with DND so as to make our efforts as well co-ordinated as possible and similarly with the United States, a country with which co-operation is apparently of the first magnitude. Again, with the geography we have and with the extent of our coasts as well as four inland waters, there are limitations to the quality of the job that can be done.

I am sure my hon. friend will realize that to do a perfect job for that distance would cost billions.

An hon. Member: $10 million.

Mr. Pepin: What?

Mr. Skelly: If I might elaborate, Mr. Chairman, this demonstrates the dilemma. The Minister of Transport really does not grasp the basic concept. His former colleague from Skeena had been beating away at the government for five years trying to tell them the service is totally inadequate. The minister referred to the 21 metre vessel program, but that is to meet an entirely different need. Its only capability is an inshore capability; it cannot be taken out in Dixon Entrance or Queen Charlotte Sound in extremely rough water. Also, it cannot be delivered there. A person will die in that water within 35 minutes.

There is a program that could be developed, however. There are 14 helicopters on the west coast of Canada but they are used in an erratic fashion. If they were to be moved to the Canadian forces station at Holbrook or Masset—the capability of the Sikorsky which is a perfect marine helicopter for distribution along the coast—that equipment could be moved anywhere on the coast in 35 minutes. The service could cover from Sitka, Alaska, to Port Angeles in 35 minutes.

I have had a chance to discuss this with Boeing, who handle the CH113, and with the Sikorsky people. Rough and dirty figures, estimated on the high side, are that the relocation of that equipment would cost less than $10 million. That is the high side, rough and dirty figure. If the minister does not believe my figures he can check with the companies.

The 21 metre vessel will not be adequate in a situation such as the one with the Lee Wan Zing. If that is not enough to impress the government and the department that vital changes have to be made now, I would remind them that Iona Campagnolo has said, as many others have, that there is a real problem. The government has missed the point completely. At any rate, I suspect it will take the sinking of the Queen of Prince Rupert or something of that nature to really drive the point home.

The B.C. transportation agreement is another very serious concern for the people of British Columbia. There are many Indian communities along the coast and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will appreciate some of the dilemmas they face. A former minister of transport, Otto Lang, made an agreement with the government of B.C. as a result of which the service of Northland Navigation, which served the entire coast, was scrapped. In return, Mr. Lang approached the premier of British Columbia and gave him $8 million as a subsidy for transportation. They placed a clause in that agreement which says that the province of British Columbia agrees that in accepting the federal government subsidy as provided herein for ferry and coastal freight and passenger service in B.C. coastal waters, it will assure reasonable and adequate service and appropriate supervision thereof.

• (2110)

The Queen of Prince Rupert, the only vessel travelling up and down that coast, was stopped from serving the coast of B.C. on April 6. It is expected that the ferry service might return on June 1, but it will be a different vessel, the Queen of the North, but there is absolutely no guarantee about that.

Indian communities up and down that coast, as well as other communities, have all been cut off from services. The only way out is by air and the cost is roughly $180 return per person. The freight rates that are coming in are enormous. The government of British Columbia certainly has not lived up to the intent of that particular clause.

I would propose that the minister compare both coasts of Canada, and ignore for the moment the constitutional requirements by looking at how the federal government fulfils its transportation responsibility through a subsidy program. On the east coast of Canada a rough figure on a per capita basis is $44 while in B.C. the per capita figure is $4. Considering some of the very disruptive moves made by the minister's predecessor that have totally disrupted the service on the coast of B.C., and an example is Northland Navigation. Another area of that department that built a $1 million wharf at Bella Coola to service vessels suddenly cut the line of service off to it. The Minister of Indian Affairs, who has been pouring millions of dollars into economic development in Indian communities to solve things like massive unemployment because of the loose and ragged nature of the agreement with the government of B.C., in a sort of abrogation of reponsibility has suddenly said that that is it for nine weeks, in the middle of the fishing and tourist season.

The government of B.C. decided to close down the community of Ocean Falls, which is right smack in the middle, and it depends absolutely on that ferry service. The town was closed down. Roughly 400 people to this point in time have been laid off, and there is no ferry to haul their goods in or out. They cannot fly their goods in or out; they must be barged in at a tremendously expensive rate.

