Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Siddon: He knows that full well. The people of British Columbia, if not all of Canada, expect strong, decisive action by the Prime Minister, now, to press this matter with the United States government.

During his meeting yesterday with Secretary of State Vance, did the Prime Minister press this important issue, and will he confirm that a strong ultimatum has been delivered in accordance with promises made to the voters of British Columbia?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I did, and so did the Secretary of State for External Affairs, raise this subject with Secretary Vance. I must remind the hon. member that our government, when it was in power, had indicated to the United States more than a year ago its preference for the all-land pipe route. The Tory government waited from June 4—

An hon. Member: That's not true.

Mr. Trudeau: —to the end of September to state its position on that. As a result of that, the Americans made a decision for the overseas route. We are trying to redress that horrible mistake by that party when it was in power.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER LEGISLATION DRAFTED ON ENERGY CONSERVATION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister confirm to the House that he has asked the officials in his department to draft legislation dealing with energy conservation matters which now normally fall within provincial jurisdiction?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Kilgour: That does not correspond to our own information on the matter, Madam Speaker. However, in light of the commitments made in the throne speech on the issue of conservation, can you tell the House whether you will be discussing this issue with our provincial partners in the near future?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

PROMOTION OF OVERLAND ROUTE

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question which was just put to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister tell this House why in December, 1971, his government decided to take no action to promote an overland oil pipeline at that time, the consequence of which assured the Alyeska pipeline, and that is why we have tankers on the west coast today?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member were to inform himself through the officials in the United States who were concerned with energy in those days and, more recently, through the minister of energy of the United States, Mr. Schlesinger, he would know that the Alyeska line was a choice made by the United States regardless of Canadian attitude. They were determined in those days to build the Alyeska pipeline, come what may, and they have said so in so many words.

ENERGY

PRICE OF NATURAL GAS FOR EXPORT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Let me tell him, before I ask the question, that he is allowed to answer with more than a Oui or a Non; it is not a referendum question.

According to a report in this morning's Globe and Mail, as the result of personal intervention to the Prime Minister by Mr. John G. McMillian, chairman of Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company of Delaware, the government ordered the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to impose a moratorium on a scheduled price increase on natural gas exports to the United States.

Can the minister explain to this House how he reconciles this action with a "made-in-Canada" energy policy as bruited in the throne speech?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would be glad to answer with more than a Yes or a No. I am not aware of any such presentation having been made to the Prime Minister, and I am not aware of any representation coming from the Prime Minister's office or the Prime Minister to my department in this respect. I do not know of any such representation made by Mr. McMillian. If the hon. member wishes to ask the Prime Minister whether any such representation was made, obviously that is up to him.

I can tell the hon. member that the decision was reached following strong representations by the authorities of the producing provinces as well as by the private sector in this respect. I made the decision to impose the moratorium on the basis also of consultations that I had with my department on the matter.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I will ask the Prime Minister. By my calculations, that is a $75 million letter, in lost revenues to the people of Canada, that went to the Prime Minister. The government has already, by international treaty, bargained away the right to impose a throughput tax on the Alaskan pipeline, they have allowed the National Energy Board to reopen the whole matter of pre-building, and then there is this instance where it has responded rather hurriedly—within a day or so—to the urgings of a chief pipeline executive from the United States.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to acknowledge receipt of this letter and table it in the House and, further, to explain to the House just how far he is prepared to go in compromising Canadian energy policy in order to facilitate the building of this American pipeline?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we do not call it an American pipeline. We have negotiated for the building of that pipeline which will have untold advantages for Canada, not only in terms of building the pipeline but in terms of bringing our own gas in the Arctic down to central and western Canada; so I do not think it is fair to say that it is an American pipeline. It is in the interests of both countries. The reasons given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as to why we made this decision and announced it last week are the correct ones.

Mr. Waddell: Will you table the letter?

REGULATIONS GOVERNING DISPOSITION OF CROWN-OWNED OIL

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since it is ten years this month that the oil and gas regulations governing the disposition of Crown-owned oil and gas lands in northern Canada were withdrawn, leaving industry operating in a regulatory vacuum, and since because the ground rules—for instance, those dealing with royalties and tenure—are not defined, investments by exploration companies, particularly by privately-owned Canadian companies, have been seriously curtailed, can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources advise this House when, in order to expedite the goal of energy self-sufficiency—which was a policy of the previous government and, I would hope, is a policy of this government—he intends to bring before this House the long-awaited new legislation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Soon, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, that is the same answer that the Hon. J. J. Greene gave ten years ago this month, in 1970.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: What assurances do we have that this time they will be put into effect?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, then my answer has to be "Very soon".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PLANS FOR EXPLORATION IN NORTH

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In developing plans for energy self-sufficiency, has the minister, or his department, determined to what extent Canada is looking to oil and gas reserves north of the 60th parallel? In particular, has his department developed a timetable and target date, or dates, for exploration activities in the north and completion of the necessary delivery systems, whether they be pipelines or LNG tankers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is yes, and the answer to the second part of the question is no.

Mr. Neil: Madam Speaker, I had hoped that the minister would elaborate in his answer. My supplementary question is with respect to the expansion of the oilfield at Norman Wells, and the application filed by Interprovincial Pipe Line to build a pipeline and to move oil to the south.

Will the minister assure the House and the people of Canada that, assuming approval by the NEB, his government will give speedy approval to the construction of this line in order that we may quickly move toward energy self-sufficiency?

Mr. Lalonde: Madame Speaker, I had the pleasure of meeting recently with the president of Imperial Oil and I asked him about their plans in this regard. I was very interested indeed in learning that they are very eager to proceed with this particular plan.

The matter is before the NEB, or it will be very shortly. It would be inappropriate on my part to comment on a matter which is before the board. I will await the recommendations of the board, and I can assure the House that whatever the recommendations, the government will give them very speedy examination.

AIRPORTS

AVAILABILITY OF EVACUATION AND RESCUE RESOURCES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I have a telex from the transport employees' section of the Public Service Alliance in Winnipeg which reads:

● (1440)

Transport has decided airport firefighters will no longer have any responsibility for the evacuation of passengers or crew in the event of an accident or fire involving planes at any airport. The responsibility for rescue or evacuation has been transferred to the airlines.

In view of the fact that job specifications for the firefighters includes rescue and evacuation, I should like to ask the minister whether it is correct that this requirement has been omitted from the policy of the Department of Transport and that firefighters are no longer responsible for evacuation and rescue of people in aircraft that have crashed.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, much as I do not like to take a question as notice, I shall have to do it this time because I am not aware of that change. I shall look into it immediately.

Mr. Benjamin: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I gave the minister's office notice of this question yesterday and I was advised that the minister would be in the House for the question period, but he was not.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Benjamin: The matter was reported in the Winnipeg press three or four days ago, the statement has been made by a branch of the Public Service Alliance, and I should like to ask—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question, please.

Mr. Benjamin: I should like to ask the minister if he will assure the House that he will instruct his officials that, under all circumstances, in addition to extinguishing fires and having fire-free paths from all aircraft, the firefighters will continue to do all they can—since they are the people equipped and trained to do it, not the airline personnel—to evacuate and rescue passengers from aircraft accidents at any airport in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, everyone knows how industrious I am. The reason I have not had time to read the papers in front of me is that up to 2.15 today I was meeting with delegates from Winnipeg, as a matter of fact. Last night I was in Toronto discussing other issues with the Ontario government. There are only 24 hours in a day, Madam Speaker, and I always try to make the best use of them.

Mr. Nielsen: If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen.

FISHERIES

POLICIES FOR ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In view of the announcement by National Sea Products Ltd., of Halifax, Nova Scotia, that it is launching a $25 million integrated fishing and fish processing operation in Uruguay, which is prompted by doubts about the way Canada's east coast fishery is being directed, is the minister contemplating any review of present fisheries policies with a view to retaining this type of investment in Atlantic Canada? If so, when can we anticipate an announcement by him, or the Prime Minister for that matter, on this question which is of great economic importance to the region?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I assume that if the company in question has decided to invest in a foreign country, it must be doing so for obvious economic reasons. I might say to the hon. member that one of the reasons they have money to invest abroad is because the policies we have put in place have allowed them to accumulate such profits and to have such increases in their shares that they are now able to venture elsewhere.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The Uruguay operation is only one of several recent international diversifications announced by this company, with the new plant to be initially served by six Danish-built, stern trawlers ordered some two years ageo while the minister was in power. The plant will use mostly Norwegian fish processing equipment financed by the Norwegian Export Development Corporation.

Did the minister, when he and his government were in power during the period when these steps were being taken, make any effort to encourage the construction of these ships in Canada in order to provide needed employment in our shipyards and all the ancillary, related industries?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I hope the hon. member checks his facts very carefully. To my knowledge, the company in question has ordered six new trawlers, three of which were built in Japan and three of which are scheduled to be built in Nova Scotia with the help of the Nova Scotia government. They are scheduled to fish in Canada. The disposition of other seiners or trawlers, of which the hon. member speaks, escapes me.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF TAR SANDS AND HEAVY OIL RESOURCES

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister still committed to the development of tar sands and heavy oil resources in western Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the same minister. In view of that answer, will the minister inform the House whether an analysis was done to determine the cost, not only to the local economy but to the Canadian economy, of a minimum of a one-year delay in either the Alsands or the Imperial Oil projects to the economy of Canada, due to the uncertainty caused by his unilateral decision on freezing the price of tar sands' oil?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. member has got his facts wrong again. The price of oil from tar sands has not been frozen. At the present time we are paying the international price, and I said that we would continue to pass on the increases while the negotiations were going on with the producing provinces—in this particular case, Alberta.

As I indicated the other day, the president of Syncrude had indicated that the decision had no impact on its current operation. As far as the future is concerned, we never said that the price would be frozen. We said the price would be increased gradually without being tied to the international price.

As far as any delay is concerned, I would remind the hon. member that it is not this government that has delayed the establishment or the starting of this plant. It is the government of Alberta that has refused to give approval to Alsands to proceed, and they have said that they would not do anything at least until they have an agreement on price. The decision all along has been for the government of Alberta. That decision was taken well before we announced our decision concerning the price of tar sands oil.

PUBLISHING

FOREIGN TAKE-OVER OF CANADIAN COMPANY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I should first like to congratulate the minister on his appointment. At this time, when Canadians are attempting to expand and even retain their sense of identity, we need a strong minister who will fight for Canadian artists.

Last week, Madam Speaker, it was announced that one of our oldest and most distinguished publishing companies, MacMillan, will be purchased by a foreign-controlled textbook company, Gage, a company that has shown no interest whatsoever in carrying on the proud tradition of publishing and distributing the works of major Canadian authors. I should like to ask the minister what is going on. These two companies received over a million dollars from public funds over the last year. Is the minister aware of this situation, and what is he prepared to do to stop this type of take-over?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes. I should like to tell him that I am, of course, aware of the take-over. I have asked my officials to examine it and to report to me as soon as possible.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I hope the minister will announce some policy on the intentions of the government. Gage will receive a million dollars in subsidies this year, yet it has enough money to buy MacMillan. This will cause lay-offs and restrict even further the opportunity of Canadian authors to distribute their works.

Are we going to allow foreign-controlled companies to use Canadian money to buy Canadian firms? Is this what taxpayers are paying for?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that the two companies involved are Canadian companies acting under Canadian law.

I have indicated my concern and the concern in general of the government about the future of MacMillan and the type of publishing in which they have been involved in the past. We are looking into the matter and will see what possibilities for action are open to the government.

MINES

PROMOTION OF GROWTH IN MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of State for Mines to give her an opportunity to rise and pleasantly dazzle this House with her person and her knowledge of the mining industry.

● (1450)

Can the minister assure this House and the mining industry that her government is planning no regressive taxation, regulatory or legislative initiatives which will inhibit the orderly growth of the mining industry as her government did during the early 1970s.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: Please let it be noted that I have no trouble at all with the prefix "Madam Speaker". I welcome the opportunity to use it.

I would like to thank the hon. member for his discovery. I thought for a moment I would need to have my officials prepare a geological survey in order to come to this discovery. No, indeed, I am not aware of any of these measures at present. In fact, I met with officials yesterday from British Columbia, who asked the same question. There are no moves at present to increase the tax base.

Mr. Yurko: I have a supplementary question of a more specific nature. On June 29, 1978, first reading was given to Bill C-64, an act respecting uranium and thorium mines, which would have required companies proposing to extract uranium in commercial quantities to obtain an extraction permit from the Foreign Investment Review Agency in addition to any permits required by the Atomic Energy Control Act. Can the minister assure this House that her government will in no way reinstate or revive this bill and bring it to this House?

Mrs. Erola: I cannot give the hon. member that assurance at this time because the entire matter is under review at the moment.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

GUIDELINES FOR MEMBERS OF CABINET

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister. At the outset of this Parliament, the Prime Minister indicated, as I understood him, that within a fortnight he would be bringing down and tabling in this House conflict of interest guidelines.

I suspect that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections will be meeting rather soon. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he has any specific date when these conflict of interest guidelines for cabinet ministers will be brought down, and confirm that he will, in fact, table those guidelines in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker. I would inform the hon. member that the matter was discussed for the final time in cabinet this morning. As a result of that discussion I will be sending the guidelines in their final form to the ministers, probably on Monday. I would hope that they could be tabled one day next week, and no later.

GRAIN

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO OFFSET LOSSES OF PRODUCERS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I pass on my condolences to him on his workload, and my apologies for adding to it. Since the minister responsible for the Wheat Board does not have the right to sit in this House, I have no alternative.

In light of the fact that export grain prices in countries supporting the U.S. boycott have fallen between 80 cents and $1 per bushel, and in light of the fact that non-embargo supporting countries are receiving as much as $1.35 per bushel over our current price, what support program by way of government assistance is the minister proposing to implement in order to keep the right hon. Prime Minister's promise of April 15, 1980, to offset any losses to grain producers?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the concept of compensation in this case—I am sorry, I have to do a bit of a Paul Martin on this one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: The concept of compensation is not easy to assess; the justification for it, I mean. Canada, because of its policy with respect to the U.S.S.R. invasion of Afghanistan, has committed itself not to a boycott or an embargo, but a restraint. Present sales to the Soviet Union are at a fairly good level; until March, two million tons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: Well, we committed ourselves to no "normal and traditional" levels. What is that? It goes from two to five million tons. We are trying to reach a happy medium and to honour our obligations with respect to our policies on Afghanistan.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRICE OF WHEAT AND FINAL PAYMENT TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my second question is also for the Minister of Transport. The quantity that we sell does not make too much difference; it is the price that counts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that the way you farm?

Mr. Hovdebo: In view of the serious situation in which grain producers are finding themselves due to high interest rates and other increasing farm costs, will the minister assure this House that he will increase the initial price of wheat for 1980-81 to the current level of $4.25 per cent bushel, an increase of 50 cents a bushel over the announced initial price; and, secondly, will the minister guarantee grain producers a final payment equal to pre-embargo levels?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has an advantage over me: he has a piece of paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: There is, obviously, a relationship between price and quantity. No one will deny that there has been a reduction in the level of prices since the embargo. That is one of the factors being looked into in assessing the justification for compensation.

With respect to initial prices, the government announced them a number of days ago. There is always a debate, as far as I can remember, as to what level they should be at in relation to expectations. In this instance, the government went as far as it could while at the same time being reasonable and indicating certain future developments. Therefore, I do not apologize for that. There has always been a debate each year on the level of initial payments, as far as I remember, for the past 12 years or so.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ADVERTISING OF AHOP—REASON FOR CONTINUANCE OF PROGRAM

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Since the minister has acknowledged there is a serious problem with the infamous AHOP—the Assisted Home Ownership Program—by making meagre promises of little help, and since I have 4,000 units in my riding, 16,000 in the region of Peel, and that the residents of these units whom I talked to feel most strongly that they were misled by the government into purchasing these units—you might say seduced into purchasing these units—and since four in ten are now vacant, in many of the complexes, and are being abandoned, why is he allowing this ill-conceived program to continue and using advertising such as this to lure unsuspecting families down the road to disaster within five years?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I must admit that my experience in the municipality of which I was mayor is directly contradictory to that of my friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cosgrove: I am happy to report that, on the whole, the performance rate of this program has been 95 per cent successful. In other words, of those people who originally entered that program, only 5 per cent of the total program area have found that they cannot continue. I must admit there may be some isolated problems, but on the whole it has been a good program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—ALLOCATION OF HOPPER CARS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. So that he will not be at a disadvantage, I gave him notice of the question and discussed it with him. It has to do with the strange policy the government follows in allocating hopper cars for grain movement to the British Columbia Railway which his officials consider to be a foreign railway.

Can the minister tell the House today whether he has informed himself sufficiently to realize that the British Columbia Railway hauls grain under the same arrangement as the other railways, and that they should be allocated an adequate amount of the rolling stock which is paid for by the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is also a very debatable subject. The BCR is not obliged to give Crowsnest rates to the grain shippers. It does so on a voluntary basis, and consequently there would be some justification for the government of British Columbia to do, with respect to the purchasing of hopper cars, what other western provincial governments have done.

This is a debatable subject, I repeat, but as the railway fleet becomes increasingly able to cope with the present requirements there is a possibility that some of these hopper cars could be assigned to the BCR. This is being discussed at the moment.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, might I direct a question to the government House Leader with respect to the business of the House for the next few days now that the debate on the Speech from the Throne has been suspended? Would the hon. gentleman also tell us when he might consider scheduling the last two days of the debate on the Speech from the Throne? When might that debate continue and finish?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, today we shall proceed with Bill C-19 and if we do not complete its study tomorrow we shall take up Bill C-17. If that bill is completed before the end of the day, we can then go on to Bill C-5 as well as, perhaps, Bill C-18.

My hon. colleague knows negotiations are under way with a view to reaching an agreement on the designation of days for the consideration of the business of supply. I trust we can reach an agreement within the next few days which would spare us having to discuss the matter again early next week. In the event of an agreement being reached, we can then proceed next week with the bill on the Bank Act.

With regard to the second part of the question about the last two days of debate on the Speech from the Throne, I asked that the debate be adjourned and resumed later this session. No firm decision has been reached on the exact time at which it can be resumed and completed.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There are two other matters, Madam Speaker. At the opening of the session a motion was put forward under Standing Order 43 asking that the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada appear before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. That was rejected, unfortunately, even though it was in the same terms as a motion the former government had brought before the House. But in the course of the discussion the Minister of Finance said he would consider the kind of appeal set forth in the motion. Has that consideration taken place and will the Minister of Finance and the governor of the bank be available in terms of that motion under Standing Order 43?

The second matter has to do with parliamentary business generally and should be of interest to all members. I think the hon. gentleman will recall that on December 11, 1979, a reference was passed by the House which would allow the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to receive and examine reports from official parliamentary delegations. If he will check Hansard he will see that this is the case. I understand that parliamentary delegations will be going out and that organizations are being activated within Parliament for such a purpose.

It might be appropriate if the government House leader would consider making that kind of reference again on the understanding that it is not our intention to debate the matter but to support it. We believe it was a good reference and it would allow the observations of members of Parliament, as they travel as members of Parliament, to be brought to the attention of the standing committee. If the hon. gentleman would consider this I would be extremely grateful.

Finally, has the government House leader decided when he will begin the allotment of allotted days in this supply period?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, with regard to the first point, the Minister of Finance is now attending the International Monetary Fund conference. I shall be pleased to convey to him the question put to me by my hon. colleague and report as soon as possible.

Concerning the second point, I am taking note of the interest expressed by my colleague. As for the third, it all depends, of course, on the negotiations which were started two weeks ago, that is, at the beginning of the current session.

I do intend to allow the parties of the opposition a very reasonable length of time to proceed with the study of the estimates. Allotted days usually serve that purpose. I want to assure my colleague that he will have at least as many allotted days as the Standing Orders would allow, if they applied.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, with respect to House business in the next little while may I ask the President of the Privy Council whether Bill C-16, having to do with the guaranteed income supplement, is high on his priority list? May I also ask him if he will give priority to the bill which the Minister of Veterans Affairs has promised to introduce at an early date?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. In answer to the second part I would say I hope to be in a position to satisfy the hon. member.

[English]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, after a sincere effort on my part to collect the data upon which to state my case on a question of privilege I find it is not complete. Could I have your permission to bring the matter to your attention tomorrow?

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is the second bill I have had the pleasure to introduce in the last 24 hours. I hope that hon. members of this House will be as courteous and as agreeable in their treatment of this bill as they were with the first because I bring to the bill the same sense of urgency which was required yesterday in the sense that this bill, which has been submitted in the past, has very severe and very important time-squeeze restraints on it. We feel it is absolutely necessary to pass this bill within a very short period of time in order to properly maintain this program.

The bill is very simple in its purpose. It is simply to extend for one further year the application of the employment tax credit program, a program which was brought in in 1978 to provide a range of tax credits to private employers for creating additional or incremental employment. As members who have examined this bill will probably know, the range was from $1.50 in areas of reasonably low unemployment up to $2.00 in areas of high unemployment such as the maritimes.

In the last year the tax credit program has provided close to 50,000 additional jobs, according to the best figures that we have, at a cost of approximately $100 million. The problem that we faced was that the legislation authorizing the granting of these tax credits came to an end on March 31 of this year. In order to continue the program, therefore, we had to bring in this legislation to extend it for one more year.

What we have done is to include within the bill a retroactive clause which would allow us to make the date of resubmission of applications as of April 15. That means there has been a two-week hiatus between March 31 and April 15 in which employers could not submit applications. Once the bill was introduced through a ways and means motion we then informed employers that they could submit applications but that there was a very strict caveat on those applications: if the legislation was not passed by this House and by Parliament, then the agreements would no longer apply. We did feel that it was important to try to maintain the continuity of the program so that the momentum which had been built up and the expectations of the employers would not be frustrated.

In terms of the success of the employment tax credit itself, it has had, aside from additional employment throughout Canada, a set of additional objectives, such as being a tax credit or an incentive which has been particularly useful to small business. Close to 70 per cent of the benefits under this program and the jobs created have occurred in businesses employing under 20 people. So aside from the simple job-creation aspect it has also been a measure which has provided substantial incentive to small businessmen and given them an extra benefit under the tax program.

It has also been a program which has been highly focused upon youth employment. Our estimates and evaluations show that about 60 per cent of those under the program were young people. The tax credit program seems to have provided a degree of benefit, particularly in the manufacturing industry, and it has had a fair degree of regional application.

If we look at the allocations across Canada, there has been a sufficient and large number of agreements signed in the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and western Canada. It has not been particularly concentrated in one region or the other. The important point about this bill is that it is required right now in order to continue the program.

In this respect I would like to tell hon. members that they should not treat this as being the only job-creation program this government will introduce. It is simply that we are required under the imperative of time to bring this bill in right away in order to maintain the program. It is certainly our intention, as was outlined in the throne speech, to introduce into this House within a very short period of time—perhaps a matter of two or three weeks—additional job-creation programs to respond to unemployment problems in this country. I am restrained because those job-creation programs have not been completely canvassed or reviewed by cabinet, but they would provide a mixture of job incentives both in terms of additional tax programs, additional job-training programs and additional direct work programs and would be able to target in on very special kinds of employment needs which exist in the country, particularly those of young people, women and various minority groups which find barriers or handicaps in the job market.

So I want to indicate to hon. members that this is really only the beginning of a continuation of job-creation programs this government intends to bring forward for consideration.

I should point out that the other job-creation programs will not be of a legislated nature. We have full authority within our estimates and within the programs of the department to apply other job-creation programs. At this point in time it is only this particular initiative which requires legislative enactment.

It is also our hope to begin looking at the longer term employment requirements in Canada. I believe it was last week that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that we intend to establish—in fact, it is already in process—a task force composed of members of Parliament from all the respective parties which will be commissioned to undertake a public examination of critical job shortages in Canada and of how both the public and the private sectors might respond to them. As hon. members probably know, my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), will be chairman of that committee. I believe discussions are now in progress with regard to additional members from the other parties who will participate.

We expect that task force to initiate its actions almost immediately to provide for a more complete review in a public way. At the same time, we will also be undertaking a serious re-examination within my department and within the government itself in order to come to grips with the fundamental issue of how we can most efficiently and effectively use public resources to create additional job stimulation.

That does not mean in any way, shape or form that we can replace the role of the private sector. It is by far the most important and significant generator of employment in this country, but the government does have a role in supplementing and adding to the employment picture, particularly with respect to special needs and problems where there are the handicapped, disadvantaged and particular regional problems. That will be the basic philosophy which we will bring to our over-all job-creation program.

I ask for the co-operation of hon. members with regard to this bill because of its importance in maintaining the continuity of our program. If we delay it too long, that will mean that there will be a substantial gap in time. As a result we would experience a fall-off in the initiative by private employers to sign agreements with the government to come into this kind of tax credit arrangement.

I certainly welcome the contributions of members opposite and on this side of the House to the general issue of employment and job creation, but I hope that they will be sufficiently cautious to restrain their remarks to the point where we can deal with this bill with some dispatch. We will have many opportunities in the future, I am sure, to discuss the larger, broader and very important question of unemployment and how this House and this government can respond to it.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit a question, because I notice he has a great deal of time left. In his remarks the minister indicated that he will be following this measure by making further proposals dealing with job creation and that they will not be of a legislative nature, that he has plenty of authority within the 1980-81 estimates to do so. As the minister is aware, there has been a great deal of discussion in the House in the last couple of days about the nature of those estimates. Can the minister tell the House how much money is earmarked in the estimates for new job-creation programs, and can he indicate to the House what changes have been made in the nature of those programs from what is proposed in the estimates? In other words, how do the Liberal job-creation programs that he intends to introduce differ from those which are currently contemplated in the Conservative estimates?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I thought the hon. member indicated he wanted to rise on a point of order. It has been the tradition of the House that if a member who has the floor permits it, a question can be asked, but I do not think it is appropriate for the Chair to encourage members of the House to open up another question and answer period. If the minister agrees to answer the question, I will allow it, but otherwise we will not continue with questions and answers.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, my simple answer to the hon. member is that, as he well knows, the estimates do set out the expenditure arrangements which do not necessarily have to be attached to any specific programs so long as the envelope or package states the same dollar amount. I can assure the hon. member that our job-creation programs will be restrained or restricted to the same kind of estimates that were put forward, but they will be of a different form and nature.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I rise in the Thirty-second Parliament, and the first time as a critic on behalf of my party.

First, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) on his appointment and wish him well in the exercise of those responsibilities. I should also like to take this occasion to congratulate Madam Speaker and all those who sit in the chair.

I think it may be useful for me to try to explain to the House the sense in which I intend to approach my responsibility on behalf of the official opposition in speaking on employment matters. I view the job of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in terms of his manpower responsibility, as the human being who represents in the House of Commons the Canadian people in the area of employment. It is this minister who sits opposite us here today who represents more than one million Canadians who are currently unemployed, who represents those one million people before his cabinet colleagues and who speaks out on their behalf.

I refer to the more than one million unemployed because I think there is a great deal of evidence that the official estimates of unemployment rates in this country are seriously in error. Any survey which includes those people who would like to work but who are unable to find jobs provides us with an estimate of between a quarter of a million and 300,000 in addition to the official unemployment figure.

I should like to suggest to members of the House who have expressed concern about equality that clearly the group which is not treated fairly in this country is the group of unemployed. There are between 10 million and 11 million employed people in this country, and we have over one million people who are seeking work and cannot find it. In a sense, we have created a class of haves and a class of have-nots.

I think it is useful sometimes—and this is the tradition of our party as the word "Conservative" suggests—that we look back at history and learn some of the lessons it has to teach us. We do not have to look very far back in time to find out that this nation has not always had a million unemployed people. In 1968 this country experienced its first Trudeau government. In those days there were slightly more than 300,000 Canadians who were looking for work and could not find it. Now, in 1980, there are more than one million Canadians who are looking for work and cannot find it.

Today, we are being asked to consider an extension of one more public sector job-creation project, and the tendency on this side of the House is to provide the minister with the legislative authority to proceed because this nation is in crisis. There are more than one million unemployed Canadians. I rank employment in the same category as food and shelter. A job is part of our identity as people; it is the way in which we interact with others, it gives us the financial security to take the plunge to buy a home, to rent an apartment, to be normal, happily functioning members of our society. It is a tragedy that something approaching one-tenth of the labour force in this country is currently unemployed. They are the have-nots. We have created this class of have-nots through a series of economic initiatives which span more than a decade now, which span a period of 12 years of economic mismanagement. I suggest to the House that those 12 years of economic mismanagement have created the one million have-nots who are in this country.

On Monday evening of this week I watched when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) presented to the House his "Mickey Mouse" budget, his half budget. I sat here feeling sad and concerned because I heard a set of economic pronouncements guaranteed to create between 100,000 and 200,000 have-nots. I was bothered by the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration sat there and did not communicate to me any sense of being concerned, any sense that his portfolio will now include another 100,000 to 200,000 Canadians who will not have jobs by this fall. I listened to a set of economic statements which will create 100,000 to 200,000 more have-nots and I thought the Minister of Employment and Immigration should have been concerned since it is his area of responsibility. As I said in my opening remarks, I think he must represent those have-nots to his cabinet colleagues, to his caucus and to the governing party.

It must be clear that the economic statements made in this House on Monday night deliberately create a larger group of unemployed Canadians. The Minister of Finance admitted as much but he did not make it clear. He stood up in the House and said that his economic projection is that there will be on average an 8 per cent unemployment rate in this country this year. The piece of that equation which may have escaped people who listened to that statement is that we are already three months into this calendar year and the unemployment rate has been 7.4 per cent.

As an aside, I might just mention that the unemployment rate in this country started to decline with the election of a Conservative government. It went down, and it stayed down in the low 7 per cent range from the high of over 8 per cent because there was a sense of fiscal responsiblity, a sense of direction and a clear-cut economic base that showed the reliance on the private sector which the Minister of Employment and Immigration just told us he believes in. But we sat here on Monday night of this week and heard a mini-budget which will not give a sense of security to the financial communities in this country. It will not do that, and the private sector will not respond in the way that the Minister of Employment and Immigration just suggested to us.

I go back to the projection of the Minister of Finance of an 8 per cent unemployment rate in this country for this year. If one remembers that it has been 7.4 per cent for the first three months, then the inescapable conclusion is that by this fall we are looking at something in the order of 9 per cent unemployment. We will have that kind of number by the fall of this year or we will not have an 8 per cent average for the year, because we have been doing considerably better than that in the first part of this year. I think that that is criminal.

I should like to review Hansard of April 21 and the speech by the Minister of Finance. It is an interesting exercise. It is an interesting understanding of the finance minister's mind-set if we look at the speech he made in this House. He started by telling us about the things he is not going to do. It is a remarkable exercise to look at the things he is not going to do because each of those things would help stimulate employment, each of those measures would create jobs in this country.

Let me briefly review them for the House. The first one is that he will not reintroduce at this time the three measures affecting taxation on capital gains. In other words, the Minister of Finance has decided at this time not to encourage Canadians to make equity investments in the private sector. If he had made the decision which the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) made in December, he would have encouraged Canadians to make equity investments in the private sector and thus create employment in the private sector.

The second item the minister mentioned is that he will not reintroduce the measure to provide special tax incentives for investors in Atlantic fishing vessels—clearly an incentive designed to create jobs in our shipyards and ultimately in our fishing industry. The Minister of Finance stood up on Monday and said that he did not care about those jobs, that he would not reintroduce that measure.

He also said that he was not making provision for private corporations to be given tax contracts for investing in particular regions of the country. We have regions and communities in this country with unemployment rates that are staggering—20 per cent and 30 per cent—yet the Minister of Finance stands up in the House, in the face of one million unemployed Canadians, and says that he is not making provision for tax contracts for investing in particular regions of the country. He does not care about the high unemployment regions.

He went on to talk about the oil industry and depletion allowances. He is going to take those away. They stimulate some employment, but perhaps they are not as necessary as the regional tax incentive. He kept a couple of incentives which I think may produce a bit of employment: the one for spouses, the deductibility for spouses, and also the bond provision for small businesses. I applaud him for those minor matters.

Also missing is something which he addressed later in his speech. I think he was clever, in some senses, in his deflection of the real issue, but he talked about Canadians who have to re-mortgage their homes this year. He made the statistical case that many of those people, even at the current high mortgage rates, would be spending less than 30 per cent of their income to maintain their shelter. The omission, the item he did not deal with, is those people who do not own homes today—the young people in this country, the young families and the newly married who want to buy homes.

The initial projections were that there would be approximately 220,000 housing starts this year. Current projections show that there will be something in the order of 150,000. That means 70,000 homes will not be built in Canada in 1980. How many jobs do those 70,000 homes represent? The failure to take some kind of economic action on the needs of young people trying to get into starter homes not only affects their families and marriages, but it affects in major ways the employment situation in this country.

The projection is that 40 per cent of the employees engaged in the house building industry will be out of work this year. It is not the issue of refinancing a house which is already built, it is the issue of new homes. It is the more significant issue in the long term, in terms of the employability of people. I would hope with the minister's background in the housing area that he might make representations to his cabinet colleagues and the Minister of Finance for some kinds of measures which might stimulate that industry.

We have seen that the province of British Columbia, which by the way is producing a balanced budget, has done a great job of stimulating the housing industry within its provincial boundaries. He might take a lesson from that and bring that matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Surely it would affect 100,000 or perhaps 200,000 people who could be employed in that industry. We have tremendous societal costs from this high level of unemployment. They relate to people's mental and physical health. They are a drain on the national treasury, and I hope that we might do a little bit more about them.

During the election campaign—and I think we had time—I was involved in close to 20 forums in my region of the country where people had an opportunity to suggest ideas to me, to ask me questions, and we came to some conclusions based on the decade of history in the 1970s. I do not know if it has always been clear but it is clear that the Trudeau government in which the minister serves believes in deficits. There is a school of economic thought which historically has said that public deficits can stimulate things like unemployment and that they are good for the economy. We have had for close to a decade now increasing massive deficits which lead to increased need for public borrowing.

If we look back at the last decade we find that the thing that goes along with this kind of borrowing is increased inflation, which hurts those on fixed incomes and, in fact, our entire economy. High inflation is accompanied by high unemployment.

We heard the Minister of Finance on Monday night of this week say he was increasing the deficit by something close to 40 per cent, and increasing the need for borrowing by something close to 40 per cent. I wonder what that borrowing accomplishes. We are talking about the need for the federal government to go out into the money markets of Canada and borrow something in the order of $3.7 billion. What does $3.7 billion mean to the average Canadian? It is a staggering amount that we cannot comprehend; a pile of zeros, as my colleague behind me suggests. I suggest it represents 70,000 mortgages of $50,000. It represents 70,000 new homes and the $50,000 mortgages required to build them. Coincidentally, that is the number of houses which are not going to be built in this country this year.

What are these increased borrowings all about, and why is the federal government today in the position that it has to borrow something close to $12 billion? The finance minister tells us it is to pay the interest on the public debt. That is why his budget is different from the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West. That interest on the public debt is going up and represents something better than $10 billion. The minister also said it was necessary to make oil subsidy payments. This is taking money out of the pockets of the taxpayers to send off to Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and Mexico.

How much of this public debt borrowing is really money which we borrow outside this country to send outside this country? None of that money which we send outside this country creates jobs in this country. This is an expenditure of public funds which has no relevance to the crisis of unemployment that exists in this country today.

Let me take this opportunity to deal with the 18 cent excise tax in the context of unemployment. The former minister of finance introduced a tax on December 13 which was the cause of the downfall of that government and a significant factor in the re-election of a Liberal government. We on this side of the House felt then, as we do today, that the excise tax on gasoline was a responsible measure. One might ask why. First of all, it is because imported oil is expensive and, secondly, because the over-all use of imported oil is going up. Canadian consumption patterns indicate that our use of oil increased something in the order of 8 per cent while at the same time it was decreasing by 3 per cent or 4 per cent in the United States, our neighbour to the south. That represents a huge gap.

We felt that the introduction of a tax on gasoline would reduce the use of that commodity and thereby reduce the need for the federal government to borrow money, reduce the amount of money which we so willingly ship outside this country, money that does not create jobs. We felt this would take the pressure off the borrowing market and perhaps have some conceivable impact on interest rates which are really strangling our economy. We thought this was a responsible step to take.

On Monday night of this week the Minister of Finance said the government were not going to take that responsible step or replace that responsible step with any other responsible step. He said they were going to do what they have been doing for the last decade, which is to go out and borrow more money so that my children and your children, Mr. Speaker, can pay more interest tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Right on.

An hon. Member: No wonder you are in the opposition.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, one hon. member opposite says: "No wonder you are an Albertan".

An hon. Member: No, I said "in the opposition".

An hon. Member: That's a big difference.

Mr. Hawkes: It is the difference between being responsible and not being responsible, I suggest. I thought the hon. member said that it was no wonder I was an Albertan. Perhaps hon. members on that side of the House might care to listen to some of us on this side of the House who represent different regions of this country. One of the characteristics I think they will find of the people who live in western Canada, whether we are talking about Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia, is a value they have had for a long, long time in relation to this issue of deficits. In their own personal lives they have a great reluctance to become over-committed to debt. There is a tendency on their part to ask their politicians, whatever their political suasion, to balance the budget. They do not want the government to create debt for them tomorrow. They want the government to do the things that need doing today and to pay for those things today. They have lived through the dusty times. They have had their homes taken over on default during the depression.

This is the kind of tradition that exists in our regions. There is no sureness that next season there will be enough rain and enough sunshine to produce a good crop. When they have a good crop they put a little away for a rainy day. They spend what they have to but they do not go out and commit themselves to something that they may not be able to meet tomorrow because the sun does not shine and the rain does not fall.

When we look at the western regions of this country we find that this was the philosophy during the depression and during the war. Throughout our political history that has been the dominant philosophy. Now, in 1980, that is the healthy economic region of this country. The taxes which are raised there can be spent in productive ways.

When I look at the federal budget I see that 20 per cent to 25 per cent of the taxes which this government is taking from the Canadian people is spent in non-productive ways, such as paying interest on the public debt and oil compensation payments to Mexico, Iran and Venezuela. Some 25 per cent of the money raised from Canadian taxpayers is not being spent in any useful way. Those expenditures are not related to the unemployment problems in this country, yet they create a burden on all citizens of this country, a burden almost in perpetuity. I think this borders on the criminal.

At the very least we have had a decade of irresponsibility, and today we have major problems. We have a million unemployed with 25 per cent of taxes raised being spent clearly in non-productive ways. We have the finance minister's admission that the increase in the deficit, which increases borrowing, is a consequence of non-productive spending. A look at the main estimates shows that what has happened in the last two or three years is that we have had a real decline in productive spending, more than matched by the increase in non-productive spending. We have more than a million unemployed people in this country as a consequence of a decade of those kinds of policies.

We on this side of the House urge hon. members on that side of the House, those with some sense of reason, to rethink some of the things that have occurred and to argue more strenuously for a little more responsibility so that some of these problems can be solved over time.

The bill which has been presented, Bill C-19, commonly called the employment tax credit bill, on the surface looks innocuous, and it is before us for debate today. I took the trouble to read a speech delivered in this House on December 13, 1979 by the former minister of employment and immigration. The former minister agrees in part with the current minister, that there is something to be said for a program which encourages the creation of employment in the private sector. That is the kind of bill which is before us today. It is better to create employment in the private sector than in the public sector. The long-term consequences are more positive and the costs are somewhat lower. However, did the previous minister intend to introduce the piece of legislation which is before us today? The answer to that question is, no. On December 13 the former minister promised to introduce an employment tax credit bill, but it was significantly different from the bill which is before us today.

The analogy which I have in my mind is that the bill before us today is a "shot gun" bill as opposed to a "rifle" bill. If one really studies and examines the unemployment statistics of this country, it is clear that unemployment is very high in certain regions and very low in others. It is clear that young people, women, the handicapped and native people suffer higher rates of unemployment than do other groups. In these groups unemployment is in some cases three, four or five times higher than the rate of unemployment in the more experienced, normal work force.

The next thing that we should consider in terms of this bill is, does it deal in any specific way with those target groups? When I started my address this afternoon, I talked about the haves and the have-nots. I said that there are over one million have-nots who have no place and no job. But in that category of women, young people, natives and the handicapped, there are more have-nots than in the other groups.

This is "shot-gun" bill that provides no incentive to target the creation of employment on those groups. I suggest to the hon. members of this House that if we have a public responsibility to create employment, and I think we do, surely the employment that we create out of the public purse should be more clearly targeted on those who need it the most, not those who need it the least. This bill does not do that. It is a "shot gun" bill. It could be that the spouse of somebody who earns $200,000 a year is given one of these created jobs. There is nothing to prevent that happening.

The minister has chosen, and I think that it is consistent with the government's pattern over the last 12 years, not to provide this House with a data base which, I am sure, exists in his department. This government gave its mandate to this program some two years ago. If one looks at the main estimates one will see tremendous sums of money being spent in the minister's department for research personnel. It is the largest operating department in the government in terms of the number of researchers working within it. I am certain that the minister has in his possession research data on the effectiveness of this program.

We on this side of the House are debating whether or not this piece of legislation should be passed, yet the minister has not seen fit to provide us with the research data base for which the taxpayers of this country have paid. I hope that this situation will change when and if the throne speech promise on freedom of information legislation is brought into reality. However, we have been hearing that promise for close to 12 years and I will not hold my breath until I see the bill before me.

If hon. members had that research data, then what would it tell us about this bill before us? If one looks at the provisions of the bill, there are very limited stipulations to which one must adhere. The people who are hired under the terms of this bill must have been unemployed for two weeks. The employer must sign a declaration that without this program the employer would not have had anyone to fill this job. In other words, the employers are declaring that they are creating a job which is extra to the normal needs of their organization.

I wonder if the research data which the minister must possess suggests to him that not every employer is honest, that some may have signed a false declaration. I wonder if that is a reasonable assumption to make. I wonder if the research data would tell us anything about that situation. I wonder if the research data would tell us clearly how many women and native people are employed under the program and the regions of the country in which this employment is created, so that a decision can be made as to whether or not the provisions of this bill provide for a responsible expenditure of public money. Is the expenditure creating jobs for the target groups and the regions which are of most concern to the members of this House? I suspect the research data would answer these questions if it were provided.

The next aspect of this bill which needs examination is with regard to the fact that it is a tax credit bill. The bill is of no value and is no incentive to an employer unless he or she is in the position of having to pay taxes. If they are in a position of having to pay taxes, then the tax credit is of some use to them. I suggest to hon. members that approximately half the employers in this country are not affected in any significant way by the provisions of this bill. I suggest to the House that it is that half, the companies which are just starting up and are having to struggle to make a go of it, companies which have not turned the corner, that are most likely to create significant employment in the long term. This bill provides no assistance in that regard. That is a choice which the minister has made.

I bring these matters to the minister's attention, and I have encouraged other members of my caucus to bring their concerns to the attention of the minister. The unemployment situation in Canada is the kind of topic which should be debated at some length. I encourage members on all sides of this House to bring to the attention of the minister their ideas and their suggestions as to what might be done in the long term and the short term to help the Government of Canada and the minister to address this very serious issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne, Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for Welland.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I very gladly—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe it is the custom in this House for the first round of speeches to include one speaker from each party. I do not suggest anything has gone haywire but I gave the Chair the names of those in this party who wish to speak. I hope that the Liberal member who has just risen will not mind yielding to the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker).

Mr. Parent: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the custom that has held for many years and, of course, I agree with it. Naturally I defer to my colleague from the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne, Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have very mixed feelings about the bill which is before us this afternoon. The employment tax credit program was adopted as a temporary program to stimulate employment in the business sector and it has not done a great deal of good. Unemployment has not disappeared from the scene; far from it. Nobody really believed that this program would accomplish that objective, but I suspect that a good many people on the other side of the House expected that it would at least have a minimal impact on the unemployment rolls.

I need not remind hon. members opposite that there are still nearly one million unemployed in Canada today, even though the program has been in effect for over two years. The latest figures I have from the Department of Employment and Immigration indicate that only 50,000 new jobs were created through this program over the past fiscal year. This would mean, Mr. Speaker, that even if there was no growth in the number of unemployed over the next year—not a very likely proposition considering predictions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on Monday night—the net decrease in the unemployment figure would amount to a mere 5 per cent under this program. In actual fact, Mr. Speaker, the number of unemployed in this country is likely to skyrocket and this program may well have the distinction of lowering the number of unemployed to, say, 1.45 million from 1.5 million. Not a very distinguishable difference, in my opinion.

I said at the outset that I have very mixed feelings about this bill, that I could hardly lend it my unqualified support. There are two basic reasons why I find the bill difficult to support, but I suppose that basically they both boil down to the question of interest rates.

The first reason I have for not supporting this bill unequivocally concerns the nature of the program itself. This program is based on the assumption that in Canada today there are all sorts of small businessmen just waiting to expand their operations and hire new employees. Mr. Speaker, that may have been true two years ago when this program was first established, though I have no idea whether it was true or not. But to suggest that it is true today is to believe in the Easter Bunny; it is to deny every economic reality facing small businessmen in Canada today. I defy the government to find 50,000 businessmen in Canada today who have even the slightest intention of going to their local bank or credit union and borrowing the capital required to expand their businesses and hire new employees, tax credits or no tax credits.

Mr. Speaker, you would think that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and his cabinet colleagues had been living in a cocoon for the past four months, that they had not talked to any small businessmen since their election. I have spoken to small businessmen in my riding on a regular basis and I have heard their pleas for action. They have not been pleading for an extension of the employment tax credit; they have not been requesting that the government give them extra tax concessions. Mr. Speaker, their pleas have been much more serious than that. They have been pleading that this government stop strangling them, that they loosen the noose before they are forced to go bankrupt.

Small businessmen in Canada today are crying out for one thing and one thing only—lower interest rates. Who in his right mind would go out and borrow money in order to expand his business when he is being asked to pay upwards of 20 per cent interest? The tax credit is irrelevant. It does not mean anything because the assumption on which it is based is ridiculous.

I often wonder what great minds are at work in the Department of Finance, when the economic signals coming from the government are so totally contradictory. On the one hand, we have the Milton Friedman economists whose monetary policies are so conservative that they were even rejected in Chile. These people are forcing interest rates up to absolutely insane levels. And the main reason for this policy is that they want to discourage borrowing. They want us, to quote the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), "to tighten our belts and live within our means."

The fact that the Canadian people rejected this philosophy on February 18 does not appear to faze these monetarists. They have never been particularly concerned with such radical theories as voting and democracy anyway, so they sit in one room in the Department of Finance thinking of new schemes to raise interest rates and discourage borrowing. And then, for all we know, across the hall sit the small "l" liberals who designed the employment tax credit program and who are recommending that it be extended for another year. These are nice enough fellows in their own way, but it seems they never talk to their colleagues across the hall because this program is designed specifically to encourage borrowing. It is based on the assumption that businessmen will dash out and borrow the money required to hire extra employees in order to qualify for the negligible benefits which the tax credit provides.

If I had to choose between one or the other of the groups in the department, Mr. Speaker, I would side with the group that drafted this bill. But it is not that simple. Every possible positive contribution which this bill is likely to make will be negated by the high interest rates dreamed up by the monetarists across the hall.

What is more discouraging is that if, and I do mean if, this bill has even the most minimal effects and does provide an incentive for even just a few businessmen to go out and borrow money in order to expand, it will only encourage the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada to immediately raise interest rates once again.

That is a Catch-22 situation which those of us in this corner of the House find impossible to tolerate. That is why we have been demanding a decrease in the interest rates. It is time that the Government of Canada tells these monetarists what the people of Canada tried to tell them in February, that they do not agree with their ideas and do not want them messing up our economy any more.

I have one other reason for being less than enthusiastic about this bill, and it relates a little bit more to my constituency. I represent a part of British Columbia which relies heavily on the forest and lumber industries for employment. In February, Statistics Canada reported that my region had the highest unemployment rate in western Canada and, with the exception of Windsor, the highest unemployment rate west of Quebec. The reason for this crisis can be summed up in three words—high interest rates. The high interest rates have resulted in a depressed mortgage market, which in turn has meant a downturn in construction, which finally has meant a serious slowdown in the forest industry.

This bill will not put one unemployed woodworker back to work, and for that reason I consider it inadequate as a method of dealing with unemployment in my region. There is only one way of dealing with that problem and it is very simple—lower the interest rates. So long as they are high, the men and women who are unemployed in my riding will stay unemployed, regardless of what "Mickey Mouse" programs the Minister of Employment and Immigration is toying with. He would be much better advised to have his officials look into the possibility of extending UIC benefits and to fight inside cabinet for lower interest rates than to play with meaningless programs like the one which we are discussing now.

In conclusion, I should like to point out that this program is really an attempt to treat symptoms and not to treat the disease which is plaguing Canada today. I think everyone in Canada would be better served by a program which reduced interest rates than by this rather meaningless program, which only serves to keep a relatively small number of people off the unemployment rolls. I urge the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Finance to get together and treat the problem of unemployment in a very serious manner.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this debate on Bill C-19. The previous speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), said that this bill was meaningless. I suggest that a program which over the last two years has produced 23,000 new jobs for women and 37,000 new jobs for men can hardly be termed meaningless.

The previous speaker before the member from the New Democratic Party was bemoaning the fact that we are approaching one million unemployed. We on this side of the House know full well the ravages that such high figures can bring. The previous speaker also said that we in Canada have never had so many unemployed. I suggest the converse is also true: we have never had so many of our workers employed across Canada. There are over 11 million Canadians who are at work today.

The speaker from the Tory party said that they in his part of the country lived through the dust bowl. We in this part of the country from Ontario well remember the depression. We well remember also the government that was in power at that time.

Hon. members opposite are talking of 11 years of mistakes that supposedly we have made. If there have been some mistakes made, we must also have been doing some good things or else we in Canada would not be prospering as we are today.

In the last Parliament I was part of a committee which studied the tax credit system. When it was brought forward at that time by the Conservative party, we on this side agreed with many of the facets that were brought out. As a matter of fact, I am sure that all hon. members know that it was the Liberal government which brought forward this program in the first place. Therefore, what we have is a Liberal program taken up by a short-lived Tory government now being put in place by a Liberal government.

I suggest that the designation of "Minister of Employment and Immigration", is quite to the point because what we are concerned with is creating jobs and making sure that Canadians are at work. I hear interjections from the other side. We must be on the right track because the Tory speaker says we are doing too much and the NDP speaker says we are not doing enough, so we must be right on if we are not pleasing those two extreme groups at each end.

The previous Tory speaker said that his government was defeated in part because of the 18-cent tax they were going to put on gasoline. He suggests that even now they were right and they would do it again. However, the people of Canada decided that they were not right. Will they be so arrogant as to say that the people of Canada are wrong and that Canadians cannot make up their minds about what is right for them as opposed to what is right for other people outside of Canada?

The employment tax credit program, Bill C-19, is being extended quite simply because it is effective and it is low cost. However, this government does not intend to follow this single-mindedly, or simple-mindedly, because it is not the answer to all of our problems in Canada. In fact, tax credits as they are at present are most likely to be used by the business sector in areas of high to medium growth that have quite a few people unemployed but generally have less severe rates of unemployment than areas characterized by continuing high unemployment, slow economic growth and minimal levels of business activity. Those communities need another kind of employment development measure. I am sure that the minister and we his colleagues in the House will be suggesting some of these, not only in the course of this debate but in our discussions in the months and years to come.

In British Columbia and in the Yukon, for example, for the fiscal year 1978-79 the employment tax credit program was tremendously effective in creating jobs in the lower mainland, but it had much less impact in other areas. More than half of the employment tax credit program placements in British Columbia and the Yukon were made in the lower mainland while less than 8 per cent were made in the northeastern sector and less than 1 per cent were made in the Skeena and Whitehorse areas. The same pattern applies in other parts of the country. Most of the employment created by the employment tax credit program is concentrated in these urban areas and the program has had much less impact in rural, slow growth areas with minimal levels of business activity.

Since employment and unemployment patterns vary widely across this country, the employment tax credit program, although it has been successful—I quoted the numbers earlier—cannot meet the variant employment needs across this diverse country. Tax credits are highly dependent on employer participation and thus, obviously, have most chance of success in areas with developed business sectors. In isolated northern communities, Indian reserves and outposts, the employment tax credit does not have much of an impact.

We do have direct job-creation programs such as Canada Works, and these have very real advantages for such areas. First, they are targetable to geographic areas. Second, they are able to support a wide range of activities. Third, they are applicable to the needs and capabilities of low or slow growth areas—I refer here to northern Ontario and the Atlantic provinces by way of example. Finally, they are able to support various stages of activities directed toward longer term employment development.

[Translation]

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in my region of southern Ontario there is a group of people working under the name of The John Howard Society. Four years ago they came to ask me for money for a specific program. I told them that we were very happy to have the opportunity of giving the people they work with the training they need to work in areas where there is a lack of labour.

[English]

The John Howard Society suggested we should set up a bricklayers school so that people could go there to learn the bricklayer's trade. We found that at the end of this particular Canada Works program 85 per cent of those who had been involved in the training were able to secure direct employment.

I might also point out that when the Canada Works program was put in place under the last government specific general areas were targeted, but we in Ontario found we were not eligible for grants notwithstanding the fact that we have high unemployment in the north and in other specific areas of Ontario. The over-all rate of unemployment was not high enough for us to qualify. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my colleagues in the House that people who are unemployed in Alberta, in Ontario or in Newfoundland, feel much the same way about unemployment and that we ought to bring in specific programs which are able to respond to the need where it arises. I hope that the Canada Works program, which I trust will be put into place, will operate in such a way as to produce jobs in the most effective way possible.

Direct job-creation measures have a significant impact in precisely those areas where the employment tax credit program has a minimal impact. The different types of program are complementary and the government is committed to using them in a complementary way, building on their strengths and respecting their constraints. Employment development policy should contribute to and increase self-sufficiency of individuals in the labour market and, in the case of geographic areas, strengthen the capacity of the business sector; or where that sector is weak or practically non-existent, it should support the development of such a sector. To be effective, job creation and job-experience measures must be area-specific and situation-specific rather than a uniform package which would apply indiscriminately across the country.

In my area of southern Ontario, in St. Catharines, we have a shipbuilding industry. I recall that some three or four years ago we needed ship welders. We could not find them in our area so we advertised across Canada for people with this skill. We brought in ship welders from Great Britain. The agreement at that time with the shipbuilders in Port Weller was that we would allow these welders to come in provided that over three years the company would train and hire a like number of Canadian welders to take the jobs of the people we had imported. One of the speakers in the debate on Monday mentioned that in Alberta there is presently a great need for welders, and I suggest that such a program might be considered in the west. So, as I mentioned before, we have area-specific solutions and, in addition, solutions which deal with a precise problem area.

Programs, whether tax credit or cash programs, must be selectively and strategically directed toward clearly identified labour markets and geographic targets. This kind of targeting which respects the diversity of this country and is sensitive to differing needs and opportunities is a fundamental part of the employment development measures which the government is developing and which will be presented to the House in the near future.

As for Bill C-19, I spoke in favour of it when it was first introduced two years ago. When it was presented by the short-lived Conservative government, we supported at that time the tax credit system. We believe that it is effective. We believe that because of its low cost it is more acceptable to the people of Canada, and for our part on this side we wholeheartedly support the measure which the minister has introduced this afternoon.

• (1630)

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I hope the House and you, sir, will indulge me today. This is that hallowed moment for every member of Parliament when he makes his maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: I do appreciate the rules of relevancy which apply in all debates on specific bills. It would have been nice in the last few days if government members had followed those rules in the throne speech debate, but that is all right. I will do my best, however, to stay within the bounds of the bill and yet say a few things, if I may, about my riding and some general matters which affect this country today and which flow, I think, in any consideration of a bill which involves employment tax credits, and therefore employment, unemployment and economic development.

Don Valley West is the heart of Toronto. It is absolutely dead centre geographically. It has had the good sense to have been a Conservative riding for some time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: There was a rare moment in the late sixties and early seventies when the electors of Don Valley elected a member who now sits opposite representing the Downsview area. Don Valley had the good sense, however, to kick him out in 1972 and elect one of the fine Canadians in the economic field, Jim Gillies, who served in this House ably for six years and who is still serving in a public capacity with us because he is a guy of whom we are very proud.

Don Valley West is a peculiar riding in many special ways. Contrary to what most people in Toronto think, it is in fact not a home owner riding; it is composed 55 per cent of tenants. Those are the people who over the years elected me as their alderman before I sought this office. It is a riding which has the highest educational level of any riding in Canada, which is shown clearly by the way it votes.

Mr. Nowlan: Explain.

Mr. Bosley: "Explain", says a Conservative member. I do not have to explain that. I am here.

Mr. Ellis: That is self-evident.

Mr. Bosley: Don Valley West is a riding which is composed as much of employers as it is of employees. We have residing in our riding many of the major corporate employers. We are blessed with a very low level of unemployment. We are also blessed with some of the most scenic natural beauty one will find in the heart of any city. In Don Valley West there is Hog's Hollow and a ravine system, all of which is unique.

A number of us are interested in urban planning, and it is fantastic, as it is all through my great city, to find large numbers of trees, parks and ravines which complement all of my riding and all of the ridings in Toronto.

My riding feels pretty secure about itself and about its future. It is a riding which tends to be more concerned, therefore, with national issues than with local issues at election time. It is a riding which ever since 1972 has resisted the attempts by hon. members opposite in the now Liberal government to destroy the economic substructure of this country. That intent, in my view, is what leads to the need for such patchwork quilt measures as this, and that is what I would like to talk about now, if I may.

If we accept the hidden figures as well as the real figures, we now have something over one million people in this country who are not working. We have this situation, as we have so many of our problems, because those who have held power for too long in this town, as opposed to in our town, have never understood that you cannot run a country any differently from the way you run your bank account for yourself. You simply cannot go on printing money. You simply cannot go on borrowing more money than you spend without its coming back to haunt you. All the measures in the world to try to paper over the cracks—which is what this measure is—will not solve the structural problem called "You are making the foundations crumble". That is precisely what we have been experiencing, and that is precisely why, when the decade of Pierre Trudeau government began, unemployment figures were not nearly so high, inflation figures were not nearly so high and have ever since got worse. We tried in our short term in office—

Mr. Chénier: And you failed.

Mr. Bosley: —to turn around the basic economic policy of the Government of Canada. We did that in a whole budget which, in its entirety, would have begun that process of restoring some sense of economic security and economic confidence in this country. It would have led inevitably to the end of the need for measures such as this. The tragedy is not that we lost. The tragedy is that Canadians will now have to suffer through four or five more years of more and more unemployment and more and more inflation because hon. members opposite simply will not face up to the pure and simple economic fact that you cannot increase your deficit by $3.7 billion in one year. They simply will not face up to the fact that you cannot increase your spending by 13 per cent when the gross national product increase is going to be 10 per cent.

You cannot go on like that, Mr. Speaker, without stripping off the economic fabric of the country, because you force yourself to take more and more money out of the private investment system, thereby driving interest rates up because money is scarce. Unless you pursue the other alternative, and that is simply to print more money and deflate the currency. You cannot go on taking more and more out of the private capital system and then expect it to be continuously able to produce the jobs, growth, wealth and investment that a growing labour force needs.

So if you are pursuing the Alice in Wonderland policy of saying to the people of Canada, "It is okay, we can borrow more and spend more, and it will not cost you now or later," the inevitable response is measures like this which, one has to admit, given the circumstances, may be necessary. But it is crazy to think that you can solve the problem we have in this country by such measures as this. In fact, in a way you are misleading people with a measure like this, because you are attempting to find a solution called government spending or revenue losses to solve a problem that the government itself is creating by spending too much.

So, Mr. Speaker, if you pursue the system which says that the answer is that we will continue to come up with more and more measures which on either side of the government ledger are actually a cost, thereby driving up the gross cost of government, you are causing the problem and then saying you are solving it. I heard the parliamentary secretary a minute ago use words which scare me: "What we need are area-specific solutions to this problem; what we need is a selectively planned strategy". More gobbledygook. What we need in this country is a government which will face up to its economic obligations, live within its means and get its hands out of the pockets of the taxpayer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: Further, we need not only a government which has morals, which some Canadians will have difficulty finding in the current government, but a government which is prepared to face decisions and to make some. The irony for me as the labour critic is that we sit in this House dealing with this measure while we cannot get a decision out of the Government of Canada on what to do about Chrysler. So we sit with a measure which cannot possibly benefit in a year as many people as may be laid off as a result of Chrysler's closing, if it occurs. Can we get a yes or no decision out of the Government of Canada on a subject which is so close to the hearts of hon. members opposite, the question of a Yes or a No? No, we cannot. Hon. members opposite know they have to make that decision and that they have to stand up and face their obligations. They have to make a decision soon on that question, and their attempt to put it off and to put it off is hurtful. Whatever the decision is, the attempt to put it off is hurtful because, if they are not going to make a decision to help, they are going to have to make a decision to figure out how to help the people who are going to be laid off.

A much more important issue is what the government are going to do about all the people in this country who are now unemployed and whom the government's economic policies are going to render unemployed. A solution is the moral obligation of the Government of Canada. Either they will face it—which I doubt—or they will pursue—which I expect—the same policies we had for 11 years prior to our election in May.

That is exactly what the throne speech contemplates and what the non-budget budget contemplates; that is, we can expect to be asked, as the House of Commons, to deal with more and more measures such as this. We are going to find that, because of the failure to rectify the underlying problem, the political need will be to cover it up even more. That is precisely what we have had and that is precisely what, in political terms, the employment tax credit issue is, namely, an attempt to avoid the fact that the government has caused the unemployment.

So I predict that, because what we have seen so far in this House is a desire to become more and more greedy, this is only the first measure of its kind which we fill face. We will see many more of them, tragic as they are and necessary as they might become because of the policies that underlie the thinking of the government opposite.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) across the way shakes his head. I hope he knows. I am never quite sure what he knows but there have been some suggestions in the House that he did not know everything he needed to know about things he ought to have known. I hope he knows that the strategy on which we were working in the employment growth program is right, and it is not just the program we were going to put in place. It was based on a reduction in the growth, the size and the borrowing requirements of the government. All of the programs that the government intend to bring in are doomed to failure if they miss that fundamental point.

If the answer the government give us is more employment tax credit programs paid for by ever-increasing deficits, if the answer they give us is strategic area-specific solutions paid for by ever bigger spending, if the answer they give us is ever more subsidies, if the answer they give us is more and more government intervention to try to solve the problem, then they are causing the problem. You make that decision somewhere, Mr. Speaker. You decide whether you are part of the problem or part of the solution. That is precisely what the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and ministers opposite have to come to grips with.

We over on this side know and are proud to say that we have always had the courage to face those decisions, to make them and to take our chances. I know we lost the election, and nobody over here likes the fact we lost; but we take pride in what we said to Canadians. We said there is no free lunch, and we will go on saying there is no free lunch. We will go on saying that so long as people want to be conned into believing that there is one, or are asking to be taught to be part of the process that makes sure there is no lunch for anybody.

That is the horror of the non-budget of the other night. That is the horror of a throne speech which says openly to Canadians: Hang your heads in shame, you can have no faith in this country on the economic level because your government simply does not understand how a home owner in this country lives, does not understand how anybody who has to meet a payroll lives, and does not understand how anybody who has a banker over his head and has to balance his cheque book lives. That is the frustration of anybody who cares deeply about the unemployment problem in this country.

All of the solutions and strategies we hear miss the unity of the whole. The unity, if ignored, will ruin us. Canadians know that because they register protest with members on this side every day; they know that the time of reckoning is coming. They know that to say to the people of Canada, "You are not going to pay 18 cents in tax for gas" but then to increase the deficit is cheating them. They know that to say to the people of Canada, "We have an economic substructure, an economic policy option called 'we will live within our GNP and our spending programs' ", and then to bring in a non-budget saying spending will increase 13 per cent, is dishonest.

They know that all the employment strategies in the world that are based on economic policies that strip money from the private sector are ruinous. They know and are afraid, and should be, that there is a thing called national bankruptcy. It does not happen because somebody calls your note; it happens when your dollar takes a nosedive because your balance of trade gets out of whack and nobody wants your goods. It happens because nobody will invest in the country, no one trusts the future and because money leaves this country.

Anybody who has been checking with the market and with his friends since the non-budget the other night knows that that process has begun again, the process of people thinking seriously about selling their companies and moving out of this country. If you think about that you will remember that the whole process accelerated about two years ago and became hot and heavy, as anyone knows who is in the brokerage business, as is my family in Toronto. The process accelerated in the last year before the May election, and everybody in the street in the brokerage business knows that. It stopped after the election in May when people began to think about reinvesting in this country, about using their funds to create jobs, not because of a government employment tax credit, not because of DREE programs, not because of programs which encourage non-economic investment, but because of the sense that this country's economy in the future will be good.

Therefore, it should be no surprise—certainly it was not to me—that after our defeat and the election of the new government there was a pause in street activity while people waited to see what the government were going to do. Starting with the throne speech and, more important, starting since the non-budget budget, the process has begun again. Anybody who wants to check that can call any broker in Toronto and that is the answer he will get.

So all these programs—and the parliamentary secretary indicated that this is just one of a patchwork of disastrous programs because the government missed the boat of restoring the basic economic health of this country by leaving money where it should be, that is, in private citizens' hands where it would be spent wisely—are immoral. The private industry sector in this country is the only sector in which you can create jobs. If you kid yourself that you are helping people by putting out a program which says on its face it is going to assist them but really strips them of the ability to invest and of the rewards for investing, and so long as we believe as a nation through our government that wealth is a bad thing and we should tax it away—which started with the nonsensical capital gains tax in this country—so long as we pursue that road, no program of this kind will solve the problem.

It is rather like saying that the house in which you live is in super shape because you just painted the outside white, but you did nothing about the fact that the roof is still leaking and destroying everything inside. If you do not deal with the foundation problems, if you do not deal, as the western premiers indicated the other day, with the structural economic problems in this country, if you pursue policies that lead to the incredibly high interest rates which we now face, if you pursue policies which lead directly to massive foreclosures in the housing industry, if you pursue policies which force people out of work, then when you come forward and say you have a solution that amounts to $1 or $2.50 a job, you are doing something that is despicable because you are saying, on the one hand, "I will create a job", and on the other hand, "I will create ten unemployed." Boy, that is not exactly the way to grow anything!

Anyone who does any investing knows that an investment where one wins a dollar and loses ten is not so terrific. Yet because these programs have been generated over the last 11 years and will now be continued, one has to explain to Canadians why, if those programs were so good, unemployment in that period increased from 300,000 to 1,200,000. If the programs and the economic policies are so darned successful after all these years of work, why are we in a mess?

Do we get answers which deal with the fact that we are in a mess? Do we get answers which deal with the structural problems? No, we get, "Let's change the expiry date on the employment tax credit". Do we get a budget? Do we get an economic statement of the policies of this government? No, we get a statement which does not say anything about economic policies. The government try to hide and say that it is a non-budget. The fact is that the budget presented in the House refused to deal with the problems in the country. That is the fundamental reality. So we do not have a new government; we have the old government made worse. We have the old government continuing to do everything wrong.

I think most Canadians will know that because of those policies and that reality we will have increasing unemployment and incredible problems dealing with our own interest rates. Inflation will not diminish and we will be worse off in international terms. What does this mean? Perhaps other members of the House will speak about what is sometimes called economic nationalism, but those of us who believe very, very strongly in making Canada strong economically, those of us who want this country to be strong, know that the real problem being created is the inability to make Canada strong because we mortgage ourselves forever and forever until ultimately we have to go to the only banker left, that is, people who are not in this country.

Instead of developing a greater ability to control our own destiny and to deal with the problems facing the country, we spend our time, through the policies of this government, making sure that we have less ability to deal with them, less freedom to move, less opportunity to grow and less opportunity to employ people. That is incredibly frustrating to anyone who wants to invest and put his money to work helping the creation of jobs at this time in this country.

I thank Mr. Speaker for his indulgence in this matter. I tried to stay as relevant as I could to the topic before us. Let me just say to the voters of Don Valley West how grateful I am that they sent me here for the second time. Last May does not seem that long ago. Sometimes it is impossible to believe that we have had two elections, but we have and here we are. I do not think any member would disagree that there is no greater privilege than to serve in this chamber. Even when one disagrees with hon. members opposite or sometimes disagrees with one's friends, in this House are collected 282 representatives of the greatest people in the world. Regardless of all the partisan arguing, name-calling and the rest of it, I do not think anyone in this House feels any less than that the people of Canada are extraordinarily well served by all 282 members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, my statement will be quite short. Bill C-19 now under consideration is an important bill since it directly affects over 50,000 jobs and provides funds of $100 million. Considering that most of those jobs will be filled by young people under 25, as indicated by statistics, I think it is important that hon. members pass it quickly because there are many people in Canada who directly depend on those funds aimed at extending that legislation until 1982.

I know quite well what unemployment means for young people, being myself one of their representatives, and I think that in spite of the comments made by the opposition a few minutes ago it is essential to have such projects to assure the continuity of the program and stimulate the creation of employment. Of course a program such as this one may fall short because it is temporary but I would like to say a few words about what it will achieve in the long term. In the shorter term, it goes without saying that the project is important because, as I said earlier, there are people right now who are waiting for the program to be implemented directly in certain regions of the country and who desperately need that kind of assistance to undertake projects which obviously would otherwise be doomed or whose loss would at least allow the rate of unemployment to rise considerably. But my remarks to the minister relate to the longer term and in that respect I would like to know whether his department has made a review of the actual employment structure or whether it has plans to allow young Canadians to join the labour force directly with assurance of financial and job security.

What is really dramatic about the plight of these young workers, men and women alike, who graduate from community or other colleges or from universities or simply from high schools, is that when they apply for jobs with any employer anywhere the answer is always the same: there are no vacancies or, if any, they are always temporary jobs. And then we wonder as members of Parliament or simply as ordinary citizens why there are so many protests or why delinquency is so rampant. I feel that one of the basic reasons is truly the shortage of jobs.

Well, this bill is important because its short-term objective is precisely to create jobs, and this is its first quality. But its greatest shortcoming is that after 52 weeks, as various statistics have shown, our young people are again faced with the shortage of jobs, which is why after a while they become demoralized, and it is impossible to motivate them again into either finding places for themselves in society or merely contributing to our national productivity. And as an hon. member opposite mentioned a while ago, the government must direct all its resources and energy toward creating productive jobs and not merely artificial ones which finally make it necessary for us to raise taxes and increase our deficit. Sometimes jobs are created which are more or less meaningless.

The employers who to a large extent take advantage of these programs—75 per cent according to some statistics, and 82 per cent according to others—are small and medium-size corporations, and I should like the minister in a little while to tell us whether profitability or at least assessment studies have been carried out with the corporations involved. Do the small and medium-size firms, industries and corporations which have hired young and older people say they are satisfied with these programs? Can they give evidence that their ability to produce and their profitability have increased during the 52 weeks the program was in operation? Those are so many answers I would like to hear from the minister, because in our region this program is not particularly well known. And I would like at this time to advise the minister that when it comes to programs such as this one, the information may be deficient. Naturally, I represent an extremely remote riding, and when speaking of job creation, I more particularly have in mind what we call the lower north shore of the St. Lawrence, the area from Sept-Îles to Blanc Sablon, 400 miles of coast inhabited by fishermen. If we examine this program we can see that on the whole the north shore does not have full coverage, so much so that the area does not even appear on the diagram. So I would like to hear from the minister whether it would be possible to have better promotion for regions which are more or less covered by this program, in many cases because of remoteness.

Another aspect of this program that I consider important in the short term, and I emphasize this, is the valorisation of work. It is most important in such a program to make sure not only that young people could be quickly integrated but also to ensure some continuity. Was a study undertaken at the department level? Where do those young people go after spending a certain time in those programs? This is important. Of course one of the positive aspects of this program is that it gives work to some people. It is even, I think, the fundamental aspect of the program. But what happens to those young people after the 52 or 60 weeks, because we know that in many cases it may become a permanent job. When considering department statistics we realize that after 52 weeks many jobs which were created by the program were maintained. But are those young people who stay for a long time after those 52 weeks covered by the statistics? And after that, where do they go exactly?

This is not mentioned in the reports of the department, and often, in the very structure of the job-creation process, it is one of the elements which are ignored. It would be useful to know how much follow-up is made by the department in such a program.

It should also often be a good thing to enter some elements of the compatibility of the regions in those programs. It means that in a place such as ours, on the north shore, when speaking of job creation, we speak about skilled jobs. Often, those who could enter such a program do not meet that first requirement. With regard to the requirements, they should be more flexible. I noticed that the criteria are often extremely vague. For instance, the statement is made that anyone 18 to 64 years of age is eligible for the program. But one soon realizes when a worker goes directly to see the employer at a manpower centre that a whole series of qualifications have to be met, which results in the unemployed remaining without a job after having gone to the manpower centre to apply for admission to that program.

As for the programs themselves, Mr. Speaker, does the department ever wonder about whether or not the hundreds of millions of dollars are really spent on the programs when, in fact, a considerable amount of money goes to large companies? I am thinking here of the multinationals. Does the amount of money intended for companies go to the multinationals? That is important, because I feel that those companies can afford to hire employees. We would be better off granting that money, as much as possible, to small and medium-sized companies. A moment ago, I spoke of 80 per cent, but there remains 20 per cent, I should very much like to know, to find out exactly how that 20 per cent is spent. Do the large companies get that money, companies which could create employment without government subsidies?

In closing, may I simply ask the minister not to create a task force—because we know very well how that can end up, we are fully aware of all that would entail—but to see to it that within the next 12 months his department gives us a brief analysis of the situation, so that steps can be taken before 1982 to create jobs over the longer term. Should the strategy for long-term job creation not include elements from the world of labour as well as management? Because, and that also ties in with the implementation of collective agreements, it is often very difficult to fit in the young when they first come on the job market because they do not have any seniority. But would it not be worthwhile to have representatives of the business community, the labour movement and the student population meet to see what could be done for young people with respect to long-term job creation?

In my view, the measures described in this program, in Bill C-19, are obviously important but, as one member of the opposition said earlier, as we said when we were the opposition and even before then, they are merely palliative measures. In the short term, they help, they obviously allow some people to gain experience and enable industries to engage in experimental work; these are advantages I will admit. However, for those intending to settle down, to join the Canadian community, to produce, to raise a family, to plan their life, it is more important that we succeed in working within the economic system to generate long-term jobs.

In concluding, I would therefore ask the minister if his department could not undertake a brief study of these conditions in an attempt to give certain directions which a committee of the House could study with a view to recommending ways which would give our young people and even those not so young the permanent jobs they are looking for. One is always amazed to see how unstable and how demoralized today's society is, for let us not delude ourselves, the outlook for today's youth is bleak. They seem to think that nothing lasts for very long, that everything is temporary and that governments are more or less helpful.

Therefore, in the wake of a short study which would give us some direction to work for the long term, in the coming year, between 1980 and 1982, we could really try to develop an employment policy which would revive youth's faith in the future and allow the department to create productive jobs; as a result, the whole Canadian economy would be better off, in my view.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, this bill presently before the House contemplates an amendment to the Employment Tax Credit Act and has anticipated therein the duration of a period of two years, to end on March 31, 1982. The minister's press release accompanying the presentation of this bill has the rather illuminating statement attached thereto, that this will be a "temporary measure". This bill has all the appearance of being temporary in the same fashion as one might apply that term to the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

The minister went on to say in his press release that the measure is being "designed to ensure that an effective job-creation program continues while an employment strategy is being prepared for early announcement in the House of Commons". That begs the question of why an employment strategy is required. The answer is not hard to discern. There are more Canadians seeking employment in our country than there are available positions to satisfy them.

We are now entitled to ask why that is the situation. I know that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his non-debatable budget explained that international circumstances dictate our economic climate. As a matter of fact, as I listened to his rather sage comments in this House I was left with the very distinct impression that I must have been sitting in the U.S. Congress.

The real answer is that the government has badly managed the business of governing Canada and has negotiated international commitments which have not been in the best interests of our nation. We are currently losing $3 billion this year on an auto pact agreement with the United States. We have become a nation assembling the auto parts produced around the world, not only in the United States, the party to the contract that we negotiated.

Our negotiators misjudged the commercial advantages to our American partners in that arrangement by not taking into account that the parent corporations of the companies to benefit from the arrangement, through the control of their foreign subsidiaries, would see that a great deal of the auto parts that were to be assembled in Canada were manufactured in nations where wages are considerably lower than might have been paid in either country that signed the pact. We also failed to recognize that a combination of the after-market with respect to parts combined with the attractive nature of the original equipment market would exceed in value the economic benefits to be gained by the nation involved in assembling those parts.

The government has continued to pursue a policy which will preclude Canadian business from exploiting the arms industry. I had occasion to listen with some dismay to the former minister of defence in the previous Liberal government when he announced that he thought that the creation of a Canadian armaments industry would be unhealthy. Unhealthy indeed, when this government has just negotiated a contract for the supply of fighter aircraft for our armed forces which, when the contract is concluded, will see something in the neighbourhood of a $4 billion expenditure, a large portion of which will flow out of this country into another nation. We have concluded the purchase of leopard tanks from Germany. We have at the same time concluded the purchase of armoured personnel carriers from another European nation.

The government's answer to the decline of research and development in this country, which would not only have permitted the development of an armaments industry, but spinoff industries as well, is to announce in the Speech from the Throne the lofty hope and expectation that it will commit itself to over-all expenditures on research and development of 1.5 per cent of the value of the gross national product of Canada.

It is somewhat illuminating to note that in 1975, the last year in which figures were published with respect to research and development and its relationship to the gross national product, the United States spent fully 2.35 per cent of its GNP on research and development. Germany spent 2.6 per cent and Japan spent 2 per cent on research and development. Canada spent the rather insignificant amount of 1 per cent of its GNP. We are promised that that figure will be increased by 50 per cent under the current government, though we were not given any time as to when this miracle will be accomplished.

I urgently direct to the attention of this House the commitment of the former Conservative government of striking a goal of 2.5 per cent expenditure on research and development. We see the results of the failure by the government in this area in this bill, Bill C-19, which asks that more federal funds be spent on paying the salaries, at least in part, of employees in private industry, which means more federal funds extracted from the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada.

What are some other reasons which come to mind as the causes of unemployment? Surely the inability of this government to fix a price for oil must be regarded as one of the most significant reasons. The very tight-lipped but amusing response of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in this House this afternoon might have been appropriate on the campaign trail, but it is hardly appropriate when dealing with the day to day business obligations of the Government of Canada. He told us that the price of oil would be determined on the basis of a blending of prices which consisted of the blending of conventional oil—or, as he referred to it, the old oil—tar sands or synthetic oil products and imported crude oil.

So much for the blending, but what of the price? Indeed, what is the price that may be considered by Canadian businesses when they are determining their costs of operation? I had occasion some time ago to discuss with a constituent of mine, whose corporation was in the business of paving roads for municipalities, the anticipated cost of one of the essential ingredients in his raw materials. Am I to say to him that today in this House the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has clearly established a price that he may use as the basis for tendering on contracts which he must make in advance for a period of one year? When this constituent submits his tendering documents, should he say that the price for which he will perform his services will be a blended price, consisting of the price of labour, the mark-up for overhead and profit, as well as the blended price of oil, one of the essential ingredients in his raw materials?

The answer to that question is, very clearly, that it is nonsense, both for business and for government. Predicting with some degree of reasonable certainty what will happen tomorrow is most assuredly one of the hallmarks of astute business judgment.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the intervention by the hon. member opposite is very interesting. I would like to inquire, sir, whether you think it is relevant to the bill before the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair is aware of the rules of relevance relating to debate in this House of Commons. It has been noted that relevance has not been a stringently administered rule in the Canadian House. I will accept the observations of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), with the suggestion that perhaps the hon. member may wish to consider his comments in that light.

Mr. Gamble: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I considered those elements of relevancy in preparing my remarks on this bill. The nature of the bill itself, which contemplates the advancing of funds to continue a program, automatically opens the flood gates of a searching mind as to why the funds are required. In my mind the funds are required because there is unemployment in Canada. If, however, the learned member believes there is no unemployment in Canada, then my approach in addressing this House should be considerably different from what it is.

Mr. Caccia: My mind is not as searching as yours.

Mr. Gamble: I recognize that, and that is why the hon. member is sitting where he is. The comments which I make here, incidentally, are made by way of a maiden speech in this House, despite the fact that I had the honour of sitting here in the Thirty-first Parliament. They are confined, of course, because of the rules of relevance. I am making these remarks because I believe that I can no longer wait to address those customary general remarks which are characteristic of a maiden speech to my constituents, having regard to the urgency confronting the nation from the way in which this government intends to conduct the affairs of this nation.

I might also add that I am prompted to make these remarks because we are confronted with monetary and fiscal measures which were introduced by the Minister of Finance in a non-debatable form, and they in themselves are an inducement to deal as best we can with those matters that lie in the road ahead of us.

Mr. Speaker, the business community in Canada that is to be assisted while the government allegedly assists those people who are unemployed keeps a very watchful eye on the functions of government. Aside from the 5 per cent temporary surtax on corporate profits that appeared in the non-debatable budget of the Minister of Finance, we are treated to the prospect of further deficit financing of the kind that can only deter business from the expansion and development that is so necessary to the financial well-being of our nation and its people.

I direct your attention in this regard, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that at the conclusion of the 1980-81 fiscal period we shall have a deficit of $14.165 billion. We shall indeed have an "interest only" element of the cost of carrying the national debt in the neighbourhood of $10.5 billion. These projections can do nothing but send a cold shiver down the spines of Canadian businessmen. If one thing is certain it is this: the day must come when the piper must be paid. That day is rapidly approaching, Mr. Speaker. Surely no business in Canada is in a position where it wishes to expand and develop if it is confronted with the prospect of paying the monumental taxes that would have to be paid in order to satisfy the obligations and debts run up by the Government of Canada.

While the Minister of Finance may speak about our current economic problems and in some way lay the blame upon international circumstances and the declining advances in the United States, I do wish he would have some regard for the efforts made by the United States government to balance its budget and cut its deficit. Instead of that, we are faced with ever-increasing deficits in this country, none of which are commendable to business and none of which will induce business to expand its operations and remove the need for a bill similar to Bill C-19.

Is it always to be the function of government to destroy free enterprise and then encroach upon the funds of the taxpayers of this country, as is the case in this piece of legislation, in order to rectify the errors it made initially? I submit that is not its function.

What of the application hitherto of the Employment Tax Credit Act which it is sought to amend today? That plan has been a bureaucrat's dream with application forms and paper work which are anathema to private enterprise. In its typical fashion, the government's answer to strangling bureaucracy has been to create more of the same. We can recall very vividly the creation of the office of the commissioner of paper burden whose first task was to send out questionnaires requesting answers to be submitted by the business community.

The real answer to the minister's suggestion that this measure is but temporary while the government develops an employment strategy is that the government already has an employment strategy. It has demonstrated what it is and it has also demonstrated that it does not wish to change it. The strategy is to take up the unemployment in this nation through the public service.

In Canada we have a public service payroll of $8.6 billion, as shown by the report of the Auditor General tabled in this House as recently as last week. From that report we know that the typical production level of the public service is 60.8 per cent compared with production levels in private enterprise of 80.7 per cent. As a matter of fact, the production level in private enterprise is on occasion higher.

We also know that in undertaking the survey the Auditor General omitted the Post Office from his investigation. We know as well that while the 60.8 efficiency level was an average, some of the averages were as low as or less than 55 per cent.

As a member of the last Parliament I served on the public accounts committee of this House which had as its chairman the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). At that time, having regard to the way in which the minister functions, I was convinced that he had a genuine regard for the proper expenditure of money belonging to the taxpayers of this country and had some real concern for finding remedies for waste and extravagance and a means of instilling in the public service of this country a sense of responsibility which has hitherto been lacking.

At that time we endeavoured to determine how some of the functions of the public service might best be amended in order that this efficiency and responsibility might be instilled. I was somewhat surprised, therefore, when questioning the President of the Treasury Board, to find that he thrust back to the committee of which he was recently a member the task of determining how to solve the problems of efficiency and competence in the public service.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that public accounts committees of this House will come and go. Nothing will be achieved unless government takes a firm step to ensure that both management in the public service and individual efforts on the part of public servants are directed to granting to the taxpayers of this country something that they deserve—a fair day's work for the pay received.

Very clearly, as the Auditor General has indicated, as a consequence of the deficiency in performance there is an excess of employees in the public service—if we are to have regard only to the figures—of 24 per cent. Otherwise we might draw the inference, as the Auditor General has, that with the present staff 32 per cent more production might be achieved. That production is the minimum recommended by the Auditor General—the 80 per cent minimum, not the standard average that is to be found in private enterprise of 87 per cent. As I have indicated, this is without regard to the functioning of the Post Office Department.

It is, Mr. Speaker, an abuse of the process for government to intervene, when attempting to solve the unemployment problem in our country, by creating more employment in the public service. We learned from the Speech from the Throne not that the government recognize that the Canadian public is fed up with too much government, but that the public wishes to have more efficient government, not less.

I do not know where the ministers of the Crown have been when surveys have been taken by Gallup indicating where the concern of the public lies in this area. There was a time when big business was regarded as being the most oppressive, offensive element in society. There was a time after that when the public had the view that labour unions were the most oppressive, offensive element in Canadian society. However, today it is this government and its ever-extending authority, its ever-reaching arms into the pockets of the public and its placing on the backs of Canadians of undue burdens.

The process is made easier by the creation of new positions, by expanding unnecessary work loads, and by hiring programs in the public service which are clearly demonstrated by the report of the Auditor General to be unnecessary. It is essential for the government not only when it presents a bill such as C-19, but when it presents any bill calling for the expenditure of public moneys in the fashion that it does here, to have regard to the manner in which those public moneys are spent.

The public recognizes that there is not an inexhaustible supply of funds which may either be drawn upon today or hopefully drawn upon in the future by postponing the agony. It is time that the government today recognizes that as well, and takes those remedial steps which are essential.

We were told in the Speech from the Throne that Canadians expect action, and action now. That is true. However, to repeat that time and again will not solve the problem without action. Study groups, re-examination, the appointment of commissions, examination on an annual basis of the Auditor General's report, will not solve the problem. The problem will only be solved by concrete affirmative action taken by this government in order to satisfy the legitimate demands of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate all those who sit in your seat for their impartial stand in the way that they rule this House.

When listening to the last speaker, I was interested when he was interrupted on a point of order by a government member. The government member was, of course, asking whether the hon. member who had the floor was being relevant to the topic. My comment would be: is the legislation relevant to the problem?

When Bill C-23 was introduced in January, 1978, all parties agreed that it should have speedy passage. However, the New Democratic Party spokesman in the debate at that time, Mr. Stu Leggatt from New Westminster, had no illusions about the ability of the bill or the program to make a dent in unemployment. I quote from Hansard of that date:

This bill will make such a small impact on Canadian unemployment that I am surprised a backbencher did not introduce it.

Neither are we today under any illusion as to how successful this bill will be in coming to grips with one of the problems that face this country. That is the unemployment problem. The proposed measure is clearly inadequate. It could be described as a band-aid measure, except that it is a band-aid to an already existing band-aid. In other words, the minister is proposing to fix up a problem by just putting another band-aid on a program that was introduced two years ago as a band-aid at that time.

An hon. Member: It won't stick.

Mr. Murphy: It will not stick, Mr. Speaker. Instead of proposing measures to help meet the needs of the millions of unemployed in this country, the minister is only extending a temporary program. Throughout the recent election the people of Canada heard that there was a new team of Liberals, a new and improved Liberal party, yet in this measure, as in the throne speech and in the mini-budget the other night, we find that the Liberal party has nothing new to offer Canada.

There is some history we should consider when we look at this legislation. If you really look at it, you find that it is the same legislation that was introduced two years ago. The Liberal party at that time introduced a temporary measure. Instead of meeting this crisis with any concrete program, any over-all program, we get the same program extended for one more year.

It is a typical Liberal patchwork and band-aid approach to the problems that face this nation. It has been caused by an increase in foreign ownership, an increase in the tendency of the Liberal party to try to deal with a problem by throwing money at it. It is a problem which is increased by the hodge-podge approach to make-work programs like this one, the Local Initiatives Program, Opportunities for Youth, and so on.

Mr. Epp: You were in favour of them.

Mr. Murphy: The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) says we are in favour of these programs. That is only because the Liberal government and the Conservative government which preceded it did nothing to solve the problems of the unemployed. We have been forced to accept these temporary measures. We would love to see this country have an economic development strategy. We would like to see an industrial stragety to develop this country and its resources.

Unfortunately, the hon. member for Provencher is right. We have not had anything else, so we are stuck with this type of program. In each case these programs have created some jobs. A certain amount of dignity was restored to individuals who received jobs through these programs, and the federal Liberal government was let off the hook for a little while. However, unemployment has continued to grow. Foreign ownership has grown. Foreign investment has increased within this country.

Two factors have become apparent. First, these band-aid programs are not working. These band-aids which were supposed to cover the sores of the Canadian economy became tattered and weak. The pressure of public opinion caused by Liberals trying to offer these types of programs was to say that we need something more concrete, yet the Liberal government has not met these concerns.

Ultimately these programs have done nothing to solve the structural unemployment among the hidden unemployed or others in our society. This measure was introduced two years ago when the public, the unemployed, and the opposition parties were clamouring for measures to deal with the tragedy of unemployment. Bill C-23 is what they gave us.

This is a typical patchwork, band-aid approach that has been used time and again. A program is announced, millions are spent, and the program proves ineffective. What happens? A new program is announced or a program is extended, more millions are spent, and again the problem is not met.

In 1968 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was first elected to his position to implement a just society, the unemployment rate in Canada was 4.5 per cent. It is now 8.6 per cent. In Quebec in 1968 it was 6.1 per cent. It is now almost 11 per cent. In the Atlantic provinces unemployment in 1968 was only 6 per cent. It is now approximately 13 per cent. What has been the advantage of these programs? Almost nothing. Unemployment has increased. The control of our economy has decreased.

This program is a band-aid because it ignores those groups and areas of the country which need jobs the most. Yes, the program does contain a provision for higher rates of assistance to regions where existing employment opportunities are inadequate, and its supporters claim it has been able to create 50,000 jobs. Yet what does it do to train people who need training in order to get a long-term livelihood? It does nothing. What does it do for women and young people? It does almost nothing. And, to be honest, there is no proof that it has even created the 50,000 jobs the minister talks about. There is no proof these jobs would not have been created through other measures. Look at some of the groups which should be helped by an employment tax program, or an employment program of any sort. Let us look at the women of this country.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murphy: Women bear—

An hon. Member: Children.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, women do bear children. It reminds me of the Premier of Manitoba who was one of our greatest breeders, as he himself claimed, in the legislature of that province. The women came back with the remark that he was one of the greatest breeders of contempt. So, of course, it is not surprising to hear a Conservative's comment in this House. Women bear disproportionately the brunt of high unemployment, of inflation, and of cutbacks in government services. In the last ten years or so there have been severe effects on women caused by economic mismanagement of this country.

About 400,000 women in the labour force are without work. Almost 9 per cent of women workers are jobless compared with 5 per cent for men, and this does not include "hidden" unemployment, the real rate of unemployment among women which is much higher. The real rate should include the housewife who would be looking for a job if she thought she could find one; the real rate of unemployment should include the welfare mother who has looked for a job for months, has become discouraged, and has given up.

Then again, when any one of these women does find a job she can bet she will earn less than a man would earn. In 1970 she would earn less, proportionate to what a man earned, than she would have earned in 1968. Today, women make 58 cents for every dollar earned by men—if they have a job.

What we saw during the last decade was an increase in these problems, a story of inaction on the part of government. Take the year 1975, for example, also known as International Women's Year. The Liberals paid tribute by implementing a program of cutbacks to women's programs, disproportionate lay-offs in the public service, discriminatory unemployment insurance changes, and a refusal to enforce the equal pay for work of equal value clause in the human rights legislation.

The minister can go to women's groups, as he did last night, and speak out against Conservative thinking, and call out for the need for social policies, but when he shouts out against these neo-conservatives, as he calls them, he should remember that it is his party which, through its actions, has become the neo-conservative party of Canada.

Mr. Deans: Well said.

Mr. Murphy: One of the other groups which is being affected has been the youth of this country. When Canadian unemployment was 8.6 per cent last month, the rate for young people between the ages of 15 and 24 was 15.1 per cent. Getting that first job, finding employment suitable to their skills and training, has become harder and harder for young Canadians, especially within the last ten years. These young people will increasingly refuse to be just statistics as they appear in government figures, because without providing a security job future for young Canadians, Canada has no future at all. What has this program done for young people? Almost nothing.

I should like to turn to another group of people who have been ignored by the government of the day and the government of the last 16 years. I am talking about the native people, especially those in northern areas. One only has to look at the Churchill constituency which I represent where, according to government statistics, the unemployment rate is only slightly higher than the Manitoba rate in general. Yet if you travel from community to community, as I have done over the last couple of years, you see the hidden unemployed. These are the people we do not find in government statistics.

Among the residents of Manitoba's northern native communities the actual unemployment rate is about 75 per cent; in some communities it is over 90 per cent. As I say, these people are not listed in government figures, but they are unemployed whether the government says they are or not. For that matter, these people are hidden from the whole manpower system. In most of these communities, the welfare system is a way of life.

The lack of planning in the Canadian economy in general, and the "pull the resources out of the north" mentality reflected in the history of northern development, have given nothing back to Canada's original residents. The occasional project has given some employment to native people but, by and large, there have been no quota systems which guarantee employment for native people. Training and long-term planning to benefit the north is what these people need, not the band-aid suggested by the minister today.

One of the speakers supporting the government said it was okay that this program did not help the remote communities because they had Canada Works programs. Madam Speaker, that is not true in Manitoba. It is not true in Saskatchewan, and it is not true in other parts of the country because the Conservative government we had a few months ago took those programs away from the people of northern Saskatchewan and from the people of northern Alberta.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Murphy: An hon. member on the government side says "shameful", and I agree with him. Anywhere else in Canada, and with respect to any group of Canadians, 75 per cent unemployment would be an abomination. The unemployment among our native population is an international disgrace and, as I said, this program will do nothing to help these people.

It is a sad fact that the companies which will benefit from this program do not exist in communities where there is native unemployment.

The regions of this country will not benefit from this program. Regional disparity is a testimony to Canada's history of unplanned economic activity and the growth of foreign investment which has tended only to increase the problem. Development still occurs in the centre, not in the hinterland. When market forces and companies are left to parcel out jobs and wages on their own, history tells us that they will leave too many people out of work in the maritimes, too many Quebeckers in low wage industries like the clothing industry, and too little manufacturing of any kind in western Canada.

Unemployment statistics can only tell part of the story because all that happens is we talk about known unemployment; the figures do not deal with the hidden unemployment in this country. At the same time they do not take into account the differences between the have and the have-not areas of this country. At times when the economic situation is not good, it is the poorer areas which suffer the most. For example, in March the unofficial unemployment rate in Newfoundland was 15 per cent but real unemployment was closer to 30 per cent. This was not the case ten years ago. The unemployment rate in that part of Canada has become worse and worse with each year of Liberal rule.

Statistics Canada does not include the 15 per cent of the population which is unemployed but hidden. These people do not have a foothold in the labour force. In a country as wealthy as Canada it is a disgrace that we should have regions where over 30 per cent of the population is unemployed. Again, what will this program do to correct regional disparities? It will do nothing, or almost nothing.

What we need is an active regional development program. We have to create an economic situation where all Canadians share equally in our country's wealth. We need full employment programs, investment guidelines, and new policies for federal programs such as this one, which would make sure that they benefit the regions, especially those regions needing economic development. The government must commit itself to a full employment program by establishing legislative targets and timetables each year for the number of jobs to be created in each region.

We also need an aggressive stance on affirmative action programs. The New Democratic Party fundamentally disagrees with the programs of the Liberal and Conservative parties. To the New Democratic Party, affirmative action means making basic alterations in the job market and in the conditions of work to guarantee that women, young people, native people, and people from outlying regions will get a foothold within the work force.

An hon. Member: Action, not public relations.

Mr. Murphy: As the hon. member says, action, not just public relations.

Affirmative actions must have the force of law. Compliance has to be compulsory rather than voluntary.

Any government moneys supplied to the private sector must be dependent upon a situated and in-place affirmative action program. The New Democratic Party recognizes that the promotion of equality in the work force cannot be created like a train which runs along its own tracks and on its own steam. Instead, we believe that the concerns of those traditionally excluded from the labour force must be met in part by the terms of reference for government purchasing, for government action, and for government leadership in rebuilding our economy. Equal footing by groups within this country will not appear magically, but what we do need is government that is committed to action to meet the problems of the unemployed. Only through positive measures by government to ensure this participation and planned direction to the economy will such equality emerge.

It is this type of band-aid approach which has allowed the government to shirk its duties. Instead of having a comprehensive program to meet the growth and changing needs of our population, this government, and the Liberal party which it represents, has been afraid to meet the challenge. It has consistently opted for short-term programs and for tax write-offs, and the Liberals have prayed that somehow things would get better.

Well, they have not got better, and as I have proved in today's speech, things have got worse and worse with each year of Liberal administration. The Liberal party and the government must face facts. It will never be possible to meet the challenge of the unemployed unless the government develops a comprehensive program to develop our entire economy so that we benefit from the energy sources and the other resources, both natural and human, that we as a nation possess.

Finally, at the heart of Canada's unemployment problem is the obvious tragic failure to develop an industrial development policy. At the root of things we are having difficulty providing jobs for Canadians because economic decisions are not being made in this country. We have allowed most of our third sector, our manufacturing sector, to come under the control of the multinationals which have no commitment and no loyalty to this country. The operations of the branch plants are geared not to the creation of Canadian jobs but to the maximum profit for the head office which is situated abroad. And when the Canadian branch plants are shut down, our communities and our labour force bear the brunt of unemployment and depression.

From the mining town in B.C. to the sawmills in the same province, to the Windsor auto lay-offs, to the maritime fishing villages, Canadian people have lost their jobs when the multinational or U.S. company has cut back in Canada, and this bill will do nothing to solve that problem.

We will never truly be able to do anything about unemployment in this country until we have a government which will gain control over the development of Canadian resources and create Canadian industry and Canadian jobs for Canadians.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, first I congratulate the minister on his appointment to his onerous task. I hope he realizes the big and very important job he has.

The first thing he said to us today was that he wanted us to pass this bill through the House hurriedly. In the last week and a half all I have heard in this House is, "Please give us your co-operation". We will co-operate, but we are going to examine each and every bill which goes through this House responsibly.

This is my second term. In the first term I was here I did not see the co-operation one might expect, especially when we were bringing in bills which were introduced by a previous government and it was a matter of some housekeeping. I heard hon. members opposite, including the minister, speaking at some length on some of the bills which should have received relatively fast passage. If I remember correctly, the first thirty days of the last Parliament were taken up with a great deal of unnecessary chatter.

The previous speaker, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), made some very good points. He used the term "band-aid"—a band-aid effort—and this employment program is just that. It is a band-aid program. It is brought in to let the people of Canada think that the government is doing something to create jobs.

In the last campaign one of the most frequently asked questions by young people of me was, "What future do I have in this great country; will I have a job; will I have a meaningful job?" I am not convinced that this bill answers that question in any way, shape or form. The minister has not presented any meaningful statistics on the performance of this program over the last two years. Were the jobs which were created, meaningful jobs? Are they still in existence, or have industries closed down? I am not sure that this program is helping the people it should be helping. Is it helping the struggling young entrepreneur who is trying to get off the ground, trying to expand his company or trying to create a company? I do not think it is helping him because he probably does not have any taxable income for the first number of years.

Rather than bringing in some of these old bills and extending them, I challenge the minister to present a meaningful package. The process could start with a budget, if the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) could screw up enough courage to present one to the people of Canada. That is where it should start, so that the private sector can plan its business over the next few years.

I am concerned about the youth of Canada. I have here some frightening statistics. I see that 410,000 people between the ages of 15 and 24 are out of work; 202,000 of them are between the ages of 20 and 24, which is an age which is very important in the development of a person's life when starting out in a career. I think the moneys which this program requires could be much better spend elsewhere. For example, let us talk about the unemployment insurance program for just a minute.

Before I start on that subject, I note the time. I would like to continue my remarks at eight o'clock. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rose): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the debate was interrupted at six o'clock, the motion for second reading of Bill C-19, an act to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, was under consideration. The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) had the floor.

Mr. McDermid: I ask for your indulgence for just a moment. I notice that the Acting Clerk is in the House and I wanted to say in passing how pleased I was that I had the pleasure of having Mr. Pelletier swear me in. It is good to see him in the House. I know he is filling some big shoes very capably.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Also, I heard the good news today that the Clerk is finally home from the hospital. I know we are all pleased to hear that.

When we recessed for the dinner hour this evening, I was in the process of discussing briefly Bill C-19, this band-aid measure which has been going on for a few years and is being extended for another year without proof that it is really working. If it is that great, why not expand the program? I was about to say that perhaps the government should turn its scrutiny to other areas which need more attention in the area of the economy, such as the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This makes for interesting statistics when you understand that the overpayments under that program amount to some $300 million, and that the program in many instances is a disincentive to work.

I consulted a personnel firm in the city of Toronto which had shown some interest in our social system and benefits. They had complained that they could not get people to work although they had jobs available. I asked the individual to whom I spoke to expand on that comment, because we hear that remark quite often but we are not given examples. Let me give you a few examples. I will just use first names.

The first is Michelle, unemployed, registered for temporary work in this firm. She was offered a position with one of the well-known downtown companies just for one day, but she refused it because she had to go shopping with her mother.

Donna was offered a number of positions but gave the firm a list of things she did not want to do in a job. They included "no figure typing, no accounting, and must be something interesting." She is qualified as a typist.

Another case is Linda, desperate for work, either permanent or temporary. When offered a temporary job, she replied she had to take the TV in to be repaired.

Kim, hard up for money and looking for permanent or temporary work, after accepting and being booked for an assignment, telephoned to say her grandparents were coming for a visit and she had to stay home to let them in. The following day another temporary assignment was offered her, but she could not go because she was going out to dinner and would not have time to get ready.

Let me give you one more example, Mr. Speaker. This is the case of Anne, who would not take a one-day assignment because it would interfere with her unemployment insurance payments. The president of the firm wrote that at least she was honest about it.

It says here that the list is absolutely endless, that cases such as these happen three or four times a day. It goes on to say that they are constantly asked for separation slips from people who have refused to take jobs which they had offered. It takes them half an hour to fill these forms out. They are constantly battling with people, trying to persuade them to go on interviews for permanent and temporary jobs, and they are just not interested. Yet they collect unemployment insurance benefits. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the minister might take a long, hard look at this system to see if in fact it is doing what it is supposed to be doing.

I should like to speak briefly now about the auto industry and jobs in that industry. It is of great concern to everyone. We hear about Windsor all the time. I must give credit to my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), who mentioned Brampton the other night. Brampton is a great auto town as well. We have American Motors there. American Motors are also experiencing a down turn in the economy and have been laying people off. I was pleased to see in their announcement this week that they are completely retooling and will be starting to make their Eagle car in Brampton, together with portions of the Concord. This will be very important to the economy of the community in which I reside and which I represent because they are now producing a jeep that is a recreational vehicle, and of course the down turn in recreational vehicles has hurt employment. I am very pleased to see this new production.

One thing that is interesting is that I have been trying to meet with the president of the United Auto Workers. There have been numerous telephone calls—and as a matter of fact one appointment set up but cancelled—to see how we could help them with the problems they are experiencing at the present time. For some reason they are not interested in sitting down and discussing those in an intelligent way. My offer is still there to help them. I hope they get in touch with us because they will have their problems in the next four or five months, being laid off while the retooling is going on.

The auto industry is suffering greatly now. Rather than bringing in Bill C-19 or extending this program, I think that it would be far more beneficial to consider the motion under Standing Order 43 introduced by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) today in which he urged the government—and which the government refused—to consider a rescinding of the 9 per cent sales tax on North American built cars. I think this would have a dramatic effect on the auto industry. I know that it would help very greatly many, many communities, not just in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec but in other parts of Canada as well. I can only echo his comments and urge that the government give serious consideration to this.

Again I say to the minister, who is in the House this evening, that we are very disappointed that this is his first great pronouncement on employment programs out of his ministry. It is a rehash of something that was brought in during the Thirtieth Parliament. It does not really introduce us to the 1980s. There is nothing sparkling, bright, new and vibrant. There is nothing that people can sink their teeth into and say, "Hey, we have a new government and they are really interested in doing something". They told us that he is the bright light in the party. I read in the Canadian magazine on the weekend that he is the great white hope riding out of the west who will lead Canada. Yet, his first bill is just an extension of something that has been here for years. In his introduction this afternoon he did not say anything to indicate whether the bill was working. He thinks it is helping young people and he assumes that it is doing something, but it really is not. Until he produces those facts we are yet to be convinced that this bill should be continued. I will be interested in his remarks when we wind up second reading of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of addressing myself to the problems that lie before us in the measure which we are facing tonight. When I look at the bill before us, it seems to me that the Liberal government has established a new record for a new government, that is, tired already after two months.

First of all I should like to point out that I was impressed with the news release the minister sent out in conjunction with the legislation before us. I noticed that the release, dated April 15, indicated that we must have this legislation because the previous legislation was so successful that it created 50,000 new jobs. I think that is wonderful, except it looks like it is 50,000 man-years. The minister does not go on to explain that.

If one reads the legislation, the parameters for this program are that the employer has to maintain the employee for at least 13 weeks. If this is 50,000 new jobs, then let us take the other side of the extreme. With 50,000 new jobs at 13 weeks per job, we are not looking at 50,000 man-years. We are looking at about 12,000 or 15,000 man-years. In terms of its success, it has not done the job that the press release tried to make us believe. I am sure that it might be a little more than the 12,000 or 15,000 because some of those jobs may have turned out to be permanent ones. But it is highly unlikely, because any employer who is looking at a clean-up operation in his company will see this as a perfect way of doing some clean-up work around the place. He will hire this person for just the 13 weeks, and, what do you know, the job runs out for him the day after the program ends! It is not fair to the Canadian public for the minister to put out a press release which misleads the public in that way.

Someone has already pointed out with respect to this legislation that one of the weaknesses in it is the fact that it really does not deal with those companies which need the help the most and could help the most, that is, help the unemployed the most. As one person has already said today, probably half of the companies in Canada will not be able to benefit from this employment tax credit program because, in order to benefit, it is necessary for them to have paid income tax. What if it is a small operation, a new operation, a struggling operation which has never had to pay income tax? How will it benefit from this program?

Is the minister prepared to introduce an amendment so that there will be a pay-out to these companies at the end of the year if they have not had to pay tax? As it stands now, they must have an income tax payable of around $27,000 or $30,000 in order to benefit from this legislation. I would be happy to know if the minister is willing to introduce an amendment so that young companies, struggling companies that have not had to pay income tax, or those companies which just started out this year and have no tax record at all will benefit from this program. In the pure sense of the word, they are providing new employment. Will the minister provide some kind of a way to allow these companies to benefit from this kind of a program? I am referring to the companies that will not benefit as the legislation is before us at the present time.

The other matter which disturbs me greatly about the drafting of this bill is that the text indicates that the parameters of the legislation are around a time limit rather than a money limit. The bill indicates that the legislation will expire at the end of 1982, but there is nothing in the legislation which fixes any firm money amount to it. Would the minister tell us just exactly how much this program will cost Canadian taxpayers? Does he have any kind of figure in mind what it will cost Canadian taxpayers? How many employers does the minister estimate will benefit from this program? In the course of the minister's remarks, when he summarizes second reading debate, will he give us some kind of estimate of what it will cost Canadians to get into this program, rather than simply a time limit? Surely we are entitled to know just exactly what we are being asked to pay for in this program.