I would urge the minister to end the subsidy to B.C. In fact, stop it right now because the government of B.C. has failed to live up to that agreement. It is a strange thing for a person from British Columbia to say, but I would urge the minister to go to British Columbia, open the negotiations with that province and come to a conditional agreement that provides specifically what services will be provided to what communities and on what basis. Then, for your part, offer a fair subsidy, a subsidy which is somewhere nearly comparable to what is offered on the east coast of Canada. I would like to hear your reaction to that approach.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I will be fairly brief because I do not want to take the time of others.

On the first point of rescue operations, I listened carefully to what was said by my hon. friend. This will probably be looked at and analysed, and questions will be asked on the subject. Thank you very much for that particular contribution.

On the subject of ferries, my friend makes too easy a comparison between the west and the east coasts of Canada. On the west coast these are intra-provincial operations. Consequently, there was good justification for the Canadian government to make the agreement it made with B.C. so that it would exercise the normal provincial jurisdiction in these matters.

I do not think it could be constitutionally valid for the federal government, once these agreements have been made, to spend the time supervising and looking over the shoulder of provincial authorities to see if they live up to the standards of the central government. If there is some chastisement to be done, it will be done by the people of the province in one way or the other, presumably at election time. I just want to emphasize the danger of making too easy a comparison between the west coast and the east coast because these ferries on the east coast cross over provincial boundaries.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Chairman, the point escapes me. We were dealing with a situation where the federal government was involved before. It did recognize the responsibility and now it does not. I am sure a conditional agreement would be the thing. Even the minister's predecessor in the other government said that the criticism had grown to such a level that he was seriously considering some kind of action to get conditional arrangements.

I would like to move to one other area respecting the coast of British Columbia that affects the entire coast, and it shows the philosophy of the government toward transportation. There are two small islands halfway up the coast of British Columbia, about 200 miles from each end. One is Campbell Island and the other is Denny Island. On the Campbell Island live 1,200 Indian people in an Indian community. On Denny Island, a short distance away, live 50 people.

Some years ago the Department of Transport did a study having to do with an airport on the central coast. The reasoning was that there is no facility from which a search and rescue base can operate. I think we lost 100 aircraft last year and a number of fishing boats suffered loss of life. However, if helicopters work that area, they must work out of Port Hardy, which is over 100 miles away, or alternatively, from a place called Sandspit which is a tremendous distance away and so is not effective. That area is also a major flyway, not only for geese but also for aircraft going back and forth from Alaska to the southern states. There is also a tremendous amount of Canadian aircraft using the air space but there is nowhere for these aircraft to land. As a matter of fact, a plane flying from Alaska was caught short of fuel in the middle of a storm and heavy headwinds and the pilot had to land in a school yard on Campbell Island. That is a very dangerous situation. There is nothing from Sandspit to Port Hardy.

The area has international flavour and it has search and rescue flavour. But the crazy situation is that this government has been saying that it is not its responsibility, that it is the responsibility of the government of British Columbia. On the other hand, B.C. said it is not its responsibility and will not become involved, saying it is federal responsibility. What has happened is that 1,250 people on two separate islands have started to build two airports. The Indian community is working on an airport and the other community is doing the same thing. In my opinion this is sheer stupidity. This is because the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have pumped millions of dollars into the Indian community to develop economic projects there and to provide employment. The community on Campbell Island has a hospital and the RCMP. It strikes me that that would be the logical community to develop. But two airports will probably be built and waste precious, valuable resources because both governments just keep passing the buck back and forth.

I know that the federal government and the minister are very concerned about the spending of funds to provide decent services for people. However, if the federal government was to build an airport there, it would be a tremendous cost reduction for the people of B.C. and a tremendous boost to safety, as well as giving immeasurable help to the Indian community.

I would urge the minister to look at the study, to examine it once again and then negotiate a settlement so those communities can co-operate and build a second airport. I would urge the minister to support the project on Campbell Island because of population facilities and the basic need. I ask the minister to please break this impasse.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I do not have anything particular to contribute. This airport is looked upon as provincial responsibility and treated as such. Again, my hon. friend is suggesting for the second time that we should take over provincial responsibility, at least this is the way I read him. There are so many things to be done in B.C. and elsewhere that are clearly federal responsibility and we are satisfied with that. However, I am very grateful for the advice given by my hon. friend, particularly with respect to the previous subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Bachand: Mr. Chairman, my questions are for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. My three questions relate to the contract for the purchase of the F-18 aircraft. Here is my first question: Can the minister say whether there have been new developments since the F-18 was chosen or can he give details about the sites chosen for the establishment of two important projects, that is a General Electric plant for the manufacturing of blades and vanes that had been promised to the eastern townships, and a digital control machining centre that had been promised to Quebec?

My second question is: Is the minister still convinced the estimate of $1.5 billion of economic benefits for Quebec is realistic?

Mr. Chairman, my third question is this: Is it true that during the negotiations the PQ government minister, Mr. Duhaime not to name him, was given an opportunity to come and see the F-16 and F-18 file, and that he did not avail himself of that opportunity?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, it is my view that our analysis of the economic spinoffs for the province of Quebec of the F-18 contract is very realistic. In our view, at least 48 per cent of these spinoffs will be located in the province of Quebec.

As we are all aware, the province of Quebec holds a very important place in this government's mind as far as the avionics industry is concerned. We intend to make the Quebec component of that industry a leading sector, while strengthening the industry throughout the country.

The hon. member also asked for details on the possible sites for the turbine blade and vane plant and the digital control machining centre. I can confirm to my hon. colleague that, quite evidently, the turbine blade and vane facility will be built in the eastern townships, although the exact site has not been determined yet. I regret to give the same answer as far as the site for the machining centre is concerned.

In his third question, my hon. colleague asked whether the PQ minister was given an opportunity to consult all the data on which was based our decision to award McDonnell Douglas the F-18 contract. According to my information, those ministers were offered a briefing just before the announcement. But later they were also given an opportunity to have exchanges and discussions between our officers and those of the Quebec government.

I would like to conclude my answer by confirming that in our view, and according to our rather involved analysis, the F-18 contract is a good opportunity for the industry in the province of Quebec and Canada as a whole.

[English]

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to ask a few questions this evening. Before doing so, I would like to preface my remarks by saying that I think this is the first time in my 23 years in the House of Commons that I have seen such a distinguished panel of ministers. All four are such a temptation—

An hon. Member: Like a shooting gallery.

Mr. Crouse: An hon. member says like a shooting gallery. I am not quite sure I know where to begin. To put it in the language of the people I represent, I think perhaps in light of what I heard today someone, perhaps it falls on me, should attempt to get this government back on course. It is obvious it is off course. It has lost its sense of direction and is out there wandering around in a fog of uncertainty not knowing where it is going.

I say that because during the recent election campaign we saw some pretty heavy brass. We had more Liberal brass in Nova Scotia—some could have come to see me, but they did not, they went to see others—than we have flotsam and jetsam along the coast. There was a lot of talk about energy, a lot of talk about oil, and we even had a lot of gas down that way. Before I place my question—

An hon. Member: Ask your question.

Mr. Crouse: I have 20 minutes sir. You had the same amount of time. I think I can use it any way I choose. I hope I am correct. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicates that I am correct. I read from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of Saturday, February 2:

> In the most major speech of the campaign to date, in Halifax last Friday, the Liberals through their leader Pierre Trudeau presented the Liberal's energy program for the 80s. A program designed to achieve energy security at a fair price for all Canadians. The Liberal program featured the following seven major commitments.

I will not read them all because the Liberals are well aware of them, even though they are not introducing them. One reads:

> Liberals realize Canada needs to substitute plentiful resources such as natural gas for the energy resources we are short of like oil. Therefore under "Made in Canada" policies, natural gas will not be pegged to rising international prices. It will be set at a lower made-in-Canada level to encourage people to switch. Massive exports as those endorsed by Joe Clark would be thoroughly investigated so Canadians would always have first claim to their own natural gas resource.
> There would be a natural gas pipeline to ensure all Canadians access to their resources.
>
> Liberals would take immediate action—

I hope the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources listens carefully to this.

> —to begin negotiations for construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes. Initially it would carry natural gas east but when maritime supplies are ready, the pipeline would be like a natural gas railroad with a return delivery facility as well.

On the same date the Prime Minister appeared in Halifax. I read just a short excerpt from his speech:

> But in order to switch, people must have access to gas. Nowhere is access needed more than in eastern Canada. I am announcing today, as part of our program, that a Liberal government will take immediate action to ensure the full co-operation of all parties in the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes. The pipeline will have reversible capacity—

I presume this was made with the full knowledge of the National Energy Board.

> —so that maritimers will have the opportunity, both to use western natural gas now and to send offshore gas to central Canada later. Like the railroad in the 1880s, energy pipelines in the 1980s have the potential to be a steel link uniting the nation.