Another point I should like to bring out is that this bill really is supposed to be addressing unemployment, so we must ask ourselves why there is unemployment. Surely, sooner or later, we have to look at the record of this government under the leadership of this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I just had some information handed to me today regarding commercial failures from 1968 to 1978 under the leadership of the present Prime Minister. In 1968, when the present Prime Minister took office, there were 261 manufacturing business failures, involving losses to the tune of $287 million. By 1974 the number had dropped, oddly enough, because we were enjoying a short-term boom. In that year there were 244 manufacturing business failures. However, by 1979 under the leadership of this Prime Minister manufacturing business failures increased to 534. That is double what it was when this Prime Minister took office.

It seems a little ironic to me that this minister is introducing legislation presumably to help small businessmen when those people he is trying to help are already going out of business to the extent of almost two per day. He is drafting legislation which, as I understand it, within its parameters in no way helps those faltering businesses that will go bankrupt without help. It seems to me we have to take a hard look at the economic record of this government. Surely when 534 businesses in 1979 failed and went bankrupt, the minister would agree that this is one of the contributing factors to the high unemployment we have today with 1.2 million people out of work. With 534 businesses failing in one year, surely that is one reason for increased unemployment.

A second factor that I believe has contributed to our high unemployment is the indebtedness of our country. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) introduced a mini-budget the other day in which he announced that the indebtedness of this country will be higher than was estimated last fall, to the extent of something like $14 billion this year. That money has to come from somewhere. If it comes from general revenue, general revenue will have to increase, and in order for it to increase the taxpayer will have to pay more. The taxpayer in question happens to include the small businessman.

When it comes to individual budget deficits as a percentage of the GNP, we are really hanging in there with the best of them. The United States has a budget deficit as a percentage of GNP of 0.1 per cent. France has a budget deficit of 1.9 per cent in terms of GNP, whereas Canada has a budget deficit in those terms of 3.8 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Friesen: With this kind of increase in deficit, the necessary extra tax must come from the business community that this minister is attempting to help. That surely is some kind of help. It seems to me we had a clear indication the other day that this government really does not believe in the private sector. The mini-budget brought in the other day belies any kind of logical belief that this Liberal government believes in the private sector.

Let us consider what the minister did with regard to the capital gains tax. I remember very well that the Carter Commission of some years ago brought in a policy of "a buck is a buck is a buck.". Let me say to my friends to the left that he meant that not only actually but figuratively, or maybe the other way around, because they really believe in that philosophy. The commissioners were from that great haven of socialism at that time, the province of Manitoba. Everything was a buck.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: We know they are awake, Mr. Speaker. They believe the government is the best agency to invest or carry out capital investment. It is strange that as soon as the government did away, as a result of the recommendations of the Carter commission, with the capital gains tax, there was pressure on the housing market. As soon as there was that pressure on the housing market, construction companies stopped building, developers stopped developing, and there was an immediate need for apartment houses and single-family dwellings. As soon as the government brought in that tax revision it created a problem in the housing industry. That naturally gave the socialists pleasure because then they could bring in more legislation and regulation. They brought in landlord-tenant regulations, rental controls, and all of that type of legislation they enjoyed. As soon as there was no point in an investor making capital investments, the government had to step in.

This minister who brought in this legislation was active on the housing task force that travelled across Canada. Surely he should have known what would result. I assume he agrees with that kind of legislation.

On Monday night we had another clear example that this government is not committed to private-sector investments in such things as the housing industry. This is one reason why we in Vancouver have a real negative vacancy rate in apartment housing, and this is why we have a spiralling cost in housing in Vancouver.

I would challenge this minister, who was a member of that task force of 1968, to put pressure on the finance minister to make sure that the capital gains tax legislation is reversed for the housing industry so there will be an incentive for development money to go into housing in order to provide jobs and housing for the Canadian people, particularly in the Vancouver area where this is so necessary.

The third reason I see for rising unemployment in Canada is that we import employees to Canada to do work that Canadians could do. Just last week I attended an interparliamentary union conference and, on my way home, I stopped in London to have a look at our immigration office there. As I stood in the foyer of the immigration office in London I looked at the jobs posted on the board. I know this minister would rather carry on a conversation with the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) than hear about what is going on at our immigration office in London, but that job board was full of jobs offered to people in England who would come to Canada. There were positions for pipefitters in Fort McMurray, and machinists in Edmonton, Regina, Moose Jaw and Sarnia. We do not have any pipefitters who need jobs in Canada, I guess. There were all kinds of jobs offered to tradespeople in England to do work here that could be done by Canadians.

Does the minister have any intention of adopting a policy whereby unemployed machinists in Windsor will be offered jobs in Edmonton, with some kind of pressure on them to move from Windsor to Edmonton so that these jobs can be taken by Canadians rather than by people brought in from England?

Does he have any such intention? Surely within the manpower program we have an incentive program which pays for that kind of move. What kind of pressure will the minister put on Canadians to fill these jobs which can be done by Canadians, rather than having people come from Europe and other countries to fill them? These jobs are waiting to be filled, and they could be filled by Canadians.

As the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) has already said, we have a seemingly systematic policy in our unemployment system that, on the slightest excuse, people do not have to accept the job that is being offered to them. There seems to be a policy within the Liberal government that, if there is the slightest excuse, it will import employees from overseas rather than put pressure on Canadians to do that kind of work, whatever it may be. These are good, high paying jobs which are being performed by people who have been brought in by the minister and the policies that he has adopted.

It is patently obvious to most Canadians that we have too few skilled craftsmen in Canada who have been trained in Canada. Approximately 25 per cent of the tradesmen in Canada have been trained in Canada. The remainder were all trained outside the country. The remaining 75 per cent are either Canadians trained outside the country or people who have acquired their skills in another country and immigrated to Canada.

It is time that we have the kind of training program, such as we had in our policy, that will provide for skilled craftsmen to be trained in Canada, an apprentice system working in unison with the unions and management. This would help establish the kind of training program that would enable young people to learn to do the jobs which are now being given to people who have been brought in to Canada to do the work.

Another reason that we have unemployment is because we export jobs which could be done by Canadian companies, to foreign companies. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) gave a good example of this very thing when he told the House of the fishing boats which are being built overseas, and the fishing contracts, which could be performed by people in the maritimes, that are going overseas.

Another example which I would like to put on the record comes from my own constituency. The firm involved is a dredging company. In a letter to me, a company official said:

> We agree with subsidies or grants being allocated to various projects but are alarmed when we see our tax dollars being spent on exploration in areas where there is no Canadian content or benefit.
> The following are some examples of our concerns:
> 1. Esso Resources Limited, island construction in the Arctic. In 1971 firm proposals were submitted to their specifications and requirements. A large American-owned company bought their way in at the start, then continued to negotiate contracts for eight years. Large amounts of these profits are directed back to the United States.
> The Jones Act prevents Canadian companies from doing the same in American waters.

But we allow it to happen in Canada. The letter goes on:

> 2. Esso Resources Limited required additional equipment, and chose to use Beaver Dredging of Toronto. This company operates a token office in Canada but are in reality Dutch owned. Again, equipment and main crew were imported. We would estimate that through their operations, a large percentage of $30 to $50 million of Canadian money spent over the past five years, has been taken out of the country. Some Canadian labour was used.
> 3. Dome Petroleum has been contemplating deepening a channel into Tuktoyaktuk harbour since 1975. Canadian companies made approaches to carry out this work but were largely ignored. In 1979 Dome hired a large Dutch dredge, at great expense, without requesting firm proposals from Canadian companies.
> Some of the men I work with had an opportunity to board this dredge and observed that the very few Canadian workers employed, were doing mediocre jobs.
> We are certain that the high revenue gained by this Dutch company will leave the country.
> This project is probably the most costly operation and the largest loss of Canadian funds to foreign owners and crews.
> 4. Export Development Corporation (E.D.C.) called tenders for dredging in Cotonou, Republic of Benin, with a financial grant (direct gift) from CIDA.
> This job was open to foreign competition as an alternate. In order to keep Canadian companies out, a large European company bought the project.
> 5. EDC built a hopper dredge for the Cameroon port of Douala, a gift of $12.5 million. CIDA called for tenders in Canada to operate and train nationals for this project. Beaver dredging obtained the contract, but used no Canadians on the project.

The minister wonders why we have growing unemployment in our country. Those are the reasons why we have unemployment in Canada.

I believe we also have unemployment because we do not target our programs to areas and groups where the needs are the greatest. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), who spoke earlier, pointed out that the minister is using the "shotgun" approach rather than a "rifle" approach. That is a good analogy. Why does the government not target the unemployment program, the tax program, to those groups where unemployment is the greatest? Approximately 15 per cent of our youth are unemployed. The program could be targeted for geographical areas of greatest distress, the maritimes for example. It could also be targeted for women. I see the hon. member for Ottawa Centre indicating that there is something in it.

Mr. Evans: What did you do with Young Canada Works?

Mr. Friesen: If the hon. member would check Hansard of December 13, 1979, he will see.

Mr. Evans: It was cancelled.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member should not stand so close because he might get caught in the draft.

The bill which is before this House tonight does not hit the target groups or areas where the needs are the greatest and, because there is no fixed dollar amount attached to the programs, the Canadian public will be left out in the cold. This bill will not do the job for which it is intended.

On the one hand we have before us a very innocuous piece of legislation although, conceptually, it has some good points within in. It looks innocuous and it even looks helpful, but I suggest that because of the way the program is designed, the work which will go into it and particularly the money which will go into it will be dissipated in such a way that Canadians will not benefit from it the way they should.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate this soon. However, following the remarks made by my hon. friend, I believe some points must be clarified.

First, I will take the liberty of reading from a speech delivered by a friend of the hon. member from the opposition last December 13, a date which all members in the opposition can certainly recall. Speaking about the record on tax credits:

The basic intent of the legislation is to stimulate employment by allowing employers to claim the $80 weekly tax credit in return for providing jobs under certain conditions. In the event that an employer would not be able to use the tax credits in a given year, it would be possible to carry them forward for up to five years.

[English]

The first question concerns the member's comment with regard to the companies that could not participate in the program because they are not paying taxes, in other words, small companies which do not have profits. First of all, most of the firms that do apply for the tax credit program are small firms. If a firm cannot use the tax credit in the first year because of zero taxation, then it can carry the tax credit forward for five years.

Many would argue that we should not subsidize an unprofitable firm, but a firm which cannot make a profit after five years should not be given the benefit of the tax credit. That is the first point. I will continue with Mr. Atkey's speech of last December.

The two elements of the program will be concerned with, first, the incremental employment of youth, and second, with improving or maintaining the employability of people with hiring handicaps, particularly youth, natives, older workers, women re-entrants into the labour force and the disabled. These elements are to come into effect in early February, 1980. If the private sector responds as I anticipate, we will be able to place in private sector jobs before the next fiscal year draws to a close up to 105,000 unemployed young people.

To come back to the second point the former speaker brought up, when he speaks of the program which, according to him, did not create the number of jobs the minister claimed in his news release—

● (2040)

The program does not really create 50,000 person-years, and most firms fire people after 13 weeks—that is the statement the hon. member made previously. The estimate is about 45,000 person-years for the year 1979-80—and the average length of a contract is 46 weeks, not the 13 week minimum that the hon. member mentioned. The data is not all complete but it had been evaluated that about 50 per cent of the jobs created continue after the subsidy has ceased, once again contrary to what the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Atkey continued:

Of this total, 89,000 young people will be placed in new private sector jobs that did not exist before; . . .

[English]

The then minister was telling us that he was creating 89,000 jobs that did not exist in that time. I cannot understand the hon. member's logic, having supported that bill on December 13 and then today saying that it is not a very good bill and not the type that a Conservative government would support. Mr. Speaker, it is exactly the same bill that we are supporting. It is not what we want—we will have our own job-creation program to present—

Mr. Friesen: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen).

Mr. Friesen: You know how I hate to rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but I think there is a significant difference between the legislation that Mr. Atkey introduced and that which is before us. There was a fixed dollar figure attached to that one and there is not to this.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Dawson: Mr. Speaker, I can see that we are attacking a certain point to which the hon. member was quick to react. It is exactly the same type of bill, and I repeat it is not the type of bill that we would want but right now there is a sense of urgency. When the party opposite was in government they stopped the Canada Works program and a whole bunch of programs that were job-creating. They cut off staff.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the members opposite have caused today's unemployment rate, we must now take urgent action to correct the mistakes made by their government which, fortunately, stayed in power only for a few months. Within the next few weeks, we plan on putting into effect a comprehensive employment creation program which will include several elements. We have decided to do so because we believe in small businesses and we consider it our duty to help them in the months to come before introducing a comprehensive job-creation program. However, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I should continue to read from the speech made by the then minister because this might instil some guilt in the minds of the Progressive Conservatives, at least I hope so, because I cannot believe that they really change their mind every six months.

An hon. Member: They have a short memory.

Mr. Dawson: You are right, they have a short memory.

Whether we reach the placement ceilings under either the incremental element or the employability element will depend a great deal on the response we get from the leaders of business and industry.

Mr. Speaker, I can say that after six months the reaction from the leaders of business and industry has been remarkable and that this government is now re-establishing this program because the funds provided have been used by the companies and because the private sector had confidence in this program. The government will continue to support this program as it had announced in 1978 in the budget speech of Mr. Chrétien.

We will be appealing to them to join with us in an all-out effort to create employment opportunities for Canadians, and especially young Canadians.

In addition to forging a partnership with the private business and industrial sectors, we want to co-operate with the voluntary sector in creating jobs directly for youth.

Although the voluntary sector has demonstrated a tremendous capacity to perform an invaluable service function, as witness their efforts in the case of the Indo-Chinese refugees, such organizations have been largely untapped as a potential source of concrete work experience for young men and women.

That is another objective we also share. As suggested this afternoon, the government was not defeated on those matters because we supported the former government on these job creation programs, but for other reasons you are fully aware of, Mr. Speaker.

Now that this bill is before the House, we are counting on the co-operation of the official opposition who supported that bill six months ago in order that once more this evening this bill hopefully will pass as soon as possible, in order that small businesses so heartily supported by our friends opposite may get these grants, and that our young people have an opportunity to work. We hope there will be no systematic opposition from Conservative members on that program.

[English]

More than 25,000 employers have signed agreements under the employment tax credit program, and 92 per cent of them have indicated in an interim survey that they would participate again.

With the greatest number of employers, Quebec and Ontario have the most impressive total of employees hired under the program—18,500 in Quebec; over 19,000 in Ontario in the last fiscal year.

The acceptance of the program by small businesses is reflected in the fact that 77 per cent of all agreements were signed with businesses employing 20 or fewer, and 40 per cent of these employers had a maximum of five in their normal work force. That is what we call helping small business enterprise, Mr. Speaker.

Use of the programs was high in all Atlantic provinces. On average 88 per cent of Atlantic region takeup was from firms with fewer than 20 employees. In the prairie region small firms represent 85 per cent of participants; in British Columbia, 82 per cent; Ontario, 77 per cent, and Quebec 72 per cent.

That is what we are doing to help the small businessman whom the hon. member was talking about when he spoke—the ones who are having all the problems with the high interest rates. I should like to have more information from my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen).

Mr. Beatty: This is just a Liberal filibuster.

Mr. Dawson: Oh, come on. We are trying to educate you hon. members on the other side.

Mr. Neil: You haven't a hope!

Mr. Dawson: You are right. I have to admit. We have been having a lot of difficulty in the last few years trying to educate hon. members opposite, but we are still working at it. We are still hoping.

Mr. McKenzie: You have had 16 years to work on it.

Mr. Dawson: Yes, and we will be here for a few years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should address the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Dawson: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I was answering the remarks made by our hon. friends opposite.

[English]

Distribution of jobs placed 51 per cent in manufacturing, 20 per cent in retailing and wholesaling, 12 per cent in service industries. Forty-three per cent of employees worked in machinery and fabricating occupations, 15 per cent in clerical, and 7 per cent in sales.

Employers in the Atlantic regions and the Gaspé region of Quebec can earn a maximum of $4,160 in tax credits for each employee hired under the program; in most other urban areas in other regions, the maximum tax credit earned for each employee is $3,120, while in the remainder of the country the maximum is $3,640.

The program involves very little paperwork. There are only two one-page forms to be filled in by the employer, with a third that is optional.

Young Canadians 25 years of age and under made up 55 per cent of those employed, equally split between male and female. Over all, a full 34 per cent of those employed were females. That is another responsibility the hon. minister has and will be dealing with in the next few weeks, Mr. Speaker.

Coming back to the paperwork, we have heard so often from hon. members opposite that we are burdening small enterprise with paper work. This is a tax credit program and it is very easy for the companies to apply for it. We have not received any complaints from private enterprise or small companies concerning this program because it is very easy for them to apply, and very easy for them to profit from it. Some hon. members have already spoken on this aspect, Mr. Speaker.

A sample based on 5,000 employed under the program reveals that 52 per cent were living on unemployment insurance benefits prior to finding employment through the program; another 5 per cent were living on welfare, and others were being supported by family members, living on savings or pensions. I think that is a good performance, Mr. Speaker. All had been unemployed for a minimum of two weeks, but the average length of time they had been unemployed and looking for work was 15 weeks. And I think that has been progressive, Mr. Speaker.

Employment and unemployment patterns vary widely across this country, and the employment tax credit program, although it has been successful, cannot meet all the varying employment needs in this diverse country.

The extension of the Employment Tax Credit Act is an interim measure, which will shortly be followed by a range of new employment programs.

The kind of targeting which respects the diversity of this country and is sensitive to the differing needs and opportunities across this country, is a fundamental part of the employment development measures that this government is developing and which will be presented to this House in the near future.

Having this information now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that hon. members will stop filibustering the bill and that we may have maximum co-operation from them so that the small enterprise about which they are always crying will get back to this program and be satisfied with it.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two about the bill before us, C-19. I was chatting with my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) just before I got up to speak. He brought to my attention a quote from John Foster Dulles that I thought might well be appropriate for the context of this debate. It goes as follows: "The measure of success is not whether you have a tough problem to deal with, but whether it's the same problem you had last year". I have to think that if you are going to measure success by that criterion, then this government certainly is successful. If anything, it is very successful given that the problem it is now dealing with is even worse than the problem it had when the legislation was first introduced by its predecessor.

Let me talk for a moment in a little different vein from my colleagues who tended to want to speak about the statistical problems and the values of this piece of legislation statistically. I want to talk about what unemployment really is. It is not a statistic that should be manipulated by politicians for their own particular needs. It is not 7, 8 or 9 per cent of anything. For the majority of people who face it, it is the single most frightening, single most soul-destroying experience.

The very result of unemployment breaks up families, and contributes to excessive alcohol and drug use. It is a symptom that is reflected frequently in child abuse and spouse abuse. Unemployment is a major contributor to crime. If you were to stop and think about it for a moment, you would agree that unemployment is the single major problem with which we have to cope. If we could deal with the background to unemployment, we would to a great extent have dealt with the social and economic problems that confront the nation at the moment.

We are in a country that is facing a terrible crisis. We are faced with a piece of legislation which, under any other circumstances, would be unsupportable.

Mr. Fraser: What circumstances would those be?

Mr. Deans: In any other circumstances this kind of legislation would be totally unsupportable. I will come to that in a moment. When you look around you and you look at the crisis and the problems that confront us, and you look at this piece of legislation intended to deal even in part with the problems of unemployment, the tendency is to smile and walk away from it.

Here we are with a resource sector under siege from offshore, having great difficulty coping with the challenges of today, given the facts of the companies that operate here and abuse and take our resources, and have done so for many years. They are now using the money that they got from the sale of those resources to develop competitive resources in other parts of the world. This country has its energy prices dictated to it by OPEC nations. It has its interest rate policies set in Washington and New York. This country has a manufacturing sector that is being undermined by foreign ownership. The elderly of this country are in despair, and the young are beset with panic.

I have three children and they say to me, "Hey, Dad, what do you think I should be? What should I study? What are the opportunities? What sorts of advice can you give me with regard to where my future might lie in terms of finding a job?" I ask hon. members to think about that for a moment. What kind of advice do you give young people today when they ask you what they should study, where are the areas of greatest opportunity, and what chance is there for them? I certainly find it difficult to give them the kind of advice that I got from my father and I am sure he got from his.

An hon. Member: Go to Canada?

Mr. Deans: I thank you very much—a very interesting interjection and typical of the Conservative party. Those who have jobs are afraid to spend because their jobs are in jeopardy. They are not at all sure of the future. Those who have no jobs cannot spend. The country's economy is on the decline and we get a piece of legislation which in essence, when looked at most carefully, enshrines the working poor as an institution in Canada.

You have to look at what is happening in this country. Perhaps the government would have been better to come forward now with an over-all program that speaks about what is really going to happen and shows that we are solving the problems we are facing. I am sure you are aware of this, Mr.

Speaker, having been involved for many years, but it is so simple and elementary that one is almost afraid to say it, and yet it is true. As consumer purchasing declines, manufacturing slows down. As manufacturing slows down, people get laid off. As people get laid off, consumer purchasing declines. As mortgage interest rates rise, people have less money to spend to purchase durable and non-durable goods. The cycle begins all over again. Consumer purchasing declines. Manufacturing slows down. More and more people get laid off.

It feeds on itself. It has a snowballing effect. It cannot be resolved with this employment tax credit. It cannot even begin to be resolved with this unemployment tax credit, because unemployment feeds on unemployment and, as more become unemployed, more become unemployed.

This program is aimed primarily at small businesses. However, if you look honestly at small business, the declining economy does not allow for small business to expand. As people cannot purchase, the small businessman does not need to hire anyone else. Therefore a program like this does not even being to address the major problem that confronts people looking for work. Small business relies to a great extent on a buoyant economy. Unless we create a buoyant economy we will not be able to solve the problems of unemployment or the problems that flow from unemployment.

Take a look at small business. I listened to members who have spoken and who made reference to small businesses and the difficulties that confront them. As they stand in their store or factory awaiting the orders to come in for the sale of the product that they either wholesale, retail, or manufacture, they build up inventories. Those inventories are dollars. They go to the bank.

I was in the bank yesterday. A friend of mine who owns a small business said to me, "When are they going to do something in Ottawa? Do they not understand that I cannot afford to carry this inventory any longer, that the cost of carrying the inventory is a cost that I cannot recover? I cannot recover it because I am in competition with big business and they are able to sell finance to a greater extent. I must therefore go into the bank and borrow. I must add the 20 per cent on to the cost of my inventory when I put it on sale in the store. The consumers, those who are still working and still have some money to spend, look at my price and they look at the price of the larger enterprise, the chain store operation or others, and they see they can get the same product at a much cheaper price elsewhere."

This does not help my friend in business. It does not help him a bit. He cannot hire anyone anyway because he does not have the volume, yet he still has to carry the inventory. He still has to borrow. If one were to look at how you begin the process of resolving the problems of Canada, you surely do not begin by bringing in this, but by bringing in some action that will stabilize interest rates.

I was particularly intrigued by the comments of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) because they are, at least in one instance, right on. These are not 50,000 jobs for a year each. These jobs might last for a few weeks. That's it. Then they are back on the breadline again, or in the unemployment insurance commission office, or looking out of their windows wondering just where they are going next.

How many hon. members have been unemployed? How many know what it is to look at your kids and realize that you don't have an income, to realize that you cannot provide the things the other families on the street are providing for their kids? How many know what it is like to sit down with your family when Christmas comes and you can't do anything because you have not been able to find a job, or what it is like to realize that your mortgage is due very soon and not only are the interest rates rising, not only will you be faced with exorbitant increases over what you were paying previously, but to know full well that you will not be able to find a job and, by not being able to find a job, no matter what happens you are going to lose your home, the home you both worked for years to save the down payment for, the home you have put most of your dreams into, and maybe thought you would raise your family in?

Go talk to the people outside and ask them. This measure does nothing even to begin to address that devastating problem. We talk about unemployment as if, somehow or other, here in the House of Commons it really doesn't affect people. I shall not go into details about unemployment in other parts of the country because I intend to do that another time, but in the province of Ontario alone unemployment has now become the order of the day. There are very few, if any, communities where industries are not laying off workers. There are very few families which are not touched by it in one way or another. Yet we get a bill, Bill C-19, which will find two or three temporary jobs at minimum wage. We get a bill which does not begin to address itself to the major problem. That is the response of the government.

Do hon. members realize, for example, that in Talbotville on January 19, 3,100 people were laid off in the auto industry? In Oakville on the same date 3,400 people were laid off in the auto industry. In St. Catharines 2,400 were laid off by General Motors on January 22. In Brampton, during February, Gabriel laid off 20 people engaged in parts manufacturing.

In Hamilton, Firestone laid off 75 workers on February 8, and another lay-off is starting tomorrow. In Stratford the Sealed Power Corporation laid off 180 people engaged in parts production. A colleague in the Conservative party spoke of the situation in Brampton earlier tonight and expressed concern. Well, in Brampton 470 people were laid off on February 16. In Oshawa in the GM plant on March 1, 2,000 people were laid off. In Ajax, 18 people were laid off on March 6 and another 92 in April. This was at Chrysler. Leigh Instruments, another auto-related industry in Waterloo, laid off 130 people.

In Whitby, the Firestone Tire Company closes with 650 people laid off and we are still debating whether we should go ahead with the Michelin project! In St. Catharines, General Motors, 3,100 laid off; also in St. Catharines, 70 people laid off on March 29 by Hayes-Dana, the chassis manufacturing firm. In Oakville on April 16, 1,400 people were laid off; in Windsor on the same date, 800 Ford employees laid off. In Scarborough on April 17—General Motors—131 more people laid off. In Ottawa—I mentioned this the other night—240 people were laid off by Beach Foundry, an auto parts manufacturer. Another 28 people were laid off by Kelsey-Hayes in St. Catharines and another 100 at Otter Lake, as I mentioned. At Stratford—Schwitzer—61 people laid off. And today, Massey Ferguson in Brantford announced that 85 were to be laid off with more lay-offs to come. Then, of course, we must consider the situation in Detroit, our neighbour, one which closely affects the Windsor area. General Motors announced today that 13,000 people are to be laid off.

That is unemployment, Mr. Speaker. And the effects of that unemployment are devastation for the workers and their families. The effects of such unemployment cannot be met by this ridiculous piece of inadequate legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: We would like to be charitable and say we understand it is only intended as a stop-gap measure. The problem is, I cannot for the life of me see where the permanent measures are coming from. When can I expect to hear from the government a statement about its policy with regard to employment? When can I expect to hear from the government its policies with regard to the restructuring of the manufacturing sector? When can we expect to hear from the government what its policies are with regard to the auto insurance industry and related industries?

If I thought for a moment the bill was intended to fill a very narrow gap, I would say: very well, let us pass it, let us get on to the real meat of the thing. But you know, and I know, Mr. Speaker—I can tell from the way you are looking at me—we both know there is no legislation forthcoming; I can see it in your eyes. It is just awful. Here we are, standing in the House of Commons; you would think it was a new thing, that we had never heard of it before, that it has just blossomed.

When I was in Hamilton yesterday and people were telling me about their problems—here we have Firestone laying people off and, no doubt, the steel industry will be affected by the auto cutbacks and colleagues and friends of mine laid off in Oakville Ford and all the related industries in the area looking very seriously at cutbacks—they said, "What are you going to do tomorrow when you get back?" I said, "I am going to say a word or two about the employment tax credit bill."

"Hey!" they said, "Is that going to be any good?" Really! What could I say? I was embarrassed. And no wonder. This government wins on the strength of promises that ministers are going to deal with the economy, that they are going to wrestle inflation to the ground again. They are really going to put their best foot forward—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If they can get it out of their mouth.

Mr. Deans: After they get it out of their mouth. Yes, the difficulty here is plain to see. For some of us it is plain, ordinary frustration. We should not be dealing here with this bill tonight. We should be dealing with the meat of the problem. We should be talking about the difficulties which are confronting people across this nation. We should be looking at primary legislation to deal with these things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I want to suggest two or three small steps—maybe the government could consider them after they get this innocuous, ridiculous, outrageous piece of legislation through. Maybe they could take a look at reducing interest rates as recommended not only by us but by Walter Gordon, among others, who has said that if ever there was a time to move to the reduction of interest rates in the interest of the national economy, this was the time.

Not only should there be a lower interest rate policy, but we should also stabilize rates for a period in order that people could feel reasonably secure about their investments, reasonably secure about their futures, and reasonably secure about their ability to repay what they borrow. That would be the first policy I would like to see followed. I think then perhaps we could sit down and look at the auto industry, because it is upon the auto industry that much of Ontario turns, and we have to recognize that unless we take advantage of the situation which is now before us, and unless we are prepared to develop a parts manufacturing sector in Ontario and in the rest of Canada, then we will be forever at the mercy of the United States auto industry. That is plain to anyone.

I am sure there is not a member in this House who would not agree that there is not going to be a return to the good old days when everybody traded in his car every second year, and the auto industry flourished on the basis of that. People are going to keep their cars longer, buy new tires, and maybe even put in new motors. They are going to put in new parts, and unless we are manufacturing those tires, those motors and those parts, then we are going to be left out. Maybe the government could come into the House and spare just a couple of minutes more than the question period to chat about how we together could solve that very vexing and difficult problem.

Perhaps with our interest rate policy we could encourage the building industry to start again building homes for people of average means. The spin-off in the home building industry is phenomenal; 3.6 jobs are created in related industries to every job created building a house. Can hon. members imagine the number of jobs we could create in Canada in related industries if we could get on with the job of building homes for people at prices they could afford, and with mortgages they could afford to pay?

Maybe we could even take some strides to alter dramatically the resource exploitation policies of the past. Perhaps we could insist on further processing in Canada—a novel thought! That probably has never been considered. Maybe we could even consider that since the resources are ours it would be helpful for two or three people if we were to take the resources and do something with them here, instead of sending them out of the country. Can hon. members imagine the spin-off? Can they imagine the benefit?

Then, of course, maybe we could consider our energy policy. Maybe we could take a look at energy as a resource, a catalyst or a tool for the development of this country. Maybe we could sit down and find a way to use it best to stabilize the economy, to build secondary manufacturing, and to develop the kinds of job opportunities which would make this kind of legislation, as I said before, unnecessary.

Then, of course, if someone brought in a piece of rubbish like this, we would know that it was really only intended to deal with such a small and isolated sector of society that we could make it worth while. We could fund it properly. We would not be putting people into low paying and menial jobs but, rather, into jobs that would satisfy them and give them a chance to earn a decent living. That is when this kind of legislation would be useful. It is useless today.

If the government would address itself to these kinds of things, then maybe the people of Canada would feel a little more secure and a little happier about the fact that we are all sitting here—we are not all sitting here, but those of us who are are sitting here. Maybe the minister would even take it upon himself to drop by and listen. He might enjoy it. If he did not enjoy it, he might learn. If he did not learn, he might at least appear to be interested. This might be a worth-while thing to consider.

In any event, the problems of this country are not going to be solved easily, and they are not going to be solved at all unless the process is begun here. This is where it has to start, and if it does not start here it will not start at all.

We put our faith in General Motors, thank you very much. We thought Chrysler, being the big, seventh largest corporation, was wonderful. We wondered how Ford could go wrong. Henry told us it was here to stay. Let us face it, the corporations have shown that they are not able to do this alone, and neither should they be expected to. This is the time for co-operative effort, and there are places in the world where co-operative effort is the order of the day and where industry and government work together.

There are places in the world where labour is consulted, where there is a sense of national purpose, where people really believe that their country means something, and where people are prepared to put out a little more because they know their contribution is both recognized and appreciated. We would not be dealing with this legislation if we could instil that kind of sense in this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, just prior to the speech by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) there was an intervention by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Dawson), the hon. member for Louis-Hébert. I want to commend him for his speech. I thought it was lucid, clear, and well thought out. It showed a great amount of insight, especially in view of the fact that it was the speech of the former minister of employment and immigration. I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he continue on that path, and I look forward to more speeches if they are of that same quality.

Mr. Dawson: I wouldn't want to follow his career.

Mr. Epp: If the hon. member's speeches continue to be of that same quality, I would appreciate them.

The parliamentary secretary mentioned in his remarks that this House and the people of Canada would receive a comprehensive employment strategy which, I take it, will be a strategy with which this government will come forward in a very clear and precise way, and that we will be told how the government will address the question of Canada's unemployment.

I take it we will be told specifically how the government will address the problem of chronic unemployment among specific groups such as women, natives, and the handicapped, and I ask that the minister pay careful attention to the commitments his parliamentary secretary has made. I suggest to the minister that a comprehensive report and comprehensive legislation be brought forward within the next month. We will be pressing him for that strategy, in view of the fact that that commitment has been made tonight.

I found it rather interesting that the parliamentary secretary should use the argument that we have been filibustering this bill.

Mr. Friesen: First day.

Mr. Epp: Yesterday was the first day we had legislation in the Thirty-second Parliament, and it was a bill from this minister. That bill received passage through all stages in one day. Hon. members will realize that yesterday was a Wednesday. It was a short day, so-called, and the bill was passed. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary thinks that, because the clock was not seen yesterday at the regular closing hour of six o'clock and the House sat until approximately 6.30, we were filibustering after six o'clock. However, I want to tell the parliamentary secretary that he should re-examine the whole definition he has been using for filibuster. This bill, Bill C-19, was presented to the House for second reading today at approximately three o'clock, and before the evening is out we already have the parliamentary secretary rising and accusing us of filibustering. I have always thought him to be a reasonable person.

Mr. Kempling: No!

Mr. Epp: He now says that that was a mistake on my part, and I agree with him. I would suggest to him that we will have many hours in committee and in the House when we will be debating and examining the employment strategy, and I suggest that if he wants to reduce the amount of time that will be devoted to the subject of employment in Canada, let him become very serious in terms of addressing the question and coming forward with possible solutions. Perhaps he made the charge of a filibuster lightly, but whatever is the case, I would suggest that this does not necessarily enhance the work of the House. Also, he pleaded for co-operation, and I believe the House works better when there is a sense of co-operation. But how short his memory is!

If you take a look at the Thirty-first Parliament—and I do not want to go through that matter again—I think the hon. member—and I still believe he is a fair person—would realize that in no way can he have a strong case to make for co-operation if he expects it to come only from this side of the House. Co-operation is a two-way street. I suggest to him and to his minister, and through them to the House leader, that co-operation will be forthcoming, but obviously it will not come from one side only. So I say to him that if he wants the legislation passed, he should use arguments that are cogent rather than the ones he used tonight.

In the throne speech an attempt was made to address the question of employment in Canada, and I shall quote two sections from the throne speech:

> To meet the needs of these groups—

That is young people, women, natives and the handicapped.

> —my government will expand its employment program while using its resources more efficiently. There will be an increased effort to develop critical trade skills so as to better prepare today's labour force for tomorrow's jobs.

The second one reads:

> Members of Parliament will have a major role in advising on the selection of job-creation projects, and my government will enter into a new partnership with voluntary agencies and local organizations in a program of community service.

Those are noble words, and I am sure they are endorsed by members on all sides of this House.

I ask the minister tonight are we to take those words seriously, and what programs does he have in mind on which members from both sides of the House will be taken into the confidence of the minister and of the government and on which their advice will in fact be followed? I ask the minister would he give us a clear indication, prior to his closing the debate on this bill whatever that time may be, as to what is meant by those words, what are the specifics, what programs, in very concrete terms, he has in mind, and how will they work so that members on both sides of the House will have an opportunity to advise and to give suggestions which will not only be considered but some of which will be adopted?

In this debate we have already heard of the economy and the structural problems that exist. Obviously the fact that we are facing, with this government and with its leadership, no growth for the next year, does not all augur well for employment opportunities over the next 12 months. I think members of the House are fully aware of my belief that basically long term, lasting employment should be created by the private sector. Before this can be achieved, a climate must exist whereby confidence to invest is developed. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members in the House that some of the rhetoric we have heard from the NDP does not help to develop that confidence.

Today I listened to the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) speak. He is a resident of the community of Thompson, a so-called one industry company town, and yet throughout almost his entire speech he criticized the role of the multinationals. Inco is the major employer in Thompson, and if Inco were to close down, so would Thompson. A number of other communities in his riding are also resource based communities with multinational corporations. What have these corporations done? They have gone into the communities—in many cases they have created the communities—and built the infrastructure. In many cases there has been a co-operative relationship between the company and the residents.

In my riding there is the company town of Pine Falls, and then there is Abitibi, and I keep hearing about the pulp and paper companies which have a good relationship with their employees and have contributed to the economy of the community. I ask the hon. member for Churchill how long he wants to stand in the House and say that Inco has been bad for Thompson? He gives no other solution. Many of us will recall that when the world nickel market became tight, and unemployment increased in cities such as Thompson and Sudbury, what did we hear from the NDP? That we were supposed to stockpile. I remember that the hon. member who said that came from Nickel Belt. I do not know where he stayed after February 18.

An hon. Member: He is stockpiled in Nickel Belt.

Mr. Epp: So the point must surely be made that in many of these resource-based communities multinational corporations have been good corporate citizens. The very jobs you, gentlemen, asked for, have been created by that type of investment.

Today we heard from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

An hon. Member: The bionic man.

Mr. Epp: He listed many cases of lay-offs and, you will recall that in almost every case a multinational company was involved. My point is that these jobs have been created because of foreign investment, but the NDP want it both ways. They are saying that the company is not doing its corporate duty when it lays off as the economy shows no growth. I am not here to defend the government but I think this matter should be kept in balance. I do not see how the hon. member for Churchill could go home and talk to the people in the city council—by the way, those people work for the company—and say to them, "I think we should close Inco down and let us not worry about the effects on Thompson", because what is happening there is that the company has been well aware of the effects which a slowdown could have on the community. They are intrinsically bound together, and I do not see how the NDP could think that the company would want to be anti-employee, because, if they were, the company would have to go out and hire again and train people again. Obviously that would cost them money and show up on the balance sheet.

It is my view that the employment tax credit program has some merit. In smaller rural communities I think we have seen a higher incidence of people subscribing to the program than to a number of other programs. I think the statistics would also bear that out. It is true that jobs have been created where those jobs possibly would not have been filled or simply where other people have doubled up.

There is a fly in the concept which underlies this bill, and that is that unfortunately too often there have been cases where the persons who had been hired were no longer required when the contract ended. When the minister rises to address this question, I would ask him to give us a breakdown of whether they have done a survey on that. Generally speaking the cases are relatively low in number as against the number of jobs created, but they exist. I believe that officials of the department should examine how better we can avoid that situation, because we cannot afford having people employed, hopes built up and then, when the government program ends, the job also ends.

Also I suggest to the minister that there should be a better advertising program related to this program. Just this week I received two letters from my riding, one from Beausejour and one from Ridgeville, a very small community. In both cases persons came to know about the employment tax credit plan after they had made employment decisions. I would suggest that the minister should re-examine the advertising program in the weekly papers because I think in that case they would reach more rural people than they do through the dailies or for that matter the electronic media.

This minister has sat in opposition for a long time, since 1973 in Manitoba. Until he came to Ottawa he was known as a person who took on many causes, spoke on most anything, and it did not really bother him if he had not studied the subject. One of his chief projects, about which I admit he had done some studying, was urban studies. Up until this afternoon he was known in our province as a chief proponent of rail line relocation. The Manitoba Hansard is full of the comments of the minister regarding the absolute necessity of rail relocation of the CPR railyards and the rails in downtown Winnipeg. We have it documented. I am sure I do not have to remind the minister of the many occasions he rose to his feet to do so.

A year ago almost to the day today our member in the then cabinet, a resident of Ontario, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), became the member in cabinet for Manitoba. Trying to do his duty he actually came and visited us. One of the first things which he did was to go and see the minister, who at that time was an opposition MLA. It did not take very long after these two blood brothers got together for them to convince each other that rail relocation was the absolute way to go in Winnipeg. We saw the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River coming back here totally convinced that that would happen in downtown Winnipeg.

Mr. Collenette: Order.

Mr. Epp: I hear the hon. member saying, "Order". I want to get to the employment this project would have meant for the downtown area of Winnipeg. If he will just hang on, I will let him know.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Just be patient.

Mr. Epp: The situation at the time was that the city of Winnipeg had committed itself to the building of another overpass. They needed a permit from the transport department to construct that overpass. The government of the province of Manitoba had committed itself to the building of the overpass, and suddenly everything stopped because these two gentlemen decided that they wanted a study on rail relocation. I guess we were looking at things too small again, we did not have enough vision; we had to have a larger vision. That was a year ago.

Since the minister's election to this House and his appointment to cabinet, he made further commitments. The commitments he made were that rail relocation would come to Winnipeg. It was a small figure, only something like $168 million, and $100 million would come from the federal treasury. We had no doubt about that because this minister gave us a commitment.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Wonderful fellow that he was.

Mr. Epp: I understand they made a decision today on rail relocation.

An hon. Member: No!

Mr. Beatty: The minister is indicating that they have not made a decision.

Mr. Epp: I understand that His Worship the Mayor of Winnipeg, members of his council, as well as representatives of the government of the province of Manitoba, met with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin).

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I have been watching the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and it seems to me that he is speaking on every single matter except the bill before the House. I would ask Mr. Speaker to direct his attention to the fact that he should be speaking on Bill C-19 and not on Manitoba matters in general.

An hon. Member: Are you the Speaker?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He was just coming to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has been listening to a number of remarks from various quarters this evening. I believe the hon. member speaking is generally addressing himself to the subject matter of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Go out to the back where you came from.

Mr. Epp: I want to tell my good friend from Toronto that I will get very specific about the employment opportunities in this matter, if he can just be patient.

Today His Worship the Mayor of the City of Winnipeg and the officials of the province of Manitoba met with the Minister of Transport. He told them: "No money, no rail relocation". I understand that the Minister of Employment and Immigration came into the meeting late, was all hot and bothered and said, "Look, just a minute, we can make another decision. Maybe you could try DREE, maybe you could try another department". I say to the minister that one of the responsibilities of sitting in cabinet is to tell people honestly whether a project is viable or not, and not hold them on a string.

An hon. Member: What about the double rail?

Mr. Epp: As of tonight rail relocation in Winnipeg is dead. How many jobs would that have created?

Mr. Collenette: Order.

Mr. Epp: I understand that this is an employment bill. I just ask how many jobs would have been created. If the hon. member cannot see the relationship, I would ask him just to listen and wait.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There have been a number of speakers during the course of the evening from various sides of the House, and the ruling is that no valid point of order has been raised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I ask the minister when he will take his responsibilities for the people of Winnipeg, for the people of Manitoba and for Canadians, and not constantly state, "Yes, we will do it", without having thought about it and without having given any consideration to whether or not the government can in fact deliver. The point is that the city of Winnipeg and the government of Manitoba are faced with the construction of this overpass which is not going to cost the same as it would a year ago, but rather an additional $2.5 million because of inflation.

• (2140)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: The hon. member from Nova Scotia thinks this is rather funny and suggests that this will create more jobs, but it will not create more jobs. The question is, will the federal government at least come forward and pay the additional $2.5 million which the city of Winnipeg now faces because of a study that was requested, and when the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) asked the city of Winnipeg to hold off for a year, during which time costs escalated and traffic piled up?

This minister has a bit of explaining to do not only in this House but to the residents of Winnipeg and of the province of Manitoba generally. When promises are made ministers should not try to break them. If the minister cannot deliver on his promises he would be better off, as we all would be, not to make them.

Let me return to the bill. The minister feels some relief in that he thinks I am moving on to another point. I will come back to rail relocation, so he should just settle down.

I do not believe we will reduce unemployment until such time as we reduce inflation. We must recognize that there is not a greater single contributor to inflation than big government. The Auditor General in his report pointed out inefficiencies that are inflationary. Inflation reduces confidence, which in turn reduces investment. Why is it that Canadians are looking for other places in which to invest? As they do that jobs are lost here.

The government must address itself very seriously to the question of how we can reduce the inflation we now face. It can make a great contribution toward this reduction by getting its house in order and becoming efficient. I know this government and the former minister of finance have said that inflation is imported and we cannot do anything about it. We recognize that there is a certain amount of truth in that statement, but our entire inflation is not imported.

We note the statement in the throne speech that this government will be more efficient. I hope that is the case, but I do not place too much faith in that in view of the record of this administration. This government is saying almost in the same breath that it wants to be bigger. I suggest that when governments at all levels are taking over 40 per cent of our gross national product for various projects, and when the federal government is spending 25 per cent more than its revenues on an annualized basis, that is not a very hopeful sign. This minister has a reputation for being one of the big spenders.

An hon. Member: Already.

Mr. Epp: Already. He has the reputation for being one of the people in the cabinet who will advocate more and more government intervention, and more and more government spending, on the theory, I guess, that bigger government is better. I ask him to reconsider that philosophy and to change it very quickly.

The only way, with our economy, that we can win the battle against inflation and unemployment is by relying on individual Canadian men and women to invest in this country. I believe Canadians will invest, but not because of a commitment by this government as I think they no longer believe its promises. They will invest if they see tangible signs that their investments will not ever increasingly be taxed or frittered away. When Canadians begin to invest, jobs will be created. This in no small way will help.

Let me address the problem of unemployment in northern Canada. Over the last ten years northern Canada has become increasingly dependent upon government. Because of regulations, our tax system and permits from federal and other levels of government, a small business virtually cannot exist north of 60. I suggest that the minister should consider tax regimes which allow individual Canadians to invest in the north. To a great extent this is where future employment possibilities exist. Even if we put our imaginations to work, I think we would fall short of the real potential that exists in the north. I suggest to this government, specifically this minister, that consideration must be given to special employment programs in Canada's north, and I do not restrict that necessarily to north of 60.

From what I have seen, and I think this is borne out by the practical experience of those who are in the north, it is becoming increasingly difficult to do business there. If you cannot get a government contract or cannot become the supplier of some government project, the chance that you will survive financially is at best tenuous. We must start looking to employment and investment strategies in this way, particularly as they apply to specific areas, to meet specific needs and to address specific problems. The north today should not be more dependent upon government than it was ten years ago, yet we see one project after another that could begin to reverse this trend blocked through regulation by government of one form or another.

In the area of native employment, the employment tax credit program is of no great benefit. Hon. members will notice that I did not say it was of no help. That is because I do not have before me the number of jobs that have been created for native people. Generally speaking, the program offers jobs which native people cannot fill and, therefore, does not offer the opportunity to these people that such a program should. We cannot continue indefinitely to allow the potential of these people to be lost. The programs established for Canada's native people should be more specific.

However, we must get away from offering term jobs. So many of these jobs expire when the term expires, and hope disappears as well. The government must offer jobs based on viable economic activity rather than on artificial, well intentioned government programs. The minister has said that 50,000 new jobs will be recreated. I hope that he is correct. I have made my suspicions known to officials of the Department of Employment and Immigration, not only about the figure of the 50,000 jobs, but also the figures they offer on program after program, week after week, and month after month. I am sure that if we were to add all these figures together, they would indicate that we have no unemployment. We receive these sorts of figures from the Department of Employment and Immigration and as well from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. While it is the spirit of government to paint as rosy a picture as possible, I would ask that this government give a realistic picture.

Too often it is the case with these programs that the same job is counted under one program, and when that program ends and another one is established, the same person is counted as having taken a job under that program. By this process two jobs have been created. When the second program ends, that person may be unemployed, but the figures show that two jobs have been created. The government must revise the manner in which it collects job statistics. It cannot have it both ways, with unemployment running as high as one million people and yet the figures show that jobs have been created, and in effect indicate that there is little or no unemployment.

I ask that the minister bring in programs which he can deliver, instead of making promises for which he does not have enough clout in cabinet to carry through, as we saw today. The government has said in the throne speech that Canadians are realistic people.

An hon. Member: It did not mean you.

Mr. Epp: I take myself to be a Canadian. Canadians prefer the truth to promises which cannot be delivered. I would say to the minister, "Take your responsibility in that way, and think before you speak".

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question before he sits down?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Epp: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It relates to the relocation of the Canadian Pacific railyards in Winnipeg, to which the hon. member has made reference. Does he not feel that, instead of accepting relocation as dead because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) said no to the delegation from Winnipeg which was here today, he should be joining with the rest of us in pressing the government to keep the issue alive? As the minister knows, the yards are in my constituency, and as one concerned for the welfare of the people who live on both sides of these yards, I say they must go.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), yes, I will continue pressing. I would like to remind the hon. member that I moved a Standing Order 43 yesterday asking this government, with regard to rail relocation, to consider the matter, to accept the terms of reference of the city of Winnipeg, and that it give its decision within the time limit asked for by the city of Winnipeg, namely, the end of May.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) has done the same thing, and I am glad that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has now joined with us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has now expired.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the hon. member about some of us joining him is completely wrong.

Mr. Nowlan: You haven't joined anything since Boy Scouts.

Mr. Knowles: We have been pressing this matter for years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a point of argument, not a point of order, as the hon. member very well knows.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, may I seize this opportunity—

Mr. Nowlan: Don't seize it, you might constrict yourself.

Mr. Harquail: I often refer to yahoos from the west, but I see that we also have some yahoos from the east with us tonight, an hon. member who is quite well-known for his shenanigans in the House of Commons.

Since this is my first opportunity to speak in this Thirty-second Parliament, I want to congratulate you, sir, on your elevation to the chair, and through you, sir, express my congratulations to Madam Speaker.

I am speaking in support of this positive measure, the second reading and reference to Committee of the Whole of Bill C-19, an act to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act. The program is designed to provide a federal income tax advantage to employers who hire unemployed persons to fill newly-created jobs which are in addition to their normal work force.

The tax credit program is being extended because of its effectiveness and low cost. However, this government does not intend to place single-minded reliance on the program simply because it does not answer all of the unemployment problems in Canada. Being the representative of a constituency in Atlantic Canada, I am, as I am sure are members on all sides of the House, anxious to see this measure adopted as quickly as possible.

This proposal was first tabled in the House by a previous Liberal administration in a previous Parliament. There has already been enough time lost through delay.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I encourage the opposition House leader to co-operate with us.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I always have.

Mr. Harquail: I thank the hon. member for his co-operation in this regard, and I hope that he will see his way clear to assist in the early adoption of this important measure. Of the more than 25,000 employers who have signed agreements under the employment tax credit program, 92 per cent of them have indicated in an interim survey that they would participate again.

The figures indicate that the greatest number of employers who have hired employees under the program come from Ontario and Quebec. However, on a percentage basis New Brunswick employers are second only to Quebec. Over-all use of the program in the Atlantic provinces was very high. On an average 88 per cent of the employers in the Atlantic region took advantage of the program, and as a result these firms have benefited greatly.

Because of the lengthy speech by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), I will have to return at a later date to conclude my remarks, but I would like to stress the importance of assistance to Canadian youth who have suffered more than their fair share as a result of unemployment.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—CRITICISM IN REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity during the adjournment debate to deal with the most unsatisfactory answers given to me on Tuesday of this week by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in connection with the report of the Auditor General, tabled in this House last week, as that report dealt with inefficiency in the public service. I wish to say at the outset that my questions were asked out of a general regard for improved efficiency and economy in government.

The questions I directed to the minister related to the specific steps that he proposed to take in connection with public service matters, in order to ensure that the taxpayers of Canada received a fair day's work from their public servants. I also inquired at that time if targets and dates were to be established for staff reductions. Some of my language was borrowed directly from the report of the Auditor General who, at page 23 of the Conspectus, stated as follows:

> These evaluations of current productivity levels raise an important question: if the government's policy is to ensure that employees receive a fair day's wage, should it not also be a policy for both management and employees to ensure that the employer (in effect, the taxpayer) receive a fair day's work in exchange?

The evaluation referred to in that extract is set out on page 22 of the Conspectus, and in paragraphs 9.99 and following on page 197 of the report itself. Of an authorized staff of 355,000, some 50,000 public servants were tested for efficiency, and the average level of efficiency was established at 60.8 per cent. Employees in private sector organizations were similarly tested by the Auditor General and they produced an efficiency rating of 87.7 per cent.

The conclusion referred to on page 22 of the Conspectus states in part as follows:

> If these results are typical of the occupational group and if a minimum acceptable level of 80 per cent efficiency could be attained, then the work now performed by 50,000 employees could be performed by 38,000.

It should be remembered that in arriving at those figures the Auditor General is referring to a minimum efficiency level of 80 per cent, while the level attained by actual tests in private industry was found to be 87.7 per cent. If we apply the appropriate multiple of 7.1 to the 12,000 figure arrived at by making a simple subtraction of the two figures referred to in the paragraph just quoted, then there were 85,200 public servants excess to requirements at the time the report was prepared.

How seriously did the Auditor General view this matter? At page 199 of his report, in paragraph 9.111 he wrote:

We suggest that the criterion of 80 per cent performance should be considered the minimum acceptable level of efficiency in government. This level, however, is not necessarily an ultimate target for government. Clearly, government has the responsibility for stating its target performance, which may be well in excess of 80 per cent. We consider performance below 80 per cent to be evidence of a lack of due regard for efficiency, and thus a matter that should be brought to the attention of Parliament.

Of course the Auditor General is the servant of Parliament.

● (2205)

At page 23 of the Conspectus he says:

This is the sort of issue that I think must be addressed constructively at the highest level of government and reflected in an integrated action plan for general management.

I entirely agree. Under section 5(1)(e) of the Financial Administration Act, Treasury Board has responsibility for personnel management in the public service, and the President of the Treasury Board is the chief officer. I accordingly call upon the President of the Treasury Board to pursue with vigor the nagging but, I fear, growing problem of inefficiency in the public service.

It is no answer to suggest, as he did to me in responding to my question, that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and I, as a member of that committee, may make evaluations. I made my evaluation, and the public has had confirmed what it has known for years, that the public service is not delivering fair value for the money that they receive in remuneration. It is the task of the minister to provide the concrete proposals which are demanded and not simply to stall, hinder, and delay the necessary process.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I would want to state for the record that probably this evening is again an example of the need that we have in this particular institution for some change, inasmuch as we can have the kind of accusations and kind of positions taken by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) without full opportunity with an equal time frame to be able to respond and cover all of the points that were raised, both here and in the House when the question was first asked. One can only hope that is going to change at some time in the very near future.

In the second instance, I would like to refer to some of the comments made by the hon. member for York North, particularly this evening when he referred to the answer that was given to him by the minister on the day in question, and particularly when he suggested that in fact the minister was saying to him that he would have the opportunity to examine or to review this in the committee. The minister was not asking him only to examine and review, but rather to examine very closely the premises upon which the kind of recommendation was being made by the Auditor General, the kind of thing that all members of Parliament, I would hope, would want to do, not because we start from the position that the report is or may be wrong, but rather that members of this House would not want to accept any report without examining the premises, without determining whether or not it was a valid type test that was being projected across all of the public service, and without wanting to accept carte blanche everything that was put down on the piece of paper as being what it presented itself to be.

The government of the day is in fact carrying out a program of restraint of both expenditure and public service growth that was introduced by this government for the 1976-77 fiscal year. We now have a five-year record which bears scrutiny. The authorized size of the public service controlled by the Treasury Board was 317,184 in 1975-76. As shown in the 1980-81 main estimates tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), the authorized size of the public service for 1980-81 is 312,595. The size of the controlled public service has actually declined by 4,589, or 1.4 per cent, over the five years of restraint. There can be no doubt that with the many greatly increased services being provided now as compared to 1975, and with a smaller public service, such a reduction in the size of the public service implies significant gains in productivity in many areas.

That is not to say that the end has been achieved. But it should certainly put us in a position as members of this House, so as not to be so hasty in standing on our feet immediately after a report without testing the report and bashing the civil servants wherever we find them. This country has been well served by the civil servants, and we should be the first to stand up and protect them.

I have many other items I would like to add in answer to the question the member has put. I know he put it sincerely. Unfortunately, time will not permit me to answer all of the areas he has covered. All I would ask—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PENITENTIARIES—SHOWING OF SEX FILM TO INMATES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, some months ago I received a document in the mail which was in fact a copy of an interdepartmental memorandum from the British Columbia penitentiary. There was no signature on the envelope, and I am sure that the person who wrote the memorandum was not the person who sent it to me. The subject matter had to do with the fact that the B.C. penitentiary authorities showed to the general population of inmates on September 1 and 3 a pornographic movie entitled, "The Night of the Voyeur". The memorandum said in part:

It is the opinion of all officers who viewed this movie that it will do nothing but encourage homosexual acts or relations in this or any other institution.

I know that the minister said that day that he would look into the matter. I was referring specifically that day to a letter I had received from the commissioner of corrections in which he says:

> As part of a policy to provide an environment which, within the limits necessarily dictated by incarceration emulates the normal—

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering, as I did two days ago when I asked the question if he considers movies like "The Night of the Voyeur" as emulating the normal. If that is the normal, I should like to know from the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) what is his idea of the bizarre.

We asked a few questions about it. We got in touch with the film classification officer. The commissioner of corrections goes on to say that they show these movies, and that the movies which are the subject of this gentleman's complaint are classified as adult. I went on to contact the film commissioner's office and I found out that federal institutions do not have to pay any attention to classifications given by provincial governments. They can ignore them completely because that is what the regulations say. I found that federal officers did in fact phone the classification officer and that in this case telephone calls were made from the federal authorities in connection with the film, and they were made aware of its contents.

This is what they were told about the film: "It is so classified that it is restricted from drive-in theatres". That should tell us a little about it. "It is so classified that any theatre wishing to show it has to get permission to show it every time they want to do so." They were told it was restricted, with a warning: "completely concerned with sex; there is no story line, it is a stag film." This is what the commissioner of corrections says is adult. This is what he says is something which emulates the normal. What is the bizarre, if that is normal?

The Solicitor General said he would look into this and see what it was all about. So he did, and I congratulate him on his quick response. I suspect, though, that it was not a thorough response because in one day, in response to my question yesterday, he apparently had done all the research as to whether or not this was a suitable film for the penitentiary service. He says in his letter to me:

> I have reviewed the letter the commissioner of Corrections addressed to you on this matter and I am satisfied that the policy and practice of the service on this issue is fair and reasonable.

Do we need to wonder why we have problems in the correctional service of this country when the officers in the pen cave in to prisoners' requests and show these kinds of movies? Is it any wonder that the officers in the penitentiary service are worried about what will happen in the penitentiaries when these kinds of movies are shown to the inmates? As I have said to some people, it seems to me that the policy of this minister and of previous ministers in this department is that they seem to want to make rehabilitation more exciting than the original crime. It seems to me that we should not inject more of the disease in order to cure the patient.

I have put a question on the order paper, and I wonder how long it will take for the minister and his officials to answer it. I would like to know how many times films like this have been shown in the penitentiaries. I wonder if there is a correlation between the kinds of movies which have been shown and the dates when there were rebellions, insurrections, or hostage takings in the institutions. I wonder if there is any correlation, and I wonder how long it will take the minister to answer my question on the order paper, and what kind of evidence we are going to find in that answer. I think it is deplorable that we have the kind of administration in the penitentiary service which allows this to happen, and I hope we get a response from the parliamentary secretary tonight.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): I thank the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) for coming back with this question to allow us to expand on what he calls an incident which I think corresponds very simply with a reality that may exist also outside penitentiaries, as my colleague admitted. I must say that indeed that answer follows up and provides additional explanations on a letter sent to his colleague, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) in October 1979, and which had not been answered at the time the Solicitor General was appointed. Furthermore, I confirm that this movie was approved from a classification standpoint by the classification board of B.C., meaning that it was indeed rated for adults, so to be used as such. On the other hand, it was also listed as being acceptable in a book entitled the "Theatre Manager's Handbook" and recorded as such in that directory. Furthermore, I would like to add that the rental of the movie was paid for by the inmates, who did not have to watch it. And, of course, if hon. members must define individual normality, I think we are in a very poor position to do so. As to the suggestion about the link with hostage takings, I think that question perhaps is not all that relevant and related to the issue of pornographic movies or movies dealing with sexual matters. On the other hand, of course, as a woman I did not have an opportunity to watch movies like that that are shown in remote places. I know that in James Bay that kind of movie is shown regularly and that the population there is mostly male. As for the army, although I never joined the armed forces which are mostly made up of men, I am told that such films are shown. I therefore believe that prisoners are treated like people living in remote regions, in any case in a community which is not like ours. I think that those prisoners should be treated like normal human beings, that is capable of judging the merits of a film. It is possible that prison officials do not particularly care for certain films. It is a matter of taste and it does not rest with any penitentiary to determine the cultural value of films shown to the inmates because they have chosen films which have been approved by British Columbia censors. In this connection, I think that all necessary standards to provide from time to time entertainment chosen by the prisoners have been complied with and I will be pleased to give further details to my colleague. I know that limited time is allotted to answer, and the film may seem strange. I would be prepared to go and see it with him because I have not seen it. To determine that kind of criteria and judge for ourselves, I think we have to see the film.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—IMPROVED FINANCIAL INFORMATION TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I asked to speak here this evening so as to receive a satisfactory answer to a question which I had asked originally of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). The main thrust of my question is with regard to the Auditor General's report which was tabled last week.

My understanding of the main thrust of the Auditor General's report was that government spending was totally out of control, although the Conservatives have dumped the blame on the backs of the civil servants, and some members of the press have picked up the case of the $2 million boat which will not float, and the $4 million worth of CBC equipment over which no one has inventory control. However, I do not really think, with all respect to Mr. Macdonell, that that was the main thrust of his report. As I said, I think the main thrust of the report was that government spending is and has been out of control for quite some time now.

He has indicated that in several reports over the period of his six-year appointment. During his six-year term some 15 commissions have been set up to study this problem within the government, and hundreds of other interdepartmental studies have been carried out. What all of them seem to boil down to is that the problem is inefficiency and lack of accountability. As I have said, these have been put on the back of the civil servants and the conclusion was reached that there should be cuts in the civil service. As was mentioned in the estimates which were tabled recently, there will be cuts of some 5,840 person-years of employment. Yet some of the areas in which cuts are proposed, such as, for example, in the Canadian Transportation Commission, need to be beefed up, such as safety, for example. Perhaps if the cuts had not taken place in some areas we would not have had the incident which occurred at Mississauga, Ontario, or the incident at Macgregor in Manitoba. The recommendations that are made in the name of accountability number in the hundreds.

The answer from the President of the Treasury Board to my first question was that the problem of inefficiency and lack of accountability in the government is being given priority attention by the government. However, the priority seems to be put aside because of the fact that we do not have a way of testing it. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Daudlin) said that we should test these reports first. But there is no way of testing the 15 reports that have probably come down with thousands of recommendations.

So the thrust of the supplementary question which I put to the President of the Treasury Board and which he did not answer—he admitted it later when I spoke to him outside the House—was whether this government will set up a special committee to study the large number of recommendations which have been made to improve the accountability and the efficiency of the government. We do not need cuts in the number of civil servants; we need to use them more efficiently. Why blame the civil servants when the fault lies with the administration? The government which have been in control for the last 113 years have addressed themselves to crisis situations, they have not gone into long-term planning or into problem solving in the over-all context. There is no industrial strategy and no economic policy to guide the government. If the numerous studies that we have could be considered by a special committee, perhaps these problems could be overcome.

At the present time I understand that many of these reports and the recommendations have been given to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. The public accounts committee is now overworked. It is likely the busiest committee within government, the busiest standing committee we have. Although the government says that it will give it some kind of a priority, there is no way to do that. There is no forum set up to look at the recommendations, bring them back to Parliament, and to help improve the information that comes to Parliament so that as parliamentarians we can make government more accountable. Right now not only does the government not understand much of the information which comes to Parliament, opposition members do not understand it either, the press does not understand the information that comes to Parliament, and therefore, the Canadian people do not understand it. Canadians may be confused, but so are the parliamentarians and the press.

I think the time is now to have a special committee struck to study these things to which I referred. My question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board is: will this government in fact strike a special committee to study these urgent and pressing concerns to which I have just alluded?

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance, without trying to sound too prideful, I should like to suggest to the hon. member that perhaps he was speaking for a more limited group and perhaps, indeed, only for himself, when he spoke of members not understanding what was coming to Parliament. Without saying that I understand everything, I would like to say that I have a far greater grasp than not understanding anything that comes to this place.

As the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) stated in the House on April 17, 1980, improving the financial information to Parliament is a priority item to the Treasury Board. It has been noted, notwithstanding the fact there has been an adjustment in terms of the time frame for delivering this new type of information and assistance to the House, that in fact major advances have taken place on the project and that the major causes for the delay which has taken place to date have not been a lack of commitment to change, but rather the complexity of the proposed changes.

The member will be able to judge that meaningful progress indeed has been made when he realizes that the Comptroller General has established a Government of Canada reporting division, headed by the assistant comptroller general, which brings together for the first time responsibility for improving the information available to Parliament in both the estimates and public accounts. This step is essential in ensuring that the after-the-fact reporting in public accounts is compatible with any revised estimates. In addition, those groups internal to the government with special interests in these reforms have been brought together and are committed to the project. As recommended by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, a steering committee has been established which includes the Secretary of the Treasury Board, the Comptroller General and the Auditor General.

An over-all plan has been developed which takes into account the various tasks necessary to develop and implement the required changes to the estimates and public accounts. Although the implementation of this change will of necessity be done over several years, a number of major projects will be presented to parliamentarians for their views and comments. I can add more specifically that Mr. N. G. Ross, a partner with the firm of Coopers and Lybrand, who has extensive experience in this area, is currently under contract with the office of the Comptroller General as an adviser on all aspects of the project. He will assist in the development of various concept papers which it is our intent to make available for comment by parliamentarians later this fiscal year.

In addition to these concept papers, pilot studies at both central agency and departmental levels will be conducted. These studies will result in illustrative estimates incorporating proposed changes being made available to parliamentarians for their review and comment, hopefully in the late fall of this year.

I recognize the hon. member has suggested that in fact the tools we have in this House will be inadequate to examine this kind of report. I take as a submission from him that in fact he would prefer to see a special committee set up in order to receive these reports, as opposed to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Surely we can treat this only as a submission, as one of the avenues available to us, and I would join him in delivering that submission to the House leader for his consideration.

WINNIPEG—RAIL RELOCATION—REQUEST FOR REIMBURSEMENT OF ADDITIONAL COST OF OVERPASS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has informed the mayor of Winnipeg that no funds are available for CP rail relocation in Winnipeg. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated previously that CP rail relocation is a Liberal approach and that he favoured rail relocation. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) rescinded construction permits for an overpass until further studies were done, delaying the project for over a year and adding an additional $2.5 million to the cost. Now the city of Winnipeg has no choice but to proceed with the overpass.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to provide immediately the $2.5 million in additional cost to the city of Winnipeg which has accrued due to federal government delays.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that it has been almost three years since the unanimous report of the parliamentary subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada was tabled stating that a crisis exists in the penitentiary system and recommending that the then solicitor general act immediately on the report, and in view of the fact that there are still many recommendations which have either been rejected or not implemented by previous solicitors general, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House call upon the present Solicitor General to move quickly to implement the recommendations of the subcommittee on penitentiaries in Canada to prevent the possibility of serious problems recurring in our prison system.

ACID RAIN—REQUEST FOR FULL CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) met in Washington recently with his U.S. counterpart on the matter of acid rain contamination, but he has not yet reported to this House on whether he was able to obtain firm commitments from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency on joint Canada-U.S. action to combat the causes and effects of acid rain fallout. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Canadian government express to the United States government our deep concern over the planned changeover of United States utility companies from oil and gas to coal to generate electricity, and the effect it will have on the increase of acid rain fallout in Canada, and that we should ask the U.S. government not to concur without full consultation between our two governments on the effect of acid rain on our total environment.

REQUEST THAT FUNDS ALLOCATED TO EASTERN CANADA BE CONFIRMED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the same standing order on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the provision made in the estimates for 1980-81, as announced in the budget speech of December 11, for $50 million to initiate new measures to stimulate employment and economic development in eastern Canada, and since $25 million was to be made available to Fisheries Canada with $40 million allocated for projects of the small craft harbours branch during 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the government to confirm the additional $25 million to fisheries with $14 million additional to small crafts harbours branch for important wharf, dredging, slipway and other necessary construction work on facilities for the fishermen of eastern Canada, and specifically that plans already announced for dredging in Petty harbour, wharf repairs and reconstruction at Renews, Admiral's Beach, Merasheen, St. Vincent's, Bay Bulls, St. Bride's, Point Lance and St. Shott's, all important inshore fishing communities in the district of St. John's West, be commenced immediately.

CARRIAGE OF HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES—INSTALLATION OF HOTBOX DETECTORS ON LONDON TO TORONTO TRACK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I refer to the daily threat facing thousands of people resulting from the refusal by the Canadian Pacific Railway to instal simple, basic safety devices called hotbox detectors on its London to Toronto track. Every day CPR transports deadly and inflammable gases on this track. We have already experienced one massive derailment in Mississauga. These devices are not required by regulation nor are they foolproof, but if they had been in place last November, the train crew might have had a vital extra warning that a derailment was about to occur.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Garant):

That this House deplores this threat posed by CPR's lack of proper safety signalling devices; that CPR be directed to cease the transportation of deadly and inflammable gases on this route until it instals hotbox detectors, and that CPR be directed to start the installation of these hotbox detectors at once.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Whereas there is strong and mounting public opposition to the Pacific Western Airlines application for hangar space in the south end of Winnipeg International Airport, and whereas former Liberal transport minister Otto Lang accepted the recommendations of a departmental study calling for such development to take place, only further northwest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAN—FAILURE OF UNITED STATES MISSION TO RESCUE HOSTAGES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the failure this morning of the United States rescue mission in Iran. I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs can give the House any information on this matter that was divulged to the Prime Minister, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to other Canadian officials by Secretary Vance or other American officials, or information that was communicated directly to the Prime Minister by President Carter.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister regrets that he is not able to be here this morning. As I believe the House knows, he released a press statement in which he referred to the valiant effort and regretted the loss of life, which we all do, as we also regret the continued holding of the hostages in Tehran. We had no advance knowledge of the operation. The knowledge we received subsequently is of a very general kind and not, I think, of the kind to which the hon. Leader of the Opposition referred.

Mr. Clark: I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs will tell the House whether the Government of Canada is considering any initiatives which Canada might take or recommend that would be helpful in securing the safety and the peaceful release of the American hostages remaining in Tehran?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, obviously this is a subject which especially today is very much at the forefront of our concerns. We expect to have discussions in the near future with our allies, including the United States, on this question. We had some general discussion along those lines with Secretary Vance when he was here, but now in this new context I think it is more important than ever that we have some additional consultations in this respect.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, is it the position of the Government of Canada that Canadian sanctions against Iran should and shall stay in full effect?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, certainly we intend to keep in effect the sanctions which we put in place. We are not unsympathetic to further sanctions in co-operation with our European allies along the lines that have been spoken about recently. We do not yet have a full economic embargo on Iran. We are considering that step, and we will more with our allies in that direction.

WINNIPEG—RAIL RELOCATION—SUGGESTED REVERSAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I wonder if he would explain to the House the complete reversal by the government in not providing funds to the city of Winnipeg for CP rail relocation. The Prime Minister stated that he favoured rail relocation. The Minister of Employment and Immigration stated that we need rail relocation. The predecessor to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Lang, said that we must have rail relocation. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River gave advice to the city of Winnipeg on how to obtain funds for rail relocation. In view of these statements, can the minister explain to the House the complete reversal of policy of the Liberal government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport is in favour of relocation, and everybody and his aunt is in favour of relocation. This is the essence of it. Everybody finds it easy to agree with this relocation project.

A study has been made which illustrates or demonstrates the substantial difference between building overpasses and relocating, and the difference is between $65 million and $135 million. Three orders of government have some responsibility in this matter, and the city of Winnipeg is trying to find if it can get the necessary money for the relocation option from somewhere. The mayor and his advisers came to see us yesterday. As Minister of Transport the only instrument I have is UTAP, the urban transportation assistance program. Under that program $9 million can be assigned for that, and arrangements have been made to assign that project should the city and the province—because the province has the main responsibility to decide—accept this recommendation.

We are looking for money elsewhere and there is a possibility that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion might make a contribution.

The difficulty, of course, is the size of the gap between option one and option two, that is, the difference between $65 million and $135 million. Even if DREE wanted to be helpful, they would require quite an amount of money to do so.

May I conclude by saying that this is a responsibility of all three orders of government. We are in a bit of a vicious circle because everybody is looking to somebody else to see what they are going to do. I tried to say yesterday what I thought as Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, the vicious circle has been created by the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry. They never said any of these things when they stopped the city of Winnipeg obtaining funds—

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. McKenzie: My question is, as the year's delay was caused by the Liberal government, is the government now going to reimburse the city of Winnipeg for the additional $2.5 million cost for the building of the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass, and is it going to provide them with a permit for the overpass? If the minister has the DREE funds, when will he be making an announcement on those DREE funds?

Mr. Pepin: I want to repeat, Madam Speaker, that the door is not closed. There is still an exercise to be done, which we hope to conclude next week. I am going to dedicate a lot of time to it because I think the city of Winnipeg should know where the two other orders of government stand. I am referring to the government of Manitoba, which has not been too keen to come out on this subject.

On the point of compensation for the delays, I regret to say that I do not accept the idea and for two reasons. First of all, this study, which took a bit of time to do, was necessary for the project to come under UTAP. Secondly, I think that had the study not been done, generations of Winnipegers would have asked themselves what would have been the cost of relocation and if it would have been financially possible to take that approach.

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT ON RAIL RELOCATION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I would direct my question to the same minister, asking whether he agrees with and recognizes the importance of rail yard relocation in Winnipeg and that the economic benefits outweigh the cost? Is he prepared to make a commitment within a week on relocation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I cannot see what I can add to the very clear answers I have already given.

Mr. Keeper: My supplementary to the minister, Madam Speaker, is, is he willing then, if required, to bring in amendments to the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act so as to make that act more sensitive to community interests and not simply to CPR interests?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I repeat again that the objective of relocation is one with which everybody and his aunt agree. The question is to find the money needed to do that. It is not only in Winnipeg, it is in Regina, Toronto, Montreal, everywhere.

● (1125)

Mr. Clark: What were the limits of the Axworthy promise?

Mr. Pepin: I hope that in the coming months to begin to develop a program that would replace the UTAP program which ends in the fiscal year 1982-83.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DELAY IN EXPLAINING BLENDED OIL PRICING

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Minister of Finance on Monday night made a solemn pledge that the implementation of blended oil pricing would reduce the expenditures on oil import subsidies by one third, $1 billion, out of the new estimate for this year of $3.1 billion. This year Canada will import 165 million barrels of oil at a subsidy at present of $20 a barrel. Therefore, there would have to be an increase in the price of imported oil to $6 a barrel to reach this $1 billion.

Would the minister explain to the House, in view of the importance of this pledge, why the long delay in explaining fully to Alberta, Saskatchewan and the other provinces what his new formula is in detail—not election rhetoric as he told the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, but his detailed proposal? Is it because the proposal resulted in an increase of over $4 more a barrel this year than was stipulated in the budget, or is it because the minister wishes to gull the people of Quebec beyond May 20 he gulled the people of Canada beyond February 10? What is the reason for this?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I wish that the hon. member would quote accurately what was said by the Minister of Finance. I suggest, when the hon. member refers to a statement made by the Minister of Finance in his absence, that he should at least quote exactly the statement from Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As to the hon. member's question, I would remind him that it took his government six months before it went to Alberta and really started to discuss detailed proposals with that province. I had a meeting with the minister of energy of Alberta within two weeks of my appointment to office.

Miss MacDonald: It took you ten years.

Mr. Lalonde: During the first two weeks of May, I intend to meet with my provincial colleagues, particularly those of the producing provinces, and discuss with them rather specific proposals.

Mr. Clark: Again he refuses to answer.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the blended price was a central proposal during the election campaign. Now the minister is admitting that he does not know what it is and that he does not have a proposal ready yet.

Miss MacDonald: That's right.

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to the accuracy of quotations, the minister told the hon. member for Athabasca yesterday that it was not the federal government which delayed the starting of the Alsands plant, but the government of Alberta. The president of Shell Canada Limited said yesterday, as reported in this morning's Globe and Mail:

> Completion of Canada's third oil sands plant will be put back a year to 1987 if Ottawa does not agree to world prices for output by the end of June—

In view of that fact, how can the minister now blame the government of Alberta, when Shell Canada is saying that completion will be put back one year if Ottawa does not agree to world oil prices for their product by June? Who is correct, the president of Shell Canada or the minister? I know who I think is correct, and it is not the minister.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, obviously I do not expect the hon. member to exercise fair judgment on this issue, nor am I surprised by his conclusion. I would remind the hon. member, that well before our decision to use the force majeure clause within the agreement with Syncrude, and to put an end to the tying of tar sands oil prices to international prices, the government of Alberta had delayed for many months the necessary approval for the Alsands proposal, while the federal government had taken all the necessary steps to make sure that this project would go ahead. The decision to delay any further approval was taken by the Premier of Alberta at least a month, if not two months, before our announcement on tar sands prices. Those are the facts, and I challenge the hon. member to prove to the contrary.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, in view of the urgency of settling the oil pricing question for the purposes of the budget, which the Minister of Finance is hesitating to bring down until this matter is settled, since the present agreement ends on July 1, in view of the fact that it is holding up the tar sands project, and in view of what the president of Shell Oil has said, that if we do not have that price, these projects will not be economically viable, when does the minister intend to pull his blended rabbit out of his blended hat and give it to the provinces and this House so that we can see exactly what he is aiming for and how he intends to accomplish his goals?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, this government will not be blackmailed by the threats of any president of any company.

• (1130)

Mr. Lalonde: We are engaged in discussions with the provinces, the producing provinces in particular, concerning a new pricing arrangement. There is agreement between the government of Alberta and ourselves that we should set our target for early July. That point is agreed between our governments. I am working on that basis, and I hope that bv that time we will have an agreement.

By the way, Madam Speaker, if that does happen, we will have achieved an agreement twice as fast as it took the previous government not to reach an agreement.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

ANTICIPATED INCREASE IN PRICE OF DOMESTIC OIL

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, on the same line of questioning, perhaps I could put a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In introducing the main estimates in this House earlier this week, the President of the Treasury Board stated:

> The $2.6 billion provision in the 1980-81 main estimates for oil import compensation payments is based on the previous government's domestic oil pricing strategy—

Would the President of the Treasury Board confirm to the House that that strategy anticipated a $4 per barrel increase in the price of domestic oil in this current fiscal year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as I recall, that was the figure that was produced in the projections of the former minister of finance in December, 1979.

INQUIRY WHETHER BLENDED PRICE FORMULA CONVEYED TO PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD PRIOR TO FINALIZATION OF ESTIMATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, as we now have it confirmed that before this House we have estimates that anticipate a $4 per barrel increase in the price of oil, I would put my next question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Did he at least convey the workings in detail of his blended price formula to the President of the Treasury Board prior to the estimates being finalized and put before this House, as certain oil compensation payments are reflected in these estimates, but apparently the $4 price was assumed still to be in effect?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government is working on various scenarios in terms of pricing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is a great day.

Mr. Lalonde: —but I can assure the hon. member that for this year the wellhead price increase that the government is working on is below $4.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

OIL COMPANY PROFITEERING—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear that this government is tough and will not be blackmailed.

I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that oil company profits for the first quarter of this year have just been released, showing that Shell's profit is up 94 per cent, Gulf 72 per cent, Texaco 94 per cent and Sunoco's profit is up an incredible 364 per cent, what action is the Government of Canada contemplating to stop this exorbitant profiteering by these oil companies?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as far as Suncor is concerned, the hon. member knows that we have stopped tying the price of tar sands oil to international prices, and that we are going to work on the basis of a negotiated price which has no relationship necessarily to international prices.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What are you going to do, Marc?

INQUIRY WHETHER OIL COMPANIES ALLEGED TO HAVE FIXED PRICES WILL BE PROSECUTED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, that does not answer my question on oil company profits, but I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Justice, if I might. I know he is tough and will not be blackmailed either.

In view of the fact that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been conducting a seven-year investigation on price fixing by large oil companies and that lawyers in the department are running over themselves with evidence from this investigation, can the minister confirm to the House that there is going to be action taken now, including prosecution of these oil companies who are making these exorbitant profits and are alleged to have fixed prices?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I will look into the matter. I have not been informed of any immediate action concerning that file. I think it is a very important subject and I will look into it. If we have to take action, we will take it, but I am not in a position to report to the House at this time.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs knows about this matter, or at least should know of it. Could he confirm to this House that officials in his department are simply furious over the inaction of the last government and over the unwillingness of this government to be tough and to take on the giant oil companies over this price fixing? Can he tell us when there is going to be some action in this area?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I should not forgive myself for expressing publicly the personal feelings of civil servants. I shall not continue in that vein but will merely reply to the hon. member that an investigation is now under way, as the hon. member already knows. I am confident its director will do a thorough job of it. For the time being, anything else would be mere speculation. I feel it would be wiser to wait for the findings of the director of inquiries. When he has handed in his report, of course the government will act without delay.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSTRUCTION OF ESCORT SHIPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Louis Leduc (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to know what the intentions of the government are with regard to the future of escort ships in Canada.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member brings up the matter considering the updating of our Canadian armed forces, which process is making great strides, the purchase of fighter aircraft and probably, in the near future, that of other material. With regard to the ships we must purchase for the Canadian navy, I think it is important to mention that the Quebec shipyards will certainly benefit the most considering that we have two shipyards which need help very badly, and like in other parts of Canada the situation can certainly be improved.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS—RECOGNITION OF POSITION OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the failure of this government to recognize Newfoundland's claim to offshore oil and gas is retarding commercial development of the Hibernia well, and in view of the position taken in Newfoundland by the minister's provincial colleagues in support of Newfoundland's position, I ask the minister if the government intends to recognize Newfoundland's position, vis-à-vis offshore oil and gas, in order to enable production of this very important well to get on and, if so, is the minister prepared to tell the House what the position is?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, what is retarding any development, if there is any such delay taking place, is also the failure of the government of Newfoundland to recognize the position of the Government of Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The minister's colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, said publicly that the position of the Government of Canada is getting closer to that of the government of Newfoundland. My question is: has there been any change in the very stubborn position of the Government of Canada, and does the minister intend to enter into negotiations with the government of Newfoundland in order to enable the development of that very important source of energy to proceed and hence reduce the dependence on offshore oil and gas which is so costly to this country?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am happy to hear that my colleague recognizes that the position of the Government of Canada might be coming closer to that of Newfoundland, and I hope this also means that the position of Newfoundland is coming closer to that of Canada.

As far as the other part of the hon. member's question is concerned, I intend to meet with my colleague, the Newfoundland minister of energy, in the near future.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

FINANCIAL SUPPORT TO CHRYSLER OF CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last Tuesday I asked the minister whether he was proposing to have discussion of the Chrysler Canada issue before an appropriate committee of the House. To my amazement, in light of the size of the proposed support, he has said that this will not take place. I do want to get some of the other matters on this important decision before the House prior to the decision taking place.

● (1140)

In view of the magnitude of the decision and its imminence, and in view of the fact that the fiscal position of the federal government is very tight right now, will the minister tell us out of what spending envelope any aid to Chrysler would come? Would it be out of the economic development envelope or would it be taken from social programs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): First, I have not finished my consultations with the House leader regarding having the auto pact situation studied by the appropriate committee. I would think that when the estimates of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce are before the finance committee this would provide at least a partial vehicle for the kind of consideration the hon. member has in mind.

As to the precise reference in his question, he should not assume that the larger amount speculated upon in the press is the amount the government is considering with respect to Chrysler.

Finally, the exact nature of the envelope would depend on the form and extent of the aid finally decided upon.

Mr. Wilson: I was not referring to the auto pact itself. I agree with the minister that the question of the auto pact should be brought before an appropriate committee of the House, but I am directing my question to the Chrysler decision which is to be taken shortly. Can the hon. gentleman assure us today that a decision to support Chrysler would not have any adverse effect on any other economic development program? Would any assistance to Chrysler be in addition to other economic development programs, in view of the importance of economic development in our country today?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, any decision we take with respect to Chrysler would have as its purpose enhancing the economic development of Canada.

Mr. Wilson: No answer.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT FOR "OMBUSDMAN" PROGRAM

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State in his capacity as the minister reporting to Parliament on behalf of the CBC. In view of the fact that the CBC intends to drop three public affairs shows, including "The Medicine Show", "The Watson Report" and "Newsmagazine", plus—and I emphasize this—"Ombudsman", an investigative program and an example of access television because it addresses itself to the problems of the average person stonewalled by a faceless bureaucracy, would the hon. gentleman find out if and when the CBC intends to replace "Ombudsman" with some other kind of hard-hitting investigative program which will take up the cause of the little guy?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): The CBC is, of course, completely responsible for the type of programming which it offers to the Canadian public. I will bring the concern the hon. member has expressed to the attention of the management of the CBC and see what reply they have to his question.

Mr. Rose: I am aware, of course, that the Secretary of State only reports for the CBC to the House, but I would ask him this by way of a supplementary. Will he also try to determine whether "Ombudsman" has been dropped not because it had poor ratings but because, like "This Hour Has Seven Days, over a decade ago, this program sometimes reveals high government officials in embarrassing posture, in addition to the fact that some of the top management of the corporation, perhaps even its president, never understood or liked "Ombudsman"?

[Translation]

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, this is the first time that representations have been made to me. I think the hon. member is well aware of the CBC's independence in establishing its programming. Considering the type of public affairs programs that the CBC has discussed over the years I do not think anyone in the House can say that such a decision was taken for political reasons, as the hon. member says.

AIR CANADA

REPORTED PROPOSED CANCELLING OF LANDING RIGHTS IN UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Transport? It arises out of press reports of a week or ten days ago emanating from the United Kingdom to the effect that the U.K. government was prepared to cancel the landing rights of our national carrier between western Canada and the U.K. Can the minister tell us where this matter stands, whether negotiations are in progress at the present time, and whether or not Canada has taken a clear position and one to which it intends to adhere with respect to alternate rights being sought by the United Kingdom in this respect?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this question has to do with the entry into western Canada of foreign carriers, particularly the British. Negotiations have started on this subject and somewhat to our surprise—because we do not expect this from cool Britishers—the British negotiating team went to the press and announced that if the Canadian approach did not improve they would suspend flights of Air Canada from western Canada to Britain next year.

That is the situation. It shows how difficult these negotiations will be in the future. It shows, also, that the British, like everybody else, have a short memory and have forgotten that way back in 1966 some arrangements were reached that were advantageous to their side.

Mr. Forrestall: Would the minister take this opportunity to tell Canadians just what the difficulty is between Canada and the United Kingdom with respect to these freedoms? In particular, I would ask him whether or not this precipitate course taken by the United Kingdom was associated in any way with the difficulty we experience in maintaining a presence at Heathrow International Airport outside London, or whether it arises out of other negotiations and, if so, what are the factors that have contributed to this precipitate step on the part of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Pepin: I was told that Heathrow has not played a role in this matter. That is in the past. What is happening is simply the normal exchange between negotiating teams which have very clear interests at heart. I do not think we should be discouraged. These negotiations are very important in terms of Canadian and British interests and it is normal that the first steps should have been difficult. What is surprising is that they should have led to the British announcement.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT UNDERTAKING TO PURCHASE HOPPER CARS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question, too, is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Reports across western Canada are that the government intends to partially renegue on its undertaking to buy 2,000 hopper cars to move western Canadian grain. Can the minister tell us whether this is true?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I can deny that with all the emphasis at my command. It is not true. The program is continuing. As a matter of fact, the situation is good at the present time. But a decision will have to be made before the end of the year as to the regularity with which we are going to remain in this business of providing hopper cars to the western railways.

An hon. Member: What does that mean?

Mr. Pepin: It means simply that a good level has been reached but it might be advantageous if we could establish a level of regular purchasing in the future.

FISHERIES

POLICY RESPECTING LANDING OF GASPEREAU

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. I may say that in response to the minister's answer yesterday I have checked my facts carefully and, for the hon. gentleman's information, six trawlers are under contract in Denmark for the Uruguayan operation to which I referred.

My question today is as follows. Would the minister outline his policy concerning the 6,000 tons of gaspereau to be landed in his native province of New Brunswick, the number of tons promised by Canada to joint trawlers of Sweden—owned by Russia, trawlers which pay no taxes in Canada—and the reason for this action since Canadian processors could have taken up to 10,000 tons of gaspereau?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may have verified some facts at the beginning of his statement but he did not do so with the second question. In relation to National Sea's decision, the hon. member forgets that this is a joint venture. There are other partners. He also forgets that in his own riding National Sea has expanded its processing plant, which is now the biggest in North America. Surely that must show some confidence in the future of the fisheries in his own province and his own riding.

As for the matter of direct sales to offshore freezers, the fishermen from different parts of the maritimes, particularly in this case of the gaspereau fishermen in New Brunswick, had put a request to the department for permission to sell fish for which processors had made no firm offer at a firm price for firm quantities.

I tried to have the processors and the fishermen work out the details of what could be an accommodation in a joint meeting. The processors did not come up with a firm offer to the fishermen at this meeting. Since the gaspereau were heading for our coast and the fishermen were waiting for an answer, I authorized the sale.

Mr. Crouse: One brief supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Since the minister's fisheries policies are obviously not leading to the progressive development of the Canadian industry, will he give consideration to an early meeting with the provincial fisheries ministers in Atlantic Canada in the hope that a more pro-Canadian fisheries policy may be established?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems confused. Pro-Canadian policy "pro" a number of processes which do not offer fishermen a reasonable price and a reasonable guarantee to take the fish they have to sell. But a "pro-fishermen policy" is what I have tried through the years to give the fishermen, at least an opportunity to have something to say in their own industry. I intend to continue doing that.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF TAXATION OF NON-SALARY BENEFITS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the continued uncertainty regarding income taxation of non-salary benefits for the years 1978-79 in northern Canada—such things as flights, subsidized housing, fuel, room and board etc.—will the minister clarify this situation for the House and assure members that the benefits for these years will not be taxed?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I will take note of the question and make sure that the hon. member gets a reply as quickly as possible.

COMPARABLE BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I did not notice that the minister was not in the House but I see that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is. In light of the position of the Minister of National Revenue on a moratorium for at least the 1980 tax year, will he assure the House and northern native people that immediate consideration will be given to introducing plans that will provide them with comparable benefits?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am aware of the interest of the native peoples in the final outcome, following any governmental policy after the moratorium is over.

May I advise the hon. member, as he may know, that the vast majority of the Indian chiefs across Canada are gathering in Ottawa next week. I hope to explore further just what they have in mind with respect to how they would like to see the policy formed. I will perhaps be in a position to give more elaborate details after I have had a chance to receive their input.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NORDAIR SALE

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is related to that of my colleague but I think the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has just left. Where is he?

An hon. Member: Maybe he resigned!

Mr. La Salle: I will therefore put my question to the Minister of Transport. Since he must have had the opportunity, I imagine, to examine the Nordair file after this appointment, since the public expects an early decision and since he met with the people concerned, could the minister tell us where this question is now standing and whether a decision will be taken, and when he will announce the sale of Nordair?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we had not been very hard on the previous government on that question. But I understand better now why they could not decide either way following their inquiry.

We are giving a good deal of thought to the question. I am now in the process of meeting a large number of people concerned and consulting my colleagues, and I will make an announcement as soon as I can.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I could tell the Minister of Transport that we had seriously reviewed that issue and that we had already committed ourselves to protect the considerable interests of Quebec anyway.

Could the minister at least assure the House, whoever the buyers are, that the majority interests of Quebec will be protected in that sale? To my mind that is the important thing.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, it goes without saying that this government is as much aware of the interests of Quebec as the former government was.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CRITICISM IN REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—INQUIRY WHETHER BACKGROUND MATERIAL WILL BE TABLED

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. The minister is no doubt aware that the Auditor General's report with its comments on the public service has created or compounded an already difficult morale problem in the public service, since it is being interpreted as an attack on the working public service rather than the management system. Given that situation, is the minister considering tabling the methodology and the studies as well as the background documents that the Auditor General used with respect to this? Are any studies being carried on within the minister's department or elsewhere within the government to extend and broaden the rather narrow sample that he used in order to come to the conclusions which he did, in order to test the conclusions to which he came?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I hope to have the opportunity of meeting with the Auditor General. I would invite interested members of the opposition to join with me to determine the methodology and look at the sampling, unless it comes up before the public accounts committee in the very near future. As hon. members know, the sampling was in, I think, classes 1 to 4 of the clerical and regulatory group. There has been an understandable tendency, due to some of the comments, to extrapolate that across the public service which, in my judgment, is unfair and inaccurate.

As I indicated in response to a question last week, it must be placed in the context of the over-all management of human resources. In that regard, Madam Speaker, I have received a mandate to direct recommendations with respect to the Lambert commission and the D'Avignon commission acting in concert with a committee of cabinet which will be formed for that purpose and chaired by the President of the Privy Council Office.

I believe it is in that direction that we must move, Madam Speaker—to improve the management of human resources and not tend to attack the hardworking public servants who have been the subject of this particular study.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I just want to say to the hon. gentleman that I agree with that general approach as a rational one. I am happy to hear him say that the D'Avignon report is going to be studied by the government as well, since a reference to it did not appear in the throne speech, which only had reference to the Lambert report.

Could the hon. minister tell the House whether he is carrying on consultations with the Public Service Staff Association and unions with respect to the D'Avignon report relative to the conclusions of the Auditor General, and what shape are those consultations likely to take? I noticed they were absent from the recitation of the list of people for whom he would be working in concert.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, there are continuing consultations, of course, I have met with the Public Service Commission, I have met with Mr. Stewart and Mr. Myers of the National Joint Council. As hon. members know, Mr. Stewart is president of the Public Service Alliance. We are continuing a series of meetings and consultations and, of course, in all of these discussions consideration of the D'Avignon report and Lambert commission is uppermost.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RADIO-CANADA DISPUTE—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ASK RADIO-CANADA TO ACCEPT CONCILIATOR'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. There is a possibility of a Radio-Canada strike at noon considering that the recommendations of the conciliator which was appointed by the Minister of Labour were accepted by the producers' union but rejected by Radio-Canada. Therefore, does the minister intend to have discussions with the management of Radio-Canada to urge them to accept the recommendations of the conciliator of his government and of his Minister of Labour?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, this week I had the opportunity to meet a delegation of the union concerned which told me about their concern and their problems in the current negotiations between Radio-Canada and the union. At that time, and I think it was Wednesday afternoon, those people told me that they did not intend to strike, that instead they were withdrawing their services now and then. Of course I am going to discuss this with my colleague, the Minister of Labour, who appointed a conciliator in this conflict.

HOUSING

CALGARY, ALTA—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RELIEVE SERIOUS SITUATION

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for housing. A very critical situation has developed in the city of Calgary. Rents have gone up 30 per cent this year. There is zero rent vacancies. Families are doubling up and cannot afford to buy homes. To qualify for a modest home one must earn about $50,000, which puts it beyond the reach of the average Canadian. It strongly appears that the minister is dragging his feet in this area.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member try to make his question briefer.

Mr. Kushner: Madam Speaker, I have concluded my preliminary remarks. Is the minister in fact going into deferred interest rates, or exactly what is the minister doing to relieve this serious situation?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Finance indicated, I was given a mandate to meet with representatives of the industry. That includes lenders and private insurers.

I hope to have a meeting on May 9 with a good cross-section of the industry. I hope, coming together with the federal government in consultation with my provincial counterparts—and I am meeting with the ministers from British Columbia and Saskatchewan on Monday—that we should have an answer for this House and the public within a short period of time.

AIRPORTS

AVAILABILITY OF EVACUATION AND RESCUE RESOURCES

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to answer a question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Regina West, who alluded to a rumour that firefighters are no longer responsible for the evacuation and rescue of people in an aircraft which has crashed. This rumour stems from a review which is being made now of standards for firefighters. A draft which was issued became the subject of a leak.

The truth of the matter is that the role of firefighters will remain to save lives, property being secondary to that primary objective of saving lives. However, the question being refined now is how to go about it, and the regulation is trying to determine that. It says that firefighters will provide fire free escape areas by maintaining "fuselage integrity" and very, very complex things of this kind, but should crew members be incapacitated, then firefighters will enter the aircraft and help in the evacuation.

This is, it seems to me, a very worth-while attempt to define in regulation what is the role of firefighters in terms of priorities in their responsibilities.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—PROPRIETY OF MINISTERS ANSWERING QUESTIONS OUTSIDE OF QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It relates to your recognition of the Minister of Transport, with which I do not quarrel because it is your right to recognize, but I know of no part of our procedure which allows a minister to make an answer to a question asked the day before or at some previous time.

Mr. Ouellet: Of course there is.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I just do not know of that. There may be one but, in any event, it could lead to supplementary questions. It could lead to every minister in the House standing up and answering fully questions they could not answer, for good or bad reasons, the day before. I think it is quite inappropriate to do that unless it is intended to extend the question period far beyond the hours. I think it is inappropriate for a point of order to be used for that purpose. I am quite prepared to discuss a way by which we could accomplish that, but I do not think we should revise the rules as we go.

Madam Speaker: I note the hon. member's comments. I thought I had made it clear that the question period was over, and the minister was giving an explanation as to a previous question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is the problem.

Madam Speaker: I think I will try to find some way of making it clear that the question period is over. I do it now by recognizing somebody else, sometimes knowing that it is on a question of privilege and sometimes knowing that it is on another point which hon. members would be allowed to raise at that time; but I will try to make it clear when the question period is over.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—JAMMING OF BROADCASTS OF HOUSE PROCEEDINGS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a question of privilege which I raised, I think, a little over a week ago. Your Honour will recall that I brought to the attention of the House the fact that the proceedings of the House of Commons were not available in Saskatoon through the cable system there, Saskatoon Telecable Limited. At that time the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) indicated that he would put the full force of his departmental officials and his own personal attention into the investigation of the circumstances in order to see whether or not the broadcasting of these proceedings could be brought about.

I am rising on this point of order, in view of the fact that the Minister of Communications is here, to see whether he can tell us if that investigation is proceeding and when we might expect his report, which he offered to the House and Your Honour, so that I can have an opportunity to assess what position and what actions to take next on behalf of the people of the city of Saskatoon.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, following the raising of the question of privilege by the hon. member last week I immediately sent a telex out to both the president of Saskatchewan Telecommunications, Mr. Forrester, and the minister responsible for communications policy in the Saskatchewan government, the hon. Roy Romanow. I have yet to receive a reply to the telex I sent to both those gentlemen. I drew their attention to the fact that members of the House in general are concerned about the fact that there has been an interruption in the distribution of the proceedings of the House of Commons in the Saskatoon area, and I requested that they look into the possibility of resolving the matter without prejudice to the rights of both parties involved.

As the hon. member knows, it is quite possible that this matter will lead to litigation, but my request of Mr. Romanow through the government of Saskatchewan is that they be able to come to some understanding on this problem without any prejudice to the eventual legal disposition of the matter.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I appreciate very much the report the minister has given us and the efforts he is taking to allow the people of Saskatoon the right and privilege of watching the proceedings of the House of Commons. I understand that steps might be taken in other cities in Saskatchewan which might fall into the same category if a dispute arises with respect to private television companies.

However, what I was going to ask with respect to the report made by the Minister of Communications is whether he would be prepared to table in this House the correspondence so that we may have the benefit of seeing precisely the nature of the representation made by the minister and his officials. I would very much appreciate having the documents tabled if the minister was prepared to do so.

Mr. Fox: Yes, Madam Speaker, I would be willing to table the telex I sent to Mr. Forrester and Mr. Romanow. However, I request a delay so that I may advise Mr. Romanow and Mr. Forrester of my intention of doing so and also in order that I could table the documents in both official languages.

MR. STEVENS—GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—NOTICE OF POSSIBLE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE TO BE RAISED

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I would like today to give notice of a possible question of privilege I hope to raise next week after I have had an opportunity to read today's Hansard. My question of privilege will centre on the two responses I received today, one from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and one from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), which put this House in the dilemma of now being told that a premise which was used in putting the estimates before the House, namely, that there would be a $4 oil price increase in Canada, is now being challenged by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

• (1210)

The net effect of that challenge could be as much as $400 million. That would mean that we have before us estimates that are grossly erroneous, to the knowledge of at least one minister in the cabinet, I believe. After having read today's Hansard, I would like to pursue this matter more fully when I see the true import with which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has startled the House today.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to reply to the point raised by my colleague. I think he has completely misinterpreted and misread the answer given by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) as well as my answer. I hope that after he has looked at Hansard he will recognize that he has no point of privilege at all.

What the President of the Treasury Board has indicated is that the figures which have been mentioned were the estimates prepared by my colleague when he was in the Treasury Board and that the total figure there was based on the budget, the figures mentioned in the previous budget which was defeated. That does not necessarily mean that the same amount would be raised in the same way as in the previous budget. It is very simple.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has now greatly complicated the question because apparently he is totally unaware of the fact that the estimates which have been brought in are an increase of $1,545 million over any estimate that we proposed to put before the House. My point is that even the $1,545 million is based on the premise that there will be a $4 per barrel increase in the cost of domestic oil in Canada. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is now challenging that premise, and the thrust of my question of privilege may be the fact that we have been misled so grossly.

MR. TOWERS—IMPLEMENTATION OF METRIC CONVERSION PROGRAM

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege pursuant to the remarks made on April 23, 1980, as reported at pages 326, 327 and 330 of Hansard, by the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) relating to the metric program, remarks which I believe to be misleading and not representative of the truth.

The minister would have this House believe that there was full and open debate on the implementation of the metric program and, as he said:

> —there were ample opportunities for hon. members to discuss this when the legislation on metric conversion was passed in this House.

The fact is that there has not been a metric conversion bill per se debate in the House. The metric program was foisted on the Canadian people through the back door in a devious manner.

The metric program had its genesis in the white paper which was tabled in the House on January 16, 1970. As is the custom with statements on motions, our spokesman, Mr. G. W. Baldwin, had only a few minutes in which to comment on the proposal. A metric converion omnibus bill was not introduced or debated in the House. Bill S-5, the Weights and Measures Act, was introduced in the Senate in October of 1970 and was passed in April of 1971. The bill provided that metric units could be used in trade in Canada. It would appear then that the government established a metric commission by executive order.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses stated:

> —the government has no intention of imposing the metric system—

But in fact this is what has been happening in Canada. Between June, 1971, when the metric commission was established, and November, 1976 when Bill C-23 was introduced in the House, there was no opportunity for hon. members to debate the principle. A metric program was already in place when Bill C-23 came before the House. Hon. members were presented with a fait accompli. Bill C-23 was simply a catch-all bill facilitating amendments to several pieces of existing legislation, such as the Wheat Board Act, the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act, etc.

On page 330 of Hansard the minister is reported to have referred also to progress in metrication in the United States. To the best of my knowledge, the government and business community in the United States has not taken steps to go metric. Perhaps the minister has information we do not possess and he will be kind enough to make it available to us. At the time of the tabling of the white paper, Mr. Baldwin said:

> We should think particularly of our trading relations with the United States, which of course is and has been for some years examining its position with regard to adoption of metric. Whether we like it or not, what we must do to a considerable extent is to keep pace with what is being done in the United States. I think it might well be suicidal for us to adopt the metric system without considering what is being done in the United States.

The minister has not given the House an accurate chronology of events which led up to the introduction of metrication in Canada. I believe that my rights, along with the rights of millions of Canadians who are in opposition to metric, have been infringed upon by the misrepresentation of successive Liberal ministers, including the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe).

After studying the case, Madam Speaker, if you rule that my rights as a member of this House, along with those of many Canadians resident in a supposedly free country, have not been upheld by the actions of successive Liberal governments, I am prepared to move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

> That the matter of the misrepresentation of the Minister of State for Small Businesses of the proceedings of this House on metrication be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, I would like to make an initial remark. I feel that my colleague would have shown the most basic courtesy if he had given me advance notice of his intention to raise a point of privilege on this. Clearly, when there is reference to facts that happened over these last ten years, nobody in this House can be expected to recall every detail of the debates that may have been held. Had I been given notice of the question, I would be in a position to give a much more detailed answer.

But let me add a few general remarks, Madam Speaker. I would like to remind the hon member that when the white paper on metric conversion was tabled, in the early seventies, it was supported by the leaders of the three parties in this House. And it was recognized in that white paper that moving toward metric conversion was in the public interest.

I listened closely to the hon. member's remarks, and I humbly submit he has no valid point of privilege. It is only a difference of opinion between the hon. member's views and the position I took at the beginning of this week.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly on this point. I noted that the minister indicated that it is indeed possible for a human error to be made by a minister or by others and he suggests that that was the cause of the information he gave to the House to which a complaint has been made by my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers).

It is my very clear recollection—and I have not had a chance to consult Hansard on that matter—that in fact there were two questions put to the minister, that there was a separation of time, and that he had the opportunity to become briefed on the matter. Indeed, he was provided with supplementary information having to do with the authority on which metric is based. The information of which the hon. member has complained was in fact a deliberate statement in his second answer, when the minister attempted to cite a number of pieces of legislation which he claimed gave authority for the implementation of the metric system. In other words, it was not a simple error based upon misinformation; it was a deliberate statement reflecting a consultation of the laws that had been passed and of the situation at the time.

I think the minister has raised the point that were there to be a simple error, the Chair might decide one way, that the Chair might decide that it was a simple error; but if a statement had been made after the minister has had the opportunity to consider the facts and if, in the course of that statement, he cited various pieces of legislation, as it is my recollection he did, then I believe the question of the hon. member for Red Deer for a reference of this matter is much more firmly founded.

● (1220)

As Madam Speaker will know, of course, there is a great concern in this House and indeed in this country that we are proceeding with reckless speed with the implementation of a program which has no, or the most suspect of, legislative authority. That is a side issue, but it is an important one. It speaks to the seriousness with which the question was raised by the hon. member for Red Deer and by others on this side of the House, and to the seriousness with which the country would react to a position taken by the government, deliberately or by accident, that in fact there was legal foundation for a system which we believe is being imposed without adequate legal foundation. The capacity to consider the answer by the minister is very germane to Your Honour's finding.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Madam Speaker, I listened very closely to the remarks made by the right hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). In my first answer, or that given to the first question, I recognize I was in error, because I had not enough time to be adequately informed. I quote from page 326 of Hansard:

> First I should like to remind the hon. member that there were ample opportunities for hon. member to discuss this when the legislation on metric conversion was passed in this House—

I recognize quite humbly that there has been no legislation on metric conversion that was passed as such.

In my second answer, when I had the opportunity to check further the available information, I indicated in this House that when the Weights and Measures Act and also the Labelling and Packaging Act were discussed in 1971, reference was made to the metric system, and I did not suggest that that was an act concerning metric conversion, but that within the framework of the discussions held on these two bills, hon. members had an opportunity to address the matter of the metric system. And if the right hon. Leader of the Official Opposition will read my answer again, as reported on page 327 of Hansard, he will see that this is what I said in the House.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) seeking the floor on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Neil: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Then I will recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that I support what the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) has said. I suggest that if the minister examines page 368 of Hansard dated April 24, he will see that the hon. member for Red Deer gave notice of the question of privilege which he planned on raising today.

I listened to the questions put to the minister on Wednesday which are recorded at pages 326 and 327 of Hansard. Quite frankly I was very disturbed because the response of the minister was such that it would lead people to believe that at some time or other, and perhaps on several occasions, members of the House of Commons have had the opportunity of discussing the implementation of the metric system. This is not so. He referred to the white paper which the minister said received the support of all parties.

Also I suggest that the minister should examine Hansard of January 16, 1970. There were three speakers, one from each of the parties. While there was general acceptance, there was no over-all debate and no indication at that time that the metric system would be imposed upon Canadians without a general debate.

I feel the answers of the minister were such that he has given the impression to the public of Canada that there was a general debate on metric conversion. As I said, this is not so. The debates were restricted. I believe my privileges as a member have been breached, and certainly I am in support of the question of privilege of the hon. member for Red Deer. This was the reason I was prepared to support the motion and to act as seconder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) seeking the floor on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Huntington: Yes.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Capilano.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, I too should like to speak in support of the motion of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). What the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) has done in his statement is perpetuate the myth that the House of Commons, since 1970 or the tabling of the white paper, has given the Government of Canada, no matter which party, a mandate to implement or impose the metric system on the people of Canada. I sympathize with him in his new position, with the duties, paper work and study he has to do. In fact they are imposing it through governor in council or through members of a commission making deals with public servants in departments which have the power to implement aspects of weights and measures legislation or health of animals legislation that were never intended to impose a change in the measurement system on Canadians.

In 1975 the then prime minister wrote to the premiers of the provinces of Canada advising them that he had a mandate from the House of Commons to ask for their assistance in imposing the metric system across the land. If Madam Speaker examines that mandate, it goes back to some legislation in the 1870s when there was an act which allowed the Government of Canada governor in council approval for certain actions pertaining to the metric system. If one takes unbiased, independent surveys on this subject matter across the land by age group, one will find that the Canadians resisting this imposition exceed 75 per cent of the population.

If the House of Commons is ever to represent the people against governor in council imposition of deals behind the scenes, using acts that were not intended for that purpose, then I suggest that this motion has to be heard by Madam Speaker and placed before the said committee. The issue is very serious indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Huntington: Surely Madam Speaker will allow this chamber to represent the people at large when the power being used is vested strictly within the bureaucrats of the Government of Canada, with the use of the governor in council and acts that were never intended for this purpose. If Madam Speaker does not accept the motion, then it behooves the government to submit to the House of Commons a metric conversion act where the advantages and the reasons for it can be explored and explained to the people of Canada. I urge the House to support this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to make a brief intervention in support of the motion and the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and so well articulated by my colleagues on this side of the House. I think it is important to get the whole question in context. I sympathize with the minister. The fact is that he has had only a matter of three or four months to be seized of this particular subject matter.

I think it is important for us to understand two basic principles. The minister should be fully aware of the background circumstances because it is important if we are to understand the responsibilities of members of the House of Commons. One of the basic principles is that the only reference to the House of Commons by way of debate was on a resolution brought forward by the government in which there were brief replies by representatives of each of the parties. As I say, this was only referenced by way of government initiative.

On reviewing the record, it would be interesting for the minister to observe that the spokesman on behalf of our party at that time warned the government respecting the question of the implementation and accountability of the conversion program. Mr. Baldwin pointed out with the forensic ability he has shown in his distinguished parliamentary career that the most dangerous aspect would be metric conversion taking place without ample consultation with the people involved, that is, the people of Canada.

The second point which should be brought to the attention of Madam Speaker and the minister is that one of the shortcomings of this particular conversion program has been the lack of accountability to Parliament, either directly through legislation or by reference to a committee of this Parliament. What it amounts to is this. The metric conversion commission is proceeding on the basis of a resolution of a most general nature, enacted in 1970 and passed by this House, which simply supported the concept of eventual metric conversion in line with developments around the world, which everyone understands.

We in Canada have a unique situation, as the minister well knows, with well over 70 per cent of our trade taking place with the United States. It is foolhardy for us, in terms of economics and in terms of public acceptance, to proceed at a pace that exceeds by much the conversion that is taking place in the United States.

This issue demonstrates the fact that if we in Parliament, as has been indicated by my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), are in fact to fulfil our responsibilities, we must have accountability in respect of government-initiated actions which have taken place under orders in council passed by the government.

I say to the hon. minister, coming as I do from western Canada, that the Speech from the Throne made some reference to the responsibility of members of Parliament to stand up and state clearly in this House those issues that are of some concern to western Canada. If the minister wants to deal with a western Canadian issue that does cause some concern across that part of our great country, he should pay very strict attention to this question of metric conversion. He should take the lead in terms of having the metric commission made accountable to Parliament, and he should in fact give very serious consideration to the introduction of legislation which will outline the timetable and procedure under which metric conversion takes place in our country.

I do not want to go any further at this time except to say that I think this is a valid subject and a valid motion for the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, where members of Parliament could in fact, from a parliamentary point of view, bring forward their concerns in respect of this particular initiative on the part of this government and the responsibilities of the minister in that regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lapointe: Madam Speaker, I would like to set a few facts straight. It is true that notice of a question of privilege was given on April 24, as evidenced at page 368 of Hansard, but if you read what was said carefully, the content of that question of privilege is not specified.

With respect to the comments made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), there seems to be an apparent contradiction when he says that when Parliament discussed the issue in 1970, there was, and I quote him in English:

[English]

"A general acceptance of the principle".

[Translation]

So it was obvious, Madam Speaker, that the House had to vote at a certain time in its history on the principle of metric conversion. And my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), indicated that, and I quote:

[English]

"An act was adopted in 1970 recognizing the broad principle of metrication."

So I think my predecessor held my portfolio longer than I did and I wonder how it is that now they should think it has become a problem of national urgency that action was not taken at that time. An action taken by my predecessor was to delay the introduction of metric scales in retail stores and I intend, Madam Speaker, to make the same recommendation he made to my colleagues in cabinet.

As to the rest of the debate, Madam Speaker, we cannot rewrite history. There was a discussion on that subject in 1970. It is not your fault nor mine nor that of members of this House if none of them spoke about that and I think the whole thing is basically a matter of a difference of opinion.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: On the question of privilege, Madam Speaker; I thank you for recognizing me again. The Minister of State for Small Businesses alleges that the action I took on this important subject matter was limited to the postponement of the implementation of metric action as it related to weights in the retail sector for one year. That is not so, Madam Speaker. I think I have the right to point to the record.

We imposed in a very careful manner a metric overview board that worked very industriously for a matter of months on this whole matter. It made six individual reports and a final report. The report was submitted to me in the last hours of my privilege of being a minister. I understand that under the new Minister of State for Small Businesses the report is not going to be circulated and made available officially, which I think is an absolute shame because the people of Canada have paid quite a few thousands of dollars for a report which does represent a very fair analysis of the concern that exists at large in this country.

I would think that the minister's predecessor acted in a very responsible manner in not doing unnecessary damage to the work that had been put in place by the metric commission, but rather represented the people of this country and represented one of the matters that was causing extreme alienation in more than one region in Canada. I should like him to please understand that I think I acted in a most responsible manner in this whole matter and did not do anything negative to damage any area that had progressed beyond the point of retreat.

Thank you for allowing me to say that, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I think at this point I must remind the House that we are in fact going well into debate, even to the point that members are expressing opinions as to the efficacy of those who now have responsibility or held responsibility before. I do want to remind the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), while thanking him for his remarks, that it seems to me he is essentially dissatisfied with the answer he got to a question he addressed to a minister during the question period. He knows that he cannot debate that matter under the guise of a question of privilege.

The subject is important. Everybody has recognized the importance and the seriousness of the subject and I am sure the House will at some time want to debate it. I am entirely in the hands of the House as to the time at which it would want to do so.

In support of my ruling that it is not a question of privilege I should like to refer to what Mr. Lamoureux, one of my predecessors, said in similar circumstances, circumstances that do arise very frequently in the House. He said that a member who essentially is not satisfied with an answer that he received to a question obviously does not have a question of privilege. He went on to say:

The hon. member, with his long experience in the House—

I think that would also apply to the hon. member for Red Deer.

—knows that he cannot rise on an alleged question of privilege to make reference to an answer which has been given in the House. The hon. member may be dissatisfied with the answer that has been given and he may feel there is a contradiction. He is entitled to his opinion about such matters, but this cannot be raised by way of a question of privilege.

Therefore I must rule, having heard this discussion at length, that there is no question of privilege.

MR. FORRESTALL—SHIPYARD CONTRACTS—NOTICE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE TO BE RAISED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise to give notice that, after some review of the electronic and printed record of the proceedings in this chamber, I reserve the right to rise on a question of privilege next week, a question of privilege arising out of a question posed by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Leduc) to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) in respect of ship repair and shipbuilding activity in Canada.

I regret that the Minister of National Defence is not present in the House, but so that he will have time to reconsider his reply, the area that I will be discussing is with regard to the implication in his reply to the hon. member for Richelieu—and I hope that I am quoting the minister correctly; I apologize if I am not— that Quebec shipyards would be favoured over other "Canadian yards" for contracts rising out of Department of National Defence requirements for fleet replacement programs and for ongoing government contracts, government account awards for building and repair.

The question of privilege which I will be pursuing is whether or not the government has the right to extend special favours in this particular area in light of the principle of tendering, and in light of the action already taken by the government with respect to the military fleet replacement program, such as the invitation of proposals to a number of interests in Canada with respect to this matter and, finally, the implication of the reply to what was very obviously a blatantly staged question, the effect of which was to buy shipyard workers in Quebec back to the No-side of the referendum.

The very important question is whether or not the government has infringed upon acceptable good business practices in suggesting to the Canadian shipbuilding industry on the west coast, the Great Lakes and the east coast that they need not waste their time, effort and money any longer to prepare tenders and estimates for shipyard work on building, repair, overhaul, maintenance and tenders of that nature.

Order Paper Questions

I would ask your indulgence, Madam Speaker, to allow me to reread the minister's response so that there is no question of misinterpretation of my words or those of the minister in response to the question put by the hon. member for Richelieu.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURES TO AMEND

Hon. Charles Lapointe (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be now read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: It is my pleasure today to present before this House for second reading Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. In essence, Madam Speaker, this bill will extend the Small Businesses Loans Act for two years and, by so doing, will become part of the reaffirmation of this government's commitment to support small businesses in Canada.

As you probably know, Madam Speaker, the Small Businesses Loans Act originally came into force on January 19, 1961 to make it easier for small businesses in Canada to obtain term financing. A major feature of this program is that loans are made directly between the borrower and the lender without any prior approval of the government. The government simply guarantees a loan transaction which takes place in the private sector and in this way supports and builds on the strength of the financial community. Since 1961 the act has been subject to legislative review on a regular basis and amendments have been made over this period of time to widen the scope of operations under the act.

At present, Mr. Speaker, loans may be made for (1) the purchase of fixed or movable equipment, (2) the improvement or modernization of premises, (3) the purchase or construction of new premises, and (4) the purchase of land.

These loans are granted in accordance with standard lending procedures and are fully secured. The maximum period over which they can be repaid is ten years.

[English]

Since 1961 almost 65,000 loans have been made, to a total value of over $1 billion. These totals are a clear indication that the Small Businesses Loans Act is an important source of financing for small businesses. The program has been growing very rapidly in recent years. In 1979 alone, over $250 million in loans was guaranteed by the government, fully one quarter of the total $1 billion lent over the entire history of the program.

The program has a broad national impact and it has steadily gained acceptance by the financial community. A breakdown by province of the total value of loans made in 1978 shows that 24 per cent were made in British Columbia, 18 per cent were made in the other western provinces, 12 per cent were made in Ontario, 39 per cent were made in Quebec and 7 per cent were made in the maritime provinces.

As for lender participation, the program was originally established to operate almost exclusively through the chartered banks and to encourage the banks to do more lending to small businesses in Canada. Since the inception of the program, however, participation by lenders has expanded. At this time, participant lenders include not only the chartered banks but also trust companies, mortgage and savings companies, credit unions and the Alberta treasury branches.

The bill before us, Mr. Speaker, proposes various changes and does two things. First of all, it amends the present act which has been in force since July 1, 1977 and is due to expire on June 30, 1980, and furthermore it amends and extends the act for an additional two-year period, from July 1, 1980 to June 30, 1982.

First, the bill amends the act so that the authorized lending ceiling which was established for the period from July 1, 1977 to June 30, 1980, is increased from $600 million to $675 million.

Mr. Speaker, when this act was last before this House it was extended for a three-year period. It was thought that a lending ceiling of $600 million would be sufficient to cover the three-year period. This amount has proved to be insufficient. With the growth of the program which I have already described, lending is rapidly approaching the $600 million ceiling. Bill C-17 proposes therefore that the ceiling for the present act be increased from $600 million to $675 million so that all of the borrowing which is required by small business will be accommodated under the terms of the present act which expires on June 30, 1980.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-17 extends the Small Businesses Loans Act for a two-year period, from July 1, 1980, to June 30, 1982.

It has been usual in the past to extend the act for a three-year period. This year, however, the government is undertaking an intensive review of all of its financing support programs for small business. This review will be complete in the coming months at which time the government will be coming forward with comprehensive proposals for small business financing. Therefore a more normal three-year extension seems to me inappropriate at this time, Mr. Speaker, whereas a shorter two-year extension will more closely coincide with the conclusion of the government's review of its small business financing.

That is the main reason for the two-year extension, Mr. Speaker. I will return to make mention of the review by the government of the financing and of its support programs for small business at the conclusion of my remarks.

Now, I want to spell out the main amendments which are to be made to the act.

[English]

Most importantly, the limit on the size of individual loans has been increased from $75,000 to $100,000. This increase is absolutely necessary in view of the steadily growing demand for more and larger loans and in view of inflation. While inflation has hit hard at all of us in the business community, it has hit hardest at the small businessman and businesswoman. These smaller companies, Mr. Speaker, are less able than larger companies to defend themselves and to protect the viability of their companies. In this respect one of the real benefits of this program is that smaller companies can borrow at 1 per cent over prime, a rate which is considerably better than they would be otherwise able to obtain for the purposes which are eligible under the act.

As an additional amendment, Mr. Speaker, a new lending ceiling has been proposed for the two-year period of extension. Whereas the present ceilling will be $675 million for the three-year period ending on June 30, 1980, the new ceiling will be $850 million for the extended two-year period from July 1, 1980, to June 30, 1982. The fact, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed new ceiling is considerably higher than the previous one, even though it will cover a shorter time period, is very clear evidence both of the growing requirement for small business borrowing and the government's willingness to meet this requirement.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the act has been amended to take account of the fact that administration of the program has been transferred from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This transfer is a natural one, as it puts the Small Businesses Loans Act into a department which has a mandate to work closely with and service the needs of small business.

Now that I have outlined the major points of Bill C-17, Mr. Speaker, I would like to return briefly to the government's review of financing support programs for small business.

As this House is aware, the government makes available a wide array of financial support for the deserving small business community. For example, the Federal Business Development Bank has been serving the needs of small business since 1944. The bank has established offices all over Canada and at this time has approximately $2 billion in loans outstanding. The FBDB in recent years has also been supplying venture capital to small businesses. In addition to the bank, the enterprise development program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce supports a large number of loans to small business and their activity has been furthered by wide decentralization of the program. Last year the program provided approximately $140 million in loan insurance and $90 million in grants.

In addition, financial support is provided to small business through the lower corporate tax rate for smaller firms, and the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion operates financial programs which support small business.

Aside from these federal government initiatives, the provinces have established support programs for small businesses and the private sector has greatly increased its term lending efforts in support of small business, especially in recent years.

In view of all of these activities, the government has undertaken, over the coming months, to review its own programs so that they might better complement other programs, be they provincial or in the private sector.

[English]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government during the course of the review to seek the views of the financial community, the small business community and the provincial governments. We expect that such consultation will provide the government with the kind of broadly based advice and analysis which will be necessary to establish the best possible financial support policy for small businesses in the years ahead. Mr. Speaker, this is a vital task. I am sure that my predecessor and members of his party as well as my colleagues in the New Democratic Party will also be most willing to advise me on the best ways and means at the disposal of the government to put in place the best programs for small businesses in Canada.

As I said, this is a vital task and it is being done in the knowledge that the health and vitality of the small business sector is of great and lasting importance to the over-all health of the Canadian economy.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that it is a pleasure to follow my successor. I would dearly have loved to continue much of the work I had started as minister of state for industry and small business, but I am encouraged by the opening remarks of the minister to note that some of the very fundamental work and much of the very detailed discussion and intercourse that was going on between the ministry, members of Parliament on both sides, the small business secretariat and, indeed, at the various levels in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is being continued.

We on this side will have no problem supporting Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act as initiated today in second reading debate by the minister. We are pleased to see that the amount has been lifted from $75,000 to $100,000, which is really nothing more than indexing to account for inflation. Even if we examine the additional expansion therein, it is just keeping the bill in touch and within practical limits of the diminishing use or value of the monetary system, or the money within our monetary system.

I sometimes wonder if it would not be a little simpler and a less heavy workload for the House if we acknowledged that and allowed the bill to adjust to the inflation component.

We will not be opposing this bill, Mr. Speaker, but I take this opportunity, as will some of my colleagues, to offer a few comments in the whole area of small business and government assistance available to the small and medium enterprises.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.01 p.m. the House took recess.

• (1400)

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the house rose at one o'clock the motion on second reading of Bill C-19, an act to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, was then under consideration. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) had the floor.

My apologies to hon. members. I had the wrong form in my hand and that was the reason for my hesitation. When the House rose at one o'clock, Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, was then under debate.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I am glad my colleagues had that straightened out because I did not have my notes here regarding Bill C-19. It would have made quite a difference.

I was interrupted at one o'clock at the beginning of my remarks concerning the bill amending the limit and the area of responsibility for the Small Businesses Loans Act. I would like to put on the record a few comments and observations about the act, and perhaps the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) might take note of these and, in his windup, reply to a question or two.

The Small Businesses Loans Act can, I think, be said to be a very successful program of financial aid to the small business community. As the Minister of State for Small Businesses has said, since it was taken from a ceiling interest rate to a 1 per cent over prime rate, the use of it has expanded dramatically in the private sector.

It has been a very inexpensive program to operate and the losses have never been higher than 0.42 per cent of average loans outstanding. Perhaps it is not generally known to members that the formula virtually removes all risk from the large lenders of these loans in that the government guarantees 95 per cent of the first $125,000 of loans made, 50 per cent of the next $125,000, and 10 per cent of the balance of loans made. This really represents an effective 100 per cent guarantee for the larger lenders.

I am glad to see that the amendment is to bring the dollar ceiling up to something that offsets the deterioration that has taken place in the value of our dollar as a result of the inflationary pressures on our economy.

One of the disappointing things that we might make note of, which the minister might reply to, is the fact that one of the real needs as we study the financial requirements and the changing conditions of the small and medium-sized enterprise sector is working capital. Too often the pressure on working capital or the use of liquidity within the small and medium-sized enterprise units of our economy is for fixed plant or equipment, covering losses, or for unforeseen poor accounts. That is an area where there is serious pressure. I think, when the minister says that the time has come for a total review of the financial needs of the small and medium-sized enterprise sectors, that working capital requirements should be a major part of that review. Also, perhaps the Small Businesses Loans Act might be widened to include working capital in the future. At the moment, working capital is not a part of its terms of reference. We would be wise as members of Parliament representing that important community to have a good look at that as we review this whole matter of financial programs for the business community.

Once again I would like to put on the record the importance of the small and medium-sized enterprise sector to the economy and why the review that the Minister of State for Small Businesses mentioned and suggested is so necessary. The small businesses secretariat did a very fine piece of work extracting information from income tax data. On 1,075,000 businesses in Canada, 325,000 were incorporated businesses and 750,000 were unincorporated. Ninety-nine per cent of these businesses have annual sales of less than $2 million; 429,000 of the unincorporated businesses were self-employed professionals.

The total sales of all of the businesses in Canada were $392.2 billion in the year 1976. Of that, the incorporated sector of the business community sold $347.6 million, the unincorporated sector, $44.6 billion. It is interesting to note that 28 per cent of the total sales came from businesses with less than $2 million in annual sales; it is this area which the small business secretariat tries to study and watch over, advising members of Parliament what is needed in that area and which forces for change are coming into play. That is a very important component of our industrial community.

About 225,000 of the unincorporated businesses have sales of less than $10,000 and, believe me, that is within the category of small business. That is what the budget of the former government was trying to do in allowing spouse deductibility in the unincorporated business sector. It would have allowed very considerable relief to that sector. That was an important initiative and I should like to see it carried through.

The business contribution to the gross national product in 1976 was 42 per cent. Thirty per cent of the business component of the gross national product originated from firms with less than $2 million in annual sales. Fifty-five per cent of the business component of the gross national product originated from firms with less than $20 million in annual sales. That left government institutions, financial institutions, hospitals and the like, making up 58 per cent of the gross national product. I am putting this on record because it is important we get a feeling which will provide support of the Minister of State for small businesses and to the small business secretariat, and draw attention to a need which hon. members will have to regard with increasing concern.

Within the community I have described, total employment amounts to 6.6 million persons according to the 1976 statistics. Businesses with sales of less than $2 million employed 2.5 million people or were responsible for 42 per cent of business employment. Businesses with sales of less than $20 million, which brings us to the small and medium-sized enterprise sector, employed 4.1 million people, or were responsible for 66 per cent of business employment in 1976.

I put this on record again to outline the impact and the importance of these matters and these instruments and of the study which the Minister of State has told us is part of an ongoing process. It is to that study and to that financial review that I should like to address some remarks. Before doing so, however, there is one other point I wish to raise and I would appreciate hearing the minister's remarks with regard to it.

As the small businesses loans legislation has expanded—the minister told us about this in his opening remarks—outside the basic group of chartered banks, and has gone out to include credit unions and other lending institutions, I should like the minister to tell us whether he is aware of any change in his liability under this act. I have in mind the nature of the loan, the credit review, the type of institution which is now embraced by the legislation and which has probably opened up a pattern of activity which has not been reflected in practices to date by the larger, more conservative institutions. I, at any rate, would appreciate knowing whether the minister is aware of any change in the minister's liability as a result of the expansion of the program.

The minister told us a financial review was taking place related to all aspects of financial programs affecting the community I have described in my remarks. There is the Small Businesses Loans Act, the act we are amending today; there is the Small Loans Act, an entirely different measure and which perhaps does not touch on the business community other than with regard to accounts receivable. There is the Federal Business Development Bank with regard to which I had the opportunity of explaining my feelings in depth during the debate on Bill C-4 in the Thirty-first Parliament.

I am sure that the Federal Business Development Bank is sweating it out right now and in need of financial relief in light of the very high cycle of interest rates we are going through. I would think that the increasing rate of bankruptcies has been creating a magnitude of change in terms of their liquidity and in terms of pressure upon their accumulated surplus. We would, perhaps, like to be aware of the extent of this pressure. If the minister could advise as to the change that the last 90 days have brought, and the pressures it has placed upon the Federal Business Development Bank, those of us who are interested would much appreciate the information.

In addition to the extensive work of the Federal Business Development Bank in this field, we have the adjustment assistance programs of the enterprise development under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. One of the things I found frustrating as minister of state for industry and small businesses in the former government was the magnitude of dollars which my colleague responsible for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion had at his disposal in his dealings with his provincial counterparts, or with industrial counterparts in the provinces, in terms of programs of assistance to the business community. So we have all these different activities going on, different departments all making their play for this audience which is described in the 1976 statistics. If there is one thing which needs co-ordination so as to bring about effectiveness in the use of resources and in the use of the program, it is this area which I have described.

I am very pleased the minister intends to continue the work in place in the department in bringing about the review of which he spoke. In my view, a basic change of structure is needed to assist the minister because, so far, we in Canada are reacting in what amounts to knee-jerk fashion to political pressures which accompany lobbying by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and so forth.

Now that we have defined the audience and the importance of that audience in the Canadian economy, it behoves both sides of the House to move in on a structure which will serve that community more efficiently and will allow them to use the resources at the disposal of Parliament more effectively. In that review I would like to suggest and submit that perhaps the government should give consideration—or perhaps the minister of state can carry this forward to cabinet—to a standing committee of the House on industry and small business at which the constituency described and now defined could have a platform and a means of communicating with their elected representatives, and particularly with the bureaucracy responsible for the activities and subactivities within the various departments.

Having studied in some detail and debated the proper vehicle through which the industrial community could best be served—or this end of the spectrum of the industrial community—one looks at and studies in some depth the small business act of the United States which has built a massive bureaucracy, put in place programs, has got itself all caught up in definitions within each category, and has indeed become a very cumbersome situation.

If one then moves over into Europe and the European Common Market countries, one will find that the co-ordinating role of the secretariat and the advocacy of the secretariat are being enhanced, but that role in itself can be quite frustrating to the staff within the department. They really do not have the clout that is necessary for the constituency—the statistics I put on the record—really demands and needs. I am sure my colleagues on this side of the House would assist and probably push for a vehicle such as a standing committee on industry and small business which would be able to assist that department and the outside community in co-ordinating the programs and improving the communication between ourselves as elected representatives, members of the business community and the various associations and lobby groups and the bureaucracy, because if there was one thing I found frustrating in the short period in which I had the privilege of serving my country as minister of state, it was the difficulty I had in moving between departments.

I could get an understanding and a working arrangement going within my area of responsibility, but it was extremely difficult to move that progress through the other departments within the bureaucratic structure, and I think a standing committee of the House would aid immeasurably in the efficient delivery of programs to the business community.

In addition, I am troubled about the ability of the political process, or this process, to communicate the needs and the feelings and the studies from organizations like chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and the various groups which study and gather up the inputs, feelings, wants and wishes of the community. I think the struggle that we, as elected representatives, are facing, is the will of the wealth-creating community outside—those people who are engaged in wealth-creating activity and in adding to the value of goods which, after all, create all the payrolls, cash flow and taxes upon which the consolidated revenue fund can finance programs—that the decision-making base be spread more widely where that community can have an incentive to direct its capital and its energies into certain directions.

To me, research and development crystalize the struggle which is going on. I believe the bureaucrats—and I speak respectfully when I use that term—within two or three departments of government naturally want to keep control unto themselves in terms of research and development, in terms of incentive programs and in terms of venture capital programs, rather than deliver tax points to the community whereby there is an incentive to make a decision to spend a particular block of money in a particular area of risk. That is the debate I would like to see enhanced, and I do not know of what forum it can be developed in other than the standing committee on industry and small business which I am proposing here as a result of the opportunity I had to spend some time studying this area of activity.

Basically the bureaucrat feels that there is more efficiency in delivering research and development incentives through programs than through tax points. I come from that industrial sector out there, and I can tell hon. members that I have not time to come through the paper work and the screening process for those programs, but if I had 125 per cent, I could have a board of directors' meeting and we could decide that the risk of doing something new that would add to the payrolls and wealth of this country was compensated in that 25 per cent factor. Then those decisions could be made across the land by the decision makers who, after all, are gambling their own working capital and their own savings, and to me that is an issue which I think we have to address, and perhaps we could challenge the desire for programs which many of our friends within the bureaucracy have.

I think what I have just mentioned is one of the causes of frustration within that industrial community, and I think again—I am sorry to repeat myself—that such a committee could do much to diffuse that level of frustration and improve the feeling and the spirit of communication between the three forces.

One of the other things that I found, I suppose while in office and particularly since being in office, is the lack of awareness that the small business community and the medium-sized enterprise sector have in terms of the government programs which are available, and I was going to bring into the House a stack of literature, the ABCs, all of the beautiful literature of the Federal Business Development Bank and the case counselling service, and all of the programs which have to do with each aspect of accounting or procurement in the small business sector.

All of this magnificant material has been put together in very well designed presentations, and yet there is a major lack of awareness within the community. I know that the Federal Business Development Bank has small business seminars. One can see university after university and institution after institution now putting on small business seminars, but the lack of awareness of what is available is another matter I would like to see addressed, and I use the opportunity in this debate on the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act to make the minister aware that we should again perhaps be in a committee addressing this awareness problem and seeing what can be done to make a more efficient and effective use of the material that is available.

One of the emerging needs in the review on finance that I have seen is the need for risk capital. It is a case now of moving any liquidity over into safer instruments and investments, or giving out some kind of an incentive which protects the high after-tax dollar cost of that type of capital in areas of risk.

I have mentioned working capital, and the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario—and I believe B.C. and one of the other provinces; not yet, the minister says—are moving in this area of vehicles for venture capital. There is potential for some abuse there, but I think anything that can move our conservative after tax savings dollars into risk areas of business, with tax shelter protection, would be an initiative that the minister of state could take, and it would have wide and great support from the community at large in Canada.

I have mentioned research and development policies and programs. We debated extensively through the Thirtieth Parliament, and if the minister cares to look into the files, he will find extensive studies on research and development programs and policies which really have to be delivered to that industrial community if we are going to keep the Canadian industrial plant modern and effective and at highly optimal levels of production efficiency. Too many of the government programs I saw when in office—and which I am sure the minister will see—are running after industries which, because of obsolescence, old plant, or emerging technologies in other countries, really cannot compete in the global marketplace.

Tied in with this is the General Agreement on Trades and Tariffs and the phasing out of tariff protection for industries. I suggest that part of that review must be a change in attitude, a change in the use of the government resource from a protective attitude toward industries that are now obsolete in the global market place to delivering programs of front-end benefit and incentive which will allow us to put the highest technology of the world in place within Canada, within the Canadian industrial community, so that we can compete against global efficiency and labour in other parts of the world where there is a lower standard of living and perhaps not the burden of environmental protection that we demand of ourselves.

These are all areas which I do not think this community, through its elected representatives, is debating, and that is one of the reasons why I urge all members of the House to support the call for the establishment of a standing committee on industry and small business where these studies could get wider recognition and more input. Perhaps the combination of programs and tax points could reduce the frustration level which exists, and we could start delivering and creating an awareness of those industrial sectors that need assistance, because that is where the future is and where the payrolls will be tomorrow.

I am seriously concerned at the extent of the resource that we are delivering in protecting what is obviously obsolete. A classic example, I think, is the auto pact crisis which we in this country face today. We knew a decade ago that there had to be product design and product change and that environmental legislation would be coming soon, that we were going to be an energy short continent and that we could not carry on wasting in the way we were. Yet we allowed ourselves to continue blindly building cars with V8 engines, the high horsepower gas burner, while the United States was quietly putting in place the energy-efficient car. Now we have reversed the flow and caused a trade inversion in this country that is of crisis proportion.

If we are going to provide aid to these industrial areas, I think we should provide aid, programs and tax points only in those areas where the product fits the need of the people and of the continent for the decade ahead, where its fits into an energy efficient demand, where we are not protecting that which deserves to be flushed out by the market system, but rather where we are delivering something that can have a market mandate in the global market at large, particularly on the North American continent.

These are some of the problems that I have seen, and now I would like to close with one other in the financial area of the SME sector. Much of the Canadian dollar, through our Registered Retirement Savings Plans, ends up in pension funds in RRSPs, and in the financial institutions which require a secure covenant of safety. There is a financial vehicle that we have been trying to get through three departments of the government, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the insurance branch, and the Department of Finance. There is a vehicle which would allow a covenant to be given to lending institutions which would permit money from those institutions to be fully secured to the lender and yet made available to the business community in amounts of $500,000 to $5 million, in 15 to 30-year terms at interest rates below prime.

As I close my remarks here today, I make a plea that the bureaucracy really hear the message because there is a source of funding for the industrial community which lies dormant in these funds and in their security, and which could be made available to the industrial community, relieving the financial pressures which exist if a co-insured first-class covenant could be given to the lending institutions.

One thing that shocks me in the hold up of that vehicle is the fact that the federal government, or its advisers, fails, in its narrow definition of qualified lenders, to take into account such funds as workmen's compensation funds in the provinces, the Alberta Heritage fund, and pension funds from Crown corporations. I think there should be an open mind with regard to them so that that financial resource can be delivered to the industrial community and so that we can get on with building a first-class industrial plant, industries that can compete on an efficient, optimal basis in the global marketplace so that we can truly be ready as a country for the era ahead that the GATT agreement is bringing on us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the proposed amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act which would raise the ceiling on the amount of money a small business may have outstanding under the act from $75,000 to $100,000, that would increase the amount that may be guaranteed under the act to $850 million, and extend the act for a two-year period until June 30, 1982.

I support this bill with reservations since the benefits accruing to small business under this act have been more than eroded through the government's monetary policy of maintaining high interest rates in Canada.

Bill C-17 is indeed an insult, not only to the Canadian small businessmen but to Canadians as a whole. It creates the impression that this government is prepared to act and do something for the small business community when, in fact, it is doing very little for Canada's small entrepreneurs. This was misused opportunity, for with this bill the government could have initiated measures which guaranteed to resurrect and build confidence throughout our business community at a time when economic expansion and entrepreneurship are at a very low level indeed. Now we have lost this opportunity to build faith and confidence in our country since the business community is disappointed and dejected with the contents of this bill. They were expecting so much more.

This bill does nothing to assist the small businessman, and it comes at a time when serious, thoughtful, rational changes are required in our economic structure and in our economic system. In their hearts, Canadians know the present system is inadequate. Canadians know that we are an incredibly rich country with unlimited and unimaginable opportunities, coupled with a young, dynamic, creative and talented people, yet facing such serious problems and difficulties as exist in our country today.

Hon. members to my right, as well as members across the way, tell us that we live in a country committed to the principles of free enterprise and competition. I am afraid this is an illusion, this is a dream. Canadians believe that if an industry is competitive, then we can expect to get a better choice of products in the marketplace and obtain them at lower prices. There exists extensive empirical evidence to support this belief, so long as the conditions for competition do, in fact, exist. However, the reality of the Canadian economy is very different from this competitive model. The key industrial sectors of the Canadian economic system are dominated by a small number of large corporations, and if we recognize that many of these corporations are branch plants of foreign business operations, then we begin to place the structure of the Canadian economy in its appropriate international context.

I am certain that my colleagues in the House are aware of the extent of corporate concentration in the Canadian economy. No one can look back over the holes left in the economic landscape by the wave of corporate takeovers since the royal commission tabled its report on corporate concentration and fail to realize that our economy is undergoing dramatic and far-reaching structural changes, changes that are not necessarily in the best interests of Canadians.

It is not insignificant that a very key question was left out of the terms of reference of the Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration. That key question is: how has federal government policy contributed to and accelerated the process of corporate concentration in Canada? Or, to put it another way, how has the federal government contributed to the erosion of competitive enterprise in this country and as a result placed many small businessmen in an unfair competitive position?

Is it any wonder that, for decades, big business, and often foreign business, has exercised undue influence on the formation of economic policy in Canada? The current economic crisis has brought this to the attention of all Canadians, but to none more forcefully than those employed in small business. For it is here, in the small business sector, that the conditions for competition exist and the competitive forces of the market place have their greatest impact. For decades the government has ignored this vital sector of our economy. Only last year it finally got around to publishing its first major statistical review of small business. Using the criteria of sales less than $2 million to define small and more than $20 million to define big, the following picture of business in Canada emerged. I should like to refer to a few specific points in that review.

In 1976 there were 628,000 small businesses in Canada representing 97 per cent of all businesses. The 2,000 largest businesses in Canada represent less than one half of 1 per cent of all businesses. Small businesses account for nearly 28 per cent of total business sales. In terms of employment, small businesses account for approximately 40 per cent of the Canadian labour force.

A recent study by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business indicates that small businesses have created more than 50 per cent of new jobs outside the government sector since 1971. But small business is vital to the Canadian economy for other reasons. While 48 per cent of big business in Canada is foreign-owned, over 96 per cent of small business is Canadian-owned. I emphasize Canadian-owned and Canadian-operated. Small business in Canada is an expression of the Canadian character, and extension of Canada's energetic and imaginative people, representing their hopes, dreams, aspirations and concerns for the future.

The decision to go into business in Canada is a decision to take one's future into one's own hands. It involves risk, frustration, and great deal of hard work. When we talk of small business in Canada, certainly we are not talking about a faceless and soulless corporation, but indeed of people. Small business is a people business, and we must do everything possible to nurture, encourage and support it.

Small business has been hit especially hard in the present economic crisis. The uncertainties associated with the 1970s have contributed to a marked increase in the number of business failures. Commercial bankruptcies in the first two months of 1980 were up nearly 25 per cent over the same period last year. Bankruptcy experts estimate that at least 75 per cent of failures occur among small businesses. Just this afternoon I had the opportunity over lunch to meet with two visiting businessmen from my own riding. One businessman owned a small clothing store and the other businessman represented a small contracting firm. Both of these individuals are on the brink of bankruptcy. The high interest rates, and the monetary policy which is perpetuated and supported by the present government, have driven these entrepreneurs to the edge.

In the face of the current downturn, this bill to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act betrays a colossal failure on the part of the government. It will do virtually nothing to ease the burden on small businesses in Canada. The increase in the loan ceiling from $75,000 to $100,000 proposed in this bill, once one takes into account the inflation over the past three years, represents no increase at all in real borrowing power. In 1979 less than 3 per cent of the value of all small business loans were guaranteed under the Small Businesses Loans Act. There are a number of reasons for this which the legislation does not even begin to address.

For example, guaranteed loans can only be used for purchase or expansion of plant, equipment or land. Loans cannot be used to provide working capital which, of course, is one of the most important capital requirements of the small businessman, the small entrepreneur. The final decision to extend a loan rests by and large with Canadian chartered banks. They have been reluctant to use this act because of the limits placed on the interest that can be charged. Why charge prime plus 1 per cent if one can get prime plus 3 per cent? In fact the chartered banks have a vested interest in not supporting this program throughout the land.

Small businesses have indicated that branch managers in the chartered banks and other lending agencies are either reluctant to talk about the Small Businesses Loans Act or are not familiar with the program, or at least they say that they are not familiar with it. The one exception to this is the heavier use of the plan by the Banque Canadienne Nationale in Quebec. We hope the minister has received commitments from the chartered banks and other lending agencies that they will actively participate in the small business loans program, and if he has not received such a commitment, we hope that he actively seeks one.

Also I feel it is important to point out that less than $500 million will be available under the Small Businesses Loans Act each year. In fact this is only a small fraction of the $9 billion borrowed by small businesses in the year 1979. As one of my hon. colleagues mentioned previously, it does not address one of the serious problems facing entrepreneurs, that is, the lack of information. Some method must be found to enable potential investors or businessmen to be more aware of the existing 400 programs of interest to them.

The real failure to provide leadership, not only in the area of small business but to the Canadian economy as a whole, is the shortsighted and misguided monetary policy which has left small business and the economy in general saddled with record-high interest rates. When the prime interest rate is 16.75 per cent, the few benefits provided by the Small Businesses Loans Act cease to be meaningful.

Short-term, simplistic, cosmetic legislation such as the Small Businesses Loans Act which we are debating today would not be needed if the government had, in the past, provided responsible leadership in implementing a sound long-term industrial strategy for Canada. High interest rates, a record balance of payments deficit, and an unprecedented federal government deficit, all point to a colossal failure to fulfil the public trust.

In travelling about the country I have had the opportunity to speak with large and small groups of businessmen about the problems which they are currently facing. I hope the hon. minister and his government will be introducing legislation during this session which will address some of the serious problems mentioned previously in this discussion.

I have yet to discuss and examine the throttling impact that government red tape has on the small businessman. The paper requirements of the federal government have placed the small businessman in a very difficult position and have resulted in undue stress and frustration, as well as placing added personnel costs on his accounts book. Also I should like to remind the minister that at present a corporate tax system exists which treats small businesses differently than large businesses. The present tax system actually discriminates against small business by imposing higher effective tax rates on small businesses than on larger corporations.

In closing, I feel compelled to relate to this House an incident which occurred in my riding of Kamloops-Shuswap during the last election campaign. During that campaign I emphasized the fact that, of the three federal political parties, only one consistently and actively supports the concept of fair and equitable individual enterprise and fair and free individual initiative in the marketplace. I suggest that party is the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: The hon. member for York-Peel, the former president of the treasury board, campaigning in my riding challenged this point publicly and suggested that the voters in the Kamloops-Shuswap area would ultimately decide which party supports the concept of fair enterprise and individual initiative. May I suggest that the voters of Kamloops-Shuswap did just that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, hon. members, it is certainly my pleasure to speak to Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, which has been brought forward by my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe). The minister has outlined the details of Bill C-17, and he has also briefly outlined the general purposes and the history of the Small Businesses Loans Act. In addition, he has outlined the government's intention to work with the financial community, the small business community and the provincial governments in preparing a complete review of the government's financial support programs for small businesses.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) for his constructive remarks in relation to this review and to the amendments to the act presented here today.

I would like to refer ever so briefly to comments of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), and refer specifically to the drop in interest rates that took place for the last two consecutive weeks since the opening of this Thirty-second Parliament. I feel this reflects confidence in the government and it is an indicator that the proposals outlined in the Speech from the Throne are quite proper and correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ferguson: In speaking to Bill C-17 I would like to add some comments on the coverage provided by the program. The Minister of State for Small Businesses has already referred to the broad national impact of the program as witnessed by its regional coverage and the very wide and growing participation by a variety of financial institutions.

In addition to this coverage, a broad range of types of businesses are supported through the Small Businesses Loans Act. I submit at this time that this is an act that covers all of Canada, whether it be the small towns and villages in the rural sector or the small businesses in the cities across this nation. It is vital to the sustenance of the small business community from coast to coast.

Statistics for 1978 show, for example, that of the total value of loans in that year, wholesale trade accounted for 4.1 per cent, transportation accounted for 8.6 per cent, construction accounted for 9.9 per cent, manufacturing accounted for 14 per cent, retail trade accounted for 26.6 per cent, and service businesses accounted for 35.9 per cent.

It can be seen that the Small Businesses Loans Act provides broad coverage of types of businesses, many of which are traditionally in the small business category. It does not include two additional types of small businesses, farming and fisheries, but they are supported by two other special federal government programs; first of all under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and secondly, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. As announced in the Speech from the Throne, both of these acts will also be brought forward for renewed consideration by the government in the very near future.

In the course of presentation of Bill C-17 I think it is important to note the philosophy which underpins not only the Small Businesses Loans Act but also all the other federal government debt-financing programs.

A basic premise behind all federal government debt-financing programs is that they should complement rather than compete with private sources of loan capital. This is more than just a philosophical stance in respect of the roles of the private and public sectors. It is based on the realization that the government can be most effective by working with the private financial institutions to make better use of the very extensive delivery systems that are already in place in the private sector. For this reason, the success of the Small Businesses Loans Act should be measured not only in terms of the volume of business undertaken, but also, and perhaps just as important, in terms of its success in stimulating private lenders to expand both the form and volume of financing to small businesses.

The Small Businesses Loans Act is in keeping with this philosophy. It is a program which has been administered effectively with as little government involvement as is possible. All of the transactions between borrowers and lenders takes place within the private sector with the government acting only as a guarantor.

We all know that this cannot always be the case, but there are good reasons behind the government which has also established direct lending and grant programs. The programs have been established to meet special circumstances which face Canada's ever-growing businesses. Even where direct lending programs are in effect, however, an attempt is made, if at all possible, to involve private lenders as co-financiers. This is as it should be, Mr. Speaker, and I think the small businessmen and small business women of this country would agree with me. They do not want handouts from the government. They want, and only when it is necessary, a boost from the government to assist them in their own efforts to build the businesses. They want to retain their independence and to go about their business as they see fit. The Small Businesses Loans Act is a program which follows this approach.

In concluding my brief remarks on this Small Businesses Loans Act I want to re-emphasize that this program is an important source of financing for small businesses. It provides suppport to thousands of deserving men and women who run businesses which are the backbone of our Canadian economy. I take great pleasure, therefore, in having spoken to this bill.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in the House since it reconvened and I should like to convey to you, sir, my congratulations on your appointment, and ask you to convey to your colleagues, especially Madam Speaker, my best wishes on the duties they have undertaken in this House. I know that all of you will serve the House well. You are all experienced in the operations of the House and we look forward with great pleasure to working with you.

Let me now say a few words about this bill. The small business sector, as we know it, is the largest employer in Canada of our labour force, employing some 6.6 million people. It is something that governments at all levels talk about, federal, provincial and municipal. It is the most difficult area for the federal people to really get involved with because so many of these businesses fall under provincial jurisdiction. When it comes down to it, I suppose it is really the role of the federal government to create an atmosphere in which that small business enterprise can flourish.

I am not that familiar with the new minister of small businesses, and I do not know his background or whether or not he was ever a small businessman. This bill may encourage him to become one in the near future. I feel that the former minister during our government, my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), was probably the first minister, at least since I have been present in this House, who knew what it was to be a small businessman because he has been one for a number of years. The hon. member for Capilano knows what it is like to go out and raise capital, employ people, and to design and devise a product which will sell and earn a profit.

If the present minister of small businesses does not have any business experience, then I hope that he is a good listener because there is much to learn from the small business community, and indeed from the members of this House. As I say, perhaps the minister will be encouraged at some future point to enter the field of business. It is a very fascinating endeavour to undertake.

As the hon. member for Capilano has just said, the problems which the small businessman must face are, to some extent, helped by this bill. One of the major problems that I found with the Small Businesses Loans Act when I have had to deal with it over the past eight years was that most people are of the false belief that the federal government lends the money. They do not understand. It would be a good idea to put out some publicity indicating that the government does not lend the money, but merely guarantees a loan through the bank. But that is an area I will cover in a moment.

Another thing which many people do not understand about the Small Businesses Loans Act is the interest rate which has had a series of strange manipulations over the years. As I recall the original act the rate of interest was 6 per cent. At that time the bank interest rate was 7.5 per cent. Obviously the banks were not interested in loaning money under this act at the lower rate. The bank rate increased to 8 per cent and 9 per cent while the small business loans rate remained at 6 per cent. Then the interest rate under the act changed. I believe that the rate was determined by the yield on a selected series of government bonds which was altered biannually in April and October.

Mr. Knowles: Semi-annually.

Mr. Kempling: At any rate, it was twice a year. However, the bond market dropped, and of course the rate of return on the bonds dropped, leaving the interest rate on small business loans in the same mess that it was in before. At this time hon. members would rise in the House during question period or during speeches and ask the minister of finance, who was John Turner, I believe, why the small businessmen were not able to get a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act and why the banks were playing games with the small businessmen. When these small businessmen would say to the banks, "I would like to borrow some money under the Small Businesses Loans Act", the bank accountant would say, "I've never heard of it". Mr. Turner would answer, "I'm having lunch tomorrow or next week with the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association. I will bring the matter up, and we will see what we can do". Of course, nothing ever happened.

This charade went on year after year, and to some extent is still going on today. In fact the banks at one time, in order to keep the Minister of Finance off their backs for not lending money under the Small Businesses Loans Act, were using the act as a form of a gift to their better accounts. The banks were not helping the small entrepreneur who had a venture capital problem and needed assistance. They were giving loans under the act to their good accounts which paid their bills regularly, kept up their deposits, and had a good record with the bank. In other words, they were using it as a plumb.

The banks would say to these good accounts who were interested in expanding their business under the Small Businesses Loans Act, "Yes, we will get the loan for you because the rate is lower than what we charge on our normal commercial accounts, which will be of some advantage to you". These banks should have been loaning money to businessmen who did not have the necessary collateral to obtain the money in the private sector. For the most part, that charade has disappeared.

I would recommend that the minister speak to the officials of his department and, while I do not like to see more paper, recommend that a pamphlet be printed. It could be entitled, "How to get a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act". The Minister of Finance should lean a little more on the chartered banks and insist that they display these pamphlets on the counters of the branches across the country. This would help a great deal.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Put the minister's picture on it.

Mr. Kempling: When this bill gets to the committee of the whole stage, standing committee, or wherever it is to go, I intend to introduce amendments which cover areas of some concern to me. I am a small businessman, so I know the problems.

Mr. Pepin: Did you say small?

Mr. Kempling: I will get you for that!

I would like to see an amendment which will allow loans under this act to be used for working capital. I would like to see provision within the act to allow for loans to be used to complete research and development projects. Let me expand on that topic for a moment. I have been in and out of big business, small business, and I have worked for multinationals, conglomerates, and I now have my own business. I know what it is all about. The person who turns off the research and development project in a small business is not the engineer or development man but the comptroller, the guy who controls the cheque book. He or she is the one who turns off the cash flow because there are just not enough funds to complete the project.

Most innovations and most of the patents are made by people in the small business field. There should be an amendment in the act to allow for the completion of research and development projects. I would be fair and say that the applicant would have to prove that the amount of money being loaned would in fact complete the project.

The third amendment which I intend to move would allow the Small Businesses Loans Act to register patents on a product, process or device developed in the small business field. Many times a small businessman expends all his money developing a device, process or product, only to find that he needs a good deal more money to register the patent in Canada, the United States, Great Britain, or any country where he wishes to protect his product.

The Small Businesses Loans Act could be used in the acquisition of a patented process, product or device to be used by a small business. The way the market is going today and particularly considering the volatility of foreign exchange, one finds that some in the small business community are in a position to license a product which they are presently importing. This helps their balance of payments problem and helps to develop the whole entrepreneurial level of small business.

If the minister would like to introduce these three amendments, I would be happy to convey them to him for introduction, as long as it is done. That is all I am interested in. Something must be done.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), when he was chairman of the finance committee in a previous parliament, and I went through the Bank Act. I am sure that he will recall section 88 of that act which deals with accepting as collateral raw materials and work in progress. At our in camera committee meeting where we were dealing with the inspector general of banks, we agreed to amend that section of the Bank Act, especially for the small businessman. We felt they should be able to offer their inventories as collateral. I know the minister recalls this because we had a long conversation with the inspector general of banks. He and I finally saw eye to eye and had the act amended. That is the bill that will now come before this House and we appreciate that, because it is going to help the small businessman.

It is the small businesses that employ the bulk of the labour force in this country and contribute the largest amount of the gross national product that is the stabilizer in our economy. When you look at the labour involvement in the small business community at large, you find that they rarely lay people off. Even if the economy turns down, they keep them on because of the difficulties they have in getting and retaining people. One of the ways they retain staff is not to lay them off as some of the larger companies do, when the economy turns down. By adopting that sort of principle or philosophy or strategy—call it what you will—they impart a great deal of stability to our economy. If we can do anything to assist them, Mr. Speaker, and to expand this sector, we will help the economy to flourish and move ahead.

There has been mention of the amount of paper that small businessmen have to deal with. I recall that a previous minister in the small business portfolio of an earlier Parliament set up a committee to examine the problems of the small businessman in dealing with all this paper. I should like to tell you something of the practical difficulties that I faced when I was in business because of the amount of paper that came in. We used to separate the paper into two piles—that from Statistics Canada was piled on one side of the table and that from Revenue Canada was piled on the other side. We knew that we had to pay our taxes, so we always looked after the pile from Revenue Canada. The other pile grew higher and higher and we started getting threatening phone calls from some clerk in Statistics Canada. It became a serious matter for us. With only a small staff, we had to ask ourselves whether we were going out to do some business, to design something, fabricate something, sell something—or were we going to sit down and fill out all these forms, some of which were totally irrelevant to our operation.

I am a very practical person, Mr. Speaker, and I was determined to find a solution to the problem. One day up town I went into a rubber stamp shop and bought a large rubber stamp which said "Not Applicable." I also bought a red stamp pad. Back at the office I stamped this great pile of government forms with "Not Applicable" and sent them all back to Statistics Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: In return I received a computerized letter which said something to the effect that "we are in receipt of flip-flip, your communication on form so and so which we understand is flip-flip not applicable." We duly filed this in our folder and when the repeat form came in we stamped it "not applicable", made a copy of the letter from Statistics Canada and sent it back to them. Mr. Speaker, we cut our paper load by 66 per cent.

I would recommend that to anyone as a method of cutting down on the paper work that comes across his desk from government. Much of it is just so much nonsense.

Mr. Evans: Would you change?

Mr. Kempling: No, I would not change.

Let me move into another area of operation for small businesses, Mr. Speaker. One of the difficulties that small businessmen in this country face is the constant change in the method by which their products are distributed throughout North America. The United States is our largest supplier and we are their largest customer, so there is a tremendous amount of trade back and forth. That applies to Europe to some extent as well.

A series of events have occurred in North America, starting with the imposition of the 10 per cent surcharge that President Nixon put on imports to the United States when that country was having a balance of payments problem. Following that, the United States established DISC, the Domestic International Sales Corporation, the purpose of which was to entice American companies operating overseas to return to the United States, produce their goods there, and then export them.

One of the provisions of the DISC program was that 50 per cent of the profit may be retained by business, tax free, at the pleasure of the president. That meant that the profit on a great deal of export dollars was retained in the business—tax free at the pleasure of the president. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that any president is going to have the courage to rescind that! The program has had a dramatic effect on the conduct of commerce in the small and medium-sized business sector of this country. It has changed the whole method of distribution. In the past a manufacturer built a product, put it in inventory and then shipped from inventory. That is not done today. Now a product comes off the production line and is shipped immediately to the downstream distribution system. This has taken the cost of carrying inventory from the manufacturer and passed it on to the wholesaler and the retailer. The difficulty with this is that in this country our financial system has not responded, and the effect is felt by the small and medium-sized businessses.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister, through you, that I want to see this Small Businesses Loans Act amended to ensure that the funds that are acquired may be used for working capital.

Earlier I mentioned section 88 of the Bank Act which will become section 177 of the new act. It will help as well, because at the present time a small retailer like the one mentioned by an hon. member opposite, a clothing retailer in the throes of bankruptcy, has to pay for his merchandise when he receives it. If he offers it to the bank as collateral, he will only get 30 per cent of its value because the bank will take it under a floating charge. The result is that he is only getting 30 per cent of the value of an asset when it is offered to the bank as collateral.

Through this change in the act we hope that we can help in such cases by having a greater proportion of the value of finished inventory accepted as collateral by the banks so that the small businessman could pay his bills and stay in business.

The record of bankruptcies between 1968 and 1979 is absolutely staggering—the number more than doubled, and I suppose by the end of 1980 it will have tripled. These were all little manufacturing concerns, Mr. Speaker, and the major reason for them going under was the lack of working capital. Someone goes into business, mortgages his house, his cottage, his car, his wife—everything—

An hon. Member: His mother-in-law?

Mr. Kempling: His mother-in-law—anything the bank will take.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How much would he get for his mother-in-law?

Mr. Kempling: That depends! At any rate, he mortgages anything he can to get his business going. Once he does, he thinks it is great and that he is really going to make some money. He gets a large number of orders, but then he has no working capital. That is exactly what happens. You have people who have the initiative to start something, to design something, and to invent something. They get their business going and then run out of funds. What do these people do? They sell out, maybe to their competitor, or they tough it out and go bankrupt. A few of them that are wily enough shake the surface and manage to succeed. So we have to find a series of ways to help this small business sector. Part of this help is here before us.

I commend the minister for introducing this bill. I am not opposed to the Small Businesses Loans Act coming under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). In fact I think that is a step forward and a good thing. Considering when it came under the jurisdiction of the minister of finance, if past experience is any criterion. The businessman will get a better shake from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce than he ever would from the Minister of Finance. At least we will not have to rely on the Minister of Finance having lunch with the chairman of the Canadian Bankers' Association and asking him, "Charlie, can't you help those little guys?". To which Charlie replies, "Well, we are up to the limit of the amount of money we can lend, Mr. Minister. We have done about everything we can", and the thing just falls apart.

One of the great things about our economy is that it is resilient. A lot of that resiliency is in the small business sector. While there is a lot of doom and gloom around, I am not at all pessimistic about the future. I have a great deal of confidence in the business community, and in the small business sector particularly. But these people do need help. They need it now, and they are going to need it for some period of time.

I can only ask the minister to take these remarks into consideration, to give whatever aid and assistance we can to these people, and even if he is not a small businessman himself, as long as he is prepared to listen and take the advice of others, I am sure he will do well in his portfolio.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to say a few words in support of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. I am even more pleased to say a few words on behalf of small business in general.

First, I would like to remind the House that it was our government in a previous Parliament—I believe it was the Thirtieth Parliament—that brought in this very important ministry, the Ministry of State for Small Business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Weatherhead: Frankly, I think the setting up of this ministry was long overdue at that time, but at least around 1977 the government at that time did bring in this ministry to look at the specific interests of small businesses.

I would also like to congratulate the present Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe), and to wish him well in his new portfolio.

I listened with interest to comments of members opposite and, of course, to what the parliamentary secretary had to say. I believe that there is no question the former minister, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), is well known for his commitment to small business in Canada. I believe his comments and suggestions will be well taken by the minister.

I thought the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) perhaps ranged a bit far in some of his comments, but when he was talking about the importance of Canadian small businessmen I agreed with him wholeheartedly.

The hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) made his comments based on suggestions with respect to possible amendments—while it is not up to me to say whether the amendments might be in order on this particular fairly limited type of bill that is before us as far as amending the present bill is concerned—and with regard to the need to look at some of these matters to help small business, and these are well taken and should be considered further.

There is no question that small business, as other speakers have said today, is the life-blood of the Canadian economy. These are the people who make the Canadian economy tick.

I see by my notes that Canadian small business employs more than 2.5 million people representing 40 per cent of the work force in the private sector. However, I remember that the hon. member for Burlington talked in terms of over six million people. But I believe that if we are really talking about 2.5 million it must be because of a very narrow definition of small business, because surely Canadian small business really takes in the bulk of the work force in Canada in one way or another.

A healthy small business community in Canada is the best way that there is to ensure more employment in Canada. These are the people who can and do employ more people when times are good and things are expanding. Therefore we must do everything possible to encourage small business in every way.

In my own borough of Scarborough in eastern Toronto, small business employs most of the people in this borough which has 400,000 people. There are a few big businesses but almost all business in Scarborough is small business of various sizes. New small businesses have been encouraged in recent years in the Scarborough area, particularly by the municipal government. This has been especially so under the leadership of the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) who was mayor of Scarborough during most of the 1970s. However, the financial well-being of small businesses depends very heavily on the economic and fiscal climates of Canada as a whole, as well as particular pieces of legislation that can make financial life a bit easier for Canadian small business.

Bill C-17 is an amendment of one such necessary piece of legislation that will help Canadian small businesses.

We heard from the minister earlier today that the program has been a highly successful one which has been in place since 1961, and it is now quite well accepted by the Canadian financial community.

Private financial markets are doing most of the job in lending the money to small businesses for long-term financing, with automatic federal guarantees on eligible loans. We have heard that since the program started over $1 billion in loans has been guaranteed. Last year alone some $250 million worth of loans was guaranteed.

We have heard the details of the amending bill, the fact that it extends the act for two years, and that the limit to a borrower is being raised to $100,000 and that the aggregate amount of guaranteed loans for the period ending June 30, 1980, has been increased to $675 million. The act also proposes that for the next two-year period to June 30, 1980, a maximum of $850 million be guaranteed.

The jurisdiction changes from being under the Minister of Finance to that of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as far as the main minister is concerned.

I would like to note that extensive review of the financial support programs for small business will be undertaken during the next two years. For example, the programs of the Federal Business Development Bank, the enterprise development fund, and Small Loans Act, which the minister referred to briefly this morning and outlined some of the benefits, will be reviewed. This review may require some substantial amendments at that time as conditions change and opportunities develop in this important sector of our community.

I believe that this review, which the minister undertook this morning and which has been commented on extensively, particularly by the hon. member for Capilano, is probably the most important part of the minister's comments, if I may say so. It is essential, in my view, that the programs of the Federal Business Development Bank, the enterprise development fund and the Small Loans Act be strongly and critically reviewed, and that amendments be proposed, and also that new legislation should be introduced which will make those programs more beneficial and useful for this most important part of the Canadian economy, Canadian small business.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am no expert on the details of small business but I do have a great interest in doing everything possible to help small business in Canada carry the load it is presently bearing.

It is not a new principle that loans guaranteed by government should be advanced to private business. The best example of precedent for this type of legislation is the Farm Improvement Loans Act introduced some 30 years ago which did so much to help farmers improve the efficiency of their operations and increase their incomes as well. In the course of its application, even the banks learned something about agriculture; some bank managers become very proficient and were most helpful to their farm clients.

I am not here to speak against the principle of this legislation. What I am here to do is to suggest the rock upon which it is going to collapse. This rock has been there for many months but we, at this moment in our history as parliamentarians, should see where the danger lies and take the necessary steps to avoid it. My proposals will not require any amendment to the legislation. They will simply require the minister to take power under the regulations and, in arranging the interest rates, to do the things which are necessary to avoid the pitfalls which exist at this moment in monetary and fiscal policy in Canada.

It is obvious I am referring to the fact that we are at a mad moment of economic history in the western world. All the countries in the western world find themselves under the firm control of people advocating monetary philosophy and principles that in fact are wrong. What they learned in school 30 or 40 years ago does not apply to the type of economy we see today in the western industrial world. Without going into a long lecture on this subject I say flatly that every person in this Parliament understands what I am talking about. Last fall we had the ridiculous spectacle in Canada of the Bank of Canada raising interest rates sharply on the grounds that the Americans were raising their interest rates. The Germans are now doing it, so are the Dutch, the Swiss and the Japanese.

We are all in a period of international monetary madness which every single person of common sense in every country knows is madness. It is not enough for us to make that generalized statement. What we have to do as parliamentarians is to use one quality we possess—a quality these brilliant theoretical people of a generation ago are ignoring. And that is common sense. Every one of us can stand up in this House and give horror story after horror story of what has happened to individuals who were called small businessmen—and that includes farmers—in their own constituencies. The rock which has smashed these promising, enterprising businesses has been these unrealistic, highly dangerous interest rates. And all because of a fallacious theory.

A number of hon. members in this chamber sat with us on the finance committee when we questioned the governor of the Bank of Canada and the minister of finance. Those who were present will recall that the governor admitted that the three reasons he had given for following the Americans were not borne out by quantitative evidence. I asked him whether he had the evidence after two years of raising interest rates following the American pattern, that his policy was working, and in each case the record shows that he said no. He was flying by the seat of his pants in heavy clouds with hard, rocky mountains in the clouds. He was trying to direct the plane of monetary policy in a very dangerous situation.

For example, one of the fears of these brilliant minds who guide our destinies in the monetary and fiscal fields in Canada, is that if the dollar drops in value by 1 per cent this will cause increased costs to those in Canada who buy imported goods. That is true. When I questioned the third-last minister of finance—they come pretty fast in this House, as you know, Mr. Speaker—he told us that for every 1 per cent by which the dollar dropped, the cost to people across Canada would probably be one-quarter of 1 per cent. One-quarter of 1 per cent of what? We import about $50 billion worth of goods a year. I cannot work with quarters; it is beyond my mental capacity. Take the figure of 1 per cent, four times greater than the minister of finance mentioned.

If the dollar drops 1 per cent on $50 billion of imported goods it costs all the people of Canada an extra $500 million every year. That is the inflationary lift, cost-push. When I asked the governor of the Bank of Canada what was the total amount of money out on fixed terms of interest in Canada he very kindly sent me a letter containing all the figures. Over $500 billion at any given moment in Canada is out at fixed terms of interest—like this loan will be at under the amendment we are considering. Add 1 per cent to that rate across that whole body of debt and you add $5 billion a year to the cost to all the people of Canada—$5 billion as opposed to half a billion, which is ten times more by trying to fight inflation by monkeying around with the Canadian dollar than it would be by forcing interest rates up.

Every parliamentarian can take that easy figure, half a billion versus five billion, and so the enormity of what this crazy madness has done to our western countries, particularly the United States and Canada, this last two years is there for all to figure out. Interest rates have literally gone from 7 per cent and 8 per cent to way over 16 per cent and 17 per cent. When we realize what that does as we change our financial instruments—mortgages are a prime example—up to higher rates and when it spreads through the system, we have added to the cost of living and the cost of producing, many billions of dollars in a single year. I use the word "madness" because that is the mildest word I can think of to describe it.

I am not going to continue talking about the gloom and doom effect that this will cause us all. I simply want to find positive, simple and constructive ways of avoiding it. Let us make up our minds that it is no fault of the governor of the Bank of Canada that he is following this theory, because every economist in the whole western world is doing it. God is in his heaven, and Keynes is right there beside him.

The reality is that we are destroying the country. We are destroying the United States, Canada and the western world, not to mention the newly developing nations. Therefore, let us get down to what our job is.

I am not going to talk about the money supply. I think the bank governor is doing a fairly satisfactory job in bringing down the snake. I am not going to talk about the lack of co-operation, co-operating that should have been there for the last thirty years between the central bank, ministers of finance and the great commercial banks. The hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) gave an example of why there has to be that co-operation. I am not going to talk about that.

What is one simple thing that we can do under this legislation, without amending it, which will get away from this danger? On the assumption that we all agree that interest rates are the most dangerous part of the inflationary package, how can we get them down and still be economic and still not subsidize? There is nothing new in this idea that I am going to propose. It is as old as the system of money itself. If we look at the business sections of newspapers from this last year, almost every week we see some large corporation announcing it is going to issue a tremendous amount of equity.

Massey-Ferguson talks about putting $500 million of equity on the market. Noranda used that device to fight takeovers. They use this money they get in from equity to pay off this fixed rate of return on interest charges and get down their costs. They gamble, rightly, that every individual in the country who is interested in saving money or investing, knows that a person who has invested in a bond or any type of financial instrument with the same fixed return on it has lost money in the last ten-year inflationary period. They know that he is willing to gamble on putting his money into a type of instrument, equity, which has no guaranteed return, as a rule. He will gamble that that company can save itself, and he will get more money out of the dividends that accrue to him inlater years. Because we see big companies saving themselves this way gives us the clue of how we can do it for small business.

Small business, as a rule, is not set up at this moment in a public company form or even a private company form, for they can go out and issue equity and change the amounts from time to time. However, under this legislation there is a way of doing it, and that is to suggest that the interest rate you are going to charge is, say, 8 per cent. I pick the figure of 8 per cent out of the air. It is very close to the amount of interest that is available to the same small businessman under this development bond concept which was put forward in the Crosbie budget and was renewed by the minister the other day in the mini-budget, where you can call your loan a development bond on which you do not pay interest. You pay dividends, and you take advantage of the loophole in our tax techniques. The banks say, "If you borrow under this provision, since we do not have to pay tax on that type of income, we will give you the interest rate at about half the average interest rate". That is my layman's understanding of how the development bond concept works.

I am simply saying—that is still going to go forward, as I understand the mini-budget—why not make this roughly the same? If the average interest rate under the development bond concept is now 7.5 per cent or 8 per cent, let us make it 8 per cent for the small businessman in this legislation. The immediate reaction I get is that that is subsidy and that I am asking the government to go out and borrow money at 15 per cent and 16 per cent and lend it at 8 per cent. My answer is very simple. You say you are going to lend the money at 8 per cent, but you are going to have a faster pay-out with this lower interest amount, and then after the debt is paid off you want a percentage of the profit for "X" number of years.

When you put that up to the lender and you put your hypothetical cash flow chart for the next ten or 15 years in front of him and he sees that this loan of $100,000 is going to add, say, $20,000 a year to your profit picture, even though there is a negative cash flow in the early period, if he can get that debt paid off quickly at 8 per cent and get his money back to re-invest and then have this 2 per cent, 3 per cent, 4 per cent, 5 per cent—even up to 10 per cent, depending on the situation—of the new profit, he can figure it out over a 20-year period that he is going to make more money this way than the other way. The borrower is better off. He does not have a heavy front-end loading during the period of negative cash flow. The lender is going to make more money. There is no subsidy by the government. The guy feels independent. It is a straight business deal.

That type of proposal is not new. I have suggested in the committee that we should use it for Farm Credit Corporation loans. All the regulations are there to allow for it. I have suggested we use it for export business, which takes a longer period of time before you get a cash flow in, and the walking money period is three years, four years, and sometimes five years.

I have suggested it should also apply to the buying of homes. There is not much use in using the word "profit" when buying a home, but let us just change the word "profit" to "capital gains". You will lend the money to a man on a home at 6 per cent. Then you say, "If you sell that home in ten years and make any capital gain, we want half of it". All of a sudden they get their pencils out and the fellow realizes he can afford to buy the home at 6 per cent. The other fellow takes his pencil out. He knows what the figures are. He knows that 80 per cent of all new homes built in Canada and the United States in the last ten or 15 years change hands in ten years. He just plays the average. He knows the capital gains. They go up and down. Whatever figure you take—make it 8 per cent for the loan for the house and a quarter of the capital gain—you can show mathematically that both people are better off.

This is not a new type of thinking. I have seen it being done in business. I told several of my friends last fall that I talked this way to a group of businessmen who wanted to lend money in Canada, and I suggested there was not much point in lending money at 14 per cent because you put such heavy front-end loading onto this business that they never get up and get the product these people want. They asked what I would propose. I said, "Well, make it 8 per cent." I said, "Go back and work out your cash flow charts. You know the costs. You know the value of the product because that is in the contract. You know the length of the contract. See what you propose". I said, "make it 8 per cent, pay off the debt faster, get a share of the profits, and you will be better off." They came back in two months, the deal was signed and was in the headlines of all the Vancouver newspapers. It amounted to $30 million at 5 per cent. This was not 20 years ago, it was last fall.

You lend money not because you worship the rate. You lend money to make money. If you make more money at 5 per cent and a share of the profit, that is where you go. There is this worship of the fixed type of finance instrument in every type of business we do that has developed in the last ten or 15 years in the western countries, and they call it leverage, etc. If interest rates are low, it is advantageous to borrow the biggest proportion of your capital and operating needs. But now that the interest rates are no longer at that level, it is certainly destructive to business. I say that at their present level it is suicidal to the great majority of big business and little business alike.

I think I have said enough to make my point clear. I have suggested that this can be applied to other legislation we have already on the books. I am certain that if we think really hard, we could find other examples where we could apply the same principle where you still have the guarantee to the bank, where you still have the concept of trying to get money into the hands of those who do not have all the types of assets that most lending institutions want. I want to suggest that credit unions and banks will be forced by competition to go into this type of practice, as well as the governments.

Every one of us, I know, has read the reports of the Economic Council of Canada. They put out last fall their major report for 1979 and just recently, last week, another report came out. What are they telling us? Our Economic Council is set up to give to politicians advice other than the one they get from the Department of Finance. It is warning Canadians that a peculiar phenomenon is taking place in Canada. This peculiar phenomenon is that instead of doing what you are supposed to do according to the text book in this inflationary period of going out and buying everything today because it will be worth twice as much tomorrow, Canadians do not do that. From 1975 to 1979 Canadians have doubled their rate of savings.

We were the leading saving nation in the world in 1975. We were saving at the rate of around 4.5 per cent and 5 per cent of our disposable income. Now we are saving at over 10 per cent. Canadians do not fit into the text book that the economists have down at the Department of Finance. Do you realize what 10 per cent of the disposable income of this nation is in a year? Our banks, our credit unions, our mortgage companies and our trust companies are bulging with money. They are in the tightest financial squeeze in our history. The more money you borrow at these high rates that they are offering, the greater the liabilities they have to make. If they cannot get this large amount out, the little guy goes down. Already the bank statements and the mortgage statements show the downward trend of earnings. They are in a squeeze just like the government is. I am simply saying that reality will force them to follow the practice, which I hope will be taken up by this government, instead of following these silly myths.

As I said, these ideas are not new, and I can give you other precedents back in 1965, and so on. But I am trying to make the point to the House that we have before us legislation which is good amending legislation. The principle is sound, it has worked, it does not cost the government very much, and it helps the bankers get along with their boards of directors, with a government guarantee. They lose no money. It has helped farmers, it has helped small businessmen, it has helped exporters, and it has helped the housing people in CMHC. But when the facts change, let us be willing to change here in the House. Let us put the ideas before our ministers so they will stand up to the brilliant advisers on the monetary and fiscal policy and say, "This is the quantitative evidence, let us get on with it." I would be very surprised if they did not agree. They must be shaking from top to bottom when they look at the evidence of what they are doing to us. These are not evil men, just men drilled to stay in a pyramid and never get away from the attitude of uniformity.

I have spoken like this around here for 25 years, and the battle goes on—the battle has to go on because, as the member for Burlington said, this country is in good shape and the United States is in good shape. But let us get the government and financial institutions off our backs. They cannot object, because if they go the way I am suggesting—and I know the government wants them to go that way—they are going to make more money. They cannot stay mad at you if they are making more money. Also the government will get more taxes, and I could go on on that subject.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have said enough to indicate that the House is tired of these band-aids in the last ten or 15 years. Raising the amount from $75,000 to $100,000 for the individual is a pretty small band-aid for the small businessmen today. The $500,000 on the development bond is a little better. But the basic weakness is not the amount that is available; the basic weakness is that if you lead people, who have to borrow for inventory purposes or operational purposes and all other purposes, into borrowing at these high rates of 12 per cent, 14 per cent or 16 per cent. You destroy them and you destroy the country at the same time. In all seriousness I would like the minister to accept these ideas, first, as being worth while, second, as being constructive, and third as having worked before for many centuries, which I am willing to demonstrate.

If I may throw a little bit of erudition into the debate, Mr. Speaker, let me point out that this is the same debate as was carried on between Plato and his student, Aristotle. The two fellows argued for a lifetime. Things have not changed much in this world.

I am simply pointing out to you that there is an opportunity here, with good will on both sides of the House. We are not trying to gun the minister or the government down. Let the idea be considered. You cannot lose by trying it, because there is no way of losing.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today on the Small Businesses Loans Act. It is of great regret to me personally that this represents only a small step of no great significance in the history of this nation because the problems are so much more fundamental. While I have to agree with this bill, I should like to put before the minister, with all good will, some ideas for him to consider. It is amazing, given the underlying structural problems, that although this is the second bill with which we are in this Parliament, we should be giving much more time to the major aspects. It is interesting that we have just come through a $60 million election. The increase under this bill is $25,000 for small businesses. If we had not had the election, we could have given 2,400 businesses the full $25,000.

The underlying structural problem which the government must face, and which I hope this minister will face, is the reality on energy. The simple fact of the matter is that Canada is not an independent nation with respect to oil. We are a major importer of oil. Yet the federal government is carrying on as if we were independent. The structural problem is not one of price, on which the government has made its decision and which we are now spending time debating. We are into a conflict which may well tear this nation apart if the central government tries to move in on our Alberta oil at the price it has set. This could rip the nation apart; the issue is not price, it is supply. A government which is really trying to provide leadership should be more concerned that we have supply.

As one goes out and talks to any small businessman, he will say that all he wants is certainty. He is not so much concerned with what the price is, but he needs to know what it is so that he can plan and take those steps down the road. By this facade of keeping the price in Canada allegedly below the world price, we are causing an effect which is very serious in terms of conservation.

We could be conserving. We know that a world price would result in more conservation. We know that 50 per cent of world price is blocking the production of goods. We know that 50 per cent of world price is blocking the signals which go back to the real producers in this nation, that is, our farmers and our small businessmen. Those signals are being blocked.

One might say that it is the big oil companies which control the price. That is simply incorrect. In the province of Alberta we have over 700 oil and gas companies. Other than the big five, they are small businesses which employ husbands, wives and children—60, 70, up to 100 people employed by them. They are the people who make this nation go.

The first structural problem is with respect to supply and price. The government could go a long way if it would just recognize that the people of Alberta have already forgone revenues of $17 billion. The people of Alberta have given up about $3 billion in the export tax. Never in the history of this nation has one province been called upon to make such a massive contribution to our nation. Yet I do not hear any real words of thanks, words of appreciation, or even an acknowledgement from the minister that the province which made that contribution would be appreciated. What we have is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) going out and immediately attacking the oil industry in Alberta, attacking the 695 small businesses which really get out and do the skilled expertise of the seismic work, the geological work, the production of oil and gas, the refining of it, and then distributing it to the market. That is the key. The small businesses do that, not the big ones.

In spite of the major contribution of over $20 billion from the province of Alberta, it has managed to save $6 billion in its magical fund called the heritage trust fund. It is that fund which is so distorting the relationship in the country, because it is thought by the people in central Canada and the east that it is a massive money tree and that anyone can pluck it. We need to realize that $6 billion is nothing more than one year's budget for the entire province of Alberta. As a result of the gross mismanagement of the Canadian economy by the government of this federal nation, that $6 billion would be used up in six months. Six months of deficit financing would use the entire fund from Alberta.

Why would there be such a concern that one government in the country is building up this pool of money? What this country needs is this pool of money in order to make capital investments. That is what the province of Alberta does with its heritage trust fund. A percentage goes into Alberta industry and a percentage is allocated for Canadian industry. The types of investments required in this nation are what the Alberta heritage trust fund can undertake. Surely it is better to borrow the money from one of our own provinces which then keeps the interest circulating within our own country, rather than all of us going off and borrowing in New York, Tokyo and Germany as we are right now.

I am moved to ask what price we as Canadians would be paying for our oil if that oil were located in the province of Quebec. I submit that the cabinet and the government would be much less aggressive in its attacking of the people of Quebec than it is the people of Alberta. I suppose the same applies to Ontario. I am moved to say that because I watched the members from Quebec make a major power move with respect to the F-18A at a time when our nation is at a critical stage vis-à-vis Quebec and the rest of the country. But there is also another dynamic, the dynamic between a central government and a provincial government like Alberta. I submit that the cabinet would have been much less aggressive in attacking Quebec members standing up and wanting that oil at 50 per cent than it has been with the people of Alberta.

The second major structural defect in our nation is simply the question of a balanced budget. I do not need to tell Mr. Speaker that the accumulated deficit is something in the order of $70 billion. The most recent budget of April 21 predicted a $14 billion deficit for one year. As well, Mr. Speaker knows that last year the United States had a deficit of $14 billion. That resulted in an immediate movement of citizens to convene a constitutional convention to block deficit financing at that level. But for the United States to be at a comparable debt level to us, it would have to have a yearly debt of $140 billion. They had a mere $14 billion and they are moving. We have $14 billion and our government seems to be proud of it.

The critical aspect of the budget deficits which affects small business is that we know as an actual fact that every nation only has a fixed amount of capital, and that different parts of that nation draw upon that capital in order to make the nation grow and prosper. Historically governments have always had a small part of that capital. That has left the rest of the capital for small business and creative people to use, to invest, to make more jobs, and to have more taxes flowing into the central government. What has happened, as a result of the Liberals taking power in 1968 and having no parliamentary responsibility for our budget, is that we have built up this massive deficit of $70 billion with a yearly deficit of $14 billion.

I wonder how many Canadian people genuinely realize that the amount of money we spend each year on interest to service the debt, without paying one cent of capital, is larger than the entire federal budget of 1968. I wonder if our friends in the NDP genuinely understand that their honest concern for the small man is frustrated by their collusion with the Liberal government in getting us into this deficit, because the people they purport to help, the small man or the person who is trying to keep the country together, is the person who is hurt the most by these massive deficits and high interest rates. As a result of the government making such a demand on our capital markets, it has had to compete. The government competes unfairly because it borrows money and it pays high interest rates with which small business cannot compete. That too is another major, underlying structural change.

We are talking about constitutional change. We hope we can keep this nation together. As members of Parliament, I would hope that each one of us would be pushing for a constitutional amendment which would force governments into balanced budgets, and that there would be no such thing as a deficit budget unless we were in times of a national economic crisis, war, depression or something really major, and not for the ongoing daily operations of governments.

I know the Liberal government has had quite a desire to spend but not to collect taxes. Not meaning to lecture, we all know the theory is that any group of social people have to create a government in order to make those decisions. The government, in its wisdom, comes up with programs, and it finances those programs by levying taxes on the citizens. In theory the government convinces people of the program need, and they are, therefore, willing to pay. If they are unhappy with either the programs or the amount of taxes, they vote people out.

We also know that in this nation over the last ten years the Liberal government has developed a system of being able to get money from the people, put programs in without having to tax people directly, and they do that by the mechanism of the Canada Savings Bond. They borrow money from their own citizens and pay them a return. They pay them not only the capital but they pay them interest, and the interest is borne by all of us.

I wonder how many people realize that in this last week $218 million in Canada Savings Bonds were redeemed, with $116 million redeemed the week before, as compared to a normal week when there is only $20 million being switched? The reason is simple. People are now realizing that the nation is in deep trouble and that they have to put their money in more secure sources, sources that will perhaps bring them a higher return.

Another way the government fools us is by going into the international market. When I told you a few minutes ago that we spend over $10 billion in interest alone, I neglected to say that the vast bulk of that money goes out of this country to service the debt in New York, Tokyo or Geneva.

The New Democratic Party actively colluded with the government to get us into that position, yet this is hurting the small man they purport to represent. They would have you believe, sir, that the amount of money that is leaving is really that of multinationals sending out interest and dividends to their head offices. This is sheer, unadulterated nonsense, because that is not correct. The bulk of the money leaving this country is interest the government itself is having to pay.

If instead of going into deficit financing, which is so hurting the small businessman today, the government had even increased taxes honestly, we would have been better off. If you take ten million taxpayers and they each pay $1,000, that is $10 billion of revenue per year.

In summary, while I have to say that I am fully in favour of this bill going through, I want the minister to consider honestly the thought that it is a small stop-gap measure, that the real solution is not in amending the Small Businesses Loans Act, but instead it is in directing our efforts nationally to the question of supply of energy and directing our efforts to the size of government and the amount of money that government pulls out of our economy. If we had less government involvement in the money markets we would have more money available for small businesses which are really the backbone of this country, as the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) pointed out so well. They are the backbone, taking a little bit of money, hiring a dozen people who are all working hard toward a common objective, this resulting in taxes for us as members of Parliament to spend.

I wish the minister well in his efforts to convince the cabinet to solve the problems associated with energy supply and to direct its efforts to the size of government and the economic market, because if he is not successful the nation clearly is in deep trouble.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment on Bill C-17, the Small Businesses Loans Act amendment which we in the New Democratic Party will support with the clear understanding, however, that this is really not a full solution to the problems of small businesses.

When we speak of small business we are speaking of quite a range of economic activities, including manufacturing, the wholesale and retail trade, service businesses, construction, transportation and communications. In the case of this legislation, all of these businesses would have to be of less than $1.5 million in annual revenues.

The amendment proposes to raise the ceiling for loans under this act from $75,000 to $100,000. This is an increase of 25 per cent, yet inflation during the period from 1977 to 1980 went up by 30 per cent. Raising the ceiling under this legislation does no more than take care of the inflation rate since the ceiling was last established.

Loans are provided at the prime rate plus 1 per cent. This provision, however, is not used that widely. Many more loans are given at a higher rate because lending institutions can make a greater return outside the act. In 1979, small businesses borrowed something like $9 billion, whereas under this act the money that will be available is something like $425 million, so that we are talking about a small percentage of the loans to small business. Therefore we must do something to increase the use of this program.

I think there are a number of ways of coming to that, and one is to make small business more aware of the availability of these loans. Another way of coming to it is to encourage banks to use the act more aggressively. The Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) could pressure the superintendent of banks to encourage greater use of this act and the program.

The amendment has limitations to the extent that the impact on interest rates will be minimal. It will be something in the order of .5 per cent to 1 per cent. That is not sufficient, given the very high interest rates we have today.

In addition, the loans under this act are available only for expansion of equipment, premises and land. There is no availability of loans under this legislation for operating capital. We should, therefore, be considering expanding the scope of this Small Businesses Loans Act to include operating capital.

As well, this amendment to this legislation is no substitute for sane interest rates. We need generally low interest rates in order to ensure access to capital for small business for all purposes.

The raising of the ceiling for loans under this legislation is also no substitute for sound economic policies, and it is no substitute for a growing economy, for one of the things that small business needs most is a demand for its services and a market for its goods. Because of the limited capital on which small businesses operate, they are very vulnerable to economic downturn and recession, and that certainly is the state of our economy at this point. Raising the ceiling under this legislation also does not in any way replace the need for a general and comprehensive business policy.

The New Democratic Party has many suggestions in this area which we would encourage the government to pick up on. For example, government procurement policy should favour small business. In the United States one-third of such procurement goes to small business, and we should do the same here.

The Economic Development Corporation should be helping small business find overseas markets. Research and development grants must be available, particularly in the area of high technology. Affordable capital must be made available for small businesses, whatever the purpose. A "buy-Canada" policy should be developed which will encourage large corporations in Canada to buy from small Canadian businesses. Also, when we come to the bill dealing with amending the Bank Act, which we will be dealing with next week, we must ensure that sufficient capital is allocated for small business. A great deal could also be done in the area of freeing up small business from the very heavy paper load under which they presently labour. NDP policy also deals with misleading advertising which would protect small business against unfair competition.

The need for a small business policy is very clearly evident from the present jump in the rate of bankruptcies in Canada. In the early part of this year, bankruptcies went up by 24.8 per cent over the same period last year. Clearly this demonstrates the need to help the small business community. This increase in the rate of bankruptcies brings the whole matter much closer to home for me because the economy of Manitoba, to a large extent, is made up of small businesses, particularly the economy of Winnipeg. For example, by way of statistical illustration, over 75 per cent of the 20,000 businesses in Manitoba are small businesses. Approximately 80 per cent of the 1,300 manufacturing companies in Manitoba are small businesses. A strong and sound small business policy is very crucial to the future of Manitoba.

Small business contributes a great deal to community life because those who run these small businesses live in the community, are committed to it, and are not likely to pick up their business and go elsewhere. These people are residents and are an asset to the community. Small business is important, not only to Manitoba, but to Canada as a whole. Businesses with assets of less than $1 million constitute 90 per cent of the firms in Canada and over 50 per cent of the labour force. In this context it is necessary to take note of present economic conditions. The recession which Canada faces today creates very high unemployment, reduces the market for the services of small business, and points once again to the need for policies that will help small business, policies which will stimulate the economy and bring about sane interest rates.

Once again, I would indicate that my party will be supporting this legislation, but, while it is a good measure, it is by no means to be mistaken for a sufficient measure.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the backbone of the Canadian economy is the family farm and small business. The number of bankruptcies in the small business community is a fair indicator of the health or sickness of our economy. For instance, in 1978 there were 392 manufacturing firms that went bankrupt. The total number of bankruptcies in Canada for that year was 5,546. Right across the nation, 5,546 owners and their families suffered bankruptcy and all that it means. This figure is far higher than the bankruptcy figure for 1977.

I suggest that the minister and his government ought to pay very careful attention to the rate of bankruptcy in Canada. In 1977, 279 manufacturing firms went bankrupt. The total number of bankruptcies for that year was 3,905, as opposed to 5,546 in 1978. Those figures do not tell the whole story. The whole story is indicated by the actual dollars lost by these companies. In 1977 loss through bankruptcy amounted to $307 million. In 1978 the figure doubled to $638 million.

It behoves every member of this House, because all of us have small business in our constituencies, and certainly it behoves the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) to take a look at this problem in an effort to ascertain why these companies have been going bankrupt. I should think that the minister would want to pursue the matter even further and have his department carry out a study to determine the real causes of these bankruptcies. Normally, if a person is sick, the doctor diagnoses the cause so that he can make that person well. When the doctor finds the cause of the sickness he or she can then take remedial action, either by operation or otherwise. The person then gets well.

I wonder what the causes are of the bankruptcies in this country. Since small business is the backbone of our economy, the more it expands, the more new starts there are, the less is the rate of unemployment and the greater the buoyancy of the economy, which means more income for the federal and provincial governments. If the scenario goes the other way and there are more bankruptcies and higher unemployment, the economy is stagnant and there is less money for governments, whether at the municipal, provincial or federal level.

I would like to suggest to the House three items which I think have contributed to some of the bankruptcies, or which may contribute to many of the bankruptcies in 1980 if something is not done. The first item is capital gains tax. Once the farmer, or the small businessman, has paid his income tax at the end of the year, and pays all that he should properly pay, then he puts some of the profits aside. This is done year after year to build up a fund for retirement, education of the children, or for the happiness, continued happiness and maintenance of a standard of living for the family. There comes a time when the owner wishes to sell the business. At this point he or she is levied a capital gains tax.

The business was developed through the sweat of his brow, the sweat of his wife and the sweat of his children and employees. The businessman or the farmer has already paid income taxes each year, so why does the government want to take another lump out of the amount for which he is able to sell that business? Capital gains tax on the sale of businesses is highly inflationary. The businessman says that he must have "x" number of dollars to retire or to do with as he wishes. To get "x" dollars he must raise the price beyond the normal sale price of the business. Therefore it is highly inflationary.

The real danger is to the man who wishes to stay in business, but there is no initiative or motivation for him to expand his business. A small businessman in one of the small towns in my constituency recently asked me about the government's intention with regard to capital gains. I told the man that I could not answer this question because I am not the government. I then went on to say that, if I had my way, capital gains would be eliminated. At the time we were standing in front of his thriving little business, and he informed me that it was his. He had built it up by the strength of his back and the strength of his hands. He had seven employees and was prospering. The lot next to his building was his as well.

He wanted to double the size of his business and build on that lot so that he could have perhaps ten or 12 employees because he felt there was enough business to justify expansion. I asked him if lack of capital was stopping him but he said that was not the case and that his credit was good. He said, "If you think I am going to work for another 20 years using the sweat of my brow and the strength of my hands and my back so that some blankety-blank government can take half of my wealth through capital gains, you are mistaken." He said he was willing to give the government its proper share every year but not the big chunk that he felt was due to his family. He said he would just leave the business as it was because he was getting by.

How many other people in this country, Mr. Speaker, do not expand their business because of the capital gains tax. How many bankruptcies occur because a business was unable to expand and take advantage of a greater available market? This man claimed that he would work ten or 12 hours a day to build up a business for his wife and family but that there was a limit to what he would do for any government. Ladies and gentlemen of the House, I think that man was expressing a viewpoint that is sensible and sound. We look after our own first—wife and family are the first responsibility; then we pay our proper share of running the country. When that proper share appears to be exorbitant then we are inclined to say, "Hold on—if that is the case I shall not extend as much as I could."

Referring to the capital gains tax again, Mr. Speaker, if it cannot be eliminated then there are some ways it could be alleviated. One man I know sold his business and then had to pay a huge chunk of what he made in capital gains tax. What irked him most was that he did not have to pay only on the capital gains—which he said he would have done without complaint—but he had to pay on the inflated value of the business as well. That being the case, he felt the capital gains tax was out of line. If we cannot eliminate the capital gains tax, Mr. Speaker, surely we can at least index it so that the farmer or businessman who sells out can get a reasonable return—a return that he deserves for a lifetime of work, not just one year or five years.

I spoke to a farmer in the Nanton area of my constituency who wanted to retire because of bad health. He wanted to have enough income to guarantee that he could continue a reasonable standard of living for himself, his wife and child. He claimed that because of the capital gains tax there was no one left within the family to whom he could sell his property and so he would have to sell to an outsider. Apparently there had been one or two deferrals and he was now stuck with a gigantic bill for the taxes that should have been paid previously had they not been deferred. He was faced with selling to an outsider, and this represented a terrific burden to the family.

I know of one group in the province of Alberta who had to borrow money to pay part of the capital gains tax after their property was sold. I would ask the minister to look into this problem and find out if we are gaining anything through double taxing people who are trying to build up businesses or farms.

The second point I want to raise, Mr. Speaker, is the problem of bankruptcies. I do not have any examples of actual bankruptcies but I have examples of what storekeepers have told me will happen if we continue with the metric system. A storekeeper in my riding showed me a scale he had bought just four years ago at a cost of $1,500. With just a small margin of profit on his merchandise he claimed that he would have to sell thousands of items before he could make up that $1,500—even with the deductions permitted under the Income Tax Act. Now he has to replace it with a metric scale at a cost of $3,500. He is just a small country merchant and he is afraid that he will be put out of business because of the imposition of the metric system—something that none of his customers want. They are quite happy with the imperial scale.

Another storekeeper in the Drumheller Valley, in the beautiful canyon of the Red Deer—which I hope many hon. members will visit some day to see the bones of the dinosaurs that used to roam there and see the wide-awake people there today who are trying to contribute to the wealth of this country—showed me a scale which cost $150. The only thing in the store that he needed to weigh on that scale was fruit and vegetables. Now he has to convert to metric and a metric scale will cost $300. Mr. Speaker, that may not sound much to rich MPs—if there are any rich MPs—but $300 is a lot of money to someone operating a small business. When I was in business there were occasions when I was happy to have a $50 net profit at the end of some periods, although other periods were much better. To this man $300 was a tremendous amount of money, and he felt that he would just have to stop selling fruit and vegetables. His customers would then have to use gasoline to drive the four miles to Drumheller or the eight miles to East Coulee.

I suggest that the metric system is not helping the economy of this country at all, Mr. Speaker. I urge hon. members to slow it down. I hope it will stop, but I do think at least we should slow it down.

Recently I was invited to attend a meeting of businessmen and farmers which was called an "anti-metric" meeting. One farmer, who was not a wonderful speaker, said, "This metric system—I don't understand it. I don't know what it is all about." He looked at me and said, "Don't make me a foreigner in my own country. I was born in this country." Incidentally, he was born in Quebec. He said, "I have lived in western Canada most of my life. Don't make me a foreigner in my own country by bringing in a system of weights that I cannot understand."

If there is merit in metric, Mr. Speaker, let us do it properly—through the schools so that our boys and girls may become acquainted with it and not become foreigners in their own country. I am speaking now of metric from the point of view of business, Mr. Speaker, the economic aspect. I think it is a factor in the destruction of some of our businesses.

There is one other point I would like to mention to the minister. I know that it is not his responsibility, possibly it is that of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). It concerns the mail service. An insurance agent in the town of Turner Valley, Alberta, told me that the Post Office was ruining his business. Why? Because the agent is not a self-issuing agent. Instead she has to take the application for a policy and mail it to Calgary or Edmonton, or in one or two cases mail it to companies which have offices in Regina or Winnipeg. She told me that it was taking her three or four weeks to get a policy back. I would suggest to the minister that the government take a real look at this situation and carry out corrections in order to give us a mail service that will get the mail to the people. We do not expect it to be a press-a-button solution but we think steps can be taken to improve the situation so that businesses are not being hurt by mail that does not arrive on time.

I agree with the bill. I wish the bill would cover inventories. I wish it would go beyond the $100,000 limit because I have one or two businesses in my constituency that want to expand beyond that point. But it does not matter what figure is used, there will always be someone who wants to go beyond it.

I want to express to the minister that in administering this act we hope we can prevent bankruptcies and bring back the buoyancy to the economy of our country.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate you and your colleagues on your appointments, and I particularly want to congratulate Madam Speaker.

Yesterday in this House we had a debate on Bill C-19 which had to do with the employment tax credit. Today we are debating Bill C-17, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. All I can make of this is a whole bunch of patchwork solutions created by the administration on the other side. All this administration does is create problems for the small businessman, and for the industry of this country, without facing up to the reality of what the problem is today. We hear it stated that this is a marvellous situation, that there will be an increase of $25,000, that is, up to $100,000. What would the rate have been last week for the poor businessman borrowing that money? It was one per cent over prime which is one per cent over 17 per cent. That is 18 per cent. No businessman can stand that type of interest cost.

We are talking about small business. What is small business? It is not what we knew it was 20 and 30 years ago. We are talking about micro-business. In the United States, SBA addresses small business based on the industry and based on the number of employees in different industries. You are not looking after anything but storekeepers, which is great. But in this country we are forgetting the medium-sized industry, we are forgetting about the micro-business, the mini-business, the small business and the medium business. But I am really annoyed that we are forgetting about Canadian business and Canadian production.

Why will the government not bring in one composite package to give us a total overview of where this country is going? Instead of businessmen having to go through books and consult lawyers in order to determine what kind of grants they can get, let us get one package together so that business—not small, not mini, not micro—can exist in this country.

Returning to the subject of interest rates, which members on the other side are trying to overcome with the $500,000 bond that our government put in—

Mr. Evans: It is Bill C-17, please.

Mr. Fennell: I am talking about the interest which the small businessman has to pay, and the small business loans. I have said it before a man cannot pay an 18.5 per cent interest rate. The interest rate has been compounded by this government. It has been compounded because it keeps spending money. As it spends money, it costs us more to borrow money. We cannot borrow money at lower rates today. This government is now asking small business to compound the same problem. We have no control on our interest rates. We are completely dependent on American corporations and people who sponsor us going into debt.

Small business in this country needs help, but it needs more than $100,000. We should be looking at $1 million basic. We should be looking at more than that. We should be encouraging Canadian manufacturing. An example of that is the electronics industry. We are putting no funds to speak of into that industry. We are not encouraging people. We are not providing enough funds or giving them enough risk capital. Why can we not tie all of these programs together? We have one in Ontario, one in Ottawa, one in Quebec, and one in Saskatchewan. We talk about the FBDB. I had to tell a man to go to his own bank for a loan, which he got because the FBDB could not give him the money.

The whole thing is a mishmash. We have all kinds of programs here. The average man does not know where to go to get started. Suppose he has $100,000, but he does not know where to go to get the next $100,000. Now he is told he is going to get $500,000. Where does he go for that? We have to get these things into one package.

This country has been dependent on the small businessman. Some people do not really relate to the farmer, but he is one of the largest groups of small businessmen. We have forgotten about him.

In my riding I have a microcosm of Canada. It contains small businesses, it is urban, it has small towns, and it has agriculture. Most of the people are connected with small business. But the ones we are talking about here, the small manufacturers, the small processors—this $100,000 is not enough for them.

Let me make it clear that I am not opposing this bill. I am only saying that it does not go far enough, and that it is too little too late. As someone else has said, all we have done is index. We have to do more in this country for that important segment of the population, namely, the entrepreneurs.

I have no great solutions to our problems. I came here from the business world, and I do not only blame the federal government. I blame the provincial government, the municipal government, and regional government that we are blessed with here in Ontario. It is a whole composite of government. Some day we have to get it all together. The Ontario government has the SBDC. If one could interrelate that with the $100,000 or with the $500,000, it would help. But through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister what about research and development for Canadian products? This country is going nowhere. We are importing all our products from Japan, Taiwan, and the United States. We must get on in Canada and develop our country. It is a wonderful country. We have the resources and we have the materials, but we are doing nothing with them. We are doing patchwork fix-ups. That is all we are accomplishing.

I ask the minister to please do something in a concrete way not only for the storekeepers, the farmers, the dry cleaners, but also for the manufacturers and the processors. Please do something about these raw materials that are being exported. Do something to create secondary manufacturing. If these things are done, we will not have to worry about the unemployment tax credit nor will there be the same problems with unemployment insurance. The problems of this country will be resolved. We must keep in mind that by 1985 a smaller number of people will be coming into our labour force. Therefore the unemployment problem will diminish. It can shrink twice as fast if something is done in a realistic way, such as a complete over-all strategy to help this country, and to make it work.

Going back to my riding again, one of the major business areas is Ajax. Ajax was created by the federal government during the war, by Dominion Industries, for the manufacture of munitions. Many small businesses started up in Ajax right after the war but since then they have all been taken over by U.S. parent firms so it is nothing more than a branch-plant economy. The situation there is largely similar to the situation in all the suburbs around Toronto.

What happened between the end of the war and 1948-49 when they had dreams of men moving out there and starting their own businesses? What happened between 1950 and today? We sold out. Admittedly the government put in FIRA to try to stop the process, but it didn't do any good. It will never do any good. As my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain pointed out, we have driven the public into putting their money into the banks. We have got to get the money out of the banks and into industry. And we must see that that industry is owned by Canadians instead of being owned by Americans. New plants are not going up. They are still using the old plants built during the war, which were supposed to expire in 1947. They are still getting along on the basis of the government's program. So I plead with members on the government side that in your term of office—and you have a relatively long period of office before you—you should begin seriously to address yourselves to this problem.

We had only six months and that was not enough time to accomplish anything. But I will say for our government that it was well on our way to introducing programs to remedy the situation. Our cabinet had many more programs to introduce. I say to the minister: we on this side will work with you and co-operate with you in an effort to make Canada a better place, and the only way you are going to make it a better place is to let people invest in their own businesses without the government putting its hand into their pockets.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I recognize the hon. member is expressing himself with some feeling, but if he could address his remarks to members opposite through the Chair it would be more in keeping with the rules.

Mr. Fennell: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. This is my maiden address. I will learn.

An hon. Member: A good speech, too.

Mr. Fennell: Another thing which disturbs me is that our funds are not staying in Canada. I understand why the government has to follow the U.S. interest rates. The money was flowing out. That happens in every country throughout the world when there is a higher interest rate across the border. How are we going to get this Canadian money from the foreign banks back to Canada and into Canadian industry? I will tell you how, Mr. Speaker. We can develop an industrial strategy for this country which will make us number one in the world.

An hon. Member: That wasn't a Tory campaign promise.

Mr. Fennell: I am sorry, it was mine. Mr. Speaker, I think I have got most of my points across. When I talked to a few people about giving this address they said; "You could never speak for 40 minutes, you can only talk for five." I have stretched my points out and I apologize to hon. members for doing so. But my final word is: please, as members of the common house, let us all work together to make this country great. Let us encourage the minister to come up with positive programs. He can do it and we want to help him. Of course, we would prefer to be over there, and I am certain that if we were over there we would be doing those things. But because we cannot wait any longer, I ask that something proceed and that we get this show on the road.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, just a few short weeks ago when I was on the other side of the House it was always a frustrating experience to be quiet and listen to the other people waffling and carrying on at great length about matters which were not contained in the bill under discussion. I would have wished that the rules of relevancy would have been adhered to more strictly. It is a little different when one is on this side, but I still think we should try to respect the rule of relevancy. So, in the few minutes that are left I want to speak specifically about the various clauses of this bill, clauses which, of course, deal only with guaranteed business improvement loans.

The first provision is that the administration of the act is to be transferred from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). I am not sure why this transfer should take place. If we look at clause 5 we find that the Minister of Finance is still required to be part of the set-up necessary to study interest rates; he is still not completely divorced from the procedure. Maybe we are getting ourselves into administrative trouble by having two people involved, instead of just one. This is something we should look at in committee.

Another of the main provisions is that the maximum amount of loan which can be made to any one borrower is increased from $75,000 to $100,000. This is obviously intended to take inflation into account. It is one of the things we need to do periodically in regard to various pieces of legislation which specify dollar amounts and I guess we shall have to continue to do this until we get inflation under control.

I have some comment to make with respect to clause 4. This is the clause which will allow the maximum aggregate number of guarantees to increase from $600 million to $675 million up to June 30, 1980. Today is April 25 so there is one month left until this date takes effect. I have a rather suspicious mind and I am wondering why this is necessary. There is no way an additional $75 million is going to be guaranteed within the next 30 days or so, and therefore I strongly suspect that this is a cover-up and that loans have already been guaranteed in excess of the $600 million allowed by law. This aspect will require careful study when the bill goes to committee to determine how this over-guaranteeing has taken place. Possibly we shall need to put in place controls to see that it does not happen in the future.

Clause 4 will extend the aggregate limit to $850 million up to June 30, 1982. There is an additional figure within that two-year time period of $175 million.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there is someone on the government side who can tell us what the menu is for Monday.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm arrangements that were made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) with the parties. The government has given the Table and the parties notice of a motion relating to supply proceedings, and it is the government's intention to call the motion for debate as the first item on Monday, if necessary.

Other business on Monday will be the resumption of the debate on Bill C-17, then Bill C-5, and then Bill C-18. Future business will be arranged by the government House leader on Monday.

Mr. Knowles: What are we going to do Monday night?

Mr. Cousineau: We will find out on Monday morning.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

SECOND WORLD WAR

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY FOR HUMAN SACRIFICES MADE BY POLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Taking into account that this year marks the fortieth anniversary of the Katyn forest tragedy, and that 1980 has been declared by Polish people as the year of Katyn, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House sympathizes with our fellow Canadians of Polish extraction over the great human sacrifices Poland had to endure during the course of the Second World War and declares that those who lost their lives at Katyn and all other sites of tragedy in Poland will long be remembered.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—DISASTER TO LOBSTER INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of extraordinary urgency having to do with the lobster fishery on the east shore of Nova Scotia.

Severe bottom and surface storms in the early part of last week combined to virtually wipe out the lobster industry in that part of Canada for the present season. Fourteen fishermen contacted out of about 280 lost about 96 per cent of their traps. In a survey of some 2,300 trap positions a week ago last Saturday, it was found that 2,072 had been lost or damaged beyond repair.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House request of the government its immediate attention to this disaster, that it devise and implement a trap replacement program, that it give immediate consideration to making interim cash compensation available so as to enable trap replacement and, finally, that it consider the extension of the lobster season in this district by one to two weeks.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE SENATE

ACTIVITIES OF SENATOR PERRAULT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise on an issue of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the increasingly partisan nature of Senator Perrault's activities in government ministries within which he has no responsibilities, in view of that senator's decision to assemble, at public expense, a partisan staff, and since that hon. gentleman is in no way accountable to this House or to the people of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

That this House directs the hon. senator to confine his activities to those normally reserved for members of the upper chamber and that all expenditures by him and his staff, including flights of government and commercial aircraft, be tabled monthly by the Prime Minister.

AIR CANADA

FLIGHTS FROM OTTAWA TO ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that under the winter schedule of Air Canada it was possible to leave Ottawa at 8 a.m. on an Air

Canada flight to Halifax, change planes at Halifax and arrive in St. John's, Newfoundland, at 1.45 p.m. Newfoundland time—four hours and 15 minutes total duration—and in view of the fact that under the summer schedule of Air Canada the traveller to St. John's, Newfoundland, must leave Ottawa at 7.35 a.m. on a flight to Montreal, wait at Montreal airport for some four hours and then take a flight at 12.10 p.m. from Montreal via Halifax to St. John's, Newfoundland, arriving at 5 p.m. Newfoundland time—or eight hours after leaving Ottawa—I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That all officials of Air Canada who have had any connection with or responsibility for the summer Air Canada schedule for flights from Ottawa to St. John's be "Mackaseyed", without any golden handshake, and that the schedule be changed to ensure service at least the equivalent of the winter service for travellers from Ottawa to St. John's, Newfoundland, particularly in view of the direct service offered to capitals of provinces such as Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island from Ottawa, and that this continuing rank discrimination against Newfoundland by way of air services cease immediately.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mackasey said "Yes".

FORESTRY

ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT FOR LAID-OFF WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, which lends itself to the serious consideration of this House.

It concerns the mounting problems experienced by the forest and wood-converting industries which result in ever-increasing unemployment, particularly on the west coast but throughout our country and, of course, the serious effect this will have on unemployment insurance statistics. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the minister engages himself immediately in discussions with his colleagues, the minister responsible for manpower, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and their counterparts in the governments of the provinces in an attempt to work out a program whereby workers whose employment has been terminated for reasons of depressed market conditions can be engaged in the important task of renewing our forests, and that the federal government undertakes to offer direct subsidies to companies that undertake such programs.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

OPPOSITION TO AMALGAMATION OF MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN DISTRICT OFFICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on an issue of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of statements made late last week by Saskatchewan postal officials which confirmed plans to amalgamate Manitoba and Saskatchewan district offices, thereby removing the district office from Saskatoon, and from Saskatchewan, taking with it jobs and a measure of local control over postal services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House goes on record as being opposed to this amalgamation which will reduce services, reduce efficiency and serve only to further centralize postal operations in this country.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are a week late.

EXCISE TAX

REQUEST TAX BE REMOVED FROM GASOHOL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill J. Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the technology involving the production of gasohol is now proven and available, and that gasohol could replace up to 10 per cent of the fuel requirements now served completely by gasoline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That this House directs the Government of Canada to provide positive leadership by exempting gasohol from the excise fuel tax of approximately seven cents per gallon on gasoline that contains at least 10 per cent biomass fuel alcohol, thereby making gasohol prices competitive with those of gasoline.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A first-rate idea.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIVE RIGHTS

CALL FOR AMENDED LEGISLATION TO RECOGNIZE HUNTING RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In light of the fact that in the spring of 1978 native people in Le Pas, Manitoba, were charged, prosecuted and later convicted, for hunting ducks in May of that year; that these convictions were a result of previous governments reneging on treaty agreements with native people when the government instituted the Migratory Birds Convention Act; since the Liberal government promised in 1978 and 1979 to change the legislation in order to recognize native hunting rights, and since a protocol was signed last year with the government of the United States allowing for these changes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That this House instructs the Minister of the Environment to make the necessary changes in legislation immediately in order to ensure that no more native people are dragged before the courts for exercising their traditional and treaty rights.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ELDORADO NUCLEAR, HOPE TOWNSHIP—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER MOVE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his press statement on Friday justifying the move of the Eldorado plant out of Hope township, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources used grossly inadequate cost estimates, which undoubtedly were the same ones he used in cabinet in order to justify the change.