That is a very fine promise, a very fine pledge. For a starter, I would like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources how does he reconcile his speech today with the undertaking, firm pledge and promise made by the Prime Minister in Halifax.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to have the opportunity of answering the question raised by the hon. member. I am glad to see that he is such a faithful reader of Liberal policy. Indeed, he read exactly and quite accurately the statement of the Prime Minister.

As I indicated, this government believes that a gas pipeline extending all the way to Halifax and Cape Breton is a matter of high priority. We stated in the campaign, as the hon. member read, that a Liberal government would take immediate action to ensure the full co-operation of all parties in the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes.

As soon as we received the report from the National Energy Board, immediate consideration was given to it in cabinet. After extensive consideration of the matter in cabinet, a decision was rendered today to accept the conclusion of the Energy Board report as a first and major step in the realization of the full pipeline about which the hon. member talked.

● (2130)

The hon. member will realize, once he has had an opportunity to consult, the reasons for the decision of the National Energy Board. I recommend to him particularly pages 6-127, 8-49, and 11-6. He will see, for instance, that the government of New Brunswick, as I indicated, has expressed some concern about, in particular, the environmental and economic aspects of this project. The Energy Board has suggested, as I have indicated, that further examination be made of the environmental aspects of this project and also that consideration be given to the economics of offshore natural gas. As far as the government is concerned we are asking Q and M to carry on those environmental studies as expeditiously as possible so the people of the maritimes are assured that there will not be serious damage to the environment by the construction of this project.

In the second place, we intend to study ways and means, with the corporations concerned, to determine whether the exploration off Sable Island could not be accelerated in order that as soon as possible we might be in a position to make a final decision on the realization of the whole pipeline. We are determined there will be no lessening of our drive to convert Atlantic Canada from oil, but we want to do this in co-operation with all the provinces concerned—I do not think we should run roughshod over any province in a matter as important as this. We should also make sure that this is the best decision for the residents of the maritimes.

As I said, we are attaching a very high priority to this question. We are determined that the pause which is being requested by the Energy Board will be as short as possible, and we intend to do everything we can to see to it that the short time taken in obtaining the information which is required will not result in a delay in scheduled delivery of natural gas to the maritimes.

Mr. Crouse: I thank the minister for that answer. For his information, I have been reading the National Energy Board's decision of May 15. There are some interesting contradictions in that report as, I am sure, he will agree. For example, I find one on page 11:

> The board wishes to stress that Q and M has not satisfied the Board that the pipeline could be constructed in an environmentally acceptable manner.

I could not help but wonder why this would be so. Then again, I note at the bottom of page 11-10:

> The board believes that the evidence adduced on offshore resources raised significant uncertainties as to the configuration of the Q and M pipeline and the board is not satisfied that the pipeline facilities proposed to be built and operated by the Q and M are and will be required by the present and future convenience and necessity.

That statement raises considerable doubt in my mind, despite all the promises made by the Prime Minister and the minister of energy, that we shall ever see this natural gas pipeline in Halifax. So I should like to know, and perhaps the minister can give me an idea, how many millions he estimates it will cost to cushion Nova Scotia's electricity costs against rising oil prices, say, for the next seven or eight years, since we are dependent on expensive foreign oil for the generation of something like 70 per cent of the energy required by industries in Nova Scotia. How much does the minister estimate this is likely to cost, and where does he believe the money will come from?

Mr. Lalonde: On the subject of the pipeline itself, the hon. member has quoted a certain section of this report, but I might point out that the report goes on to mention that the information obtained from the east coast offshore areas should determine what type of pipeline ought to be built later on. As far as the environment is concerned, the hon. member was wondering on what basis the Energy Board was making its conclusion. Surely, it was making it on the basis of the evidence which it had received. But it is interesting to note that on page 6-127 ten different, specific areas are mentioned about which the board is requesting Q and M, the Quebec and Maritime Corporation, to come up with environmental studies and additional information. So there are numerous areas where it appears to the board that further environmental information is required.