Now that it is apparent these extra initial costs alone will be over $50 million, and not just $2 million as the minister indicated at his press conference, will the government reconsider the move?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there is no question of reconsidering the move. The minister has just informed me that he used no cost estimates at his press conference. So if the hon. member has been misled in some way or other, he should perhaps ask the minister for the correct facts.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister is now indicating that there is no chance at all of the government reconsidering the move at all—

An hon. Member: He didn't say that.

Mr. Lawrence: Maybe I am misinterpreting the Prime Minister. Perhaps he will clarify that. I have given him notice of this supplementary.

Because the contract to put in the services to the cancelled plant in Hope township will require compensation to be paid if the services are not connected, and because that work alone will keep some of the construction workers busy over the next few months, could the government complete the servicing of this site for the cancelled plant and then turn it over, fully serviced, to the municipality—hopefully, for a token amount—so that the municipality itself could then attract other industries to the site? As I say, I have given notice of that question to the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker, I am told that is one of the options being considered. I think the hon. member, quite properly, is seeking a solution to this problem for his constituency, but if he wants further detail I would ask him to direct his questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is much better informed of the details of this matter.

Mr. Lawrence: I have a further supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I am sure the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources heard my last request of the government in respect of the servicing of the site and turning it over to the municipality. Will the minister take that as a question directed to him?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this is a matter that is being examined at the present time by Eldorado, and it will be discussed with the local authorities eventually as to what, if anything, should be done.

URANIUM REFINERY SITE AT BLIND RIVER, ONT.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the government has selected a new uranium refinery site at Blind River, partly on the basis of storage of waste, does this mean that the community of Blind River has accepted that it will become the nuclear waste storage site for Canada?

• (1420)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in answer to the previous question, I would indicate that at the press conference there was no mention of cost figures in the press communiqué.

I indicated at the press conference certain figures in response to the question as to how much it would cost. I said that the plan would cost $133 million if it were delayed for one year, and if the increased cost of construction were 10 per cent, then that would be $13 million more. That is the way the question was put. I did not give any specific, additional cost figure.

With regard to the question raised by the hon. member, no specific site has been selected, but—as the hon. member knows—all the experts indicate that the best possible site in Canada for the disposal of spent fuel is in the Canadian Shield which is found in northern Ontario. Sites are being considered. No site has been selected as yet. This will require extensive research, analysis and consultation with local authorities.

I hope that the decision made by the government last week will ensure the co-operation of the communities in northern Ontario so that the matter can be fully investigated, and that with the co-operation of the provincial government of Ontario and the local communities the best and safest arrangement can be found in order to dispose of spent fuel.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the government committed to expansion of the Candu system both internationally and in Canada and, specifically, does the government intend to promote the use of the Candu system for heavy oils extraction in western Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, on the first part of the question, indeed the government is very committed to expansion of the Candu system both in Canada and in the international community. For instance, last week I met with representatives of the Argentinian authorities on this issue, and I believe we made progress on some of the outstanding issues between Canada and the government of Argentina.

With regard to the second part of the question, obviously this is a matter which must be discussed with the government of Alberta. The government has made no such decision, but such an avenue could indeed be explored further.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HIGH INTEREST RATES—HOLDING OF NATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In light of statements which have been made by the minister of the treasury for Ontario and by the four provincial premiers who met out west last week, can the Minister of Finance tell the House whether or not his government is reconsidering its high interest rate policy which was criticized by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and by the present Minister of Employment and Immigration when they were in opposition; and, particularly, whether the government has been giving active consideration to the possibility of holding a national economic conference as soon as possible?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member wrongly characterizes the policy as a high interest rate policy. If he wishes to be accurate, he will recall that recently there have been two drops in the bank rate and in the prime rates of commercial banks. Certainly that is a move in the right direction.

I have not given consideration to calling a national economic conference, but I would be glad to take into account the hon. member's representations.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Think about it, Allan.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, I would remind the minister that the bank rate now stands at 15.67 per cent, and when he took power the rate was 14 per cent. That is a rise of something over 1.5 percentage points in the space of time since the government was formed.

Press reports indicate that governor Bouey declined to meet with the four western premiers on the grounds that he had an alternative engagement, and also on the grounds that he felt it would be inappropriate for a federally-appointed public servant to meet with the four western premiers. I would like to ask the minister if that is also his view of the function of governor Bouey.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I should explain to the hon. member that governor Bouey has been ready to meet with western premiers on an individual basis, has done so in the past and is prepared to do so in the future. With respect to an invitation to appear at a formal conference of western premiers, which might carry implications as to which level of government had responsibility for monetary policy, the governor of the bank chose not to attend, and he gave an explanation.

In that position I supported the governor of the Bank of Canada. But I do reiterate his willingness to meet with the premiers, as he has done in the past, and to explain the basis of his policy and the reasons why monetary policy is being administered the way it is at the present time.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. Since the minister is not prepared to accept responsibility for his government's high interest rate policy, I am not surprised that there is a little confusion about which member of the government is responsible.

As my final supplementary question, Madam Speaker, I would ask the minister if he is prepared to give consideration to the recommendation of the four western premiers, that instead of having a board of directors appointed by the Liberal government of the day, the Bank of Canada be advised by an advisory board which would be at least partly appointed by the provincial governments, which would allow a far greater degree of national economic consultation and disclosure of national monetary policy and which would give rise to a far greater degree of trust by all Canadians in the policies of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I want to make it clear to the hon. member that the governor of the Bank of Canada has received representations, and will continue to receive views and representations, from western premiers and other interested groups.

I do not think it appropriate, in this context, to revise the constitutional arrangements and to provide for a formal structure which is unnecessary in light of the free access which all groups have both to the governor and to the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EMBARGO ON AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS TO SOVIET UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Minister of Agriculture is quoted as having said at the weekend that he favoured a complete embargo on Canadian agricultural exports to the Soviet Union.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Minister of Agriculture was stating government policy, in view of the fact that an embargo on grain sales to Russia alone could cost Canada in excess of $400 million per year.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture has not had an opportunity to make this particular suggestion to me. He may have discussed it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs or other ministers. I shall inquire.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the statement by the Minister of Agriculture has caused very great ripples throughout the agricultural industry, which is now concerned that this is a new direction being taken and that the person who should be speaking on behalf of western agriculture and agriculture generally is now making suggestions that we limit our exports to the Soviet Union.

Madam Speaker, due to the fact that the Prime Minister has allowed him to answer this question at least, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement made by the minister on the Olympic boycott, to the effect that we were going to maintain traditional levels of grain sales and continue traditional exports of agricultural products to the Soviet Union, is this particular initiative one which he endorses and one he has discussed with the Minister of Agriculture?

If there are other embargo items, is he now prepared to bring the House into his confidence and let us know whether he plans other initiatives with respect to the Afghanistan problem?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture and I are continually having discussions on these and other problems. I also discussed the embargo question with the United States Secretary of State, as he then was, last week.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Look what happened to him.

Mr. MacGuigan: There is no further announcement to be made at this time. We will certainly keep the House informed. I will say that there is in place a very full range of sanctions on the Soviet Union with respect to Afghanistan.

PARKS CANADA

PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question stems from a question put earlier today which dealt with the cancellation of construction of the Eldorado Nuclear plant in Hope township.

My question to the Minister of the Environment concerns another regional office relocation of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough. Would the minister advise this House if he has had a change of mind about that move which is currently under review, or has he decided to permit it to move as planned to Peterborough from Cornwall?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member has suggested, the matter has been under review. I have made some recommendations to my colleagues concerning it and I hope very shortly—perhaps within the next two weeks—to be able to announce a definitive decision on the matter.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of the Environment and it deals with the same subject. Going back to the last election, the employees of the office in Cornwall were told that they would be advised within seven to 14 days should the government decide to cancel that move. Those 14 days have passed. Could the minister advise this House why every time 14 days pass he requires another 14 days to review the move?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, the basis of the hon. member's question is incorrect. When I met the employees in Cornwall, I said that I hoped very shortly, within two weeks, to have come to a conclusion in my own mind about the matter and I would then be making recommendations to my cabinet colleagues. The fact of the matter is that I have decided on the proposals I want to present and I am discussing them with my cabinet colleagues. I indicated at that time that I would have to discuss the proposals I wished to make, and it might take further time before a decision could be announced.

Oral Questions

CALL FOR DIRECT FLIGHT FROM OTTAWA TO ST. JOHN'S

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the proposed changes in the Air Canada schedule, in view of the fact that St. John's is the only provincial capital not served by a direct Air Canada flight from Ottawa, and in view of the fact that all Newfoundland members of the House of Commons would like to have direct access to our provincial capital, can the minister say whether he will make representations to Air Canada for such a direct flight from Ottawa to St. John's?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will obviously do that. But my very recently acquired information is that there will be such a service direct to St. John's, and that will be announced next week—or start next week. I will get further information tomorrow, Madam Speaker, because I would like all members from Newfoundland to be properly served in terms of transportation from the capital.

Mr. MacEachen: Especially on the outward run.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROTEST AGAINST PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA PLANT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Lorne McCuish (Prince George-Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Aluminum Company of Canada has declared its intention to proceed with the Kemano II hydroelectric project in central British Columbia under provisions of a 1949 agreement with the province of British Columbia.

The Aluminum Company of Canada feasibility studies disclose that the project will result in irresponsible and irreparable environmental damage, including the loss of spawning grounds on the Maurice, Skeena, Nechako and Fraser River systems, a change in water tables affecting both municipal and private water and sewage systems, and the loss of agricultural lands and wildlife habitat. Because of the grave danger which will affect over 200,000 people, would the minister assure this House and the people of British Columbia that the federal government will not permit the Aluminum Company of Canada to proceed with this project?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that the British Columbia government has already given assurance that there will be a full public inquiry before this matter is proceeded with. We will, of course, see what happens in that inquiry and make a full study of the environmental effects—particularly as they relate to fish species—before coming to a final conclusion, in order to assure ourselves that there is no damage in proceeding with this matter, if that is the decision of the British Columbia government.

Mr. McCuish: Madam Speaker, surely the minister is aware that his predecessor had taken positive steps and there will be ample evidence in his own office as to the impact? I would like the assurance of the minister that he has made it loud and clear to his counterparts in the British Columbia legislature that he will not accept the conditions of this project as they now stand.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, as I indicated, there is going to be a full public inquiry. I think it will be wise for us to delay an absolutely definitive decision until we see the full effect of that inquiry.

PRIVACY

OPENING OF MAIL BY RCMP

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Two weeks ago the minister gave a commitment to this House that within a few days, as he put it, he would make the kind of presentation that hon. members would like to hear on the subject of mail-opening. The Solicitor General knows, of course, that although the RCMP have been opening mail illegally for years, they were not able to produce any such evidence before the McDonald commission.

Will the Solicitor General now perhaps confirm that, as an alleged former civil libertarian, he understands the people of Canada want no further incursions into their privacy, and will the minister tell this House why there has been such a lengthy delay in preparing this important study?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, first I would like to remind the House that there is no intention on my part or on the part of the government to change the rules which prohibit the opening of mail, by regulation or in any other way. If it is to be done, it will be done by bringing forward legislation for the full consideration of this House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): When?

Mr. Kaplan: I indicated recently that because of the announcement of the McDonald commission, its report would be forthcoming before the end of the summer and that no action would be taken before that time. I did tell members that a report is being prepared. I have seen a version of it that does not contain enough statistical information, but in view of the fact that the matter is not urgent, that no pressing action is contemplated by the government or by me at this time, I think it is worth waiting to have the opportunity for a very full report to be brought forward, and I intend to bring it forward as soon as it is available.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I am not surprised that the statistics are unavailable. My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Justice. For over a year now the government has had evidence of systematic violations of the Post Office Act by members of the RCMP. The Prime Minister will now, hopefully, be aware of the fact that it is the responsibility of the federal government to prosecute under that particular act.

My supplementary question, then, to the Prime Minister is: What action does the government intend to take to prosecute those persons who have been shown clearly to have violated the Post Office Act. Second, how quickly will the government be acting? Hopefully, it will be with the same kind of speed with which it moved in the case of the prosecution of CUPW leader Jean Claude Parrot.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in the case of the hearing before the royal commission, I made it clear before—various ministers have also—that we do not intend to act piecemeal as the evidence unrolls and unfolds in front of the commission. Some of these hearings are in camera; others are in public. Some of them are in parts, and they are joined again at later stages.

I am sure that the hon. member would not want the government to take action and prosecute somebody on partial evidence. We have always said that we would not comment on the evidence as it came out in a piecemeal fashion; that we were waiting for the whole report. That remains our position.

POST OFFICE

MAXIMUM LIMIT FOR AWARDING ROUTE CONTRACTS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): My question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that the maximum limit for letting postal route contracts without tender is currently $10,000, and that this maximum amount has not been increased since 1968, could the minister please tell the House whether he will give consideration to raising this limit?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, of course we would like to raise that limit as soon as possible. The hon. member must know that, unfortunately, to do so an amendment must be passed to the Post Office Act. If the hon. member can consult his colleagues and assure me that we could pass such a bill unanimously in a few minutes in Parliament, I would be the first to go ahead with such a measure and have it approved immediately.

TOURISM

FUNDING OF PROPOSED CONVENTION CENTRES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, given the fact that the Liberal cabinet was sworn in at the beginning of March and that the Prime Minister has not yet seen fit to name the minister who will have responsibility for tourism, an industry that is Canada's sixth largest earner of foreign exchange and one that contributes 5 per cent to the gross national product, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who perhaps may have been briefed on this important aspect of tourism.

It is a well-known fact that the previous government had approved funding for the proposed convention centres in Vancouver and Toronto. Can the minister give his assurance that this government will honour the commitment made in good faith to the cities of Toronto and Vancouver? I ask this question as it is difficult to plan without knowing the basis of funding.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State, Small Businesses): Madam Speaker, the whole question of the funding of convention or commercial centres throughout Canada is now being reviewed within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We shall be in a position to put before our cabinet colleagues a document for discussion purposes within the coming weeks.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

STEPS TO ENSURE TALENTED CANADIAN ARTISTS REMAIN IN CANADA

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State: in his absence, I will direct it to the Acting Secretary of State. Two weeks ago, a Canadian film animator, working for the National Film Board, won an academy award for his film "Every Child", yet this person was laid off by the National Film Board because of budget restraints. He has not been able to find a job in the Canadian film industry since last November.

The net result is that talented Canadians end up leaving Canada, taking with them valuable resources and further weakening the Canadian film industry. What steps is the government prepared to take to ensure that talented Canadian artists remain in Canada, and to ensure the continuation and improvement of the Canadian film industry?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I know that my colleague is aware of the situation and I will draw the hon. member's comments to his attention when he returns.

Mr. de Jong: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. Perhaps the former secretary of state can answer this. I would like to have an answer today by the Acting Secretary of State.

The former Liberal government in 1978 had cut the National Film Board budget by $4.6 million. The former Conservative government restored it by some $350,000, only for last year. It is obvious that the cutbacks have severely limited the role of the National Film Board. Would the minister inform the House if his government will consider increasing the National Film Board budget, especially the budget for production?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, clearly, the restraint programs have had a considerable impact on the National Film Board. The question about further spending priorities in relation to the National Film Board is one to which the present Secretary of State should respond. As I said earlier, I will be happy to draw the hon. member's concerns to his attention.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BOYCOTTING OF MOSCOW OLYMPICS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON OTHER SPORTS ACTIVITIES WITH SOVIETS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the long overdue but welcome decision by the government to boycott the Moscow Olympics, and in order for this government to be consistent in its actions condemning the Soviet Union's military invasion of Afghanistan, can the Prime Minister tell this House whether or not his government is now prepared to cease all further artistic and sporting ties with the Soviet Union, including the prevention of the Soviet hockey team from participating in this fall's Canada Cup hockey tournament? If not, can the Prime Minister explain the obvious inconsistencies that exist within his government's position in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot comment on all the detail of this. Here again, the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be better able to do it than I.

On the specific point raised by the hon. member concerning the World Hockey Cup competition to be held here this fall, I point out to the House that the position of this government has been, not to ban the Olympics or sporting events, per se, but to ban them because they were being held in Moscow. That is the point we want to get through. I think that is the point President Carter first emphasized in his own policy. It is certainly our policy.

In other words, we are not condemning all contacts with Russian athletes, Russian artists or Russians of other kinds. We are condemning the Moscow Games. That is the purpose of this government's policy. I do not know what the hon. member's policy was.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, Canadian amateur athletes will forfeit their once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to participate in the Olympic Games, and rightly so under the circumstances. But the question I put to the Prime Minister—and I suppose he did not understand it the first time—is, how can he justify the fact that on one hand Canadian amateur athletes will have to forfeit this opportunity, and on the other hand the hockey players, for example, or the Soviet-built Lada car sales people in Canada, will continue to bring to the forefront Soviet Union industry and Soviet Union sporting events which, as the Prime Minister knows, is the number one propaganda tool of the Soviet Union?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it has nothing to do with amateur or professional status. Our condemnation is of games to be held in Moscow. That is the total aspect of it. We are not condemning sporting events, amateur or professional, held in other fora. As a matter of fact, and as the hon. member knows, Russian athletes were in the United States at Lake Placid just a couple of months ago. Therefore, the creators of the policy of the boycott, the Americans themselves, are interpreting the policy the way we are, not the way the hon. member is suggesting.

FISHERIES

OVER-THE-SIDE SALES TO FOREIGN FISHING FLEETS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to elaborate briefly on the reported guarantees by his department in connection with over-the-side sales of fish, specifically to Joint Trawlers Limited, a Swedish-based consortium. I wonder if this is not tantamount to a subsidy and whether he could tell the House briefly the basis of this, if it is true.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the discussions with the foreign company have, in fact, included the possibility of commensurate benefits being offered in exchange for coming in and buying Canadian fish from Canadian fishermen.

As the hon. member knows, we have experimented with the guarantee formula. We found that this created a lack of incentive to hang in if, for example, mackerel did not show up at the appointed time. We are now looking at the possibility of making available, as a commensurate benefit, fish in which Canadian fishermen have shown no interest in the past and which is surplus to our needs, for example, a certain quantity of silver hake. That is the approach we will be taking this year.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer. I wonder if he could say whether or not there are any safeguards or provisions in place that would make sure that fish sold under these conditions would not be used to compete directly with existing Canadian markets.

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, if one of the negotiations is successful, it is for a country that is a high consumer of mackerel and any of the fish for which they have need in their own internal consumption bracket.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Can the minister tell the House why it is necessary to provide guarantees to Joint Trawlers, or to any other foreign trawlers, which amount to a subsidy, when Canadian processors have the capacity to handle that fish?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows very well—and this policy is not that different from the one I believe he advocated in Charlottetown last January—that if you are going to ask freezer vessels to come over to Canada and be ready to buy fish, which in the case of mackerel may not appear on the scene for some time, you may have to offer some compensation for the time in which the freezers are waiting in the bay.

It is this approach that we are looking at, not a guarantee but a payment for steaming time. If the amount of fish that is delivered to the foreign vessel is not above a certain level, we are looking at a system which would guarantee a range between a minimum and a maximum sold by Canadian fishermen.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MOVEMENT OF OIL BY TANKER—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION AT U.S. HEARINGS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Since 1975, the minister's government has allowed the movement of Alaskan oil down the British Columbia coast. Now we are faced with greatly increased traffic, with vastly increased potential for disaster.

At present, in connection with the Northern Tier proposal for an oil tanker port at Port Angeles, in the state of Washington, the state is holding site evaluation hearings at Olympia. Canada has neither representatives nor observers at those hearings, but has contact only through our consulate general in Seattle. Given the importance of this issue and these hearings, this is not good enough.

Will the minister undertake to have an official Canadian presence at the hearings or, failing that, will he fund an independent public interest group which would be willing to send a representative?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is not the practice of the Government of Canada to make representations at such hearings nor, I regret to say to the hon. gentleman, do we have funds available in my department to finance interest groups who wish to appear before them.

However, as the hon. member touched upon in his question, we do ensure that there are observers via the consulate who are present at the hearings, and I am satisfied that they will keep us very much in touch with the hearings as they progress.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, I am sure the people of British Columbia will feel that the government is not fulfilling its election promises in this regard, with that answer.

In order for the Canadian government to make a strong case regarding tanker traffic on our coast, we need independent environmental impact studies. Is the minister's department relying on the National Energy Board requirement that Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company Limited do such studies before it can proceed with its application or, knowing that Trans Mountain's application could be withdrawn at any time, is the department prepared to proceed with environmental studies on its own?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, we are very much in touch with the situation. We are opposed to the tanker traffic on the west coast and we are, in a continuing way, assessing the potential impact which might come from the various schemes which are discussed.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST RAPESEED NOT PUT UNDER CONTROL OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Now that farmers are in some cases working their land, or in others are making plans for seeding, there are suggestions that the government might be moving toward putting rapeseed under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Could the minister allay the fears of the farmers and indicate to this House that there is no intention of the government to move now so that the present crop or future crops will be put under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board as far as rapeseed is concerned?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board made a speech recently in the west in which he stated quite emphatically that he had no intention of doing that unless he were to take the normal procedure, which is to bring it to the attention of the cabinet as a whole. Most people have taken that as an understanding that he will not move unilaterally toward that change. That is the way things are now.

It seems to me that there are other things of much greater importance to do in western Canada at this time, namely, to increase the railway capacity and to tackle the Crowsnest Pass rate which will necessitate a climate of co-operation, which I very much hope for.

NATIONAL UNITY

POSSIBILITY OF HOLDING HOUSE OF COMMONS' MEETING IN QUEBEC

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. As the House of Commons has moved from its chamber in the past, and there is no technical reason to keep it from doing so again, as many parts of Canada have not firmly expressed in the last while their desire for a renewed Canadian federalism including Quebec, and as the Parti Québécois has intimated that the rest of Canada does not care or that Quebec would be better off without Canada and Canada would be better off without Quebec—things which we in this House do not believe—would the Prime Minister consider discussing with the other party leaders and Your Honour the possibility of adjourning the House of Commons to the city of Montreal, or elsewhere in the province of Quebec for two or three sitting days, not to debate the referendum, which is a question Quebeckers must decide, but to allow members representing every part of Canada to express the overwhelming view of their constituents that there is an important place within a renewed Canadian federation for Quebec, and to express that the overwhelming desire and attitude of other Canadians toward Quebec is one of, "Stay. Let us join together to build a greater Canada"?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that I share his views and admire the objective as expressed in his question. As for the specific suggestion of adjourning the House of Commons to Montreal where it would sit for a few days, I find it very interesting indeed and I am convinced that generally speaking my caucus would find the proposal most acceptable. I shall ask the Leader of the Government in the House to discuss the matter with the other leaders. If there is consensus to that effect, we can then discuss the matter with Madam Speaker and the appropriate authorities.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED RELOCATION OF SASKATCHEWAN DISTRICT OFFICE FROM SASKATOON TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the Post Office. Last week, the hon. member for Saskatoon West moved a motion asking that the proposed relocation of the Saskatchewan district office from Saskatoon to Winnipeg be revoked.

Can the minister indicate whether there has been any follow-up, and why he has not responded to my letter asking for clarification of the situation and reversal of the decision, if indeed one has been taken?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to answer the question and I thank the hon. member for asking it. I think he is acting much more responsibly than the hon. member for Saskatoon West who recently raised that question knowing quite well that I was unable to answer. I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the amalgamation of administrative services is not settled. No final decision has been made, but if we ever wanted to amalgamate administrative responsibilities, services would in no way be reduced in Saskatchewan. It would not affect employees in the Saskatchewan postal service. Finally, if it were done to reduce our administrative staff all those employees in Saskatchewan would be offered jobs in the public service or in the Post Office so they might continue to work for the Canadian government in Saskatchewan if they want to do so.

[English]

Mr. Ogle: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister really understands the serious problem that the people of Saskatoon feel they are facing when they hear of the idea that this office could be taken away from them. I wonder if he realizes that the alienation which is taking place there now toward the government in that respect is becoming very widespread.

Would the minister reassure me that everything possible will be done to leave that office in Saskatoon for the district of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member that the allegation presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon West was grossly exaggerated and had no foundation. No decisions were taken.

Mr. Clark: Was it carried by Radio-Canada?

Mr. Ouellet: If, indeed, we do something, it will not diminish or curtail good service in Saskatchewan. It will not deal with hundreds of employees, as has been alleged, but with only a few employees at the administrative level, and we will make sure that we continue to give good service in Saskatchewan. We will not substantially diminish the service.

Mr. Epp: What do you mean by "substantially"?

Mr. Ouellet: I see some Conservatives do not like the answer.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Right.

Mr. Ouellet: However, I think it is important that I reassure the hon. member—and I thank him for asking the question—and the people there that job security is assured. If such a decision is taken, those who could be affected will be guaranteed jobs in Saskatchewan in the public service, if they want to stay.

AIRPORTS

PLANS FOR EXPANSION OF MOUNT HOPE FACILITY

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, since this government took office, we in the Hamilton area have not heard a peep out of the Minister of Transport, and certainly nothing official from his department, about his plans for expansion of the airport at Mount Hope.

● (1500)

Can the minister tell us now whether the government will adhere to the $45 million commitment of the previous Conservative administration, or does he intend to revise upward or downward government spending on Hamilton's ticky-tacky terminal and airport facilities?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Among other things, I did have a conversation with the Ontario minister of transportation on this very subject: he has a great interest in that particular item. A couple of things came up. One of them was that we would pursue the definition of the "concept"—that word is in quotation marks—or the orientation of the runway, which is still uncertain and needs clarification. Another thing that would be done—

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Pepin: I am using technical words that I did not know the meaning of two months ago. That is how fast I can learn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. Since the question period is coming to an end, would the minister please make his answer as brief as possible?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Madam Speaker, I was about to mention that there is another aspect of very great importance, namely, the servicing of that airport by Air Canada. There are a number of negotiations to take place in that connection because it would be rather useful to have the assurance of regular service if the airport is to be expanded.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I would still like to know whether the government is going ahead with the $45 million expansion program which had been approved by the previous government. Also, will the minister undertake to meet personally with the mayors of the greater Hamilton area to iron out some of these outstanding problems? Can he give us an assurance that the airport expansion plan will go ahead?

Mr. Pepin: I was trying to say that the promise which was made by the previous government will be honoured if it makes sense to do so—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: —which involves the information I am looking for at the present time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—ECONOMIC REMARKS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Order. On Tuesday, April 22 last, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) raised, as a question of privilege, the participation in the address debate the day before by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I have now had an opportunity of reviewing the arguments presented on both sides of the question of privilege. Essentially, the Chair has to determine whether the Minister of Finance has breached the privileges of the House.

Perhaps a brief examination of the criteria for a question of privilege or for contempt would be appropriate at this time. Privilege relates to the obstruction of members in the discharge of their parliamentary duties and contempt relates to manifestations of disrespect for this House. The facts set out by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the complaint he raises relates rather to the manner in which the Minister of Finance was proceeding during the proceedings in Parliament last Monday night.

Our ways and means practice, that is to say, our practice regarding taxation proposals, was changed fairly substantially in January, 1969. Until then, most matters of taxation were dealt with in the committee of ways and means, in which the taxing resolution preceding the bill was subject to debate. The House resolved itself into a committee of ways and means by the vehicle of a government order which permitted the Speaker simply to leave the chair.

When it came to the traditional "budget presentations", the House embarked on that debate by a debatable motion for the Speaker to leave the chair in order for the House to resolve itself into a committee of ways and means. When that debate ended, the ways and means motions based on the budget were adopted after debate in the committee of ways and means, and bills based on these motions were then introduced.

The practice since 1969 is for a ways and means motion to be tabled by a minister at any time during a sitting without notice, provided that it may not be dealt with until a later sitting, and then without debate. With respect to the budget presentation, notice is given by the government to designate a day certain for its presentation and a six day debate follows. The ways and means motions—taxation proposals—which always flow from such budget presentations are tabled during the budget presentation and are treated the same way as those ways and means motions mentioned earlier; in other words, they are dealt with at another sitting and then without debate.

The gist of the complaint of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is that what the Minister of Finance was doing last Monday was to all intents presenting a budget without adhering to the established procedures for budget presentation, and he thereby deprived opposition members from replying in the usual six-day debate that follows.

On the other hand, the position of the Minister of Finance appears to be that, whatever he did in the chamber last Monday night, he did not present a budget as envisaged by our rules but rather spoke in the context of the debate on the Speech from the Throne, and also tabled ways and means motions permitted by Standing Order 60(1), which tabling was not required to be preceded by a budget presentation.

Because the practice in respect of taxation procedures has changed considerably since 1969, the pre-1969 rulings are perhaps not as relevant, particularly since the taxation proposals were debatable then, and the complaint here is that no debate is being permitted on what is alleged to be a budget presentation.

Certain things are clear. First, taxation proposals may be tabled by a minister of the Crown at any time during a sitting. Second, a motion for their adoption is not permitted on the same day they are tabled. Third, the motion for their adoption is not debatable. Fourth, the Standing Orders of the House of Commons provide a procedure for a budget presentation. Fifth, a budget presentation for which the Standing Orders provide a procedure may be presented at a time when the government is so disposed.

Finally, it would be difficult to argue that any member may not address himself or herself to any subject when speaking during the debate on the Speech from the Throne. The practice of the House, as the records will show, has been to allow much greater leniency and not insist strictly on relevancy in the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

While the complaint, if I may so refer to it, is that the Minister of Finance showed disrespect to the House in the manner that he proceeded, the House has set down rules and has built up a practice in regard to the proceedings for ways and means, or procedures in respect of taxation, and therefore from a procedural point of view the complaint relates to the regularity of these proceedings and accordingly is a matter relating to order rather than privilege or contempt. Therefore, it seems to me that the basic criteria for a question of privilege are lacking in this instance.

The House of Commons is guided by its rules and how they have been practised. While the spirit of the rules respecting taxation procedure may have been strained last Monday night, compared with the recent practice of October 20, 1977, when the then minister of finance tabled taxation proposals during his interventions in the debate on the Speech from the Throne for that session, in my view there was not that element of irregularity in the procedures of the Minister of Finance last Monday night which would require me to intervene.

Concerning the agreement or what some people assumed to be an agreement between the parties on the order in which speakers should have been heard, the House found itself in an almost identical situation in 1977. However, at that time, the Chair had been advised of an agreement between all party leaders and it was able to fulfil the wishes of the House without any confusion. I quote from Hansard of October 20, 1977, on page 98, when the then parliamentary secretary to the president of the privy council had the floor:

> I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is hardly two minutes left and we agreed with each party's representatives to adjourn the debate at six o'clock to allow the Minister of Finance—
> —who was then Mr. Chrétien—
> —to have the floor at eight o'clock.
> The minister would be followed by a speaker for the Progressive Conservative Party, one for the New Democratic Party and finally one for the Social Credit Party of Canada. The agreement was that the previous speaker—the one who just spoke—would close his remarks at six o'clock. Since it is now a few seconds to six—
> —and I am still quoting the Parliamentary Secretary—
> —I ask that the House call it six o'clock to comply with the agreement we had reached.

[English]

If the House wishes to depart from the conventional principles regulating the process of debate, it should do so by a clear agreement, or preferably by an order of the House, if the Chair is to be the servant of the House.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to rise on a similar point with respect to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) on Friday. I think I should bring this matter to the attention of the House and the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) to make sure that there is absolutely no question in the minds of anyone here, because I know the minister would not want knowingly to mislead the House.

During the course of his remarks on page 424 of Hansard, the minister allegedly quoted me with respect to a position I took which was completely contrary to the position I did take. He quoted me as saying that an act was brought into place; I found that in the transcription. The fact is that I said that there was no act; I specifically referred to that particular fact. I am sure the minister will agree that I did not make any reference to a specific act.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 41, 266 and 343.

[Text]

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—METHODS USED FOR PURCHASING

Question No. 41—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Between April 20, 1968 and May 22, 1979, what methods were used for purchasing furniture, equipment and appurtenances or other articles for government offices?

2. Where purchases were made in bulk, were tenders called and (a) if not, in what cases were they not called (b) if so, were they by public advertisement or by invitation and if by invitation, how were the names supplied?

Hon. Jean-Jacques Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. In so far as DSS is concerned, from the establishment of the department on April 1, 1969, to 22 May, 1979, all purchases of furniture, equipment and appurtenances or other articles for government offices were made in accordance with the government conctract regulations and the subsidiary departmental supply policy manual. Purchases covered both bulk and unit requirements appropriate to customer needs.

2. Tenders are always called to cover bulk purchases. These tenders can be either competitive or non-competitive.

(a) Although, as stated above, tenders are always called, they may be non-competitive if: items to be purchased must match or interchange with items already in use; items to be purchased are available from only one supplier; items to be purchased are available from only one supplier who is able to meet required delivery conditions.

(b) By invitation to suppliers who have identified their willingness to supply the federal government and who have been qualified in accordance with departmental policies.

INDUSTRY—CAPACITY UTILIZATION

Question No. 266—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Governor of the Bank of Canada in his remarks to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on October 25, 1979, state "that many of our industries are operating uncomfortably close to capacity"?

2. Is the government aware of any industrial sectors that are in such an uncomfortable position?

3. What is the present estimated percentage capacity utilization of industry in Canada?

4. What is considered a desirable percentage, and does the government intend to introduce incentives to encourage industry to increase its capacity?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): 1. Yes.

2. The following manufacturing industries were operating at a rate of capacity utilization in the second quarter of 1979 which was greater than their average rate for 1974 as a whole: tobacco, rubber, leather, textiles, knitting, clothing, printing and wood. (1974 was the year of the previous peak for the manufacturing sector).

3. As of the fourth quarter of 1979, the latest period for which data are now available, capacity utilization in manufacturing was 86.9 per cent compared with the average rate of capacity utilization in 1974 of 90.4 per cent.

4. A decision on the need for further incentives will be made prior to the budget.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PENSION APPLICATIONS

Question No. 343—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many pension applications, in the Canadian Pension Commission of the Department of Veterans Affairs, were received but did not receive first level decision as at (a) December 31, 1978 (b) October 31, 1979?

2. How many (a) permanent (b) temporary employees were responsible for the processing of the applications in all their stages as at (i) December 31, 1978 (ii) October 31, 1979?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1. (a) 2709;

(b) 3570.

2. (a) (i) 94;

(ii) 81.

(b) (i) 4;

(ii) 4.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1980-1981

REPORTING FROM STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, notwithstanding any standing order, the Supplementary Estimates (A), 1980-1981, shall be reported or be deemed to have been reported from the several standing committees no later than May 9, 1980;

That, no later than fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment on May 15, 1980 the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then in progress and put, forthwith and successively, without amendment or debate, every question that may be necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply, the said supplementary estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the said supplementary estimates or any opposed item in the said supplementary estimates and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 72, for the passage at all stages of any bill or bills based thereon, providing that the ordinary time of adjournment shall remain suspended until all such questions have been decided; and

That, for the year 1980, Standing Order 58 shall be amended as follows:

(ii) by replacing in section (9) thereof the word "two" with the word "four";

(iii) by replacing in section (14) thereof the words "March 1 of the then expiring fiscal year" with the words "April 30"; and

(iv) by replacing in section (14) thereof the words "May 31 in the then current fiscal year" with the words "November 10".

Madam Speaker: Is is the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, although the motion may look very technical, the aim is quite simple. It is simply to adjust our standing orders to present conditions. All hon. members know we have gone through two elections this last year. This has affected very significantly the order of business, especially supply and the estimates.

All the motion boils down to is simply to try and bring back a minimum of order so that we may dispose in a positive and efficient manner the workload accumulated as a result of these last two elections. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the motion is nothing more than amendments to the standing orders for the year 1980, as I say to make the orders applicable to the business of supply we have to face.

In order to understand fully the purpose of the motion, a brief review of recent events is needed. First, we have gone through two elections in 1979-80, on May 22 and in the beginning of 1980, on February 18. As a consequence, the estimates for last year, for 1979-80, were never formally approved by the House, and the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1981, could not be tabled on the 31st of last March to be referred to the various committees of the House, as called for by the standing orders. As a result, the rules concerning the business of supply and limiting the debates do not apply. Our aim in introducing the motion today is to avoid a severe bottleneck that would render the House unproductive. It is to ensure that a fair and reasonable schedule be ordered so that we may dispose of that workload, accumulated as a result of two elections in less than a year.

I emphasize that the proposed schedule is very liberal for the opposition, because it is allowing more time than set forth in the standing orders were they applicable. Let me explain.

Under normal circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the government budget expenditures or the main budget estimates must be tabled in order to be referred to the different committees of the House, by March 1 each year. The standing orders provide that after this occurs, on May 31, that is three months later, these estimates are deemed to be automatically reported back to the House without any additional debate in committee. When the standing orders apply, that is when the estimates can be tabled by March 1, a maximum delay of three months is being allotted for their study in committee. According to the tradition, on March 26, that is the last day of one of the three supply periods provided for under the standing orders, the House of Commons adopts the interim supplies so that the government can carry on its duties and spend until such time as the main estimates are studied and passed.

Also tradition has it that it is only on June 30, at the end of one of the three supply periods, that the whole thing, namely the main estimates and the supplementary estimates which have been studied by the committees until May 31 be voted upon and finally passed on June 30 therefore within the maximum delay of four months provided for the study of the main estimates and the supplementary estimates, such matter including passage by the House of the interim supply.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, if the elections had taken place a little earlier and if the present government could have tabled the main estimates on March 1, the opposition would have had a maximum delay of three months to scrutinize them in the House committees and finally a maximum of four months before their final passage, in the meanwhile having granted the government interim supply less than 26 days after referring the main estimates to the committees.

Yet due to this exceptional situation in which we now find ourselves these normal limits which had been accepted by the House at the time of a parliamentary reform back in 1968 or 1969, these normal and natural limits provided for by the standing orders do not apply. What we must do now is to try and make sure that the desire expressed by His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne be fulfilled. I would refer you to a paragraph in that speech which states, and I quote:

[English]

Canadians expect much of this Parliament. The country asks for action and action now. The first task is to clear the accumulation of essential legislation left from previous Parliaments. This backlog must be dispatched expeditiously so that the affairs of the state may be put in good order. To that end, my government is relying on the good will of members and senators of all parties.

This was the wish expressed by His Excellency the Governor General and it is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I have opened consultations and negotiations, as I said often in this House in the last two weeks and a half, since the opening of Parliament. I believe that the good faith or good will mentioned by His Excellency the Governor General will be demonstrated in the debate on this motion, if there is one, because I am still waiting for the valuable explanations that will be certainly given by the Progressive Conservative Party so that we can orderly dispose of that backlog to make this Parliament efficient and allow it to study and deal with the real problems facing our country.

So, Mr. Speaker, what this motion says in the spirit of the wish expressed by His Excellency the Governor General in the name of efficiency and to ensure that the rights of the opposition are respected is that we are going to make sure that the two clauses of our standing orders concerning business of supply or related matters will be changed in view of the present circumstances. We are going to change a few dates in S.O. 58 which includes 19 paragraphs and determines the natural time limits that I mentioned earlier. We are going to change those dates so that the Thirty-second Parliament will be able to study the main estimates as well as the supplementary estimate within a reasonable time limit. That time limit shall be at least equal to that provided by the standing orders had they been applicable and I think that you cannot expect more from a government when it is prepared to ask for an order of the House giving the opposition more time to study the main and supplementary estimates than normally provided by the standing orders.

Another advantage of the order requested by the motion would be to give the opposition all allotted days provided by our standing orders for the two supply periods ending December 10, 1980. Let me explain: The supply procedure provides three periods each year for which a certain number of days called opposition days are allotted which can be used by the opposition parties to consider the estimates or subjects which interest the Canadian Parliament. These three supply periods are as follows: The first goes from March 26 to June 30 and includes 13 days allotted to the opposition. The second period goes from June 30 to December 10 and provides five allotted days for the opposition. The third period extends from December 10 to March 26 and grants seven more allotted days, which makes a grand total of 25 allotted days in a year.

If we look at the period provided in the motion now under consideration, we note that it provides two supply periods and grants to the opposition the total number of allotted days normally provided in these supply periods. In other words, the motion provides 18 allotted days for the opposition parties from now until December 10, while our standing orders normally provide the same number of days for the period between March 26 and December 10. As I said earlier, there are 13 allotted days between March 26 and June 30 and five between June 30 and December 10, which makes a total of 18. We are now at April 28, and as is quite obvious from the motion, we would be willing to grant to the opposition parties the 18 allotted days that would be provided under our rules if today were March 26. In other words, the opposition would have 18 allotted days for a period of about seven months instead of having 18 allotted days for a period of about eight months, which is clearly to the advantage of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to summarize the two advantages provided in this motion. First of all, in a shorter period, the opposition parties would have the same number of allotted days, that is 18, as the number provided by the standing orders between now and December 10, which is a considerable advantage, and second, the main and supplementary estimates could be considered in committee, not only for three months, as provided normally by the standing orders, but for over six months.

We are saying in effect that these estimates will be considered as having been thoroughly studied and will be tabled in the House only on November 10, as opposed to the other deadline which would normally be May 31. Therefore, we have a second advantage: it will be possible for the opposition parties to scrutinize and make a more extensive study of the estimates during a period of time twice as long as is normally provided for in the standing orders.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the government proposal is very reasonable in allowing Parliament to act efficiently and demonstrate to the Canadian public our desire to work in an orderly fashion to be able to clear this enormous accumulation of legislation left from the previous Parliaments and in the wake of two successive elections in less than one year; but today's order will allow us to be duly efficient without infringing on the rights of the opposition, and without preventing the opposition from making a detailed study of the government's estimates and main expenditures. On the contrary, the motion under study will amend S.O. 58 dealing with the business of supply and ways and means in that opposition parties, will come out the winners as they will have much more latitude to criticize, to analyse and to debate the estimates and to do so in an orderly fashion.

So, Mr. Speaker, I do want to believe in the good will of opposition parties on the necessity of disposing within reasonable time of this backlog, and in particular what we are discussing today, the business of supply. The Progressive Conservative Party which so far has failed to agree on this kind of order of the House and failed to make counterproposals. In the consideration of this motion for a special order of the House, a consideration that I hope will be very short so we can dispose of the very large number of other urgent bills that have accumulated as a result of the two successive elections we have had in a year, I am confident the Progressive Conservative Party will prove reasonable and show the good will that is hoped for by His Excellency the Governor General.

I am confident, and I say so in all sincerity, that that party will allow us to work effectively because we are offering them in that order something more generous than what the opposition normally gets under the rules of this House. And I am sure that my colleague, the Leader of the Offical Opposition in this House, is going to co-operate so as to ensure that that good will is there. I am convinced he will give us the proof in this debate that that good will being required by His Excellency the Governor General is possible between the three parties in this House, and that is why today I ask the Progressive Conservative Party to accept the generosity of the government, to admit that indeed the proposed order is much more generous than the otherwise applicable rules of this House. Furthermore, I am quite aware that there might be a debate perhaps to get some explanations on the required order of the House but I think the Progressive Conservative Party today has an excellent opportunity to prove it is anxious to see Parliament dispose effectively of the legislative business that has accumulated as a result of an extraordinary situation, namely, two elections in less than a year.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and for purposes of clarification. I know that the President of the Privy Council would not want to mislead the House intentionally. He has made references throughout his presentation with respect to statements made by His Excellency the Governor General in the course of the throne speech debate as though this was the personal request of the Governor General. I was speaking with the Governor General just the other day, Mr. Speaker, and he never mentioned a word about this particular problem.

• (1540)

I wonder if the President of the Privy Council would want to make it quite clear on the record that the Speech from the Throne, although read by the Governor General, is set down by none other than the Prime Minister and his cabinet, including the hon. President of the Privy Council.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the throne speech that I quoted speaks for itself. As for the ways my colleague might want to interpret it and the private conversations that he might have had with those who helped draft the throne speech, I cannot vouch for them, I was not there. But the passage I quoted is evidence of the fact that there is in this country a desire for the government to stop dragging its feet and carry out its business more efficiently. That was all I wanted to convey by quoting the very words of the throne speech, and we want to act, Mr. Speaker, in the greatest respect for the rights of the Progressive Conservative Party and other opposition parties. In that regard we want to give the opposition parties more scope and more time than stipulated in the standing orders. That is exactly what is proposed in the motion now before us.

Therefore I ask the hon. member on what principle he refuses such generosity from the government. I think his position is illogical.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is at all fair for anyone to blame the Governor General for the contents of the speech he read two and one half weeks ago. I am glad that the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has pointed out to the people of Canada that it is not the Governor General who is responsible for the speech but the government that speaks through the Governor General on that particular occasion. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I noted the pious way in which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) expressed this gift. He wishes to give members on this side a gift. He wishes to give us something we did not have before. He wants to give us several extra opposition days within a certain period of time. It really touched one to hear him describe what he was going to give us. We do not want something to be given to us. We think that the rights of Parliament are rights, not to be given to us by the gift of the government.

We think that members of the House should have certain rights—that the opposition have certain rights, and that the government, of course, have certain rights. They have the right of a majority and if they do not exercise that right with some sense and discretion and propriety, then we will have no rights on this side of the House.

We do not want the President of the Privy Council to give us a couple of little opposition days. What is the good of an opposition day in any event? What does it lead to? We do not want that. We want the President of the Privy Council, now representing a government with a strong majority, to give us something far better than that—to give us some rights. Grant us some rights. Let us enshrine some rights in the rules of the House.

I shall move an amendment to his motion later that is supremely reasonable and will carry out some of the items that we were going to carry out ourselves in the direction of parliamentary reform, so that on this side of the House we will not have to be begging like trained seals on our flippers to the President of the Privy Council, begging him for a couple of extra opposition days and so that we will have the right to have ministers come before the House with their estimates. I mean ministers who are recalcitrant, ministers who are arrogant, ministers who will not come to committees or who only come when they feel it fit to come to committees. These are ministers who do not want to answer questions in committees, ministers who have to have their minions on the backbenches on the government side protect them in committees, occupying time, as Mr. Speaker knows.

In these mighty committees that examine these estimates, everybody has ten minutes to question the minister. Lo and behold, the government has a majority on the committees and members of that government majority use up their ten minutes each footling around so that the minister will not have to answer any pertinent questions, any rude questions, any direct questions, and so that we will not have time to embarrass the minister or dig into some scandal or ferret out some information.

That is what happens in the committees—the majority wastes our time. The committees are absolutely useless for the discussion of estimates, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We, with no power, with a minority, are in no position to demand anything. When these estimates go out to committees, forget it! We are going to learn nothing in those committees, unless accidentally along the way when we have some officials there who might give us a truthful and full answer and the minister is not around to stop them.

That is what these House of Commons committee studies of the estimates are. The worst thing that ever happened to the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, was when the estimates were taken away from this House and Committee of the Whole and sent to committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: So the minister gives us nothing. The minister gives us the square root of nothing. The minister gives us zero—zilch.

We have not agreed to the motion that he is proposing today, and we are not going to accept the motion he is proposing here today; we have our own alternative. If he is a man who is going to listen to the Speech from the Throne, if he is going to rely on the good will of members, then I know that he is going to spread a goodly measure of good will in the chamber. He is going to listen to anything we propose that is reasonable and proper and that will help the members of this House.

When the good will of members is being discussed, Mr. Speaker, I cast my mind back to one week ago today and the good will that was demonstrated in the House when there was a mini budget or financial statement bootlegged into the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I cast myself back there and look at all the good will that was generated on that Monday night, the fantastic good will that was displayed in this chamber.

The question of privilege that we raised has been found not to be privilege. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) put his finger on the matter when he said that this is not a question of the technical rules of the House but a question of how the government wants to approach the House, of what kind of atmosphere they want to exhibit in the House. That is what it all is about. We have not seen too much good will yet. We are relying on the government for the good will. We are relying on the government to exhibit some of that good will.

The Speech from the Throne said that Canadians expect much from this Parliament. Canadians expected much from the last Parliament, Mr. Speaker, but they got precious little chance to see what the last Parliament could do. The last parliament met for only two months and then it was terminated. During those several months there was very little co-operation by the opposition with the then minority government; in fact, there was none.

We are willing to forget all that, Mr. Speaker. I can tell the President of the Privy Council that, for my own part, I should like to get through all the legislation that is non-controversial, and there is a lot of that. I do not see any reason why there should be long debates. We will deal with it speedily and efficiently so long as we get co-operation on this side of the House.

Where we want that co-operation, Mr. Speaker, is in dealing with these estimates, but not dealing with them out in committees of the House where they get no publicity, where we have not got the weapons, where the minister can deal with us as a toy. We can ask the minister a question, he can take nine and a half minutes to answer it and so the ten minutes is up.

When one gets the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) before the committee and asks a question about blended oil pricing, he speaks for nine or nine and a half minutes. By then his time is up and he smiles as he finishes his peroration. He has not answered the question, has not given one bit of information and never intended to. Then we pass on to the next questioner. A Liberal backbencher tells him how good he is, what a wonderful job he is doing. He asks penetrating questions such as, "Mr. Minister, do you realize how good you are?"

We do not want that. We want some of the estimates brought here for discussion. We want the estimates of the ministers who are the most arrogant, overbearing, supercilious, the weakest. Perhaps we could choose one weak one and then one who thinks he is the bee's knees and is really tough. We want to discuss these estimates in Committee of the Whole with unlimited time, until the good gentleman comes forward with the information. What is this blended oil price? How is it going to give the people of Canada what they have been promised? That is what we want to know.

If we are treated that way, Mr. Speaker, then you can count on our good will. We are going to have lots of good will in this Parliament. There will be more good will, Mr. Speaker, than you have ever seen in your life. The President of the Privy Council will practically drown in good will. But I will come to my amendment later.

We see a government that has come back with a majority and in just two weeks it has done its best to crush good will in this House. It bootlegged in a budget without adequate warning to members and then dealt with it in a very cavalier fashion. It stopped the Speech from the Throne after six days so that even if we wanted to discuss this bootlegged budget in the address in reply, we could not do it.

After doing that, Mr. Speaker, they brought in the estimates. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) said these were the estimates but they were not going to pay any attention to them. He said: "This is not our policy; we are putting these estimates before you so that we can get interim supply".

That was a bald-faced admission that we were being given these estimates not because they were accurate estimates of what this government intends to spend, but because this government wants to sling interim supply out of the House of Commons and it has to present something. After being questioned for two days, the President of the Treasury Board did not know what was in the estimates. There was $2 billion more in the estimates of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) than in the estimates of the President of the Treasury Board. So the President of the Treasury Board does not know what is happening in finance and finance does not know what is happening in treasury board; and the two of them together do not know what is happening to the economy. There is a $2 billion discrepancy and the President of the Treasury Board could not tell us where it was. He said he would have to have time to survey; I have his exact words and I am coming to them, Mr. Speaker. Before I am finished this week, I will be dealing with these matters in detail but I will be coming to the exact words used by the President of the Treasury Board. I am leading up to the subject gently.

I recommend to the President of the Treasury Board that he look at Hansard for October 12, 1979. I have it underlined here. It struck me at the time as being such a pertinent statement. We know that the former minister of finance now has his fingers in the dikes; all of his fingers and toes are in the dikes in Quebec. He is not in the House this afternoon but he said a very pertinent thing and gave a piece of advice to our government. Too bad our government did not have time to act on it. This is what he said as reported at page 147 of Hansard:

> There is only one thing that matters: to be honest with the public.

Imagine a Liberal giving that piece of advice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I want to repeat that so hon. gentlemen opposite will know what is the cardinal principle that rules the government:

> There is only one thing that matters: to be honest with the public. That is all I ask of the government.

That is what the hon. gentleman who is now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) asked of us last October. Lo and behold, we were honest with the House and we were honest with the public. Now we are over here and they are over there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: That was our trouble; we listened to that advice. The day that he opened his mouth and gave us that advice was a poor day for us. Now I am giving the President of the Privy Council the same piece of advice. There is only one thing that matters: to be honest with the public.

The motion before us gives us nothing. If the motion of the President of the Privy Council is passed, the supplementary estimates will now go off to the committees and they will be diddled around with for a couple of weeks. Everyone will have a fine time there saying how good the ministers are. The minister will have a fine time saying "Look, I am only here two months, I cannot answer your questions". They will all come back to the House, and there will not be a word of debate in this House. Under this motion, there will not be a word of debate in the House of Commons on the supplementary estimates if this motion passes. There will not be a word in this House about the interim supply for 1980-81, which will take the government to the end of December. Not one word will we be granted permission to speak in this House on billions of dollars of spending under interim supply from now until December. That is what the President of the Privy Council offers the official opposition. I do not know what members of the NDP will do. We all know that they are very subtle in these matters. They have all the consistency of a corkscrew.

Mr. Crosbie: We know the attitude that they took. We know how straightforward they were, how resolute they were that the rights of this chamber be backed up right to the fore, right to the very hilt, when we were the government and the Liberals, NDP and Social Credit party had a majority over us. Then, by golly, they wanted everything done right and proper. We had to give, give, give, which we did not mind doing because we wanted to change the rules and get this House operating a bit better. We hear the members of the NDP from the length and breadth of Canada. They are fighting for democracy every day of their lives. Every minute of every hour they are fighting, fighting, fighting. We know that they will not be found lacking when we move our amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Now, what about the main estimates? Let us look at the main estimates. We will have until next December to study the main estimates. Can you not see all of those committee members burrowing in every day in August, Saturdays and Sundays, racketing through those main estimates right until next December?

An hon. Member: They do not mean anything.

Mr. Crosbie: March next, 1981, they will tell us they were not their estimates anyway, that they had to change policy. So we will all be going through these estimates in committees, in the crevices of this building where the committees meet. All the press will be there watching and listening to every word we are saying and taking it all in as we are grilling those ministers who turn up when they leave Waikiki, or whatever, every couple of weeks to answer to the estimates. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the main estimates will not come back to the House either? Have I got that right, Mr. Leader? Mr. Leader, where are you when I need you?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Right here.

Mr. Crosbie: Is it not true that the main estimates will not come back either?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Crosbie: The past president of the privy council, who shall be privy to the council again some day, tells me that that is right, that the main estimates under this rule will not come back to this chamber. We have seen the last of the main estimates. We know that we have opposition days but the main estimates will not come back to the House of Commons. So that is not quite good enough.

Before I get to making my motion, I want to tell the House about some other things that we are a teensy-weensy bit concerned about. There does not seem to be any sense of urgency on the part of the government such as they felt last fall with financial and economic matters. The leader of the government seems to be uncertain about what he is worried about. He is not worried, we are told, about the deficit. No, that does not worry the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I am glad that he has said he is not worried by that, because I would not have thought he could survive the worry if he had been worried about it in view of what he has done with the estimates and with the deficits over the past ten years. But he has said no, he is not concerned about the deficit. He has a henchman, the Minister of Finance, and he is not concerned either.

I do not want to be accused of quoting anyone incorrectly. Usually I have thousands of quotations and from time to time, Mr. Speaker, you may have to wait a minute or two while I get the exact quote so no one will accuse me of being unjust. In any event, here is what the Prime Minister said at his press conference on Thursday. I think the Prime Minister is probably going to give up holding press conferences. He said that "the reason why we want to reduce the deficit then is not to improve the health of the Canadian economy". I do not know why he wants to reduce it if he does not want to improve the health of the Canadian economy. Here he is saying it is healthy. We have a Prime Minister who thinks the Canadian economy is healthy. He does not want to reduce the deficit to improve the health of the Canadian economy because the Canadian economy, lo and behold, is healthy.

This is the economy that he said several months ago when he was in opposition was in ruin and tatters. This is the same economy regarding which last Monday night the Minister of Finance gave certain information and projections as to what was going to happen with the economy; in other words, the economic outlook for Canada. Here is what he said at page 245 of Hansard for April 21:

> The general view is that there will be little or no growth in Canada in 1980.

Little or no growth is healthy? How healthy can you get? The Prime Minister is not worried about little or no growth in Canada. He clapped his Minister of Finance on the back and said: "That is the healthiest statement, Allan, that you have made since we have been in the government". I repeat: "The general view is that there will be little or no growth in Canada in 1980". We have a really healthy economy? The Minister of Finance goes on to say at page 246 of Hansard:

> Our latest forecast is that the economy will grow by only one-half of one per cent.

It is getting healthier all the time. Imagine, the economy is going to grow a whole one-half of one per cent and the Prime Minister of this country thinks that is very healthy and therefore does not have to worry about the deficit. That is his statement. That is the person who is leading the government and will lead it for the next four or five years. One fears for this country, Mr. Speaker, when one realizes that a man who is going to lead this country for four or five years thinks that our economy today is healthy.

Then the Minister of Finance said this:

> The consumer price index is projected to rise by 10 per cent.

That is very, very healthy! This is great news, Mr. Speaker! The CPI is going up 10 per cent. This is great news for Canadians. It is positively healthy; very, very healthy. Again the Minister of Finance said that there will be an increase in the nominal value of the GNP of around 10 per cent.

An hon. Member: What about unemployment?

Mr. Crosbie: Someone mentions unemployment. What about unemployment? Somewhere he has a word about unemployment. I see interest rates, mortgages, other domestic sectors, aggregate demand, residential construction. He is trying to hide it here somewhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Ah, here it is. He says that the unemployment rate is now expected to rise to an average of 8 per cent. I have campaign speeches here made by the Prime Minister. I can get them out and quote them, and I probably will as the week goes on. He says in those speeches that he cannot risk while Canada has one million unemployed. He cannot risk while Canada has one person unemployed. He was positively bubbling over with his enthusiasm during the campaign to fight unemployment, to get the unemployed back to work. Now he is ensconced in his comfortable government post again and the Canadian economy is healthy. It is positively healthy. Here is his Minister of Finance saying the unemployment rate is going to rise from an average of 7½ per cent to about 8 per cent. That is supposed to be healthy!

● (1600)

The volume of consumer spending is projected to increase 2 per cent. The cycle of investment expansion which began in 1979 is expected to continue through 1980 with a further increase of more than 7½ per cent in real terms.

That is if the Minister of Finance's mini-budget does not put a stop to that. That is the healthy economy that the Prime Minister was referring to. Then he says:

—rather it is necessary to reduce the deficit because interest charges on the deficit are so high because of high interest rates.

That is what he is supposed to have said at the press conference. According to The Ottawa Journal, Friday, April 22, and I quote:

Prime Minister Trudeau made it clear yesterday that a large federal deficit in itself does not worry him, but the debt charges the government must pay on the deficit do.

We have a Prime Minister that does not realize that without one you cannot have the other. He is not worried about the deficit, he is just worried about the debt charges. He does not have to worry about the debt charges if he keeps the deficit down, but if he allows the deficit to go up then he has more reason to worry about the debt charges.

Our Prime Minister does not realize that debt charges are connected to the deficit. This year it is going to go up $14.1 billion, according to figures given to this House one week ago, and the debt charges this year are going up $10.775 billion. As for the interest charges alone, one out of every four tax dollars paid by the Canadian taxpayer this year is going to pay interest of $10.775 billion. That is the present estimate; it may be more. One out of every four of your tax dollars, Mr. Speaker, is going to go to pay interest. It would not be going to pay interest if there was not a deficit and if there had not been during the Prime Minister's tenure these ever-increasing deficits.

What have these deficits been? I am not going to go back to the start in 1968 when we had a net debt of $16.76 billion. That has now quadrupled. At the end of 1979-80 it was something like $67.7 billion. At the end of this year it will be something like $81.8 billion. The net debt of the Government of Canada has quadrupled during the Prime Minister's tenure in office. Why has it quadrupled? Because the Prime Minister does not worry about a large federal deficit. He only worries about the interest charges, and he has not worried about them until very recently. From the time he took office we have quadrupled the national government's debt.

What were the debt charges back in those days of 1968? We paid $1.27 billion in interest and debt charges. Today we are paying nine times as much. It has quadrupled. He has "ninetupled" these interest payments on the debt. Well might he be concerned now, Mr. Speaker. He lately comes to his concern about the debt charges, but they are "ninetupled" since he took office in 1968.

I will not go right back to 1968, but I will give some figures from 1972-73. In 1972-73, and that is only eight years ago, our deficit was $968 million and our debt charges were $2.27 billion. In 1973-74, encouraged by this reasonable deficit, we had a deficit of $1.4 billion and the debt charges went to $2.55 billion. In 1974-75 $1,650 million was the deficit and the debt charges went to $3.16 billion.

The Prime Minister must have been surprised. The Prime Minister must have said to his minister of finance, "What are you doing, what is going on here? Why are these debt charges going up? How dare you have these debt charges; don't you realize I don't like debt charges, they worry me?" Surely the minister of finance of the day must have said, "Prime Minister, I can't help these debt charges if you are going to have these deficits". Apparently he never did because it is only in the last week the Prime Minister has learned there is a connection.

In 1975-76 there was a deficit of $5.3 billion and the debt charges went to $3.91 billion. In 1976-77, the deficit was $6.093 billion and the debt charges went to $4.66 billion. In 1977-78 the deficit was $10.098 billion and the debt charges $5.47 billion. In 1978-79 the deficit was $12.103 billion and the debt charges $6.87 billion. In 1979-80 the deficit was $11,450 million and the debt charges $8,420 million. That is last year.

The Minister of Finance came into this House last Monday and calmly told the people of Canada the deficit is going up from the one projected by us; it is going to increase $3.7 billion to $14,165 million and the debt charges are going to be $10,775 million. Why are the debt charges that high? Because of all these deficits.

When the Prime Minister says that the large federal deficit does not worry him but he worries about the debt charges, he has to realize, and I hope the Minister of Finance will have the courage to tell him, that there is a connection. If you do not like these debt charges, Mr. Speaker, you have to reduce the deficit. The Prime Minister still appears not to know.

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Crosbie: There is an NDPer croaking in the corner. That is all they are good for, swelling up and croaking in obscure corners of Canada. There is not one of them east of Ontario; The plague has been done away with. As long as we get no more fleas down our way, we are safe.

Here is what the Minister of Finance said about the deficit just after he received this prestigious appointment. I quote from the March 7 edition of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald:

Mr. MacEachen, trained as an economist—

That is going to be a shock to a lot of people.

—says he is concerned but not consumed by the size of the government's $11.8 billion deficit.

When it was $11.8 billion, he was concerned but not consumed. Now it is $14.1 billion. One can only hope that he is concerned and consumed and that he will do something about it and not sit tamely by uncaring. He had further advice in that same interview, and I again quote him:

"The best way to bring about lower interest rates is, of course, to reduce, generally, inflationary pressures in the country," he said without offering specific measures.

The amount of specificity we will ever get from this Minister of Finance is going to be strictly limited. Specificity, or whatever that word is, is not one of his strong points. Getting up in this House and using 25 sentences when one word or three words would suffice is his strength. But the people of Canada are going to be demanding specific measures.

The Prime Minister thinks the economy is healthy. The people of Canada do not think it is healthy and they are going to be wanting answers. We all remember. By the way, Mr. Speaker, I do not say that the government's policy is wrong on the interest rates. They are facing the same situation we were faced with. Until anyone can be convinced there is a better approach, unfortunately the Bank of Canada and higher interest rates have to be endured. That situation has not changed since they took office. Therefore, I have not blamed them since they took office for the fact that interest rates have gone up. What I blame them for is that when they were out of office last fall and knew better and knew that their policy would be not one iota different from ours, they tried to pretend in this House that they had some other policy, some better policy.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) used to get up and crow and bloat in this House about the different policies—and I am coming to that in a few minutes—that he had. The House will recall that they had a made-in-Canada interest rate policy and that they had a made-in-Canada oil pricing policy. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) said it was the same old policy that we had, and he is where he is now and we are where we are now because of that. Yes, he took the advice of the former minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice. There is only one thing that matters, to be honest with the public; and he knows where honesty with the public gets you, just as we do.

Do you remember made-in-Canada interest rates, Mr. Speaker? Oil prices were going to be made in Canada. What else?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Made-in-Canada fabrications.

Mr. Crosbie: All their fabrications were going to be made in Canada. Here is what the Minister of Finance said on Friday, April 18, as I mentioned the other day in the House, in the Toronto Star. If something is in the Star, how I wonder where you are if it's in the Toronto Star. Here it is. It must be true. He said this:

MacEachen said the lower rate was "welcome news".

That is the lower interest rate. But:

"—it's worth pointing out that the high interest rates we have had and the very rapid increases in these rates recently have been the direct result of action taken in the United States".

Just a couple of months ago during the election campaign the hon. gentleman opposite claimed we were going to have our own Canadian interest rate policy which would not be subject to the fact that the economy of the United States has an influence here. There were going to be made-in-Canada interest rates.

Well, where are the made-in-Canada interest rates now that the Liberals are back in office? They have "sleveened" their way back into office with that kind of approach. Where are they now when they stand up, frankly, and say there is no made-in-Canada interest rate policy, when they say "we are helpless" and that these increases in rates are the direct result of action taken in the United States? It was the same last fall, the same when they were in office in 1978 and 1979. So they are not giving the people of this country any confidence when that is the best they can do, to turn their position so quickly as they have done.

Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he is needed? Where is this veritable Hercules who was in the opposition last fall, who had so many suggestions as to what policy should be and how we had to develop an industrial strategy, how we had to get at the problem of unemployment, how we had to create jobs and what we had to do with the auto pact? Can you not remember him? Well, what is happening now? "Ontario hardest hit by U.S. slowdown"; I quote now from The Ottawa Journal, again an article by Robert Stephens.

Ontario will suffer more than any other province from the current U.S. slowdown, and thus will turn in one of the worst economic performances in the country this year. That's the gloomy forecast released . . . by the Conference Board in Canada. It predicts that Ontario's 0.6 per cent decline in the real domestic product will be exceeded only by New Brunswick's projected 1 per cent drop.

It goes on to say that in Ontario:

—manufacturing accounts for about 30 per cent of the output of the province, and therefore the provincial economy is particularly vulnerable to difficulties in this key sector. The shrinking U.S. auto market, higher inflation, and tighter credit will continue to restrain manufacturing.

How can these things be? The gentleman who had all the solutions last fall, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not here today to enlighten us with his new policies on industrial strategy, his new policies of going with the winner, like Chrysler, one of the great winners that he is going to go with. Why is he not here to enlighten us on the government's dynamic new policies which are going to overcome the shrinking U.S. auto market, higher inflation and tighter credit?

The Conference Board predicts that Ontario's manufacturing output will decline by almost 4 per cent.

This is despite the fact that we now have the "Windsor wizard" as Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He is not in the House now telling us how he is going to cure the problems.

Some hon. gentlemen might think I am being unfair. They might say that surely the wicked Windsor of west or whatever he is, the hon. member for Windsor West, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, did not say anything like that, that I am being unfair, positively unfair. I cannot find any quotations showing where he said anything like that. Well, it strikes my eye that I have one from the Prime Minister which I will give first. The Prime Minister was leader of the opposition on November 6, and a sorry looking sight he was. He used to slump in his chair like a crushed rose. He did not come into this House last fall with a new flower in his lapel every day. Not on your life he did not because the pubic treasure chest was not available. There were no fresh flowers. They disappeared. The fresh flowers are back blooming again now because there is a secret vote in the estimates for flowers for the Prime Minister somewhere. No, last fall when he came in he would get in his chair and slump over. His head would be down. I do not think he asked ten questions in the whole of the fall. He was crushed. He was despondent. But on November 6 he did move a non-confidence motion. He blamed the then government for four things. I will quote only one of them to save time because I do not want to use up too much time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I want to leave some time next week for you people.

Miss Jewett: Let's hear your amendment.

Mr. Crosbie: I am coming to that. I am referring to page 998 of Hansard for November 6 last:

That this House has no confidence in the government because it will cause severe economic hardship—

He gave four reasons, and the fourth was:

—through its acceptance of record high interest rates.

The present Prime Minister last November 6 moved a non-confidence vote in our government because of what he called our acceptance of record high interest rates. At the time he moved that non-confidence vote the central bank rate was 14 per cent. That sounds pretty good now. On October 25, 1979, 14 per cent in the Bank of Canada; the prime bank rate, 15 per cent. Since the hon. gentleman who moved that non-confidence vote got into power, the bank rate went to 16.2 per cent, the Bank of Canada rate, and the prime bank rates went to 17.5 per cent. Now, thank God, they have gone down a bit; the Bank of Canada rate is 15.67 per cent, and the prime rate of the banks is somewhere around 17 per cent or in that area. They are still considerably higher than when the Prime Minister moved his non-confidence motion last November 6. So what has happened? Is he going to get out of office himself? If he does not get out of office himself, why not?

He had no confidence in our government last November 6, not because of our inability to do anything, but because of our acceptance of record high interest rates. That Prime Minister has accepted vastly higher interest rates since he got into office, and he campaigned on the basis that he could do something about interest rates. He was going to reduce them, and he was going to help those suffering from high interest rates. He was going to help mortgagors. He was going to do it all, and he has done nothing, zilch, for them since he got into office. He has tamely accepted those higher interest rates that he blamed the government for last fall.

Mr. Evans: Are they going up or coming down?

Mr. Blenkarn: Say anything, do anything.

An hon. Member: Say anything, do nothing.

Mr. Crosbie: That quote just caught my eye while I was going by, on my way to coming to another gentleman, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I do not want any member here thinking I am unfair. I just want to get a couple of quotes on record to show that last fall he did pretend he was Superman. He was "Super Herb". He had the answers, and it was inexplicable that we were not doing and performing the miracles he was going to perform.

On November 6 the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservatives' high interest rate policy has already adversely affected the economy.

That is what he said. Now, after he got into power the old high interest rate policy was not affecting the economy at all, presumably, but last fall on November 6 right there at page 1031 he shook his head: They had "already adversely affected the economy". Then he went on to say this:

For some members on this side, Mr. Speaker, there may well have been an argument for allowing interest rates to rise a year ago when it still meant they were only one or two points above the level of inflation, but when the Conservatives allowed our interest rates to go above 14 per cent, five points higher than the rate of inflation, then I think it is a different matter. It means a frontier has been crossed into dangerous, uncharted territory for the Canadian economy.

Lo and behold, we were into trouble there—dangerous, uncharted territory. As a result, he said:

—I believe it is right and necessary for Liberals to take a new approach and a new look at interest rate policy.

That was what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said last November 6. Now the Liberals have taken a new approach, they have taken a new look, and our interest rates are now one and one half points higher than they were last November 6. Where is their new look? Where is their new approach?

When they were asked at the beginning of the session to approve a motion to establish the finance committee so that they could hear from Mr. Bouey, they refused. The work of that committee on the interest rate hearings had only begun early last fall. I was glad to appear before the committee. I was glad to have them sit because, frankly, if I could be persuaded of some better policy I was quite ready, willing and able to be persuaded and to take some other course rather than see interest rates going up as they were. If the finance committee could have come up with something that seemed better and which I could take the risk of accepting, I would have been glad to do so. But I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker: it is the minister of finance who takes the responsibility and therefore he cannot just go gambling over what is going to happen to interest rates and the Canadian dollar. He has to be pretty sure of his ground; he must see that some pretty heavy "heavies" are giving him advice, and no matter who gives him advice, it will be he, the minister, who is responsible if the Canadian economy is wrecked as a result. That is why I accepted the advice I was given last fall and which I felt I had to continue accepting. But if the finance committee or anyone else could have come up with convincing arguments to show our economy would be better off if we did not follow that route, I would certainly have been willing to follow it.

Why does the government prevent the House of Commons finance committee going on with this work? The committee had a number of learned economists, some from the United States and some from Canada, appearing before it to give evidence. The then minister of finance had appeared, Mr. Bouey had appeared. He was anxious to come back. Why is that committee not now functioning? There is the same problem of high interest rates, the same economic problems, only worse, why will the government now not permit the House of Commons finance committee to go ahead with its interest rate hearings? What has changed? It is not the problem that has changed. It is only the government which has changed, and the group which was over here demanding hearings and demanding that governor Bouey be hung and demanding that I be hung alongside him are now following governor Bouey to the scaffold.

Mr. Knowles: We are listening.

Mr. Crosbie: You are listening but you never learn. If that irresponsible group in that corner ever got to power, God help Canada. The foolishness they have tooted and touted from coast to coast would be the economic ruination of this country. I hope they are listening, I hope they are learning, but I doubt it. I have never heard such nonsense: if they ever get into power they are going to pass an order in council saying that interest rates must go down 2 per cent. Imagine, old Broadbent was going to do that all by himself, he was going to sweep down interest rates by 2 per cent. The Liberals never said anything as foolish as that.

An hon. Member: That is a compliment.

Mr. Crosbie: A backhanded compliment—the Liberals are not quite as foolish as the NDP.

Miss Jewett: Why not speak to the motion?

Mr. Crosbie: I hear a member speaking who during the last campaign put a sword right into her leader's back, and now she has the audacity to call out to me. I have been warned, and now I want to watch the swordplay over there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: I said "speak to the motion". What is your amendment?

Mr. Crosbie: The leader of the NDP was lucky he got back to this House. His back was ventilated by the hon. member from Vancouver-something-or-other.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Members of that group cannot listen to economic sense. I want to go on, Mr. Speaker. What the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said on November 6 was this:

> The Liberals and I generally want action taken now to prevent the hardship this Conservative high interest rate policy is creating for millions of Canadians and their families.

This was his demand as recorded at page 1032 of Hansard. He wanted action taken immediately. Well, he has been in office since the end of February. Has any action been taken? No, the only action was that interest rates went up further and hon. members opposite refused to help mortgagors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we in this party had a mortgage interest and property tax program which would have helped.

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: I do not know who is croaking "order". This is interim supply and we can talk about everything in the estimates. And I intend to talk about everything in the estimates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What action have members opposite taken? They have left the mortgagors dangling in the air. They say they are going to help some 6,000 or 7,000 and the rest they are going to let sink. The great Liberal government promised to help the people of Canada in their problem; they were going to assist the renters, they were going to assist the mortgagors. Now, unless a person spends 30 per cent of his income on mortgage payments, he is to be left dangling in the air. If you get $10,000 a year, unless you spend $3,000 on housing you are not going to get any help. The party opposite did not go across Canada campaigning like that, Mr. Speaker. They never said to all the mortgagors out there: "If you spend 30 per cent of your income we are going to give you an acorn to help you"—the one acorn that the old leases used to request. But there it was. He wanted action taken at once to avoid hardship.

Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce today when those Canadians suffering hardship as a result of high interest rates are looking to him for help? He is not in this House. I do not know where he is. He is in Windsor; he is talking to Chrysler; he is talking to Ford. He has seen Ford, he has seen Chrysler. Ford will not see him. He sees them, they will not see him. He complains about the grants they got. He complains because the Liberals entered into an agreement with Ford which did not include any protection and did not guarantee the number of jobs; it was a piece of botchery, debauchery, on the part of the Liberals. Anyway, he is not around here to tell us what action to take or what action he is taking.

Last fall, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite wanted a budget. My, it is amazing how things change when people move just a few feet across the floor of this chamber. They demanded a budget. Why? The present Minister of Justice had this to say on October 23:

> It is important that the nation know where it stands. I hope the Minister of Finance will tell us what he is thinking and what he intends to do.

That is why they wanted a budget last fall. I refer to page 517 of Hansard. The former minister of finance went on to give various other reasons and, as reported at page 516, he said:

> We have to get ready to move now rather than push back all the problems until later.

I could read his whole speech and the reasons he gave. The hon. member for Windsor West also gave his reasons for demanding a budget, as reported at page 950 of Hansard for November 5, but I will not put on record all the reasons they gave then for demanding a budget. Why do they not talk, now, to this reluctant debutante, the present Minister of Finance? He does not want to bring in a budget. Why does he not want to let the nation know where he stands? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. It is because when the nation finds out where he stands, the nation will know that he stands on sand. The nation is not going to like where he stands. The nation is not going to like what it hears; it is not going to like the tax measures he is going to bring in unless his oil blender can go to work and save him somehow by getting the billions of dollars of revenue he needs. From where? Is he going to take his blender out to the tar sands? Has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources got some magic blender he intends to set up way out on the tar sands and start blending to get us the oil we need at a reasonable price?

The Minister of Finance is waiting because he is pinning his hopes on the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and a more unlikely magician I never saw. "Mandrake the magician" has nothing on that gentleman. When Premier Lougheed gets through with him you will not be able to pick him up with tweezers. But he has to pull off this miracle. Because if you are not going to impose an excise tax on gasoline, which would have helped Canada, which would have helped conservation, which would have been the way the IMF recommended to the governments of the western world, and if you are not going to get the $2.5 billion in revenue which a measure of that kind would produce, then the revenue has to be obtained from somewhere else. And as the President of the Treasury Board has said, the only way to bring down the deficit is to increase revenue.

So the Minister of Finance is not bringing in a budget. He does not want the nation to know where he stands. He does not want the nation to know what he is thinking. He does not want the nation to know what he intends to do. That is why he has not brought in a full budget or is not bringing in one in May. So in power the hon. gentlemen are doing the exact opposite to what they said they would do when they were out of power.

An hon. Member: What about the amendment?

Mr. Crosbie: I am coming to the amendment. When I come to it, I think the hon. member will support it.

An hon. Member: I would love to hear it.

Mr. Crosbie: You are going to hear it, believe me; you are going to be the first one to hear it.

I was talking about the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He is a very strong and powerful minister; he is going to perform miracles by making Canada control its own economy. He is going to get back control of our own industry. He is going to do a mighty job, and we all wish him well with it. For 30 to 40 years his party allowed the control of the Canadian economy to go to the United States and to go everywhere. They did not care about who controlled the Canadian economy. Their policy from 1945 onward was to let it slip. They paid lip service to it in the last campaign, but now there is a mighty Samson who is going to wrestle back control of the Canadian economy into the hands of Canadians. Some hope! I wish him well, if he ever attempts it. Here is what the member said as reported at page 2299 of Hansard, when he was discussing my budget:

> Essentially this budget hits the little guy in this country.

The tears were starting to trickle down his cheeks, I remember. He continued:

> If the little guy decides to have a smoke or a drink to try to find some solace from the impact of this Conservative budget, he will still be reminded of its unfair impact.

That was what he said last December 12. What did the Minister of Finance do, his colleague on the treasury benches just down from him two seats? I think the seating is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), and then the Prime Minister, who says that the economy is very healthy. No, it is the Minister of Finance and then the Prime Minister; he is just down one seat. The Minister of Finance is within talking distance of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What did the Minister of Finance do a week ago today? He brought in a budget hitting the little guys in the country, just what we were told last December 12 not to do. If that little guy decides to have a smoke or a drink to try to find some solace from the document brought in by the Minister of Finance of the Liberal government, he is going to find that the price of his cigarettes is up, like the cost of his tobacco, his wine, his beer and his hard liquor. That is exactly what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as finance critic last December 12 opposed; he got up in this chamber and opposed it.

Well, I will not belabour the point. It is hypocrisy, of course, complete and utter hypocrisy. It does not matter whether it comes in French, English or Turkish, it is hypocrisy in every language of the world, and nothing but hypocrisy. Then he moved an amendment to the budget.

Mr. Evans: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Evans: I am out of my seat.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member should address us from his correct place in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I recognized the intervention of the hon. member on a point of order, and my apologies to the House, I did not realize that the hon. member who sought the floor was not in his own seat. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not being in my seat at the time I called a point of order, but the hon. member is using unparliamentary language. As defined in Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, the use of the word "hypocrisy" or "hypocrite" has been ruled by the Chair before to be unparliamentary, as has the word "debauchery" which was used previously by the member.

An hon. Member: Withdraw it.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get you into a procedural hassle. I withdraw the use of the word "hypocrisy", "hypocrite" or "hypocritical" and just say, "double-dealing, double-faced". I do not want to offend the rules.

Mr. Evans: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different point of order, and I do it very carefully. I realize that under Standing Order 31(1) the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has unlimited time. That means he can go on as long as the former member for Nickel Belt and may even outdo this record of two or three days. But surely it is incumbent upon him to relate his remarks, just once in a while, to the motion before us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thought he was doing pretty well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raises a question of relevance. As he and members of the House know, there is before the Chair no motion yet—

Mr. Knowles: Yes, there is.

An hon. Member: Let him finish.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I mean one moved by the hon. member for St. John's West himself. If relevance is in order, it is to the motion put by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I would be prepared to admit that there seems to be a wide-ranging effort on the part of the hon. member, but there are few occasions when the Chair has been asked by hon. members to force relevance into debate. Perhaps the intervention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will make the point itself and the hon. member for St. John's West might like to consider those remarks.

Mr. Crosbie: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I am dealing with the reason why we cannot support the motion in its present form, which is because we are concerned and worried about the government's approach to our economic, financial and energy problems and the total gamut of the problems. But I am glad to take the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I will try to be even more relevant than I have been to date. How I can be more relevant, I do not know.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I know the hon. gentlemen to our left always start to squirm when they hear some truthful statements in this House. When they are not listening to their own nonsensical piffle, they start to squirm and do not want to listen.

Mr. Knowles: You remind me of John Rodriguez.

Mr. Crosbie: I miss that hon. gentleman. I certainly hope that he comes back to us some day, like the twenty-first century.

I have just one further quotation from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. That gentleman was speaking on November 13, as reported at page 1251 of Hansard. This is just to put the final nail in the coffin of the government over there. He was decrying the fact that we had the possibility of double-digit unemployment and inflation next year, and he said the following about our government:

> They seem to have, on the one hand, adopted Mr. Volcher's economic Malthusianism approach in the United States—

That is what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources thought last November 13. Why does he not speak to the Minister of Finance who I just quoted a couple of days ago as saying that it was all in the hands of the United States? Why does he not speak to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, and say, "Allan, you are adopting Mr. Volcher's economic Malthusianism approach? Why are you doing this, Allan? Only last November 13 I got up in the House of Commons and I attacked the then government for adopting Mr. Volcher's economic Malthusianism approach". I am sure if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can explain what he meant by it—and I doubt that he can—the Minister of Finance would be only too glad to listen to him and get the present government off this adoption of Mr. Volcher's economic Malthusianism approach.

Is it not time that they got their act together? Is it not time that the House and the people of Canada were now told that the government has been in office since the end of February, that they have been in office now two months? They are old hands at it. It is not like they suddenly came in from the dark. We were like the spy who came in from the cold. We had to find out where to warm our little fingers when we got in. It took us a couple of months to get used to it. We had been out of office for 16 years, but the hon. government opposite has been in for 16 years and have just been out for seven months, not time enough for their little fingers even to get cold. They have been in now for two months and they seem paralysed with inactivity.

Mr. Lalonde: What a terrible mess you left us!

Mr. Crosbie: We thought that we were dealing with giants and that they were starting back into office over our bent and broken bodies, having shown us what was necessary to get into power and how to deal realistically and honestly with the provinces of Canada. They were going to get in and go right down the road with their program, but we have not heard or seen a program yet. They will not even bring a budget into the House. They are still practising economic Volcherism or economic Volcherian Malthusianism or whatever it was. Well, they are not practising government. They are not practising telling the people of this country what their course is going to be. They are not giving confidence to the investor. They are not giving confidence to the public. They are not giving confidence to the poor man who has a few dollars in his savings account and he sees the value of it going down because of the inflation rate. They are not showing how they are going to approach the provinces in the next four or five years.

They have a majority. They are coming into this House and trying to get us to swallow this codswallop motion. They suggest we should accept this motion. The estimates would never get back into the House again, and they will throw us the bone of a couple of opposition days which we are not going to accept. They can force it on us but we are not going to accept it.

I have dozens more quotations but you can see the point there, Mr. Speaker. The government is not now doing what it said last fall that we should be doing, and it is led by a Prime Minister who does not have the least economic sense in this world. He cannot even understand that the bigger your deficits the more interest you are going to pay. He has a President of the Treasury Board who is not co-ordinated with the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

How is that, do you say? The President of the Treasury Board, a brilliant lawyer—he is a brilliant lawyer and a nice gentleman—does not know what the Minister of Finance is doing? Yes, he does not know what the Minister of Finance is doing. If you look at Tuesday's Hansard you will see that he is asked what the interest costs are going to be for next year. He was asked what is the best estimate of the oil import subsidy charges, and the third question he was asked was, what is the amount to be spent on the guaranteed income supplement. The minister replied as reported at page 296:

—I would be happy to take that question under advisement.

The President of the Treasury Board comes into this hallowed chamber with the estimates for 1980-81, and the supplementary estimates, and when he is asked what are those very, very important three items, public debt charges, oil import subsidies and the new guaranteed annual supplement, he has to take them under advisement. That President of the Treasury Board has to take that under advisement when he has just tabled these documents in the House of Commons, when he has just made a prepared statement to this House, and when he has just weasled and said he is not going to stand by the estimates. He says that some of the information appears in the material which he has tabled but some of it will require further analysis, information that would not be appropriate for him to give during his response.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The Chair is having some difficulty with the hon. member. First, as was noted earlier, Standing Order 31 provides that there is no time limit whatsoever to the hon. member's intervention on the floor and he could, as he has said himself, continue well into next week.

Mr. Knowles: Don't put that idea into his head.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Second, there is a rule of relevance which, as I have indicated, it has been the practice of the House to interpret very loosely and very widely. I do not want to move that argument too far forward. There is also a third matter, and that has to do with parliamentary language. The hon. member has been reminded once that he may be treading in some water there, and I think I should remind him again that some care is in order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You will recall there was an interjection about the word "hypocrite" or "hypocrisy". At the time the hon. member for St. John's West withdrew it because he did not want to get into an argument. However, if you will look at Beauchesne's Fifth Edition you will find that the word is not unparliamentary.

An hon. Member: What about 425 of Erskine May?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am looking at a book that is much later than Erskine May and much better. Nonetheless, the hon. member withdrew those words when he did not have to. I have looked at Beauchesne's to see whether the word he is now being accused of using is unparliamentary, as I think he would be generous in withdrawing that if that were the case. That word is not unparliamentary either.

The hon. member for St. John's West has an interesting debating style which is refreshing in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is extremely direct and he calls them as he sees them. In respect of that particular matter I think he called it appropriately, but I do not think that what he said can by any means be unparliamentary.

As to relevance, Mr. Speaker—I say this as you did not make a ruling but made an observation—we are talking here about all of the government's expenditure programs which the government is asking Parliament to accept, for reasons which have been put forward by the President of the Privy Council. I can think of nothing more relevant to the programs of the government, and whether we or the public should accept them, than a consideration of the inconsistencies in what they said when they were in opposition and what they say when they are in government. That is absolutely relevant to the programs. Estimates are the springboards of policy. If the government has flip-flopped and used its political trampoline, then I think the government should be told so and told so directly. That is precisely what the hon. member for St. John's West is doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I ask the House to recall that when I mentioned the question of relevancy a few minutes ago I did so very carefully. I just offered it as a suggestion, thinking that my friend might take it to heart. But when my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, tells us this is a motion under which we can discuss everything relating to the spending and budgetary policies of the government, I suggest he would not have talked that way when he was President of the Privy Council.

The motion before us is really quite a narrow one. It relates to a régime or an arrangement by which we will discuss the estimates. It relates to changes for 1980 in the Standing Orders. I do not see how that can become a debate on everything. If that is possible, if what the hon. member for St. John's West is being allowed to do and now being encouraged to do by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is in order, then this is far better than the throne speech debate because it could go on for two, three or five weeks. Anybody could talk about anything he thinks the government is doing wrong.

As I say, when I first made this suggestion I did so carefully. I did not want to make a fuss about it. Your Honour said that the hon. member for St. John's West might take note of the sentiments. I do not think we should go too far in terms of how far we can go but, by the same token, I do not want to make a big issue of it. However, I think there should be some little regard for the rule of relevance.

Mr. Crosbie: I will try to accept that advice, Mr. Speaker. The relevance of what I address myself to now is that we are discussing a motion which deals with what is to happen to the supplementary estimates and interim supply. We are being asked to grant interim supply on the basis of the estimates for this total year which are put before us. I am addressing myself to the fact that these are estimates, the contents of which the President of the Treasury Board does not even know. These are estimates of which he and the Minister of Finance have two different versions. I am addressing myself to that point, because whether these estimates should go to the committee or should not go to the committee, or what should be done, depends on how accurate they are. That is the relevance of my remarks. These estimates are not true estimates in the first place. The government has not given this House true estimates.

I am pointing out that the President of the Treasury Board, who presented these estimates that we are being asked to deal with in this motion, did not know the answers to certain questions when he was asked them last Tuesday, April 22. At the end of his remarks during that session the President of the Treasury Board said, as reported at page 298, that debt service charges would be in the order of $10.8 billion to $10.9 billion. That answer turned out to be incorrect by approximately $200 million, because the next day he was asked again. In fact, he did not have to be asked because it was in the estimates. The President of the Treasury Board said on Wednesday, April 23, as reported at page 323 of Hansard:

Yesterday, I indicated that with respect to debt costs, the main estimates provide for $10.275 billion and the current projections are $10.775 billion.

The next day the minister had to correct the statement he had made the day before about the estimates which he had presented to this House. He now says that the debt charges are $10.775 billion, not 10.8 billion or 10.9 billion. The day before the minister did not know, and he had to get the information from the Minister of Finance.

How accurate are these estimates that we are being asked to send to committee? For the first time in this House estimates have been presented where the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board have been unable to agree as to what the total of the estimates were. The President of the Treasury Board said on Tuesday that they totalled $58.4 billion. The night before the Minister of Finance said they totalled $60.4 billion.

Is this discrepancy irrelevant? Are we not allowed to consider matters such as this when we are being asked to vote on rules under which these estimates may never come back to this chamber again? I certainly suggest that it is relevant. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been in this House since the 1940s. I do not care if the hon. member has been here since the 1900s, I say that it is relevant for us to discuss the estimates in this motion.

Mr. Collenette: Who are you?

Mr. Crosbie: Who am I? I am the member for St. John's West. I am only the little member for St. John's West, and I can be put down any time.

Mr. Collenette: You do not decide.

Mr. Crosbie: And you do not decide.

Mr. Collenette: The Speaker does.

Mr. Crosbie: Exactly, and I say that my opinion as to relevance is just as good to me as the opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is good to him. It is relevant to consider what we are being asked to do with these rule changes.

Then, the President of the Treasury Board can give this House no information on how a blended oil-pricing policy will reduce expenditures and financial requirements by as much as $1 billion. The Minister of Finance came to this House last Monday night—and these are the estimates we are considering now—and said that he was giving the estimate of total outlays at $60.4 billion. He then went on to lead the House to believe that it would not be $60.4 billion. As it is reported at page 244 of Hansard, the minister said:

—that these projections do not in any way constitute the expenditure plan or the planned financial requirements of this government for fiscal year 1980-81.

Implementing blended oil-pricing could alone reduce both expenditures and financial requirements by as much as $1 billion.

For the first time this House is being told, quite bluntly, by the government that total outlays are $60.4 billion. But they may be $59.4 billion, and the President of the Treasury Board has said that they are $58.4 billion. Are we not to mention this fact, after a motion has been brought in to dispose of these estimates so that they will never return to this House? Are we to keep quiet about such discrepancies as these simply because somebody to my left believes that they are not relevant? I do not think so.

The government owe this House an explanation before this motion is passed of how they intend to reduce expenditures and financial requirements by $1 billion. I believe it was C. D. Howe who said, "What's a million?" This government is saying, "What's a billion?" and think that they can simply ask the supine opposition—which they would like us to be—to pass this motion allowing these estimates to go to committees where they will not be heard of again. The estimates could be inaccurate by $1 billion alone.

When we on this side ask questions of the Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on how blended oil pricing can reduce expenditures and financial requirements by as much as $1 billion, they will not answer. I have copies of Hansard for Thursday and Friday, when the questions were asked.

Last Thursday when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked questions of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about blended oil pricing, and hon. members can refer to Hansard at page 359, he received no answers from the minister, who does not have a blended oil pricing formula. He said that it is detailed, as he stated it to the Leader of the Opposition. The minister said nothing.

On Friday the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), my seatmate, asked the President of the Treasury Board if the $2.6 billion provided in the main estimates that we are now considering for oil import compensation is based on the previous government's domestic oil pricing strategy in anticipation of the $4 per barrel increase this year. The President of the Treasury Board said yes, that was the figure that was produced in the projection of the former minister of finance in December, 1979.

Therefore, the estimates that we now have before us for oil import compensation assume a $4 a barrel increase in the price of oil in Canada this year—the same price that we proposed in our budget, the same price that the government opposite went across the country denouncing, saying that they would introduce an oil pricing policy that was "made-in-Canada". This is another one of their "made-in-Canada" policies. It was to result in a lower increase, but yet we are not told by the President of the Treasury Board, the President of the Privy Council, the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources how they intend to reduce these estimates by $1 billion.

Why should we give this government $1 billion more than they need for interim supply? Is that not relevant to this debate? We are being asked to vote on interim supply up to December, one half of the financial year, and the hon. gentlemen opposite are telling us, coolly and calmly, that they are requesting $60.4 billion but that they will not need $1 billion of it. If they do not need that $1 billion, then why are we giving them that $1 billion? Let us reduce the $1 billion now so that the government will be under some compulsion to bring in an oil pricing agreement in Canada that will result in increases of less than $4 a barrel for this year. By its own statement, the government is asking for $1 billion more than it needs. If hon. members vote for this motion, we will never see these estimates before this House again. We will have tamely submitted to the government. That is why it is relevant to discuss such subjects here in the House.

Here is what the people of Canada are being told by the Minister of Finance. I quote from page 6 of the statement which he made one week ago. It reads:

The projected increase in outlays of over 13.5 per cent is a good deal higher than I would like to see.

What kind of pat does he expect us to swallow? Why did he put in his financial statement that the projected increase in outlays of over 13.5 per cent is a good deal higher than he would like to see? If it is a good deal higher than he would like to see, then why was it there in the estimates? If these estimates are 13.5 per cent higher than the minister would like to see them, then why did he not do his job and cut the estimates back by 13.5 per cent?

The people of this country and the members of this House are being asked to swallow this kind of statement. What this motion will enable the government to do is to get these estimates off to a committee so that we will forget the 13.5 per cent. It is a pious statement by the Minister of Finance.

The minister goes on to say at page 7 of his statement:

The budget will recognize that the well-being of Canadians, the creation of jobs, and the easing of inflationary pressures all depend critically upon a continuing and growing strength of private investment.

I have opposite that paragraph something in my own handwriting which I cannot repeat in this House—the word "hypocrisy". I will not use that word. The Minister of Finance has brought in an economic statement that does its best to frighten all investment in the private sector out of Canada by proposing a $14.1 billion deficit and an $11.7 billion financial requirement, which indicates the borrowing that is necessary for this year and which will have to come from public markets.

What the minister has indicated in his statement will compete with the private sector, force interest rates up, take away money that the private sector needs for investment and cut back on the expansion of manufacturing capacity. It scares the pants off investors to see a government that does not care about such a huge leap in the estimates and in the deficit.

Then the Minister of Finance says that the budget will recognize that all of these things, the creation of jobs and the easing of inflationary pressures, depend critically upon the continuing and growing strength of private investment. If that is what it all depends on, then why has the minister not brought in estimates that are $3.5 billion less than the ones which the government is now asking for permission and authority to put through now, estimates which will never return to the House again except for a vote on the night of May 15?

The minister goes on to say in his statement at page 8:

Canada is certainly not in a position where it can afford to let its guard down against inflation.

The minister lets his guard down against inflation in the same speech by going to a $14.1 billion deficit. Why did the minister make that statement when he is acting 100 per cent contrary to it? Not only did the United States of America overcome inflation, but they are cutting their budget deficit to zero. Here in Canada the government through the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 245 of Hansard:

● (1700)

Canada is certainly not in a position where it could afford to let its guard down against inflation.

In the same speech he allows the deficit to go to $14.1 billion, which in United States terms, whose population is ten times larger than ours, would be $140 billion. He is not letting his guard down against inflation. He has no guard at all. Those are the estimates that we are being asked to shove off into the cubbyholes of the committee system of this House and then forget, or just bring them out for a blind vote on May 15 when the government will use its majority to romp them through without anybody else having a word to say in this House about them.

At page 247 of Hansard the minister stated:

—we cannot expect to insulate ourselves fully from that slowdown.

That is, insulate the Canadian economy from the slowdown in the United States. The Minister of Finance says that we in Canada cannot expect to insulate ourselves from the slowdown in the United States. He goes on to say:

This is especially the case given the substantial deficit which already exists on the current account of our balance of payments, and given the size of the federal government deficit which already exists.

Who caused these substantial deficits? It is the government which has been in power for the last 16 years. Who has created the size of the federal government deficit? The government opposite. The minister himself proposed a $14 billion deficit. The same night that he said we cannot insulate ourselves from the U.S. because of these deficits, he brought in an ever larger deficit.

To read the speech is to marvel that the words would even be put on paper. We cannot insulate ourselves from the U.S. because we have huge deficits in the balance of payments and current account. It was $5 billion last year. Exports are forecast at $7 billion this year. We have had a series of huge deficits in our own budget and that is going to be topped off this year by a $14 billion deficit. The minister is going to make sure that we cannot insulate ourselves.

The effect of his statement to this House is that there is less power to insulate Canada from the United States economy and the U.S. downturn than ever. Yet we are asked to pass these estimates based on that kind of thinking. No, Mr. Speaker, not likely.

In the budget of December 11, dealing with the estimates of the Department of Employment and Immigration there was a funding provided of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I want to alert the hon. member that the question of relevance has been raised twice through other hon. members.

On the floor of the House at the moment is a motion put forward by the President of the Privy Council which, in effect, would amend Standing Order 58. I understand that the hon. member who now has the floor would have the widest possible range of subject matter because of the fact that it is a motion to amend Standing Order 58 related to supplementary estimates.

At the same time, however, I have to observe that there must be some rule of relevance available here. Otherwise, since our standing orders provide that there is no limit on the amount of time that the hon. member may take the floor, he could, in fact, as he indicated himself, continue for a week or two or three or four, and, in the manner in which he seems to approach the subject, he could range entirely through all government and parliamentary operations without let or limit whatsoever.

I think I have to draw to the attention of the hon. member that he might direct himself a little more toward the actual motion that is before the House at the moment.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, what we are being asked to deal with here is a process to take into account the fact that the normal processes for dealing with estimates is not available to us. I guess the normal way would be for there to be a motion of some kind which we could debate. We are being asked to have this taken away from us now and something else substituted therefor. I think, with respect, that in the circumstances it becomes relevant for us to examine those estimates in terms of the rights that are being taken away from us.

It is also, as I am sure you will see as the hon. member goes on, relevant as well to a process which we are going to suggest to the House that might return to the House its right to deal with those estimates in the normal way and in a way that ought to be acceptable to all members.

In order to lay the groundwork for the kind of amendment which we are going to propose, I think it is important that the House and the country understand the magnitude of the estimates, where there are discrepancies in the estimates, so as to lay a proper foundation for the suggestion which the hon. member for St. John's West will be making shortly to permit the House of Commons to examine those estimates.

I do not think it is enough merely to say that there have been discrepancies and therefore we have a right; I think we have to demonstrate those discrepancies. That is precisely what the hon. member is trying to do. To that extent and in that direction I think there is some relevance. I want to assure the Chair that it is not our wish to debate this motion forever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It never was. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman opposite being so acquiescent with respect to the government. I think it is important, however, that there be some discussion of these estimates because this process is different from any we have ever dealt with before.

It is our intention to move a motion on a procedure which I hope will permit the expeditious handling of these estimates in the House, where they should be handled, and where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said many times they ought to be handled. I therefore ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to be patient—

Mr. Knowles: That is my middle name!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —and to view the statement made by the hon. member for St. John's West as laying the groundwork, because of the discrepancies and the statements of the party opposite from when they were in opposition to when they were in government, from when they were in the campaign to today, for demanding something more than is being given to the House if the motion of the President of the Privy Council should carry.

I think those discrepancies are such that we cannot be satisfied with a process that really does not allow examination of those estimates in the House. It is to the groundwork for that motion, which I hope will be commendable to the other side, that the hon. member for St. John's West is directing his remarks.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you will see the drift of this when the motion is put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I want to accept the comments made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, particularly because he used the word "process". What is before the House is a suggestion for a change in process. It is for that reason that I have asked the hon. member for St. John's West to address himself to that process, the subject matter of that process.

The Chair is in the position of saying that there is either no limit because it is under supplementary estimates and a change in the standing orders of the House treating with supplementary estimates and interim supply, or that there still is some limit and some relevance in debate. I do not think hon. members would like me to attempt to make a ruling on that kind of subject.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has made it clear that it is not the intention to stray too far. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has received, I hope, the sentiment of the Chair and possibly of some other hon. members as well who are, in fact, asking him to try to stay closer to the subject of the process that is before the House in this motion.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I know it is a very difficult question and I certainly want to be very relevant to this process.

As you know, this motion wants us to deal with interim supply and the supplementary estimates by sending them now to the committee. They will not again be debated in this House so far as we know, but at 15 minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment on May 15 this year the Speaker will interrupt the proceedings, whatever is in progress, and put the question in connection with disposing of the supplementary estimates and interim supply.

This is what is suggested in this motion. I am trying to explain why we do not like and do not accept the process suggested in this motion, because important questions to do with the estimates, to do with the government's economic financial policy, to do with the government's approach to the problem and to do with the whole process of the control of this House of Commons on economic and financial matters have been disregarded in the last two weeks. The motion now before us is a part of this pattern.

What is the pattern? It is this. Monday night a week ago, an economic statement, a budget or a quasi-budget—call it what you like—was bootlegged into the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. That was the start of the government's treating us with contempt on this side and trying to ride roughshod over us on very important financial and economic matters.

The process then continued on Tuesday with the estimates being tabled by the President of the Treasury Board who would not stand properly behind them and who could not explain discrepancies between his estimates and statements made by the Minister of Finance the night before.

Then the process continued during the week with a contemptuous refusal by ministers to explain how they were going to save $1 billion in the estimates presented to the House on Tuesday which the Minister of Finance had spoken about on Monday night. It was a contemptuous refusal to explain how this $1 billion was to be saved by a blended oil-pricing policy.

Then the process continues with this motion before the House, not agreed to by our side, in which the ignoring of our rights, and responsibilities of the government on economic and financial matters, is continued by these estimates, and with interim supply to carry the government until December. These estimates are being washed out of the House. "I am going to wash that man right out of my hair". We might as well say that we are going to wash those estimates right out of our hair and send them on their way. They will be sent right out of the House to a committee and they will come back here for only 15 minutes for voting on May 15.

I will illustrate the process. I am not going to emulate Mr. Rodriguez. How are you, John, out there in never-never land? I am going to finish speaking before this House is adjourned at six o'clock. I am not going to try to carry on any great Rodriguez marathon, not at all. I am going to move our amendment in about five minutes. For example, in our budget of December 11 we said in addition to an employment tax credit program to respond to differences in employment opportunities across the country that we were going to make an amount of $50 million available to initiate new measures or to supplement existing programs aimed at stimulating employment and economic development in eastern Canada.

We had $50 million in the estimates, Mr. Speaker. We had increased the estimates to combat employment $150 million over those of the previous year. That is what was said in the budget speech. There are estimates before this House now tabled last Tuesday that include that $50 million because the President of the Treasury Board said these were the estimaes that we had prepared.

I made inquiries as to what has happened to the $50 million in the estimates. The President of the Treasury Board said that he had presented the estimates we had prepared, but when I inquired of the minister of fisheries and other poeple in the government about the $50 million—$25 million was going to the Department of Fisheries and $14 million to small craft and harbours to stimulate construction of wharves, breakwaters, slipways, dredging projects in eastern Canada this year, which would create a lot of employment, money to be spent by the government—I was told that it was not there. I was told that this money is not going to the Department of Fisheries or to small crafts and harbours.

Where is this $50 million which was in our estimates to create more employment in eastern Canada this year? If that question is not answered here in this House, we will never have the answer. Why has the government done away with the $50 million stimulus for employment opportunities in eastern Canada where, we all have to admit, unemployment is the highest in Canada?

If this procedure that the hon. gentleman has suggested is adopted these estimates will go off to committee and we will be unable to force any answer from any minister of the government. They can ignore our questions. They do not have to answer any questions in committee. We cannot do them any harm because we cannot hold up anything in the committees. It all has to come here automatically on May 15. The ministers do not have to come anyway. We will never get an answer to what has happened to this $50 million additional money for more employment opportunities in eastern Canada this year that we had in the estimates. These very estimates were tabled in the House yet we are told there is no $14 million extra for small crafts and harbours. The Minister of Fisheries cannot tell me whether they are going to be doing our wharf in Bay Bulls or repairing the wharf in St. Shott's and so on. I moved a motion of Friday under Standing Order 43 that named the various communities where some of these works were supposed to be done, to create employment in an area of high unemployment and so on.

That is the process. Once this motion is passed, this goes out into committees and we may or may not get any answers. We have no way of pressuring the Crown to get any answers as to what has happened to this $50 million. That is why this process is important. That is why it is important to us to have the President of the Privy Council adopt a different procedure which we hope will commend itself to him.

Because there is so much impatience being shown, and because you are under so much pressure yourself, Mr. Speaker, about relevance and irrelevance—I do not want to cause you any trouble as the presiding officer—I will move the amendment now. Our amendment is from the brilliant brain and intellect of our House leader on this side of the House. It is not debatable. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), one of the great parliamentarians of the century:

That the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"That on May 12, the business of the House shall be the consideration of any motions or bills relating to the said supplementary estimates or interim supply;

That notice shall not be required for a notice to oppose any item in the estimates or for any motion to restore or reinstate any item in the estimates;

That, no later than fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment on May 12, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then in progress and put, forthwith and successively, without further amendment or debate, any motions relating to interim supply, the said supplementary estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the said supplementary estimates, or the second reading stage of any appropriations bill based on the said supplementary estimates or interim supply;

That on May 13 to May 15 inclusive the business of the House shall be the consideration of committee of the whole stage of any bill or bills relating to the said supplementary estimates or interim supply;

That, no later than fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment on May 15, 1980, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then in progress and put, forthwith and successively, without amendment or debate, and notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 72, every question that may be necessary for the passage of all remaining stages of any bill or bills based on the said supplementary estimates or interim supply, providing that the ordinary time of adjournment shall remain suspended until all such questions have been decided;"

And by inserting after the last paragraph of the motion the following paragraph:

"That members in opposition to the government may choose the estimates of three departments or agencies which shall be presented to the House in a separate appropriations bill exempt from any deadline in this or any other temporary or permanent standing order or special order relating to the business of supply, provided that all stages of the said bill, except the committee of the whole stage, shall be put to the House without amendment or debate".

I might try to explain the purport of it. What this amendment attempts to do is this. As I say, if the present motion passes, supplementary estimates go into committee, interim supply goes into committee, the estimates for the year go into committee. Supplementary estimates and interim supply all get voted on before the end of May 15. We do not discuss them any more in this House once this motion is passed.

Then, as I understand it, the main estimates for 1980-81 are dealt with in a similar manner, but they do not have to be brought back in the House and voted on until December. I think that is the procedure. But we no longer discuss them in this House either.

If this amendment is agreed to by the President of the Privy Council and the government, what will happen will be that on May 12 we will discuss for that day motions or bills relating to supplementary estimates or interim supply. We would vote on those motions or bills on May 12. Then we would go on for three days, May 13, 14, and 15, to consider in Committee of the Whole the supplementary estimates or interim supply.

We would all have our ordinary chance in Committee of the Whole to question ministers. I ask a question, I sit down, and then somebody else asks one. If there is a minister we are particularly interested in, we can question him for three days. It might be on energy policy or whatever is in the supplementary estimates. Anyway, we would all have a chance in Committee of the Whole for three days to really go into these estimates and into the question of the main estimates and interim supply. That is what we are suggesting.

We would have three days in Committee of the Whole, and this is far better than opposition days. This is Committee of the Whole where we can question ministers and attempt to get answers, where we can catch ministers not doing their homework, where we can pin down ministers who do not know what they are talking about or force them to give us some information, make things a bit hot for them. That is what ministers are for—to test their methods, make things hot for them, see if they know how to jump from the pan when it gets warmed up or whatever.

We would have three days, not opposition days where I get up and make a speech, the member over there gets up and makes a speech and somebody else makes a speech, which accomplishes very little, but three days of questioning ministers here where the television is in the House so that the people of Canada can see the process. Do they know what they are talking about? Does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources know what he is talking about? Does he have a blended cost? Does the Minister of Finance know what he is talking about? In three days they will see no, he certainly does not, that he said nothing as usual. Or they might say the Minister of Finance is a brilliant man, that he has turned back all inquiries and explained fully what his policy is. I will certainly be astounded if that turns out to be the case, but he is a man of long experience in this House. He has just been over to Hamburg. We know what happens when bachelors go to Hamburg, Mr. Speaker. I imagine he had quite a busy time there.

Anyway, that is the purport of this motion. Apart from the question of interim supply and supplementary estimates, all that would be voted on by May 15 so the President of the Privy Council gets his necessary business to the House.

Then we are suggesting that the estimates in general go on out to committees. However, next December or whenever they are brought back from committee, the opposition can choose three departments. This is because we want to give our confreres in the opposition, the members of the New Democratic Party, a chance to participate. We are not like them. We do not want to cut them off from debate. We did not get up and object when Mr. Rodriguez was here speaking day after day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member again, but the usual tradition of the House is that the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member is read by the Chair to the members. I do not necessarily want to do that if the hon. member is going to finish his comments in the very near future.

Mr. Crosbie: I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker. I have a lot more to say, but there seems to be some upset in the chamber if I go on too long. What can one do?

What we are proposing is that when December comes, or whenever these main estimates come back to the House, the opposition would be able to say to the government that we want to have the estimates of three departments. The NDP can suggest one. Our confreres in the New Democratic Party may want to choose one. We will choose two. These will be departments that we would like to get more information on, or just raise burning topics of the moment. Probably this year energy would be one that there would be a lot of debate and discussion about, but it might be finance or any department. Who knows what is going to be very topical next fall?

The estimates of those departments will then come forward in a separate bill. We will go into Committee of the Whole stage. We will question the ministers of those departments until they satisfy us that they have given us the information that is required or they have satisfied the points brought up in the House.

This is not something we are suggesting as the opposition that we did not suggest as a government. It is something that as a government we said we are going to do because we believe in the House of Commons. We believe in trying to make this chamber function effectively, so that members can really feel they have some influence, not that they are just here speaking so they can send a few copies of speeches back to some of their constituents, or because somebody might be watching during the afternoon when they are speaking or whatever.

We would like a chamber that is effective. There are probably a dozen government departments, there might be twenty, that no one can quarrel with, but there may be a couple that are not performing properly or where there is some injustice. For example, in the Department of Transport there might be some jiggery-pokery going on there.

I remember when a CFLCO airplane crashed in 1977 in Labrador. It was just shocking. The Department of Transport interfered with the report of the accident investigation division. I smoked it out. Now a royal commission is sitting and getting the evidence on all this.

This procedure would be a very useful device for something of that kind. If the Minister of Transport had not been forthcoming on a matter like that, fine, we would choose his estimates to go into in the House until he came forward with the information. Who knows what department or minister it will be, but it will make them all sit up and be a bit more attentive to the wishes of their own backbenchers and the opposition.

We have an experienced former minister in the Treasury benches. He was always pretty forthcoming. He would have been even more forthcoming and on his toes if he knew that he could be kept in this House for a few days answering questions in Committee of the Whole.

That is what this amendment suggests. It is not something we were not prepared to do ourselves. We are suggesting a way out for the President of the Privy Council. The only difference between his motion and ours is that there are four days in this House when we discuss interim supply and supplementary estimates, and three days in Committee of the Whole where we can really probe the minister and so can backbenchers opposite. There is nothing stopping them in Committee of the Whole asking any questions they want to ask.

For the main estimates we are suggesting this different treatment. We believe that this will make a vast difference in committee, because when a minister comes to the committee he will be more willing to be reasonable. He is not going to want the opposition to choose his department to be grilled in the House of Commons. He will be more forthcoming. It will make the system more reasonable all around.

Part of the frustration now is that you cannot do anything when the government gives you the run around. We were over there ourselves. We would want to give the run around too. Nobody wants to create a whip for his own back. It is only because we were new at the game and in government for only a few months that we were willing to propose this as a government. If we had been in power for sixteen years, we would be just as bad as the hon. gentleman opposite, most likely. I would have liked to be given a test of the sixteen years first and then see if we can make a comparison, but that was not to be.

These are our suggestions. We are hoping that the President of the Privy Council will accept this amendment, or if he does not want to accept it as it is, he might talk to our House leader and see if there is some common ground.

In concluding—I have a lot more information that is very relevant but I do not want to occupy the time of the House too much; I know we have a lot of other speakers who wish to address themselves to this very question—quite seriously, I say we on this side of the House want to co-operate.

I, as a former minister of finance, will be quite frank. I am interested in seeing a lot of that legislation through—tax conventions and banking legislation, Bretton Woods. There is a lot of legislation that is non-controversial which should be able to go through this House reasonably quickly, as long as hon. members on this side of the House are included in the process and as long as we are treated with some degree of fairness.

There are four or five years to go, and I for one do not think that much that is said this year is going to have any effect when the next election comes in four or five years' time. I am interested in trying to see that this is a place that does a good job and that the things we really disagree on we ventilate well, but otherwise let us get on with the business. However, we are only going to be in that frame of mind if hon. gentlemen will give some way to us, and in the last ten days this they have not done. They were rubbing our noses in it with their approach to the financial statement last Monday night, and they were doing it again in the estimates on Tuesday. Well, it is all well and good, but it does not induce the right kind of spirit.

Now, if we can be given some proper way with backbenchers opposite to go at the estimates, where we know at the end of the process we have some muscle to use on recalcitrant ministers, or on those who get carried away with the sense of their own importance, or on those who have something to hide, then it will make the whole process a lot better, save a lot of time in committee, and it will make a lot healthier atmosphere, so I am hoping.

I certainly have nothing to praise the government for at the moment. In my next speech I would like to be able to get up and praise the government for doing something, and for doing something sensible. I have not been able to do that, but I commend this to the President of the Privy Council and hope that he will respond and that we can get on and do a lot of business before the end of July, close for a week or two, come back in the middle of August full of vim and vigour, get right into this thing again and get on with the business.

So, I have great pleasure in moving, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton the motion Your Honour now has, and I hope we will get a good response from the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I can put that amendment to the House I want to express some concern about the provisions in the last paragraph where the amendment proposes that if this amendment were to be adopted by the House, if I understand it correctly, it would be exempt from any deadline in this or any other temporary or Standing Order or permanent Standing Order related to the business of supply, and so forth. My understanding is that the amendment proposes unlimited debate without time limits inherent, and I think it would be wise if hon. members would accord me the dinner hour to seek consultation with the Table officers in order to determine whether that is quite right on.

That being the case, and if it is deemed suitable by hon. members, debate may continue on the motion.

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm)—Metric conversion—Request for parliamentary debate before system put into full effect; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie)—Canadian Pacific Railway—Winnipeg—Rail relocation—Suggested reversal of government policy.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1980-81

REPORTING FROM STANDING COMMITTEES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pinard:

That, notwithstanding any standing order, the Supplementary Estimates (A), 1980-1981, shall be reported or be deemed to have been reported from the several standing committees no later than May 9, 1980;

That, no later than fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of adjournment on May 15, 1980 the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then in progress and put, forthwith and successively, without amendment or debate, every question that may be necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply, the said Supplementary Estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the said Supplementary Estimates or any opposed item in the said Supplementary Estimates and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 72, for the passage at all stages of any bill or bills based thereon, providing that the ordinary time of adjournment shall remain suspended until all such questions have been decided; and

That, for the year 1980, Standing Order 58 shall be amended as follows:

(i) by replacing in section (5) thereof the word "five" with the word "eighteen" and by deleting the words "Thirteen additional days shall be allotted to the business of supply in the period ending not later than June 30.";

(ii) by replacing in section (9) thereof the word "two" with the word "four";

(iii) by replacing in section (14) thereof the words "March 1 of the then expiring fiscal year" with the words "April 30"; and

(iv) by replacing in section (14) thereof the words "May 31 in the then current fiscal year" with the words "November 10".

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we all enjoyed the meandering speech of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I am a little disappointed that he did not make it for at least two full hours. He fell nine minutes short. Maybe next time he is in that spot he will surpass his own record.

However, I have to say, despite my criticism of his wandering and so on, that when it was all over he did produce something that to me, at least, is negotiable. I suspect that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) would find it difficult to accept the amendment in its entirety as it has been moved, but there are certain principles in it that I believe are sound, and I hope that there might be some consultations that could lead to a compromise or a negotiated settlement.

As a matter of fact, I think it is unfortunate that we are having this debate on the floor of the House. There is an awful lot of business with which this Parliament must deal, and it seems to me that one of the reasons for having meetings of House leaders is to try to sort out the process so that on the floor of the House we can deal with matters of substance. Indeed, I think it is unfortunate that the terms of this proposal as set out in the amendment were not presented at a meeting of House leaders where, perchance, we might have come to some understanding.

I have been a bit critical, perhaps, of my friends to the right. I am addressing myself now to the President of the Privy Council. As he knows, I was prepared to buy the motion that he put down the other day. In fact I was prepared to buy an even shorter one that he presented to us at a meeting of House leaders, but I ask him not to reject out of hand the suggestions which have been made by the hon. member for St. John's West in an amendment which he says was drafted by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Before I comment on what this amendment does as I see it, may I back up a bit and describe what I think would be the result of the motion as put by the President of the Privy Council. The hon. member for St. John's West rang the changes on the proposition that we were being denied the right to debate the estimates back on the floor of the House. Well, that happens to be the way the rules are set up. I do not like them but that is the way they are. The motion of the President of the Privy Council does not do that. All the motion of the President of the Privy Council does is to take cognizance of the fact that we have had a couple of elections, that we met only two months out of 13 between March, 1979, and April, 1980, and that somehow we have to catch up with the backlog. So, his motion proposed that since in the semester we are now in and in the one at the end of this year there is a total of 18 days, he puts down 18 opposition days. Since the rules provide for two non-confidence days in each of those, he adds two and two together and gets four. He is a smart man; he can do his arithmetic.

An hon. Member: He should be the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: As for the business of the estimates being sent to committee and then being brought back to the House without any chance to debate them on the floor of the House, a process many of us do not like, that has been there since we put these rules in a decade ago, and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is quite right that I am not happy with that arrangement. It is the one thing out of the changes we made that I think does not stand up, and that we should be changing. By the same token, I am prepared to experiment with something else in the meantime.

As for the proposal by the President of the Privy Council, it provided the same number of days for what remains of 1980, and it provided for the same number of "non-confidence" days. He also provided for the estimates to be out there in committee a lot longer than the rules provide. So I do not think he deserves to be castigated quite as much as he has been today. All he was doing was trying to put together the rules as we have them in terms of the 1980 time frame. I appreciate the fact that he added these extra weeks or months for discussion in committee, but as the hon. member for St. John's West indicated, many of us have become dissatisfied with that arrangement.

Now, what the hon. member for St. John's West, as the spokesman for the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, is proposing, is that in 1980 we experiment, as we have done in some other years, with having a few days of estimates here on the floor of the House. The proposal, as I get it, in this amendment, is that with respect to interim supply and supplementary estimates we have four days debate, the four days being May, 12, 13, 14 and 15. Right away that hits the President of the Privy Council between the eyes. Where does he find four days? Let me come to that in a moment.

Then the member for St. John's West proposes that when we get to December and we come to wind up the main estimates, there be an opportunity for debating the estimates of three departments, which the opposition will choose, but without any time limit on the total number of days to be taken for that debate. I read the amendment as saying that debates will all take place in Committee of the Whole. That is good. In other words we do not have set speeches with the Speaker in the chair; we spend all our time in Committee of the Whole questioning ministers on those estimates. I do not think the wording of the amendment changes the time limit on speeches, I think the 20 minute rule still applies in Committee of the Whole. But there is no limit on the number of days that might be taken on those departments.

So what the member for St. John's West is asking is that, in addition to what is provided in the rules, translated as the President of the Privy Council has done, there be an additional four days in May for supplementary estimates and interim supply, and an additional unstated number of days in December for debating three departments. Now I would like to make the suggestion that some time soon, perhaps after I have finished speaking, this debate might even be adjourned, and we could possibly go on to something else. The House leaders might get together, in short, to consider what might be done.

First, may I talk about the four days in May? We could trade off some of the opposition days for some of the four days. I will not start off by saying we will give you four for four, but we might give you two for four. I am suggesting that the problem that the minister has of finding four days' debate in that period could be looked at in terms of a trade-off with opposition days. The same could happen in December; there could be a trade-off. I recognize that it will be a strange government if it agrees to an unlimited debate on those three departments, but if we got together the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton might say: "All right, we will accept a certain time limit; we will accept four days in December on that special supply bill that deals with three departments and be prepared to give up two opposition days." This is the kind of thing we do in House leaders' meetings all the time.

I think that if we had had this before us at one of our meetings in the last week or so we might have come to it. So I find myself in this position in those meetings, often trying to be an honest broker between my two friends. They have both been in and out of government, and they both have feelings about this, and each one is trying to get back at the other and all that sort of thing. I have not been in that position, so I can try to conciliate between the two of them.

I say I do not think the President of the Privy Council should be condemned for his motion. He did not put anything new into that motion at all. It is already there that the estimates go off to committee and when they come back there is no debate on them unless the opposition puts some of them down for an opposition day. He has given more time, but that is simply because of the nature of the calender in 1980. So I do not think he should be condemned. Neither do I think the proposal of the hon. member for St. John's West should be dismissed out of hand because his proposal seems to call for four more days of debate in the House in May and an unlimited number of days of debate in December. I think the compromise is to have four or three days in May and a bit of a trade-off with the opposition days. The other thought is to have an understanding about a certain limited number of days in December, again with a trade-off against opposition days.

As for the idea itself that we should bring back some of the estimates to the floor, I have been speaking in favour of this for years. Then, as to the other proposition that debating estimates on the floor of the House should be only at the Committee of the Whole stage—I do not think I have seen it in those precise words before—it is a good idea and I commend the author of it.

Way back in ancient history we used to debate the estimates entirely on the floor of the House in committee of supply. The process went on and on, but there were some pretty good debates. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton will remember them because he sat up in the gallery as a boy and watched them. Some of us were down here on the floor. But, you know, this country got too big, the number of departments became too many, the sums of money became too involved, and we just could not handle it that way—the year was not long enough for us to consider all the estimates in committee of supply on the floor of the House. So we experimented with two or three different ways.

We went back and forth and finally we decided, I think it was in 1968 or 1969, to take the estimates off the floor altogether and send them out to the standing committees. That same package which we passed in 1968 or 1969 included changes affecting the legislation, the report stage, the sending of bills to committee and so on, which I think were good and which have worked out well. Somewhere in the process we brought in the late show at night, and we did other things. I think we have improved the procedures in this House.

The one area in which we have not yet solved the problem is with respect to the passing of estimates. We could not possibly go back to the way it was when I came here in 1942. But I do not think we can continue with this process of their being dealt with in committee without a word being said on the floor of the House, and I think some sort of compromise should be considered.

I hope we can look at this subject with equanimity, and get over chiding each other about what has gone on in the past. I trust the House will realize that the President of the Privy Council has a problem which must be solved. We have to find a way to do it. I hope the President of the Privy Council will consider that maybe, despite all the problems he has, we can experiment this year with a few days of debating estimates on the floor of the House in Committee of the Whole on special supply bills.

I do not think we can solve this by simply debating this matter all week and all next week, and having recorded votes. I think it calls for consultation, and I hope there will be that consultation among the House leaders and that we can find something which will solve this problem. As I said in my initial remarks, we are faced with a great backlog of business, budgets and estimates and a lot of things which did not get done, and I think the country out there—

An hon. Member: Whose fault was that?

Mr. Knowles: An hon. member says "whose fault is that?" Is it not time to quit talking about whose fault it was, the two elections and all the rest of it? The fact is: let the bygones be bygones. The reason I was prepared to buy the shorter program of the two which the President of the Privy Council gave us the other day, was because it got the rest over that much sooner; it got it over in the middle of the summer. I do not think we should drag the past on for all of this year. As I say, what the country would like is for us to deal with substance. I hope we do not spend all week debating this process, but that we will find some way whereby we can have some agreement and get it done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because I have already taken part in the debate and the amendment has been taken under advisement. I just have one thing to say. It is true, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, that about ten days ago the various options were consideration and the opposition House leaders were given a choice. The hon. member came quickly to a decision; he was willing to co-operate, to accept either proposal, but my learned colleague of the Progressive Conservative Party, of course, took no position and preferred having the question debated today, without offering any counter-proposal, as I indicated earlier in my remarks on the motion.

We would have preferred, of course, to have the procedural matter negotiated and settled by mutual agreement or, at least, to receive counterproposals rather than being forced to come to the House to reach a solution that is fair and in accordance with the spirit of the Standing Orders, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so appropriately remarked, although that does not make us less open to a serious negotiation, if only there could be someone to talk to in the Progressive Conservative Party.

So if today's debate has the effect of convincing my hon. friend, the House leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, at least to reply to the proposals which have been made to him and to negotiate with all the good will that I know he can show, I am sure that if we call it six o'clock now, we can negotiate a reasonable agreement by eight o'clock tonight. Should my knowledgeable colleague not be reasonable, we can go on with the debate at eight o'clock.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am really rather surprised. I thought that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had dealt quite appropriately with the spirit that ought to exist among House leaders. I hope the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), by what I regard as a rather offensive interjection, has not destroyed that spirit.

Since he has laid it out on the table, I just want him to recall that I told him I would consult and consult broadly—and I did—with respect to what we should do. I did exactly that. As I said at the outset in one interjection, it is not my job to make life miserable for the government, although I think my friend should recall that when I occupied his position my life was made somewhat miserable by open-ended debates in Committee of the Whole with respect to estimates. I think he should remember that. Notwithstanding that, as a result of the considerations we took internally as to how we might make this House of Commons work, one of the ways we chose was not to be offensive to one another on the floor of the House.

We considered very carefully how we might satisfy two things. The first thing was the necessity of the government getting its business done. I sat in that seat. I sympathize with his desire to have business done. I suffered under an opposition which did not give a damn whether business was done. The second thing which is important with respect to this is that it is part of Parliament's business, not just the government's business, to hold the government accountable. Parliament is not the handmaiden of the government. It will never be, God willing. Parliament's job is to hold the government accountable. The only way we will in our processes hold the government accountable is if we somehow look at our processes and procedures.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite right. The examination in committees is next to useless in terms of estimates, and every member knows that. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has been concerned about the rights of French-speaking Canadians outside of Quebec. He knows how little opportunity there really is to come to grips with that. But if he had, for instance, the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State here where the public can see what the government is doing, or is not doing, if that is the case, then I think he would feel he had his day in court on behalf of a constituency which to him is important. This could be repeated 282 times in the House.

What this amendment is all about, as a result of consultation, is not to hold up the government. But it is to provide that balance where we can somehow do our job. We have wrestled with the way in which it can be done. I hope Mr. Speaker finds it appropriate. In fact, if I can give Mr. Speaker some advice, the Chair ought to lean in the direction of finding this amendment appropriate if it can. It expands the rights of members of Parliament and of Mr. Speaker. That is the way in which it is prepared, not as a way to hold up the government.

I think our relationship will continue to be a good one, if we do not insult one another on the floor of the House. It is very important. Having served in both capacities as opposition House leader and government House leader, if I can give my learned friend some advice it is to learn to cool his tongue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): This is a House of debate and of differences of opinion, but in terms of the operations of government and the operations of Parliament, there has to be some good will. As I said before, it is not my wish to hold up the government; it is not. That wish can be accommodated if we can accommodate each other. This amendment is an attempt to do precisely that. Of course we are prepared to consult; of course we are. We now have something to consult about.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I wonder if I could make a suggestion which modifies slightly the one made by the hon. President of the Privy Council. It seems to me that to try to resolve this before eight o'clock is a little too much, but I believe we have a meeting already set for tomorrow morning. I wonder if we could not come to that meeting with our minds and hearts open, trusting that we can come to something, and that being the case, I wonder whether there could not be an agreement to adjourn this debate at six o'clock and take some other business tonight. I suggest now that a debate tonight on this subject will just be a repetition of speeches, but we have something about which we could consult tomorrow morning. I believe the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is prepared to do so. I invite the President of the Privy Council to put this on the table at our meeting tomorrow morning and to ask the Chair to move to some other business at eight o'clock tonight.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is an eminently excellent suggestion, and I join in the invitation to do that, if I may. If the government House leader wants to take a few minutes to decide what he would like to call, we would be quite willing to deal with whatever business he has in mind this evening.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this new wind of co-operation. There is no need for me to consult anyone now. At eight o'clock tonight, we will proceed with the consideration of the bill on small businesses loans. I sincerely hope that we will reach an agreement tomorrow morning on this motion, otherwise I will notify my colleagues of the order of the day for tomorrow. The proposal of our hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seems to me to be very reasonable and I am quite willing to negotiate provided, once again, I deal with a serious spokesman for the Conservatives. Tonight we will consider the bill in the name of the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) dealing with small businesses loans. Tomorrow, we will see whether there are any changes in the order of the day.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Agreed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The understanding of the Chair is that some progress will be made on the subject matter of checking the orderliness of the amendment this evening, and I believe that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has indicated that at eight o'clock this evening we will resume the debate on Bill C-17. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: That this debate is adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURES TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix) that Bill C-17, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) had the floor.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I believe you are correct, but I did not know that as soon as I walked in tonight you would change the schedule and this matter would again be under discussion. However, I have just about completed what I had to say on the subject.

The final clause of the bill with which we are dealing brings the date forward, at which time the act will expire, unless renewed, to June 30, 1982. I am pleased to note that this sunset provision is still included in the bill. If we are not very careful, legislation of this nature can continue, continue, and continue, and Parliament can lose sight of it. With this provision it means that the measure has to be brought back before this House within the time period.

We are given to understand that within the two-year time period the government is going to take a close look at the various ways by which assistance can be given to small businesses, and I am very pleased this is to be done. The general consensus of the House is, I believe, that we should like this to go ahead, with assistance given to small businesses, and we commend the government for taking this upon itself. I am sure it can expect the advice and help of all members of this House.

Although that is the consensus of the House, I have one small reservation. It appears to me sometimes that instead of the government taking money from one set of taxpayers and giving it out in this fashion in specific areas, it might be better had it not taken that money from the taxpayers in the first place. We can very often make a good case for leaving the money in the hands of individuals, in the hands of corporations and small businesses, particularly so that they can themselves decide where they want to reinvest that money.

Just a few days ago every member of this House received a communication from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) about the summer youth employment program. In reviewing various projects under that program it came to our attention that after all this money has been spent we are still not going to be that much further ahead. This was something of a stop-gap measure. Perhaps in that case, as in the case of some of of the programs to assist small businesses, it would be better to leave the money in the hands of the taxpayer.

I think those were to be my concluding remarks on this particular bill. This is something I am sure everybody in this House wants to deal with quickly. We all agree with it in priniciple, and I hope it has speedy passage.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to enter the debate on Bill C-17 to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. The government has nothing to congratulate itself about in respect of this bill. All this is, is a very small step forward. The government certainly has much to do in this Parliament in order to get off the backs of the businessmen. I should just like to read into the record a brief comment from some business leaders in Manitoba following the introduction of the mini-budget last week. This is an excellent article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, entitled "Budget Riles Winnipeg Businessmen". The article states in part:

> The federal government's mini-budget is the worst of all possible combinations, three Winnipeg business leaders say.
> Their protests centre on higher government spending and escalating deficits coupled with higher taxation.
> "They've led us down the garden path," is the way the government's financial posture was described to the Free Press by Gervin Greasly, executive vice-president of the Winnipeg Construction Association.
> Jim Cartlidge, president of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, expressed concern the government is increasing both taxes and bureaucratic spending without having a long-term plan for fiscal administration.

● (2010)

In other words, the government does not have its act together. The article goes on to criticize the government for its continuing irresponsible spending habits, which have been the record of this Liberal government or so-called Liberal government since 1968. The Liberals have a disgraceful record when it comes to assisting the business community in Canada. One only needs to look at the number of commercial failures and bankruptcies since 1968. In 1968, under a Liberal government, there were 2,481 bankruptcies. Since 1968 the Liberals have managed to work that figure up to 5,648 bankruptcies. Clearly it indicates that their policies of heavy taxation, interference, and harassment of the business community have been very successful. They have increased bankruptcies by making things as awkward and difficult as possible for the business community in Canada.

Mr. Pepin: What is the figure for 1979?

Mr. McKenzie: We on this side are very pleased that the Liberal party has adopted a number of our proposals. One proposal which it has adopted is the Small Business Development Bonds which will assist small businessmen with the problem of escalating interest rates. I will be discussing the high interest rate policies of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party in just a few moments.

Another policy which has been adopted by the government is the tax deduction to small businessmen of salaries paid to spouses, which was introduced in the last Conservative budget. One of the most serious problems for businesses, large and small, is the paper burden. Our government had taken steps to reduce the amount of paper work imposed on the small business community. Over 70,000 small businessmen will be exempt from filing reports under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. This is a step in the right direction, and I hope that the Liberal government will take a look at this problem and continue to take steps to reduce the paper burden of the small businessmen.

A bill which died in the last Parliament under the filibustering and blocking of the NDP and the Liberal party was Bill C-12. I hope that this new Liberal government will reintroduce this bill, or a similar one, because it will greatly assist businesses, large and small, in Canada. This particular bill would save Canadian businessmen a considerable amount of time by reducing the paper burden.

As I have said, we had only begun in the area of reducing the paper burden. Bill C-12 was intended to streamline reporting systems and improve the sharing of information within the federal government. That bill would have also resulted in a better perception of labour union activity, particularly with regard to finances. I hope that the appropriate minister will be dealing with those issues in the future.

All members of Parliament receive copies of Mandate from the small businessmen. I read them with great interest, particularly the column which is headed, "Our members speak up". I would like to read a couple of comments from that section into the record tonight. One comment reads:

> High interest rates are killing business. Governments should drastically reduce interest rates to business by having two prime rates—with interest charged to businesses being about 50 per cent of the personal rate.

The Small Business Development Bonds introduced by the Conservative government, and now being implemented by the Liberal government, will help to some extent in this area.

One of the major problems facing this country is high interest rates. I would like to talk about high interest rates and what causes them. The size of the government deficit is one of the major contributing factors in causing high interest rates. This involves the financing of the deficit through the sale of securities to the public and absorbs a good part of the savings in the economy. The savings thus absorbed would tend to reduce interest rates if public borrowing requirements were less.

The reason we have such high interest rates is because we must attract investors to pay off the huge deficit which was run up by the NDP-Liberal coalition of the Twenty-ninth Parliament when all stops were removed. During that Parliament the lid was taken off, and federal spending increased by 50 per cent. This is what happened when the NDP were running the country for 20 months during the Twenty-ninth Parliament. Thank God it only lasted for 20 months. During the 20-month period of the Twenty-ninth Parliament, the period 1972-1974, Liberal government spending increased by approximately 50 per cent, when the little group down here to my left were controlling the country.

Mr. Benjamin: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: They are clapping, Mr. Speaker. They love bribing the people with their own money and getting this country deeper and deeper into debt. In dollar terms, during the fiscal year 1971-72 budgetary spending was $17,046,000,000. By the fiscal year 1974-75, budgetary spending reached $29,717,000,000; an increase of $12 billion in a 12-month period. That is why we have high interest rates today, to pay off the debt and the uncontrolled spending of that Parliament which was run by the NDP party, because the Liberals would sell their very souls to stay in power. They did not only sell their souls to stay in power during that Parliament, but they took the country into complete bankruptcy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: We hear laughs and jokes from the Liberals and the NDP because it is a great big joke to them. Canadians saw their performance in the Liberal television commercials during the last election which said, night after night, that interest rates should not have gone up, that it was a terrible thing for the Conservatives to let interest rates go up. If interest rates should not have gone up, then why has the government not reduced interest rates? It has been back in power since February 19, and why has it not reduced interest rates? Instead this government has played one of the cruellest hoaxes on the Canadian people that I have ever seen. Look at the smirks and laughs on these new NDP members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: These new Liberal members—what is the difference between NDP and Liberal?

An hon. Member: It's the same thing.

Mr. Huntington: It's a coalition.

Mr. McKenzie: That is right, it is a coalition. The Liberals spent 20 months in bed with the NDP.

It has been suggested that the Progressive Conservative minority government made Parliament unworkable because it refused to make deals to keep Parliament alive. It is the heavy spending of the Twenty-ninth Parliament which caused so much trouble in the business community, not the Conservative government. The Liberals claim that their ability to survive 20 months with a minority government, 1972-74, is ample proof of their inherent ability to govern. What the Liberals fail to understand is that the art of governing involves more than the craft of political survival. The Liberals survived their minority period by continually making deals with the NDP or by selling out one's principles for the sake of power, and it has not benefited Canadians. That is why there is a high interest rate problem which is not only affecting businessmen but also home owners across this country.

In 1979 the Conservative government, faced with a need to make decisive economic decisions following the prolonged period when economic decision-making was virtually nonexistent, the Clark government made those decisions and stood by them. We were not going to make any under-the-counter deals with the NDP. If we had entered into any such agreement with them, spending would have skyrocketed out of control, and the interest rate would be much higher than 16 per cent, 17 per cent or 18 per cent.

In contrast the Liberal minority government of 1972 to 1974 was one which presided over the total abandonment of responsible fiscal management, and the cost to Canada of the Liberal-NDP alliance was staggering. The fiscal damage that was done during that period tied the hands of the Clark government, and Canada could no longer afford the economic compromises which the Liberal minority government found so expedient to their political survival. The Clark government had taken a stand on basic economic principles, principles it was unwilling to compromise.

I listened to the Winnipeg radio station, with the NDP finance critic wailing and moaning about interest rates. He forgot to tell the people what happened in the Twenty-ninth Parliament with the coalition between the NDP and the Liberal parties. The NDP is directly responsible for the high interest rate problem that we have doday. Their policy is high interest rates through uncontrolled government spending.

I also made reference to the Liberals' TV advertisements. That was one of the most cruel hoaxes I have ever seen played on the Canadian people regarding interest rates, Mr. Speaker. It clearly indicated that the Liberal party do not have the principles or the ethics of an alley cat. That was one of the most cruel hoaxes I have ever seen played on the Canadian people. Unfortunately it was a member from Manitoba, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), who was used in the TV ads night after night, telling the people that interest rates should not have gone up. Mr. Speaker, why do they not bring them down now if they should not have gone up?

Then there was the utter nonsense we had to listen to in the last Parliament from the Liberal finance critic, now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), who comes from Windsor. When he was asked how he would reduce interest rates, "Oh" he said, "I will introduce an industrial strategy." When are we going to see this industrial strategy that will lower interest rates? We are not going to see it, Mr. Speaker.

The name of the Liberal party should be changed to the B & B party. In the 1960s it was bilingualism and biculturalism that was going to be the complete answer to all the problems of Canada. That did not work. It was only a limited success. Now the Liberals are taking us into the 1980s. We will have to find a new B & B name for them—the Balkanization and Bankruptcy party. I think that would be a very appropriate name.

Mr. Collenette: How about the winning party?

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. A Liberal member just said, what about the winning party?

Mr. Collenette: Try it sometime.

Mr. McKenzie: The Liberals won through their unscrupulous tactics on TV ads and what have you. The Liberals certainly do not know anything about running the country but they know how to win an election, unfortunately. But the Canadian public is getting wise to them.

Bill C-17 does not cover a number of areas that were covered in the budget we presented in the last Parliament. It would have assisted development in eastern Canada. It offered specialized tax incentives for firms investing in Atlantic Canada and the Gaspé. Tax incentives were offered to encourage the construction of new Canadian-built fishing vessels. Fifty million dollars in job-creation funds were offered to assist eastern Canada in projects related to economic development. I hope the Liberal government will consider those areas in the very near future.

It is all very well to bring in little band-aid programs, but in countries or, for that matter, provinces that have nationalistic, leftist, or extremely strong bureaucratic tendencies, successful and striving entrepreneurs are made to feel uncomfortable. That is the situation we have witnessed in this country in the last few years. It was experienced also in the eight years the NDP were in power in Manitoba. Most people have no idea of the extent to which businesses are affected. It drives out investment money and stops business expansion because they simply do not trust these socialist governments. I shall not read into the record tonight things that I have read into past debates in other Parliaments about the amount of investment money and businesses that have been driven out of this country.

It is easy to see that Bill C-17 is not the total answer. It is a very, very small bill that will temporarily assist a few thousand business people. I have read the figures from this particular document into the record a number of times, Mr. Speaker, showing the amount of money driven out of the province of Manitoba in the eight years it had an NDP government. I have also read into the record a number of times the amounts of money driven out of this country under Liberal governments over the years.

The unadjusted unemployment rate as of March is running at 8.6 per cent, or almost one million people. This shows that over the years the policies have been absolute failures. The government managed to con people with their TV ads and slick promotions. We cannot take that away from them because they have been very successful with it—but that is about all they have been successful with. In 1970, Mr. Speaker, Canada enjoyed the third highest standard of living in the world; in 1978, we were eleventh, and today I believe we are somewhere about fifteenth, so our standard is dropping steadily under successive Liberal governments while problems for business are mounting.

I should like to return to the Mandate I referred to earlier and the comments that are made about the problems of small business. I hope that the minister will take note of these tonight. I should like to quote another letter that appeared in the Mandate recently as follows:

Please be advised that we are wasting a lot of time and gaining nothing for the small business with regards to the Small Businesses Loans Act. I have pleaded with (1) my bank, (2) the Co-op Credit Union, (3) The Provincial Treasury

Branches and received a big horse laugh. (They all said) there is no way that we are going to let our money out for 1 per cent over prime.

That came from a plumbing company in Calgary, but it is an issue that has been raised time and time again in the House. Small business people are having problems obtaining loans from different trust companies and banks. I hope we will hear something constructive from the minister regarding the problems that small businesses are having in obtaining loans.

I should like now to quote a comment of a businessman from Salmon Arm, B.C., who writes in the Mandate as follows:

For our clients, banking is a constant concern. The banks do not serve the business communities—the community serves the banks.

The problems are continuing, and Bill C-17 is far from the total answer. In fact it is not anywhere near it. Another letter which appeared in the Mandate reads as follows:

If the government is entitled to make laws to protect the consumer, they should also have the responsibility to make them known to all small businesses in such a way that the onus is not always on us. Who reads the official Gazette anyway!

I imagine this gentleman was referring to orders in council. We know that in 1978 about 3,300 orders in council were passed. This is a constant problem for the business community, to try to keep up with all the changes and the laws. They cannot sit down and read orders in council every day. We raised a question repeatedly in the House about the number of orders in council issued which affected businesses and other people in Canada.

Another area has caused problems for the small business community, especially the housebuilding industry. The September, 1979, issue of Hudac National Focus applauds the Conservatives' mortgage tax deduction plan which was filibustered and blocked by the Liberal and NDP parties in the last government. The publication commented that builders and industry generally were well pleased with the program outlined by the then minister of finance, although a few were skeptical about its over-all effects. It might not have helped everybody in the country but it would have been a great step forward in assisting home owners and builders. Nothing has been done since the new government took over. We hear the NDP screaming and yelling about interest rates but they filibustered and blocked a piece of legislation which would have been a major step forward in assisting home owners and the building industry in Canada.

Not only were they busy blocking veterans' affairs legislation and the transportation of dangerous goods measure but they also blocked the mortgage tax deductibility plan which would have helped home owners and the business community.

Mr. Blenkarn: And put people right out of their homes.

Mr. McKenzie: That is right. The NDP and the Liberals are putting people out of their homes.

Mr. Blenkarn: It costs them 3 per cent more than it should in interest.

Mr. McKenzie: That is right. One of my colleagues has just pointed out that the interest rates have gone up 3 per cent. That is as a result of the actions of the Liberal and the NDP parties in the Twenty-ninth Parliament.

The Liberal government is also falling back in not creating jobs and instead causing problems. It could do a lot to help the business community by making Canada self-sufficient in oil. We see that Canada spends $5.1 million a day to import oil. Successive Liberal governments have done more to create jobs for OPEC than they have to create jobs in Canada.

Mr. Blenkarn: They have done a good job with high interest rates in Canada though.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, they have certainly done a good job with high interest rates in Canada. I understand too that they have done a remarkably good job in creating work for OPEC with their policy of relying on imported oil, instead of making Canada self-sufficient. If previous Liberal governments had continued with the policy introduced by the Diefenbaker government in 1958, namely, the road to resources program, Canada could very well be self-sufficient today. We probably would not have any unemployment nor would we have to worry about importing oil. Every business in this country would be booming if the Diefenbaker program of roads to resources had been continued. But the Liberals had a big laugh about that and said that all we were doing was building roads from igloo to igloo. That is a Liberal policy for which we are paying very dearly.

Of course, under the present Liberal policy, this $5.1 million a day going to OPEC to create jobs, over the next three or four years, will increase to about $15 million a day. I am sure OPEC will be looking forward with glee to this Liberal government depending on other countries for energy.

There are others in our party who wish to speak this evening but I wanted to put these viewpoints on the record. I know the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) has moved around—there he is behind the curtain—and I hope he has taken some note of what I have said tonight. I hope he is reading the Mandates, and I hope he bears in mind why we have the high interest rate policy. I do not know whether he was here during the Twenty-ninth Parliament, but I hope he bears in mind the damage that was done to this country by allowing the NDP to run Canada for 20 months. They have to take full and direct responsibility, along with the Liberals, for the high interest rate policy that we have today which was established by the NDP and Liberals in the Twenty-ninth Parliament.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak tonight, having been the advocate of small business during the past Parliament. As a result, I have some knowledge of the difficulties that small businesses are having in the country at this time.

The bill itself is really not going to fool the small business community. All it is is an amendment to the instructions found in the average Liberal band-aid box. The increase by $75 million to $675 million, which will take us to June 30 of this year, does not do very much to deal with many of the critical internal problems faced by the small business community. The limits are raised from $75,000 to $100,000, which addreses inflation by adding a $25,000 bump. But it is really simple indexing for three years of unbridled inflation.

It was interesting to listen to the previous speaker who never really touched on the small business community or its difficulties. Instead, we heard a lot of political rhetoric from him. I would certainly hope that the Tory party will take the time to send it out to every small businessman in Canada.

An hon. Member: They would not dare.

Mr. Fulton: The new ceiling, which will take us into 1982, adds an additional $175 million, raising the limit to $850 million. I think it is important to look at what it means. The historical bulk of Liberal legislation does not deal with working capital, nor did any of the amendments proposed by the previous administration. The bill allows for equipment, improvement on premises, purchasing and construction of premises, and the purchase of land.

Tonight I would like to centre in on working capital requirements. I would like to point out that having acted as the critic for the NDP on small business, I noticed one particular thing in the last Parliament, and that was the number of letters I received from small businesses compared with the number I received from large corporations. I can tell you quite frankly that I did not get any from large corporations.

Mr. Fulton: I think it says a lot about the two larger parties, and how they fund themselves during elections. They like to laugh and chortle. I raised the point in my riding that Alcan gave the Liberal candidate $15,000 and the Tory candidate $15,000. It is interesting how it muzzled them during the campaign. Alcan wanted to build a large dam that would destroy the fishery and a major section of the environment. The Liberals and the Tories were very quiet during the campaign. There was only one voice, and that was the voice of the NDP.

The brutal rate of bankruptcy will remain untouched by the availability of loan capital under the SBLA. It directs itself rather to cosmetic change, to premises or equipment rather than interest rates and the costs of carrying inventory and expanding deliverability of goods and services, which are really the keys to a strong business sector. It is high time that the centralized disorganized approach to small business was discussed in this House. The myriad of forms for loans and criteria are an unnecessary hurdle to most small businesses. There is a need for one apparatus which deals, like a physician, with the whole, as well as the parts, rather than having, as many small businesses do now, a full time form filling and journeyman paper chaser. Businessmen need access to capital and expertise, not to red tape and paperwork.

With interest rates at 17 per cent to 20 per cent, a small business must pay out well over $1,000 a month simply to carry a $100,000 inventory. This gives opportunity for major chains and corporations to take over markets if a small business cuts back in its inventory. For example, in my riding a number of small businessmen contacted me as interest rates escalated earlier this year. A clothing store owner had two choices before him if he was to remain viable in the small business sector. He had to carry different sizes, colours, cuts and fabrics in order to attract customers and to get them back because he had the goods they liked. His first option was to borrow, increase his inventory, and hope the customers would come and buy from this increase in inventory. His second option was cut his inventory, thereby reducing his costs, and risk losing the volume sales which would result from customers in greater numbers. Neither of those options is particularly viable. Let us not forget that four out of ten Canadians are employed in the small business sector, with sales of less than $2 million.

I think it is important to touch on one of the points raised by the previous speaker. With over one million unemployed in Canada today, we should look at the relationship in percentages of those employed. Roughly 400,000 of those individuals would move on into the small business sector should we come up with a unified plan that would get the small business sector rolling again.

The time spent chasing loans could be better used at work within the Canadian economy. Let me give hon. members a number of examples. A number of years ago I was a glazier. I can tell you, quite frankly, that the need to carry inventory in that particular trade is extremely important. A glazier is much better off cutting glass, installing glass, mirrors or whatever else, than running around to wholesalers, as many glaziers now have to do, chasing up materials because they cannot afford to carry a full inventory.

I put it to hon. members that Bill C-17 and the other 400 odd pieces of dribs and drabs of garbage legislation and programs, do not deal with the crucial problems that small businesses are facing.

Mr. Blenkarn: It's a ding-dong bill; let's face it.

Mr. Fulton: A plumber is better off refitting a home than sitting in an office trying to negotiate a loan because his accounts are slow in being paid or his cash flow is limited because of his carrying capacity.

An engineer is better off preparing a site evaluation than sorting through an inch-thick book of bureaucratic nonsense, or trying to accommodate his need for staff to some ethereal federal government gobbledygook program.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have looked at such things as the ABCs to small business a number of times. I am glad to see the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) here. I am sure he has had a number of things to say, and I have read some of his comments. It is certainly something that the previous government had some intention of dealing with, but did not get too far along the road in doing so.

Small business today is working to subsidize the federal monetary system that does little in return for its hard work. An active, growing small business sector requires an aggressive and an imaginative federal leadership, something that is sadly lacking in Bill C-17. We should not spend days dealing with cosmetic trivia such as this. Let us spend our days effectively, condensing and working on such things as an umbrella funding system, an expanded research and development concept—

An hon. Member: Are you opposing it?

Mr. Fulton: I am certainly not opposing it. I think it is a very cosmetic bill and really does not deal with the types of issues and certainly the type of media that surround such things as the introduction of this bill.

An hon. Member: It's useless.

Mr. Fulton: I would not say it is useless as the hon. member to my right is indicating. It certainly does offer some funds to the small business sector.

The myriad approach, now with some 400 programs, is an attempt to cover up the fundamental problems of Liberal support to monopoly corporations and high interest rates which result from a deficiency of made-in-Canada industrial and economic strategies.

All fingers and toes in the dike of small business problems do little today except have all digits in the dike, something the pickled corkscrew from St. John's I am sure would appreciate. It is fundamental that there must be a forum for the voice of small business in developing a comprehensive structure that deals immediately with the needs of small business, not simply the needs and the wart-healing approach of the Liberal party.

Bill C-17 is an expression of the search for band-aids to hold together an eighteenth century approach to twentieth century global economics. I notice from the comments of the hon. member for Capilano, the previous minister of small business, a number of interesting statements, and I quote from page 431 of Friday's Hansard:

> I suggest that part of that review must be a change in attitude, a change in the use of the government resource from a protective attitude toward industries that are now obsolete in the global market place to delivering programs of front end benefit . . . so that we can compete against global efficiency and labour in other parts of the world where there is a lower standard of living and perhaps not the burden of environmental protection—

I must say with respect to the first part of it I can agree there are some obsolete sectors in the Canadian economy that really need to be dealt with, either in terms of bringing in a new technology so those jobs can be transferred, or dealing inside of Canada's economy so that the small business sector can expand into those areas where we are now importing either technology or the goods themselves.

There are some other points touched on here. Certainly the one I would like to touch on, being the environmental critic, is where the previous minister referred to "the burden of environmental protection". It is important, in looking at some of the statements of the previous minister of the environment when his party was in office, that the costs were estimated in the hundreds of millions of dollars, the costs of environmental and industrial pollution. If we are going to talk about burdens, it is an issue we should discuss at some length.

For example, acid rain is a burden. Polluted lakes and rivers, caused by industry are a burden. Cancer and disease from a polluted environment are a cost and a burden. The studies that are coming forth today indicate that some of the areas of soft technology in fact bring more jobs with them than having an industry that does pollute the environment. It can actually bring more jobs than simply adopting, as we are seeing certainly with our neighbours to the south, such policies that say if we are going to move toward energy self sufficiency by 1990, we are going to have to trade off part of the environment. I would say, and I hope all members would support it, that as we move toward energy self sufficiency and full employment in Canada we should not simply trade off the environment simply to gain goals that are not accessible in the short term. Carefully planned and executed developments that operate with the environment are a cost benefit, not a burden.

The benefits of this bill are eroded by the high interest rates. I think we need to look at that most closely. It raises the limit from $75,000 to $100,000. With the type of inflation that we have seen in the past couple of years, that extra $25,000 has been very rapidly gobbled up.

Let's take a look for a moment at a small businessman somewhere in Canada who is having difficulty. He is having difficulty getting his accounts in and he is having difficulty carrying a large inventory. What does this act deal with? It deals with premises, machinery, and land.

Simply putting on a new store front might help to get somebody in. A new piece of land for a little parking might help. However, the fundamentals in the small business community are waiting for this government to really start credibly dealing with the very difficult situation that they are facing, that is, the cost of carrying inventory and the cost of increasing staff, so that they can get out and deal and grapple in the marketplace with the problems, and with the initiatives that are required to get the small business community going. The 25 per cent increase in the amount, with 17 per cent interest charged on that, can hardly be described as a constructive policy.

Mr. Blenkarn: Where do you get 17 per cent?

Mr. Fulton: 15.67 plus 1 per cent.

Mr. Blenkarn: One per cent over prime.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) covered very well the reasons why banks are less than eager to pursue 1 per cent over prime when they can pursue 3 per cent over prime on other loans. That comes to the crucial matter of what is facing the small business community, which is access to capital.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Capilano touch on that, with some possibility of ways of getting capital out of the Canadian economy and getting it moving within the small business sector. This is a job for government. Clearly the government on the other side is not prepared to move on it. It is a job for all the opposition, rather than bickering back and forth as the previous speaker for the Tory party did. We should deal credibly with the issues that are at hand, rather than simply using these periods in the House of Commons to bicker back and forth about very trivial issues, getting on to the fundamental issues that need to be dealt with in this country on behalf of small business. After all, that is why this time is set aside. We should therefore pursue it as effectively as we can.

With the same frustration felt by the small businesses of Canada I give support to this bill, acknowledging however the stop-gap and bureaucratic nature of it, at a time when an imaginative and cohesive approach is required.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I cannot begin without saying how amazed I am at that hogwash coming from the previous speaker for the New Democratic Party. If any government followed the philosophies of the New Democratic Party, there would be no small business sector. All that would be left in a country run by the socialists would be larger unions and nationalized Crown corporations.

I would first like to congratulate the new Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) on his appointment. I hope he receives the co-operation from his cabinet that his predecessor, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) did, and not as his previous Liberal predecessors. Otherwise he will become a puppet on a string as they were in the past. I sincerely wish him the best of luck in his deliberations with small business because we all look, from these two parties in any event, at the future of small business in a very non-partisan way.

I am pleased to be taking part in this debate regarding the proposed amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. I am always delighted to speak on matters which deal with the small business sector because small business, as we know it, still know it, or certainly as we knew it, is certainly the backbone of the economy. Unfortunately, with a lack of attention to that sector, that backbone has been eroding.

Small business, as we have said over and over again, is responsible for over 60 per cent of the labour force in this country. It is certainly the largest potential employer, something that governments, generally speaking, are not taking as much advantage of as possible, especially with the unemployment figure reaching a million in this country.

It is unfortunate that this House debates matters involving small business so seldom, when in fact the whole economy revolves around it. It is also unfortunate that more often than not when this House debates matters dealing with small business, it deals with amendments or extensions of old pieces of legislation merely to keep up with the times, rather than with new innovative programs and policies that truly assist the small business sector. This bill, Bill C-17, is one such example of merely amending the Small Businesses Loans Act in such a way as to keep up with the times. Naturally it will receive all-round support, for it increases the amount of the maximum guaranteed loan from $75,000 to $100,000. As I said, that merely keeps the level of the loan indexed to the current inflation rate.

I recall in 1977 when similar amendments were made to the Small Businesses Loans Act at which time the ceiling went from $50,000 to $75,000 maximum. At that time a number of us recommended that we should be more generous and raise the level to $100,000 instead of going back to this bill on a tri-annual basis. Perhaps a permanent bill incorporating measures keeping up with inflation could be considered, so that we would not have to come back to deal with these band-aid approaches to small business on a regular basis, as we have been doing. In any event, three years ago dealing with these same amendments I said we should not just deal with this vital sector on an ad hoc basis, as we are doing today again but, rather, that we should develop an over-all comprehensive program for small and medium enterprises in Canada.

Over the years that I was a small business spokesman in this House, my colleagues and I proposed a variety of ideas and recommendations to assist and enhance the growth of the small business sector. In fact, my friend, the hon. member for Capilano, was in the process of developing some of those ideas when he was minister of state for small businesses in the last Parliament. Unfortunately, though, as everyone knows, this development of ideas came to an abrupt and sad end when the Liberals and New Democrats defeated a budget which, I must assume, was defeated for a reason which goes far beyond budgetary measures, namely, political power.

Mr. LeBlanc: Explain.

Mr. Jelinek: The Liberals could not have defeated the budget because they did not approve of it. I will explain. The Liberals could not have defeated the budget just because they did not approve of the budgetary measures, because why else would the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have copied to the cent many of those budgetary measures in his mini-budget just a week ago tonight? One of the few things that was left out, of course, was a promise that government spending would not increase any faster than the gross national product. Look what the proposal is now, $4 billion. That was a promise.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) promised during the election campaign after our budget defeat that if interest rates rose after the Liberals formed the government, he would resign. What happened? Interest rates have increased by 3 per cent, and he is still here. The only thing I can say to those who supported the Liberals on February 18 is that they have been had. If they believe that energy cost increases are going to stay below 18 cents a gallon, they are fooling themselves as well. The government has been fooling the Canadian people. That is what has been happening. The Liberals did that in 1974 with wage and price controls. They did it again this time with the budget and with energy policy.

Where is that magic blended price or the magic made-in-Canada price? When all the blending comes together, the cost at the gas pump is going to increase by 50 cents or more a gallon, not 18 cents. We were proposing 18 cents a gallon. We proposed, hand-in-hand, energy tax rebates to low income families, to agricultural producers and to the development of the urban transit system. None of this is being proposed by the Liberals now that they are in government.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised that as soon as he formed the government he would let us know what energy costs were going to be. In December of last year he said that in two weeks he would let us know exactly what that made-in-Canada price would be. Two weeks later he said he would let us know as soon as he formed the government. When he formed the government he still did not know. He still does not tell us, and he still keeps the Canadian public in the dark as far as energy costs are concerned. That is why I am saying to those Canadians who supported the Liberals on February 18 that—and I repeat again—they have been had.

In any event, back to Bill C-17—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A wonderful digression.

Mr. Jelinek: —three years ago this House also increased the eligibility level of a small business under the Small Businesses Loans Act from maximum annual sales of $1 million to $1.5 million. I am somewhat surprised that there is no change in this definition as it pertains to this legislation in Bill C-17. Is there something wrong with growth? Does the Minister of State for Small Businesses or the government think there is something wrong with growth? By not raising the level there would appear to be an incentive for small business to stay small rather than to grow.

But perhaps the most important thing which is missing is a provision which would include venture or working capital as part of this legislation because, after all, the majority of businesses which experience financial difficulties experience them because of a lack of working capital. This is something that I proposed very strenuously the last time this bill was amended in 1977. It was considered and rejected for a variety of reasons, but today more than ever, as far as the economic climate in this country is concerned, it is necessary that working capital or venture capital be included in this bill, and I hope the minister will seriously consider including such a provision when it comes before the appropriate standing committee at which time I, along with my colleagues, will be proposing a number of amendments to try to improve this bill.

However, after all is said and done with regard to this bill, it is really interest rates which harm industry the most, the high cost of borrowing money. Members of this government only two or three months ago were saying that they should be elected because they would bring interest rates down. One credit I must give to the government is for copying parts of that John Crosbie budget, and one of the measures in that budget which the government copied is the small business development bond, but that is not enough.

Three months ago this Liberal administration, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has said over the past few months, knew what was wrong. Surely it must know what is right, and yet all it has the guts to do is sneak in a mini-budget so that the opposition does not have an opportunity to reply and respond. We cannot bring the budgetary measures before the appropriate committee for discussion and deliberation. What is wrong with this government which made all those promises to the Canadian public about what is good and what is not good? Unfortunately, the small business community cannot depend solely on the Small Businesses Loans Act and its tri-annual update.

The small business community cannot continue, as it were, to hang in, while governments in general ignore its basic needs on one hand, and swamp it with bureaucratic regulations, directives, controls, forms and general paper work on the other. The small firm sector is what the free enterprise system in this country was built on, and if we want this system as we know it to continue to exist, much more must be done in the way of the promotion and development of wide-ranging programs and policies.

I have said over and over again, in this House as well as outside it, that government must commit itself to developing an over-all policy, not just ad hoc amendments and legislation such as the legislation we are discussing today. This government must commit itself to an over-all policy to assist the small business community in dealing with a broad range of issues and concerns.

The party to which I belong has, on many occasions, put forward realistic recommendations for consideration by the government in dealing with this vital industrial sector and, again, we were in the process of implementing them. The hon. member for Capilano was in the process of implementing them when he was cut short. The Conservative government was cut short in trying to implement the many realistic programs and proposals which we had introduced and were in the process of introducing.

For example, here are just some of the programs which I personally have recommended in this House in the past, and I continued to do so: Give tax rebates and other incentives to those small businesses which invest in research and development, because incentive is the key word in small business. Yet under the Liberal administration of the past 12 years, incentive has virtually disappeared from the political vocabulary.

I turn to point two: to provide an incentive tax credit to any Canadian citizen who makes a direct investment in the equity of a Canadian-owned business. Again, we must give small business an incentive, and we must give Canadians the incentive not only to invest in small business but to keep their investment in Canadian small businesses. By such a program we would kill two birds with one stone—keep investment in Canada, and support the small business sector at the same time.

Three: develop trade schools and apprenticeship programs. It is unfortunate that in a country like ours, in which there are now a million unemployed, we should be importing specialists and tradespeople instead of setting up expanded trade schools and apprenticeship programs here. We have to go abroad and bring in labour from other countries. It is a shame, when we have a million people unemployed, that we should have to depend on other countries for specialized labour. The Conservative government was in the process of developing more trade schools and apprenticeship programs when it was cut short by the Liberals and the New Democrats who do not have a program to replace the new programs we were recommending.

Point four: to establish a fixed proportion of government services and goods to be supplied by small business, in other words, a set-aside program. We have talked about this for years. Why should the majority of those called upon to produce products and services for the government be large corporations, many of them multinational corporations not Canadian-owned? Why cannot the government set aside part of its purchasing program strictly for Canadian small businesses which, more often than not, can provide products and services more effectively than the larger multinationals?

Five: exempt small businesses from the application of federal legislation potentially harmful to them. We often debate federal legislation which is geared to large businesses, forgetting what harmful effects many of these measures have on the small business sector, whether it is textile quotas, whether it is—

An hon. Member: The Bank Act.

Mr. Jelinek: —or the Bank Act, as one of my hon. friends mentioned. There are many pieces of legislation dealt with in this House which are harmful to small business. The minister responsible for small businesses should take upon himself to make sure that small business is exempt from these provisions whenever they are harmful to that sector.

Six: develop, through incentives, a secondary manufacturing sector. Canada is the wealthiest country per capita in terms of natural resources, yet consider what happens: we dig up our natural resources, often using American or foreign firms, and sell those resources to West Germany, Japan and elsewhere, where they create productivity and employment. Then, very often, we buy back the finished product at inflated prices, though in many cases they were made out of natural resources which came from Canadian soil in the first place. Again, through incentives, we must begin to consider establishing a secondary manufacturing sector particularly within the small and medium-size business community which is the most capable when it comes to dealing with this aspect. As I say, we have an advantage because the natural resources are here as opposed to Japan or West Germany.

Governments in the past have closed their eyes to these possibilities. Their philosophy has been: just dig it out and ship it abroad. If we had a secondary manufacturing sector here we would not be obliged to depend to the extent we do on the American economy when it comes to auto parts, for example.

One other point—and I shall be brief because I know my time is running out—calls for the total overhaul of the Federal Business Development Bank. From my point of view, its procedures are too cumbersome, too bureaucratic; there is too much red tape and too much security is demanded by way of collateral. I could tell you a dozen horror stories, Mr. Speaker. I recall when I was building up my own small business. At that time the Federal Business Development Bank was called the Industrial Development Bank. We needed expansion funds because our business was growing faster than we could get credit from the chartered banks. It took us six months to get the loan and four times the amount of collateral which we regarded as reasonable. I am sure if that bank had known my grandmother had gold fillings in her teeth, they would have asked for them, too! But I did not tell them. I might add that legal fees amounted to about 10 per cent of the total loan. Now, is that assistance to small business? The same kind of story is true today of the Federal Business Development Bank. That is not assistance to small business.

As I said earlier, bills such as the one before us are necessary for the sake of updating only. They do not constitute anything new or innovative. I believe the bill should have offered a lot more than it has, such as higher maximums, higher annual gross revenues for eligibility, an increase in the number of institutions offering the loans, the inclusion of working capital, and a far greater variety of reasons qualifying people for loans—not only those engaged in small business strictly defined but those engaged in the area of farming and fisheries as well.

I shall not dwell on this subject any longer because I anticipate putting forward these recommendations perhaps by way of amendment when the bill reaches committee stage. So, in closing, I should like to repeat what I have said often in this chamber, something which I believe is imperative if we are to preserve our democratic way of life.

If we wish the small business sector to continue and prosper in our society, as I am sure we all do—at least on the Liberal and Conservative sides; I am not so sure about those other clowns to my left—immediate action must be taken by the federal government to come up with an over-all, comprehensive program dealing with small business, rather than the present band-aid approach. I know the minister must be getting tired of hearing the phrase "band-aid approach" used so many times, but that is what it is and that is what has been applied for the last 12 years. The small business community is what the free enterprise system is all about. It is what this country was built on and what this country can prosper by.

Other countries, which are presently more fortunate than Canada with respect to unemployment, inflation, productivity and other benchmarks by which a standard of success is judged, have all concentrated their economic energies upon the small business sector. We still have a chance to keep the free enterprise system well and alive, building toward the future, building on what we possess, building on the strength we have. But we must act at once before we lose this opportunity.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne had a great promise in it. It said something about an assurance that ceilings for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act would be raised to $100,000. That, of course, was designed to sound good to the general unwashed. This is a ding-dong piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker. It is pure drivel. It does not mean anything with interest rates on prime at 16.75 per cent. And one over prime is 17.75 per cent—18 per cent. Well, my goodness gracious!

We are now going to increase the limit which the Government of Canada can guarantee to the big banks to $675 million from $600 million. Now, is that not an important piece of legislation for the big banks? Is that not wonderful for the big banks? The big banks will be happy about that. Also we will hear about the Bank Act later in this session. Is that not super? Are we not going to do something real fine for small business? We are going to give them money at one over prime, if they happen to qualify under the regulations in the act.

Let us look at the act and all the regulations required under it. Under section 7 of the act it is indicated that the governor in council may make regulations prescribing the forms, applications, reports and other documents required in connection with guaranteed loan improvements effective under the operations of the act. At one over prime we have got to go through the red tape, and at 18 points we still have to go through the red tape. This is to help small business. Is that not wonderful? How can one be the Minister of State for Small Businesses, (Mr. Lapointe) and expect to help small business by one more bit of regulation and red tape up to $100,000? This is providing that one's business does not have too much gross and providing that it comes under the regulations and the requirements of the minister. What is his regulatory power? It goes on a whole page and on to the next page right down to section (m) and the subsections. It goes on and on and on.

The poor small businessman coming up to apply for a loan will say to his banker, "Sir, I want a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act. I want to pay only one over prime." The banker is going to kick him out on his arse. This is what they call a help to small business. This is a real Liberal help to small business. They really want to help the small businessman. They want to give him all this advantage of paying one over prime. The guy could probably get the loan at one over prime without the red tape, and if he cannot, he will not get the loan anyway.

What are they going to guarantee with this one over prime loan? They are going to guarantee that the banks will get 90 per cent of their defaults covered. That is what they are talking about. They are talking about a piece of legislation which is so important that it was put into the Speech from the Throne. It was put in to help the unwashed who do not know anything about small business to think that this government will do something for small business.

I see the minister walking out right now. I do not blame him for walking out. I would walk out too if I was the minister with this piece of legislation. This piece of legislation is a travesty on this Parliament. We were asked to debate urgent legislation. The Governor General in his imputations for this House said in the speech that we must rely on the good will of members and that we must get down to passing necessary legislation, the accumulation of essential legislation. This is called essential legislation; this is called legislation to help small business. I see the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) nodding his head. He thinks that this is great stuff. He has been so heavily involved in the small business field that he really knows what it is to earn a living and pay a payroll, as long as he is on the public service staff.

Let us get down to brass tacks. This is a bill which is just pure hokum to the general public. It has no intention of helping small business at all. It will not do a darned thing to help small business. It raises the limits the banks will receive. The big banks will receive the guarantee of the minister from $600 million to $675 million. It raises the size of the loan, providing the loan goes through all the regulatory processes, up to $100,000. I say, big deal, ding-dong legislation. It is a never mind bill. One cannot oppose the thing. It has got good intentions. It says something about small business. It is really intended to help. Maybe it will help the little guy a bit, but it will not do a darn thing for the business conditions of this country.

I am disappointed that the minister has left because I would have liked to have asked him how many public servants are operating this wonderful piece of legislation, guiding the limits the banks will guarantee these loans? How many people does he have supervising the banks under the Small Businesses Loans Act? How many people are we paying as taxpayers of Canada to supervise these terribly difficult loans on which the poor small businessman only has to pay 18 per cent or 1.5 per cent a month? It is as easy as that. It is disgusting that the government should produce this legislation at all, that it should not come to the House of Commons with real concrete economic legislation dealing with the interest problems faced by business.

The other day I was doing some homework on the Bank Act. I am glad the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is looking at me. While I was doing some homework on the Bank Act, I had some discussion with some bankers, and it appears to me that the banking system is taking the hide off business to pay for its mistakes by getting into the mortgage business and the consumer loans business. What they have to do to cover their hides and their losses with rising interest rates is to charge small business prime plus one over, plus two over or whatever, just to get enough income to cover the losses they are taking on their long-term mortgage portfolios, their long-term car finance portfolios, and their long-term chargex type portfolios which are guaranteed at rates of interest far below the current prime. The effect has been that the business community has been diddled. Really, the minister should be talking about the Bank Act. He should be talking about how we will control interest factors charged to businesses that are productive and employment oriented in the country, rather than businesses which need the assistance of this act.

Frankly this act has never done anything for small business. This act started in 1961. Really, what has it done? What are the huge accomplishments? What are the enormous successes of a statute which has been cluttering up the books since 1961? What have they really accomplished with it? We could talk about the bureaucracy they have. We could talk about the number of people who are employed in the service of the Government of Canada as a result of this act. We could talk about the paperwork that has been organized. We could talk about the forms that have been prescribed under section 7. It goes on page after page. This is the kind of thing we get from a Liberal government. They have not got anything new to offer, so they keep on amending an old piece of legislation, and they do not justify this legislation by any tremendous assistance to small business. Yes, it sounds sexy if one wants to put it that way. It is great stuff, it will help small business. They are going to increase their loan limit to $100,000. That is not the kind of thing we should be doing in this Parliament.

Even though the Governor General, in speaking to us in the Speech from the Throne, was mouthing the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the people of Canada expect something out of this Parliament. They do not expect this kind of drivel. They expect something that is positive. They expect something that will inspire the entrepreneurial efforts of Canadians. What does this act do? It increases the loan limit to $100,000. It increases the guarantee limit to $675 million. That is all it does. At no time can we show in the administration of this act for nearly 20 years that it has really accomplished anything for small business, that it has really made it possible for small business to grow and develop, even though small business represents very close to half the employment in this country or more.

What has this act done? As a small businessman, would you bother going to your bank manager and saying, "Mr. Manager, you have got to put me under the Small Businesses Loans Act?" The truth of the matter is that you want the loan. If the manager says that it is 1.5 over prime, you will go for 1.5 over prime rather than upset the manager and try to beat him down to one over prime. That is what you are going to do. You are darned right you are going to do that. You are not going to say to Mr. Manager, "Fill out the forms under the Small Businesses Loans Act and get it for one over prime for me." Guess what! You are not going to get the loan at all if you play that kind of a game. You know it, I know it, and anybody who has been in business knows it.

This is cosmetic legislation designed for people who do not know any better. It is designed to put in a brochure so the government can say it has given something to small business. I suggest the government has done it to small business, not for small business, and they have done it to the people of Canada, not for them.

The government has created a situation where it has gone to the public of Canada, and intends to go this year, to borrow $50 million every business day of the year. That is fresh money they require to pay for their wasteful expenditure programs. These are expenditure programs which they refuse to come to this country and the people of Canada and this House of Commons to say why they are required. The government requires $50 million fresh cash every business day.

Some small businessmen hold savings bonds. Some ordinary Canadians hold savings bonds, but $500 million in savings bonds have been cashed in the last three weeks.

What this government has done has driven up the price of capital. It has driven up the cost of interest in this country by excessive borrowing. If the government would even cut down its requirement to borrow by a couple of billion dollars, or the $3.7 billion the budget of December 11 would have allowed, there would have been more money on the market for businessmen to borrow. When there is more money around to borrow, the interest rate goes down. Businessmen are not concerned about whether they qualify under this piece of legislation. They are concerned about whether they can borrow money at a reasonable rate. What does this government do? It is going to do something great for the small businessman by increasing the amount of the ceiling to $100,000.

I guess our party will support this piece of nonsense. I guess we will send it to the committee. As the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) says, I suppose we can make some amendments to it. However, you know it really is a ridiculous piece of nonsense. It does not do anything for people in small business. It does not help anybody. I bet you that the minister, if he were here, could not tell us one single person this piece of legislation has really helped. If you can get a loan you get the loan yourself. If you cannot get the loan then you do not get it.

Do you think a bank is going to give you a loan at one over prime when it thinks it can dig you for three over prime, just because you go to the manager and say, "Mr. Manager, did you not know there was a Small Businesses Loans Act? Did you not know that, Mr. Manager?" You know what the manager is going to say. He is going to say, "You do not qualify, buddy boy, because I ain't going to fill out the form." He will tell you to go down the street to the Bank of Nova Scotia. The Bank of Nova Scotia will tell you to go down the street to the Toronto-Dominion Bank. You can go all around the clock and eventually you might, if you do your politicking right, get somebody to fill out the forms, but then he will probably turn the whole thing down.

This is a lot of nonsense. Anybody who has been in business knows that. I see that the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) knows that. He has been there before and he knows it is a lot of nonsense. It is a lot of nonsense; it is ding-dong legislation from a ding-dong government that does not know anything about business. The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett)—

An hon. Member: I was sleeping.

Mr. Blenkarn: She says she is sleeping. I do not think that even she expects there is very much in this legislation. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) was speaking about it and I do not think he believes there is very much in this legislation. This is a filler bill in order to keep people happy and let this government say it is doing something. The government can tell Mr. Bulloch it has done something for small business today. I hope Mr. Bulloch of the organization for small business appreciates that because he has really got something. He has got a wonderful bill. He has a really wonderful bill here. It is really going to make all his members rich and prosperous. It is going to help them all make a lot of money.

This is the kind of a bill that is really not worth the paper it is written on. You will not find a bank manager getting all worked up about this bill. They think it is great. They think, by golly, the Government of Canada has really come to the assistance of the little fellow. Here we have a bill that is supposed to help small business. Why does the government not have a bill before this House that says this government commits itself to buying the things it requires from small business? It should buy a percentage of government requirements in Canada from small business. It should buy a percentage of its stationery, paper clips, typewriters, and repair services from small business.

What about the things the government needs around this Hill and in its offices around the countryside? Is a percentage of that material purchased from small business? Are we going to hire no one except people from small businesses to do the typewriter repairs, fix up the adding machines and the computers in the manpower office in my city? Is that the kind of policy we have, or are we going to continue with a policy of only hiring the big boys, the powerful boys, and give the small businessmen this drivel in Bill C-17?

Bill C-17 represents the kind of nonsense that we get from this government. This is the kind of thing this government produces so that it can say it has done something. I can see all the press clippings now. They will indicate that in the month of April this government was able to pass through second reading so many pieces of legislation: Holy baldy! Holy baldy!

This ding-dong bill with its red tape, with its 17¾ per cent demand interest on the present rate will not do anything for the business people in the community. It is keeping us busy here tonight. We are having lots of fun. We can debate it back and forth, but the real problems of the small businessmen relate to the acquiring of equity capital. If this government really was intent on doing something it should produce some amendments to the Federal Business Development Bank Act in connection with the federal government making arrangements for equity capital for small business. The government should do something in respect of the Federal Business Development Bank taking less security and a little more risk on some of the development loan possibilities that exist in small business.

This bill really does not have much to offer. It limits the minister's liability to a bank. It is really a bill to guarantee a bank against a bum loan. In others words, if a bank has to make a loan, because of political pressure in a community, and it did not think it was a very good loan, that bank is protected by the government. As a matter of fact, if the banker felt he would probably lose he would probably fill out the necessary paperwork and make the loan. If it was a good loan the banker might even talk the client into taking the loan at 1.5 per cent or 2 per cent over prime because of the speed at which the loan would be processed. After all, if the interest rate at 1 per cent over prime is 17¾ per cent, or 18 per cent, and the rate at 2 per cent over prime is 18¾ per cent, what is the difference? At that level of prime, to a person who wants the money, the total interest factor on the improvement loan does not mean much. The important thing is how fast the loan can be approved and how quickly the man can get on with the job.

This bill really does not reduce interest rates at all. It really provides an assistance program for the big banks. That is what it is, it is the big bank improvement loan. We should call it the big bank improvement loan. We could say it is the Royal benefit plan, the Commercial benevolent plan, or the Montreal yes plan. That is really what it is.

If one really gets down to the matter, the only people who will file applications under this act are those whom the banks looks upon as people who cannot pay their bills anyway. The banks will try to stick the minister with a $100,000 liability. They can stick this minister with a lot of liabilities. He is a good fellow for liabilities. He is a liability to this government sometimes, and he must be a liability because he brought in this bill as a matter of urgent and pressing legislation. It is a bank benevolent act.

If a person really qualifies for the loan, then he will get the loan from his local bank. I can say, from my much experience in small business and arranging financing for small business through our banking system, that our banking system is very competent at organizing loans for small business. It does not want to be bothered with the red tape of this bill. In fact the banks will make these loans at 1 per cent over prime or not much more. The banks will make these loans in some cases with minimal security if the credit worthiness of the borrower is there. It is only if the credit worthiness is not there or if the person cannot or will not pay, that the bank will attempt to stick the minister with the loan.

The minister will end up with a bank bureaucracy to look after the situations where the bank has ended up sticking it to him. This bill is very typical of Liberal legislation in that it is designed to increase the size of the bureaucracy and designed to be colour-coated to make a good impression. As far as business is concerned, as far as the guy on the street who is running a small manufacturing business, a store, or something in the construction field, is concerned, this is a bunch of nonsense. If such a person goes to his banker tomorrow and says, "Bill C-17 has been passed and you have to give me a loan of $100,000, cheapie, cheapie, cheap", he will get the cold shoulder from his banker. You and I know that, Mr. Speaker, and the minister ought to know it as well.

The minister has been involved in small business enough to know that this piece of legislation is purely cosmetic or drivel legislation, the kind of useless bill that really does not accomplish very much and that is only there to paint the picture that this government is doing something for small business. This government has "bureaucratitus". It is a disease. The government passes legislation that provides for regulation, and I mentioned earlier the regulations in section 7, and I can go on through three-quarters of this bill about regulations.

Obviously, this is a bill that is designed to employ people. It gives the minister more people to work for him, more people in the civil service, more people to regulate and more forms to produce. It is probably good for the printing industry, and if the minister were really enthusiastic about the bill, he would organize the printing of the business forms required for this legislation so that the work would go to companies defined under the legislation as being small businesses.

This legislation will not do very much for small business. I will support the bill, but I really do not know why it was introduced as part of a program of a government that purports to do something for people, that purports to create, that purports to produce, and that purports to be interested in the affairs of Canada. After the government increases the deficit to $14 billion and brings in a requirement to borrow $11.75 billion on the capital markets of the country which will drive interest rates up and make things difficult for business, it proceeds to come along with this piece of camouflage, this piece of ding dong, this piece of nothingness and say that small business loans will receive favourable treatment.

The minister knows that it is nonsense, and anybody who has been in small business knows it as well. This bill is cosmetic and has no value in the total picture of the business community in Canada. This is typical of the kind of bill which this government produces. It is unfortunate that we on this side must support or, to some extent, go along with such a measure simply because there may be some conceivable benefit. So, I believe that we must conceivably go along.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best suggestion that could be given to the government today as it addresses the problem of what it might be able to do to assist small business is that it try, through some magic that is not obvious in this piece of legislation, to put itself in the place of a small businessman. I suggest that Bill C-19 refuses to address the problem that the small businessman is facing today.

I think back to 1977 when I entered federal politics and to what the then prime minister of Canada said, that he would like to wrestle inflation to the ground. He gave the people of Canada a commitment in that year by forecasting that inflation would not exceed 4 per cent. He followed that forecast with an apology by blaming the pressures of inflation on the Canadian economy on other countries. In 1978 he said, "We will hold inflation in Canada to no more than 6 per cent." In fact, what has happened is far from the promises which the Prime Minister gave. His promises are not inconsistent with the promises his party made during the most recent election campaign.

I am sure that the business community in Canada was looking to this new government which took office only a short time ago for some injections into the economy that would help small businessmen. As a small businessman for some 25 years, I can say that this piece of legislation offers absolutely nothing new over what has occurred in the past decade, which was a complete disregard for the small businessman as he faced the pressures of inflation. We all know what members opposite thought of the "Diefenbuck", the 97-cent dollar, and we all know that when a piece of legislation is introduced in the House that offers some positive measures with regard to the fact that the small businessman must get better value for his dollar, he must also get better value from the government.

This piece of legislation, Bill C-17, will not correct what in fact is actually happening. What is happening to the business community in Canada today is that investments are leaving the country. No one wishes to invest in small business because of the bad treatment it gets from government. The government is supposed to set an example, and introduce legislation to prove it. What the government is doing in this bill is saying it would like to see the banks guaranteed for their losses incurred through the higher frequencies of bankruptcies in Canada today. This way the banks will lend to small business.

Small business is a bad risk because small business cannot get good value for its dollars spent. And why can small business not get good value for its dollars spent? It is because of the devalued dollar, the waste in government, and the high inflation rate, which was forecast in 1977 by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to be 4 per cent. Then it went to 6 per cent, 8 per cent, and 10 per cent. I say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe), why can the government not introduce legislation that honestly tries to help the business community? Why do they dress up legislation and have headlines in the newspapers to the effect that the Small Businesses Loans Act is coming in when all it is in reality is a means for the banks to guarantee 90 per cent of their risk capital to an already bankrupt industry, small business, for job creation and employment?

Today the small business sector provides more than half of the total employment in Canada. We have a tremendously high unemployment rate. It approaches one million or more, if the figures were accurate. It actually exceeds one million because it eliminates those people who no longer qualify because of the effect of Liberal policies on the UIC qualifications.

This government is totally responsible for the giant octopus approach to the economy. The government is reaching out with its tentacles and is sucking like a giant octopus every nickel and every penny out of the small business community until there is nothing left for that octopus known as the government to live on. It grows with its own greed and the person mainly affected is the small businessman.

How nice it would have been if the government had honoured some of the commitments it had made to the business community in Canada. How long can this giant cookie monster keep reaching into the cookie jar sucking every ounce of blood out of the business community until it has created the threat of unemployment for 50 per cent of the potential work force in Canada today?

If they do not smarten up soon, and introduce small business legislation that addresses the principal problem in business today—if they do not soon face the fact that the business community is going bankrupt with them, may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the spending of this government at some $60 billion represents 30 per cent more than they expect to take in? What business in Canada today could remain operative when spending 25 per cent more than it earns—sucking out of the people of Canada $1 out of every $4 they pay in taxes in order to satisfy their own greed?

The government's greed is nothing more than an insatiable search for power. They will tell the people of Canada anything, lead them down the garden path to nowhere, and in reality what the people get is nothing. This piece of legislation offers nothing new—no new outlook, no new approach or new direction for the running of this country.

When I ran for election in 1977 it was because I was finding it increasingly difficult to stay in business because of the greed of government and bureaucracy with its paper work. Why can the government not look at small business and design a very basic piece of legislation and give some credibility to the Minister of State for Small Businesses? It is not fair to shove him in some back room office and tell him that it is his responsibility to solve the problems of the country while, at the same time, giving him no teeth with which to attack the problem. If the minister is sincere—and I am sure he is—in wanting to help the small business community, he should introduce legislation that would cut bureaucracy, that would reduce the 60 per cent inefficiency in the civil service, that would offer funds to small businessmen at an interest rate they could afford. Why doesn't he do these things instead of introducing a meaningless piece of legislation?

This bill does nothing more than say to the business people of Canada today, "We are going to guarantee your loan to the bank; we are going to make sure that those big corporate giants known as the banks and trust companies are not going to lose any more on that problem that we, as a government, created, so we are going to insure the banks against losses in business."

When I approached the Industrial Development Bank in 1971, in 1972, and in 1974, Mr. Speaker, I found it increasingly difficult to obtain a loan. The banks are not interested, and this legislation does not offer the incentive for the bank or the lending institution to help the small businessman.

The government does not offer business people any incentive to run their businesses effectively, efficiently, economically and practically. The government cannot run its own house, so how does it expect the business community to pay any attention to a piece of legislation which does nothing more than guarantee the loan to the bank—90 per cent and write off 10? The banks can write off 10 per cent at the exorbitant interest rate of 18 per cent that our government is proposing to charge them.

I think this bill is a piece of rubbish, Mr. Speaker. The problem of the business community is totally ignored. There are not enough businessmen on the other side of the House to design a piece of legislation that will be helpful to that community.

What is a small businessman with a demand loan at the bank at up to 20 per cent interest, depending on the risk, a private loan from an individual paying up to 22 per cent, another loan from a mother or father paying dear knows what they can afford to pay, going to do with this legislation? Absolutely nothing, Mr. Speaker. He cannot consolidate his loans, nor can he make himself solvent because the legislation will not allow the small businessman to obtain working capital. The major problem in the business community today is not building a business or buying an expensive piece of equipment; it is staying in business. How can people stay in business with this kind of legislation? How can the small businessman become solvent again through the pressures of high interest rates when the government ignores him, when the government cannot even set the example for the business community to follow?

The real responsibility of the government today is to create a climate for small business, and not to meddle in the market place, not create the paperwork, not put the burden on the businessman to fill in reports and account to everybody for everything he or she does. A business is run best when the government stays out of the marketplace. What the government is doing with this piece of garbage is entering the market place with a bill which is mountainous in scope, as one of my colleagues said, and which is not even comprehensible to the average businessman. He wants something simple—for the government to make funds available to the business community in order that people can obtain working capital, can consolidate debts, can get their cash flow in line with income.

The government is taking more from the small businessman than he can afford to pay. You are taking $1 out of every $4 in taxes paid today. You, as a government, are responsible. You are taking from business people in Canada today more than they can afford to pay.

I suggest that two things should be in this act in order to enable the business community to survive. The first one is for the government to set an example and to live by the Auditor General's report which shows the government is a bad manager. There should be people in control of government who will address this major problem of how to run their own house, how to run Parliament, how to run the country.

You cannot do it. You did not do it for 12, 13, 14 or 17 years, and all of a sudden you are back in office. That is not because you have a new program. You do not. That is why you are sitting on the opposite side of the House. We had a program and you did not, but we did not have a chance to turn the train around. You got the train running downhill in Canada for 17 years. We did not have a chance to get that second track going out west in order that we could bring it back.

I say to the government, if you do not get your ship in order, if you do not address the problem facing the business community today, and quickly—I see both businessmen on the other side are laughing—I say if they do not address the problem quickly there will not be any business community left in Canada to save.

Do you realize that you, responsible people as you are, responsible people as you should be, are currently—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member address his remarks to the Chair?

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, do hon. members on the other side of the House who are reported to be creditable, sincere people, realize that this country cannot go on spending almost 50 cents of every dollar compared to the United States which spends as low as 23 cents? There are just not enough dollars to sustain that kind of octopus. The government has to get its hand out of the cookie jar. It has to remove the paperwork that is the burden on the small business community. The government has to cut that spending program from $60 billion to what it has to spend. This government must set an example for the business community, an example which the business community can look up to, not look down at.

As long as this government continues as a government, and as long as we allow it to spend 25 per cent or 30 per cent more than it takes in each year, the government will go the route of the business community, that is, it will go down the drain. When the government goes down the drain, we all lose. That is exactly the course the train is on now. We are going down the drain. The government is refusing to face the facts, it is refusing to address the problems of the business community and refusing to make working capital available to the small businessman so he can consolidate his debts. I say 18 per cent interest will not do it. The business community cannot survive on this program. The government ignores it. The government offers a program that is only of benefit to the major banking institutions.

We are at a time now in history when the people of Canada must be conservative. The people of Canada must learn to spend less. When I say the people of Canada, I say that the government will have to start living within its means if any legislation, particularly if a piece of legislation to be credibly studied in this House, addressing the problem of the business community is to be given any credibility at all. Having said that, with a little bit of restraint now shown by government—and it is not in its Minnie Mouse budget—we could perhaps slow up the train. But we must keep the business community shovelling the coal in. We must generate that 50 per cent of the work force that the business community generates. We will not do it by strangling these people with increased paperwork and bills like this which are of no assistance to them whatsoever.

We all know about the disasters in the post office and how well the Government of Canada runs anything that it sticks its hand into. We say: less government intervention, more responsibility given to business, less requirements of business to account to government, and the net result will be a reduction in our deficit, an improvement in the business community, and credibility to this government which it sorely needs.

What we need is a more businesslike approach from members opposite. We should not be continually laughing at the small business community. When we do that, we discredit ourselves. We have to give importance to the need to assist them and not give them lip service. We have to stop the intrusion of a government in the economy. We have to stop large bureaucracies draining life out of the business community. We have to bring in legislation that honestly and sincerely addresses the problem, and not give some front page headline story to this bill that it is going to offer the saving salvation for the business community when, in reality, it is going to do nothing of the sort.

A small businessman going broke today is not going broke because he cannot borrow $100,000. He is going broke because he cannot borrow $5,000. He cannot get enough money to meet his payroll. He cannot make the payments to the CIP, to the government. He cannot meet the payroll to his spouse, so the deduction that the government proposes to give to the spouses in small business, to a large number of businesses in Canada today will not mean a thing. He is not paying any income tax. He is not paying any money to the government. Consequently, we do not have enough dollars to run our own House here. Let us get our House expenses down. We have to move away from leaning toward the free handouts that is pressured on us by members to my left.

We have to stop realizing that every time there is a need in the country we look to the government to pick up the tab. Every time you do that, you strangle small business. Every time one gives in to a pressure group, any time one makes an election promise—and members opposite make election promises that will cost money—the business community is strangled with excesses of spending far in excess of revenue.

Let us try to put the country back on its feet. Let us do everything we can to be a good example to the business community in Canada. Let us consider, just for a moment, the possibility of getting off the back of the small businessman. Let us take a moment to think of what a saving it would be to a small businessman with a staff of two or three if he did not have to devote 30 per cent, 40 per cent or 50 per cent of his time to filling out papers in order to satisfy the bureaucrats that the system that we have implemented, here with all of our legal advice, is the best system for that small businessman. In reality, our major problem in Canada today, whether it is the labour unions, small business, or in government, is productivity or the lack of it. We cannot improve productivity in the small business community if we do not get off the backs of these people, or say, and mean what you say, that we will cut the paperwork and set up systems within ministries today, not a new ministry or a new portfolio with 125 administering it, but systems within the existing ministries in that front bench across the way whereby their own ministerial expenses will be cut. And at the same time perhaps they will be able to cut the paperwork that is putting a burden on the small businessman. If hon. members opposite do not address these subjects soon, they can expect the kinds of problems that are compounding as they continue.

I remind hon. members opposite that in the first quarter of 1979 there were 1,465 bankruptcies. In September, 1979, there were over 2,000 bankruptcies. I would also like to remind hon. members opposite that our percentage based on the number of businesses in Canada, of bankruptcies, is not very commendable when one looks at the situation to the south of us. We have a lot to do to put our ship in order, in order that we can even compare half favourably to other free enterprise countries. The main problem is the drain that the members opposite, the ministers, and the minister for small business are ignoring—the drain on the pocketbooks of the small businessmen.

I plead with the minister for small business in his wisdom to bring in a good, honest piece of legislation that will say to the business community of Canada, "We do care and we will reduce government expenses. We will cut the inflation rate," not big insignificant promises of inflation rates of 4 per cent, 6 per cent or 8 per cent when in reality we have double digit inflation.

Let us look at what the Prime Minister has referred to as perhaps a new fresh outlook, and involve Canadians in that process of bringing credibility to government and success to small business.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before we proceed to the late show, I wonder if we could have a word from the government House leader about the business for tomorrow. I hope we will reach an agreement in the morning on the matter we discussed this afternoon.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I sure hope we come to an agreement tomorrow morning. If we do, we will proceed with Bill C-19 tomorrow afternoon.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

METRIC CONVERSION—REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE BEFORE SYSTEM PUT INTO FULL EFFECT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, as the result of some questions asked on metric conversion as it would pertain to the imposing of forced implementation of metric conversion on some six million or eight million people in Canada on January 1, whether they want it or not, I asked a question in the House of Commons on April 23. I addressed the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In his absence, I referred it to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). He was reluctant to answer it and passed it on to the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe).

The question dealt with two matters. I felt that the Government of Canada, against the will of the people of Canada, and without due process or consultation, had forced metric conversion on the Canadian people, in particular the cities of Peterborough, Kamloops and Sherbrooke. I asked the minister for small businesses if he would consider bringing into the House an act to be debated which would afford the opportunity for the citizens of Canada, to have their input into this legislation which will bring metric conversion into retail stores, and the meat stores in particular.

The minister responded that he was under the impression that metric conversion had been debated in the House in 1971. On April 25, last Friday, the minister for small businesses stated that he recognized that he was in error. He said, "I recognize quite humbly that there has been no legislation on metrication that was passed as such."

With that in mind, I would like to advise this government that the contrast between the United States method of handling the implementation of metric conversion in the retail stores versus Canada's method, is the same as looking at a democracy and looking at a dictatorship. What has happened in Canada is without the due process of parliamentary debate and the citizens of Canada being given the opportunity to choose. The Government of Canada, in its lack of wisdom, elected through orders in council or ministerial direction to force metrication last year on three test centres in Canada. The results were disastrous. The response against the program was overwhelming. In light of this, and in light of the adverse reaction to this forced metric conversion without debate, I look forward very optimistically to the minister's statement in the House.

On April 23 the Minister of State for Small Businesses, when I asked whether he would allow full parliamentary discussion on metric conversion, responded "that it would be examined". I pursued the question with a supplementary and asked whether he would introduce a bill. Again he said he would review the suggestion. In light of the throne speech of the Prime Minister and the government, in which they assured the people of Canada that they would take into consideration the wishes of the people as they proceeded with running this country, I sincerely hope they will avail themselves of the opportunity to introduce legislation before they implement metric in 21 cities in Canada on January 1, 1981.

I remind this House than when metric is imposed without the due process of debate on January 1, 1981, approximately six million Canadians will be affected over the next year. If the government refuses to introduce legislation in this House, it will be taking a very hard-handed and dictatorial approach to what we all ran for office to do, that is, represent the majority wishes of our constituents in Canada.

Perhaps some hon. members opposite would like to know that they are going to get metric in St. John's, Dartmouth-Halifax, Quebec City, Montreal, Ottawa-Hull, Hamilton, Brantford, Windsor, Edmonton, Calgary, Lethbridge, Victoria, Nanaimo, and on the list goes. I would like hon. members opposite to realize that in April of 1981 they are going to have it in Charlottetown, Moncton, Fredericton, back in Montreal for a second phase, Mississauga, Toronto, Scarborough, Kingston, Oshawa and St. Catharines. There is something in this long list I would like to draw to the attention of this House. They have left Peterborough off the list.

Peterborough went into forced metric conversion in 1979. It has presented, through delegations to this government, the adverse effects it felt. My quarrel is not with the metric system per se but with the way it is being introduced. In last Saturday's edition of the Ottawa Citizen an article dealing with the report of the metric overview board includes the following quotation from that report:

> The majority of Canadians are not prepared to accept metric conversion, despite active promotion of metric by the Metric Commission over an extended period. Many people also view the metrication program to be costly—
> Another hindrance for small business.
> —inconvenient and confusing, having few if any practical benefits.

A preliminary report by the overview committee last November listed more examples of public opposition to the implementation of metric, but truly to understand the nature of the opposition, it is probably best to go to the people who were the guinea pigs, the people of the city of Peterborough.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State, Small Businesses): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet decided on a date to proceed with the implementation of the retail scales metric conversion program.

The previous government imposed a postponement of a minimum of one year on the continuation of scales conversion across the country. The weights and measures regulations setting conversion dates for the different areas covering the country were rescinded on February 19, 1980, but the provision for weighing and selling in metric still remains. In the three pilot areas almost all the food stores in Sherbrooke still retail in metric; in Kamloops about half of the stores switched back to pounds; and in Peterborough almost all stores are back to pounds.

The national co-ordinating body which planned this conversion is the working group on scales in the retail food industry. This body met on March 24 of this year and indicated the majority of the retail representation in the working group are prepared to recommend a start of scale conversion on January 1, 1981, provided that this receives the support of government regulation over the entire industry, and with a positive public attitude toward conversion created by that time.

The working group further gave its chairman a mandate to make the government aware of its concerns and, if its recommendations receive the approval and support of government, to recall the working group to implement a program of scale conversion covering the two-year period starting January 1, 1981.

The working group on scales is composed of representatives from the retail food and scales industries, and from consumers' groups. Associations represented include the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers, the Retail Council of Canada, the Retail Merchants Association of Canada, and the Consumers' Association of Canada.

Note that weights and measures in Canada have been regulated under the Weights and Measures Act, through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The working group on scales responded to the view of food retailers and consumers that retail food scale conversion be supported by legislation in order to ensure an orderly conversion and fair and uniform advertising practices. The working group now recommends that the proposed new schedules should also be supported by regulations and by a reinforced promotional campaign.

Our review will consider the views of all the interested parties involved in the conversion of scales in the retail food industry.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—WINNIPEG—RAIL RELOCATION—SUGGESTED REVERSAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, in February of 1979 I raised a question in the House in regard to the federal government, the Liberal government of the day, making up its mind one way or another as to whether it would provide funds for CP rail relocation in Winnipeg. After much procrastination they decided they would have another study. Well, we have just received the results of that study within the last couple of weeks and they show it would cost something like $168 million for rail relocation in Winnipeg.

As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) pointed out to me last week, however, there are no funds available for rail relocation. I do not understand why Liberal governments are continually asking for studies on rail relocation in Winnipeg when they do not have any funds for rail relocation. What kind of game are they playing with the people of Winnipeg? Tonight we have the parliamentary secretary answering for the Minister of Transport. He is calling for more studies. And the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) wants more studies too. They all want more studies, but they are not prepared to put up one red cent for rail relocation. This is absolutely ludicrous in light of the statements we heard from the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) when he was prime minister in 1979. Rail relocation, he said then, was the Liberal approach. Well, if it is the Liberal approach, let them put up the funds.

Under the rail relocation formula 50 per cent comes from the federal government and the remaining 50 per cent is split equally between the provincial and municipal governments. If Ottawa is not prepared to put up something between $85 million and $100 million, then let them stop all these studies and this silly nonsense about wanting more studies about rail relocation. Let them put their money where their mouth is. The Minister of Transport told me the other day that the door is not closed, that there might possibly be DREE funds available. I hope the parliamentary secretary has some kind of announcement to make tonight about DREE funds, and I hope it is not $3 million or $4 million. If he cannot stand up tonight and tell us it is $85 million to $100 million, it will be further evidence they are leading us down the garden path.

There is another point I want to make clear tonight. This deliberate delay with regard to building the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass, because the Liberal government will not provide funding for the CP rail relocation, will cost Winnipeg an additional $2.8 million in construction fees, and I want a commitment from the parliamentary secretary that Ottawa will reimburse the city for the cost of this delay in providing funds while studies, studies, and yet more studies were being held. They will have to pay the additional $2.8 million which the city of Winnipeg will have to raise due to the 14-month delay in building the overpass.

The Minister of Transport stated to me the other day that everybody and his aunt want rail relocation. Well, not everybody and his aunt have been asking for it. It is the Minister of Transport, the former minister of transport, the present Minister of Employment and Immigration, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael), and the Prime Minister who have been asking for more and more studies. So, the onus is on the present Liberal government to provide some kind of funding to the tune of $85 million to $100 million.

Rail relocation has to be initiated by federal legislation and federal funding. They are committed to making a firm commitment to produce $85 million to $100 million in funds. Then the provincial government will be put on the spot to see what they will come up with. The Minister of Transport was critical the other day because he said that the Manitoba government has not said much about providing funding for rail relocation. But the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba cannot make any firm commitment for funds until the senior government makes a firm commitment because it is their legislation.

We have heard the statements from the previous minister of federal-provincial affairs. He gave tips to the city of Winnipeg on how to obtain funds for rail relocation, and he was so concerned about the grain handling problems in Winnipeg, that they are a major concern of the federal government, and the possible relocation of yards. He went on and on about the backup of grain cars. He was concerned about grain cars and grain movement, but when the final crunch comes, they do not have any money to put up at all. All we have is the UTAP funds which the province of Manitoba is prepared to turn over to the city, $7.2 million of the $10 million which was allotted to the province, but that is the only funding they have. The city of Winnipeg and the province do not have a bottomless pit of money to bring forward for CP rail relocation.

I hope the parliamentary secretary tonight has a firm commitment to give us. I hope he will announce that he has found $85 million to $100 million in DREE, or if they cannot come up with the funds, for heaven's sake say that you are going to forget about rail relocation and will grant a permit to build the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass. Everybody would like to see the rail relocation go through, but if they cannot come up with the funding, then we will have to go with the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass.

I want to remind the parliamentary secretary that the two bridges crossing the tracks now are under weight restrictions. I hope the Liberal government is not waiting for these bridges to be closed permanently and then maybe come up with some solution. We cannot go on and on with this procrastination, stalling, and calling for more and more studies. I hope the parliamentary secretary will stand on his feet tonight and give us a firm commitment one way or the other.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following the conclusion of the railway relocation study in Winnipeg, I have been involved in reviewing the study and have conferred with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and Transport Canada officials about the study findings. In this process both the minister and myself have used the consultative approach. For instance, on April 24 the minister met with representatives of the city and the province to exchange views on the course of action to follow.

I am sure everyone here will agree that removing the railway tracks from the downtown of cities is a very desirable action. The cost of doing so, however, may in many cases be prohibitive. In the case of Winnipeg, the minister has already indicated in the House earlier that Transport Canada does not have funds, other than those available under the urban transportation assistance program, to allocate to Winnipeg. During the meeting on April 24 he reiterated his position on that subject in light of the report that the estimated net cost for relocation of the yard is $128 million, and $169 million is the estimated net cost for moving the yard and its main line.

I would note that the city is likely to construct the Sherbrook-McGregor arterial roadway system even if the rail lines are removed from their present location.

The study which was undertaken by the federal government was carried out because the city provided no estimate on the cost of relocation when they applied to build the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass.

Before the meeting with the representatives of the city and the province adjourned, the minister agreed to approach the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to find out whether this department has funds that might be allocated to the relocation project in Winnipeg. This possibility is being explored expeditiously so that an early decision can be reached.

I doubt very much that even should the federal government be in a position to increase its own financial commitment proportionately, the province and the city in turn would be willing to give the proposed CPR rail relocation in Winnipeg their corresponding priorized financial participation. Such an essential component of their co-operative involvement can only be resolved through jointly held negotiations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

FINANCE

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN MINISTER AND NDP FINANCIAL CRITIC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement in the House of Commons by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on April 22, 1980, that he "tried to reach the financial critic of the New Democratic Party last week to tell him" about the non-budgetary statement made by the minister on April 21, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Minister of Finance be provided with specific, detailed and non-evasive instructions as to the use of that great Canadian invention, the telephone, together with the telephone numbers, both office and home, of opposition finance critics, to carry with him at all times.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR DISPUTES

REQUEST MINISTER INTERVENE IN DISPUTE AT PORT OF SAINT JOHN, N.B.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the current strike by National Harbours Board policemen and the subsequent illegal walk-out by longshoremen in the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, and the severe economic repercussions that the city, province and Atlantic region will suffer as a result of this strike, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the House instruct the Minister of Transport to go immediately to Saint John to show his concern and intervene personally in an effort to end this dispute.

AIR CANADA

FLIGHTS FROM OTTAWA TO ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since yesterday the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) advised the House that there would be an air service direct from Ottawa to St. John's starting next week, and that he would like all members from Newfoundland to be properly served in terms of transportation from the capital, especially on the outward run as suggested by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and since a spokesman for the minister later yesterday advised the news media that the Minister of Transport "goofed" when he replied to the "Newfs", I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the minister see that Newfoundland be properly served in terms of transportation from Ottawa by directing Air Canada to commence a service direct to St. John's from Ottawa, or resign, since Canada cannot afford further "spoofs" or "goofs" from the minister who has now angered, alarmed and annoyed transportation users in Canada from Prince Rupert in British Columbia across every province to St. Shott's in the southeast corner of Newfoundland.

POST OFFICE

CALL FOR LEGISLATION AMENDING MAXIMUM LIMIT FOR AWARDING ROUTE CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) informed this House that he was willing to increase the maximum allowable limit for rural postal delivery contracts without submitting them to tender. In response to my question yesterday he said "of course we would like to raise the limit as soon as possible". He went on to say that he "would be the first to go ahead with such a measure and have it approved immediately".

Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House direct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General to introduce the necessary legislation to Parliament as quickly as possible so that the excellent service of rural mail carriers is not deterred by the further delay of this measure's hasty passage.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PUBLIC SERVICE

MEASURES TO IMPROVE MORALE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that the Canadian government's relationship with public servants has deteriorated drastically in recent years, resulting in low morale, antagonistic negotiations, mass demonstrations and strike action, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House instruct the government to do the following as initial steps in attempting to improve the situation:

(1) To immediately reopen direct negotiations with the clerical component of the PSAC and make a more realistic offer than the 5 per cent per annum offered to these low-salaried government employees;

(2) to grant extensions of the priority status to those former government employees who were laid off in 1978 and 1979;

(3) to table before this House a government plan to increase government and management efficiency prior to any further lay-offs or staff size reductions; and

(4) when government lay-offs or staff reductions are planned, to provide an itemized report on the government services that will be affected before any action is taken.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the government's failure to aid in relocation of the CPR yards in Winnipeg, and in view of the government's unwillingness to consider financial aid for the Winnipeg Convention Centre, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government reconsider its decision of no aid for the Winnipeg Convention Centre and make moneys available to the Winnipeg Convention Centre on the same basis as that given to other cities which have built or are considering the building of convention centres.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

POST OFFICE

SATURDAY DELIVERY OF RURAL MAIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that many small towns in rural ridings and, indeed, rural areas presently receive delivery of their mail on Saturdays, in view of the fact that this delivery date is an important one for those who have come to depend on it, and in view of the fact that the Post Office is presently considering cessation of this service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL DISCUSSION WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF INDIAN PEOPLE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, who tonight I understand is addressing the all chiefs and elders conference which is meeting in the city.

The Prime Minister will know, with regard to constitutional discussion, that the Conservative government agreed that representatives of the Indian people would participate fully and directly in all constitutional deliberations having an impact upon an identifiable interest in their affairs. Is it the intention of the government to honour that commitment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition will permit me to remind him that his government, I believe it was last December, followed up the policy which we adopted in February of last year when at the first ministers' conference on the constitution the federal government put on the agenda the issue of Indian participation and obtained the consent of the various premiers to have that item concluded the way we did.

The conclusion was that we undertook to have the ministers who were discussing the constitution meet with the Indians, and I am very happy that the then prime minister, now the Leader of the Opposition, followed up on this commitment. We certainly intend to go in that direction as well.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I am sure that hon. members appreciated the brief excursion into the history and background of the question. I wonder if the Prime Minister would now answer my specific question. Will the specific undertaking given by the government which I had the honour to lead be honoured in its specific terms by this government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the purpose of stating the history was to indicate that we gave the undertaking and, necessarily, we will carry it out. In the meantime, I am happy that the Leader of the Opposition had an opportunity to subscribe to that undertaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister is confused about the matter, I can advise him that the Indian people are not. They know there was a markedly different commitment given by the government which I had the honour to lead from that which was given by his government. It may well be that the Liberal government of the time was moving in that direction.

The Prime Minister could ease concern and clarify the question considerably if he would indicate to the House whether it is the intention of his government to honour in specific terms the commitment given by the government which I had the honour to lead.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition refers to the blues, he will see that I gave that commitment at the end of my first answer.

INDIAN ACT

REVISION OF LEGISLATION—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Now that the revision of the Indian Act has gone through various stages, can the minister state what his target date is for completion of that revision; and is he intending to make any changes in the terms of reference?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member's leader has just mentioned, the all chiefs and elders conference is being held during the course of this week. They will be deliberating on the Indian Act.

It is perhaps the first time in Canadian history that such a group has come together to make their views known with respect to how they perceive and, indeed, how they would like the Canadian government to proceed on this matter.

Because of this conference, I am withholding answers to questions of this type which the hon. member has just asked until I have at least had a chance to hear what the Indian leaders of this country say about the matter. I will be in a better position to answer questions of the type which the hon. member has just put in a couple of weeks, after I have had an opportunity to assess the feelings of the conference.

• (1420)

Mr. Schellenberger: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. The minister and previous ministers have conducted a number of studies that were to assist in the revision of the Indian Act. All those studies are now in the hands of the minister.

Is it his intention to discuss those studies with the Indian people at this conference, or what impact will they have and what part will they play in the revision of the Indian Act?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): As I say, Madam Speaker, if one looks at the agenda, they are going into this question thoroughly. They have asked me to watch their deliberations. After the Prime Minister speaks to them tonight, they have asked me to speak to them on Thursday and respond to some of their suggestions.

I hope to be in a position then to indicate in some concrete fashion the direction in which I think we can proceed with their backing, but I will do so only in the most general terms at that early stage.

THE CONSTITUTION

NEGOTIATION ON COLLECTIVE RIGHTS OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister: it is on the constitution as it pertains to the aboriginal people of this country.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to negotiate with Canada's aboriginal people the entrenchment of certain collective rights for them in any new Canadian constitution.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the question is too general for me to do it justice in this particular forum. If the hon. member would indicate what he means by collective rights, we might have a little discussion about them.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker: Is the Prime Minister willing to negotiate with these people the entrenchment in our constitution of certain collective rights? Those rights could be defined in future negotiations between the Indian people of this country and the federal government and perhaps the provinces.

In principle, is the Prime Minister in agreement with the entrenchment of certain collective rights for the Indian nations of this country in a new Canadian constitution?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member, but I repeat: if he is asking me a theoretical question without indicating what he has in mind—

Mr. Nystrom: Will you negotiate?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: There seems to be a bit of worry over there. The position I have always taken on these discussions—but I realize it is perhaps not the forum to do it—is that there are very few collective rights which cannot be protected by reducing them to individual rights. I should like to know more from the hon. member about what he has in mind.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—SETTLEMENT OF DENE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and also pertains to specific rights. In 1977, Mr. Justice Berger of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry called for a moratorium on major development in the north until native claims had been settled.

On March 24, 1980, application was made to the NEB for a certificate of public convenience and necessity for the building of a $360 million, 12-inch, 560-mile oil pipeline from Norman Wells to Zama, Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Manly: Application was made—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Manly: My question is, considering the government's recent initiatives to reopen claims negotiations with the Dene people, will the minister endeavour to persuade his cabinet colleagues to instruct all government agencies involved in the decision on this pipeline to postpone any action until Dene claims have been settled in a manner that is satisfactory to the Dene people?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I believe I shall be seeing the leadership of the Dene during the course of this week, and we will be discussing that matter. We are responding to their desire to have the land claims question to which the hon. member referred settled as quickly as possible.

Discussions have indicated that we might be able to find an acceptable solution so that all development is not frozen in the meantime. I wanted the involvement of the Dene in the type of solution that I am hopeful we can arrive at.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING PACKAGE—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is part of the oil-pricing package that he will be discussing with his provincial counterparts a tax or a levy on all crude oil used in Canada to pay the cost of imported oil which is to be passed on directly to the consumer in the form of higher prices for petroleum products? Is that a proposal the minister is making to the provincial governments as part of his blended price concept?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, several alternatives are being considered. They will be discussed with my provincial colleagues, and I shall be very happy to inform the House and the hon. member as to developments in those discussions.

An hon. Member: Now answer the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister, who not very long ago was so anxious to have the full details of the previous government's proposals out in the open, would do us the same courtesy as we did to him by giving the full details.

I wonder if he could give a commitment now that the price he will negotiate with the provincial authorities, including all taxes and levies, will not exceed the increase of $4 or $4.50 proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, in his budget over the next three or four years. Will he make that commitment now, including taxes and levies that I referred to in my first question?

• (1425)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that we waited for 6½ months before we got from his government an indication of what they were planning to do. When we received that indication, it was not acceptable to the House or to the country. So we will take the time necessary over the next few months to discuss these matters extensively with the provinces, and I hope that we will come up with an acceptable solution for all parties concerned and for the Canadian public.

As to the second part of the question raised by the hon. member, I would like to remind him that the proposals contained in the budget of the previous minister of finance—

An hon. Member: Four dollars and $4.50.

Mr. Lalonde: —were well above the $4 and $4.50 that were mentioned.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Clark: That is not what you said in the election campaign, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: We have indicated quite clearly that our proposals would produce for Canadian consumers a price that would be lower than that under the previous budget put forward by that government.

Second, I would like to remind hon. members that the best evidence of this is that this year Canadian consumers have saved $2.6 billion already by the decision of this government not to impose the 18 cents tax of their government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where did you get the money: from a piggybank?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FINANCIAL ACCOUNTABILITY OF NATIVE BANDS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The meeting of elders and chiefs which is going on in Ottawa right now will be very much preoccupied with the whole question of financial accountability, as was the Auditor General and the Treasury Board—not so much the accountability of Indian bands but of the department the minister represents in the House.