As to the point raised by the hon. member concerning oil-generated electricity, he is quite right in saying that the cost is high. He mentions that the high costs result from the need to import oil supplies. However, I am sure he knows that this imported oil is paid for by all Canadians, thanks to policies established by a Liberal government in 1974. Consequently, Canadians are paying for their oil a price which is well below the world price or the international price or the price of imported oil, and the citizens of Nova Scotia are benefiting from this national policy of a single price for all Canadians below the world price. We have fought for this policy. We campaigned in the last election for this policy, and I hope we will get the support of the hon. member's party, or, at any rate, of members of his party coming from the maritimes, for our policy which aims at establishing a price in Canada which is not tied to world prices.

Nonetheless, even at prices which are lower than world prices, the production of electricity from oil in Nova Scotia is expensive. The hon. member asks how much it costs. That will depend, obviously, on the forecast of prices he makes. It will depend mainly on the kind of agreement we can get with the government of Alberta. I can tell him that at my last meeting with the government of his province, the government of that province presented me with a potential bill of $555 million representing federal subsidies they would like to obtain over the next seven years solely for the cushioning of the cost of its oil-generated electricity and helping in the transformation from oil. This is over half a billion dollars for the province of Nova Scotia alone.

At that time I indicated that indeed this was a matter we were ready and willing to look at, because it is essential that the electricity produced in Nova Scotia be "off oil" but obviously the federal government needed to have the resources from any future oil agreement which would allow it to help a province like Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crouse: Basically, what the minister has told the committee tonight is that when campaigning, and this includes all the Liberals who campaigned in Nova Scotia, he and his colleagues were aware, as the Prime Minister must have been aware, of the views of the National Energy Board as they apply to this problem. In effect they railroaded the people of Nova Scotia with that promise. I stress the point that there is no equivocation in that speech by the Prime Minister. The words are: "We will immediately bring that gas pipeline to Halifax". That is the statement, and it has been indicated tonight that it was nothing more than an election promise.

● (2140)

I will go on to two other questions. I have more if my time permits, but I would like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he is prepared at some future time to indicate to the National Energy Board, in support of a re-application of Q and M, that he is prepared to subsidize the cost of the transmission of gas to the maritimes in the same way that the government now subsidizes domestic oil shipped to Montreal.

I do not want to ignore the entire panel, so while I am on my feet I would like to leave one with—somebody is calling out "stop". If he does not wish to participate in the hearings here this evening, he is free to leave or he is free to rise and seek to ask a question. I do not like being interrupted, and if the hon. member would stand and indicate who he is—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for South Shore has the floor.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I hope you will keep the rabble on the other side quiet because this is a committee—

An hon. Member: Shut up.

Mr. Crouse: He says I should shut up, Mr. Chairman. I think you should ask him to withdraw that. That is not being very parliamentary or constructive.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Out, Olivier.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, perhaps he should leave because he is suffering from pain in the belly or something.

I have a very simple question for the President of the Treasury Board. Would he give us an update on the privatization program for certain Crown corporations? Maybe I could have both of those answers in sequence.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, first, I am sorry that the hon. member has distorted so obviously the statement that he himself quoted at the beginning of his own intervention. He read it into the record, and I am sure the public will be able to see his statement for what it is, a straight distortion of a statement made by the Prime Minister. The statement he just made is completely false, and he should withdraw it.

When the hon. member reads Hansard tomorrow he will see that the words he read into the record were not attributed to this party or to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said, and I quote again for the record, in case the hon. member forgot what he himself read, "A Liberal government will take immediate action to ensure full co-operation of all parties in the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Quebec City and the maritimes".

Mr. Crouse: That's right.

Mr. Lalonde: That is on the record. That is what we stand by, and that is our commitment. We are not welshing or withdrawing from that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Indeed, in order to ensure the full co-operation of the parties concerned, I have already consulted with the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I have already reported to this House on some of the issues and the problems.

The hon. member should remember that in January and February his party was in office. He must have remembered that, although he may not have had the chance of participating very much in that government.

An hon. Member: He was in New Zealand.

Mr. Lalonde: I am advised that he was in New Zealand at the time, but I do not think it is true. He was campaigning in his riding like an honest candidate.

Mr. Crouse: I am still here.

Mr. Lalonde: However, how dare he say to this House that we knew what was going on at the National Energy Board and what the conclusions of the National Energy Board were? The National Energy Board was either still holding its hearings or was considering the evidence. We were in the opposition. I hope even the government of the day was not made aware of the current deliberations of the National Energy Board. That would have been quite improper and incorrect. We were acquainted with the conclusions of the National Energy Board when the National Energy Board report was given to the government some time in April. The cabinet since has had time to read the report, examine it and weigh its arguments, and we have come to the conclusion that the best way to ensure progress in the realization of the whole projet is to endorse and accept the report of the National Energy Board because, as the hon. member knows, our choice under the law is either to accept or reject that report.