With regard to the service agreement on which we had such a problem getting agreement from the Indian bands and the federal government—which agreement the minister has now extended until July 15—could the minister tell us whether he has the concurrence of Treasury Board to make this extension, since there has already been an extension from 1979 to 1980? Furthermore, could he tell us what new information he will use to guide him in reaching an agreement by July 15?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I advise the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River that my officials, under my instructions, have had discussions with Treasury Board with respect to the service agreement to which the hon. member referred. I am going to continue those discussions in parallel fashion with discussions I wish to undertake over the next few months with the Indian leadership on this very contentious question, with the idea that we can jointly come up with a solution that will be satisfactory to all concerned.

That is my desire, and I hope to get under way with those talks as soon as the all chiefs conference is over. Again, there will be discussions on that question during the course of this week.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I take it from the minister's remark that he has not obtained the concurrence of Treasury Board to extend the arrangement that we have had with the various Indian bands throughout the country; in other words, there is no assurance that the bands will receive their financing in the usual manner, since Treasury Board insisted on the implementation of the service agreement.

Furthermore, could the minister address himself particularly to the question of what his policy will be in the future? Will he rely, for instance, on the Beaver report to establish financial accountability of the bands or the more central associations of native people in this country?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, certainly I am looking at the Beaver report. But to specifically answer the hon. member's question, financing for the bands will continue during this period under the previous arrangement with the BCRs—the band council resolutions. So that has not changed. It will continue during the period in which we have the consultations.

• (1430)

One of the primary reasons for the July 15 date to which the hon. member referred was that it was my hope that, as a result of consultations, we could come up jointly with an acceptable solution that we could put into operation subsequent to that date. If the talks go well, I still feel that is possible. If not, we will have to look at the possibility of an extension because, as I say, I am sure we can work the matter out.

ENERGY

STATEMENT OF PÉQUISTE MINISTER ON PRICE OF OIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the startling statement made by PQ minister Marcel Léger to the effect that Quebec will have to pay world prices for oil in a few years because Alberta will apparently have to reduce its oil supplies as of 1985, could the minister tell the House whether that statement of the Quebec minister is based on serious studies of the energy situation?

An hon. Member: They are liars.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think that this is another rather irrational statement of PQ ministers on the energy question. I am afraid that Mr. Léger is unaware of the existence of the tar sands in Alberta. He would be well advised to make a visit there. He would realize that the province has various forms of gas and oil supplies which will last for decades and should be used to serve all Canadians, including Quebeckers, of course.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—INFRASTRUCTURE FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. At a press conference yesterday in Vancouver, Senator Perrault of the other place chopped $2 million from the amount of the infrastructure funds announced by the minister for the Prince Rupert grain port development.

Would the minister confirm to this House that the senator's figures are not correct, and that those given by the minister to this House are in fact the amounts allocated?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the figures used by the distinguished leader of the government in the other place are right. However, there is $2 million to be added to the $20 million which I think he referred to, and that is for navigational aid. Therefore, the discrepancy is simply that the leader of the government in the other place did not include that item on top of the $20 million to which he referred.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, in light of the statements made by Senator Perrault at the press conference, would it not be more appropriate in future for these statements to be clarified by an elected representative of this House making the statements?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I had checked the written document.

ENERGY

GASOLINE REFINERY TAX—IMPACT UPON USERS OF FUELS

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to the number of alternatives which he indicated to my colleague from Saskatoon West he would be discussing with provincial counterparts. One of these alternatives, in addition to a higher excise tax on gasoline, would appear to be a tax at the refinery—or whatever one might call that—which is now the subject of some press speculation.

Will the minister confirm directly if that is one alternative? Will he also confirm that such a tax would impact not only upon consumers of automobile and vehicle gasoline, but upon consumers of home heating oil and other non-transportation petroleum products?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first I would like to welcome in the House my hon. colleague and critic who was absent a few weeks due to illness. I hope he will remain with us for many months yet.

In reply to his question, I should point out that press reports to which he referred are, of course, speculative and I do not intend to make comments during the negotiations on all items which will appear in newspapers and all speculations from left and right. They are now speculations and I do not intend to deal with them any further.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I do not ask the minister to comment on press speculation. Unless I misunderstood him, he indicated to the hon. member for Saskatoon West that there were a number of alternatives, and he did not rule out a specific tax at the refinery level.

Will he also give the commitment that he will not rule out, in discussions with provincial colleagues, the offsets that will obviously be necessary because of the impact not only on oil consumers but specifically on certain income groups and certain geographic regions? I think particularly of Quebec and Atlantic Canada because of their high dependence on oil.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, my colleagues will have noticed that I indicated to the hon. member for Saskatoon West that we were considering a number of alternatives, but I did not indicate that the one the hon. member was speculating upon was necessarily one of those alternatives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Say it isn't so.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the point raised by the hon. member is concerned, I can give him the clear assurance that I am not going to rule out any alternatives.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON B.C. INDIAN LAND CLAIMS—EXPECTED COMPLETION

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the long-standing need to resolve the problem of the British Columbia cut-off land claims—an injustice that affects some 30 Indian bands in British Columbia—and in view of the fact that the previous government was taking concrete and positive steps to resolve this 60-year old issue, could the minister inform the House if negotiations are presently taking place; and, if so, what is the target date for their completion?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, with respect to these particular land claims, I hope to have discussions on Thursday with the Indian leadership on precisely how they wish to proceed. I will endeavour to speed up the process if I possibly can. Pending those further discussions, I prefer to defer giving a more specific answer to the hon. member until next week.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, I did mention in my preamble that this problem has been going on for some 60 years, and I think the Indians have laid down very specifically what their claims are. I ask the minister to address this problem as soon as possible. Is he contemplating a meeting very shortly with the Indians on this question?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Madam Speaker, I most certainly am. As I say, I hope the meetings will get under way this week. This is one of the real benefits of having the conference at this particular stage. We can talk about the process and we can talk about meetings in the very near future to keep the process going in an endeavour to resolve this particular problem.

EMPLOYMENT

TRAINING AND HIRING OF NATIVE PEOPLES FOR ENERGY PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the government's commitment to affirmative action, can the minister assure this House that he will support Alberta's policies on native employment, and that the Alsands pricing and taxation agreement will include clauses to ensure the recruitment, training and employment of native people and also ensure business opportunities for native people?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will certainly be pleased to raise this matter with my counterpart, the minister of energy for Alberta, when I see him. As part of the general policies of this government, any steps taken in the area of affirmative action to increase the employment of minority groups and women in the work force will be supported by this government.

Mr. Shields: Obviously, the minister did not hear the first part of my question. I was asking if he would go along with the Alberta government policies. My supplementary is to the Prime Minister. In light of the government's commitment to Canadian ownership, is this government committed to equity participation by the native people for the development of the tar sands and heavy oil industry in northern Alberta?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot answer that we are committed to that, but it is certainly an option that the Indian people might want to pursue.

TOURISM

REQUEST FOR GRANT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF CONVENTION CENTRE IN HULL

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses. Considering the rumours that have been spread in the national capital area regarding a possible federal subsidy to the city of Ottawa for its convention centre, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to make a similar subsidy for the convention centre of Hull, a city which, as the minister knows very well, is as much as Ottawa a component of the national capital area?

• (1440)

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, the whole policy on financial aid to convention or trade centres is being revised, and I would like to remind the hon. member for Hull of something he knows already, that the financial commitments of the federal government in the area of Hull now exceed $500 million. But in the revision we are now doing I shall certainly take into consideration the representations he has made for the municipality he represents.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED MERCURY POISONING OF NORTHERN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RESIDENTS—ACTION TO PREVENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The latest in a long list of reports on the mercury poisoning of native Canadians, entitled "Methylmercury in Canada", was released recently by the minister's department and came to what I and many others believe to be an obvious conclusion, namely, that some individuals have mercury levels which are a health risk, and that one can expect the most sensitive to show early or mild symptoms of Reed-minimata disease.

What new steps are the minister and her department taking to stop the systematic poisoning of residents in northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position today to answer that question, for the simple reason that the Quebec health minister, Dr. Lazure, for a reason that I do not understand but that I am trying to clarify, does not want me to make public the report prepared jointly with McGill University concerning the Crees in Quebec. That is why I would prefer to wait until this report is published before saying what we will do.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I asked the hon. lady what she intended to do herself, through her department, to stop the systematic poisoning of native Canadians my question was not about Dr. Lazure's or any other report.

What is the minister doing, for instance, to encourage the provincial governments which are involved here to compensate people whose lives have been affected by this poisoning, so that they can return to a state of health, so that alternative economies might be developed—matters of the sort that were dealt with in the report and to which my original question referred?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: The hon. member did not understand. I will try to explain why I want co-operation and why we need provincial co-operation in this area. Naturally, we are trying to control mercury poisoning in some Indian reservations. On the federal side, that means I have nothing new to add since we are continuing our monitoring, and I think that in the end the right solution will be to have health workers from the Indian communities work inside the reservations so as to inform their fellow Indians and improve their eating habits. Moreover, if there are specific instances and industrial or other causes of pollution affecting the environment, we need help from the provinces. That is why, I repeat, I want Dr. Lazure's approval or else I will go ahead and publish the most recent study so that we can have an over-all picture of the situation, because this is indeed a very important study.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBECKERS REMAINING IN CONFEDERATION WOULD BENEFIT FROM PAYING LESS THAN INTERNATIONAL PRICE

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the recent statements of PQ ministers Landry and Joron, to the effect that Quebeckers should pay the world price for their oil and natural gas, which tremendous increase could be offset by exporting electricity, can the minister give the House the assurance that Canadians, and Quebeckers in particular, because they belong to Canada, should have the advantage of paying a far lower price than the world price for their oil and gas? Moreover, could he say whether the exports of electricity would make up for the high cost of oil in a sovereign Quebec?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, here again we are dealing with a whole series of statements coming from PQ ministers that are completely groundless. In the last few years, all Canadians, and Quebeckers in particular, have benefited greatly from the fact that our price in Canada has been lower than the world price. This government has clearly indicated that we would arrive at a made-in-Canada price for oil and gas that would be lower and will continue being lower than the international price, which will be advantageous for all Canadians, including Quebeckers, as long as they belong to the country known as Canada.

In answer to the second part of the question, I would say that clearly the exports of electricity mentioned by the ministers would be totally inadequate as compensation for the world price a sovereign Quebec would have to pay. According to the best forecasts, such exports could bring in some $600 million, while oil imports at world prices would cost over $6.8 billion. What we are witnessing here is a bunch of nonsense meant, literally, to hoodwink Quebeckers in the current referendum struggle.

OVER-ALL POLICY—EMPHASIS ON COAL

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What emphasis, in Canada's over-all energy program and policy, is the government placing on coal?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we are placing a high emphasis on coal. Together with the provinces which have a lot of coal, we are carrying out many examinations in this field. The hon. member knows, however, that there are certain problems in connection with coal exploitation in terms of the environment and the cost of production in some areas. These are being examined.

Currently, for instance, discussions with British Columbia are going on concerning the development of whole new areas of that province for the exploitation of coal, some of it for export. If we could count on a sufficiently high demand in Canada, I can assure the hon. member that we would want to examine the coal option very closely as being one which would be added to those arising out of our large resources of gas and other forms of energy.

Mr. Taylor: I appreciate the minister's answer. I wonder if he could outline any steps the government is presently taking to deal with the great issue with regard to coal from the west and from the maritimes, and tell us in particular whether anything is being done about the gasification of coal.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, the question of the gasification of coal is one which has been examined and which is still being reviewed on an almost constant basis. I must advise the hon. member, however, that it appears at the present time that coal gasification for domestic purposes would result in a more expensive product than the large amounts of gas we already have, so it would not appear that coal gasification for domestic purposes is the most economical way of allocating our resources at the present time.

As far as the question of transportation tariffs for coal is concerned, I would prefer to refer this matter to my colleague, the Minister of Transport. Again, it involves the question of cost and such a matter would be reviewed as part of the general question of tariffs for transportation of goods in this country.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

LAND CLAIMS NEGOTIATORS FOR YUKON AND MACKENZIE DELTA

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that delay and indecision on the part of the government in appointing special land claims negotiators for the Yukon and Mackenzie Delta regions is giving rise to all kinds of wild speculation and rumours, including the possibility of the appointment of Dr. Lloyd Barber for the Yukon and Dr. John Naysmith for the Delta, could the minister, in order to allay the apprehensions and suspicions of the residents of these areas, either confirm or deny that he is considering the appointment of these persons? When does he expect the appointment of special land claims negotiators to take place?

● (1450)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories one thing became abundantly clear, that is, that the governments of both territories and the people generally—whether it be people involved in the business community, or the leadership of native organizations—indicated that one of the clouds that was perpetually over the territories was the fact that the land claims question was not settled.

I assured them that I would proceed in an endeavour to appoint negotiators as quickly as possible, and that I am doing. These rumours may emanate from the fact that various names were suggested by governments and by other people interested who, they felt in their own wisdom, would be appropriate for the job.

Mr. Nielsen: Not in the north, they would not.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Many names were suggested, there is no question about it. So I am endeavouring to find out who is available, who might be prepared to take on the job, and I hope to have an answer to that question within the next week or ten days. But I would advise the hon. member that it is not easy to find a person willing to take the job in terms of the time he will be called upon to give to it in order to do an adequate job. I am sure the hon. member is aware of that.

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, the approach of the previous Government of Canada to this question in appointing a member of the House to act in the capacity of a negotiator was apparently favourably received. Could the minister consider that possibility again?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: Don't phone Judge Berger.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —I have considered that possibility. I think it would be appropriate for members of the House, be it my parliamentary secretary or others who are interested, to act in an advisory capacity to any negotiator. But it became quite clear to me that what everybody had in mind was somebody who would sit down and work at it in a constant fashion and perhaps be involved in negotiations not only taking place in Ottawa but in the territories themselves.

That type of mandate would rule out, it seems to me, any member of the House carrying on negotiations on an active basis. It would not be realistic, and I think they understand that. Someone indicated that that was fine, but they certainly did not want a member of the bureaucracy, and I was quite prepared to go along with that suggestion.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Given that the Ontario government has made known that it will soon be making a major announcement concerning measures to abate acid rain—particularly that coming from Inco—and given the fact that this particular initiative will be welcomed, for example, by the Americans who will see it as an indication that at least Ontario is serious about this problem, even if the federal government is footdragging, would the minister tell the House what specific steps he intends to take now to ensure the early completion of an agreement with the United States for the abatement of acid rain on both sides of the border?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, some of the argumentation of the hon. member is false. It is not the federal government that has been dragging its feet in this matter. Indeed, the action which Ontario is about to take has been helped considerably by studies done at the federal level and on the information provided to it about the situation. It is not a question of our dragging our feet, but a question of Ontario and the Government of Canada acting co-operatively to resolve this problem.

The hon. member may want to refer back to some previous issues of Hansard to see that, indeed, the question of pressing the United States has been discussed here before. I have indicated to the House previously that we are pressing the Americans to reach an agreement. That was the subject of my discussions with the United States a couple of weeks ago, and the matter was discussed again with secretary of state Vance on his visit to Ottawa, and I believe that substantial progress has been made.

Mr. McMillan: My supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of the Environment, Madam Speaker. He has mentioned research and studies. As he will know, the previous government made a commitment in principle to a substantial increase in funding for acid rain research. This, again, demonstrates that government's concern about the problem whereas the present government seems to be less concerned.

Would the minister indicate, now, whether the commitment made by the previous government to such increased funding for acid rain research will be honoured by the new government, and whether it considers this an area of high priority?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I will try to say to the hon. member as politely and forcefully as I can that I have no attack to make on the previous government's record in this direction. But the hon. member is completely off base in suggesting that there has been any reluctance on our part to proceed vigorously in this matter. The facts are exactly the contrary, and the hon. member does himself no credit in asserting the opposite.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN AND DEFENCE POLICIES RESPECTING NATO AND NORAD

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In an interview televised last evening, the minister reiterated his view that except in the field of aid there is no need to re-examine or have any public input to our foreign and defence policies, including our NATO and NORAD alliances.

My question to the minister is: Does this mean that the minister does not favour a six months' extension of the NORAD agreement in order to allow a review of that agreement by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has not quoted me quite correctly. What I said last night was that I did not see a need for a total review of our foreign policy. I am very happy to have contributions from Parliament and from the public in the area of foreign policy and, in particular, I hope we will soon be able to announce that we are able to have a parliamentary contribution to the question that the hon. member raises with respect to the alliance.

EXTENSION OF NORAD AGREEMENT TO ALLOW FOR REVIEW

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence if he is in favour of a six months' extension of the NORAD agreement so that there can be a critical review of that agreement by the standing committee of the House on a reference from him, or from him and the Secretary of State for External Affairs jointly?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, without presuming on the decision which will be taken after discussion with different committees, I think it would be a logical and reasonable way of doing it.

AIRPORTS

PLANS FOR EXTENSION OF MOUNT HOPE FACILITY

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport further to a question put to the minister yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

Can the minister advise whether he has acquainted himself with the location of the Mount Hope airport, and could he advise us if the expansion of that facility will proceed as announced by the previous government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not have anything to add to what I said yesterday on that subject. I am well informed of the location of the airport, and particularly well informed of the number of steps which need to be taken—to which I referred yesterday—before the runway is reoriented and the terminal extended. I gave the full explanation yesterday.

Mr. Kempling: I take it from the minister's reply that there is no commitment on the part of the government to proceed with the expansion announced by the previous Conservative government.

Could the minister say whether more studies have to be done? Is this what he is saying, that more studies are required before the expansion can proceed? Seventeen studies have been done so far on that airport expansion. They have examined every groundhog and tadpole from Copetown to Tapleytown and back. Surely you do not need more studies.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I answered the question yesterday by saying that the past commitment to $100 million or $45 million for that purpose was not what was paramount in my mind. What was paramount in my mind was to do the right thing in this particular instance. I indicated very clearly yesterday that there were a number of obstacles to clear, and I mentioned some specifically.

An hon. Member: I like you better when you are serious.

TRANSPORT

IMPROVEMENTS TO PORT OF PRINCE RUPERT—PROPOSALS FOR FUNDING

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport because of the uncertainty caused by conflicting statements made for a number of weeks over the whole question of the port of Prince Rupert.

• (1500)

Can he assure the House at this time that, first, the port will proceed as planned; and, second, that the funding will be similar to the funding set down by the previous Progressive Conservative government, which was acceptable to all parties in western Canada including the consortium, and also the provincial governments in western Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have explained that question a number of times. It is terribly simple.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: My predecessor referred to $42 million. If one adds the navigational aids to that, one will have $44 million. If one deducts about $8 million, which is the commitment of Alberta and British Columbia to that project, one will have—

An hon. Member: It is $36 million.

Mr. Pepin: I am coming to it. If one deducts from that about $14 million, which is the cost of the wharf that will be built on a cost recovery basis, one will have $22 million which is the extent of the federal government's direct contribution to that project.

An hon. Member: This sounds like the energy formula.

Mr. Pepin: There have been a number of discussions on the wharf.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is a good place to have a discussion.

Mr. Clark: On the wharf, or on the rails?

Mr. Pepin: My understanding is that an agreement has been reached, on a cost recovery basis, between the National Harbours Board and the consortium. There is still one point to be finalized; it has to do with the lease on the land. That is being discussed presently and, hopefully, a conclusion will soon be reached on that also.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, I have just one short supplementary question. The minister was in the process of alluding to this at the conclusion of his statement. When does he feel that the negotiations will be concluded? Can he indicate that to the House? Also, when does he think construction will start on the proposed terminal? Will it take place in the latter part of 1980, or will it be delayed until 1981?

Point of Order—Mr. McGrath

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the present development entitles me to believe that the last thing to be clarified, which has to do with the lease, will be clarified in the coming days and that construction will begin in mid-May.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk Assistant of the House has laid upon the table the second report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—AIR CANADA SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND ST. JOHN'S

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. It arises out of a reply to questions asked in the House yesterday by the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). A question was directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) referring to the recently announced decline in service by Air Canada between the city of St. John's and the national capital, to which the Minister of Transport replied, as reported on page 454 of Hansard, as follows:

But my very recently acquired information is that there will be such a service direct to St. John's, and that will be announced next week—or start next week.

That is the end of the quotation. I am sure the hon. minister, whom I know and respect, does not want to mislead the House deliberately or otherwise. But in today's paper there is a quotation from his office to the effect—to quote one of his officials—"We goofed; there is not to be such a direct service announced."

I realize how anxious the hon. minister was to accommodate his supporter in the back benches, the hon. member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe, but if I may paraphrase the hon. member for St. John's West and indeed the minister's officials, I am sure the minister would not want to deliberately "goof with a Newf". Consequently, I want to give him this opportunity to correct the record, and even hopefully to tell the House that in fact he has intervened and that the national capital will have a service to the capital of the province of Newfoundland commensurate with the importance of that route and the amount of traffic also.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I was trying to catch Madam Speaker's eye a moment ago but I failed to do so. I thank my hon. friend for giving me this opportunity. Indeed, yesterday I was a victim of my eagerness to please Newfoundlanders both in the House and outside the House. I should have checked further the usually reliable information I got.

I have now checked and the answer I received is that Air Canada is of the view that traffic flows indicate that the best use of equipment and schedule—they failed to mention members of Parliament— is to concentrate on westbound in the morning and eastbound in the evening. The present intention is to have flights as follows: departing Ottawa in the afternoon at 1600 and reaching St. John's at 2240; then in the morning a flight from St. John's would be leaving at 7.15 and arrive in Ottawa at 10.32. So members of Parliament would leave in the afternoon of Friday at 1600 and be back here at ten o'clock on Monday, which is not a bad idea, I think.

I have asked Air Canada to review this further, and I will be discussing that with them.

An hon. Member: Is that both ways?

Mr. Pepin: Both ways.

Mr. Epp: Are they to Quebec?

Mr. Pepin: The flights are from Ottawa to St. John's.

Mr. McGrath: They have misled you again.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed from Thursday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, let me say once again that this is a continuation of my first opportunity to speak in debate this session, and I wish to join with other hon. members of the House in expressing my congratulations to you, Madam Speaker, and to offer my best wishes to you in your new responsibilities in the chair.

To continue the debate from the other evening, Bill C-19 is a very important measure with which, I submit, this House should deal with dispatch. I am delighted to refer to an intervention during my remarks the other evening by the distinguished House leader for the opposition, who indicated so openly his willingness to co-operate in the quick adoption of this most important measure.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am a most agreeable fellow.

Mr. Harquail: I believe there is complete agreement in this House that anything we can do as a government to alleviate any aspect of unemployment in this country must be done with haste and dispatch.

The other evening as time ran out for this debate I was stressing the importance of youth in this country in relation to the employment tax credit plan. The youth of this country suffer much more than their fair share in relation to unemployment, accounting for almost half of the total unemployed in Canada. The employment tax credit program has been a useful means of helping young people gain a foothold in the work force. About 55 per cent of the participants to date have been in the 25 or under age group, split equally among men and women.

There is substantial evidence to indicate that the early labour force experience of individuals has a significant bearing on their later employment and income record. Jobs obtained through this program, incidentally, have a fair chance of becoming permanent. In Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta, more than half the employers have indicated that the jobs newly created would survive beyond the 52 weeks maximum for earned tax credits. In Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec more than 57 per cent felt most of the jobs would survive, while the figure was 41 per cent in British Columbia.

In the fiscal year 1979-80 some 39,000 agreements were signed and a total of about 51,000 Canadians were placed in jobs. Small businesses employing 20 or fewer signed 75 per cent of all agreements, and 40 per cent of those were employers with a maximum of five in their normal work force. The program was an important source of jobs for women, representing 34 per cent of all placements.

As I said at the outset of my remarks the other evening, we must collectively agree to co-operate in the adoption of such measures that will bring some relief to the unemployed of this country.

We support not only this measure, particularly in relation to the Atlantic area, but as well the Canada Works program which we hope to see the government keep in place as an important make-work, job-creation program for the coming months. In addition to this program assisting the youth in this country, we know that the Opportunities for Youth program, which is under review at the moment, will help in a very real way, along with other measures that are approved and funds that will be spent during the summer months, to create jobs for the young university people in the work force.

Small businesses in Canada have most fully accepted the employment tax credit program which is being extended as an interim measure, pending the introduction of new employment development measures to be introduced in this House by the minister in the very near future. Acceptance of tax credits by small businesses is reflected in the fact that 77 per cent of all agreements were signed with businesses employing 20 or fewer, as I mentioned earlier. I might say that I have received a good many inquiries in my own area and have had discussions with people who have made small businesses work in this country. They are very anxious to see this measure adopted by the House and implemented.

This program is attractive to employers for the very good reason that a maximum of $4,160 in tax credits can be earned for every person hired under the program. All of the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec are eligible for that amount. In most other urban areas in other regions employers can earn a maximum tax credit of $3,120 for each employee hired under the program, while in the remainder of the country the maximum is $3,640.

I realize that we can be as technical as we like, quoting figures and taking as much time as we want, but rather than delay the adoption of this measure I would simply like to take the opportunity of stressing the importance of the benefits that this measure will bring, particularly to the Atlantic region where we do have designated areas under the DREE program, areas where we do have extremely high seasonal unemployment.

I am delighted to have had the opportunity of participating in this debate in a positive way. I have indicated my support for this motion and hope that, with co-operation from all sides of this House, we will see the early adoption and implementation of Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had in this Parliament to participate in debate and I want at the outset of my remarks to offer my congratulations to you and, through you, to Madam Speaker on the ascension to your current high offices. I know both of you will discharge your responsibilities with that degree of dignity and impartiality which will do honour to all sides of this House, and which will satisfy members on all sides that the choices made were excellent ones.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Perhaps I can be forgiven if I have a sense of déjà vu as I begin my first remarks here in this Parliament, because during the previous Parliament I had the opportunity of speaking in debate only once. That intervention came during a debate on a proposal made by our government to extend rights to Canadians to a mortgage interest and property tax credit which would have given relief from high interest rates and high property taxes to millions of Canadians.

My particular intervention came in the course of an afternoon discussion on a motion which was proposed by the present Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), who was then just the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry. He proposed a series of amendments to the legislation which would have had the effect of destroying the bill itself and preventing it from going forward. He put himself firmly on record as being opposed to extending this sort of tax relief for individual Canadian families.

As I said, I had the opportunity in that Parliament to speak only once in debate. I made my intervention on the proposal that is made by the present minister, and three days later the government fell. My sincere hope is that three days after this intervention on the minister's proposal which he is putting forward today, he will have the same success and that Canadians will have the opportunity to again change governments. Particularly when Canadians see the way in which this government has handled the whole question of management of the Canadian economy, they have cause for very deep concern.

The minister said in his introductory remarks that this bill would help create some 50,000 new jobs for Canadians. I can accept, as my colleagues can, that at a time when we have one million Canadians unemployed—and this figure does not include Canadians who have given up looking for work or native Canadians who are often not included in employment surveys—extraordinary measures must be taken to create employment when, clearly, unemployment is reaching the level that it is today.

I would like to stress that I find it ironic that this minister has brought—before this House, in his second bill, a band-aid measure to create these jobs when that minister was in the vanguard of leading the filibuster against the property and mortgage interest tax credit plan in the last Parliament. It is ironic that this minister and his colleagues in the Liberal party and their colleagues in the NDP blocked that tax relief for Canadians which would have provided a direct stimulus to the construction industry, given new jobs to the home furnishing industry, and given relief to individual families to make the goal of owning a home of their own much more affordable.

When we were in government we urged that action be taken quickly to give that sort of relief to home owners and young Canadians who wanted the opportunity to own a home of their own and were seeing that dream being snatched away from them by high interest rates. When we make that argument we were told by the colleagues of the present Minister of Employment and Immigration and members of the NDP that if a Canadian was wealthy enough to own his own home, then he was too wealthy to receive assistance from the government. They said that the proposal was welfare for the rich and that such people were not entitled to receive a break from high interest rates.

Therefore, I find it ironic, to say the least, that this Minister of Employment and Immigration, who must share personally the responsibility for blocking that tax relief for Canadians, would get up today and argue in favour of a new tax credit program which would, in his words, create new jobs.

Tomorrow night is the last night for Canadians to file their income tax returns. Each of us should have had our tax returns in before now, but if you are like me, Mr. Speaker, you may not have. Millions of Canadians are going to be confused merely because of the efforts of the present Minister of Employment and Immigration in blocking that tax relief, because it was necessary for our government to put a provision on the income tax return which would allow Canadians to apply for that tax relief. There is no indication when one files a return that in fact the Liberal party and their friends in the New Democratic Party were successful in blocking that relief. Literally millions of Canadian families will find themselves tremendously confused when they discover that that tax break has been snatched away from them.

I listened to the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain (Mr. Deans) as he spoke in the debate on Thursday night. The hon. member was eloquent as he outlined the problems which face Canadians today, those in his own constituency and those across the country, with increasing lay-offs, increasing unemployment, and increasing financial strains caused by the scorched earth economic policies of this government. I was particularly struck by his comments regarding interest rates; they were very germane. He made a statement which I think would be useful to put on the record again. He said that perhaps with our interest rate policy we should encourage the building industry to again start building homes for people of average means. He pointed out that the spin-off in the home building industry is phenomenal, that 3.6 jobs are created in related industries for every job that is created in building a house. He asked us to imagine the number of jobs that would be created in related industries if we could get on with building homes for people at prices they could afford and with mortgages they could afford. That is what he said last Thursday night, as reported at page 397 of Hansard.

I recognize that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain was not a member of this House last December when the Conservative party put forward proposals which would give relief from high interest rates and high property taxes to average Canadian families. He should recognize, however, when he speaks in this debate—bemoaning the Liberal government's high interest rate policies, that it was his present colleagues and the Minister of Employment and Immigration who were responsible for denying Canadians relief from high mortgage rates. It is not enough to express indignation about the effect upon Canadian families of these high interest rates today. Where was he then? Where were his colleagues when this government was trying to bring in provisions which would give relief to Canadian families and stimulate the home construction industry?

In my own constituency, Mr. Speaker, a large number of young Canadians would like to have the opportunity to buy a home of their own but they find that they cannot do so. What would be the effects upon the economy in my constituency of stimulating the home construction industry? How many new jobs would be created, I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration? What would happen at the Hotpoint plant in Orangeville which supplies goods for housing? What would be done at the GSW plant in Fergus? What would happen in the furniture building industries in my constituency—

Mr. Nielsen: And Winnipeg.

Mr. Beatty: —and in Winnipeg, for that matter, if we were to give a shot in the arm to the home construction and home furnishing industries in Canada? How much more quickly we could create permanent jobs by giving incentives to Canadians so that they may recognize that Canadian dream of owning a home of their own. Yet we find that because of the Liberal party's policy in opposition, joined by the New Democratic Party, Canadians were denied that right and many millions of young Canadians will not have the opportunity to own a home of their own.

I think it is important that we ask these questions when considering a provision which would be an economic band-aid and which in the short term would create 50,000 new jobs. What was the policy of the minister and his colleagues when they were in opposition? What happened when we asked for their support for the initiatives we put forward to stimulate industry in Canada and create new jobs? What did they do on the night of December 13, when they were voting on a provision in a budget which would create small business development bonds?

In the mini-budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) last week, it is clear that he discovered the provision contained in the budget of December 13 which would have given small businesses in my constituency and across Canada a chance to get money at lower rates of interest. In essence, it would have subsidized interest rates for small businesses.

Where were this minister and his colleagues then? Where were the members of the NDP? In that budget we proposed measures which would have given stimulus to the small business sector, which is the major employer in the country just as it is in my constituency. Several months later the Minister of Finance has discovered that it was a good provision which would give some relief to small businessmen.

As a reasonable person, Mr. Speaker, I ask you if the small businessmen in my constituency would not be better off now if, instead of forcing an unnecessary $50 million election, instead of stalling these provisions, the Liberal party had decided to support those measures allowed them to be put in place.

The minister was party to a vote which prevented those measures being taken and which prevented us from keeping small businessmen in business. Failures in the small business sector are running at an unprecedented rate this year. In each constituency small businessmen and family farms are going out of business at a rate unheard of in our history. Foreclosures on homes are running at a record level.

I put it to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that if he is genuinely concerned about the small business sector, about individual families and about creating jobs in Canada, it would have been better to allow that budget to go through. It would have kept Canadian businesses operating, it would have stimulated the economy and would have allowed Canadians to get on with creating the goods and services so necessary for a young and expanding population.

As I said earlier, we recognize that band-aid measures may be necessary when a million Canadians are unemployed. But I say to you that the only way we as a House of Commons can look at measures like this is to examine them in the context of the whole of the government's economic policies.

When the minister spoke in favour of this bill on second reading, I asked after he sat down whether he could elaborate on the job creation policies that were coming forward and how they differ from the proposals made by the previous government, the Conservative government. At that time the minister refused. I think he has a responsiblility to this Parliament and to the Canadian people to indicate what proposals he has to supplement what he is doing to attack the root problem of chronic unemployment that faces Canadian society today and which particularly disfavours young people. Half the people in Canada who are unemployed today are young people, Mr. Speaker. The unemployment rate among young people is running at twice the rate among older Canadians. I am worried that if the first experience young people have with the labour force is to be told that there is no room for their skills, that there is no need for them, it can have a serious effect upon their work habits in the future. What does this government propose, beyond these band-aid measures, to deal with this problem of unemployment, particularly among young people and native Canadians?

I think we have to recognize one fact, Mr. Speaker, when dealing with this whole question of employment. Perhaps nothing more graphically illustrates the difference in approach to unemployment between this government and the previous government, or between the New Democratic Party and the Conservative party, than our attitude toward job creation. We in this party believe that the private sector should be the engine for growth in the economy. We believe there should be long-term, well paying secure jobs in the private sector, not just band-aid proposals. Such proposals should not require increased expenditure by the federal government. They should not be short-term proposals which result in people being laid off after a few weeks' work.

If we are to attack the root causes of unemployment in Canada, we will have to attack them within the private sector. We will have to allow the private sector to expand in order to provide the jobs so desperately needed today. It is not enough simply to propose band-aid solutions or short-term jobs, which is what the employment tax credit would do. We need permanent jobs, Mr. Speaker, which will give Canadians the opportunity of securing long-term employment.

The Canadian people want candor from the government regarding their economic policies. On December 13, they voted against the budget proposed by this party. They rejected the solutions we proposed and went through the election campaign claiming that our proposals were unacceptable to Canadians. They said that they were certainly unacceptable to them. The Canadian people then decided to give the Liberal party an opportunity to bring forward alternative solutions. Mr. Speaker, they have that opportunity now, but where are their policies? What are their spending plans? What is their energy policy? That would have a very important effect upon unemployment in my part of Ontario. By implication, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) indicated today that he is contemplating a major increase in the retail price of gasoline. That is the only way one can interpret his statement.

How different it is to listen to members of the Liberal party today compared to their speeches during the election campaign when they complained about our proposals to ensure energy self-sufficiency for Canadians—proposals which would ensure energy being available to all Canadians in the future at affordable prices. We were worried then, when we made our proposals, about the need to ensure jobs for Canadians.

Let me mention again, Mr. Speaker, the effect upon my constituency if this government's policies are followed and we allow ourselves to develop a growing dependence upon foreign sources of oil. What happens in portions of my constituency where Canadians must commute to work if we run out of gasoline? What happens if industries throughout the industrial heartland of Canada are forced to lay Canadians off? What happens to the homes in constituencies such as mine which are dependent upon energy being available? What happens to Canadian agriculture when shortages of energy develop?

What we find today more than two months after the federal election is that the Liberal party has yet to level with the Canadian people and to indicate what its policies are. This government has yet to tell the people where it intends to take us in terms of energy and what it will do to break that increasing dependency upon foreign oil which was started during 11 years of Trudeau government? What does this government intend to do to ensure that the promises are kept to provide energy to Canadians at a price that is affordable? It will not tell us.

What this government is doing is preparing Canadians in my constituency for higher prices and for shortages in the future. I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration what will be the effects upon unemployment in my constituency in the future if his government's policies on energy continue as they are today. I ask the minister what will be the effect upon small business if the Liberal government is allowed to continue as it is today.

During the election campaign Liberal candidates went from coast to coast attacking our government because of what they described as high interest rate policies. I accept that interest rates during that period were high, because we were forced—due to the legacy left by 16 years of Liberal government, big spending government—to allow interest rates to rise. The clear implication of the statements made by Liberal candidates and Liberal frontbenchers during that period was that if the Liberal party were given a chance to govern, interest rates would go down in Canada.

You probably saw, Mr. Speaker, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), when he was Liberal finance critic in the last Parliament, appear on Morton Shulman's program in Toronto and give the firm, unequivocal undertaking that he would resign if the Liberal government allowed interest rates to go higher after they formed the government. Why is he with us today? Has he changed his mind? Surely this minister owes it to the people of Canada and to my constituents—because he was in my constituency during the election campaign—talking about Liberal solutions for the economy—to indicate why his opinion on interest rates has changed.

Clearly, interest rates in Canada are having a direct effect on the ability of small business and family farmers to provide jobs in this economy. It is not enough for the Minister of Employment and Immigration to propose band-aid solutions and to ignore the real root of the problem.

The Liberal party has a responsibility to indicate to Canadians and this Parliament what are their spending plans. Both the Minister of Finance with his mini-budget last week and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) when he tabled his estimates last week—refused to indicate to the Canadian people how much money this government intends to spend this year. How can we look upon any proposal dealing with expenditures by this government if it will not level with Canadians and indicate its spending intentions?

The Minister of Finance provided projections in his mini-budget. He projected that the federal deficit might go up to $14.2 billion in 1980-81, as opposed to a $10.5 billion deficit projected in the Crosbie budget last December. The Minister of Finance projected that there would be a half of 1 per cent real growth in the economy as opposed to a 1 per cent real growth projected in the Crosbie budget of last December. The minister then went out of his way to say that his figures did not constitute a firm financial plan on the part of the government, that they were simply projections.

When will we have that plan? When will this government level with Canadians and tell us what it intends to do with the Canadian economy? Clearly, in the vote on the night of December 13, it was not enough for the Liberal party to simply say that they were opposed to what we were presenting in the budget. They had a responsibility to the Canadian people to come up with their own solutions and to indicate where they wished to take this country.

When the Minister of Employment and Immigration made his introductory remarks in this debate, he said that his proposal today was not designed to undercut the role of the private sector. The minister continues to believe that the private sector should be creating jobs in our economy. How can the private sector be expected to increase investment in our economy if it is left with continuing drift and uncertainty on the part of the Government of Canada.

It has been a year and a half since this country has had a budget passed by Parliament. Yes this government, of which this minister is a prominent member, continues to deny Canadians leadership and continues to refuse to indicate to them what the government's economic plan is for the future.

There are ominous signs, Mr. Speaker, because in the Speech from the Throne the government gave an indication of how it differs from the approach taken by the previous government. The Clark government, of which I had the honour to be a part, believed that the time had come in Canada for governments to pay their bills, to reduce the size of the government, to bring it under control and to begin to have government of a size which was manageable by the Parliament of Canada and by the cabinet of Canada. But what we find in the Speech from the Throne is a statement that Canadians do not want smaller government, they want more efficient government.

I say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration that you cannot have fat government at the same time as you have efficient government. If you are going to be successful in having an economy that is properly managed, if you are going to have this Parliament discharging its responsibilities to scrutinize public expenditures properly, or if you are going to have a feeling that the cabinet, the elected representatives, have some control over the activities of the government, then you cannot have fat government. You cannot have government which is characterized by waste and by uncontrolled growth, and yet this is what appears to be offered to the Canadian people by this government.

I want to remind the Minister of Employment and Immigration of the commitment made by the Liberal party. Perhaps it is a mistake to do so because the Liberal party has already indicated its intention to break so many commitments that it made as a party in opposition. However, I want to remind him of a statement made by the Prime Minister on January 12, 1980, when he was leader of the Liberal party, to the Liberal campaign college in Toronto. I have a copy of his text here and this is what he said:

> Our commitment is this:
> —We will hold the line on government expenditure growth to under the rate of GNP.
> —We will not introduce the gas tax or the mortgage scheme. This will mean more justice for our society and more money for the treasury.
> —We will review the tax system to ensure that all sectors of the economy make their fair contribution to future needs.
> —The deficit will be reduced—
> —in a phased and orderly fashion, but not at the expense of jobs, growth and the attack on inflation.
> —Finally, in this election campaign we pledge that any new expenditure programs to meet the evolving needs and requirements of Canadians will be financed by re-allocating existing expenditures or by increases in revenues. We will not add to the deficit by adding new programs.

I find that statement hard to believe even when I see those words in black and white. The Prime Minister went on to say:

I asked the President of the Treasury Board in this House last week on more than one occasion if he would level with the Parliament of Canada and with the Canadian people and indicate whether that promise to hold spending growth to less than the growth in the GNP would be kept. The minister refused to give a straight answer. He refused to give a firm undertaking that it would be. He said that that was their goal, that they would like to hold down expenditure growth to less than the real growth in the GNP. But he refused to give any firm commitment.

I ask what happened to the commitment that any new expenditures would be financed by reallocating existing resources as opposed to increasing the deficit? What will the deficit be? What are the spending plans of this government? When will the Canadian people be given the opportunity to know what plans the government has for them? When will the government level with Canadians? What does the Liberal party believe in? What kind of leadership does it intend to provide for Canadians? Surely the time has come with a majority government in office to provide leadership for Canadians and for the government to provide an example of candor if they expect the private sector is going to be willing to make the investment that is necessary to create new jobs in our economy.

I would remind the minister as well of a statement that was made by the Liberal party during the election campaign in response to a Financial Post questionnaire about spending. This is how the Liberal party responded to that questionnaire and stated their policy on spending and growth:

> Our policy is to continue ensuring that government spending grows less rapidly than gross national product. As this policy will require the same kind of restraint which kept spending increases below 10 per cent over the last four years, most changes will have to be in the form of reallocations of existing budgets to ensure continued emphasis on economic development and to protect the least fortunate in society.

What happened to that commitment? If you believe that the Liberal party was serious and was acting with honesty when it made this commitment, what it must do now, when the Minister of Finance projects a real growth rate in the Canadian economy for this year of one-half of 1 per cent, is to keep spending to less than one-half of 1 per cent of real growth. Will the government keep that commitment or break it as it has broken so many others?

An hon. Member: They have broken it already.

Mr. Beatty: My colleague is saying that the Liberals have broken it already. Indeed they have. So much for candour on the part of this government.

Because the government recognized the devastating effect that inflation was having on lower income Canadians, upon middle-income Canadians and on small business, it promised to attack inflation. But where is it? Where is the indication that the government is prepared—

Mr. Nielsen: To wrestle inflation to the ground.

Mr. Beatty: —as my colleague has said, to wrestle inflation to the ground? The Prime Minister promised this many years ago. As he said before, inflation was dead in Canada, that it no longer existed. He said that separatism was dead in Canada as well.

What we did was to institute a regime of restraint. We indicated that if new spending was to take place, it was going to be necessary to reallocate resources out of current budgets which exist today. But what we are going to find now, now that these big spenders are back in office, is increased deficits on the part of the federal government, massive increases in federal spending and massive new intrusions by the federal government in the private sector. We are going to find that because of the government's demands on money in our society, pools of capital which are necessary to the private sector to remain healthy and to expand will be drying up. That is the Liberal party's policy on inflation. That is the direction in which they intend to take the Canadian economy.

When will we have a budget? When will we have more than band-aid measures? When will we have an indication that the government is serious about dealing with these problems which it complained about when in opposition? What we have today in positions of leadership in Canada is a government that is either indifferent to business or hostile to it.

We can go back to the date of the Prime Minister's year end remarks when he talked about a new society, when he talked about how the free enterprise system in Canada had failed. The free enterprise system in Canada, Mr. Speaker, was not given the opportunity under successive Liberal governments to succeed. What they found was that the federal government would strangle the private sector through increasing regulation, through paperwork burden, through higher taxes, through uncontrolled federal spending which led to massive inflation on the part of the Canadian economy. Clearly Canadian business has a right to be skeptical as it makes its investment decisions for the years ahead. Surely small businessmen in my constituency have a right to ask the minister and to ask all members of the treasury bench what their plans are and when they will begin to recognize the problems facing small businessmen, family farmers and families of average means in Canada today. When will the government begin to bring in proposals which will be helpful to these Canadians? We do not see any indication of any awareness on the part of this government of the problems being faced by so many Canadians.

I was disturbed by two aspects of this bill in particular. The first is in the area of job creation. While this will be helpful in the short term, these jobs are not necessarily permanent ones. Federal funding runs out, and when it runs out, all too often the jobs run out as well. What we should be doing is ensuring that permanent jobs are created in the private sector. We can only do that by attacking the underlying problems facing business today, not by treating them with band-aid solutions.

I was disturbed also by one element of the bill, and I was made that much more concerned by the remarks of the parliamentary secretary when he spoke on Thursday night. We on this side of the House pointed out that because this proposal is a tax credit, the benefits will only go to those businessmen with taxable incomes, to those who are profitable and are therefore paying taxes. When the parliamentary secretary spoke he tried to respond to this point by pointing out that you can roll forward the benefit for up to five years, and if a business became profitable after five years it could claim, at any time during that five-year period, this tax credit.

What he is saying is that the government intends to provide benefits for small businesses as soon as they no longer need them, as soon as they get profitable, not in the formative stages, not when times are rough, not when the jobs of Canadians who are already working in those small businesses are already in jeopardy because they are not profitable, but when they turn the corner by themselves without the assistance by this government. Then the tax credit will be of some use.

I want to put on the record again the comments made by the parliamentary secretary because I found them extraordinary. I do not think that this government should be allowed to forget statements like this by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Dawson) in dealing with the effect on small businesses and whether indeed this tax credit would be of benefit to small businesses which are profitable.

● (1550)

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration said, as quoted at page 393 of Hansard:

> Many would argue that we should not subsidize an unprofitable firm, but a firm which cannot make a profit after five years should not be given the benefit of the tax credit. That is the first point.

What he is saying is aid for the healthy, aid for the profitable, but not aid from this government for small businesses at a time that is critical to them and to their very health. When jobs in existing industries or new businesses which are being created now and which are not profitable in their first year are in jeopardy, this government will be nowhere to be found. You can call on them for your tax credit after you turn the corner, after you become profitable—if you do in spite of this government's policies.

As I said at the outset, this party recognizes that the serious social and economic problems posed by unemployment in Canada today require that the government take measures, even band-aid measures, to begin to alleviate some of the suffering of a million Canadians.

We demand from the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Prime Minister and members of the treasury benches that they accept their responsibility to come forward to the Canadian people in the Parliament of Canada with an economic plan designed to attack the root causes of problems in our economy, that they recognize for the first time that business must be a partner in creating these jobs. It must be the singlemost important instrument for creating these jobs. That can only be done if government begins to restrain its demands upon the economy, and if we begin to show some respect to the private sector and to the entrepreneur, small businessmen, the family farmer, who so desperately need an ear in Ottawa that is willing to listen.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I did not want to miss this opportunity to make some comments on the bill under consideration or on the extension of legislation that we already know. Still I would like to say to the minister at the outset that of course in principle we cannot seriously object to his request to maintain the tax credits in order to help not only some industries but more particularly a number of unemployed who would be glad to be back in the labour force. In principle we have no major objection but indeed we will not miss this opportunity to let the minister know that this measure is just not enough to solve the problem of unemployment that we face today because unemployment means a lot of hardship or misery for over a million Canadians.

This is not the first time in about 12 years or so that I have heard unemployment problems discussed in the House of Commons. I remember very well that when I first came here there was already concern about the fact there were some 300,000 unemployed. In the last 12 years, after many representations, there were so many statements or promises that that number of 300,000 would be reduced! Today there are about four times as many unemployed. I am concerned as are my colleagues and many others. I presume members opposite are also concerned about the means that are now open to the government, whose attitude since the throne speech gives us even more reason to worry, and thousands of Canadians are worried because of inadequate measures.

We have before us a piece of legislation that will undeniably produce a few thousand jobs, but we must not waste this opportunity to make the minister aware of the situation—in any case, he can take new initiatives in cabinet—to prod him to make proposals that would go much further than the form of aid we have before us.

I know that this legislation results in assistance ranging from $1.50 to $2 an hour in certain areas. I also know that this legislation which has been in force for over a year has meant the creation of some 50,000 additional jobs. According to the minister the problem lies in the fact that the act provided for tax credits ending March 31 and that it was urgent to table this bill which, of course, has forced the House to postpone the throne speech debate.

The minister emphasizes that, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, he definitely intends to present in the near future—perhaps in a matter of two or three weeks—other job-creation programs to deal with the unemployment problem in Canada. I want to stress that this is only a beginning and that the government will keep introducing job-creation programs. Finally there will be a committee to study the possibility of creating new mechanisms which would help create employment. These are observations which have often been made in the House of Commons for the past 12 years, Mr. Speaker, and I do not believe that the absence of adequate measures in the Speech from the Throne must be construed as wishful thinking.

In the Speech from the Throne we have not heard many commitments on the part of the government to reassure the 200,000, 300,000 or 400,000 unemployed. In addition, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) did not hesitate to point out that unemployment would reach at least 8 per cent, and in view of the delay in tabling his budget, we already have the impression that unemployment could reach 9 per cent at the end of this year which means 200,000 or 300,000 additional unemployed. Also, the absence of economic direction will delay some investments and discourage some investors from taking concrete steps in terms of job creation. The minister must be aware of those things.

We are now clearly witnessing the economic failure of this government over the last 12 years. Mr. Speaker, some might say we did not bring in enough measures during the seven months we were in power, but we had already clearly given a new direction in terms of the use of private enterprise. It was also clear that businessmen seemed to feel we were moving toward a kind of co-operation and mechanisms that would allow them to invest with confidence and optimism because after only a few months they were already feeling we were going to give back to private enterprise the place it deserves in a society like ours. But in the circumstances, in the absence, I repeat, of the measures that were necessary, it is also clear that we are going to experience once again a certain stagnation that is going to create more unemployed, given the measures which we had already considered and which this government is now refusing to take.

And to illustrate this, since 1968, I think we might have to talk about a drama because I think we have to agree that in the context of unemployment, which we call the cancer of our economy, it is clearly a drama. And it is a drama at the Canadian level, it is a drama in my province also—I think many hon. members from Quebec know perfectly well the miseries the province of Quebec is going through as a result of a rather extraordinary rate of unemployment. Some would like to blame the provincial governments and heaven knows how the provincial government—even before the arrival of Mr. Lévesque, Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Johnson or Mr. Bourassa was in power—was always under fire from members of this House because of the rate of unemployment back home; it was the same in the maritimes and elsewhere, and we just found out that there are problems and concerns in Ontario as well, and rightly so. So I believe that the last 12 years indicate a failure at this level and it seems that the measures or the attitude or the theories of the current government did not succeed in finding a solution to adjust the unemployment rate to a more acceptable level.

In the light of strong disappointment, Mr. Speaker, some people wanted to take advantage of the Speech from the Throne to address themselves only to the question of national unity. I have no objection because it is a problem that has to be solved before long, but how can we think of a solution to national unity when the unemployment rate will rise again this year, when so many regions and provinces show their disappointment with the lack of sufficient measures, the lack of efforts to consult with the provinces in the face of an economic problem?

When a sufficient number of Canadians will be working, it will be much easier to talk to one another, Mr. Speaker, for it is important to be able to discuss, and it will also be much easier to understand one another. But when provinces and regions are faced with such problems on an economic level as they are experiencing today, and when the situation dates back to 12 years ago, when projections indicate difficult months and years to come, it is hard to ask Canadians to forget these problems and treat one another as brothers. So we are faced with an economic problem, raised several times by many in this House. This economic failure is certainly not my responsibility nor that of my party and the proposal by the minister is nothing more than a feeble attempt at solving forthcoming problems.

I shall speak about my own province, but I would certainly not want to miss the opportunity to state that the same problems exist in my constituency. Since I have represented this constituency for 12 years, I know how many times I have had to appeal on behalf of serious organizations such as the municipal council of the major city in my riding and how many representations I have made on behalf of certain municipalities and organizations concerning economic matters. Mr. Speaker, I believe it took me ten-odd years to benefit from the advantages offered by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to certain areas in my province and in other parts of Canada. It took me roughly ten years to obtain for my constituency what has been in effect since April 1, namely the benefits granted by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. For ten years, I was refused these advantages even though my constituency was also suffering from high unemployment and, of course, during my short term as minister I made the public service and my government understand that my riding, as much as any other area in Canada, but not more than any other, deserved these advantages which will provide certain subsidies in the next four years if some industries are interested in developing there.

At least my constituency now has the same tools as other regions. In Quebec as a whole, we have many people in city councils, chambers of commerce and economically stimulating organizations who have thought about encouraging the required and appropriate infrastructures for the establishment of certain industries. I therefore trust that the extension of this legislation will allow a certain number of industries to benefit from the act. But once again, that is not enough.

I hope that my constituency, like so many others, will soon be able to know if the budget includes incentives for job creation. For the moment, however, we have been refused a budget and we have no information on what it will include and this just adds to many deceptions, concerns and expectations.

I believe we should do much more than what we are now doing. I would also like to say that when we talk about incentives, many people are greatly concerned about the refusal of the government to do anything for home owners. We know that the building industry has a strong impact on job creation. I think that this sector employs about 30 per cent of Canadian manpower. And yet, Mr. Speaker, we had proposed a program designed specifically for the home owner to help him keep his house in spite of high mortgage rates.

I think that this government knows what excessive interest rates mean. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance recognizes as does the Speech from the Throne, that the rates are excessive but nothing has been proposed yet to develop and help the construction sector and home owners. I remember that our proposal had been delayed and boycotted, I think the word is appropriate in the House of Commons, because it offered no direct help to tenants. But this government offers them nothing either. If it had been true that our budget was unacceptable to them, even though thousands of home owners think otherwise, it would have been urgent to propose something for tenants, but we are still waiting for that kind of measure. But it is also proven, Mr. Speaker, that the measure we introduced was aimed at helping home owners keep their homes through interest assistance and encouraging Canadians to buy their own homes, giving them a share in this land, so they would become prouder and more involved in our society through home ownership.

We know that a Canadian who gets his own home becomes involved in municipal, provincial and federal affairs—this is automatic and quite natural, Mr. Speaker. But for some time interest rates have been rising, home owners are concerned and there are statements that this government should think over. There are reports from Toronto, in Ontario, a press release that there are thousands of bankruptcies because of high interest costs.

The home builders association are making very official representations on the lack of measures urgently needed to help the building industry. I have here a letter from CIPREC, the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies, from which I would like to quote a few paragraphs. That letter was sent to the Minister of Finance. I quote:

> Our industry recognizes the need to reduce the inflation rate, to control the level of deficits and to maintain interest rates at appropriate levels to support the value of our currency. But such unprecedented rates have an abnormal impact on the real estate industry, and especially the residential sector. The development of real property is of prime importance to the economic welfare of this country, and more jobs probably depend on that industry than any other.

It is stressed that—

> In 1976, there have been 273,000 new housing starts in Canada, but the figure declined to 197,000 in 1979. The CMHC estimated that the Canadian demand could justify the building of up to 220,000 units in 1980, but under current conditions the figure cannot exceed 150,000. The general implications of unemployment are very serious since the building of each unit creates between 3 and 4.4 man-years of employment. Consequently, a decrease of 70,000 units below Canadian potential could result in the loss of 200,000 jobs this year.

Those are not my remarks, Mr. Speaker. This is not a totally groundless comment I make; those remarks come from a serious organization entertaining equally serious concerns about current interest rates and which will entail considerable loss in the housing industry, affect hundreds of businesses and could indeed increase unemployment by as much as 200,000 people.

I could not miss this opportunity to point out to the responsible minister his obligation to make urgent appeals to the cabinet, to force his government to take action primarily concerned with housing. That is clear, and I think members opposite feel the same way. Besides, I recall that a short time after the election, at a government caucus meeting, some members, each more talkative than the other, told journalists how important it was to pressure the cabinet into helping home owners who were already anticipating the loss of their house. We all know that the renewal of mortgages is of terrible concern for young and older home owners alike. Even young people who would like to become owners overnight are really stuck because of those interest rates and because of the lack of action by the government. But the minister is not unduly worried. He suggests that 35,000 home owners could be hit a little harder, but despite that he is confident that he will manage to get over it.

Clearly, the government refuses to give help that is essential and now urgent. And it speaks of a measure that is efficient and will reduce unemployment. It is unthinkable, Mr. Speaker; we will witness months and years of hardship if this government does not agree to change the formula that has made of it the winner in terms of unemployment for the last 12 years. How inconceivable, how unacceptable that this government should continue thinking that by spending a bit more money on social programs the rate of unemployment will be reduced. But the people want to work! Some will say that too many Canadians are lazy. The Prime Minister himself did not hesitate to say so. But that claim is untrue. Personally, I feel that, as a whole, the Canadian people have more pride than that: they are eager to work. Canadians are not happier when they have to depend on social measures and unemployment insurance. Such claims are simply not true.

The public expects real proposals, a new economic direction; the people and the business sector are waiting for the government and the budget, to find out in what direction the country will go from here on in. That is important for business, and its members will not hesitate to invest provided, first, they can invest in the private sector while at the same time helping Canadians through their competence and know-how. I feel present leaders of this country would stand much to gain if they listened to businessmen who, as a group, have proved their initiative, have made progress, and have achieved fantastic results for the country as a whole. It seems to me the administrators of this country, the Prime Minister and the cabinet, could benefit from sitting down with that type of entrepreneur to find out what is going to become of the business sector.

Given the present state of bankruptcy of our economy, our private enterprise would certainly not want to consult with any of the members that have been in the cabinet in the last 12 years. But I have been one of those who often favoured the possibility of bringing together representatives of the business world who live close and know the Canadian economy, the Minister of Finance and his staff as well as trade unions representatives, because they all are directly involved in, and directly interested by, the question we are debating now and by the unemployment issue.

It is urgent, I think, that the government recognize that middle and long-term policies and objectives are needed in terms of the private sector which would certainly appreciate knowing the intentions of the government. Then we will be able, I think, to encourage investors to invest more money. We certainly will have to have some kind of incentives so that Canadians invest their money in our businesses, instead of the government procrastinating on those measures which we will debate until May 20, Mr. Speaker. I know it, I feel it; there is now a more pressing priority than to listen again, Mr. Speaker, to questions directed to ministers about questions asked by Quebec ministers. It does not make any sense at a time when we have so much to deal with here in Ottawa.

If some members are concerned about the loss of confidence of a number of Canadians or a number of Quebeckers in the federal system, it is because the people in charge at that time lost this confidence here in the House and now they will have to win it back here in the House by introducing constructive, positive measures. The minister of employment will have his work cut out for him during the next few months and the next few years. Of course, the measure he has moved is acceptable but the lack of propositions, for which we have been waiting for three weeks, is bound to discourage Canadians. It is certainly not likely to encourage the members who sit on this side who, I am sure, had succeeded in giving at least a direction and a certain optimism to all Canadians.

It is not through the Speech from the Throne that we should act. I know that. We know that there are only pious wishes in the Speech from the Throne. Some proposals should follow the good intentions mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but those proposals are not put before the House of Commons; we are waiting for them, we are waiting for the budget, and that cripples the affairs of the country. However, Canada has not been too well served by its Parliament in the last 12 months as there was hardly a two-month sitting period. Therefore, in order to help his Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) should table his budget as soon as possible so that Canadians can expect some proposals which could mean a reduction in the unemployment level, of which the new Minister of Employment and Immigration would be the champion. I am convinced that the new minister is well intentioned, I really am, but I caution him against the experience he has not had with this government, but which we and thousands of Canadians have had for the last 12 years. This experience has unfortunately resulted in an increase in the number of unemployed in Canada from 300,000 in 1968 to 1,300,000 in 1979 or 1980. Some will say that the number of people in the work force has increased, of course, the population has increased, but we do have more unemployed and that is the problem of the Canadian people.

We all wish that the social climate were healthier than it is at present. But, as I said, Mr. Speaker, we must first of all solve the economic problem. The provinces are aware of this. They have often been let down in their representations to this government in the last 12 or 13 years. The provinces would have wanted to be involved in the major national decisions. But they were not given the opportunity to participate, yet that would have made the government realize the advantage of solving certain things and the danger of going too quickly in certain areas. Because of this government's attitude, we now have an unacceptably high rate of unemployment. I think the government should reconcile provincial interests as quickly as possible so that we can propose economic measures in accordance with regional and provincial realities.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that these few comments will be sufficient warning to the minister so that he will pressure his cabinet colleagues and prompt the Minister of Finance to present concrete measures in the House, because his objective is a very noble one, I am sure, that of lowering the unemployment rate in Canada and we are all prepared to co-operate with him in this regard.

But I must remind the minister that we will not achieve this objective if his government is bent on maintaining the philosophy or attitude of the last 12 years. Important changes must be made, and I trust that the new ministers in this old cabinet will be able to bring about new initiatives. Only then could we congratulate and applaud the new government, if it deserves it.

[English]

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to debate the principle of the bill now before us, Bill C-19, one is struck by what I would call the somewhat schizophrenic behaviour of the government. On the one hand, the government doles out money to business to subsidize the private sector to create jobs in the short run, as exemplified by this bill, and on the other hand, sometimes in co-operation with other governments, they hand out millions to business, again to subsidize the private sector to destroy jobs in the longer run. Obviously this bill is an example of the former, and the example to which I want to refer in just a few moments is a rather glaring illustration of the latter.

The attitude of the government would seem to be summed up rather well in the words of a rather well known actor, Peter Ustinov, when he said, "I find myself of two minds on the subject—one more or less in disagreement with the other." That appears to be the attitude of the government.

As I said, this program seems to fall into the first category—handing out money or doling out money to some of the private sector in order to create jobs in the short run. Are they temporary jobs? How temporary are they? Do we really know, as yet, how many jobs have been created by this wage subsidy program, most of which will be at the minimum wage or very close to it, I would suspect? Perhaps we could hear something more from the government as to what level of income they expect people to live on who hold the jobs which are, in large part, created by this program. Is the purpose of this bill to open up to new applicants or new businesses the addition of more employees in the creation of more production, or is it to extend the current jobs already created in that sector?

In any case, I should like to now comment on the opposite end of the pole. A story appeared in the Toronto The Globe and Mail on April 21 entitled: "$140 million grants to mills will cost 600 to 800 lost jobs". The federal government will put up one-third and the provincial government of Ontario in this case will put up two-thirds under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion program, which is the program we are dealing with here. The Department of Regional Economic "Contraction" would perhaps be a better term, especially if this is to indicate the kind of path on which that department is embarked. The almost $50 million, which is the federal government's contribution to this particular program, is not, to our way of thinking, in line with the recent statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the policy of the government is to "help those who need help the most". If that is the case, I think we have come upon a rather startling definition of those who are "in need" in our society.

I should like to mention some of the companies. The article which appeared in The Globe and Mail reads as follows:

Among the companies given grants so far, Great Lakes Forest Products Ltd. could lose 200 jobs at its mill in Dryden. An additional 240 will be lost at an Abitibi-Price Inc. mill at Iroquois Falls.

Mr. More, who is the pulp and paper consultant to the Ontario department of industry and tourism, according to the article also said the following:

—another 280 jobs will be lost at Ontario Paper Co. Ltd. in Thorold; about 100 at Spruce Falls Power and Paper Co. Ltd. of Kapuskasing; and 20 at Domtar Inc. in Red Rock.

If this is the government's new definition of those "in need" in our society, then it perhaps strikes some of us in our corner of the House as strange that that is where the public welfare bill of this government is going. It is quite in line with the kind of corporate welfare which has been passed out for many, many years by this government, the former Liberal government and the "blue blip" that appeared somewhere in the middle.

Apparently these are corporations which the government thinks are in need of this assistance. We are paying almost $50 million out of the federal treasury to eliminate between 600 and 800 jobs. I wonder what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) would think about some of the companies. Some of them are multinationals, some of them are 100 per cent subsidiaries of American corporations, and others have interlocking directorships which are somewhat more obtuse in nature.

Is E. B. Eddy Forest Products Ltd., a subsidiary of George Weston Ltd., a firm that is really "in need"? What about Spruce Falls Power and Paper Co. Ltd.? The company is 100 per cent United States owned. What about the Ontario Paper Co. Ltd.? That company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Chicago Tribune Co. All of these companies have regular profits in the tens and in the hundreds of millions of dollars. Why do they need subsidies from the public purse—out of the pockets of working taxpayers—in order to do what they ought to be doing if they are interested in running efficient and proper businesses? It is rather beyond the wildest extent of my imagination. I do not know how we can legitimize that as being a proper charge on the public purse.

Meanwhile hundreds of smaller independent companies in the forest industry in particular are in severe danger of going belly-up due to some of the other policies of this government. While Bill C-19 may be all right in itself, it does nothing to put a dent in the kind of unemployment the other policies of this government are creating. Under some circumstances maybe there could be a proper case for the kind of social assistance that is being offered to these corporations.

Again I should like to refer to Mr. More, the pulp and paper consultant to the Ontario department of industry and tourism, the provincial partner in this giveaway, and what he said about these companies' attitude. He said the following:

—the industry endangered its position in the world market in past years by not having the business sense to expand and consolidate.

Also he said:

As a result, the government now has to guide it with multi-million dollar incentives.

Mr. More's words describing their attitude in past years are rather colourful, but I should like to quote his remarks as they appeared in The Globe and Mail. I am sure The Globe and Mail would not print anything which should be censored. It reads as follows:

They take the attitude: "When things are good, we'll go like a son of a bitch and make good profits, and when they're bad we'll tough it out."

Those are the words of an official of the Conservative government of Ontario describing the attitude of the compagnies to which this government is giving $50 million because they did not do their jobs.

Mr. Blais: Does that offend you?

Mr. Kristiansen: As a woodworker, it really offends me. But it is difficult to understand what rationale the Department of Regional Economic "Contraction" has in mind when it gives this kind of assistance to companies with that kind of dismal record in terms of looking after their own affairs and keeping their own business house in order. It is an incentive for initiative in reverse. It is free enterprise turned upside down. I am suprised that my Tory friends are not jumping in on this. Surely the Conservative government of Ontario could be wrong too.

• (1630)

This is one of those nice hunky-dory, cosy relationships we seem to have within the "contracted" departments and their friends. Something needs to be said because we hear some of our friends to our right chastizing some of the unemployed for refusing to accept work, by whatever definition they may choose, as one of the speakers did earlier in this debate last week.

The Conservative party was rather schizophrenic on that too, because one of their critics stood up and said that there were actually fewer unemployed than appeared because a lot of people would not take jobs when they were offered, while another stood and suggested there were in fact hundreds of thousands of hidden unemployed in Canada who should appear in the statistics but do not in fact do so. I suppose the government is not the only group that is a little schizoid in this regard.

The policies being pursued, which are creating such a severe rate of unemployment in a number of industries, particularly in the forest industry, are really the result of a coalition policy, again of the current Liberal government, the past Liberal government and the "blue blip" that appeared in between. One of the key aspects of that policy, of course, has been the continually rising—now floating—slightly sinking—we will never know—interest rate policy that has been a feature of all three governments.

I would just like to mention a few things about unemployment, in the forest industry in particular. In fact, things are getting so standard as regards lay-offs and headlines and news about lay-offs from one end of the country to the other that the Daily Townsman of Cranbrook, in the riding of my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke

(Mr. Parker), now prints headlines that say "CFI plans no lay-offs yet due to poor market". Surely we have reached the height of absurdity and asininity in terms of our approach to unemployment and the kind of policies which seem almost deliberately designed to create it when the fact that there are no lay-offs at a major mill creates news. Surely our world is being turned upside down.

This is not just a matter of the government's current interest rate policy. I will have something more to say a little later about the designs and the plans of both the government and the Bank of Canada and its announced policies, which seem to be pursued in order to put us into an even worse position than that now prevailing in the United States. If we think we are in trouble in our housing industry, let us consider the United States lumber industry which is facing an even worse crisis. This government by its statements—and I will go into those in a few minutes—seems determined to catch up.

On April 4, just a few weeks ago, a report in a newspaper in Spokane, Washington, indicated 38,000 lumber workers in the Pacific northwest were unemployed due to high mortgage and high interest rates prevailing in the United States. In this morning's The Globe and Mail it was reported from Boise, Idaho, that more than 60,000 mill workers and lumberjacks in the northwest and southern United States are now out of work, due again to interest rate policies and the refusal of the United States government, although it has done more than the Canadian government, to take specific action to aid home owners, giving some type of assistance to those who are having to renew their mortgages for the first time. That government is doing more than Canada, but it is still only a drop in the bucket there. This government is doing nothing here.

No one would suggest, and members of this party would be the last to do so, that whatever action the Canadian government takes in terms of our mortgage interest rates, or the interest rate structure in Canada, is going to put everybody back to work in the Canadian forest industry. None of us would suggest that. There is a significant market, particularly for plywood, in central and eastern Canada, but that market is falling apart.

In a number of recent stories, one again in today's The Globe and Mail, this is mentioned. This article is from Amherst, Nova Scotia, and it states:

> Tony Rumbold said markets for the bureau's 49 member-firms started dipping sharply in February as high interest rates slowed down housing construction in Canada and the United States.

That report is from the Maritime Lumber Bureau. The situation has worsened.

I am not suggesting that the unemployment statistics tell the whole story, but what are some of the statistics in the forest industry? Let me refer to the government's figures from Statistics Canada's labour force survey for March, 1980. They indicate that in the Atlantic provinces in the forest industry there were 4,000 unemployed, or 44.4 per cent. According to StatsCan there were 11,000 or 44 per cent unemployed in the forest industry in the province of Quebec, and that is as of March. In Ontario the figure was 11.1 per cent, but both the governments of Ontario and of Canada seem set hell bent to make it worse.

In British Columbia there were 3,000 or 10 per cent unemployed, and let me say a little more right now about that 3,000 figure or 10 per cent in March for British Columbia. The last report compiled by regional Council No. 1 of the IWA which covers western Canada—these are just IWA members but there are a number of other labour organizations in the forestry industry in this country including the Canadian paperworkers union and the lumber and sawmill workers, not to mention the tens of thousands of Canadian woodworkers who do not have the benefits of union organization—listed 3,000 unemployed in the IWA alone in March, but as of April 22 the total for that region west of the Manitoba-Ontario border was 6,082.

By May 2, just a few days from now, there will be an additional 300 laid off in The Pas, Manitoba, by the Manitoba Forestry Resource Corporation. Just a couple of days ago, I believe, there were 350 people laid off at a mill in Salmon Arm, British Columbia. By the end of April 1,640 employees of Weldwood of Canada will be laid off, mainly in the Williams Lake and Quesnel areas of the Cariboo district in British Columbia. That is a total of 8,000 to 9,000 people.

Let me read briefly from a couple of notes prepared for me a few days ago when I attended a meeting that was attended in turn by a number of people who had just been laid off or were about to be laid off in the Kootenay region, both Kootenay West and Kootenay East-Revelstoke. I asked some of them for an up-to-date report. This note is from an employee of Revelstoke Sawmill in Radium, British Columbia, and states:

> On April 4, Revelstoke Sawmill, Radium, closed down "B" mill which was employing 70 people and maintenance and also laid off one shift at the planer, employing 15 people. On April 18, 1980, there were further lay-offs. The company shut down the planer. There are now only 37 people left working and this is very unstable. We suspect that within a very short time the mill will close down completely. This will leave approximately 200 people out of work. This figure does not include the contract loggers and truckers.

More of them are going down. The note continues:

> This is the main industry in our area and our people are scared. There is no sign of improvement. We feel the government had better have a good look at the situation and do something about correcting it.

● (1640)

That is an appeal for help from real people, and this mill is in a small community. Certainly, there is a tourist industry in Radium Hot Springs. This city sits right on the edge of one of our greatest national parks. But in terms of stable year-round employment, the forest industry is all that these people have and all that many of the communities in that area have, both in the east Kootenay and in the west Kootenay and in hundreds of other smaller communities across this country. We must begin to do something about the situation.

In the town of Haney, which is found in one of the Fraser Valley ridings, there were 350 shake and shingle employees laid off due to market conditions. They expect a possible 150 more in the near future. At least 100 loggers have not returned to work, and it is possible that other mills will cut back. There were 70 cedar mill employees laid off, and all the other loggers were late in returning. Stories like that can be repeated by the hundreds.

It is not enough to have an employment tax credit creating a few temporary jobs close to the minimum wage when what we are facing across the length and breadth of this country is thousands, approaching tens of thousands, of people who work hard for their living, who are proud but are being cast on to the garbage heap of society because this government and previous governments have refused to take any concerted action to attempt to come to grips with their problems.

Sometimes statistics are sneered at. I recently read a cartoon. It was one of those cartoons which can be read, and it is not necessary to see the pictures. The cartoon was in the Castlegar News of March 22, and I believe that it was written by Jules Feiffer. The situation pictured is a little boy asking questions of a man behind a desk. On the desk is the word "Economist". It reads:

What's a depression?

Bad for business.

Yeah, but what is it?

A depression is when upwards of 12 per cent of the middle class is unemployed.

What's a recession?

Unsettling for some individuals but a useful hedge against inflation.

It sounds like government policy.

Yeah, but what is it?

A recession is when upwards of 7 per cent of the white middle class is unemployed.

What's affluence?

Good times!

Yeah, but what is it?

Affluence is when only 3 per cent of the white middle class is unemployed, and minority unemployment has levelled off at 25 per cent.

We are past that. Perhaps I am playing the role of the little boy, but I know that we are getting the same kinds of answers from this government as the economist in the cartoon gave. We got the same kind of answers from the last government—the "blue blip" between the two Liberal administrations.

One of my Conservative friends to my right had the absolute unmitigated gall recently to wonder where the New Democratic Party was when the Tory government was brought down without being given a chance to do anything in government. The Conservatives intended to give up to $375 to some home owners in Canada and to some people who wanted to buy homes. This was at the same time as their interest rate policies—and maybe the Liberals will have something to cheer about as well for a while—climbed continuously during their nine month aborted pregnancy in office, enough to raise the payments on an average home by at least $500, possibly $1,000 and probably $1,500 in a year.

The Conservatives expected us to be thankful because their government was going to give back up to $375 to some of the people. That is like suggesting that we should have confidence in the captain of a ship who sends half his crew to paint the superstructure while he sends the other half below to scuttle the hull. The Conservatives complained, and they wanted to know where we were. I was not here but my party was here, and we were doing our job when we brought down that government because it had to be one of the worst governments in one of the shortest periods of government in the history of Canada. It was so bad that it even made the second coming of the Liberal party look good.

Mrs. Mitchell: No way.

An hon. Member: They weren't that bad.

An hon. Member: That's going too far.

Mr. Kristiansen: Apparently many Canadians thought they were better. There are a number of other statistics which one could quote. I do not wish to get into them, but there are a few lessons to be learned.

I would like to go back to the joint program of the Department of Regional Economic "Contraction". All of the companies to which they gave assistance—approximately $50 million in federal dollars and $100 million in Ontario dollars, all of which were taxpayers' dollars—were large, integrated companies, and many of them were owned by multinationals. Almost all of them were companies with integrated operations, not only in lumber, but in shake and shingle, plywood and—most important for our current purposes—in the pulp and paper industry which is doing rather well at the present time.

The pulp and paper industry is the only sector of the forest industry that is showing strength at this point in our history. Why does that assistance go to the sector which should be strong? Simply to reward them for their lack of initiative in not keeping their plants up to date in the past when they were earning good money? They were doing their job badly, but they are one of the few industries that have really made it on the differential between the Canadian dollar and the U.S. dollar. It has been cream for the pulp and paper industry, and it is still doing rather well. They are the people whom this government and the Prime Minister believe need assistance most. At least, that is to whom the government is giving assistance.

I said earlier that I wanted to comment for a few moments on the actions of other governments. One might classify the new program for assistance to the house building industry, $160 million, in the United States as peanuts, but at least it is a start. In the context of the United States $160 million does not go very far. Nor would $16 million in a Canadian context go very far, but at least it would be a beginning.

I do not often have very much of a favourable nature to say of the present government of British Columbia, but a few months ago it became involved in a program, whatever its difficulties, in which, by using approximately $7 million, it generated $200 million in terms of mortgage loan assistance to people for new housing starts. That is perhaps one of the few and only reasons why British Columbia housing starts in the first period of this year had a slightly better performance than the rest of the country.

I am not suggesting that the federal government make a duplicate copy of the B.C. program, nor am I suggesting that it make a carbon copy of the United States program; but I am pleading with it to do something besides giving away up to $50 million to large, integrated companies that are not in difficulty for the purpose of eliminating hundreds of jobs, in this case throughout northwestern Ontario.

The Globe and Mail of today had an article in its business section headed "Bond prices spurt higher as large U.S. banks reduce prime rate to 18.5 per cent". The article is on page B3. Again, what it says is rather shocking and is an indication, I suppose, of this government's real policy at a time when it should be doing something to create demands in housing, for our forest products, lumber and plywood, to a meaningful extent within Canada through a new approach to interest rates.

The article reads in part:

> The U.S. authorities' stance contrasts sharply with that of the Bank of Canada, which has re-established a painfully tight grip on the Canadian banking system and is resisting the downward move in Canadian short-term rates.
> The Canadian central banks' aim is to restore—

What they call—

> —a more normal spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates as the year progresses, according to economist Michael Manford of Merrill Lynch Royal Securities Limited of Toronto.

The article goes on to quote Mr. Manford:

> In all likelihood this will be accomplished by slowing the decline in Canadian prime rates until U.S. rates fall below them, he wrote in the firm's Capital Markets Letter. Thus the Canadian prime rate is likely to average 14 to 14.5 per cent by year-end, compared with 13 per cent in the United States.

● (1650)

At the moment we have the advantage and can try to keep our industry going a little better than theirs. Their unemployment statistics are absolutely astronomical. Why in heaven's name is the government and the Bank of Canada bent on following a policy that will drive us further and further into national bankruptcy and put tens of thousands more of our people out of work?

An hon. Member: It is the national Liberal employment policy.

Mr. Kristiansen: It certainly seems to be. It is not because they have not had advice.

A Canadian Press story which appeared in the Nelson Daily News on March 6 reported in part as follows:

> The government could create 100,000 additional jobs through a reduction in interest rates and some fiscal stimulus, says the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy in a study released Wednesday.
> Fiscal stimulus refers to tax cuts or incentives, or both.

It goes on to suggest that the government should be taking deliberate action to lower interest rates. This is in line with what the New Democratic Party has been trying to get across for some time. It would turn the whole thing around.

The International Woodworkers of America met with the previous government but I do not think they have yet had a chance to meet with the present government. They presented a rather comprehensive brief to the former prime minister which discussed the impact of current interest rates on the wood products industry in British Columbia. It is a rather detailed brief of some 25 pages and accompanying statistics. It offered a well presented and documented argument and attempted to persuade the government of the day to reverse its disastrous policy on interest rates. I suggest it should be required reading for members of this government. They have heard the arguments and the facts.

Some of the top economists as well as influential groups and economic bodies in the country have suggested that the government turn its policies around. Instead of that, what we get is a renewal of the employment tax credit program. Thousands of people are being thrown out of well-paid jobs—people with mortgages, people with families, with bills to pay, with credit cards—yet incentives are still being given to finance companies, credit card companies and others so that they can advertise and increase the demand for credit. We have been suckered by an industry which our public policy tends to assist in this endeavour. The present policies will throw thousands of people out of work and a continuation of the tax credit program will only offer some of them temporary jobs at or near the minimum wage. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker.

People who have been used to earning $10, $11 or $12 an hour are not fussy about accepting a short term job and losing their right to unemployment insurance benefits in order to take it. If they do not, then, of course, our Conservative friends and perhaps a couple of hon. members opposite are going to accuse them of being welfare bums who do not want to work!

Who should have to work at those rates, Mr. Speaker, in a country that has the potential and, hopefully, the ability to get its act together and produce wealth per capita such as no other country in the world can dream of? To ask our people to live below the poverty level is worse than ridiculous; it is almost criminal.

My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) borrowed a phrase from me the other day. Indeed, I invited him to use it and he did to open his address. I should like to close with the same quotation. As the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain thought it suitable to open the subject, I, too, can think of no better phrase with which to close. Perhaps even some of my Conservative friends would listen to John Foster Dulles, who said that "the measure of success is not whether you have a tough problem to deal with, but whether it is the same problem you had last year".

We not only have the same problem we had last year, Mr. Speaker, we have a worse one. We seem bound and determined, as a matter of deliberate public policy, to further complicate it and make it worse. We go off in both directions, Mr. Speaker. We appear to have a schizophrenic government.

Perhaps I should wonder if the words of Frank Scott in his poem about Mackenzie King are not somewhat appropriate. He wrote that "We had no shape because he would not allow us to take sides, and no sides because he would not allow us to take shape".

Do we have a jellyfish? Maybe, Mr. Speaker, but we do not need a jellyfish. We need a government that takes some hard, tough decisions and begins to move this country in a direction where people who want to work can work, where people who want homes can have homes, good jobs with good rates of pay. It can be done if the government will listen to some of the advice offered, not only by the opposition but by many of their own so-called experts.

I plead with the government to listen; I plead with the government to act. I plead with them to get their act on track and try to be just a little more consistent in the pursuit of their economic policy.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I associate myself with the many kind remarks that have been made concerning you and may I ask you to convey my best wishes to Madam Speaker for success in conducting the business of this chamber. I have known both you, sir, and Madam Speaker for a long time and I have confidence in the impartiality you have already demonstrated in many areas. I know that will be reflected in your attitude toward the chamber, the right of members to be heard and the good conduct of business. I know we sometimes have a tendency to get out of control. I wish you well, sir, and I wish Madam Speaker well.

The government caught hell today, Mr. Speaker, and justifiably so, for the blatant positions they adopted during the last general election with respect to what they would or would not do in the area of job creation. I regret the minister is not in the chamber. As a matter of fact, in the course of my remarks I shall express regret that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) are not present. Indeed, I am a little disappointed to see only one member of cabinet from Atlantic Canada in the chamber. That is an area of the country which is probably the most seriously affected, not only by programs being developed by this government, but which historically has been adversely affected by past programs. So many have been ad hoc, short-term programs.

We can look forward to some 9 per cent or 10 per cent unemployment in this country, but in my area it can run to 25, 30 or 40 per cent, and even to 60 or 70 per cent in pockets of the black community. When I reflect upon the ad hoc programs of the past, I find the government's position during the last election campaign to have been farcical. They have been in power for only two months but before that they had 16 years to put programs in place. Ad hoc programs are not good enough, Mr. Speaker.

One of the reasons they are not good enough is that of every dollar generated in Atlantic Canada today, 64 cents comes in the form of a government-to-government transfer or a government-to-people transfer. That leaves 36 cents of new wealth for every dollar generated in Atlantic Canada. This is so because of a variety of reasons, but most important of all because of our dependency in recent years on government transfers on short-term government programs.

If we do not turn the situation around, by the end of the 1980s or early 1990s that figure will rise from 64 cents to somewhere close to 80 cents. There will be a difference of opinion, depending on certain factors, but in any event the consensus is that it will be very close to 80 cents for every dollar generated. No wonder there is disparity. The situation is a direct effect of ad hoc job programs. We hear it said that they are great because we need them; we take them because we have to have them, but they do not create permanent long-term jobs. What the government must do, and must do very quickly or it will have the Atlantic provinces as a cost to the federal treasury forever is to turn its emphasis in our part of Canada toward the creation of jobs based on our natural and renewable resources.

If the emphasis, the time and the energy that we do place in dreaming up these programs—for example, the one in front of us is the extension of the tax credit program—

An hon. Member: You are always lost.

Mr. Forrestall: I may be lost as far as the noise is concerned from the other part of the chamber, but I am not lost in my concern and my awareness of what in God's name is going on in Atlantic Canada. It is something a little bit more than I can say for my friend. If hot air were music, people like that would make fine brass bands, but they do not do very much for the economy of our country, Mr. Speaker.

In this chamber I have argued for a considerable period of time for governments to pay attention to the needs of the disparate regions of this country, to get away from ad hockery and the "couldn't care less attitudes" and to take the disparate regions out from under the need for government-to-government and government-to-people transfers. Then one would not have disparity. You do not waste your time when you look imaginatively or with concern to regions which suffer the way Atlantic Canada does. You do not waste your time when you do that. Quite the contrary. If you were to look imaginatively at Atlantic Canada you would find our renewable resources.

I was asked what we did in the fisheries. We offered tax incentives to those wishing to invest in the fishing industry, in new fishing vessels. That is what we did. What did this government do? It cancelled this program and took it away, preferring to give handouts. That is one thing that this government did.

We offered incentives to people to go into Atlantic Canada. We told them to invest in Atlantic Canada in our renewable resource and natural resource areas. We could then create long-term job opportunities and permanent job opportunities. We could then raise capital and start paying our debts to the rest of Canada. We are in debt to the rest of Canada, and I do not like it.

As a matter of fact, it brings into question the whole area of national unity. The other day I listened to a planted question asked by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Leduc) of the Minister of National Defence. It was so provocative that after three o'clock I reserved my right to rise later on this week on a question of privilege, a question of privilege which is a very serious one. As a matter of fact, now that I have reviewed both the French and English Hansards as well as the electronic media, I cannot make any charge and I am not making any charge, but it is rather interesting that the English Hansard reads quite differently from the French Hansard. The question had to do with jobs and with the need in Atlantic Canada to stop putting money into permanent long-term job opportunities and is an interesting one.

The question raised by the hon. member for Richelieu appears at page 414 of Hansard for April 25, 1980 and reads as follows:

> Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. I should like to know what the intentions of the government are with regard to the future of escort ships in Canada.

That question was planted, there is no question about that. The reply given by the Minister of National Defence reads as follows:

> Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member brings up the matter considering the updating of our Canadian armed forces, which process is making great strides, the purchase of fighter aircraft and probably, in the near future, that of other material. With regard to the ships we must purchase for the Canadian navy, I think it is important to mention that the Quebec shipyards will certainly benefit the most considering that we have two shipyards which need help very badly, and like other parts of Canada the situation can certainly be improved.

That alone raises the question of whether or not the government has abandoned the time-honoured principle of tendering with respect to public service contracts in this area. But what disturbed me more than that is the record, and I wanted to check because it is not the way I heard it. My understanding of the other language is certainly not the best, as hon. members in this chamber will attest, but it is not without some knowledge. At page 415 of the French edition of Hansard it reads "les plus favorisés". To me those words mean "the most favoured"; I repeat, "the most favoured".

What does that have to do with employment? It does not have anything to do with employment per se, but it does have to do with the morality of a government who, with a simple statement, can write off four Atlantic provinces, the province of British Columbia and all of the shipyards of the Great Lakes. I ask, why was this done? Because the night before on television the shipyard workers said Yes and presented a petition to René Lévesque that said Yes. How do they counter that? By kicking Atlantic Canada in the ass.

An hon. Member: Order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: Do you want to talk about morality? Do you want to talk about national unity?

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Forrestall: Do you want to talk about jobs and job creation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, we are once again witnessing a case of unparliamentary language being used in this chamber by a member on the other side.

An hon. Member: Apologize.

An hon. Member: Retract.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have to inform hon. members that I have been involved in other matters. I rely on the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and if in fact his language was unparliamentary, he might care to withdraw it.

● (1710)

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to withdraw. What I said was that this government, their morality and apparent concern for parts and regions of this country was submerged in the question of the referendum, and perhaps under certain circumstances rightly so. As a matter of fact, it has been a kick in the rear end. I used the other word, in the "ass". I mean it with respect to them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: They have lost sight. I will withdraw the remark if it is unparliamentary; I doubt very much that it is. I almost put it the other way, that the asses themselves have ignored the rest of Canada.

What does this have to do with jobs and employment? Nothing directly. However, it clearly indicates to the rest of Canada that it is the intention of this government, if you will, to ignore regional disparity, to not pay any particular attention to very, very high unemployment in some regions of this country. I am speaking here about Atlantic Canada.

For the first time since before the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, Mr. Diefenbaker, led a government, there was no mention in the throne speech of regional disparity. For the first time there was no commitment in the throne speech to those regions of Canada that suffer extensively from high and chronic unemployment and from high and chronic underemployment.

The programs represented by this bill do much for our young people. This is just one bill, but there are a number of programs that are good. However, in terms of bringing Atlantic Canada into the mainstream of Canadian society, enabling our people to begin to pay their bills, I suggest to the government and hon. members opposite that this type of program is just ad hoc, short term, gap filling and does nothing.

One hundred permanent jobs will do more to correct the problem of disparity and to enhance national unity in Atlantic Canada than a thousand one or two-month jobs. You cannot build a future and a family cannot buy or build a home with a part-time job or with government handouts; it does not work. That is what we have here. I am not critical of the bill but what it is symptomatic of—that we keep putting band-aids on a very serious problem facing Canadians.

What else did we do about jobs? There is an opportunity available to this government to very quickly create an atmosphere in this country within which 25,000 to 30,000 new jobs could be created in the marine and related fields. I am talking about the establishment and creation of a Canadian merchant marine, a program supported by former ministers of transport; by Mr. Marchand, now in the other place, and by Otto Lang, who has gone back to private industry. Somebody sent him back there, I am not sure who.

An hon. Member: Sensible prairies.

Mr. Forrestall: There was also the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in the last government. Indeed, under the last government a process of industrial consultation, development of cabinet papers, the development of positions, methods and ways of creating the type of atmosphere which would be conductive to the re-creation of a Canadian merchant marine went a long, long way. Indeed, if it had not been for the defeat of the government, in all likelihood by now there would be in front of this chamber or ready to come into this chamber proposals which would have made that a reality.

In terms of 25,000 to 35,000 new jobs, the cost is $3.5 billion. Hon. members laugh at that. We paid $3.5 billion to $4 billion to offshore cartels to move our imports and exports. Why are we not using that money to pay Canadians on board the ships, to build ships in Canadian shipyards, to repair Canadian ships in Canadian shipyards and to protect our waters north of 60 degrees through Canadian industrial effort and entrepreneurship? We have not done any of these things.

A good start has been made. I am talking about jobs. This is the type of permanent long-term job-creation program that we need. There was no mention of it in the throne speech. I hope we can construe that as meaning that the work done to date and the progress made by the former government and by officials of Transport Canada is such that there is no need to mention it, that in fact it is virtually a fait accompli and will be before us in a matter of time. I hope that is the interpretation. If, on the other hand, the government has abandoned that program, they can be called to task. It would demonstrate that they wasted their time on ad hockery and have not paid any attention to those areas which will create the type of long-term permanent jobs that we need in this country if we are to grow.

There is just one other area. Where does the question of a Canadian merchant marine stand? Is this government going to go ahead with it or has it abandoned it? More important than that, when are we going to find out from them? There are upwards of 20,000 jobs directly involved in the establishment of a Canadian merchant marine if we only look at moving 10 per cent of the goods we produce for export and the goods we import. If we ever got to 100 per cent, we would have a very, very viable industry. Governments would have taken a very positive step to enable the Atlantic provinces to begin to pay their bills, to get out from under the burden of transfer arrangements which are too high. They depress our capacity to expand.

Development of the Canadian merchant marine would add another dimension. I will mention this in two ways. The Liberal administration prior to the present one had started to explore with the province of Nova Scotia the possibility of a sub-agreement within DREE under the general development agreement with that province for the establishment in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of an ocean industries park dedicated to marine and marine-related activity.

With respect to the one in Nova Scotia, it had already attracted 25 to 30 very serious inquiries from new industries dealing with new technology related to the sea. Under the Clark administration, these proposals from the previous Liberal government were brought forward. They were developed, found to be sound and an agreement was prepared and drawn up. It would have been ready for signing by the middle of last December.

Where is that agreement? Is it the intention of the government to go ahead with that, because 22 of those 25 to 30 inquiries would have produced a little over 900 new jobs. They were the types of jobs that would have led to the development of exportable technology in Atlantic Canada.

Where is the sub-agreement so that we can put the infrastructure in place? I am not talking about that now in Canada. I am talking about attracting to Canada technology that we can develop and export. That is what we need.

What can come out of the F-18 in terms of exportable technology? What exportable technology have we acquired in Canada in the last 30 or 40 years in the branch plant economy we run? How much exportable technology have the great multinationals, our friends to the south or from the United Kingdom or western Europe, left with us? What base have they given us from which we can develop exports and create Canadian jobs and bring dollars back to Canada? I suggest it has been very, very little and that very few jobs have been created by foreign multinational companies allowing us to develop technology to the point at which we can resell it. No, what technology they brought into this country was just sufficient to meet their own market needs here, you can be sure, not for re-export in competition, in many instances, with their own parent companies.

So we have to do these things. The incentives are great but they are short term. This motion asks for an extension of the bill for one year. What do we do next spring? What do we do next fall? If there is oil off the east coast of Canada, maybe we can develop the dollars we need to start paying our bills. Maybe we can begin reducing the need for government-to-government transfers. Maybe we can begin to reduce government-to-people transfers by way of unemployment insurance, welfare and that type of thing.

I say "maybe" because we do not know whether the oil is there or not. We have been counting on it for four or five years and so has the government, hoping it will bail them out and that no further action will be needed. But it is not good enough. I do not want to gamble that there is enough wealth out there to create the type of permanent employment we need and stimulate the flow of dollars which would get us out of this transfer of funds grip in which we are held. It is like claustrophobia; it closes around one, takes away initiative and dulls the imagination. Obviously it has dulled the imagination of the government, otherwise we would not be here discussing what is essentially a housekeeping measure.

There is another area I wish to touch on and it has directly to do with job creation. What happened to the $50 million for Atlantic Canada which was in the budget of my hon. friend from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)? What happened to the $14 million for small craft harbour improvements? That money was intended to ensure that our fishing industry would have safer harbours to use.

An hon. Member: What budget?

Mr. Forrestall: The hon. member asks "what budget?" The budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) reintroduced here with one or two minor exceptions the other night. How can the hon. member stand up in front of his constituents and look them in the face? If it comes to that, how does he shave in the morning? Isn't the hon. member just a little ashamed of himself? Wait until he goes back to his constituents next fall and they ask him, "How come I am paying $1.50 for gasoline?"

We had a program in place and I will give the House a small example. I have 15 or 20 fishermen fishing out of Chezzetcook Harbour along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia. Plans were made to dredge the entrance to that harbour so that they could get in to the inner station in times of storm or to unload, so life would be a little easier for them. Forty-eight hours after the defeat of the government on February 18, somebody here in Ottawa—and I suspect it was the Minister of Finance or one of his henchmen responsible for political matters in Atlantic Canada or Nova Scotia—had that program cancelled. "We didn't promise it; it was something the Tories promised and couldn't deliver, so cancel it and send the money down to South West Nova, between there and the riding of the Minister of Finance, where 90 per cent of the maintenance money and new money for harbours and breakwaters and port improvements has gone in recent years." Anyway, the program was cancelled. What has that got to do with jobs? It was cancelled in the same way as the $13 million for small craft harbour improvements was cancelled by this government, simply because they do not care, they do not need the money there; they would prefer to use it as an offset with respect to the cost of moving a uranium plant already established in one part of Canada, in the province of Ontario, in the Port Hope area, up to northern Ontario.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Give a cheer for that! Be proud of that! It is my money that you wasted.

An hon. Member: Fifteen million!

Mr. Forrestall: It is his money. It is your constituents' money. It is also money belonging to constituents in British Columbia and Newfoundland. But members over there do not care about it. Look at that expression! It is pure, absolute gloating. She has been here only a few months and she has got that expression. And how long did it take her to get it? Look at her! Did it take years to get it? Well, it will settle in, we know. We now know what is the hon. member's approach to the morality of government. "Yours by divine right, to hell with the taxpayer, it's only money".

Mr. Speaker, I started to talk about fishermen. I want to say one or two words in conclusion about job creation. Last week in Nova Scotia along the eastern shore we experienced one of those natural phenomena which, thank God, occur only once every ten years or so in which there is a combination of a surface storm and what the fishermen call a seabed storm. A week ago last Saturday the fishermen along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia set traps in readiness for the 1980 lobster season. About 50,000 traps were set. A storm developed in the early part of last week. To describe its ferocity I might say it cost the lives of three fishermen, their boat and their equipment. The fishermen I have talked to personally, the ones I have surveyed, put 2,309 traps in the water a week ago last Sunday. I am talking, now, of just 14 lobster men out of some 300. Mr. Speaker, 2,072 of those traps, out of 2,309, were completely destroyed. In a good lobster season a trap will produce 100 pounds of lobsters, bringing to the fishermen between $2.50 and $3 a pound depending on the market. That cash is gone.

When it came to my attention last Thursday that the storm was abating to the point at which the fishermen could get out to check their traps, I got in touch with the office of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc). The people there were not even aware a storm had occurred. I alerted them to the fact and asked that an assessment of the damage be started as soon as was reasonably possible—which was the following day, just last Friday.

By yesterday morning nothing had been done. By this morning there seemed to be a general awareness that upwards of 300 fishermen had lost their means of livelihood for the next four or five months. There was no program to do anything about it, no indication of any special effort to go out and help these fishermen find lobster trap replacements, no indication of whether or not there might possibly be available to them some interim financial help to buy traps, and no consideration had been given until early this morning to whether the government would even consider extending the lobster season.

I mention this because obviously it is a very serious problem to lobstermen from the Halifax harbour down to at least Port Bickerton, and as you move further east along the shore, the losses seem to go down, as you can tell from these figures, of 250 traps set 226 are lost, of 220 set 210 lost, of 250 set 200 lost, of 120 set 100 lost, and of 128 set 103 lost or damaged beyond repair. No action was taken by the federal government. The fisheries protection officers in the area were becoming aware of it by last week, but there was no intervention, no special direction, no care and no concern from this government for the livelihood of men who have to ply the seas for their living.

It is the same attitude they have to jobs—"give them a handout." That is all you have in northern Ontario from this government. All you got was a handout, and do not ever make a mistake about that. They will give you hundreds of millions of dollars, they do not care about it. Do you know what it is? In job creation, they gave us $44 million three or four years ago to put in a water infrastructure program to service the city of Halifax. Of that $44 million, within ten days of the documents being signed, over $40 million was being spent back here in Quebec and Ontario. They stand up in the House and say, "We just gave you $44 million, what do you want?" We say we want jobs so we can start paying our own way, so we are not the poor cousins.

It was interesting to hear the member from British Columbia speak about the rough time they are having. They are having it, no question about that. Our situation is exactly the opposite to theirs. For every government to person transfer in terms of the total stimulation of dollars in British Columbia, where for us it is 64 cents of the transfer dollar, for them it is the exact opposite. For every 64 cents which the federal government pumps in there in terms of pensions, unemployment, or government-to-government transfers, they are producing $1.64 of new wealth. So that is just the gap.

They should keep up their good work and fight for their own provinces, but in the doing of it let them remember that there are four provinces and the eastern part of the province of Quebec where underemployment and unemployment are serious, chronic problems facing this country. Those problems will not be addressed by short-term, ad hoc approaches to employment. We must, as a nation, start to be a little imaginative; we must begin to look at areas such as natural resources and renewable resources, areas where our dollars will have a better opportunity to create long-term permanent jobs. Until we have done that, you will have as a burden around the necks of Canadian taxpayers the million or million and a half people living east of Quebec City. I do not think that does anything for national unity and I do not think it serves us well, but we do not do anything about it and I think that is regrettable.

If I have a hope for the next four years, it is probably that in terms of jobs, of job creation, this chamber will come to recognize and will be able to bring to bear on governments a type of awareness and realization that, if we do not move, we will create third and fourth generation people in all or parts of five of our provinces whose lives will have been touched directly by some form of welfare payment from the 1930s through the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. We are now dealing with fourth generation people who are growing up, coming through the schools, who will be underemployed, who will spend a large part of their lives on unemployment insurance or some other form of government-to-people transfer. Surely as Canadians, surely as a responsible House, we can use our imagination and can redress this so that it does not become an accepted fact in the Canadian way of life.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State, Mines): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member had alluded to an announcement that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) made last Friday about the moving of a refinery to a section of the province to which I am very close, I would like to begin by recounting something that happened to me this past weekend. I live in a very remote area of northern Ontario. I was wakened very early in the morning by a cacophony of sound which I found quite startling. At first I thought I was sitting in the House of Commons facing the hon. member and his colleagues. But no, it was a flock of geese, and I thought to myself: even they know when it is time to move north.

The hon. member has, in the same breath, justified the move. It was not only a political move—I deny that—it was a logical move. It was a move which meant that this government is standing by its policy to refine where we mine, to carry on further processing of our natural resources. I find it a purely logical move, a move that will strengthen the regional economic base of northern Ontario. I am proud of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: Canadian youth suffer much more than their fair share of existing unemployment. They account for almost half the total unemployment figure. The employment tax credit program has been a useful means of helping young people gain a foothold in the work force. About 55 per cent of the participants to date have been in the 25 or under age group, split almost equally between men and women.

There is substantial evidence to indicate that the early labour force experience of individuals has a significant bearing on their later employment and income record. Jobs secured through ETCP, incidentally, have a fair chance of becoming permanent. The hon. member will note that particularly in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Ontario, Manitoba, and Alberta, more than half the employers have indicated that the newly created jobs would survive beyond the 52-week maximum for earning tax credits. In Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec, more than 47 per cent felt that most of the jobs would survive, while the figure was 41 per cent in British Columbia. In the fiscal year 1979-80, 39,000 agreements were signed, and a total of about 51,000 Canadians were placed in jobs because of it. Small businesses employing 20 or fewer signed 77 per cent of all agreements, and 40 per cent of those were employers with a maximum of five in their normal work force. Something that was very important to me was that for women the program was an important source of jobs. Women represented 34 per cent of all placements.

The extended program, and new initiatives that will be announced soon, will take into account the need to place women in jobs, as well as others who may experience difficulty in entering the labour force. On the average, 88 per cent of the Atlantic region take-up was from small firms. In the prairies small companies represented 85 per cent of participants. In British Columbia the figure was 82 per cent, while it was 77 per cent in Ontario, and 72 per cent in Quebec. Distribution of jobs placed 51 per cent in manufacturing, 20 per cent in retailing and wholesaling, and 12 per cent in service industries. Machinery and fabricating occupations supplied the openings for 43 per cent of the new employees, while 15 per cent worked in clerical jobs, and 7 per cent in sales.

Last year just over 100 public servants managed the program. That is one of the reasons why employers like this program. They have told us quite plainly that it is because there is very little paperwork involved, just two one-page forms to be completed by the employer. There is an optional third sheet which is designed to simplify procedures further. But on the whole it works very quickly, very efficiently and well on both sides.

Employment and unemployment patterns vary widely in Canada. The employment tax credit program, successful though it is, cannot meet all the needs of the labour force in the country. The extension of ETCP is an interim measure, but one that needs immediate help. This government is developing other employment measures which will be presented to the House very soon. They will be measures which address the diversity of this country and will be sensitive to the needs and opportunities in all regions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to extend the employment tax credit program for one year. It was first brought forward in 1978. It provides tax credits to private employers for creating additional or incremental employment. It provides for a credit to employers from $1.50 an hour in low unemployment areas to $2 an hour in high unemployment areas for those employers who make use of this program. Its objective is to provide 50,000 additional jobs at a cost of approximately $100 million.

Given the magnitude of the unemployment situation in this country, it seems to us, at a time when our unemployment could be compared to a major epidemic of pneumonia that should be treated with the most modern types of antibiotics, that the government proposes instead to use a mustard plaster to deal with our unemployment. Let us look at what the situation is. The latest figures for unemployment show, according to Statistics Canada, that in March of this year we had 969,000 people unemployed and an unemployment rate of 8.6 per cent. That is one of the highest, if not actually the highest rate of unemployment of any of the industrialized countries in the western world. Those are the official figures, but it has been estimated that the real figure for unemployment is not 969,000 but probably 1.5 million unemployed.

For example, in Newfoundland where the official figure for unemployment is 31,000, in fact there are probably close to 75,000 unemployed; in Nova Scotia where the official figure for unemployment is 40,000, in fact there are probably 65,000 unemployed; and in New Brunswick where the official figure for unemployment is 37,000, in fact there are probably 80,000 unemployed. The reason for the wide discrepancy in the figures is very simple. It is because Statistics Canada counts as unemployed only those people who are unemployed and actively looking for work. In many of the slow growth areas of this country, such as the Atlantic provinces and the Interlake area of Manitoba, there is simply no use looking for work because there are no jobs available.

In fact the situation is much worse than I have indicated because we have seen in recent weeks undoubtedly the beginnings of what will be major lay-offs. The three major multinational automobile manufacturers, General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler, have each announced substantial lay-offs in the last few weeks. I will not go into the details of these because the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) dealt with that a couple of days ago. But lay-offs in the automobile industry created by a drop in sales of more than 10 per cent over last year mean inevitably major lay-offs in the automobile parts industry, the glass industry, the rubber industry and the plastics industry, all of which have as their major customer the automobile industry.

It has been estimated that in Ontario one in ten workers work in plants directly or indirectly involved with the production of automobiles. When that industry goes into the kind of crisis it is facing now, we can expect even more lay-offs than we have had up to the present time. What is true of the automobile industry is also true of the construction and forest products industries.

Housing starts are down. In most parts of Canada the building of commercial property has virtually ceased, as has the building of industrial plants and factories. All of these fields are in a period of slow or no-growth which, of course, means more lay-offs than we have had.

What is the answer of the government to the major crisis facing it with almost 1.5 million unemployed and 40 per cent of the unemployed being young people aged 15 to 24? What is the answer of this government? Well, I will come to the answers which we did not get from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) a few nights ago, but let me first look at the comments of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who introduced the bill we are now discussing. A few days ago he was reported, in an article entitled "Job-Creation Programs Will Centre On Young, Women, Handicapped" which appeared in The Globe and Mail, as follows:

> Employment and Immigration Minister Lloyd Axworthy says a job-creation package to be introduced in three to four weeks will contain measures to prepare high unemployment groups—women, young people, the handicapped—to meet skill shortages in the labour market.

Then the article continued:

> Mr. Axworthy refused to say whether the Liberal government would spend more on job creation than the Tory government, but suggested it would not, stressing that Liberal programs would use funds more efficiently.

I am not being critical, but if the private sector is not creating new jobs and, indeed, is reducing the jobs it provides, then there will be more unemployed. The private sector only produces when it sells its products and makes a profit. I am not critical of them; that is why they are in operation. If the private sector is not going to provide more jobs in the coming year, and the public sector is not going to put more money into job creation, then obviously we are going to have much more unemployment in the coming year than we had last year and the unemployment rate will go up substantially.

● (1750)

A few days ago we had what was really a budget speech smuggled into the throne speech debate by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. What did he say? We know what he did not say. We know that he ignored all the promises made by members of his party, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) when he was the financial critic for the Liberal party in opposition. He ignored all the promises they made while in opposition, and by his silence he poured cold water on the implications of all those promises they made in opposition.

Let me illustrate that my judgment of what the minister said in his speech of a few days ago is not just criticism by a politician in an opposition party, which I am. Columnists who write about what goes on in Parliament and analyze what members of government say, were unanimous in their judgment that the minister had nothing but gloom and doom for the coming year.

Wayne Cheveldayoff stated in The Globe and Mail of March 27, 1980, reporting on a study issued by the Conference Board:

> Because of the U.S. economic slowdown, Canada's economy will show no real growth in 1980, the board . . . says in its regular quarterly economic forecast.
> As a result, employment growth will slow down and unemployment will rise from the latest monthly rate of 7.4 per cent.

It will probably be more than that; probably over 8 per cent. The article continues:

> On the inflation front, the worsened U.S. trend will spill over into Canada and the year-to-year rise in the consumer price index, currently less than 9.5 per cent, will rise to 10.1 per cent by Christmas. For 1980 as a whole, inflation will be 9.7 per cent, up from 9.1 per cent last year.
> The board believes this forecast to be a minimum because it has assumed a $1-a-barrel rise in the wellhead price of oil later this year. If oil prices rise faster, so will the inflation rate.

I am sure, as I am sure every member in this House is, that oil prices will go up more than we have calculated.

Don McGillivray in the Financial Times, April 28, 1980, wrote:

> Finance Minister Allan MacEachen revealed last week that the economy is in worse shape than when the Crosbie budget came down last year—and the Liberals have even fewer clues than the Tories about what to do to improve it.

Then he goes on to write:

> It is obvious, of course, that a September budget—

He is assuming, on the basis of what the minister has already indicated, that we will not get a budget until next September. The article states:

> —a September budget will do little to change the adverse economic projections made by MacEachen. Since December, the finance department's forecast for economic growth in 1980 has been cut to a stagnation level of 0.5 per cent from 1 per cent.

That 1 per cent had been previously calculated. David Crane in the Toronto Star April 22, 1980, writes:

> Our economy is headed for tough times, with both inflation and unemployment getting much worse during the next few months. This was the grim message Finance Minister Allan MacEachen delivered in his surprise economic statement in the House of Commons last night.
> What he didn't tell the country is what he intends to do about it, or even when he plans to come up with a budget that spells out his economic strategy.

Later he writes:

> Turning to the grim state of the economy, MacEachen said there would be virtually no growth, probably just 0.5 per cent this year, while unemployment would average 8 per cent and the consumer price index would rise 10 per cent.

Then Mr. Crane goes on to state substantially what I said a few minutes ago:

> Many sectors of the economy will be weak. These include: Export industries such as lumber, mineral products and autos; residential construction, which has been dealt a solar-plexus punch by high interest rates; government spending on goods and services; and the inventories of raw materials, parts and finished goods that industry keeps on hand to meet future demand.

That is the situation. We are staring at 11 per cent inflation, with less than 1 per cent growth in production. We will now have to contend with record post-war unemployment this year. Manufacturing is off, and is expected to remain so or get worse during most of 1980. We are going to face unemployment of 8.5 per cent, with an increase of approximately 135,000 more unemployed than we had last year.

It has been estimated by the Purchasing Management Association of Canada, which monitors manufacturing industry hiring each month, that its members began laying off employees in November for the first time in at least a year. The association noted that new orders were falling off sharply and that production declines were noted by 31 per cent of the companies surveyed, or roughly twice the percentage of those who reported increases. The association stated this was another turnaround from early 1979 experience. It also noted that industrial production in Canada, which moved ahead smartly during the third quarter of 1979 after declining over the previous three months, was back on the downgrade as of last November.

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but there have been some consultations with my colleagues, the leaders of the opposition parties in the House, and I would ask for unanimous consent to revert to motions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

CONCURRENCE IN MAIN AND SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would ask for unanimous consent to withdraw motion No. 2 under government business, to be replaced by the following motion that I shall read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Pinard: I must say, sir, that after consultation there seems to be unanimous consent that this motion be put now and agreed on. If I may do so, I would move, seconded by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais):

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, the Supplementary Estimates (A), 1980-1981, shall be reported or be deemed to have been reported from the several standing committees no later than May 9, 1980;

Business of Supply

That when the House reaches government orders on May 13, 1980, the Speaker shall put, forthwith and successively, without amendment or debate, every question that may be necessary to dispose of any motion relating to interim supply, the said supplementary estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any opposed item in the said supplementary estimates and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 72, for the passage at the first and second reading stages of the bill based thereon and all of the time provided for the consideration of government orders on May 14 and May 15, 1980, shall be allotted to the consideration of the committee of the whole stage of the bill and that all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said bill shall be put and decided without debate or amendment no later than fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of daily adjournment on May 15, 1980; and

● (1800)

That, for the year 1980, Standing Order 58 shall be amended as follows:

(i) by replacing in section (5) thereof the word "five" with the word "eighteen" and by deleting the words "Thirteen additional days shall be allotted to the business of supply in the period ending not later than June 30";

(ii) by replacing in section (9) thereof the word "two" with the word "four";

(iii) by replacing in section (14) thereof the words "March 1 of the then expiring fiscal year" with the words "April 30"; and provided:

(ii) that the remaining six allotted days shall be divided into three periods of two days each and that not less than twenty-four hours before the first day in each such period, members in opposition to the government shall give notice of the name of a department or agency the estimates of which are to be considered in Committee of the Whole on the aforementioned bill during the two day period; and

(iii) that on the second day of each such period the hours of sitting shall be from 2 p.m. to 12 a.m., there shall be no private members' business, the evening interruption shall not take place and proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 40 shall be suspended; and

(iv) that at the specified time of adjournment on the last allotted day the Speaker shall interrupt proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the aforementioned bill at all remaining stages without further debate or amendment in the same manner mutatis mutandi as provided in section (10) of Standing Order 58.

This is the new motion which has been put with unanimous consent and agreed to by all parties.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) the government House leader is quite right. There have been some discussions with respect to how we might do two things: satisfy the necessary problems which the President of the Privy Council faces with respect to estimates on the one hand and, on the other hand, to satisfy what we believe are the legitimate rights of the opposition, to deal with certain ministers in terms of the operations of their departments as revealed in the estimates, on the floor of the House of Commons, rather than in committees, as was mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

I believe, as it has been described, that this motion provides a road map by which we might accomplish those two things.

There are some minuscule matters which are well known to the President of the Privy Council and to the House leader for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that would be subject to some discussion in order to get us along the road. For instance, there is the question of how we would deal with the situation in which a minister might have completed his examination by the House prior to the end of, let us say, the first day period or prior to the end of the second day period, and what might happen then.

This motion does provide the essence of the agreement, to establish in a different way some of the things that we would like to have established. It follows generally the spirit of the amendment that was put by the hon. member for St. John's West, except for the unlimited time clause. We are prepared to accept the motion on that basis. In paragraph 3 on page 2 there is reference to 12 a.m., and I would like to make it clear that it was never part of the discussions that we would run all night until 12 noon. The 12 a.m. refers to 12 midnight, just so there is no doubt.

We have made some progress. We accept the terms and are prepared to live with them. Of course, as we go along the road outlined by this road map, I am satisfied that any questions raised can be resolved by discussion in good faith.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend my two friends, the other House leaders, on their willingness yesterday to have that day's debate adjourned so that we could have the consultations which have taken place since that time. May I, as one who watched these two gentlemen give and take—I was the innocent third party as it were—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Innocent!

Mr. Knowles: —commend each of them for the give and take atmosphere and for bargaining in good faith. It was a commendable exercise, and I offer my commendation to my two fellow House leaders.

We have come up with a good arrangement for this unusual situation. I believe that it meets the points which were pressed by both sides. I am also hopeful that, as an experiment, it might give us some guidance for further thought about how we handle the estimates in 1981-82, 1991-92, and so on. All told, it is a good agreement, and we are prepared to give it our support. I trust that we can now make it a House order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to point out that I am pleased that both my colleagues are satisfied with the agreement and I hope we will continue to work in a spirit of co-operation so that on one hand the proceedings of the House will be efficient and, on the other hand, the rights of the opposition will be respected.

So that is a fine example we are giving today of the agreement which can be reached when we negotiate together and in good faith, and we will continue to work, in that spirit.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As I understand it, the motion put forward by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) yesterday has been withdrawn by unanimous consent, the order relating thereto has been discharged, a new motion has been substituted with the unanimous consent of the House, and hon. members are now prepared to give unanimous consent to making this new motion an order. Do I have agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.08 p.m. the House took recess.

• (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy, that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I spoke before the dinner time adjournment I put on record the sad state of our economy, the fact that unemployment is close to one million, according to figures published by Statistics Canada and that our rate of inflation and the cost of living in 1980 are likely to increase by 10 per cent, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). We are facing both high unemployment and a sharp increase in the cost of living in 1980.

I also put on the record the assessment of a number of people who write regularly in Canadian newspapers on economic matters, of the speech made by the Minister of Finance some days ago during the throne speech debate. At that time I said the government has offered no programs, no proposals, and no solutions to the problems we face. Now I want to put on the record the criticisms which the spokesman for the official opposition before the last election, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), made in the short period when the Conservative party formed the government. I shall compare what they said then with what they are saying now. The party to which I belong has often been accused of promising people things which cannot be implemented, and we have been told we can promise those things because we are not likely to form a government in the near future.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is right.

Mrs. Bégin: That is very true.

Mr. Orlikow: If there is one party in this country that should know what it can do for the people of Canada, what the economy can bear, and what governments can do, Mr. Speaker, it is the Liberal party. After all, they have been the government of this country for most of the last 60 years.

Let us look at some of the things the Liberals promised the people of Canada, in Parliament, or on the campaign trail a few months ago. I shall put on the record some of the things they said, and compare them with the silence of the government, particularly that of the Minister of Finance.

An interview with the leaders of the three major parties was reported in The Globe and Mail on February 13, 1980, in part, as follows:

If, for instance, the private sector is not creating enough jobs to put the labor force to work, then I see no reason at all why the government shouldn't take a larger proportion of the gross national product in order to create jobs—

Mr. Speaker, obviously, the private sector is not producing the jobs, yet what do we get from the government? The Minister of Finance offers virtually nothing. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has made a proposal to spend $100 million, which will reduce the rate of unemployment, at most, by .5 per cent.

The Prime Minister is further reported in the same interview as having this to say about high interest rates:

—we would keep interest rates down and we would make sure that they go lower by controlling inflation—

When the Conservatives formed the government the interest rate was 14 per cent; since the Liberals formed the government it has gone up by around 2 per cent.

An article in the Toronto Star of February 11, 1980, reports the Prime Minister talking about how the Liberals would manage the economy. He said:

I would want to manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would in fact come down, not because of act of government intervention, but because the economy would be administered in a sounder way.

Yet the Minister of Finance is forecasting more unemployment in the coming year and a 10 per cent rate of inflation.

The Toronto Star on February 13, before his party formed the government, reported the Prime Minister's address to the Advertising and Sales Club of Toronto, as follows:

We do not condemn Mr. Clark for failing to solve the problems of inflation, unemployment and high interest rates in six months. That would have been an unfair and unrealistic expectation.

We condemn him for budgeting to make our problems worse. Nowhere is that more true than in Ontario.

The Clark budget, if we had not defeated it, would have jolted Ontario with such a sharp increase in energy costs as to bring economic growth to a virtual standstill—

● (2010)

That was in February. Here we are in April. What did the Liberal Minister of Finance tell us? He told us there would be no growth at all in this coming year, no growth at all in Canada. But when you realize that in Alberta and Saskatchewan there are quite sharp increases in the GNP, it means in fact a reduction in the GNP in Ontario. That is the difference between the Liberals when they are in opposition and the Liberals when they are in office.

I want to turn now to some of the things which were said by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, whose bill we are now debating. If there is one person who is an example of the Liberal party it is the present Minister of Employment and Immigration because there is such a contrast between what he says when he is in opposition and how little he says when he is in government. I have a few of the things that he has said, in front of me. On January 10, dealing with housing, he said this:

The first requirement to respond to immediately is high interest rates.

We know what has happened to mortgage interest rates since this government took office. As reported in the Toronto Star for January 11, the following appeared:

Liberal housing critic, Lloyd Axworthy said yesterday "a range of alternatives" on housing were presented to the Liberal economic platform committee, with a shelter allowance scheme as one option.

Where is that shelter allowance scheme?

Mr. Deans: Where was the platform?

Mr. Orlikow: My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), asks where was the platform. Unfortunately the people of Canada did not really press them on that.

Let us continue to look at some more remarks made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration with regard to housing. He was noted when he was in the Manitoba legislature for the constructive things which he said about redeveloping the core of our cities, and how we ought to do things in the housing field. I have here a speech which the minister made concerning the mortgage tax credit bill. This is dated November, 1979. He is talking about the Conservative proposal for the mortgage interest tax credit plan. This is what he said:

The Minister of Finance likes to say he is prepared to take recommendations and propositions. He has just received one, put some money into first-time home owners; put some money into writing down interest rates for those who have to renegotiate their mortgages; give bridge financing so that people can get into the housing market or stay in it. The major beneficiaries of this program are not first-time home owners but existing home owners who already have large mortgages at low interest rates.

At the present time in the city of Winnipeg, a city which both the minister and I represent, there is a petition being circulated by people who are facing just the problem which the present minister was talking about. They are this year in the process of renegotiating their mortgages which they took out five years ago. And five years ago the interest rate on their mortgages was about 11 per cent. Now it is 15 per cent, 16 per cent or 17 per cent. The minister has power now, and suddenly he has lost his voice and suddenly we hear nothing from him. He was great in opposition, but now he has disappeared.

Mr. Deans: He has disappeared completely.

Mr. Orlikow: And he is not even in the House.

On October 29, 1979, we found the present minister asking the following question:

By this time, the Minister of Finance must be aware that as a consequence of the high interest rate policy of his government, thousands of Canadian families are facing the horrendous prospect of renegotiating their mortgages at a time when rates have gone up anywhere from 30 per cent to 50 per cent. To put it in other terms, where mortgage rates have gone up, carrying costs have risen as much as $1,500 a year.

Since the minister asked that question in October, 1979, interest rates have gone up 2 per cent or 3 per cent, and carrying charges on an ordinary mortgage have gone up another $1,000 a year. What is the minister going to do about it? Nothing, because the Liberal party has now achieved office and it will be in power for three or four years so it can forget the promises that it made at that time.

Here I have a quotation from Hansard for November 6, 1979, when the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce spoke about the Conservatives. At page 1029 the following appears:

The present record level of interest rates, which is supported by Conservative policy, cuts back the ability of Canadians to buy goods and services of all kinds—cars, homes, food and clothing, everything people need. These high interest rates cut back the ability of factories and businesses generally to expand, to create more production and jobs. These high interest rates limit the ability of business, especially small business, simply to operate at basic non-inflationary levels. Therefore these high interest rates mean losses of production and jobs now and over the coming winter months.

Now that it is the government, what answer does the Liberal party give to these high interest rates which were and are driving small business to the wall? The answer is a tax credit for $100 million. It would be laughable if it were not so tragic.

The same Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce further on in his speech said this:

These high interest rates are also bringing the housing and construction industry to a halt, with a potential loss of thousands of jobs in that sector alone.

Of course it was doing that then. It is even worse now that the interest rates are up 2 to 2½ per cent more than they were when the Conservatives were the government. I could go on and on. This is the record of that Liberal government.

Mr. Rae: Don't stop.

Mr. Orlikow: I would have to make speeches as long as the former member from Nickel Belt made a couple of years ago; I would have to go on for days and days.

An hon. Member: Where is he now?

Mr. Orlikow: Hon. members on the Liberal side are asking where he is now.

Mr. Deans: Where is the minister of trade?

Mr. Orlikow: I can assure these hon. members that if they do not mend their ways, and if they continue implementing what were essentially Conservative policies, as they are doing in this session, and as they are doing with this phony budget which the Minister of Finance smuggled in here a week or so ago, many of them will not be back here after the next election.

Those of us who have had experience with the Liberal party over the years are not surprised at some of the things which I have quoted today. That is the record of the Liberal party going back as far as any of us can remember. Back in the 1940s—I know that my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), is the only member of Parliament here now who was in this Parliament during the war—the then Liberal government tabled a white paper in which it set, as the objective of that government and of this country, a full employment policy. Mr. Howe was certainly not in the left wing of the Liberal party. Mr. Howe promised that the Liberal government would ensure that governments would carry out policies which would ensure full employment, not the kind of phony full employment of some of the well paid economists in this country who work for governments, teach at universities, and some of them are in this Parliament, or work for some of these foundations which are funded mostly by the big business corporations of this country.

These economists are doing very well for themselves, thank you. They have now evolved a new theory. It does not apply to them. It applies to other people. The theory is that full employment in this country is about 7 per cent or 8 per cent unemployed. Full employment is a situation where we have 7 or 8 per cent of the people in this country unemployed. That represents about a million people. Then they give us lectures about the fact that our generous unemployment insurance and welfare schemes are disincentives for people to go to work.

They want people to go to work. They do not want skilled workers such as electricians, plumbers, and machinists who are used to making $8, $9 or $10 an hour unemployed. They are angry and critical when these skilled people are unemployed. Many of them still have confidence that Liberal and Conservative governments will manage the economy so that these people will get their jobs back in the not too distant future.

Some economists and some politicians think it is terrible when these workers who have worked and earned enough money so that they can live well, be comfortable, buy a house and own a car, do not run out and get a job at the minimum wage. They find that scandalous. They think workers should do that.

For a long time it has been the basic fundamental principle in our party that this country has the manpower training, skills, education and resources, everything we require so that every person in this country who wants to, can do useful and productive work. We were not alone in that. We were ignorant enough to believe for a long time that this in fact was a principle which had been accepted by most people in this country, and by all the major political parties. We found out that is not true.

I talked about what the Liberal party said back in 1942 in 1943 when it published its white paper. Let's look at what it did not so long ago. About 17 years ago the Liberal government, headed by Mr. Pearson, established the Economic Council of Canada. They set out five objectives of economic policy for that council.

What were those objectives? The five objectives were full employment, a high rate of economic growth, reasonable stability of prices, a viable balance of payments, and an equitable distribution of rising income. Let us look at how closely we have come to achieving those objectives as set out by a Liberal government not so many years ago.

When the present Prime Minister took office in 1968, there were 360,000 unemployed, 4.6 per cent of the labour force. That was fairly close to what full employment in this country really means. If we make allowances for those who are changing jobs, moving and so on, full employment is something between 3 per cent and 4 per cent unemployed. As I said, in 1968 there were 360,000 unemployed, 4.6 per cent of the labour force. Today, under the same Prime Minister, there are 969,000 unemployed, over 8 per cent of the labour force. This government has failed in its objective set for the Economic Council of full employment.

The second objective was a high rate of economic growth. The Conference Board has predicted that there will be no economic growth at all. What that means is between 8 and 9 per cent unemployed, instead of 7½ per cent unemployed. It means a loss in production of $5 billion worth of goods and services which would have brought to governments in Canada—federal, provincial, and municipal—$2 billion in tax revenue. We have had no economic growth instead of a high rate of economic growth.

Third, reasonable stability of prices. What can I say? When the present Prime Minister instituted wage and price controls in 1975, he was going to wrestle inflation to the ground. Prices were rising, and I am speaking from memory, at about 11 per cent per year. We are now in the year 1980. Not only has the Prime Minister not wrestled inflation to the ground, but in 1980 prices are going to go up by 10 per cent.

The fourth objective was a viable balance of payments. The only reason we have anything like that is because the governor of the Bank of Canada believes that, to achieve that aim, we have to keep the value of the dollar up. In doing that, he has sacrificed all the other objectives which the government set for itself when it established the Economic Council.

If the governor of the Bank of Canada was not supporting the dollar with his highly deflationary policy, a policy of keeping the dollar up, the dollar would have gone down. Of course we would have had a good deal more economic growth, but the governor of the Bank of Canada, sitting in his glass tower and getting a very large salary, is quite prepared to put the people of Canada through the wringer. He, of course, does not suffer as a result of that.

The last objective was an equitable distribution of rising income. I do not intend to talk about that today. No one has documented what has happened in the last 25 or 30 years better than the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). She has placed on the record of Parliament and outside Parliament how completely we have failed in terms of achieving a more equitable distribution of incomes in this country.

What has happened in the last 30 years, most of which time the Liberal party formed the government, is that the share of the gross national product which goes to the lowest one-fifth of the income earners in this country has declined, and the share which goes to the top 20 per cent of the income earners has gone up.

I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that if I believed, as she did, that we ought to have a more equitable distribution of the wealth of this country, and I belonged to a government that did the exact reverse, I would give serious thought to resigning from that government.

An hon. Member: If you had principles.

Mr. Orlikow: Somebody said if I had principles. I will leave that to the conscience of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am one who thinks that she is one of the really progressive Liberals in that party. This is where we are at the present time.

I say to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that he has laboured tremendously and, instead of a mountain, he has produced a mouse. I say to him that I did not expect more from him. I do not expect more from his party and his government. I wish I could have made an entirely different speech. I wish that he would have surprised me. I wish I had to make a speech in which I congratulated him and the government for the progressive things they were proposing, for the important steps they were attempting to take in order to meet the real needs of this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow one of those great orators from the New Democratic Party. I do not think he would have been capable of making an entirely different speech. I will take pleasure a little later in making reference to some of the things hon. members of the NDP have said tonight, because I take a different view of the problems which are besetting our economy.

Before beginning my speech I want to take this opportunity, since it is the first time I am participating in debate in the Thirty-second Parliament, to extend my sincere congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, and your colleagues in the chair, and through you to Madam Speaker, on your election to the distinguished positions you now hold. I know you will discharge your duties in an excellent manner.

What we are discussing tonight is, of course, just another of those stopgap measures to which we have become accustomed over many years of Liberal rule. Yesterday we were discussing the Small Businesses Loans Act; today we are debating an employment tax credit. I see myself here in the House of Commons as a member of a team running around a very large pipe which is beginning to leak, sticking a finger in here and a finger in there, and I see no sign of any preparations being made to rebuild the crumbling foundations of the system over which those people on the other side have assumed management once again.

We are inserting ourselves at every point in this vicious circle in which we are involved, a circle which creates an inflationary mentality, a vicious circle which creates apathy and indifference on the part of so many people toward the political process, a vicious circle which destroys the confidence people once had in our ability to be one of the great nations of the world. In the bill before us we are inserting ourselves at a point at which we hope to subsidize, so to speak, the small and large businessman in his attempt to attract workers to work in his plant. There are other forms of subsidy. We can subsidize business and hope the price will stay down; we can subsidize labour and hope that its demands on the economy are less; we can subsidize consumers. It is a vicious circle, and here we are inserting ourselves once again into this whole scheme of things.

When we look around the world we wonder how we got ourselves into this mess. If I make reference to economies in other parts of the world I do so because that has become a favourite pastime among those on whom we rely to provide us with answers concerning these problems. It has become a favourite pastime to blame others for the problems we are facing. After all, they say, inflation has been imported—for instance, from the United States which has managed incredibly poorly lately—their inflation rate is higher than ours, they have an employment problem as well, and even their interest rates are higher. So, obviously, they are pushing their poor economic performance on us.

Yet I wonder why it is that other countries with whom we compete, such as West Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden, can manage a 4 per cent inflation rate, can manage without unemployment, can manage a 6 per cent interest rate. I wonder about these things because when one compares the situation of those countries with the incredible natural advantages we have here, it is mind-boggling how anyone could manage a country which is the second largest in the world so badly. Those fellows over there have managed to run our economy into the ground.

We cannot forever blame others. We have some very distinct advantages, for example, our natural resources and our well-educated manpower force—I want to talk about this later; the main theme of my speech has to do with manpower training. The capital resources of this country are almost unbelievable, but the party across the way has been preoccupied in all the years it has been in power with the distribution of wealth where there was really no wealth to distribute. Now it is hoping to create wealth out of thin air. I will take the liberty of quoting a very modern economist who lives in our country today. This is the first time he has been quoted in the House, but I am sure it will not be the last. He is a friend of mine—

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Oberle: I am quoting his definition of capital. He says this:

> Capital may be defined as subsisting in material goods, in the mental disciplines of workers, including professionals, manufacturing and commercial plants in place and functioning; goods and inventories available for markets; natural resources and the capacity to harvest and refine them; commercial, financial, political and social institutions in place and functioning.

His name is Larry Lewin and he lives in a little place called Crescent, British Columbia, where he is spending a lot of time writing down some of his ideas. He, too, has joined some of the leaders around the world in discussing some very fundamental aspects of the economies of the world, especially the need for new orders in the economies of the world respecting the new dimensions which have been added and with which we have been unable to cope over the last few years—the commodity groups, the cartels, the multi-national companies, the bigness of government, labour and corporations which are exerting such a great influence. All these things call for fundamental new ideas, and some reform of the system. But that is not what I want to talk about tonight except to the extent that it sets the stage for what I am about to say.

I was glad that one of the members of the New Democratic Party is also related in some way to the wood-converting industry. He calls himself a mill worker or a wood worker, or a logger, or whatever, from British Columbia. I welcome him to the House. Obviously he knows a lot about the industry, although one would not think so by reading his speech. I want to say a few words about the forest industry because it is an industry which is particularly hard hit by high interest rates, the decline of the construction industry, the decline in the housing market, the situation in the United States. I am talking about an industry which employs one out of every ten Canadians directly or indirectly, about an industry which produces more foreign dollars than mining, agriculture, oil and fossil fuels and fisheries combined. It is an industry known to some as the goose which has laid the golden egg.

The forest industry is in dire straits today regardless of what the hon. member from the New Democratic Party has said. The reason the industry is on the rocks is that its basic 60 per cent of income goes into some form of taxes, licences, and fees, and that it is on the receiving end every time the government has mismanaged the economy, as the governments of the United States and the governments of Canada have done over the last few years.

● (2040)

Housing starts are at an all time low and nobody has the money or the confidence in what we are doing to wish to build a new house, to build a new future, and to build generally. The wood converting industry in Canada, in comparison with the industry in the United States, has suffered badly, not just in the last few months but over the last 20 years because of incredible mismanagement by this government. The lumber industry once had 31 per cent of the world market. That position has declined to 19 per cent over the last 20 years. The United States were heavy importers of lumber from our country. They held 9 per cent of the world market 20 years ago. They have now increased to 12 per cent.

The reason for all this is that we have paid no attention whatever in this country to the renewal of our forests. We have allowed our loggers to cut, from coast to coast and every year, the equivalent of a one-mile ribbon, without anybody spending any time, providing any ideas or money to ensure that new trees are planted and that the sustained yield is ensured for future generations to continue to harvest this incredible resource which is known sometimes as the green gold. We have spent no time whatever on research and development; we have spent no time and effort on training a manpower force and training professionals to help our industry to be productive and improve our techniques in forest culture, to upgrade our techniques in improving the species on which we rely to satisfy our foreign markets.

There is an incredible job out there of thinning overpopulated forests in every province of our country. There are thousands of acres of forests that are totally unproductive because they are overpopulated. What is required is a manpower force, some machines to go in there and take out four out of every five trees, thus giving the fifth tree a chance to become a convertible item in economic terms. There is an incredible job out there to replenish and restock 60 million acres of unproductive forest land which has accumulated over the last ten years, and yet here we are talking about an unemployment crisis, talking about the wood industry laying off 6,000 people in the province of British Columbia alone.

It is for that reason that I asked, under Standing Order 43, that the minister sit down with his counterpart and talk about a partnership with the companies and the provinces and work out a deal whereby people who are now suffering, because the machines and the mills have to be shut down for a while because of being overstocked with inventory, there being nobody out there to buy it, are given an opportunity to get out into the forests to plant trees, to do some fertilizing and thin out some of our forests. This is what we should so instead of plugging the dike with this investment tax credit, and instead of paying out unemployment insurance to the tune of $130 to $150 a week.

You should tell the company that this money is available; they should keep their people working and let them do something that will be noticeable and that will be an investment in the future. But, as you know, that is too practical an idea and really does not fit into the context. After all, these people are entitled to unemployment insurance, so why should we worry about it? After all they have paid into it, we have paid into it, and the companies have paid into it, so there is nothing to worry about. In the meantime, our forests will continue to decay, they will continue to grow in abundance without us having any use from them. All this really does not make sense.

If you wanted to compare again what we are spending in our country to foster and maintain this incredible resource for future generations, let me point out that in British Columbia, a province which has probably the most advanced forest management techniques, roughly $45 are spent on an acre in our most productive forest land. Sweden, on the other hand, spends $300 an acre to do the same thing. That is why we are facing a crisis in the forest industry today. That is the crisis about which my hon. friend, who claims to know something about the forest industry, should say something. The companies no longer have the money to work with. The interest rates they are paying, and from which they are suffering because no one builds houses, affect them in other ways as well.

It is precisely at this time of the year that most companies in the country have mountains of raw materials in their yards because many of them can only log in the wintertime. Even a small company will have $2.5 million to $3 million worth of lumber sitting in the yard. Our banks have been very reluctant to lend, as you know. If a small forest company in British Columbia tried to borrow money in a chartered bank, that would have to be a trick and a half. Most of them borrow in the United States, and have to do so. I know something about that because I have been in the business for some time. Money comes from the United States, the interest rate is high, and companies have to pay interest on inventory that will not be bought for a year, so they are in dire straits; they are done for.

If it were not for the integration of these companies which have pulp, paper and other refined products, as well as plywood to some extent, to keep their logging and mill operations going, we would have very serious problems, problems so serious, in fact, that we would be debating here tonight, and probably some other nights, whether we should be bailing out the lumber industry as we are attempting to bail out the car manufacturers at present.

I cannot help but make a few comments on what has been said by my NDP friends who have a solution for all the problems. Half of them are economists, and their average age must be under 30. I think it was George Bernard Shaw who said that if you have not been a socialist by the time you are 30, you have not got a heart, but if you are a socialist after you are 30, you have not got a head.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: I could not help but think about that the other night when I saw the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) on television. He said he is not concerned about the deficit because he relates that to a percentage of the gross national product. So the $14 billion, $16 billion, $17 billion that the government needs to borrow every year does not concern him at all. He did not mention the percentage, but it is "a very small percentage of the GNP". Let me talk a little about this deficit. How does a government raise money, and when it has finished raising money and is still short, when the cheques begin to bounce at the end of the month, the unemployment insurance cheque, the welfare cheque, the pension cheque, what does the government do? Of course it can raise taxes, but you can wear out your welcome quite quickly. Good God, Canadians know all about that. Then you can go and borrow from the citizens of the country. That is done by Canada Savings Bonds. Also you can borrow from pension funds into which the citizens of the country have paid. You can use all these techniques to borrow. But this government has worn out even that welcome. There is no other place from which to borrow.

Canadians will not buy this fraud called Canada Savings Bonds any more. They are wise to this idea, they are wise to this fraud. They are not buying them any more and the government is broke. So what do they do? There is only one thing left to do—you go to the source of money. The closest place for us from which to borrow money is right across the border in New York. We are going down there hat in hand to borrow another $2.5 billion to do what should have been done, namely, pay our bills when it comes to our gasoline prices and heating oil prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: They are going to New York to borrow yet another $2.5 billion to keep floating. I wonder about these fellows in the NDP.

Mr. Forrestall: They are laughing.

Mr. Oberle: I wonder why these fellows should feel so much more comfortable owing their soul to a New York banker than owing it to the president of Exxon or the president of Shell. I would like them to tell me what the difference is.

• (2050)

When municipal leaders, provincial leaders, finance ministers and federal financial people go to New York to see a banker, they are asked all the same kinds of questions as the bankers in local communities would ask. He says, "What are you going to do to get yourself out of this fix?" By saying that, he will tell you how to run your country. Then he will say, "What do you have for collateral?" When we go down there as Canadians, we tell them we have gas, oil, lead, zinc and lumber. Of course we do. That is why we have a triple A rating. But he charges us interest as do the bankers at home. That has crippled our economy more than anything else and keeps us out of competition with nations which run a house on a balanced budget.

When we talk about constitutional reforms, I could mention some nations which have in their constitutions a provision that a government cannot overspend.

An hon. Member: Which nation?

Mr. Oberle: West Germany. When you have exhausted the taxpayers' welcome and when you have exhausted the borrowing power of the sources I have mentioned, you are finished; you are no longer bringing in any new programs. Incidentally, it is the nations which have the best social services in the world that treat their citizens best. Do you know why? It is because they do not take 30 per cent of the gross national product and pay it out in interest. They put it where it belongs. They pay it in pensions to senior citizens and they give it to native people if they have any. What will this bill do to solve some of the problems of our native people in the country, 95 per cent of whom are unemployed in some regions? I was over at the Holiday Inn just before I came here this evening. Unfortunately I could not hear what the Prime Minister was telling them, but I am quite sure they will be impressed.

I would like the fellows in the NDP to explain sometimes how this whole scheme works which they have worked out. There is another saying about a socialist: a socialist is someone who has nothing and wants to share it with everybody. They have a lot of friends over on that side of the House; that is where they are all sitting. This nation has nothing left and we are going to share it with everybody.

Many Canadians are affording themselves the time to go back and dig out the budget that was defeated on December 13. When one does that, one finds some very serious and very profound differences from how we are being treated here. We had made a commitment toward a balanced budget and to bring our situation under control within a five-year period, to the extent where at least we could finance the deficit from domestic sources so that we would not have to go begging, pad in hand, to other countries such as Switzerland, Germany, and bankers in New York, asking them to bail us out. We have all this expensive oil on the east coast, and it is politically too risky to impose an 18-cent excise tax, so they would rather run our economy into the hole by another $2.5 billion. Apparently that will get us over the hump.

When one talks about intellectual dishonesty, these are the masters of it. Incidentally this term has been used here during the last couple of weeks quite regularly. It had been used mainly in the context of what is happening in the province of Quebec right now. They are saying that René Lévesque is intellectually dishonest in posing an innocuous question about how the future of our country should be rearranged. Well, these guys are the inventors and the architects of intellectual dishonesty, because René Lévesque—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I want to advise the hon. member that the last several days, as he and many other hon. members will know, have been my initiation into the chair. The question has been whether or not certain kinds of language are unparliamentary. I do not know the answer to that. I will do some research on the subject, but I think possibly the hon. member might want to consider whether or not accusing certain members opposite, or even a group of members in the House, of intellectual dishonesty is unparliamentary language. It is not my intention to come to some conclusion on that subject, but it has been raised four or five times when I have been in the chair in the last few days. I would ask the hon. member if he would, for the moment, give some consideration to the words he uses. In due course I will undertake to do a little research to find out what may or may not be acceptable to all members of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention.

An hon. Member: Did you hear it?

Mr. Oberle: Yes, I did. Mr. Speaker underlined what I have said. I know this particular language could be offensive to some people. It did not originate on this side of the House. It originated on the other side of the House in the context of the Quebec referendum and the Parti Québécois. Mr. Lévesque was accused of being intellectually dishonest. What I was saying was that he is no more intellectually dishonest than these fellows, because I look at the Quebec referendum in this way: there is a fellow whose term and mandate as a premier are running out. He knows that he cannot ask the real question, Yes or No. He knows, as everyone in the House knows, that it would fail because only 18 per cent in the province of Quebec, and some of those who are on the lunatic fringe, would want to leave this country. He cannot ask the question, Yes or No. But he promised that there would be a referendum, and he must fulfil this promise if he wants to be elected once more. So, he is buying time with this sovereignty-association consultation business. These fellows have accused him of intellectual dishonesty.

I want to take us back to December when they defeated the government. They said that interest rates must go down. That is what the finance critic over there said. He said it three or four times—interest rates must go down.

Mr. Collenette: They are going down.

Mr. Oberle: He would slump over in his chair and say that they must go down, that there were all these things that had to be done right away. In British Columbia the other day I had a fellow ask me, "Do you know why we are in such tough shape in the country? It is the backlash of the Conservative government." Can you imagine? If one wanted to apply the term of intellectual dishonesty, that would have to be it.

These fellows had to get back into power, so they promised low interest rates, housing, cheaper energy, and everything one would want. Now they are back in power, and what do we get? We get a bill called the employment tax credit. It is a bill that has been in effect since 1978. We are adding to it a little bit now. We are extending it a bit. We are raising the ante a bit. Then there was the Small Businesses Loans Act. We raised that from $75,000 to $100,000. That does not catch up with inflation, but we are doing things.

The Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) was telling us how this particular measure has helped small business in the country. Well, it is really laughable. I want to tell Mr. Speaker that there are Canadians throughout the land who are looking at the budget of December 13, and they are looking at it very closely. I can assure the House that it is our intention to remind them as often as we can of what our intention was, what we would have done with the economy in the first five-year period and over the longer term. We would have restored the confidence the people once had in our ability to produce and in our ability to do things.

Going back to forestry, in that short six-month period we got together for the first time with the provinces and once again worked out a national forest policy. Let me quote from the policy a little bit, and let me in fairness say something nice about the minister. I see him in the House tonight, the minister of the environment who has part-time responsibility for forestry. He was asked recently by the Pulp and Paper Association, which had its convention in Montreal, to make a luncheon speech. I must congratulate him on the contribution he made in respect of policy and to the discussions that took place.

The minister responsible for forestry when our party was in power, and the resource ministers of the provinces, entered into a commitment which the minister underlined and to which he paid tribute. He committed himself pretty well to following the trend that had been worked out and established, and I compliment him for that.

When I asked the minister in the House a couple of weeks ago whether he would take the important step of appointing an assistant deputy minister, he said that would happen within days. Some days have expired and he is nodding his head, so I assume he will probably do that tomorrow morning at eight o'clock. When he does, he will have my support. He and his department will continue to have my input and suggestions.

Let me review some of that policy, sir. The new federal policy was based on the concept that the forest sector is of vital importance to our country's economic, social and environmental well-being. Our rich endowment of natural resources has supported our rise as an industrial power and, to a major degree, it still supports our continued economic prosperity.

The forest policy also recognizes, of course, the right to ownership of the resources by the provinces. That is an important factor the minister will have to address himself to, because some of his colleagues do not share that view when it comes to oil and some other natural resources. The policy we have worked out very much respected the ownership of the resources in the right of the provinces and their right to manage them initially. The federal policy must, therefore, be based on the advice of provincial resource ministers.

It was the intention of the policy to provide continued support for the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers as the key to the evolution of a well co-ordinated and cohesive national forest policy. I am sure the minister will carry out that commitment and that it will provide no problems.

The Conservative government was committed to producing taxation schemes which would provide a climate for greater private sector and provincial government investment in intensive forest management.

In that context, sir, may I say that there is one company in the United States, namely, the Weyerhauser Company, which spends more money on research and development and forest renewal than is spent by the entire Canadian forest service. Can you imagine that? That is mind boggling, but it is the fact. In fact the expenditures in the Canadian forest service in real dollars today are only 50 per cent of what they were ten years ago. It is time for rethinking on that side on how we can groom and keep this goose that lays the golden egg for the future.

The federal government intended to find ways and means to improve graduate training in forestry in our universities, and means of improving manpower planning with particular reference to woods labour in order to improve labour force availability and productivity.

I want to go into that because I think that is one of the crucial issues we are facing today. It was intended to find ways to improve transportation policies to accommodate the special needs of the forest sector. There would have been much greater co-ordination of the various federal departments which have some jurisdiction in the area of forestry, and for that purpose we would have seen the formation of a federal forestry sector strategy committee. I understand that committee has been formed, and again I thank the minister for that. It would have included representatives from the departments of the environment, finance, industry, trade and commerce, regional economic development, agriculture, transport and others. I understand that committee is to report to the new minister. It is my intention to continue to remind the minister to share the information contained in those reports with all members of the House.

All these efforts were intended to achieve the following key objectives: to provide scientific and technical leadership through research and development; provide and analyse national and international information and statistics as a basis for forest policy; aid in developing and certifying codes and standards for product performance; protect Canada's forests from foreign insects and pests; foster and negotiate improved access to foreign markets; and foster the potential use of the forest resource for energy. That has to be the most exciting prospect for the future. There is a commitment to write a new Canada Forestry Act to embrace the functions I have mentioned, and many others.

The council of resource ministers has, as I said earlier, committed itself to increasing the total timber production in our country by 50 per cent, from 140 million to 210 million cubic meters by the year 2000.

The problems of our forest industry should not be looked at in a doom and gloom manner. There are a lot of exciting new opportunities of which we should take advantage. There are some very fundamental things that need to be done before we can cash in and capitalize on some of these opportunities.

One of the real problems that is facing our forest industry, as with any other industry that is highly technical, is the lack of a skilled manpower base. I go back to what was said by Mr. Larry Lewin, that trained and disciplined manpower is a part of a nation's capital. Indeed, I would look at the human resource as the most important part of the machine. We have just done an incredibly poor job of ensuring that our young people who graduate from schools and colleges are adequately prepared to cope with this highly technical and industrial world into which they are about to embark.

I was speaking with a young group of graduate foresters the other day in British Columbia and it was underlined that there is an incredible shortage of skilled workers in this country. This goes back to the war years when, in the immediate post-war period, we relied almost entirely on immigrants from other parts of the world, particularly from central Europe, to come here and run these new machines we were building on the North American continent. When the economies of those countries in central Europe improved and they were beginning to rebuild their economies, Canada was no longer as attractive a place to emigrate to as it once was, and we had to bring immigrants from other parts of the world, particularly from Third World countries. We brought in professional and highly skilled and trained people from these Third World countries. We received a lot of criticism from other countries in the world because we were supposed to be generous and compassionate in relation to the problems faced by these Third World countries, yet we were stealing their most valuable human resource, their highly trained manpower with technical and professional skills.

What we did, instead, was to bring in unskilled workers from these Third World countries. That ended this influx of skilled workers, and we had to begin to train our own people, as well as some of the immigrants. Today we do not have any institution in place to cope with this problem. We spend a lot of money on colleges, through manpower, to train and retrain people, but, as my friend Lewin has said, there is just no way the commercial, financial, political and social institutions, as they now exist, are capable of producing the manpower resource with the training and skills we need in the 1980s in order to keep our industries in competition with those of other parts of the world.

Our productivity in the forest industry is fully 15 per cent less than that of the United States, and that is one of the reasons for that. Another reason, of course, can be related to the antiquated machinery that we work with, particularly in eastern Canada.

The unskilled manpower resource is the main problem why our productivity is 15 per cent less than that of the United States. Again I must say that it will require very fundamental reform of our process of educating and training people. We should look to other countries and observe what they have done in this situation. For example, in West Germany people who feel motivated toward a particular industrial skill are allowed, and even encouraged, to leave school at a much earlier age, at the ages of 15 or 16. These people are absorbed by the industry, and through the efforts of government, industry and labour unions, are put through a training period in the plant for as much as five years, depending on the skill which they are acquiring.

This training is carried on in a school atmosphere. The young person works in the plant for three weeks of the month and then goes to college for the other week. When the individual is finished, he or she is considered a professional.

The one distinct difference is that while this individual undergoes this training period he or she does not receive $8.30 for the first hour which he works. The individual receives a small stipend of 50 cents or a dollar an hour. Of course my friends in the NDP would scream child labour and child abuse, but that party is representative of labour in this country.

Adam Smith, one of the earlier economists, talked about the invisible hand that regulates the free market system and free enterprise. A modern economist—and it was not my friend Larry Lewin—talked about another invisible hand. He referred to it as the invisible handshake. It is the handshake that is passed between big business, big labour and big government. It is that handshake which is responsible when members of that party get up in defence of large multinational corporations such as Chrysler.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Oberle: That party would like the government to bail out Chrysler. Regardless of what Chrysler has done to their fellow workers in Britain, they want to bail out that company because there is an elite group of workers which may be affected. If Imperial Oil were in the same straits, they would do the same thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. I tried to indicate to the hon. gentleman that he might be coming to the expiry of his time. Because I interrupted the hon. member earlier on a matter of language, I will give him a brief period to finish, something like one minute.

Mr. Oberle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not abuse the patience of the House. I have said what I wanted to say. I think that hon. members who are here tonight know what I know, what you know, and what every Canadian knows, that we can no longer put a band-aid here and a band-aid there. We must talk about fundamental reform of our economic and fiscal approach, our approach to our human resource, manpower training and our job-creation programs. We must talk about very fundamental reform of our political and institutional framework. Of course that process has begun and will accelerate after May 20, but I do not wish to get into that tonight.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I respect your admonition of a few moments ago about the parliamentary use of the term "intellectual dishonesty" as being inappropriate in a parliamentary sense. It is also inappropriate in a substantial sense. As I sit here on the government side and hear both parties in opposition say the things which they say about us, I would rather use the term "naive simplicity". It is naive, because it really does not deal very much with the world which we are in, and it is simplistic in the sense that it takes only one side and sees one answer as the only answer.

I listened to the hon. member who spoke before me and other Tories before him, for the last seven or eight years saying that the government is involved in too many things, that the government is growing too big, that we were into things that we should not be into, all kinds of things which were more appropriate to the private sector. Or, if it was not appropriate for the private sector, they wanted to hand it all back to the provinces. This has been one side of the issue.

I have heard this same argument used with regard to the ratio of the net national debt to the GNP. This argument is constantly used by the parties opposite. I would ask the hon. member, when he uses that argument and with regard to his lumber business, if the line of credit that one would achieve would not be proportional to the size of the business operation. It seems to me that when one talks about debt, whether it is net national debt or another form of debt, one must put that line of credit against the size of the operation.

I do not see that anyone can relate the net national debt in an intelligent way unless one relates it to GNP. It is very interesting that under the government of the late John G. Diefenbaker, I believe it was 1962, that the net national debt as a function of the gross national product was something like 32 per cent, whereas now it is down to something like 20 per cent. I am not saying that in his time this was a bad situation. I am just not as sure that it is such a dangerous thing as the hon. member would seem to indicate.

On the other hand, the NDP has the simplistic notion that government can do anything and that there are no limits to what can be spent.

Mr. Rae: Careful, Paul, you are treading on your childhood.

Mr. McRae: I have a great deal of difficulty dealing with that philosophy. When one sits on this side of the House, one begins to think that we must be doing a few things right since we are being condemned by one group for doing too much and by the other group for doing too little. Somewhere along the line we have probably achieved a balance which most Canadians accept, and that is probably why we are here.

The employment tax credit bill can be criticized if it is looked upon as all that the government is doing in the area of employment. Of course, this is not the only measure that the government is taking. It is a limited type of bill which, for instance, is not designed for the kind of operation one might find in smaller communities, rural areas or large ridings. It is basically a bill which is perhaps more appropriate for larger cities, and that is why it is being introduced.

The bill is not being introduced to solve all the employment problems, and it is not the only piece of legislation which the government is putting into play. The bill supports certain groups of Canadians more than others, particularly young people who are trying to get on the labour market. The bill has a little more permanence, although it is not entirely permanent, than perhaps some programs such as the Canada Works program. To criticize this bill from the standpoint that the government is bereft of any other ideas, is nonsense. It is a limited bill introduced in the attempt to accomplish a certain things at a certain cost. It will achieve the kinds of results expected of it.

There is a whole series of other programs initiated by the previous government and this government which comes into play. Some are Canada Works programs and Canada works-type of programs which will probably be initiated in the future. There is also the manpower retraining program. It has been calculated—and I believe that the figure is correct—that the summation of all the programs in the Department of Employment and Immigration would open something like 230,000 jobs. This is a substantial gap when one speaks of unemployment in this country. To get around some of this simplicity one has to look at employment in perspective. It is true that we have one of the highest employment rates of all industrial nations; it is also true that we have the highest growth in our labour force of all industrial nations.

When I spoke in this House two or three years ago on this subject I used a chart which dealt with the summit group of countries. It showed that between 1966 and 1976 there were 146 people on the labour market in Canada for every previous 10 years; in the United States there were 128; West Germany had one or two less, but for most members of the summit group the figure was between 100 and 106. The growth in the labour force for the balance of the summit group, not including Canada, was 109 for every previous ten years; for Canada it was 146. That is a tremendous growth in our labour force.

On the one side there is high unemployment, and on the other side there is a record growth in employment among all the OECD countries, running between 350,000 and 400,000 new jobs per year. This is an accomplishment, Mr. Speaker. It is nonsense to say that we do not do anything, and it is nonsense to say that we do too much. There is a mean to be achieved and I think over the years this government has achieved it. To say that all the things we have done are wrong and that we have led the country into a mess is nonsense. We are living in a very difficult world, one that does not follow naive, simplistic suggestions. It is not true to say that if employment can be increased the economy will be better. It does not work that way and has not worked that way for many years.

There are many economists who believe that the Keynesian theories do not obtain today as they did years ago, perhaps because we are not as willing to try them as we used to be. In the early 1960s we used to talk of throwing a couple of billion dollars into the demand side to create a tremendous amount of employment and generate a lot of activity in the country. At that time the GNP was about $40 billion to $50 billion. Today it is $250 billion, six times as great, and we are talking about the same $2 billion—as if something less than one per cent would turn the economy around! This kind of thinking disturbs me a great deal, Mr. Speaker. Some of these things are counterproductive. Where there is high unemployment and high inflation running side by side, whichever way you turn you are going to create problems and not solve anything. I think we have to move piecemeal, though structural changes may be required.

One of the things that we have done in the area of unemployment that appeals to me is what I call the decentralization of policy. I support the notion of the federal government decentralizing its activities by moving the Precambrian Institute to Thunder Bay. If this country is to remain strong and have a strong federal government, the various parts of the government must be decentralized.

Decentralization of policy is not understood as well as it should be. There has been, however, more progress in the area of employment under the various ministers than in any other department. A very important advance was made when it was decided to bring the country into a series of regions and districts when studying unemployment and UIC, particularly the latter. This is very important in my area because of its location. In effect, what was done was to acknowledge that there could be a different situation in Newfoundland than, say, in Toronto, and a different situation in northern Ontario than, say, in Calgary, and that the various regions required policy differences which would come into play if the unemployment rate reached a certain level. I think this step was taken with a great deal of difficulty because of bureaucratic resistance.

Many backbenchers on this side of the House fought very hard for this change, and I would urge the minister to see if more can be done to differentiate between regions, not just regarding unemployment insurance benefits but in the whole area of manpower. I am sure the minister will look favourably upon allowing each region to set its own standards for manpower.

I should like to illustrate a problem that has not been solved by decentralization of policy, by speaking about a community in my constituency which is facing some very difficult times. Atikokan is a community of a little over 5,000 people. It had two operating mines, both of which closed down within the last year and one half. In fact the last one closed last week. In all, about 1,200 people were laid off by the closings. Under normal circumstances, if 1,200 people were laid off in a district where there were a lot of communities nearby, the people would merely commute to jobs in those other communities. If the lay-offs in the district were high enough to reach a certain percentage, then the UIC benefits would come into play.

Such is not the case with Atikokan, and I am sure there are other communities in the country in the same position. Atikokan is 140 miles from Thunder Bay and roughly 80 miles from Fort Francis. There are no communities of any size in between. To the south there is the U.S. border and north there is just nothing, so the community is on its own. The unemployment rate is as high as 50 per cent or 60 per cent. It is not a community where people can commute daily to other places to work. They have to find jobs within the community.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that Atikokan is a community with a good future. There is another mine in the area which should open within the next three or four years. There are also other prospects for the community, and I hope that there will be full employment again in Atikokan within three or four years. It also has a very fine infrastructure. It is not the kind of community that can be picked up and moved someplace else in short order.

Given the distances, the inability to commute, and the very high unemployment rate, I think it is important that the government consider a special designation for the community since it does not fit into the district designation. Even the 1,200 extra jobs does not push that northwestern Ontario district into a high unemployment designation. Since that is the case, I think the solution is to consider the community of Atikokan by itself. There will be, and have been, other communities in Canada in the same situation through no fault of their own, so I think we should give them a special designation and try to work out some solutions in terms of UIC, manpower thrust, DREE and particularly with CMHC.

• (2130)

I am very disturbed—and I brought this point up in the throne speech—about the attitude of CMHC to the community. This is a community with a lot of good homes and good infrastructure. The CMHC attitude is, to quote the local manager who, I believe used the phrase, "I would sooner board the places up than do something with renegotiating mortgages." Communities like this, there are others in Canada I emphasize that, I am not taking the view from this side or from that side, but those of us from the larger ridings will have those kinds of communities, and in my opinion we should take a look at them.

I would like to conclude my remarks by re-emphasizing the fact that all in all we have done a very commendable job employment-wise. We have had something like 500 per cent greater growth in the labour force than the average members of the summit group. We have created jobs at a faster rate by far than any other country in the OECD, or any of the industrial countries, and we still have these massive problems with us. The answers are not simplistic, they are not a lot more government, they are not government turning everything over to the private sector. The answer is a combination of a whole series of things which this government has sustained over the last 15 or 20 years.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, since this is my first opportunity to rise and speak in this Thirty-second Parliament, I would like to congratulate you for being appointed Deputy Speaker. I would particularly like to congratulate Madam Speaker for being elected to her high position.

I am pleased to rise in my place and participate in second reading on the principle of Bill C-19, the employment tax credit act. In my estimation Bill C-19 is a budgetary measure dealing primarily with employment in all its ramifications. Let me say first that the national Government of Canada is supposed to lead and guide this nation in economic direction, in economic diversity, in economic growth and development and, to a large degree, provide considerable guidance in the generation of jobs.

The over-all policies and philosophical basis of government are generally provided in the traditional budget brought down by the Minister of Finance. The budget speech to this assembly, and the nation, provides a national economic and fiscal perspective and fabric for the nation, for business, for the banking community, for labour, for provincial governments, for international institutions and in fact other nations. They all subsequently tailor their planning to this perspective. The same applies for any minister in the various portfolios of government. Each of them is responsible for the administration of vast sums of money, and their over-all basis for economic policy formulation is important for the nation to know and understand.

The present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has brought down no budget of his own. But he has done something; he has resurrected a mangled version of "Honest John Crosbie's" budget. Let me review briefly the budget events of the last four to four and a half months. So much has happened in the last four to four and a half months! A saga has unfolded in this House that literally dazzles the imagination and almost boggles the mind. I think that only the likes of Shakespeare could put in writing the drama that has unfolded in these last four and a half months in this place.

An hon. Member: How about Walt Disney?

Mr. Yurko: It is only Shakespeare who could catch in print, if you like, the intrigue, the intellectual dishonesty, and hypocrisy that took place in this House.

Mr. Rae: Love's Labour's Lost.

Mr. Yurko: That is understating it.

Just a fortnight before Christmas last year, the modern day prophets, Joseph and John, descended from the mountain of inspiration—which is somewhere near Jasper—and brought forth a budget that contained what I call the commandments of the new age, the eighties, that is, the decade of the eighties. After being duly inspired, the doctrine of that budget was as follows: free my people from economic bondage of big government and its wanton spending, and the new slogan, a very apt slogan, was "short-term pain for long-term gain".

I have indicated, and I hope to indicate to the assembly, the new economic commandments of that budget. I want to go through them very briefly. The first said thou shalt pay thy debts. The second said thou shalt live within thy means. The third said thou shalt save and therefore prosper. The fourth said thou shalt invest and multiply and become self-sufficient. The fifth said thou shalt be rewarded for owning thine own house.

Mr. Rae: Thou shalt raise interest rates.

Mr. Yurko: And now, what was the sixth? The boys are getting excited over there. The sixth said thou shalt pay more for thine iniquities, boozing, smoking, and driving.

Mr. Rae: Thou shalt break thy promises.

Mr. Yurko: The seventh said the poor shall be relieved from the burden of higher petrol costs. The eighth said thou shalt not be a slave to thy government. The ninth said thy government shalt pay its bills. The tenth said our government shall not be our master and our lord.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Two days after that budget came down with the new slogan to this place, which is the House of the Commons where, I understand, we have a lot of nobodies and some somebodies, a lot of the people on this side of the House—at that time they were the nobodies of that side—jumped up and said, "Kill it, kill it, before it takes root and spreads."

This new doctrine and new direction of paying one's bills and controlling the size of government and its deficit were too much to swallow. This was just too much for the nobodies on this side of the House. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the nobodies outnumbered the somebodies on the other side of the House, and the government fell. The government went to the people and the people rejected the budget of the prophets Joseph and John. But the saga does not end there—

Mr. Rae: Tell us about St. Sinclair.

Mr. Yurko: —because something else happened. A government sitting over there fought an election that can only be described in one word, and that word is deception. It is deception, deception, and more deception. One can say that out of this misty swamp of deception two new prophets came, only these new prophets were Joseph and Pierre. Joseph likes to be called Allan, but indeed his name is Joseph. They brought forth a new slogan. No budget, but a new slogan. What was the slogan? The slogan is "short-term drain for long-term pain". May I say that again because it is something that they should print in great big letters, tie to a sign and put around every member on the other side. A budget supposedly with a deficit of $14 billion piled on top of an impossible deficit now, "short-term drain for long-term pain".

● (2140)

I could not possibly think of a more appropriate slogan for the behaviour of this government in connection with its budgetary proposals. If one wanted to indicate a new doctrine, if you wish, one would have to call it economic bondage equalized for all.

My, how they changed the commandments. If you will bear with me, I would like to indicate what they have done. The first one now has become, thou shalt pay thy debts with the help of the government. The second one says thou shalt live within thy means and government handouts. The thirds says thou shalt save and thereby prosper and pay half of it to the government. The fourth says thou shalt invest and multiply and become self-sufficient for government's sake. The fifth says thou shalt be rewarded for owning thy own house with higher interest payments.

The sixth they agreed with, that is thou shalt pay more for thine iniquities, boozing and smoking, but not driving. The seventh said the poor shall be relieved from the burden of higher petrol costs. No, sir, Mr. Speaker, now this government say they are going to pay every cent that everybody else is going to pay, because gasoline is going to go up every bit as much as the 18 cents proposed by the last government, only they are going to hide the tax. They are going to put it in the form of a refinery tax on a barrel of oil. Deception again of the highest degree.

What did they do with the next commandment? Thou shalt not be the slave to thine government. Well, they removed the "not" and made it thou shalt be the slave to thine government. The last one, thy government shall pay its bill by borrowing more. The government shall pay its bill by borrowing more and more and more, indeed bankrupting future generations of this country, a country with riches beyond all imagination.

As an engineer I have had occasion to travel fairly extensively around the world. I worked in the United States for over six years. At one point I attempted to put down on paper the endowments per capita enjoyed in Canada. It literally cannot be compared with any other country on this globe. Indeed, what is prevalent today is that parents and grandparents anywhere in this world would give their eye teeth to emigrate to Canada, not necessarily for their own well-being but for the well-being of their children and children's children. There is no greater desire among any of the populations in the world that understand the advantages of Canada than to emigrate to Canada so that their children and children's children will have a future.

I am just going to touch on the Quebec referendum at this point because I hope to speak again on this matter. One of the things that baffles me is that nationhood, or the idea of nationalism, has been used traditionally in history to guard and safeguard—

[Translation]

Mr. Dawson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand quite well that it is the maiden speech of the hon. member in the House, but I wonder if he might be called to order because he has not even referred to the bill since the beginning of his speech, as several other speakers before him failed to do as well. I think this is an extremely important bill and I would ask members opposite to co-operate so that we can pass it. If they want to make speeches, they will have to wait for the debate on the budget or on the referendum. I do not think that it is timely, Mr. Speaker, to deal with that matter. We now have a bill to consider and I would like to have it debated.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The remarks of the hon. member are well taken. However, in the past the Chair has always been very lenient during the maiden speech of an hon. member. I think tonight he overdid that. I would ask the hon. member to address his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the guidance you have given me. I would, however, suggest that I began my remarks tonight by indicating that this is a budgetary matter before us. It is a bill dealing with appropriation, with supply. Therefore it is my intention, as I said at the beginning, to deal with the whole gamut of supply, to deal with the whole question of the economy of Canada as it relates to unemployment. Indeed, the referendum in Quebec bears a very specific reference and relationship to the well-being and economic nature of Canada, as well as employment, not only in Quebec, but with respect to the whole nation. I just want to make some brief comments on the referendum in respect of an economic matter. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I will do so.

What I intended to say was that nationhood has two dimensions, one the cultural, linguistic and other aspects of it, and the other economic. Traditionally throughout history nationhood has been used to guard cultural aspects, linguistic aspects, the traditional roots of the people. With the advent of technology, the growth of the economy of the world and the economy of nations, a new dimension has been added to nationhood which is very profound. It is the dimension of economics, economic well-being.

Because technology, and I am an instrument of the world of technology, has interrelated the world economically and has interrelated all parts of Canada economically to such a degree, in order to enjoy economic well-being a new form of nationhood has evolved in the modern world through civilization. It is called a federation of parts, a federation of parts in which the cultural and linguistic character of a part can be safeguarded and maintained in all its aspects. At the same time, the guarding of those cultural and linguistic roots of a people can be integrated through a federation in an economic well-being of a larger whole, a larger nation, and this is Canada.

Canada is one of the oldest federations in the world. In fact, I think it is the third oldest. It has bound itself together with peoples in such a way that it enjoys one of the highest standards of living in the world. Its future economic well-being is related to maintaining a federation that needs some change admittedly at this time, desperately needs some change to recognize regional aspirations and regional needs, but it is the creation of mankind, and it is a modern creation which indeed ties together the ability to sustain a culture and a language and the ability to sustain all these aspects with economic well-being.

Let me come back to budgetary matters. Let me go back to what this government has brought before this House, the guidance it has provided us in the last several weeks and the guidance it will provide us in the coming months.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member says he wants to talk about budgetary matters. I would remind him that the bill before us is very narrow in its scope and I invite the hon. member to address his remarks to the subject which we are considering, the employment tax credit act.

Mr. Yurko: Again, I want to indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, that the principle behind this bill is job creation. The employment tax credit act provides incentive for job creation all across the land and is very broad in its scope. The bill before us brings in amendments to an act which deals broadly with the economic well-being of the nation and the creation of jobs in different parts of the country, a bill which has relevance to the budget and relevance to every provincial act in terms of employment creation. I would beg of you, Mr. Speaker, to allow the latitude you have given so far to hon. members taking part in this debate.

I should like to say again I am waiting for economic guidance from the other side as to the principles which should be established to deal with the unemployment problem. Where are the principles in the amendments this bill puts forward? Where is this budget which we have been promised? Let me suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are people in this nation who are providing leadership, people who are providing economic guidance for the country as a whole even though it is not being provided from the other side of the House.

A most remarkable conference took place in western Canada during the last several weeks in the course of which four leaders of western Canada recognized that this government needed help in the field of economic policy. They recognized it needed help in terms of policies for the creation of jobs. So they got together, four premiers, in Lethbridge, Alberta, and put forward certain suggestions to assist the government. What did they say after reviewing the problems of the nation—not only of western Canada but of the entire nation? Here is what they said:

> High interest rates are causing hardship for many Canadians and represent a serious economic problem for the country.

How can one create jobs and provide subsidies for job creation when interest rates are moving entirely against this type of action? The premiers are deeply concerned about the unacceptable and unfair impact of high interest rates on home owners, small business, farmers, forest workers, and the development potential of the west. Acknowledging the responsibility of the federal government for interest rate policy, the western premiers regretted that there had been little progress in meeting the mutually-agreed commitments made at the first ministers' conference on the economy on November 19, 1978, by this government.

An hon. Member: One of them concerned employment.

Mr. Yurko: One of them was employment. They were disappointed that the governor of the Bank of Canada was unable to attend the western premiers' conference to discuss monetary policy and the policy options open to Canada, matters directly related to employment and the measures necessary for creating it. The western premiers pointed out that current high interest rates are symptoms of much more serious structural problems in the Canadian economy, namely, the balance of payments deficits and the federal budgetary deficit. To address these deeply-rooted structural problems they suggested a number of proposals which could form a major part of a national economic policy strategy to avoid automatic tracking of Canadian-made interest rates with those of the United States.

What could be more relevant to this amendment, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yurko: The premiers agreed that a realistic energy-pricing policy is the key to energy self-sufficiency and the creation of jobs. Canadian energy prices must rise to reduce the disparity between domestic and international prices, they said, in order to create jobs. They agreed that the increased revenue generated by such price increases should be recycled into investment in Canada to reduce our reliance on outside capital and foreign energy sources. To create jobs, Mr. Speaker—a massive number of jobs which would result from self-sufficiency in energy, and we have the potential to do it in this nation.

What has the minister done? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has thrown punches in every direction even before the negotiations on pricing have begun. Indeed, he came out with a report by officials called "Analysis of the Impact on Oil Prices of the December 11 Budget Proposals"—I want to deal with that document later on and indicate the intellectual dishonesty of that report. That minister exercised the force majeure clause in a Syncrude agreement which put into jeopardy the Imperial Oil heavy oil plant at Cold Lake. If there ever was a project which would create jobs, that was it—jobs across the nation from one end to the other; machinery is going to be fabricated in Toronto and Montreal, across the nation for that project to create jobs for native people and Canadians in all areas. What bothered me about that decision was its timing. The timing was terrible.

This heavy oil project is the first of this kind. The Syncrude plant was the second of its kind. The Great Canadian Oil Sands plant, or Suncor, was the first. It proved the technology. Syncrude was the second. The Alsands plant is going to be the third. Then we are going to have a fourth, a fifth, and a sixth, and so on. But the Imperial heavy oil plant at Cold Lake Alberta was the first of a kind, the initial commercialization of an in situ extraction of heavy oil from 2,000 feet and lower in the ground. It was vital for this nation that that project go ahead, and no impediment of any kind by any government should have been put in place to delay it or bring it into question. Indeed, the fate of this nation in terms of energy self-sufficiency is dependent on that process for the extraction of heavy oil.

So we have a minister on that side of the House, just about the time it was necessary to approve that plant, throwing punches before he had even begun to negotiate pricing policy. Mr. Speaker, I have a lot more to say and I have a few more minutes left, but I would like to call it ten o'clock, and I therefore adjourn the debate on Bill C-19.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Kempling: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) could advise us on the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, since the debate on this bill seems to be winding down, we plan to continue with it tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—OIL PRICING PACKAGE—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time in relation to a question which I posed earlier today to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) with respect to the proposal he put forward, together with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), during the course of the election campaign, on the so-called blended oil price. Many of us and many Canadians have been trying very hard over the last few months, especially during the time after this particular concept was first announced, to get an idea of exactly what this blended oil price was all about. It was very difficult to find out, because almost any Liberal spokesman one approached on this formula had a different idea.

After we had an opportunity of considering what this meant and what exactly it would cost us, we put a question to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on what it would mean, in terms of dollars and cents, to the average Canadian. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and Liberal candidates in the course of the last election campaign went across the country saying that, in any event the Liberal government was going to assure the Canadian people of an oil supply at a lower price than that proposed by the Conservative government in its budget which was brought down by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) last December.

We listened with great interest to find out exactly what the price would be, and again, depending on which Liberal candidate was approached, we got a different figure. It was certainly not going to be over $4 this year and it would not exceed $4.50 for the next three years, because that, of course, would be more than the Conservative government had proposed in its budget.

Then, a few days ago, we heard the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in a speech made in the debate on the Speech from the Throne in which he finally indicated what the figure might be, in which he gave us an inkling, when he indicated finally that, lo and behold, the price for foreign oil, the oil import compensation payments, would be rolled on to the backs of the consumer, thus resulting in a saving of over $1 billion. Still we could not get an answer from the Prime Minister, from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or from the Minister of Finance as to exactly what that meant.

What I am trying to do today is put this into perspective, because if there is going to be a roll over this year, according to the projection of the Minister of Finance, of $1 billion on to the backs of the consumers, I would like to know how this might be accomplished. Will it be in the form of a tax or a levy by which oil import compensation payments would be added to the price of oil for consumers? I specifically asked of the minister whether or not this was in the arsenal that he would take with him to his discussions with the provinces. Of course he refused to answer, because I suspect the answer would be one that he would dare not give at this point in time, and that is that any proposal in order to bring about a blended price will mean to the average consumer a very substantial increase in the cost of oil and petroleum products in this country.

● (2205)

The fact of the matter is that I should title my speech, "Canadians Watch Out". We are being set up by the Liberal government to have a really large increase in oil prices in this country. The simple fact of the matter is that if they are going to roll the prices we pay for international oil or offshore oil on to the backs of the consumers, this will mean that they will have to raise the prices very much more substantially than anything put forward in our budget brought down last December. The fact is that we have no assurance from the minister. He has not denied, in the course of his responses to me, that the increase in price will surpass $4 this year. He has not denied that it will surpass $4.50 over the course of the next three years.

Canadians will now be faced by this new blended oil price policy with the most substantial price increases that they have ever experienced, and far in excess of anything proposed in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West.

I want an assurance and commitment from the parliamentary secretary tonight that the increase in prices will not exceed an increase of $4 this year and $4.50 over the course of each year during the next three years. I want his assurance that there will be some protection with respect to the consumers of home heating fuel and non-transportation products in Canada, that they will not be burdened with this additional cost of the oil import compensation payment.

I want an assurance from the parliamentary secretary that the commitments made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, on behalf of his party and the government for whom he now answers, will in fact be kept, so that Canadians can say with assurance—and get a commitment from the parliamentary secretary—that they were not deluded, they were not misled, and that in fact they will experience increases to a lesser extent than those set forth in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful that the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has provided me with this opportunity to set forth the government's position on the important question of oil pricing in Canada.

One method of compensating for costly oil imports is to place a levy on all oil used in Canada. Such a procedure would be in line with the principle that the consumer must pay for the energy used. As pledged, however, we shall implement a pricing system that will provide energy to Canadians at a lower price than would have been the case under the proposal of the previous government. Let me elaborate for a moment.

In its ill-fated budget of last December, the Conservative government proposed changes in oil-pricing and in excise taxes on oil. Under those proposals the average annual rate of oil price increase, as measured in Toronto, would have been $4.48 without the additional to international prices specified in the budget. If the budget's link to international price is taken into account, the average annual increase would have risen to $4.98, accepting the December, 1979, projected international prices. Under a low-case projection, that would have been $7.21 per year. Under a high-case projection, it would have been $10.24.

It should be noted that all these figures exclude the effects of the budget's excise tax. Taking into account both the effect of the gas excise tax and the link to the international price, the Conservative government would have increased the average annual oil price at Toronto to as high as $11.07 per barrel in 1984.

In contrast, this government's pricing proposals will ensure that price increases are below those that would have resulted from the proposals of the previous government. Specifically, the 1980 price will remain below the $4 to $4.50 increase. Subsequent increases will continue to remain below what the previous government would have forced upon consumers.

In the near future the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) will release a statement outlining various options and explaining the application of the blended price in equitably distributing the cost arising from eastern Canada's dependence on imported oil.

Naturally it would be inappropriate to make any such announcement before discussing this matter fully with provincial governments to obtain their views on this matter of utmost national importance. These discussions will proceed as quickly as possible. I am sure that all members of the House will join in endorsing our approach which avoids hasty pronouncements on oil pricing before the views of provinces have been solicited.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—BOYCOTTING OF MOSCOW OLYMPICS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON OTHER SPORTS ACTIVITIES WITH SOVIETS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to justify the inconsistency and hypocrisy of his government in respect of the Olympic boycott on the one hand and the government's refusal to ban other artistic and sporting events between the Soviet Union and Canada on the other, specifically the forthcoming Canada Cup hockey series in which the Soviets are scheduled to play. Twice the Prime Minister did not justify his position, but instead reiterated his hypocritical stance by saying:

> Our condemnation is of games to be held in Moscow. That is the total aspect of it. We are not condemning sporting events, amateur or professional, held in other fora.

That is unfair, unjust, hypocritical and inconsistent. The Prime Minister condemns the Olympic Games, but that is not the question. The question is, do he and his government condemn the dastardly act of military invasion of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union? Is he condemning that country completely, or is the Prime Minister and his government condemning the Soviet Union partially for that act? If it is full and complete condemnation, then I suggest that all artistic, economic and sporting ties should be broken, whether that means disallowing the Soviet hockey team to participate in the Canada Cup series, or, for that matter, whether it means disallowing the continuation of Soviet-built Lada cars to be sold in Canada, particularly at this time when there are proposed massive lay-offs within the automotive industry in this country.

If the government is partially condemning the Soviet Union for its invasion of Afghanistan, then it is partially condoning the invasion as well. I do not think Canadians accept that fact, as I do not. This is as though you, sir, would not allow one of your daughters to marry a murderer, which would be proper, but then allowed your second daughter to marry the same man. That would not be fair and it would not be consistent. That is precisely the position of this government.

As a former Olympian and world athlete I know that the Soviet Union prides itself in sports events and uses them as the number one propaganda tool. How can the Prime Minister sit there and allow Soviet hockey players and Soviet athletes to come and play games here, while disallowing our athletes to go over there? I would like to hear that explanation. This is a half-position.

There is no leadership by the Prime Minister in this case. We all know he did not want to boycott the Olympic Games in the first place, but public and international pressure forced him to back down. We all know where his personal philosophies lie and who his friends are, and they certainly are not our traditional allies in the free world. It is time the Prime Minister put his personal philosophies aside in matters of this nature and began to assume the leadership role Canada should have in events involving human rights.

This deals with human rights because there are murderers from the Soviet Union invading countries, whether it be Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and now Afghanistan. We as Canadians, because of this government, are partially condoning those dastardly acts by allowing the Soviet Union to play games, sell their cars, and through their games to make hundreds of thousands of dollars to take back to the Soviet Union.

I am, of course, delighted with the response, the ground swell of support, which has taken place since last Thursday when I made my first statement. This support has come from NHL hockey players, arena managers and owners, athletes, much of the media, the public and other groups. I know that the answer which I will receive tonight will be a farce, as is usually the case. The answer will not be on my specific question; do we condemn the Soviet Union fully or do we condemn it partially? I know that it will be a farce. However, that is not the point. The point is that I would like to urge tonight all Canadians, in the name of human rights and world peace, to get on that bandwagon and demand of this bleeding heart, hypocritical government that it bar all further artistic, economic and sporting ties with the Soviet Union until all Soviet troops have left Afghanistan and it complies with the Helsinki agreement, and the Human Rights agreement which they signed and to which Canada is a signatory. I plead with Canada to get on the bandwagon.

I have pleaded with the Prime Minister in the past in matters of this nature but to no avail. The matter is left to public opinion and world international pressure to get the Prime Minister to back down, as he did with the Olympic boycott, on other ties with the Soviet Union, until it complies with the principles of human rights.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said yesterday in answer to questions from the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek), the Government of Canada is not opposed to Canadians taking part in multilateral sporting events in which the Soviet Union might also participate. However, the Olympics represent an exceptional case in that the games are held in Moscow and we cannot give the government of the Soviet Union an opportunity to have the Russian people believe that the invasion of Afghanistan is leaving the western world indifferent.

However, the government does not intend to intervene in the organization of the Canada Cup this fall or in the organization of any other multilateral competition. But should professional hockey players decide, as some stars of the National League just indicated, to associate themselves with the amateur athletes who are now bearing the cost of a government decision, which could not have been different in the present international context, Canadians in general could only be grateful to them.

It is out of the question for the Government of Canada to out-Herod Herod, that is for the Government of Canada to go further with respect to the Soviet Union than the United States did when they allowed the Soviet athletes to enter their country for the games that were held at Lake Placid last February. Mr. Speaker, if one were to follow the reasoning of the hon. member for Halton, one would have to conclude that President Carter himself is following a hypocritical and inconsistent policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No one having risen to speak, I declare the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

FUNDING OF CONVENTION CENTRES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Inasmuch as the Conservative Government of Canada, after careful and protracted consideration, had announced a clear policy for granting funds to convention centres in the amount of as much as 25 per cent, and inasmuch as a specific offer was made to the Toronto convention centre, and in view of statements made in this House and outside by the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) which have caused much uncertainty on the Toronto project as well as possible loss of convention bookings, such as a 7,000-person convention on which a decision must be made within the next three weeks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That the former government policy and the specific offer to Toronto be reaffirmed immediately.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEASURES TO IMPROVE FINANCIAL SITUATION OF FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the financial crisis facing farmers today, of high and uncertain interest rates that make long-term planning impossible, I move, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this government, especially the Minister of Agriculture, show some leadership in this crisis by establishing a loan guarantee program, by providing more money to the Farm Credit Corporation, by taking the required steps to prevent foreclosures on all farm mortgages, and by calling together representatives of the farm community, the Farm Credit Corporation and the private lending institutions for the purpose of establishing a plan of action to meet this crisis.

That this House urges the government to introduce, without delay, an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to end the discrimination therein against persons of single status between the ages of 60 and 65 by providing for the equivalent of the spouse's allowance to be available to all persons between the ages of 60 and 65, regardless of marital status, provided they are out of the labour market.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

REQUEST CONSTRUCTION DELAYED UNTIL AGREEMENT IN PRINCIPLE ON ABORIGINAL CLAIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a question of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas there is a proposal before the National Energy Board and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by Interprovincial Pipe Line to build an oil pipeline along the Mackenzie River corridor from Norman Wells, Northwest Territories, to Zama, Alberta; whereas four years ago the Berger commission examined a similar proposal and recommended against it on social, political and environmental grounds; whereas in 1977, following the Berger commission report, the National Energy Board and the Government of Canada decided against the Mackenzie Valley gas pipeline; therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That the Government of Canada continue to respect the recommendations of the Berger commission, and that the proposed Norman Wells pipeline be delayed until aboriginal rights in that area are protected and, in particular, until agreements in principle have been concluded with the native people of the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories respecting their aboriginal claims.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MEASURES TO IMPROVE FINANCIAL SITUATION OF FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that farmers finance between 50 per cent and 60 per cent of their operating costs with borrowed money, and some farmers have had to drop their low-interest Farm Credit Corporation mortgages for high-interest bank mortgages because the Farm Credit Corporation no longer has sufficient funds, and that in some regions there has been a five-fold increase in farms put up for sale, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

● (1410)

That this House condemn the government's do-nothing approach to the financial crisis facing farmers today, that the federal government immediately offer more money to the Farm Credit Corporation, and that the Minister of Agriculture immediately introduce the proposal put forth by the previous PC government which would allow the Farm Credit Corporation to borrow supplemental funding from the private marketplace.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Because of the dramatic situation in which hog producers have found themselves for the last four months already; because some of them will very soon have to face bankruptcy, if they have not already done so, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger)

That this House unanimously invite the Minister of Agriculture to act immediately through either a compensation formula or enough financial assistance to avoid the worst.

CALL FOR RESCINDING OF NEW TAXES IMPOSED ON DOMESTIC WINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Given the fact that the now famous infamous mini-budget of April 21 imposed additional increases in excise tax and federal sales tax on wines, given the fact that the Canadian wine industry situated in the Niagara Peninsula and in the Okanagan Valley is being unfairly and grievously hindered in its attempts to compete with foreign wine by this measure, and given, further, that these increases will create surpluses of grapes and increase unemployment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

That this government reconsider the action taken, and rescind the new taxes imposed on the Canadian wine industry.

OFF-LINE ELEVATORS TO SPEED UP MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Producers in La Crete and Valleyview, Alberta, must haul their grain a maximum of 100 miles. Rail lines in this area were not scheduled for abandonment, and thus do not fall under the previous government's recommendations for an experimental off-line elevator concept. In light of the throne speech's commitment regarding transportation as a national priority, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Minister of Transport give serious and immediate consideration to including the participation of La Crete and Valleyview, Alberta, in the experimental off-line elevator concept as recommended by the previous government for rail line abandonment stemming from the recommendations of the Hall commission.

In view of the totally confusing answers given in this House on Monday by the Minister of Transport regarding the future

MOVEMENT OF OIL BY TANKER—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS AT U.S. HEARINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and hope that I will get the unanimous consent of the House.

In view of the devastating effects on Canada's maritime resources that would occur should there be an oil spill off the B.C. coast, and particularly in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, and because of the failure of this government as far back as 1971 to encourage the overland route for Prudhoe Bay oil to the United States market, and with hearings now in progress in Olympia, Washington, to hear representations from interested parties on the Northern Tier route approved by the President of the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That this House require the Canadian government not only to be present at those hearings which are now being covered on an on and off basis from the Canadian consulate in Seattle, but also to make representations expressing the concerns of Canada and Canadians—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

—because more tankers mean greater chances of oil spills, and indicating that in any event a pollution compensation bonding scheme—

An hon. Member: Speech.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

—for all vessels entering the Strait might be instituted—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member move his motion very rapidly.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, Madam Speaker:

—without delay.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Who said "No"?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Oral questions. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise).

Mr. Anguish: A point of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Questions of privilege are usually heard at the end of the question period. I shall be delighted to hear the hon. member then.

Mr. Anguish: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is the same thing.

Mr. Anguish: A point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Would the hon. member please resume his seat.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member will understand that the same ruling applies also to points of order. I shall hear him with pleasure after the question period.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We won't hear him with pleasure.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Elgin.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST ACTION BE TAKEN TO IMPROVE FINANCIAL SITUATION OF FARMERS

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the subject I raised earlier in my motion under Standing Order 43 regarding high interest rates and its effect on farmers, particularly young farmers.

In the face of declining farm commodity prices—pork, beef and potatoes, to mention a few—and in view of the statement of the Minister of Finance that no new programs will be put into motion without increased government revenues, does this mean that no new programs and no new help, either directly to the producers or in co-operation with the provinces, will be given to help farmers cope with the very serious problem of high interest rates at this time of year?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we have met with all the provincial ministers of agriculture: my counterparts and myself finished those meetings on the weekend. The suggestions we received from some of them were encouraging, but none of them are rushing ahead with any kind of program other than those we already have. I am sure the hon. member knows, from his past experience, that many provinces have programs of low interest rates for farm start programs, such as that in Saskatchewan at 8 per cent and that in Nova Scotia which is a low interest program.

As the hon. member is well aware, we initiated programs to provide interest-free loans to farmers. For instance, soybean producers have been provided $15 million in interest-free money from last fall, and it will run until next July. Apple growers have received the same kind of program; rutabaga growers have received the same kind of assistance, and many other producers have as well.

The hon. member mentioned programs for beef producers, pork producers, etc. I met with the Canadian Bankers' Association last night. They told me that there seems to be no lessening of borrowing by these people. Bankruptcies are not what some people are stating; they are not above normal. I have been in constant touch with the minister of agriculture of the province of Ontario, and he has not come forward with any programs similar to what other provinces have for their producers.

● (1420)

Mr. Wise: Madam Speaker, having known the minister for the last seven years, I interpret that answer as being "No".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wise: During the campaign, the minister made a very clear commitment to give additional funding to the Farm Credit Corporation. Does he intend to keep that commitment, or does he intend to break that commitment? Also, during the campaign he gave a clear commitment to grant additional money for agricultural research. Is that commitment going to be kept, or is it going to be broken?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the former minister of agriculture realizes, I am sure, that the commitment to research is not being lessened. There are this year 59 extra man-years for research and several more million dollars. The hon. member also knows full well that when I say we are going to do something, we generally do it unless there are certain circumstances beyond my control. But we are just putting together all the recommendations of provincial ministers of agriculture that have been made to me in the last three weeks for those kinds of programs.

I have asked the farm organizations, also, to tell me how many farmers are in a state of bankruptcy, are not going to plant, etc. A week ago last Tuesday I made that request of the National Farmers' Union. I made the same request of the executive of the Federation of Agriculture, and I have not yet received one reply.

Mr. Wise: Madam Speaker, I suggest to the minister that about 10 per cent, or 25,000, farmers are in very serious difficulty. I think it is a foregone conclusion that there will be some help for the home owners of this country, and I certainly support that. I think it is a foregone conclusion that the minister's position is in support of aid for Chrysler.

When can we expect the Minister of Agriculture to show some tangible evidence of his concern for a sector of the population for whom he, as Minister of Agriculture, has direct responsibility?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, perhaps the former minister in his short term of office did not have the opportunity to do the great things he is suggesting that I do at the present time. We did some of those things with Chrysler, and some small business people and others would like to have them. We are working on this because we represent all people. We know that if Chrysler's workers do not have money, they cannot buy food, and so on. So we work very closely together.

But I can say that farm credit, at 13 per cent interest today, is a very envied interest rate. That is being subsidized by the government at the present time because that rate is less than the government is paying.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL AID FOR HOG PRODUCERS

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I should like to put a supplementary, Madam Speaker. I have listened carefully to the answer given by the Minister of Agriculture. According to him the financial condition of farmers would seem to be fine. Now, could the minister tell us about the condition of a very special group, the hog producers? According to our information, during the past four months they have been incurring a deficit of millions of dollars per week. Is the minister aware of the situation? If so, does he intend to announce a special program to help hog producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member also knows that hogs are a named commodity under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. That fiscal year just finished, at the end of March, and we will be announcing, I hope in the very near future, a stabilization program for hog producers. But to be fair, they geared their production to an unlimited market, and overproduced. They are suffering the consequences of not managing the supply of pork needed for the market; that is why they are now in dire need of assistance. They have said in the past, "Mr. Minister, keep your cotton pickin' fingers off our industry." Now they are saying, "Mr. Minister, please save our industry." If they had managed things a little better, they would not be in the economic position they are right now.

Mr. Nielsen: This sounds like hogwash.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker. I accept the comments which the minister has just made on production control. In that context, is the minister trying to convince producers to join a national board? In any event, considering the present situation of hog producers, and I think he finds the situation dramatic, before the creation of a national board could the minister try to devise a formula for financial assistance now essential for the survival of hog producers?

● (1425)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, we know that hundreds of hog producers, especially young people, who entered the production field in the last year or two are now in the greatest financial difficulty. Regarding having a better kind of marketing system, there seems to be that kind of desire by many of them. The same is true of the potato industry, which the former questioner mentioned. It is in a state of chaos. However, the four provinces have agreed to go ahead with it—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Ontario. I firmly believe that the Quebec producers want to go ahead with it, but I believe Mr. Garon does not want to because it would appear he was favouring the federal system so that they could market together; therefore, he does not want to go ahead with that kind of program at this time.

I think the same thing applies to a hog marketing board, because we know Mr. Garon wants that kind of thing for his provincial producers, but at the same time he is saying the hog industry is in fairly healthy condition. That is not what the producers are telling me. In meetings I held with Quebec producers last week—two different groups—they both pointed out the dire need of assistance that they have mainly because of overproduction and a very poor market for their product.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—PROPOSED PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on the important subject of gasoline prices. In a speech in Toronto on February 12, the Prime Minister said, and I quote from his text:

> The Liberal price hike will be less than half what the Tories plan to inflict on you.

In the same text he said:

> For the consumer that means a gasoline price increase which will not rise by 32 cents a gallon this year as it would with a Clark government.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, does his government today stand by that commitment which he made less than a week before the election?

Right Hon P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would want to re-do the mathematics of it, but in my memory—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I concede to the hon. member for Northumberland that that was a bad start, Madam Speaker. My recollection of the calculation I made to reach this statement about "less than half" was that the Tory budget proposed an increase of $4 for the year 1980—a $4 increase per barrel in the price of petroleum at the wellhead—and that the 18-cent a gallon excise tax was the equivalent of $5, I believe.

An hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Trudeau: Closer to $6 I am told, so if you add half—

An hon. Member: Half?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, half. If you add five and four, you arrive at nine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the New Democratic Party can now tell me what is half of nine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I will tell him, Madam Speaker. It is 4½. Our price, I made quite clear—and that has been the position of this party all along—would be less than $4. Therefore, it is less than half of nine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has just proved that he can do grade one arithmetic—but that does not take us very far. On a serious commitment, he said the price rise will be less than 32 cents per gallon. That is what the Prime Minister promised. Now he is clearly abandoning that commitment.

• (1430)

On the second question, also in terms of an election promise, the Prime Minister said many times in the campaign that if elected there would be no increase in the excise tax on gasoline. Specifically, on January 3 in this city, he said and I quote:

> We will not raise the gas tax and will implement fairer ways to deal with increased energy costs.

Outside the House yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said:

> The Liberals have never said there will be no increase in the excise tax.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: He indicated, indeed, that the government is now considering an excise tax increase. Would the Prime Minister tell us whether, at least, he is going to keep his commitment on excise tax?

Mr. Trudeau: As to the first part of the question, I would remind the hon. member that his question was that I had said "less than half". Am I departing from that? I have just demonstrated to him that my "less than half" was a commitment we have kept and are intending to keep.

I do not know what the exact price will be yet, but it is not going to be $9; it will be less than half of $9. So I am repeating that to him. As to what the price will be in the future, it will depend, of course, on the negotiations conducted by the minister with the various—

Some hon. Members: Excise tax.

Mr. Trudeau: On the excise tax, it was pointed out to me during the campaign by several interviewers that we already had an excise tax. I said, "Yes, of course we have an excise tax; we brought it in to pay the transfer payments to the five eastern provinces". So we are not against an excise tax, and I made this quite clear during the campaign. What we are against is the 18-cent excise tax that this budget was bringing in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is factually wrong on both counts. I quoted where he said there would be no increase in the excise tax.

Mr. Trudeau: And that is what the Speech from the Throne said.

Mr. Broadbent: Yet the minister, outside the House yesterday, said they are considering an increase in the excise tax.

Mr. Lalonde: Not this year.

Mr. Broadbent: In reply to the first question the Prime Minister was referring to a price per gallon increase. He said it would be less than 32 cents per gallon—which he has just taken back.

Mr. Trudeau: No.

Mr. Broadbent: It is going to be less then 32 cents a gallon? All right. The last question I have for the Prime Minister is this: During the campaign he complained about the oil companies getting too much of the revenue coming in for our oil and gas resources. Considering that the profit figures released on the weekend show an average increase for the Big Six of 102 per cent in the first quarter, I should like to ask whether he will at least live up to that commitment to do something about excessive profits in the oil industry and force these companies to treat the consumer in Canada with a little more respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Once again, on the first part of the hon. member's question, I made a commitment during the campaign which is repeated in the Speech from the Throne: "My ministers do not intend to impose an 18-cent increase in the excise tax on transportation fuels."

Some hon. Members: This year.

Mr. Trudeau: That is what we said during the campaign, and that is what we said in the Speech from the Throne; and that is what will happen in this Parliament.

An hon. Member: Do I hear 17 cents?

Mr. Trudeau: I haven't changed what I said on the 32 cents, either, because if the hon. member calculated it he would find that an increase of $9 a barrel, when translated into a gallon of gasoline, is 32 cents. That is why, when I made a demonstration for $9, half of which is $4.50, it was a demonstration which was equally good for the 32 cents. Thirty-two cents is composed of 18 cents, being the excise tax, and 16 cents, being the increase at the wellhead.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Where is your arithmetic?

Madam Speaker: Order please.

An hon. Member: It is 34.

EXCISE TAX ON FUELS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Energy has been shouting from his seat that the undertaking of the Liberal party during the election campaign not to increase the excise tax was an undertaking which would apply to this year only.

Can the Prime Minister confirm that when he made his firm commitment to the people of Canada during the election campaign, he really intended to say there would not be an excise tax increase in 1980 but there would be one later on? Did he simply forget to tell the people that he intended to sock an excise tax increase to Canadians after the calendar year 1980?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did not forget to tell the people, as the Leader of the Opposition puts it. The decision was that we would not reintroduce the Tory budget with the 18-cent excise tax, and that is the commitment which the Speech from the Throne will deliver.

Mr. Clark: Is it the intention of the government—I pose this question to either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy—to propose an increase in the excise tax next year or in subsequent years?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Madam Speaker, that has never been our intention. What we will do next year or the year after will depend on many things.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Since it depends on many things we cannot formulate any intention in that regard. It will depend on the price we negotiate with the producing provinces; it will depend on the budget which in that year the Minister of Finance wants to bring down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My last question, Madam Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Energy. Why was he shouting across the floor of the House, trying to prompt his leader that the commitment which was given applied only to this year? Why did he shout across the floor of the House "Not this year"?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, unlike the Leader of the Opposition, my leader does not need any prompting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: It seems that members on the other side still want to prompt their leader further, Madam Speaker. As to the question raised by the right hon. member, I would remind him that during the last campaign the Prime Minister was asked repeatedly by the press and other people about the principle of the excise tax, and he indicated repeatedly that we would not reintroduce the odious 18-cent excise tax which the Conservatives had put in their budget. That was a clear statement of commitment. Moreover, questions were specifically put to him at the time about the principle of an excise tax. He indicated that we had introduced a 7-cent excise tax, so the principle of an excise tax is not one which this government had refused.

I see the Leader of the New Democratic Party losing his cool again. I suggest he wait for the answer. He will have his opportunity. The Prime Minister, during the last election campaign, stated that as far as the future was concerned this was a matter which would have to be looked into at that time. But the principle of an excise tax was already in the books and it was a matter which would be decided eventually in the future.

DISCUSSION OF PROGRAMS WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Because few provinces are putting in top loading programs in the livestock industry, and in order that we may show the leadership he speaks at great length about, would the hon. gentleman call together all the ministers of agriculture and discuss with them the provincial programs and give some federal direction in this area?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member did not want to create the impression that all provincial ministers of agriculture are in favour of top loading. Some of them are definitely against it. I am sure he is aware of my feelings against it. I do not believe in it because it creates inequity in the agricultural industry for producers who are producing for the domestic market as well as those producing for the international market.

I am sure the hon. member realizes that even in his own province interest rates are subsidized by the Alberta government through some loan programs which offer a fixed rate of interest of 9 per cent. For instance, we have nothing like that for the producers in the province of Ontario, and that creates inequity also. I hope the hon. member has made that kind of representation to his provincial minister of agriculture in Alberta. Some provinces have greater resources to do these kinds of things than other provinces. I am sure the hon. member realizes that his province probably has the greatest resources, but his minister does not believe in that form of top loading that he talks about.

● (1440)

We have a deputy ministers' meeting being held first, I believe next week or the following week, to discuss some of these very things. Under no stabilization program in which I am involved will there be payments to those producers who are already being fully subsidized in some form or another by their own provincial governments.

Mr. Schellenberger: Madam Speaker, I believe, then, that the minister is not prepared to call together the ministers of agriculture from all the provinces. Would he, then, make an interim stabilization payment under the stabilization plan in order to help livestock producers who are in trouble; or would he discuss with the provinces which are top loading, the elimination of feed freight assistance so that there might be some justice in this area?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, the province which gets the most feed freight assistance is British Columbia. The next is one of the maritime provinces. I am not suggesting the hon. member is insinuating that we should disband the feed freight assistance in those provinces, but feed freight assistance is being phased out in practically all of Ontario and all of western Quebec.

However, when the hon. member says I have not suggested to the provincial ministers that we would meet, and should meet, that is not so, because the deputy ministers will be meeting first. If they come to the conclusion that we can forge ahead with some program, we will be calling a meeting immediately after that. But I am sure that the hon. member is aware, for instance, that the minister from Alberta is in favour of an orderly federal marketing system.

The minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan wants me to impose a national marketing system on hog and beef producers. I do not know if the hon. member is suggesting that. The minister of agriculture of Manitoba is suggesting that he should give Ottawa all of his stabilization programs and we should absorb them federally. That kind of suggestion is what we are getting and we are trying to put them together to make a federal program that is workable. They recognize that their provincial programs are just not workable for a federal production entity called agriculture.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NATIVE HEALTH CARE—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN BERGER REPORT—STRUCTURE OF INDIAN BANDS' GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. For several weeks now the minister has had Mr. Justice Berger's report on Indian and Inuit health consultation.

Considering the report's findings on the deplorable state of Indian health and the need for greater Indian control over their health care delivery system, can the minister inform the House whether she will be implementing the four recommendations of the report, and what timetable we can expect?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I met with the National Indian Brotherhood at the beginning of April. I am sorry, but I do not remember the exact date. The hon. member seems to have learned about the Berger report only today. I informed the National Indian Brotherhood at that time that I agree in principle with all the recommendations, and we have started a follow-up process and, of course, a consultation process to implement each of the recommendations; in particular, the one which would lead to a national conference on Indian health, with the Indian community in July of this year.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, this morning, at the first nations constitutional conference, the minister heard complaints from Indian people that members of the medical service branch in her department lack understanding of the role of band councils and of other aspects of Indian life.

Would the minister undertake to provide a program to acquaint her staff with the cultural, social and economic background of the Indian people and of the varied structures of Indian government?

Mrs. Bégin: Madam Speaker, the fact is that one participant this morning mentioned to me that the concept of band councils might not be judged at its proper value by some of my staff in some parts of Canada.

The hon. member may not be aware that within the medical services branch there are meetings of all the staff from all over Canada at different times of the year. The last such meeting was in Cornwall. I attended part of it, again earlier in April. The idea, of course, is always to better the understanding and to bridge the communities as best we can, and that starts with a knowledge of the organizational structures of the Indian communities.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HEALTH AND SAFETY MEASURES TO PROTECT URANIUM MINERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. In view of the very great concern expressed by uranium miners working under federal jurisdiction that they have less health and safety protection than those working under provincial jurisdiction, when does the minister plan to take action to implement the provisions of Ontario's Bill 70 as a regulation to federal health and safety legislation, as was done for Saskatchewan uranium miners?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, in answering this question—which is the first question related to my labour portfolio—I want to take advantage of the occasion to pay tribute to my predecessor, who is not in the House this afternoon but who is slated in two or three months to leave the House, the hon. member for Hamilton West. I would like pay tribute to the work he did during his time in the Department of Labour. In dealing with these problems I am able to benefit from his work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: The problem the hon. member speaks about arises from the fact that in 1978 it was determined by the Department of Justice that part IV of the Canada Labour Code applies to conventional mine safety in uranium mines. Prior to that time we depended upon provincial legislation in relation to mine safety.

When that discovery, or finding, was made, it was necessary for the federal government either to develop regulations and laws in relation to conventional mine safety in uranium mines or adopt, by reference, the provincial laws. What was done is that by reference the federal government at that time adopted the rules of the province of Saskatchewan and those of the province of Ontario, and those are the ones that are in effect at the present time. However, subsequently—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Regan: It is an involved question, but I will try to make my answer very short.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister try to give us an answer that is not too involved?

Mr. Clark: Read every second line.

Mr. Regan: What it amounts to is that the province of Ontario subsequently changed its law after the referencing had occurred, and during the past few months, at the request of the United Steelworkers' Union, the department has been working with them in the developing of a new set of federal regulations. Our target for them to be in effect is late May, and we are hoping to keep to that target.

ENERGY

PROTECTION OF LOWER-INCOME GROUPS FROM SEVERE PRICE INCREASES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister has indicated that negotiations for a significant increase in oil prices are under way. To offset the impact of such increases, the previous government proposed a system of grants and tax credits which would have been especially beneficial in the Atlantic provinces.

What plans does the minister have to shelter Canadians in Atlantic Canada and in the lower and middle-income groups from the severity of such increases?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member was present in the House at the beginning of the question period, but the Prime Minister indicated that the increase for this year, for instance, will be less than half that foreseen by the Tory budget of last December.

As far as the other points raised by the hon. member are concerned, I am beginning discussions with my provincial colleagues, starting this week. I will be meeting with my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces in the course of the next few days.

I will have an opportunity to exchange with them various views about the future of oil pricing in this country and what measures should be taken. I will be very happy to inform the hon. member about developments later on.

• (1450)

Mr. Howie: I thank the minister very much for his answer, whatever it was, and I ask him what plans he has to breathe life into renewable energy research and development in Atlantic Canada, to expedite Fundy tidal development and the Maritime Energy Corporation by investing financially in renewable energy projects in the Atlantic provinces where high energy costs aggravate the problems of regional disparity.

Mr. Lalonde: No doubt this is something that will be discussed with my colleagues in the next few days. However, the hon. member knows, I believe, that additional funding has been provided for those projects over the last few years.

In addition, one of the serious problems, I regret to say, has been the inability of the maritime provinces, in some cases, to agree among themselves on how they wanted to proceed with some of the projects. As the hon. member knows, there were some agreements and there were some disagreements. I would hope the three maritime provinces, in particular, will be able to work very closely together and to co-operate fully with regard to these projects, because they are indeed very important for the future of energy in the maritimes.

AGRICULTURE

PROVISIONS OF MEAT IMPORT LEGISLATION

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I am sure the minister is aware and pleased at the response of Canada's cattle industry to his reference in the throne speech that a meat import act will be introduced to protect both consumers and producers.

Can the minister inform the House and our Canadian cattle industry whether his intended meat import act contains essentially the same types of provisions as the beef import proposals we had drafted in the Thirty-first Parliament?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that the one which was drafted in the Thirty-first Parliament was practically the same as the one drafted in the Thirtieth Parliament but was never presented to Parliament. I can say that it will be essentially the same. There may be a few modifications which I think will make it even better, because I am sure the hon. member felt that his party made a few modifications in the Thirty-first Parliament which made the proposals better, as we did in the Thirtieth Parliament.

Mr. Hargrave: As the minister himself admitted, of course, his proposals never got to the floor of the House of Commons. I should like to ask the minister whether he can indicate what other meat commodities, if any, he is proposing to include in his meat import act, and when can we expect this very important legislation?

Mr. Whelan: At the present time, Madam Speaker, we have to look at all the rules of GATT and we have to abide by them with our trading partners. That may have some effect on whether we can add any other products to the act. But I would say we should be able to bring the legislation to Parliament soon.

BROADCASTING

MINISTER'S SPEECH ON NEW BROADCASTING SYSTEM

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. My question concerns a speech given by him in Calgary yesterday, in which he outlined a novel vision of a new broadcasting system for Canada, the key feature of which is that private broadcasters will be free to concentrate on the lucrative business of airing more cheap U.S. programs dumped into Canada, while the public sector will concentrate on the very expensive business of producing and airing Canadian programs. The reaction to the statement from one private broadcaster, at least, was the following:

It would be in my interest if he did say that . . . but I don't believe that's what he meant.

In view of this, I wonder if the minister would clarify his statement for the benefit of the delighted private broadcasters and the horrified Canadian public.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I think the best suggestion I can make to the hon. member is to take the time and trouble to read my speech, instead of relying on press reports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: Back in office! I should like to tell the minister that I took the time—and it was a great deal of trouble—to read the minister's remarks. In his paper he hinted not only to what I alluded earlier but to the abandonment of the single system, which is a policy retreat of mammoth proportions.

I wonder if I could ask, as a supplementary, what the minister's plans are, or if he has any, for improving and stimulating our creative production industry. Also, when does he intend to let the rest of the country in on these plans, because apparently it is the position right now that Canadian programs are going to be reduced, not enhanced?

Mr. Fox: I think the last part of the hon. member's statement does not take into account the speech I made in Calgary yesterday. The thrust of the speech was that, while people in general have spoken about a single system in Canada, with the technological development one could raise the question as to whether this is still reality, or fiction, at a time when we have satellites in the sky broadcasting directly to people in their homes. It is my intention to promote Canadian content in television.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Fox: I think a number of Canadian cultural agencies have been set up and funded over the years by the government which are producing high-quality Canadian content which has not been used sufficiently by public or private broadcasters in this country.

I think in particular of such organizations as the National Film Board, widely acclaimed across the world, which does now produce a number of programs of high quality which I would personally like to see used to a far greater extent on both the public and the private broadcasting systems in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXCISE TAX ON DOMESTIC WINES—DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON GRAPE AND WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the Minister of Finance in his mini-budget adopted holus-bolus the provisions of the Crosbie budget relating to the excise tax on tobacco and alcohol, but failed to maintain the traditional difference between distilled spirits and wines, and since this is undoubtedly a regressive tax on wines, resulting in a surplus of grapes, a reduction in sales and more unemployment, will the minister—as did the former minister of finance, following representations made to him by the grape and wine industry—agree to implement a more equitable tax on the wine industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am surprised to hear an hon. member on the other side say that anything in the budget presented by the former minister of finance was regressive and suggest that we should adopt anything that is regressive.

All I can say is that I am sure the hon. member is aware of the representations made by the grape growers and the wine industry. Those representations are being reviewed at present.

EXCISE TAX—RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN DISTILLED SPIRITS AND DOMESTIC WINES

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question this time is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that his budget distorts the traditional difference in the tax relationship between distilled spirits and wines, and results in an average percentage increase of 6 per cent on spirits, 29 per cent on beer and 185 per cent on Canadian wines, how does the minister justify this unconscionable increase in tax on Canadian wines?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I join the Minister of Agriculture in deploring such strong language as the hon. member directed against the former minister of finance. I gather he is asking his question today because the former minister is not in his place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I would remind the hon. member that one purpose of the proposal was to remove what was regarded as a real distortion between the impact of taxes upon spirits and wines. If the hon. member would examine the alcoholic content of these various beverages, he would understand that we have moved to a more equitable, relative treatment of these beverages. Nonetheless, other hon. members—including the hon. member for Lincoln—have been making vigorous representations in the interest of wine growers. I have undertaken to look again at these proposals to see whether the complaints are justified and, if so, whether any action is then justified.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR POTATO PRODUCERS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Of course I do not have to remind the Minister of Agriculture of the serious condition of the potato industry in eastern Canada. However, in the medium term, could the minister advise the House whether he has obtained a consensus from his colleages the provincial ministers of agriculture with a view to setting up a potato marketing board in eastern Canada and, in the short term, does the minister intend to announce soon an assistance program for the industry which this year is experiencing the lowest prices in history?

• (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier today in this House, the eastern regions of Canada—Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces—have held provincial ministers' meetings. New Brunswick has taken some action.

The minister of agriculture for New Brunswick has imposed a marketing agency upon the producers there in respect of potatoes. I have the same assurance from the minister of agriculture for Prince Edward Island, that they hope to do the same thing. Representatives of the province of Ontario have said yes, they are willing to go along with the National Farm Products Marketing Council holding hearings to decide what they should do. The producers in Quebec—at least, the ones I have heard from—have said yes, they want that. The members of Parliament from Quebec who have made representations to me have said that also.

I would repeat, again, as a result of a meeting with the minister of agriculture for Quebec in his office in Quebec City I got the feeling that he wanted to go along with this program also. I got the impression that he did not want to make that decision now because he might be looked upon as favouring the federal system, and he did not want to be in that position at this time.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX—POLICY ON APPLICATION TO FARMERS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Has the minister had time to consider the once-in-a-lifetime exemption for qualifying farmers with regard to capital gains taxes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I did consider that and, as the hon. member knows, I propose to release a discussion paper covering the whole question of capital gains, and within that general understanding it will be possible for the hon. member and for me to take a more comprehensive look at such particular concerns as the one he has expressed.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, has the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance received representations from the Minister of Agriculture in line with his election promise to change the valuation day from December 31, 1971, to December 31, 1974; and, if so, is this going to be done?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am aware of the history of that particular proposal because, as the hon. member may recall, I was chairman of the platform committee for this party prior to the last election. I am aware of the nature of the discussions that took place during the campaign and I will have this before me, obviously, if and when I make any further tax changes.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOMM—PARKS CANADA—PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I feel involves a gross abuse in this House and an insult to every member here. Earlier in the week I asked a question of the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) dealing with the relocation of the Parks Canada regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough. At that time I asked the minister two questions: Was the move proceeding as planned; and why did he require more than the 14 days he had assured various people it would take for him to make an announcement?

The minister responded, as reported in Hansard for April 28 at page 453, that he had not given the assurance of 14 days. He also responded by saying that he had made a decision in his own mind and was reviewing it with his colleagues.

My question of privilege is this. Rather than honouring the responsibilities of a minister of the Crown in answering members of Parliament who ask questions on behalf of their constituents, the minister responsible for the move of Parks Canada's regional office from Cornwall to Peterborough chose to discuss it with his colleagues, who in turn gave information to the media the day after, rather than to this House. The hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) advised the media the day after that he and the minister thought the same. We all know how the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas feels.

My question of privilege is this, Madam Speaker. If ministers of the Government of Canada opposite refuse to answer questions in this House, asked responsibly, by hon. members in the interests of their constituents, trying to find out what are the problems that create all this indecision, then I maintain that Parliament will lose its credibility with the people of Canada and ministers opposite deserve to be reprimanded.

I appeal to you, Madam Speaker, to intercede in this matter. My reasons in support of my position can be found in statements by the minister, first of all in March to the acting mayor of the city of Peterborough, the warden of the 18 municipalities of Peterborough county, that he would make that decision prior to the opening of Parliament, and that he would then announce his intention.

Following that, as reported in the Peterborough Examiner of April 12:

> The minister promised the employees he would make a decision in a week or ten days—

He gave those employees of Parks Canada the assurance of a decision in that time frame.

In addition, as reported in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder of April 16 we find the report that Harley Starks, vice president of the local of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, said that the minister had also promised them that if the issue does go to cabinet he will announce a decision before Parliament sits.