By accepting it, we are ensuring that at least part of the line is going to be built. It will reach Quebec City.

As soon as it is finished and if the National Energy Board, after having held hearings, comes with further recommendations, and if Q and M makes a further application and there is a positive recommendation, I hope the cabinet would endorse it, and we would be in a much better position to realize the full line in time for the people of the maritimes to benefit from the realization of this project. That is our approach, that is our policy, and I believe it is a very honest, realistic and reasonable approach to this issue. In his last intervention I do not think the hon. member interpreted the situation adequately or fairly.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for South Shore has asked me to provide an update, as I understand it, on the so-called privatization plans which, as many hon. members will recall, were initiated back in 1976 by the Liberal administration, the idea being to examine certain Crown corporations and also certain operations of government which might be susceptible to transfer to the private sector.

As I recall, deputies were asked to identify certain areas, and a number of corporations were on the list and were being reviewed prior to the change of government. I just say that because I believe my predecessor, the hon. member for York-Peel, often portrays himself as being the father of privatization, which he is not.

In any event, my predecessor did commission a review of five Crown corporations and the evaluation of those corporations by independent consultants, being First Boston Corporation and A. E. Ames. The corporations in question which were the subject of those studies were the CDC, de Havilland, Canadair, Northern Transportation and, I believe, Eldorado. We have received a preliminary evaluation of the CDC from A. E. Ames, and we expect to receive further evaluations within the very near future on all of these five Crown corporations.

With respect to what steps we have taken, we have taken none other than to wait for these reports to come to us, and also to suspend—but not disband—the advisory committee, which was appointed by my predecessor, under the chairmanship of Mr. Derek Hannaford.

The matter has not been abandoned, but it is not an idealological issue with us on this side of the House. We look at the question of privatization in the whole context of achieving greater efficiency in government.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., pursuant to the terms of the order made Tuesday, April 29, 1980, it is my duty to put forthwith—

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if there would be a disposition for the House to continue a little further with the examination. I note that it is not ten o'clock. I know what the Standing Orders are, but I wonder if there might be a disposition to allow the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster, who has been very patiently waiting, to ask questions of the ministers. I wonder if the ministers, now that they are here with their officials, would accommodate him.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton seeks the unanimous consent of the House to carry questioning on for some time.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised by the request made by my hon. colleague. I would like to accommodate him, but if I create a precedent by accommodating one of my colleagues, whom I respect very much, I would place myself in a very bad position because several members who wanted to speak have not been able to do so precisely because the time allotted is rather limited, even though we must admit that we have had a very good day's work. In view of the circumstances, I would not like to be unfair towards other members. Yesterday, I stated unequivocally that I considered all members on both sides of the House as equal. I believe I would be going against this principle if I allowed an opposition member to speak, without doing the same for my colleagues who would like to do so and without the House being able to adjourn before midnight, or else very late this evening. There has been an agreement, and all I want to do is keep to it. Next fall, there will be days when the House will sit in Committee of the Whole, sometimes until midnight. I believe we have been more than reasonable, and I am convinced that my hon. colleague will understand the position I am taking this evening in the name of fairness, and I call on his good judgment to understand my attitude.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the remarks made by the previous speaker, the difficulty consists just of choosing one member and not being fair to other members. Perhaps the minister might consider the committee sitting until eleven o'clock, taking the chance that many members can be heard. It is very difficult for us to find a chance to ask the ministers questions, other than the brief ones during the question period. We have the ministers here and their officials are here, the hockey game is probably over, so there is no reason why we could not continue sitting in the interest of examining some of the estimates further until eleven o'clock. I would ask the minister to consider that.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton put the question as to whether there might be unanimous consent to continue. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Clearly there is not unanimous consent.

It being 9.50 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to an order made on Tuesday, April 29, 1980, to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Committee of the Whole stage of the bill.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) on a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, excuse me for troubling you. I would like to inquire about the Standing Order. Is it customary to pass $20 billion when there are exactly 20 members opposite in the House? The opposition is away.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the hon. member rises on a point of order, I assume it is an appeal to the rules. I do not think the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) expects the Chair to rule on that as a point of order.

It being ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 9.54 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