The minister has said there were two deadlines. First he mentioned 14 days before Parliament reconvened. Let me refer to The Globe and Mail of April 25, where it is reported:

> Employees say that Mr. Roberts, at a meeting on March 12, promised a decision in two weeks or before the opening of Parliament at the latest. Parliament opened on April 14.

My question of privilege is further substantiated in this morning's paper.

I directed the question to the minister on Monday of this week. The minister said he had made up his mind that he would not respond to a member of Parliament. On what authority does a minister of the Crown take it upon himself to circumvent parliamentary procedure? The purpose of the question period is for members of Parliament to learn what are the programs intended by the ministerial people on the other side of the House. The minister has said he has made up his mind that he will not tell the member of Parliament for Peterborough, but he will tell his colleagues; and then his colleague the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas, when interviewed by a reporter of a local paper here, advised that the minister does support that hon. member. We all know what that hon. member's feelings are.

As a result of that interview we find an article in today's paper under the heading "Parks Canada move vetoed—". This reminds me of the Eldorado affair which was also vetoed. It is vetoed regardless of cost and without accountability by government. It is done without any answers to members in the opposition.

I would remind you, Madam Speaker, that it is our job as members of the opposition to represent our constituents. We cannot represent our constituents when we have ministers on the other side of the House who completely disregard the parliamentary process.

I appeal to you, Madam Speaker, to intercede on my behalf, on behalf of every member of the opposition, and on behalf of every backbencher on the government side of the House, to hold these ministers responsible, and to require them to account for their actions in running the Government of Canada. This is what Parliament is all about. As a recent member of this House I am appalled by this situation, and I am sure the Speaker of this House will intercede on my behalf, making these ministers accountable to members of the opposition in the proper fashion. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I believe that the hon. member's point is unfounded. I can understand why he would wish to stand up and present his point so vociferously, because it is in the interest of his constituents. I am sure that that is an obligation to the hon. member and that he finds it an attractive position to take.

Nevertheless, to the best of my belief, the answers which I have given to the hon. member in the House are accurate answers to the questions which he raised. Whenever I have met with the various people concerned, I have indicated that I did wish to take a decision very quickly and that I hoped to do so within ten days or two weeks. Always I emphasized that I could not give an absolute guarantee on the time. I was also careful to point out that I would take my decision quickly, but that that decision might very well necessitate consultation with my colleagues.

It is true that I took my decision rather quickly, and that the matter is one on which I am in consultation with my colleagues at the present time. There are various options which I have put forward for consideration and discussion, and the rumours and newspaper headlines to which the hon. member has referred are unfounded. The decision has not yet been finally taken.

The hon. member may prefer to believe the rumours which he reads in the newspapers, and I cannot prevent him from doing so, but I will tell him honestly that the final decision to which he has referred has not yet been taken. As I have told the hon. member, consultation is in process and I believe that the decision will be taken in a very few days.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the comments of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) and to the thoroughly inadequate reply of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts). As the minister well knows, the former Liberal government had made extensive studies of the appropriateness of the move of Parks Canada from Cornwall to Peterborough and, in fact, was only waiting for the conclusion of the 1979 election to announce their decision.

When the government of which I was a member took power, I was minister of the environment and I accepted, after careful consideration, the information which was available to the former Liberal government. On the basis of that information given to me by my officials, I made a decision last summer that the move should proceed. That decision was clear, unequivocal and was made because we could not—nor was it right—allow the public servants in the department and the people of both Cornwall and Peterborough to go on not knowing the intentions of the government.

To listen to the minister, one would think that no decision had ever been made. He is now dithering around for 14 days, then ten days and then another 14 days and then going to his colleagues before making up his mind about something on which there was a clear decision made by a government of Canada, and it was made last summer. The conduct of the minister is absolutely disgraceful, because what the minister is doing is going back on a decision which was made many months ago on the basis of the information, the accounting and the propriety of such a move, all of which was instituted by the former Liberal government prior to the election of 1979.

The hon. member for Peterborough has brought this matter to you, Madam Speaker, as a question of privilege, which it is most clearly. If members in this House cannot receive a better answer from a minister than the ones which we have just had to listen to, then there is no use having question period. This minister is still misleading the House because it is quite clear that the hon. member from Cornwall has gone public and stated that in his view—and it is well known—Parks Canada should not move, and his view is the same now as that of the minister's.

Without actually giving their decision in the House and coming clean with the media, this government, in effect, has in a circuitous way not only made a decision but communicated that decision. They have completely circumvented the right of the hon. member for Peterborough to raise that matter in this House on behalf of his constituents and receive an honest answer from a government which, in this case, is not only acting dishonestly, but shabbily.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has not brought up a new matter, therefore I will not allow the hon. minister to reply.

I have listened to the arguments presented very carefully, and I do not really see a question of privilege in the question raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) nor in the argument raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. It is very much a matter of one member not being satisfied with the answer which he received during the question period. Beauchesne very clearly states that such a situation does not constitute a question of privilege.

Therefore, I would assume that both members are satisfied with the arguments brought forward by the minister. If not, there is ample occasion to ask other questions and to go into debate at some other time.

MR. ANGUISH—EJECTION OF GUESTS FROM MEMBERS' GALLERY

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A little more than an hour ago some guests of mine who had been given signed passes by myself were ejected from the members' gallery.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I am already listening to one question of privilege, and I cannot entertain a second one at the moment. I will entertain the second privilege later on, but not at the moment.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, these guests of mine who were ejected from the gallery are all treaty Indians. They came from the reserves of Dillon, Ministikwan, Joseph Bighead, Waterhen Lake, LaLoche, Fond du Lac, Flying Dust, Onion Lake, Thunderchild, Salteaux Reserve, Moosomin Reserve, Mudie Lake Reserve, Patuanak or the English River Band and Loon Lake. People from these bands were affected or will be affected within the next couple of days. The reason they were ejected from the gallery is because they were not wearing ties. I submit that ties are not—

Madam Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. The matter of the galleries in this House is one of my responsibilities. The hon. member may come to my chambers and discuss any grievance he has concerning the matter.

I would like to say, though, that yesterday when these people asked to be admitted to my gallery, I had already begun the parade to come into the House of Commons and, therefore, I was not consulted on the matter, and someone applied the rule very strictly and decided that they could not admit these people to that particular gallery because they were not wearing ties. We do admit to the gallery people of other nationalities who do not wear ties. Had I been aware of the matter when it occurred, I would have allowed these people to come into my gallery. I do apologize profusely for what happened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I understand that these people were ejected from your gallery. I think that it should also be the decision of this House that an apology be extended to these people.

Mr. Blais: She just did.

Mr. Anguish: If these people are still in the gallery, they should be allowed to come in to the members' gallery now.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please come to my chambers later on to discuss this matter.

MR. ROBERTS—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF LANGUAGE USED BY HON. MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER SOUTH

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker—

Mr. Waddell: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Roberts: I regret any explanation received—

Mr. Waddell: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please resume his seat. I shall now recognize the hon. Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) providing he is not speaking on the question of privilege on which I have just ruled.

Mr. Roberts: No, Madam Speaker, I believe I am not. I am referring not to the question of privilege which was raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), but I believe that in his comments the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) did say that I had misled the House; and I believe he said—although I would have to check—that my comments were dishonest and shabby, which would, I think, constitute a question of privilege for me. It is on that point that I rise. I believe that is unparliamentary language which should be withdrawn.

The hon. member said that he had taken a decision in this matter and that I was pretending to take a new stance. I have never denied the decision was taken. I have made it clear to the House and I have made it clear outside the House that the previous decision was under review, so my comments in the House on that point have not been misleading.

The hon. member also commented on the length of time taken for me to review this matter. I think the record will bear out my following statement, and that is that it took him longer to take that decision when the matter was brought to his attention than it has taken for me to deal with it up to this point.

I think the language the hon. member used is unparliamentary and I would wish to see it withdrawn.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have not heard anything in the intervention made by the hon. member that I felt was unparliamentary. However, since the minister has raised the matter, I shall check Hansard and act accordingly.

MR. WADDELL—PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—IMPROVED FACILITIES FOR HANDICAPPED

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have another question of privilege but before I raise it I may say, with great respect, that Your Honour referred to other people getting into the gallery without ties as people of other nationalities. May I remind Your Honour that these people are Canadians, native Canadians, important Canadians—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: —and we should not let that go on the record.

I might say with respect to that point, Madam Speaker, that I too had a delegation of high school students from Kelowna. The girls were allowed in the gallery because they do not wear ties, whereas the boys had to go into the ladies' gallery because they did not have ties. I shall not pursue the matter, but perhaps we can pursue it privately and clean up our gallery act in the House of Commons to be in tune with the modern world.

I rise now on a question of privilege that is much more pleasant, Madam Speaker. On November 26, 1979, I moved in the House, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), as follows:

That this House notes the difficulties handicapped people face inside the Parliament buildings and urges the appropriate authorities to investigate these facilities with a view to suggestion for correction.

The motion was passed by this House. In my prelude to the motion I said, as reported at page 1676 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, today I invited to the House of Commons a group of handicapped people from British Columbia. They came in their wheelchairs and were at first unable to get into the building. Eventually they got in through a side door which had to be unlocked. For a while they were unable to enter the parliamentary dining room: we had to carry them down the stairs.

Finally, not all of them were able to get into the House of Commons, though there were only about seven or eight of them in wheelchairs. The marble staircases pose a danger when one has to carry people in, and the situation is really shocking.

Then I put the motion. I now have in my possession a report from Mr. R. A. Hill, property manager for Public Works Canada dated December 7, 1979, concerning facilities for the handicapped in the parliamentary complex. I am very pleased to have this report and to tell the House that many things that the House objected to have been remedied, and specifically in four respects.

By May 31, 1980, it will be possible for a new or at least a renovated entrance to be built to the main building under the Peace Tower; the entrance to the restaurant is going to be changed in the summer recess of 1980; there is already a new entrance to the West Block which was completed last December. As a matter of fact, Madam Speaker, the night the House fell, I too fell over that entrance so I realize that the Thirty-first Parliament had achieved something. Finally, there is a procedure under way to change the entrance to the House of Commons.

I raise this as a question of privilege because I wanted to bring to Your Honour's attention and to that of the House the excellent work done by the people responsible in response to the resolution of this House. I know, Madam Speaker, that you are particularly aware of and interested in the progress of this matter, and although I cannot officially do so, I should like to indicate that you could perhaps follow up the matter, being the person responsible for the environs of this House and the excellent work progress that is being made. We hope it will be completed by the end of the summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The remarks made by the hon. member are, of course, well noted and the program to which he refers is under way. I have not had time since assuming this function to see whether it is proceeding at a pace sufficient to accommodate everyone who wants to come to the House of Commons or to the Parliament buildings.

I certainly agree with the hon. member that this place and this building should be as accessible as possible to everyone. I am glad to have the support of the hon. member in order to implement that program as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the reply to question 106 is as follows:

The management of Air Canada advises: Hangars and other buildings formerly owned by Air Canada and situated on Crown land at Winnipeg International Airport were sold to CAE Aircraft Ltd., pursuant to an agreement dated September 1, 1969, under the terms of which CAE Industries Ltd. acted as guarantor. (a) Six; (b) Air Canada considers this cost information proprietary; (c) and (d) The purchase price was fully paid and thus, CAE acquired title to the six buildings; (e) Following full payment, CAE Aircraft Ltd. was free to sell or otherwise dispose of any building, or buildings, acquired under the agreement.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it has come to my attention that the government may be considering calling the Bank Act as an order of the day for tomorrow. I know this is not the usual day to ask a House business question, but it would be very helpful if the government House leader could confirm that that is the case now.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I would be glad to do so if my colleague would confirm to me that we will end debate on Bill C-19 today. It would help us to make up our minds. However, we will let my colleague know later on today, depending on the progress of Bill C-19.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—JAMMING OF BROADCASTS OF HOUSE PROCEEDINGS—DOCUMENT TABLED

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if there is unanimous consent, I would ask the House's indulgence to revert to tabling of documents so that my colleague, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), could table a document on behalf of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox).

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree that we return to tabling of documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I am tabling a document as a result of an exchange on a question of privilege that occurred on Friday between the hon. member for Saskatoon-West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox). I would ask leave to table a document that was requested by the hon. member for Saskatoon West.

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF PROGRAM PERIOD

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Axworthy that Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise again and continue debate on Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act.

As you will note from the beginning of my remarks, this is a bill with regard to budgetary matters and the widest possible discussion on the budgetary program of this government was permitted. I would like to continue where I left off. I believe I have about 12 minutes left and I will review very quickly the matter of energy pricing as provided by the leaders of the four western premiers found in their statement arising from the conference in Lethbridge.

I mentioned that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) was preparing fully for his journey out west to negotiate a price for oil, and subsequently the relationship of natural gas to oil. In preparing himself, the minister found it appropriate to start tossing punches left and right by in effect bringing forth a report that was intellectually dishonest. This was done by exercising the force majeure clause in the Syncrude contract and by recently publicly speculating on the possibility of a refinery tax on crude oil. I also understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), that great wizard of economics or perhaps the great wizard of ooze or economic ooze, is planning another punch against western Canada, in particular Alberta, with regard to some possible changes to the Public Utilities Transfer Act. What a climate for negotiating an energy price agreement with western Canada!

As I said yesterday in talking about the economic leadership that is provided to the nation, I had referred to the filling of this vacuum which now exists on the other side, because the government of the day is not grappling with the real economic problems of this nation. I had stated that this gap was now being filled by some of the leaders of the provincial governments across this nation.

It was particularly profound that the four premiers of western Canada got together to attempt to lay a foundation of economic policy for this nation and refer it to the federal government. What was the second point that the premiers dwelt on? They stated that action is required to reduce Canada's reliance on foreign capital. Among steps required are a variety of tax measures which influence both the outflow of Canadian savings and the inflow of foreign savings. The federal government should examine such measures to increase the availability and effective mobilization of domestic savings for investment in Canada.

Indeed, they went on to say that incentives should be put in place to encourage Canadians and Canadian companies to buy equities in companies doing business in Canada and so ensure that the dividends and investments of these companies stay within Canada. The previous government of the Thirty-first Parliament was moving in that direction, a needed step.

Furthermore, the premiers went on to say that federal and provincial governments should give consideration to ongoing co-ordination of essential borrowing by governments and Crown corporations in international markets.

The last time that I looked at the extent of provincial borrowings outside the nation, which was several years ago, it exceeded $7 billion. Some of us proposed, and I was among them, that some of the accumulation of funds if kept in Alberta in a fund called the heritage savings trust fund might be lent to the provinces, if they so requested, to pay off some of this debt. Since that time interest rates have skyrocketed.

What was said is that federal and provincial ministers of finance could, for example, meet annually to plan and co-ordinate foreign borrowing in the light of current economic circumstances and the need to reduce Canada's reliance on foreign capital. This is suggested leadership in dealing with the economic, financial and fiscal climate of this nation.

The premiers also noted that the recent major natural gas discoveries in Alberta and British Columbia could provide a means to increase Canada's exports, thereby improving the balance of payments and strengthening the dollar. Subject to firm assurances by the National Energy Board that long-term Canadian natural gas needs are protected, the premiers urged the federal government to consider approval of further natural gas exports. Such exports should be tied, if practical, to a commitment to build the Alaska natural gas pipeline.

Recently in this House we moved a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to direct the National Energy Board to consider the gasification of coal as long-term reserves following behind the existing natural gas reserves of western Canada. Not only is that essential, it is practical, and it should be done because the natural hydrocarbon reserves of western Canada are indeed very large. The minister indicated that he was not going to consider the gasification of coal as a backup source of natural gas to the vast fields of natural gas now existing in western Canada.

The western premiers recognized that an essential part of developing a national economic strategy requires the federal government to reduce the size of its budgetary deficit, and ultimately to balance its budget over the economic cycle. What has the government done? The government has skyrocketed the deficit to $14 billion in the current year. The premiers noted that it was important to distinguish between government spending on programs and services and government investment on capital projects which will enhance Canada's economic position, for example such things as port facilities, railway upgrading, hydroelectric and other energy projects.

They went to say that while a reduction in the federal deficit would likely have some adverse short-term effects, they could be offset by undertaking certain large, viable capital projects. These projects would have the desired effect of increasing employment, which this bill is all about, in a period of slower economic growth and at the same time providing productive assets which will strengthen the Canadian economy in the 1980s.

The premiers also noted that an important step in resolving Canada's balance of payments problem is to be able to identify the source of the difficulty. In 1979, for example, there was a $4.4 billion financial drain from Canada, the source and nature of which is not known, entered in the balance of payments tabulation as errors and omissions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member, but the bill before us relates to an employment tax credit. With all due respect, I think the hon. member has strayed a bit from the central point of the bill. Can he return to the subject?

Mr. Yurko: Perhaps I will, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I will come to the point of incentives for continued expansion of the housing stock, which is vitally important in western Canada where the population is growing significantly. There is a shift from central Canada and eastern Canada to western Canada.

There are some people in this nation who forget about the economic contributions of Ontario to confederation in terms of providing employment for the graduates of the rest of Canada. For 25 years or more the economic activity in this nation has been primarily in Ontario. It was there for very specific reasons. Ontario had some economic advantages in confederation. It has subsidies which reversed and provided the opportunity for growth in Ontario. It was located strategically in terms of the vast population in the United States. It was a manufacturing centre. It was the research centre of Canada.

Ontario provided jobs for graduate boys and girls from all over Canada when there were no jobs anywhere else. I can vouch for that because in 1950, as a fresh graduate from Alberta, as one of 64 chemical engineers, literally 62 of us had to find employment in Ontario. Ontario provided the employment sustenance for youngsters from all over Canada. Ontario to a large degree sustained this nation in economic activity, research and development for a large number of years when there was no activity in many parts of the nation. I know all about it. I have repeatedly gone through the advantages that Ontario has enjoyed in confederation.

Just as in the United States, this situation in Canada has changed. As in the United States, capital and labour flows where there is opportunity. Indeed, if there is anything we have in this nation, it is that we have too large a deterrent effect on the flow of capital and labour to where the opportunity is. Just as in the United States where economic opportunities moved from the east coast to the central United States, then to the west coast and on to Texas, a similar situation is happening in Canada. It is a good situation. I have no difficulty with the fact that Ontario enjoyed its time in confederation as the most prominent and fastest growing area in confederation, but the situation has changed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue. Again I call to his attention the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I will not intrude upon the privileges of hon. members for very long, perhaps 30 or 40 seconds. I simply want to make the point that with regard to providing employment, Ontario played a vital role in this area in past years. The economic climate in the nation is shifting. Some of it is shifting eastward because of the resources in the Newfoundland area. Some of it is shifting westward. Indeed, some is shifting northward in a massive way to some areas of the Yukon.

I want to make the point that in a federated country, one federated of different parts, regions and potentials, this is a good thing. This is a wonderful thing that all of us as Canadians enjoy because Canadians can move anywhere in this vast land, this vast country of riches, and accept opportunity. In most cases that can be done without sacrifice and without need to give up on your culture, your language and your roots.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy); he has a very difficult job and I wish him well. I would also like to congratulate Madam Speaker on her appointment and all those who sit in the chair.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has made a very simple request. I wish to quote from his statement when submitting the amendment:

> The bill is very simple in its purpose. It is simply to extend for one further year the application of the employment tax credit program, a program which was brought in 1978 to provide a range of tax credits to private employers for creating additional or incremental employment.

I wish to quote another remark:

> In the last year the tax credit program has provided close to 50,000 additional jobs, according to the best figures that we have, at a cost of approximately $100 million.

I then go to the next phrase, which hits me between the eyes:

> Our estimates and evaluations show that about 60 per cent of those under the program were young people.

Good so far, but then he goes on to say:

> The tax credit program seems to have provided a degree of benefit, particularly in the manufacturing industry, and it has had a fair degree of regional application.

The emphasis is mine. I have only two brief comments to make to the minister. If I can have his attention for no more than four minutes, I will make those comments and then sit down.

I wish to point out that as a small businessman I have had occasion to come across this program at the receiving end, and I feel that the total legislation is really open to abuse. The evidence that I have and which I would like to pass on is, to borrow a phrase, that it has had a fair degree of abuse.

I know of a number of occasions where small businessmen have applied to the local Manpower office for someone to fill an appointment or job with the result that an employee from the Manpower office journeyed to and solicited the employer to sign up for this program saying that he qualified for this program because it is a new job. I submit to the minister that this is not what the legislation was intended for in the first place, but it is happening. Estimates seem to point to 30 per cent or 40 per cent abuse. It is being abused in this way and employment tax credit is being applied under the program although these people would have been hired in any case. If the amendment is passed, as I am sure it will be, I hope the minister will undertake an honest evaluation of the program as far as that aspect is concerned.

In conclusion, I should like to pass on a little information to the minister and ask him possibly to intercede with his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in connection with a matter which is very closely linked to employment and job incentive programs in northern Alberta. I should like to draw to the minister's attention that 16,000 jobs were created during the construction phase of Syncrude. Ten thousand of these were in Alberta and six thousand in the rest of Canada. Now a word about the cost-benefits. The cost of construction was over $2 billion, and of that sum more than $300 million was spent in central Canada just to purchase goods used in construction. Virtually every province received orders in connection with this gigantic plant. In addition, Syncrude created 3,200 permanent jobs, since increased to 3,800. With the Cold Lake plant ready to go at 2.3 times this size, agreement on oil pricing with Alberta which would allow this work to go ahead is of the highest importance since it would create many more jobs than would the legislation before us.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I should like to take part in this debate, but before I speak to the bill I should like to make a couple of comments. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) on his appointment to the cabinet. I should like to say to him that a good many people from western Canada are putting a lot of faith in him that he will give a strong voice and accept representations from western Canada.

I should also like to say, in regard to some references made prior to the opening of this Parliament about NDP members being something like eunuchs in harems, that I have taken a sample survey of the caucus and in each case when I asked the members if they were eunuchs they said no. We have been far too busy with our parliamentary duties to be seeking out any harem and I hope other members can say the same.

This debate has gone on before. The minister himself refers to the program as a temporary measure designed to ensure that an effective job-creation program continues while the details of an employment program to be introduced as soon as possible are finalized. The word that catches my eye here is the word "temporary." Temporary programs have to stop. Band-aid measures have gone on for far too long and they have helped to create the problem instead of lessening it.

I do not think the government has stopped to evaluate the benefits of the band-aid programs which have gone on for so long. For almost 113 years Conservatives and Liberals have been responsible for the administration and they have put us into the devastating economic times in which we find ourselves today. We are living in a country today which is told in the Speech from the Throne it must look to the future and accept the restraints which are to be put upon us, that we must live within our means. The throne speech also says we shall have to make sacrifices to accept the challenges of the 1980s.

I see no need for Canadians to sacrifice to the extent they are sacrificing today in a country where we have so much, a high level of technology, a high standard of living and resources unparalleled anywhere in the world. At this time we find people leaving their homes and losing their jobs. Bill C-19 does nothing in the long term to reduce the level of unemployment to an acceptable one. The minister should be aware that as a band-aid measure this program extending employment tax credits will do nothing but complicate matters instead of lessening the unemployment burden in the long term. I am sure the hon. gentleman was intellectually inspired by the remarks of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), who made a very stimulating speech the other day on the bill before us.

I should also like to tell the minister that we are happy the government was defeated in the last election. I say this because Brezhnev would not have been much different from Clark. Things in the country which Brezhnev controls are controlled by the government; every facet of the people's lives is controlled by the government with little regard for democratic procedure. In the country I am referring to, that is done through a dictatorial type of government and the government is the one that is reflected upon. You see, Mr. Speaker, in the case of this government, if we had continued without that election the people would have suffered hardships almost identical, not at the hands of this government but at the hands of the Conservatives and the multinational corporations to which they would have handed over control totally. To me, such a situation is unacceptable. I am glad the election came along and that the Conservative government was defeated.

Mr. Kempling: Another socialist sucker!

Mr. Anguish: As I said, the Liberals and the Tories have created this problem over the last 113 years. It has become a permanent one. Unemployment can no longer be treated as a temporary problem which will go away one day if we keep hanging on to band-aid measures of the kind we are now being asked to extend. It is a permanent problem and we shall have to adopt permanent solutions if we wish to overcome it.

According to official figures almost one million are unemployed. In real figures the total is more like a million and a half. They are tired of temporary measures too. Although a few hundred people may be made happy with temporary employment, enticing them to buy homes with heavy mortgages and to obtain easy access to credit from banks which gobble up their hard-earned cash and savings, what actually happens? They are left without their jobs, the temporary measures are over, the unemployment problem is still there and they have nothing to rely on; they have no savings, no economic strategy to which to look forward in hard and pressing times.

I should like now to talk for a few moments about some of the programs the government started and which I thought were good steps toward bringing unemployment in this country under control, programs which go back as far as the late 1960s and the early 1970s. One program I was very happy to see brought out in the late sixties was a program called New Starts. The concept of some of the New Starts programs was to look at ways of training adults to enable them to participate more fully in the work force. In Saskatchewan they started a program that I was very familiar with. Many methods of training adults were created there. Life skills programs improved not just the level of technical training but also the way people cope with the things happening in everyday life. There were many other programs—right down to the basic literacy level—which were introduced to Saskatchewan New Starts and which were quite acceptable to Canadians who required the services which New Starts could provide.

● (1600)

They were given a five-year mandate to develop these programs of unique ways of training adults, and there was an extension given to the program in the early seventies; but upon completion of the program most of the work done was put on microfilm or microfish and shipped back to Ottawa, and now the people across this country do not know what happened to the program developed by Saskatchewan New Starts and the other New Starts such as those in Alberta and in the maritimes, to which people were receptive and warmed to and which provided much benefit. Now these programs have been shelved to a large extent. They are not moved out to where they can do the most good. I thought that those progrms were a good link in the chain of problem solving and doing some kind of planning where there was a problem—and obviously the government here identified it as unemployment—and then some training was carried out. However, then they should be moved to a work force which has an industrial strategy and long-term economic planning that can ensure some kind of security in this country.

There is another program I can think of and on which I would like to compliment the government for its input. Incidentally, the New Starts program was funded federally and administered through the provincial government, which I think is a very good approach. The Saskatchewan training opportunity program was funded federally and administered by the provincial government.

Some of the programs took the approach of training people to take over industries within their areas where there was some interest. I think of the Saskatchewan training opportunity program at the Loon Lake reserve within the area I represent. The operation was a tourist operation. It had been leased out to a private operator for many years at a very low rate, and the band was not receiving much of a return from that operation. The training program was funded by the federal government and, again, I commend the government for that. The program was to train the people of that area to operate their own resort and to train them in areas of basic education, life skills, management skills and the technical skills which are required to run an economically viable operation.

What happened? It turned out that that program was actually a band-aid measure. At the end of the period of time during which the government had offered funding, it cut it off completely without any evaluation whether that program had succeeded or not. I say that Bill C-19 does much the same thing. There will be very little evaluation and very little done to overcome the permanent problem which has come upon us, that of unemployment.

I think what Bill C-19 does is continue to give subsidies to large companies. If they are manufacturing a product which people in Canada today are not in a position to buy, when the program is over people are laid off and the company is in bad shape because of large inventories they cannot move on the market because economic times are so bad. Small businesses cannot really take advantage of the program either because small businesses are not in an economic position to take on new staff, and the very few which are do so to clean up things which would not normally stimulate long-term jobs within their companies. Small businesses take short-term measures to clean up their own in-house operations.

When I was in business just prior to being elected a member of Parliament, I could not take advantage of the employment tax credit program. It was of no benefit to my company. My company did not qualify under the program, and I did not have extra capital to use this program to full advantage, as do large corporations.

I see the program is not benefiting other areas of the country. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen), when speaking about this bill the other day, said that many people are being laid off right now who will not benefit from the employment tax credit program. He referred largely to the lumber industry in British Columbia and in his own riding. In Saskatchewan alone this month three mills have closed down, and one plywood plant has closed down because of the bad economic times we are facing.

I submit that employment is not really the big problem in this country today. The big problem is that we do not have any long-term economic or industrial strategy to keep this country moving and our people in the standard of living to which they have grown accustomed. We let them down with band-aid measures such as the one we are being asked here today to extend. I think we should sit down and evaluate what has happened. We should take a look at this country and, looking back as far as we want to, we will find that those permanent problems are here and will plague us for a long time into the future.

My riding has a largely agricultural background. The agriculture industry has likely been the number one industry for quite a number of years now, although it is over-shadowed now by some resource development such as heavy oil development, some potash development to the south, mineral development in the north, mining development in the north and a timber industry which was thriving until we hit these bad economic times. Now lumber companies cannot afford to carry their inventories and they are laying off large staffs. I submit that the people in The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency will not benefit at all if Bill C-19 is passed. There is nothing in it that I can think of that would benefit them.

I would like to hear from the minister what industries or small businesses would be employing people in Canada who are being laid off now. What short-term jobs can they go into? People are being laid off in the wood industry, the lumber industry and the auto industry across this country. Those people have a hard time finding jobs. They are some of the hard core unemployed. How is this program going to help them? I submit that it will help not at all. I reiterate that it will help large companies and no one else in this society of ours. In fact, in the long term it will not even help large companies because they will have been helped by a band-aid measure, and if they cannot see through this very devious program of spending $100 million of taxpayers' dollars, then they are not running a very efficient shop either.

Communities like Meadow Lake, The Battlefords, La Loche, Patuanak and many others have very little manufacturing and very few large businesses. What help is this program going to be to the people in those places? I think of young people who are suffering the largest amount of unemployment or the brunt of unemployment in places like Loon Lake, Hafford, Turtleford and Frenchman Butte. What will this program do for them?

The other day I looked at the youth employment program that is being offered by the federal government. Five applications came in from two communities in my constituency. The deadline has passed, but I do not think the government had any commitment to telling the people about the availability of that program. I am sure many young people throughout this country want to work, but when I know that only five applications came from the riding I represent and that they came from just two communities, there has to be something wrong with the way the government has put this program out. The people do not have access to information about the program until after the deadline cuts it off.

On becoming a member of Parliament and moving into my seat in the House of Commons, I received a press release about the youth employment program the federal government had introduced, and by the time I got information about the program it was only a couple of days before the deadline. How can people have access even to these band-aid programs, with which, incidentally, I disagree, if they do not know about them? The government does not pass out information. There is no good, clear line of communication.

I say that Bill C-19 must be repealed. We should not extend a program which helps worsen the economic times of this couontry by spending taxpayers' dollars with no clear direction. There is no clear commitment to the Canadian people. We should be more concerned about addressing ourselves to high interest rates and the lack of economic policy and industrial strategy which I mentioned before.

I think this government, instead of bringing in such temporary measures as the employment tax credit program, should be looking at problem solving, the first step of which is to raise an awareness of the problem among members of the government. I think all members of the House and also the Canadian people realize that we are in troubled times now and that we face problems in this country.

The second step is to define the problem. I believe a gross error has been committed by the Conservative government which was just defeated as well as the Liberal government which is in office now because the problem to which this bill is addressed is defined as the problem of unemployment. That is wrong. The problem is not unemployment, the problem is that we have no economic policy to guide this country and no industrial strategy.

The NDP has been calling for an economic policy and an industrial strategy for some time now. These policies are set by the Canadian people through our conventions on the basis of thorough research which has been done by those people as well as by our research people. They have developed programs which I believe the government should study seriously so as to guide us with some kind of economic strategy.

The next step in the problem solving method is to establish some criteria on which this House would be willing to work so that we could have rules to follow. It is obvious that members of the House do not always wish to follow the rules that are set down for them. On the basis of those criteria we should look at all possible solutions instead of keeping a closed mind and pushing through all the measures possible because there is a majority government opposite. What we should do is to provide solutions following consultation, as was promised in the throne speech, with all members of Parliament, and members of Parliament should seek out solutions and ideas from their constituents.

It is amazing to see the large amount of information which can be gathered from one's constituents, whether one travels by car, by train or by aeroplane. The ideas of the Canadian people are very important and are often overlooked. I think we should gather together all the solutions at our disposal to implement an economic policy and an industrial strategy. Once we have all these solutions in hand, we should look at the criteria.

Implementation is the next step in the problem solving process, and it should be carried out jointly instead of trying to push through a band-aid program, as the Conservatives did and the Liberals are doing now, asking for the extension of a program which does nothing but compound the problems in this country by spending money which should not be spent and, in the long term, creating more unemployment. It appears that in the short term this legislation would actually reduce unemployment, but in fact it does not.

After implementation, I should like to convey to the minister, through you, sir, that some kind of evaluation of all the programs we have had for many years should be made. Part of that evaluation should take into consideration the recommendations contained in the Auditor General's report, the 15 or so studies that were implemented during the six-year term of office of the Auditor General to improve the efficiency and accountability of the government to the Canadian people. The evaluation process should consider all those studies in the context of the definition of the problem and compare them to see whether or not the problems which existed last year are no longer here today. That should be implemented after the evaluation has taken place.

That is what I mean when I say that long-term planning should involve a problem solving method and should develop the needed economic policy and industrial strategy to guide this country in the future. At a time of high unemployment anything is better than nothing, but this bill certainly brings us no improvement. As I mentioned to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry, the temporary program in fact accelerates the permanent problems we have. It only appears to solve the problem. I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to reconsider this legislation, although I am sure this bill will be passed. I should like to ask that the extension of this program not be considered in the House.

Before closing I should like to reiterate the words of John Foster Dulles which have been quoted in the House. He said that the measure of success is not whether we have a tough problem to deal with but whether it is the same problem we had last year. In fact, it is the same problem and it has been the same problem we have had for decades. I say this has to stop. The program certainly does not help the people on the 14 reserves in The Battlefords-Meadow Lake constituency and it does not help the people who are being laid off from the mills and the plywood plants.

The Indian people are not even included in the unemployment statistics to which the Minister of Employment and Immigration alludes every once in a while. How will this program help the 20 per cent higher unemployment in Newfoundland? I strongly disagree with Bill C-19 which proposes to continue the employment tax credit program for one year and I ask that no more consideration be given to the extension of these band-aid measures, and that from that point on the Liberal government honour its commitment and work with all members of the House to implement a program of long-term planning for an economic policy and an industrial strategy.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to say a few words about the employment tax credit bill which we have before us this afternoon to extend this program of employment for one more year. It was first brought in in 1978 and has been in effect for the years since. Last year some 50,000 jobs were created under this program costing nearly $100 million. I think it is interesting to note that many members on the other side have been criticizing this bill, even though this is a program with a somewhat similar approach to that adopted by the Conservatives when they were in power for a brief period.

It was interesting to listen to the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) who seemed to be speaking about economic leadership almost as if we were back nine months ago just after the May 22 general election, because he described the economic leadership vacuum which existed at that time. The thought that occurred to me was: was he not here on the night of February 11 and was he not here on February 13 when his minister of finance brought down the budget?

Mr. Knowles: You mean December 11 and 13.

Mr. Foster: Yes, in December. If he was not here on that night, then he did not realize that the Canadian people and certainly this House of Commons rejected the economic leadership of the former Conservative government. Of course, on February 18 the Canadian people rejected their economic leadership. His whole pitch seemed to be that there is no other policy than their policy. If their policy was so good, how is it that not only the House of Commons rejected it but that the Canadian people rejected it in the general election of February 18?

The important thing to recognize in Bill C-19 is that this program is especially useful in communities with relatively well developed industrial and commercial sections. It is obvious that if you are going to have tax credits then you must have a relatively well developed commercial or industrial sector. That is why this bill is so important in communities where this kind of situation exists.

I am told that more than 25,000 employers have signed contracts with the department under the Employment Tax Credit Act, and that 92 per cent have indicated they like the program and would use it again. The greatest number numerically, of course, were employers in Ontario and Quebec where there are the largest number of employees in the country. On a percentage basis, New Brunswick was second in the use of the program. The program was widely used in the Atlantic region. On average, 88 per cent of use in the Atlantic region was by firms with fewer than 20 employees.

Of course, the argument by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) that these benefits all go to large corporations is just not true. If we look at British Columbia we find that 82 per cent were small companies with less than 20 employees. In Ontario the figure was 77 per cent, and in Quebec 72 per cent were companies with 20 employees or fewer.

In the fiscal year 1979-80 some 39,000 agreements were signed and about 51,000 unemployed Canadians were placed in new jobs as a result of the employment tax credit program.

The distribution of jobs under this program was 51 per cent in manufacturing, 20 per cent in retailing and wholesaling and 12 per cent in the service industries. Some 43 per cent of the employees worked in manufacturing, machinery and fabricating operations, while 15 per cent worked in clerical jobs and 7 per cent in sales. The majority of agreements were signed for 52-week periods.

Employees in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec can earn a maximum of $4,160 in tax credits. In most other regions the maximum tax credit earned for each employee is $3,120, and in the remainder of the country the maximum is $3,640.

The program is not viewed as one that involves an uncessarily large amount of paperwork. For instance, there are only two one-page forms to be filled in by the employer and a third that is optional. Some 84 per cent of the employers said the tax credit was an important underlying factor in their decision to hire under the employment tax credit program.

A sample based on 5,000 employed under the program reveals that 52 per cent were living on unemployment insurance benefits prior to finding employment through the program, while another 5 per cent were living on welfare. Others were being supported by family members, living on savings or on pensions. All had been unemployed for a minimum of two weeks, but the average length of time they were unemployed and looking for work was some 15 weeks or almost four months. To say that these people would be employed in any event is certainly not true.

Young Canadians 25 years and under made up 55 per cent of those employed, and these were equally divided between male and female. Over 34 per cent of those employed were females.

The acceptance of the program by small businesses is reflected in the fact that 77 per cent of all agreements were signed by employers employing 20 or fewer, and 40 per cent of those employers had a maximum of five in their nominal work force.

The employment tax credit program is a most economical plan to operate because only 100 people carry out the entire program throughout the country. This is certainly an important program in areas with well developed industrial and commercial sectors. Equally true is the fact that programs like Canada Works and Young Canada Works, which were cut off last year by the previous government in all parts of Ontario and western Canada, except some parts of B.C., are terribly important. Unless you have a well developed commercial and industrial community the incentive tax credit plan will not work because you do not have the private employer. Certainly that is true in respect of native people on Indian reserves, such as those in the Algoma-Manitoulin area where we have 12 reserves with some 5,000 status Indians. This kind of program is not applicable in such areas as programs like Canada Works which are direct employment programs.

We hear hon. members opposite say these are band-aid programs. That may be true. On the other hand, welfare and unemployment insurance certainly do not provide the answer. Most people are pleased to see the community benefits that have taken place in so many communities, particularly in the Algoma-Manitoulin area, through programs such as Canada Works. I hope the minister in reviewing the programs will be bringing in a program later this year directed toward rural communities, native groups and young people.

Last fall when the Conservative minister of employment and immigration cut off the Canada Works program we knew we were going to have 400 or 500 people unemployed, some 45 per cent or almost half of them young people, because of the cutback. At the time I organized an employment seminar in my constituency to review direct employment programs because I thought it was important that we make known to the government the importance of these programs. At the seminar we had employers, community groups, people in the teaching profession, people from direct employment programs, both federal and provincial, and a good cross-section of the communities in that area sat down and discussed these direct employment programs.

I think the concept when the former minister of employment and immigration brought in the Canada Works program in 1977 was that for some four or five years we were going to have several hundred thousand young people coming into the labour force in Canada, some of whom could not be absorbed immediately into the labour force. To accommodate these people we adopted programs like the incentive tax credit program and other direct employment programs. The benefits to communities, especially in rural areas, in terms of improved social services, community services, wharves, parks and recreational facilities is pretty obvious. There is hardly a community in my constituency which has not benefited in a major way.

These programs not only provide many young people with their first opportunity to get a job when private enterprise cannot accomodate them, they make very significant improvements to the community at large.

I am certainly pleased to see the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) present here, because in many areas of Canada the Canada Works program, which I hope will be reinstated this year, will work in conjunction with the efforts of the minister's department, particularly the small craft harbours branch, in the development of wharves and marina facilities. This work has made a tremendous impact in the way of improved facilities throughout our area. The north channel of Lake Huron is one of the three best cruising areas any place in the world, yet it is very difficult to secure enough funding to improve marinas and wharf facilities in that area from the regular maintenance and capital programs of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. However, the work done through the two programs has resulted in tremendous improvements.

• (1630)

One ends up not only providing employment, but improving the community facilities and in the long haul developing the tourist industry, for which there is such very great potential. This bill is not a total employment strategy, as the members opposite have said. We agree that it is an important step in stimulating employment in the private sector. I hope that this program will be followed by other programs of direct employment, particularly for those rural areas which unfortunately will be unable to take advantage of this program, as they have of others in the past which have been terribly important. I hope that they will be important in the future.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to respond to a statement made by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). Your ascendancy to power once again was not a national acceptance of your economic policies, and you know that.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. King: Your policies have been rebuked at the polls, your leadership discredited.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. King: I will, Mr. Speaker. The majority received by the side opposite was based on a Quebec vote which was given entirely on the basis of an appeal other than the economic issues that plague Canada. Quebec did not vote, 73 to one, an endorsement of the Liberal party's economic policies, and they should know that.

Mr. Dawson: Seventy-four.

Mr. King: I hope that the Liberals are not now telling Canadians to accept a dollar and cents premise because they received endorsation in the late election. If that is the government's theme, it is certainly living in a world lacking in reality. It is especially dangerous to us as Canadians if the members opposite believe that statement made earlier by the hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Foster: I thought that I would straighten you out.

Mr. Rompkey: Tell it like it is.

Mr. King: I am pleased to have this opportunity to join in the debate on Bill C-19, the amendment to the Employment Tax Credit Act. I support the intent of this act and reluctantly accept its necessity. I am pleased to join in the debate because it is very apparent that this opposition must, at every opportunity, lay at the feet of the government the total responsibility for the Canadian circumstance which requires putting into effect such band-aid solutions to a major national health problem.

We have a bill to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act, to extend the act for one year to create incremental employment in the private sector. The tax credit ranges from $1.50 to $2 per hour depending on unemployment levels in the areas affected. It is $2 in the Atlantic provinces and Gaspé, $1.50 in southern Ontario, southern Alberta, B.C. and the Montreal and Hull areas, and $1.75 in the remainder of Canada. Of the benefit available, 50 per cent goes to Ontario and Quebec manufacturing industries.

What is the reason for the necessity of such a bill? In 1968 there were just over 300,000 people unemployed; the figure projected for 1980 is over 1.25 million people unemployed. That attests to the years of bankrupt Liberal fiscal policies or, more astutely put, lack of policy.

This bill is only a stop-gap measure. We still do not have a long-term fiscal policy or even a short-term policy. I would say to the members on my left down at the end of the chamber that we Conservatives provided that type of long-term projection and policy. What about some long-term benefits created by a sense of fiscal responsibility not shown by the side opposite? They can look up the term "fiscal responsibility" in their dictionaries when they go home.

The necessity for this act symbolizes the depth of poverty and lack of resolve and inspiration which exists in this government. While perpetuating the spending regime which catapulted the nation into the disastrous economic situation which presently exists, this government proposes to apply salve to the symptoms but nothing to the disease. The disease is Liberal spending policies of the past decade and the present decade which have given Canada the largest measure of deficit spending in the history of this nation, if not in the history of the world of nations.

Having done this indignity to the economic sanity of Canada, this government now proposes to continue its policies of excessive spending without recourse to a rational application of an appropriate increase in federal government revenues. This is a government of political expediency with a quest and a thirst for power which takes it beyond the concept of acting in the national interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. King: Where is this great thrust, Mr. Speaker, to act for Canada? It is not to be found in the throne speech nor is it to be found in the substance of this act. How is this government addressing the prospect of 1.2 million people unemployed in 1980? We find only a preoccupation with consolidating power in Ottawa in the Liberal complex that so permeates all levels of our social and economic order. This preoccupation works to the exclusion of economic commonsense. Thus we see this government enunciating its own creed and, with galling audacity, attributing it to Canadians as a whole.

We are told by that gang over there that Canadians do not want less government, that they want more effective government. My exposure to citizens in the riding which I represent with honour tells me that Canadians want less government and they want more effective government. We proposed to provide both but we were denied the opportunity. It is apparent that this government offers just one option, and that option is more government.

The Employment Tax Credit Act is symbolic of a spineless approach to correcting a Liberal induced economic disaster. They offer a palliative, costly, temporary dilution of the problem—and do not attack the substance of the problem itself. To attack the problem might disprove the Liberal campaign position that no sacrifices are necessary to live in Canada.

We agree that the initiative provided by this bill is presently necessary. It is only necessary because this reactivated, worn out bunch with its socialist leanings is not prepared to look beyond today to address the ills of tomorrow caused by the sins of yesterday. We support the extension of this bill but decry the absence of national direction to eliminate the circumstances that create unacceptable employment levels.

● (1640)

These were the circumstances which the government we formed under the leadership of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was prepared to address head on.

I should like to put on the record a rather alarming resumé of a report in the Vancouver Province. It focuses on only one aspect of our national dilemma—a denunciation of the deficit spending policies of the present government. All members of this House should pause and consider how the Employment Tax Credit Act will address our national problems. The article is a recitation of disaster, the authors of which sit opposite. On April 27 there appeared in the Sunday business report section of the Province the following:

Every child born in Canada this year will get one bit of inheritance he or she may not want—a slice of the national debt.

Along with the rest of us, the newborn babe will be expected to share the burden of shouldering a debt load of around $60 billion. That's about $2,540 each at present, and will be closer to $3,000 each by year-end.

An hon. Member: By an irresponsible Liberal government.

Mr. King: Hon. members opposite may smile. Maybe they like it but I do not. I do not want my grandchildren to be faced with it nor the new daughter of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. King: The article continues:

The interest on the national debt this year is expected to reach $10.2 billion or a staggering $432 each.

The country's estimated nine million taxpayers could look at it this way:

In 1980 they are expected to pay personal income tax of around $16.5 billion or an average $1,833 each. $1,133 from each of the country's taxpayers would just be enough to meet the interest on the national debt, leaving a scant $700 each for other government purposes.

It's no wonder that the size of the national debt and the mini-budget of the past week which added another $10.7 billion to the debt figure cause concern.

It causes concern on this side but I do not think it causes very much concern across the way. The article goes on to say:

At that rate, within a couple of years all of the income tax raised would be insufficient to meet the interest payments on the debt.

Further along the author writes:

And debt burdens incurred by the Crown corporations and agencies in their own name but guaranteed by the federal government have certainly been galloping upwards.

According to Canada Tax Foundation figures, contingent liabilities of the federal government through its guarantees of Crown corporation debts increased from $18.8 billion in 1977 to $28.6 billion in 1979.

He then pointed out that economists are concerned about the borrowings by Crown corporations and agencies because they do not know exactly where the money is coming from. Later in the article he writes:

—deficit budgets . . . hamper the private sector's ability to raise capital. If the government is in the marketplace as a big borrower, Canadian industry must look elsewhere for its funds.

He is referring here to the criticism voiced by someone else who is also reported as saying:

"If there's enough government paper around, the private sector has to offer higher rates or go out of the country. Either way it's more expensive for them."

This is what causes our problem, Mr. Speaker. It is why this bill is before the House and why it should be extended; under these circumstances we do not have many options. The deplorable thing is that there are no long-term initiatives proposed by hon. members opposite to correct the basic ills in the land.

The government cares little about this aspect of our nation's character. I suspect the reason for this inattention is that there is a political advantage to ducking reality. There is a practical advantage for those who pursue socialist philosophies—an advantage which generates dependence on government programs like this one and programs for spending which tend to be self-perpetuating. Socialists know that as government's role increases, the demand for government intervention also increases. The outcome is that government momentum carries itself.

We see this in the unseemly haste to metrication which is being propelled not by national demand but is being carried by a bureaucratic offensive on the part of the Metric Commission. Those who espoused government intervention found their positions weakened by an active, vibrant, self-sufficiency in the private sector.

What do we propose, then, Mr. Speaker? Just that it is time for Canadians and the Canadian government to use commonsense in the nation's economy. Canadians are prepared to share the burden of restoring health to the nation. There is an opportunity to do great things for Canada but those opportunities have to be seized.

Home ownership has to be encouraged, Mr. Speaker. Small business enterprise must be encouraged by reducing red tape and taxing interventions. The national debt and our deficits must be reduced so that we can capitalize on our natural advantages in the areas of energy and resource supply. We must reduce our dependence on foreign capital inflow so that we can control internally such important factors as our interest rates.

I should like now to refer to specific situations in my riding of Okanagan-Similkameen which have a bearing on this act. The lumber industry in my riding is still trying to "tough it out" as a headline in the Vancouver Sun of April 23 stated. A front page article begins by saying:

The angry talk in the beer parlors and union halls, the echo of a few voices in a cavernlike mill are becoming the new sounds of the local lumber industry, where just a few months ago man and machine hummed harmoniously if noisily.

The article also points out that 8,000 people have been laid off. On the same page there is another article with the headline "Spending Climbs—National Debt 'Costs $1,000 per taxpayer' ". That figure could be updated considerably, Mr. Speaker.

I think it is significant that those two headlines are on the same page and I hope that significance is not lost on hon. members opposite who are in a position to change the course of this nation's economic policy. The price drop has been so severe that in some cases mills can only sell the finished product below the cost of the timber itself. The necessity is to clear the shelves at any price to generate cash flow for the banker.

Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, I drove to Grand Forks in my riding. I passed the Pope and Talbot sawmill at Midway. The parking lot in front of the mill was empty. Ordinarily there are hundreds of cars in the lot. That is the sort of local tragedy that is upon us simply because the government of the day refused and is still refusing to face up to the economic realities that exist in Canada. Our government cannot go burying its head in the sand and offering employment tax credits when it should be delving deeper into problems in order to remedy them.

We need a revitalized housing construction industry to stimulate lumber sales and employment, Mr. Speaker, and Bill C-19 will not achieve this. The mortgage interest deductibility provision proposed by this party would have done a great deal toward it.

• (1650)

Our economy is suffering because of the shortsightedness of members of the government. Mariner Homes Limited is a corporate citizen of Penticton in the Okanagan valley. This is a community city which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) knows well. We have met with him there and I am sure he will admit it is a lovely community. It is a real shock to a community like that when a manufacturing complex, such as Mariner Homes, closes its doors, as was the case a few days ago. Mariner Homes put $3 million annually into the local economy of Penticton. Of that, $1.5 million was spent in wages and the other $1.5 million was used in the purchase of goods and services. How does the Employment Tax Credit Act respond to the situation of those closed doors? It will take two million hours of subsidized wage contributions just to replace the void created by the closing of this manufacturing complex in Penticton.

There has been nothing offered of substance and encouragement to those entrepreneurs and creative people who wish to use their inventive skills for the benefit of Canada, particularly in the expanded field of energy. There is nothing new proposed that is equivalent to the energy bank proposal which was contained in the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West.

I think of a man in Merritt, Mr. Lange, who has proceeded with a new concept in a wind-energized electric generator package called "The Onion". Mr. Lange's invention represents the type of activity that not only offers Canada energy advantage, but can provide permanent employment opportunities to many thousands of Canadians in both the development and production activity that will result.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. King: What has happened to farmers in my riding?

Mr. Whelan: They are doing good.

Mr. King: The hon. member is right. It is not because of federal action but because the provincial government has underwritten their operating cost of production. You cannot take any pride in that, sir.

Mr. Whelan: They took my program and put it into force. You cannot take pride either.

Mr. King: I take considerable pride in that policy. I worked for the minister of agriculture in the provincial government for some 12 years. I was involved in the negotiations of the terms of that package which the minister speaks of with such skepticism.

What is happening to farmers in my riding? Federal action and federal policies would put them, like other industries in the area, in extreme jeopardy. It is only because of provincial initiative in the form of financial underwriting of the cost of production that our farmers survive. Land at $12,000 an acre, tractors that cost $17,000 versus $1,700 25 years ago when I started farming, tree fruit packing lines that cost $2 million to instal, are examples of high costs. The B.C. farmers would much prefer that the government address directly the basic ills of the land rather than apply efforts such as we debate today, efforts which fail to attack the problems which have been defined, redefined and redefined again. Look at what the briefs from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the BCFGA ask. Farmers are aware of the facts of life. It is unfortunate there are not more farmers sitting opposite.

Perhaps it would be asking too much of a government with a record of irresponsible, reckless actions and inappropriate policies to throw off that cloak and do what is right for our nation. One can only hope that somewhere on the other side of the House there exists that germ of spirit that seeks to correct the disease rather than soothe the symptom. Until that happens and as long as this government exists, Canadians will be forced to accept short-term solutions, such as those contained in the Employment Tax Credit Act. One could more heartily endorse this extension of the provision of the act if there were a parallel effort to address our underlying problems. Unfortunately, this government shows no such resolve. In this circumstance it is safe to suggest that this program, and others of similar intent, will be with us for some time to come.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have had the opportunity of speaking in this House since the election of last February, and I want to take the opportunity of thanking the people in my riding of Beaches for sending me here in the first place. I would like to say a few words about one of the great men I follow, Mr. Andrew Brewin, who served my constituency, which was then the constituency of Greenwood, for 18 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: While I certainly have a great deal of respect for him, I am sure that while he was in this House he earned the respect of other members.

My immediate predecessor, Mr. Richardson, was not in the House long enough to make his own mark. However, I know Mr. Richardson rather well and even though we disagree politically and philosophically, in my view he is an honest and decent man. If I can represent my constituency as well as my two predecessors did, then I will be happy to be in this place.

I want to say at the outset that I do not believe the measures proposed in this bill will do much of anything to cure the unemployment crisis we have in Canada today. The unemployment tax credit program is intended to provide a federal tax credit of up to $2 per hour for a 12-month period for employers who hire additional workers beyond their normal requirements.

The minister has described the measures in this bill as temporary and designed to fill a gap while an employment strategy is developed by the government. I want to remind the minister and this House that this government has been saying the same thing for many years and the people of Canada are still waiting to see some action by the government to alleviate unemployment.

In May, 1971, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told this House that full employment was the goal of his government. In 1968 when the Prime Minister came into office, the rate of unemployment was 4.5 per cent and there were 360,000 people unemployed. In 1978 there were 911,000 people unemployed and the unemployment rate was 8.4 per cent. As of March, 1980 the number of unemployed Canadians was 969,000. When you consider the hidden unemployed, those people who have dropped out of the work force or are not considered as being unemployed, the rate is over 1,526,000 people unemployed. The people of Canada are still waiting anxiously for a full employment program.

I would like nothing better than to believe the government when it says today that it has a renewed commitment toward an employment strategy. I would like nothing better than to believe we are finally going to see action that will alleviate the despair that has become commonplace among many hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians. I would like nothing better than to believe that. However, the record of this government is such that I do not hold out much hope that we will see the kind of action required.

Certainly the proposals set out in this bill will not even make a dent in the unemployment rate and its value is questionable. In the first instance, the problem with this program is that the employment created is usually of a temporary nature. There is nothing to stop employers from taking advantage of this program by claiming tax credits for employees they intended to hire in any event, regardless whether the program was in place or not. Again, it only benefits those employers who are in a position to pay taxes. Those employers who need help the most will not receive it under this program. There is nothing to prevent employers from using this program to create short-term employment that ends as soon as the subsidy ends. However, the measure does allow the government to create a rosy picture of the number of jobs it has created. That is typical of the cynical approach this government has been taking toward the unemployed in our country.

Unemployment and the effects of that unemployment on the lives of all Canadians is a national disgrace. The fact that there are programs today such as unemployment insurance and social welfare that lessen the economic impact on the unemployed and make it less severe to be unemployed today than it was in the depression days of the 1930s does not alleviate the human stress that being out of work causes to our unemployed and their families.

In a study prepared for the use of the joint economic committee of the Congress of the United States by Dr. Harvey Brenner of John Hopkins University, the effect that unemployment has on homicides, suicides, imprisonment and mental and physical ailments was well documented. That study clearly showed that an increase in unemployment had a severe impact on the well-being of society as a whole.

Even a 1 per cent increase in unemployment creates a legacy of stress, aggression and illness affecting society long into the future. The human tragedy alone of unemployment revealed by this study is shocking enough and, even though it is a study conducted in the United States, I am told by Canadian people who are conversant with that study that the same effects can probably be applied to the Canadian scene. I wish to read into the record one of the salient points of that study which may be of interest to this House and the minister. I quote:

> The 1.4 per cent rise in unemployment during 1970 has cost our society nearly $7 billion in lost income due to illness, mortality, and in added state prison and mental hospital outlays. To this must be added public outlays of some $2.8 billion annually over the 1970-1975 period for jobless and welfare payments associated with the sustained 1.4 per cent rise in unemployment. Additional outlays not included here are the costs of care in federal institutions. Even excluding these latter outlays, the cost of the sustained 1.4 per cent rise in unemployment during 1970 is at least $21 billion. And as noted earlier, this entirely excludes the impact of the further increases in unemployment since 1970 as well.
> These dollars represent resources lost or diverted from productive use. They represent wealth never to be realized, lost forever to our economy and society. They, in part, measure the human tragedy of unemployment. But most significantly, their loss could have been avoided.
> I said earlier that the federal government knows how to minimize unemployment. It knows how to reduce it using monetary and fiscal policy and to keep it down. This study, for the first time, offers our government the capability to accurately and fully measure the impact of these economic policies. Economic policy planners can and will now know the full and tragic cost of unemployment if they fail to hold it at a minimum.
> They are obligated to use this new wisdom.

I highly recommend that study to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). I am sure it would help to educate him on the problems of unemployment in Canada.

If the wisdom reported in this congressional committee report is to be used in Canada, if the human and financial costs are to be avoided in Canada, government, business and industry, organized labour and educational institutions must be brought together to mount a concerted, imaginative and innovative effort to give our unemployed back their dignity and sense of worth by providing them with work.

Fooling around with measures that are contained in this bill will not do it. It took no imagination at all to put together what is in this bill. In fact, the measures are worse than useless. In fact, it is not possible to talk about having an employment strategy without talking about an economic strategy for Canada.

In the 12-year period or so since this government was elected, we have experienced the worst levels of unemployment and inflation since the great depression. In this period we have seen plant closures and layoffs to such an extent that many economists are now referring to Canada as being in a stage of de-industrialization. Certainly in the industry I am most acquainted with, the electrical-electronics industry, there have been drastic changes over the past ten years. Ten years ago, Canada had a fairly strong electronics manufacturing industry. Over the past five years alone, nearly 20,000 jobs have disappeared.

● (1710)

In addition, we have lost thousands of potential jobs through a combination of two principal factors—inadequate research and development, and increased foreign imports. For example, in 1967 we imported $63 million worth of electrical goods. In 1977 we imported $421 million worth of those products. Today you cannot buy a Canadian-made radio. Fairly soon you will not be able to buy a Canadian-made TV set. By the early 1980s Canadian-made electric small appliances may be a thing of the past.

What has happened in the electrical industry has been going on in virtually every other sector of manufacturing in our country, whether it be footwear, clothing, furniture, textiles, shipbuilding or whatever else. In more recent times that good old standby in Canada, our natural resource industries, have also fallen upon bad times.

For years the New Democratic Party and the CCF before it has warned successive governments, both Liberal and Conservative, that we could not permit the uncontrolled extraction of our raw and natural resources for export to other countries for processing into finished goods and then have them shipped back for sale here. That has been government policy in Canada since 1949 and it is not only dumb economics, it is irresponsible government in the extreme. We have not only been giving away our valuable resources, but in the process we have been giving away our hope of being able to finance our own way as a technologically-advanced industrial nation.

In terms of the present economic crisis, probably the most significant problem of all is the large degree of foreign ownership of our industries. According to the most recent figures I have, foreign companies owned 57 per cent of all manufacturing in Canada. They also owned 99 per cent of the rubber industry, 96 per cent of automobiles and parts, 85 per cent of chemicals, 71 per cent of electrical goods, 63 per cent of agricultural equipment and 57 per cent of transportation equipment.

Until recently our major concern over this degree of foreign ownership has been that we were a branch plant economy. Today we are not even that. Today we are rapidly becoming a warehouse economy with an increasing number of domestic consumer goods being supplied by imports from other countries. These are manufactured in the main by the same corporations that once produced them in Canada and now find it more profitable to operate elsewhere.

In the midst of all this, both the Liberals and Tories want us to believe that owing to current international conditions there is little governments can do about unemployment. Both I and the New Democratic Party do not agree with that position. If this government were serious about doing something concrete about unemployment and if they were seriously committed toward a goal of full employment in Canada, then steps should be taken now to reduce unemployment. In the short run the government could give a clear indication that it is serious by stating it has no intention of continuing to cut back on grants to job placement agencies funded under the Outreach programs. The success of these programs has clearly been demonstrated in the past yet the government has chosen to do away with many of them.

A case in point is the citizens action group, a Hamilton, Ontario placement organization that specialized in finding employment for hard-to-employ people. Those people were mainly young people or referrals from correctional institutions and former psychiatric patients. Yet this group has recently been told that its grant of $118,000 a year would be withdrawn because, it was said, the Outreach program under which it was funded was for temporary pilot projects. Now that it has shown what can be achieved with hard-to-employ clients, its function is to be taken over by Manpower.

What this government should be doing instead of playing around with measures now before us is reinstating programs such as Outreach that we know do create jobs. We need programs to provide incentives to get us into apprenticeship training to address the shortage of skilled workers in Canada. If members opposite were really serious, they would make better use of taxpayers' dollars by employing them in productive government spending in the food, housing, energy and transportation sectors, using the money available for the development of processing industries based on Canadian resources and the development of manufacturing industries to produce goods we now import.

If this government were really serious about unemployment they would show their commitment by bringing in a full employment act which would provide for annual forecasting of employment targets, together with a timetable for implementation. These are the kinds of things which would show Canadians the government is serious about fixing the mess which the administration has itself created. Playing around with measures like those contained in this bill simply cements the view that this government is not serious about doing anything to alleviate unemployment. I think it is about time they started.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate today I feel I should like to express a few thoughts concerning the bill before us and also the general condition in which we find the economy today. I feel it is most unfortunate that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) should have chosen to deny Parliament an early opportunity to debate a budget in the normal course of our affairs and, above all, that he should have failed to produce a budget which, hopefully, might do something meaningful to correct the present economic situation.

The month of April has almost run out. If I were to make any comment to my constituents or to the Canadian public generally it would relate to the unbelievable air of unreality which seems to permeate this House, in particular the government side. Mr. Speaker, I know this has concerned you in other Parliaments in other times, but what I find so hard to reconcile in my mind is that we as a nation, a great nation, great in tradition, in resources, in agricultural potential, in manufacturing, led by a government which is responsible to Parliament, should be so oblivious, apparently, to the crisis which is coming.

● (1720)

I find it shocking that the government of the day is showing such indifference. I say this because there is absolutely no doubt where our present policies are leading this nation—to disaster. There is no alternative. If we are lucky enough that it does not strike in 1980, I can guarantee, as any knowledgeable economist in this country will guarantee, that the disaster of which I speak will strike, if not in 1981 or 1982, certainly by 1984. However, if we are to avert the disaster I refer to and if we are going to try at least to lessen its impact, it is time that the government of the day became realistic and started to make some of the hard decisions which have to be made in order to bring back responsible fiscal and monetary management to Canada.

I have felt that in the December 11 budget brought in by my colleague and deskmate, the then minister of finance, at least a start had been made, but only a start. At least, for example, we had identified a course which, if followed, would have narrowed the deficit in this country by approximately half of what it otherwise would have been if trends had been left to follow their own course.

Not only had we taken those steps, but we also had the courage to show the Canadian public, for the first time, where the fiscal course in Canada was headed, not just for the immediate, one year perspective, but for five years down the road. Hon. members can imagine my great concern to have spent April in this House and not to have had one tittle of evidence offered from the government benches as to how they see our economy evolving in the 1980-81 down to 1984 scenario. Instead, what we have had furnished to us is a so-called economic statement carefully tucked into a throne speech debate so that it itself could not be debated, and it indicated, for example, that the deficit since December, when the budget of my colleague was introduced, is now anticipated to be $3.7 billion greater. The budgetary deficit is running at over $14 billion, and there was only the most casual comment that somehow or other they hope expenditures and financial requirements might be narrowed by $1 billion between now and the time that a budget is finally introduced.

Hon. members can understand my concern. I think the Canadian public deserves better. For example, there must not be another Parliament, certainly in the British Commonwealth, that is faced with a situation where the last completely debated and passed budget was April 1978, two years ago. That was when we last had a proper accounting and a fully debated budget in this House.

When I say that, hon. members can imagine why I rise to speak now on Bill C-19, to amend the Employment Tax Credit Act. Surely if I wanted anything to highlight how totally out of context the House has become, it is simply to emphasize that here today we are debating, at the government's request, a two-clause bill dealing with an employment tax credit matter which, as we know, was introduced by the previous government, certainly at least partially in the form we have it, and yet we are left without a proper budgetary presentation for us to deal with.

Let me put it this way. When we are told that our deficit is now over $14 billion, over $3 billion higher than we anticipated last December, that in turn means that the government in effect is admitting that, on a spending program of $60 billion, it cannot pay for $14 billion of what it intends to spend. As hon. members can see, what that really means is that over 25 per cent of the government's revenue is being, so to speak, overspent in the form of expenditures that the government does not expect it can cover.

Think of it; here we have a government which says, in effect, that the revenue it anticipates will be something under $46 billion. Its expenditures will be over $60 billion, leaving a shortfall of $14 billion. It does not take much arithmetic to figure out that that is nearly a 30 per cent overrun on the revenue coming into Ottawa.

The reason I mention this is that we grappled with these figures. If those in the House care to do so, they can pull out a release that we put out through the Treasury Board on January 22. In vivid terms that release showed where the course of the economy would take us if the Crosbie budget was not passed, and that is exactly what we now have before us. I invite you, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members to take a look at that release because it can be seen year by year how big the deficit will be, how high expenditure levels will be and how big the net debt will become without provisions such as those the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) proposed on December 11.

What I find so alarming is that on April 30 we are here debating Bill C-19, yet we still have no budgetary presentation to give us the hope that somehow the scenario we brought out on January 22 will not be reality.

I would be less than candid if I did not tell the House that one of my greatest anxieties is to witness what is now happening in the office of the Minister of Finance and in the office of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). There is absolutely no doubt that we have a Minister of Finance who is entirely in the hands of his bureaucracy. He is not running his department. He is being told by the Michael Pitfields and the other bureaucrats who have called the shots so wrongly in this country for so many years, exactly what he is expected to follow as far as economic policy is concerned, and he is very dutifully doing what he is told. What a shocking thing! In Canada's day of economic need we have a Minister of Finance who is not a servant of the public but simply a servant of public servants.

One might shift and say, "Well, the saviour is obviously going to be the President of the Treasury Board, because under the Financial Administration Act his mandate is very clear." Contrary to the public impression, it is the President of the Treasury Board who has the responsibility to restrain and contain expenditures as far as government is concerned. So you might turn to him because he is the man who will somehow right the ship and ensure that these rising deficits to which I referred will not materialize.

● (1730)

Here again I am disappointed with some of the comments which the President of the Treasury Board has made. For example, he stated that it is not so much a question of containing expenditures but rather of increasing the revenue which we need to somehow bring the deficit down in Canada. I say that should sound an alarm with everybody in the House because essentially it is saying: do not turn to government to trim costs, do not lessen government expenditure; that is not necessarily the answer; the answer lies with the already over-taxed public which should be paying more in the form of taxation. That is what is coming down the pipe.

As I have indicated earlier, a disaster is coming. I should also like to indicate that what we are going to be asked to pass at a later date is a substantial corporate and personal income tax increase. To the degree that the government calls upon Canadians to pay more in income and other tax, it is going to be evidence of their failure to control their own expenditures. It is as simple as that.

I would invite all hon. members to read the little booklet written by the President of the Treasury Board entitled "Fiscalamity—How to survive Canada's tax chaos". The President of the Treasury Board wrote this in 1974 when, presumably, other influences were brought to bear on him. I ask hon. members to pay attention to the following introduction in the book, which reads:

> This book is dedicated to all Canadians who share my belief that Canada, with its beauty, its resources, its people, and its legal-political heritage, could be a country of unequalled opportunity and happiness, were it not for too much taxation, too strong a bureaucracy, too much government, too much welfare, too many politicians, and too few statesmen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Think of it, Mr. Speaker. Here we have a President of the Treasury Board who is given, under an act of this Parliament, the responsibility to handle the bureaucracy, to handle expenditures and certainly to have influence on taxation, having written what I have just quoted in 1974, and who now indicates to the press and in the House that he believes expenditures are not the real problem, that the question is to get more revenue.

What has changed from 1974 to 1980? I can tell you that one thing has changed. When the then Mr. Donald J. Johnston wrote the book to which I am referring, total federal government spending was approximately $20 billion. He might not have known about the statement made by the Minister of Finance—but he has to accept some responsibility for a statement which has been given to the House—in which the House was told that in the current year our spending was going up to $60 billion, triple what Mr. Johnston referred to in 1974 as something that was "fiscalamity". What has changed? Would he not agree that if it were fiscalamity back in 1974, it is triple fiscalamity now because it has tripled in size?

In 1974, sure, we had deficit problems, but we certainly had no deficit problem compared to the $14 billion budgetary deficit which we are told to expect this year. The deficit this year is 70 per cent of the total federal government spending in 1973-74, the very year Mr. Johnston wrote his book trying to alert the Canadian public to the fiscalamity into which he thought we were heading.

At a later date I intend to go at length into more of the comments made by Mr. Johnston in his book because I think there is a strange transformation which has taken place; a person who was so concerned and alarmed at that time has now become party to putting in place the very expenditure levels and deficit levels that only a few years ago he felt would lead us to fiscalamity, as he called it.

How best can we relate this? I often feel that we sit here in Parliament oblivious of reality, almost as if we were aboard a ship at sea. We know where the shoals are, we see them coming, but for some reason nobody seems to want to do anything about them. I was very surprised to learn in the last year how the previous government—I say "previous government" only in a sense; the government which existed before the Clark government, which has been resurrected in the form of the present government—

An hon. Member: Voted in by the people of Canada; do not forget that.

Mr. Stevens: I was very surprised to learn how their decision making processes had been developed while they had been governing this country from reading what had happened at their cabinet meetings and who said what on various things. I only wish the Canadian public could be exposed to the type of discussions which took place at those cabinet meetings so that they could judge the calibre of the people conducting the affairs of Canada.

An hon. Member: You should release yours.

Mr. Stevens: As you know, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the reasons we felt that freedom of information legislation was long overdue in this country. It is time that some of these so-called governmental secrets were released and the Canadian public were allowed to see the ineptitude of this government in former years in conducting the affairs of Canada.

I say this because what I found most startling when, for example, we come to the question of restraint was to learn that under the previous government there was no concept of restraint in the sense that you and I, Mr. Speaker, understand it. There was no concept of the government spending less and saving money, that it had the duty and the obligation to the Canadian people to spend less and save. What we were introduced to, or certainly what I was introduced to for the first time, was the concept which the former government used to call macroeconomic thinking. The macroeconomic thinking was simply to have some bureaucrat decide that the proper spending level in Canada was $50 billion or $55 billion or $60 billion, and everything else fell out of that. In short, while we were in power no doubt people could have hinted that the $60 billion spending level for the fiscal year 1980-81 was a level that could and should have been attained. But what absolutely startled me was when somebody at the bureaucratic level said the previous government would have accepted the $60 billion level for macroeconomic reasons. It was not suggested that the economy somehow or other needed it, but basically because the economy needed that type of federal government spending to continue what they like to refer to as the "fine tuning".

• (1740)

What I think is exceedingly important that we do in Committee of the Whole and in other committees of this House is to pin this government down as to where it got the $60 billion and some odd spending level it is telling us we may have to live with in 1980-81. My guess is that it was simply a figure handed to the Minister of Finance by a bureaucrat on the basis that he thought it was a nice round figure, and that as far as the economic model was concerned it was roughly what the Canadian government should be spending.

The reason this is so significant as far as Treasury Board is concerned is that there were, there are and there will be existing savings that can be made, some of which we made and some we intended to make. However, we were told that from the bureaucratic approach these savings would be counterproductive if we instituted them. In short, it is deemed that Canada should have a spending level of $60 billion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) on a point of order.

Mr. Evans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hate to interrupt the eloquence of the hon. member opposite, but I have a very difficult time seeing the relevance of his comments to the employment tax credit bill that is before this House. I wish you would rule on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has exercised a certain amount of latitude but, if I may say so, he has not been the only one to do so in this debate. I would hope, however, that the hon. member would bear in mind the point made and perhaps address his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, and I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House at the time, I wanted to make a few of these preliminary comments, and they are only preliminary, because I felt that we in this House are facing such an odd scenario, being asked to debate a two-clause bill dealing with employment tax credit matters without having had the advantage of a budget and without knowing the governments fiscal position. I was indicating the type of approach this government in its previous incarnation followed in arriving at spending levels in this country and from which flew the various legislative matters we were asked to consider. At a later time I will comment more fully on some of the fiscal matters which I feel most of us are concerned about, but about which unfortunately we are not sufficiently alarmed.

Dealing more specifically with the question of unemployment, let us not forget that when the Prime Minister took power unemployment in this country was 4.5 per cent and there were some 358,000 Canadians out looking for work at the time. Unemployment is now hovering around 7.4 per cent, which means there are over 500,000 more Canadians unemployed today than in 1968 when the Prime Minister first took power in this country.

Let me make a side comment. I would ask those who say that present deficits are needed and that big government spending is essential—because unemployment is going to go up still higher without them—how come unemployment has in fact gone up so dramatically, notwithstanding those deficits that have been loaded on Canadians year by year?

The Trudeau response has been to create a hodge-podge of programs. Unemployment was treated as a short-term phenomenon that could be treated with temporary measures such as the Local Initiatives Program and the Canada Works program.

Having regard to both LIP and the Canada Works program, I would invite hon. members, especially those on the government side, to read what the President of the Treasury Board had to say about them. What he said is most informative. In due course we will have to find out from that minister whether he still holds those views.

Those programs did not alleviate our long-term unemployment problems. They only succeeded in discouraging mobility in the labour force and creating a dependence on government support programs. Young people between the ages of 15 and 24 have suffered most from the Liberal government's ineptitude.

An hon. Member: You are not supposed to be working at 15; your are supposed to be in school.

Mr. Stevens: What an interesting comment from a government supporter—"you are not supposed to work".

An hon. Member: "At 15", he said.

Mr. Stevens: At 15. Let me help the hon. member understand. Statistics happen to be prepared by Statistics Canada for that age bracket of 15 to 24, and whether hon. members on the government side like it or not, there are presumably some people below 16 years of age who would like to get to work in this country, even if the Prime Minister cannot deliver it.

Young people between the ages of 15 and 24, as I have said, have suffered the most from the Liberal government's ineptitude. In 1967 the unemployment rate for this group was 6.5 per cent. Unemployment for young people has now soared to 13 per cent.

Bill C-19 gives no indication that it recognizes the special problems of young people. For that matter, it offers no special help for other groups that have been hit hard by unemployment, including women, native people and the handicapped. While in 1979 unemployment among men was 6.6 per cent, the unemployment for women was 8.8 per cent.

I gave some of that background because I thought it would be wise today to contrast what the present Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has said, both to the press and in this House, concerning the matters that are before us and which are partly touched on in Bill C-19, with what I suggest a much more effective minister of employment and immigration said in this House on December 13, the very day the previous government was brought down.

● (1750)

An effective minister of employment and immigration, Mr. Atkey, recognized that the young are among the hardest hit by unemployment. He said, and I emphasize this again to those backbenchers who had a hand in that decision on December 13:

> Youth suffer much more than their fair share of existing unemployment. For example, in November of this year—

He is referring to 1979.

> —while youth made up about a quarter of the labour force, they also accounted for almost half of the total unemployment figure.

Mr. Atkey also recognized how crucial it was to find jobs for young people, since they are so easily discouraged. He recognized that the problem was not just economic but that there was a social and human element involved. When young people are unable for a long period of time to take an active place in society, their values and their attitudes about themselves and society are profoundly affected.

The then minister of employment and immigration went on to say:

> Our concern stems from recognition of the importance that finding and keeping meaningful jobs has for the self-esteem and future labour market experience of young people.
>
> There is substantial evidence to indicate that the early labour market experience of individuals has a significant bearing on their later employment and income record. The youth of the "baby boom" generation now makes up over a quarter of the labour force. Over the next few years this group will move rapidly into the mainstream of adult workers. For example, by 1985, it is expected that youth will make up only 23 per cent of the labour force, compared with more than 26 per cent in 1980. Under these circumstances, it is particularly important that young people acquire the skills and attitudes now that they will need to lead satisfying and productive working lives as adults. Above all, this government does not want to create another generation of UI and welfare recipients. Our young people are capable of far more, especially in a nation so well endowed with natural resources and human capital.

Mr. Atkey continued:

> Although solid work experience in real jobs is important to all youth, the truly vital factor, especially for young people who have not had the advantages of higher education or formal skill training, is to land that first job. This can be critical to his or her ultimate success because it provides that all-important starting point. And, in that connection, I firmly believe that an authentic job in the private sector is going to be more credible to potential employers than a job on a government make-work project, about which many employers tend to be skeptical, if not downright negative.

Mr. Atkey went on to state:

> What we are looking for here is to help those young people who are at a real disadvantage and who most need the help. We do not want to repeat some of the experiences under programs such as Opportunities for Youth and the Local Initiatives Program where in many cases elite groups or middle and upper class youth were able "to do their own thing" at the expense of the public purse with little lasting benefit to the country or the community. By involving tried and true organizations which have already demonstrated their ability to direct services to those who need them most, we feel there will be less emphasis on innovation for its own sake and a much better opportunity to undertake projects of lasting benefit to the community which will provide relevant work experience for youth.

Mr. Atkey went on to propose specific programs to help young people find jobs. This is what we have yet to hear about from the present Minister of Employment and Immigration who is, presumably, concerned with other things of a more personal nature. For example, this minister has not told us what Mr. Atkey said on the very day that the previous government was defeated. Mr. Atkey said:

> We will be establishing a youth employment secretariat to provide the direction that has been lacking in the past. This secretariat will monitor existing programs and co-ordinate them to ensure that duplication is reduced and that they are meeting the real needs of Canadian youth.
> As an additional means to ensure that youth employment programs provide the best value for money invested in them, the youth employment secretariat will work to harmonize federal youth employment programs with those of the provinces. One of the first tasks of the secretariat will be to ensure co-ordination of temporary employment programs for the spring and summer of 1980 to accommodate the thousands of young students expected to come onto the labour market at that time.

Bill C-19 says nothing about helping young people find jobs. That is the tragedy of what happened on December 13.

Mr. Atkey's commitment to youth did not exclude a concern about other groups in society that face particular difficulties in the labour market. For instance, he recognized that women have a hard time entering the labour force. In addressing this issue, he said:

> The participation of women in the labour force has been rising rapidly and continuously in the post-war period. This trend is expected to continue for some time to come. Although this human resource is one of our strengths as a nation and an economy, for too many years the talents and abilities of Canadian women have not been fully used. One measure of this is to be found in the fact that, although women account for about 39 per cent of our labour force, they also make up about 47 per cent of the unemployed. Moreover, women frequently suffer from job segregation and low wages when they do work.
> Such barriers are gradually being removed and my department is embarking upon a major campaign to speed up the process. We are encouraging women to train for all kinds of jobs, including many of which, for too long, have been regarded as male preserves. A good idea of the potential of this exercise can be seen at such projects as Syncrude in Fort McMurray where women in hard hats are an integral part of the work force.

Again, Bill C-19 does not express any concern for the specific problems of women in Canadian society. Nor did Mr. Atkey forget about the special problems encountered by the handicapped and native peoples. On this topic he said:

> Those of us who have good fortune and good health too often forget not only the problems, but the employment difficulties of those who are physically or mentally handicapped. We cannot, however, continue to shunt occupationally handicapped persons to employment outside the mainstream. The new programs must and will make provision for their employment in meaningful jobs in the private sector.

Mr. Atkey wanted to develop a co-ordinated employment strategy where the government would work in co-operation with the private sector. He said:

First, we intend to help to create an economic and social climate which will enable the private sector to prosper and take the initiatives which will lead to the creation of new permanent jobs. That is what my colleague, the Minister of Finance—

He was referring to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

—has provided for in his budget. It is also an area where my department is taking some supporting initiatives and I will describe those in more detail shortly.

Secondly, we will encourage the private sector to play its full role in employing people whatever their sex, age, ethnic or cultural background. We will be doing this in complete realization of current and future social and demographic changes. Some examples are the increasing participation and rising expectations of women in the labour market, the aging of the baby boom generation, alterations in the family size and structure and the aspirations of native Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

I will recognize the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), but first I have a matter to bring to the attention of the House.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that drug and antibiotic residues in meat and meat products are responsible for causing severe illness, allergic reactions and even death to consumers allergic to specific drugs and antibiotics, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Agriculture take immediate steps to eliminate the serious and dangerous health hazard emanating from abattoirs under federal inspection.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Canadian workers in the fish processing industry will lose some 40,000 work hours and the Canadian economy will suffer a loss of more than $2 million as the result of planned over-the-side sales of 9,000 tonnes of mackerel and 3,500 tonnes of gaspereau alone this year to the Soviets, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That no further contracts be arranged by the minister or his officials with Soviet interests for over-the-side sales guaranteeing them cash or increased allocations of fish quotas, without prior consultation with the president of the Seafood Workers' Union, representing 6,000 workers, the fishermen's representatives and the processors.

DELAY IN CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL ON SANDY BAY RESERVE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that ten families are already withholding their children from attending school on the Sandy Bay Indian reserve, and in view of the fact that other parents are threatening to join them, considering that the present school has been condemned as a fire-trap since 1968, and since in January, 1979, Treasury Board had originally approved the construction of a new school, and since the Dakota Ojibway tribal council has also passed a resolution requesting the federal government to "immediately grant the Sandy Bay tribal council its new school and any efforts to further delay this vitally important issue be stopped immediately", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to immediately investigate the reason for the delay in construction of the said school, and that he ensure that his department not stall unduly the transmittal to Treasury Board of the Sandy Bay school project.

Due to the hardship being experienced by wage and/or commission earners who are affected by bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings—for example, the employees of Parkway

Country Motors in Edmonton, Alberta—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this House request the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to immediately revise subsection 265(4) and subsection 265(10) of Bill C-12, an act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, in order to guarantee that the class of creditors set out in subsection 265(4)(e), namely, creditors with claims for wages, salaries, commissions and compensation for other services are given first priority over the payment of all other claims; and, furthermore, that this House expedite the passage of Bill C-12 so that wage earners whose back wages have been frozen because of bankruptcy can be paid.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the differential in the cost of fuel and electricity charged to residents in outlying settlements in the Northwest Territories and Yukon vis-à-vis Whitehorse and Yellowknife, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this government implement the policy adopted by the previous government and approved by Treasury Board, namely, the equalization of fuel costs with those in Whitehorse and Yellowknife and the equalization of electrical rates for small business with those in Whitehorse and Yellowknife.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BROADCASTING

REQUEST MINISTER INTERVENE IN LABOUR DISPUTE AT RADIO-CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

From Friday, April 25, until Wednesday, April 30, the production staff at Radio-Canada facilities in Quebec and New Brunswick were locked out by the corporation. As a result, all live broadcasts, including news, were severely curtailed. This action by Radio-Canada came after a conciliator's proposal which the workers accepted, but which Radio-Canada rejected.

In light of the fact that the Quebec referendum is currently under way, making adequate news coverage even more vital for the citizens of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That this House instructs the Minister of Labour to actively intervene in this dispute, with the specific intent of persuading Radio-Canada to accept the conciliator's proposal and ending all further interruptions of service to the residents of Quebec and New Brunswick.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

FUEL PURCHASED IN CANADA BY FOREIGN CARRIERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas it is estimated that in 1980 foreign air carriers, by stopping at Canadian airports, will take advantage of cheaper, subsidized Canadian fuel prices to record savings of approximately $101 million; whereas these savings are not being passed on to the passengers travelling from Canadian cities in the way of reduced fares, but are used to subsidize the costs of other world operations by these foreign carriers; and whereas the subsidies under the Canadian oil import compensation program were intended for Canadians and not for the large, foreign international airlines, many of which are state-owned; therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia)—and this might have the consensus of the House:

That the government examine this situation immediately and consider charging the world price for all fuel purchased by foreign carriers landing at Canadian aiports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Moved by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia)—

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Too late.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will ask the question again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: You can't do that.

An hon. Member: Too late, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon—-

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I gather that what would rule in this case—

Some hon. Members: Three o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —is your ear. I gather, from your intention to put the motion, that you did not hear a "no": in fact, you started to put the motion. I would think that is about the best evidence the House could possibly have of what your decision was with respect to what you heard.

● (1415)

Madam Speaker: I asked the House twice if there was unanimous consent. There was a considerable amount of noise. When I started to read the motion I began to hear the "noes", so I put the question a third time. There were "noes". Therefore, I felt that there was not unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Unacceptable.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED MOVE OF SASKATCHEWAN DISTRICT OFFICE FROM SASKATOON TO WINNIPEG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I am glad that the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) is discussing matters with the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle).

In view of the fact that widespread opposition has been registered to the Postmaster General on the move of the Saskatchewan district office from Saskatoon to Winnipeg, including from the mayor and members of city council of the city of Saskatoon, employees of the Post Office and members of Parliament representing Saskatoon and all Saskatchewan, and in view of the fact that the Postmaster General has neglected or refused to categorically revoke the planned move, notwithstanding serious questions of impairing the efficiency of the operation of the Post Office in Saskatchewan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House direct the Postmaster General to immediately make a statement in this House cancelling any plan to move the Saskatchewan district office and alleviate the deeply-felt apprehension that Saskatchewan views are not taken seriously by this government.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS IN PURCHASING FERTILIZERS AND HERBICIDES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that farmers are now seeding and are under tremendous financial pressure, whereby 65 per cent of the farmers must borrow money from lending institutions to finance the planting of their crops, at the highest interest rates in the history of the country; and given the situation where the Canadian Wheat Board allows an over-delivery of quotas of 735 bushels for the purchase of seed grains, and where that quota is not used on a regular basis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the government take the immediate steps to make it possible for farmers to use the extra quotas to purchase fertilizers and herbicides.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

FUTURE INCREASES IN PRICE OF OIL

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question, which relates to oil pricing, is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister who indicated to the House yesterday that this government's oil price increase would be less than $4 a barrel this year.

Given the fact that the Minister of Finance, in his mini-budget statement, indicated a $1 billion reduction this year in the oil import compensation payments, and given the second commitment by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on April 16, when he stated that it was his intent to collect not less revenue this year from the new oil pricing agreement than would have been received under our December 11 budget, and given the fact that these ministerial commitments—the two of them in total—cannot be achieved under any formula without price increases in excess of $4 a barrel, has the Prime Minister asked both, or either, of his ministers to review or withdraw their respective commitments?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not agree at all with the premises of the question. We have discussed this and I am surprised that members opposite agree with the premises of the question.

Mr. Crosbie: You are on the ropes, Pierre.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister does not agree with the premises, he questions the accuracy of Hansard. I direct his attention to those two days.

Does the Prime Minister recall that earlier this week his Minister of Energy refused to rule out a special oil levy, or special oil tax, at the refinery level which, of course, will be passed directly on to the Canadian consumer; and does the Prime Minister's commitment of less than $4 a barrel include any special levies or taxes imposed by the federal government on oil after it leaves the wellhead?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, on the first part of the question, when I said that I did not agree with the premises, I was not agreeing with the hon. member's statement based on statements by the minister. It was a statement in the question of the questioner that this money cannot be raised without increasing prices beyond what the Conservatives did. That is the premise with which I do not agree, and that is something that will not be happening. That is the answer to the second part of the hon. member's question.

What I said was, rather than an increase of some 32 cents a gallon which was planned by his minister of finance and his government, we will have an increase of less than that. It will be an increase less by at least the 18 cents of the excise tax and of the other 14 cents which was the increase corresponding to a barrel at the wellhead. Our increase will be less than that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: Perhaps the Prime Minister failed to understand me. If I put the question badly, I apologize. I will rephrase it. The less than $4 a barrel commitment given yesterday, does that commitment include, as a matter of principle or as a matter of government policy, any special levies or taxes that are within his government's constitutional jurisdiction to impose on oil, the handlers or consumers thereof, after it leaves the wellhead.

In other words, I want to know whether the $4 commitment includes a commitment that any additional taxes or levies will not result in a price in excess of $4 a barrel at the wellhead.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is very clear.

Mr. Trudeau: It is not clear at all, Madam Speaker. I think I know what the hon. member is trying to ask, but it is certainly not clear from what he says that he knows what he is asking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He wants to know, when we say our price will be less than $4 a barrel increase, if we will try to make up for that "less" by some other taxes elsewhere. The answer to that is "no".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HONOURING OF COMMITMENT ON FUTURE PRICES OF OIL

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Prime Minister demonstrated his facility with arithmetic. Surely he must realize that the statement he has just made, the statement by the Minister of Finance regarding a billion dollar reduction in the import subsidy, and the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the same "take" to the federal government as what they would have received from the December 11 budget, makes it impossible to honour the commitment of a $4 increase this year and $4.50 in each of the next three years. Will the Prime Minister have the honesty to admit that to the House and stop playing the shell game with Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that is not a question; it is a rhetorical argument. When the hon. member says it is impossible to do that, he is forgetting one thing, that the Tory budget and the pricing policies for oil of the former government was based on a principle which would sock the consumer. We are not going to sock the consumer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: We believe that the companies themselves and the producers themselves have some contribution to make in this.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I gather the Prime Minister is indicating, without saying so in a forthright way, that in fact his price increases will be more than $4 this year and $4.50 in each of the next three years, and just by moving the date he is going to change it.

I have a question for the Minister of Finance—pardon me, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who said in the House on Tuesday that the government's decision to reduce the excise tax saved the Canadian consumer $2.6 billion. He also said in the House on April 16 that they intended to collect, from oil price increases, the same revenue that would have been collected under the December 11 budget. My question to the minister is, what kind of tax, levy or shell game is going to produce the $2.6 billion that is not going to have any impact on the consumer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, at the beginning of the question the hon. member indicated that he was asking it of the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: I will repeat the question, Madam Speaker. I then said "I am sorry" to the Minister of Energy. The question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is this: On Tuesday, he indicated to the House that the decision of his government not to impose the excise tax resulted in a $2.6 billion saving to the Canadian consumer. But on April 16 he said in the House that he intends to collect as much revenue from oil price increases as the December 11 budget provided.

• (1425)

May I ask him by what tax levy or mysterious process he plans to produce that $2.6 billion for the federal treasury without an impact being felt by the consumer?

Mr. Lalonde: I would invite the hon. member to show a little patience. When he sees the proposals the government is going to put forward, he will realize that they are, by a wide range, much more favourable to the consumer than the proposals put forward in the budget of the former minister of finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

AUTO INDUSTRY—PRESERVATION OF JOBS FOR CANADIAN WORKERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am sure that everybody in the House, the minister included, is aware that the president of Chrysler, Mr. Iacocca, has publicly indicated that there will be no job guarantees in the agreement he is attempting to sign with the Canadian government, that there will be no engine plant in Windsor and no small size, world car built in Canada, and that they have just completed negotiations to sell off their Australian holdings to a Japanese company.

Can the minister tell the House exactly what it is we are putting on the negotiating table in an effort to preserve for Canada that portion of the auto industry, and preserve for Canadian workers the jobs, which he long since promised would be preserved?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I have been working to make sure that in this matter there is a fair deal for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: In this connection, Canadian jobs are, and have always been, a very important consideration. In spite of what the chairman of Chrysler Corporation said in Detroit yesterday, it is a fact that senior executives of his parent corporation and the Canadian company were negotiating with my officials throughout yesterday afternoon, yesterday evening and on into the night. They are meeting right now. I am determined, and the government is determined, that this matter will not come to an end in the absence of a fair deal for our country and for Canadian workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: Since it is clear that all the matters which, according to the minister, ought to be contained within the agreement have been discarded by the chairman of Chrysler—there is to be no guarantee, no engine plant, no small car production—what is it that we are asking for in return for the $200 million guarantee he is prepared to put up?

Mr. Gray: The hon. member and the New Democratic Party seem ready to cave in to the Chrysler Corporation. We are not.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Gray: The Canadian people will be able to judge this matter in light of the total package we are able to negotiate in return for whatever kind and level of assistance the government provides.

PROPOSALS FOR MAINTAINING VIABLE AUTO INDUSTRY IN CANADA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): May I address my final supplementary to the Prime Minister? He will recall, as most of us do, that during the election, speaking in Windsor he indicated he was prepared to renegotiate the auto agreement with the United States. He made reference to the fact that there was a $3 billion deficit in the auto trade pact arrangement.

• (1430)

Can the Prime Minister indicate whether he has personally met with any of the Big Three leaders or all of the Big Three leaders, whether he is prepared to meet with them or whether he has asked for or obtained a letter of commitment for the production of parts, for research and development and for the manufacturing of vehicles which in fact might even sell on the North American continent?

Is there any indication from the Prime Minister on what he proposes might be done with the auto industry, given that Chrysler is not the only one that is ailing and that 25,000 people and their families in Ontario are not earning a living—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had any such meetings but, of course, the matter has been discussed many times in the cabinet. The minister responsible for trade has met not only with the people in charge of the auto industry but also with his counterparts in the American government, and they have agreed to discuss the auto pact with us.

SPORTS

DISTRIBUTION OF LOTO CANADA FUNDS TO ARTS AND SPORTS ORGANIZATIONS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for either the minister responsible for sports or the Secretary of State.

Since the provinces have given the federal government a $6.4 million cheque as its share of Loto Canada, and since the cheque remains uncashed—at an interest loss of about $3,000 a day—would either minister advise the House whether the government intends to cash the cheque and distribute the funds to arts and sports in the manner agreed upon by the previous government?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the lady member for this important question.

Mr. Epp: The "member".

An hon. Member: "Hon. member".

Mr. Nielsen: Chauvinist.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I think the minister could call her "the hon. member".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I am quick to agree with your edict, but if we cannot call them ladies, I suppose we cannot call them gentlemen either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: In answer to the question, may I say that having received from the provinces a cheque for just over $6 million, which was a certified cheque, and not wishing to cash it until the legal position of the tentative agreement that the former government had attempted to make but had not, perhaps, completed with the provinces, was clear, we returned the certified cheque—because no interest runs with a certified cheque—to the provinces and received in return an uncertified cheque. This means that $3,000 a day is accruing to the interests of the ten provinces of this country. That is another piece of generosity by the benevolent federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUNDING OF VANCOUVER ART GALLERY

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, since the minister did not answer the question, and since the Liberals have demonstrated that they prefer deficit financing to certified cheques, I will direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

Since some of these funds have been earmarked as the federal government's contribution to convert the old court house into Vancouver's art gallery, and since $5 million has been raised by private individuals in Vancouver—which depends on the federal funding—does the minister recommend that the Vancouver art gallery return these funds to the citizens of Vancouver because of an unwillingness on the part of the new government to allocate these funds to the appropriate ministries for their disbursement?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. I would like to point out to the hon. member that the capital project to which she is referring is, indeed, a campaign promise which was made during the course of the campaign by the previous government without allocating any specific funds to that project.

As soon as the issue concerning the distribution of Loto Canada funds is resolved, this government will be in a position to reassess the capital project requests which have come in from across the country, and we will at that time give all the consideration required to the project the hon. member has mentioned.

RENEWED FEDERALISM—JURISDICTION OVER LOTTERIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us if it is part of the renewed federalism of which he has spoken to reassert the federal claim over the field of lotteries.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, that matter is under consideration and discussion.

RENEWED FEDERALISM—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I wonder if it is part of the renewed federalism of which the Prime Minister has spoken to deny the jurisdiction over offshore resources to the provinces.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That would not be renewed federalism, Madam Speaker; that would be a continuation of the kind of federalism practised by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I remind him that our government had signed with the maritime provinces an agreement as to the offshore. He broke that agreement in order to give them unilaterally to the provinces.

In the case of the lotteries, we had also reached an agreement with the provinces. He broke that agreement in order to give them unilaterally to the provinces.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has indicated that renewed federalism in at least these two instances involves the quickest possible return to the status quo.

Given the interest in Quebec and elsewhere in knowing what the contents of this renewed federalism of which the Prime Minister has spoken are, and since he has now indicated two areas in which he intends to move away from progress that was made, will he table in this House, before May 20, an indication of the contents of the renewed federalism that he and his government have in mind?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it seems to me that my previous answer made it clear that we had reached agreement with the provinces on these two matters. What the government of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition did was to cave in and to give to the provinces what had been negotiated away by them on an equal basis with the federal government. Now I am telling him that if his view of renewed federalism is to undo all the agreements which are fair for both the federal government and provincial governments, and replace them by agreements which will be fair only for the provinces, that is not our view of renewed federalism.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WINNERS OF COMPETITION FOR DESIGN OF PATROL FRIGATE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the minister could announce the two winners of the competition for the design of the Canadian patrol frigate, thus enabling the navy to proceed to the contract definition phase and enabling the three consortia which did not win the competition to cut their losses and not incur further useless expenses.

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that nothing is unduly delaying the normal progress of the frigate file. I have not yet received any specific suggestion concerning companies having the required qualifications to undertake the design of the new frigates. The only statement I have made so far is that the new frigates would be built in Canada with a Canadian design.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, the minister is not quite as specific as he was last Friday about where they would be built, when he illustrated political patronage was his prime factor in awarding the contracts.

Last November, as minister of national defence I sent a memo to the chief of the defence staff and the deputy minister ordering a study to be started on a new ship replacement program to follow on after the six frigate program was finished. An interim report was to be given to the chief of the defence staff by March 15 and to the minister by the end of June. Can the minister tell the House what progress, if any, has been made on this study, and if he has been briefed on it by the chief of the defence staff?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, following my previous answer, the development of the frigate program follows its normal course and once the problem of the new fighters was settled I asked the department to do its utmost to suggest all possible solutions on the frigates.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER OF JUSTICE WILL BAN PUBLICITY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Following the scathing criticism made this morning by PQ minister Pierre-Marc Johnson about the publicity of the federal government, does the Minister of Justice intend to put a stop to the information activities of the Canadian government in Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to stop the publicity. I merely want to thank Mr. Johnson for having acknowledged the suitability and effectiveness of the Canadian government information program. I wish to take this opportunity to remind Mr. Johnson of a statement made on March 31, 1980, before the National Assembly by Premier Lévesque, and I quote:

It is normal for governments, if they have some sense of reality, to try, as corporations do, to obtain some information on the occasion of publicity—

Madam Speaker: Order. Could the minister answer more briefly and refrain from reading long quotations.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I very rarely abuse the rules and I have almost finished:

If it is related to the referendum, I would say "Good!" and I suppose you would say "Too bad!". However, this is in a context which is—

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD APPROVAL OF NATURAL GAS EXPORTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Perhaps I can call him what Vancouver journalists called him, "the charming minister, the charming member".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: He will need all his charm. Yesterday, the National Energy Board approved the export of enough natural gas to finance prebuilding the southern portions of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline, thereby making a complete farce of its own hearings on the prebuild.

My question is this: In view of the fact that the National Energy Board has obviously prejudged the issue, can the minister assure the House that he will stand by his own position of last December 6 when he stated in the House that such exports would amount to—and I use his words—"the greatest sellout in Canadian history"?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to a press release which I issued yesterday following the statement by the National Energy Board, in which I indicated that this report by the Energy Board "did not imply that the government was now prepared to approve new gas exports". This matter will be decided by cabinet—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: When?

Mr. Lalonde: In due time, after we have had further consideration of this whole issue. More particularly, the "key factor in the ultimate decision will be the status of the Alaska sections of the pipeline". This is all in the press release which was issued yesterday, and we stand by the position we have taken.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Minister also said to the press yesterday, and I will use his words, that "Canada was taking every step possible to pave the way for prebuilding the project". Senator Olson, who is also responsible in this matter, has approved equipment purchases for the project. On April 21, in Calgary, he said that he expected legislative authority or legislation in this House within the next three to five weeks. and in the Senate yesterday he said that he was prepared to agree to the prebuilding, this summer, of a portion of the project.

My supplementary question is this, first of all: Who is right? Has the minister made a decision, or not? Is Senator Olson right, or is the minister right? Further, did Senator Olson's statements mean that the Government of Canada has received assurances from the government of the United States that the whole Alaskan gas pipeline can be built?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. member is trying to introduce confusion where there is none. When he quoted that excerpt from my press release, he could have gone on to read as follows:

—Canada was taking every possible step to pave the way for prebuilding the southern sections, and that it was now incumbent on the United States to do the same by demonstrating that the northern sections of the pipeline and the entire project would be completed in an expeditious and timely manner.

This is the position of this government and all ministers of this government.

THE CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER DRAFT AMENDMENTS WILL BE SUBMITTED TO PROVINCES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Like many other Canadians, he is surely aware of the attitude of several of his provincial counterparts with regard to the status quo or sovereignty, because rejection of both options manifests itself in the same way. In the context of his new federalism, is the right hon. Prime Minister in a position to say, with a view to throwing some light on the subject for thousands of Canadians, whether that attitude goes to the point of intending to submit the draft of a new constitution to the provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If it could induce the hon. member for Joliette into joining the No forces, I should be tempted to say yes.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, you will understand that it is clearly not enough to convince those who are tempted to vote yes at the present time, to hear the right hon. Prime Minister refuse to throw some light on the matter. It is obvious the premiers—and they are people with responsibilities—want a meeting to be convened shortly after the referendum, regardless of its results. It is obvious that the federal government will also have to discuss the matter with the Quebec government. Can the right hon. Prime Minister say whether he intends to submit the draft of a new constitution, which would be of interest in any event at least to those who might be tempted to vote no? But the right hon. Prime Minister should not be surprised if his new federalism is found lacking, and undeserving of trust after the experience of the past 12 years.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the government has made two proposals for a new constitution to the House. It did so in June of 1978 when we tabled the white paper entitled "A Time for Action". We also tabled a bill, namely Bill C-60. A report was also prepared at the request of the government, that of the royal commission of inquiry chaired by Messrs. Pepin and Robarts. A royal commission of inquiry was also set up by the federal government, that of Mr. Pearson, namely the Laurendeau-Dunton commission. So the hon. member should not forget that this government and former governments of Liberal allegiance have made several proposals on a renewed federalism. What he seems to forget, Madam Speaker, is that when Premier Lévesque came he always refused to discuss the proposals saying they were "too little". That was his way of ensuring that the status quo be maintained because, as we know, what he wants is independence. The hon. member should also know that.

AIRPORTS

CAMPAIGN PROMISE TO IMPROVE FACILITIES AT MOUNT HOPE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madame le Président, on Monday the Minister of Transport said that the government would honour the Conservative administration's $45 million commitment to expand the Hamilton civic airport at Mount Hope, and then he added "if it makes sense". The hon. member for Hamilton East said the following on January 25:

—$45 million would provide facilities that are primitive at best; the Liberals stand by their commitment to spend $100 million to upgrade the airport.

In view of that campaign statement by his colleague, I ask the Minister of Transport if those gentlemen have their act together yet. If $45 million may not make sense, can we take from that that the government intends to honour its $100 million campaign promise?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my information is that the previous Liberal government never made a promise of giving $100 million to this project.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Your colleague did.

Mr. Pepin: No, sir. My information is that the immediate previous government—theirs—simply passed a resolution in cabinet expressing the wish, the desire, the intention or the principle of allowing $45 million for this project.

I suggest to you, Madam Speaker, very simply that the assessment of what is needed to be done at that airport is not completed yet. This is what is taking place now on the ground side as well as on the air side. When this is done, we will assess what needs to be done and direct the necessary funds to do it.

AIR CANADA

SERVICE OUT OF HAMILTON—EFFECT ON NORDAIR

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question which is directed to the Minister of Transport. Air Canada opened an office in downtown Hamilton a few months ago, and a senior official at that opening said Air Canada would be offering a service out of Hamilton once the new airport facilities were arranged at Mount Hope.

I want to ask the minister what effect this will have on Nordair. What effect will it have on the purchase offers which have been tendered to the government for the Nordair shares held by Air Canada on behalf of the government?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No effect at all, Madam Speaker. This is a different question entirely. My department is trying to make sure that Nordair will stay there and will continue to operate from that airport. There are ideas being expressed there are possibilities that Air Canada might also operate from that airport, on other routes, obviously. This is what is being assessed now. It is a bit of a vicious circle, as usual—one wants to know what the traffic will be in order to find out what kind of terminal one needs.

Mr. Nielsen: Like Pickering.

Mr. Pepin: So we have to break through this vicious circle, and we are working on that at the moment.

FINANCE

RESULTS OF MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—ASSISTANCE FOR LESS DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I had hoped to address my question to the Minister of Finance, but I see that he has left the chamber. Therefore, I will address it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

● (1450)

The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance is well known for his activities and interest in the north-south dialogue, the discussions that go on between the rich and the poor countries today which are even more important because the staggering differences become more clearly visible: for example, 800 million people are now living in destitution and 30 million children die each year from starvation.

I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has had an opportunity to discuss with the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance the meeting that was held last week in Europe of the International Monetary Fund. Also, can he indicate what was the result of that meeting in relation to the problems of north-south countries, particularly countries like Jamaica which are staggering under the debt load that the world currency crisis now causes?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have not yet had a report on that particular meeting from the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, but the whole subject of north-south dialogue and all the related concerns which the Deputy Prime Minister, and Minister of Finance, and other members of the government have been so aware of in recent years, are very much before the government.

There is a special session of the United Nations dealing with this problem this year, and I can assure the hon. member that this is one of our foremost concerns in international affairs.

Mr. Ogle: Madam Speaker, in the recent report of the Independent Commission on International Development Issues, former West German Chancellor Willy Brandt asked that governments bring the subject of north-south disparities before their parliaments as a matter of the utmost urgency.

Is the minister ready to advance this debate in the House at this time, so that Canada, instead of just joining in the heightening of international tensions could be a forerunner in responding to global development needs, which are not a side issue but a matter of survival today?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, as the House knows, the government has already taken the initiative of establishing a task force in this particular area and, of course, these issues will be before the parliamentary committee and also before the House in due course.

THE ADMINISTRATION

VISIT OF CABINET MEMBERS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—REASON THEREFOR

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is in respect of the rumour that has been circulated that nine government ministers are embarking upon a mission to that land beyond the Rockies called British Columbia.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House the specific objectives this mission is to accomplish? Also, will he give us an indication of the message this mission is to convey, so that we who come from this strange land can prepare a climate of hospitality with which such important delegations are usually received, and in order that the mission will not end up as a "mission impossible"?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member calls British Columbia a strange land. It is a very beautiful land and a very integral part of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am also surprised that he feels this matter coming up is the subject of rumours. If he had been tied into his constituency he would know that the government of British Columbia has been seeking a meeting with our government for many weeks now. Unfortunately, we have been unable to take enough ministers out west to go to that meeting, but fortunately on the occasion of the visit of the Prime Minister of Japan we have planned parts of the discussions in British Columbia with the Japanese Prime Minister. On that occasion we will have several federal ministers in British Columbia dealing with their counterparts on many subjects of mutual concern.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, in that context, maybe the Prime Minister could undertake to put members on this side of the House on the mailing list of the political minister who sits in th other House and who, indeed, organized and co-ordinated the mission with those who are to receive it out there.

Could the Prime Minister, specifically, say whether the ministers are prepared to discuss such things as the port of Prince Rupert and agreements with the British Columbia Railway regarding hopper cars, particularly since the Minister of Transport is one of the ministers going out there? More specifically, will they be prepared to discuss some of the commitments made by the former government, and is the mission prepared to reaffirm and underline those commitments again?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I will be happy to accede to the request of the hon. member. I am sure that he is on the mailing list of this government. I think we do everything we can to keep members opposite in touch with their constituents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: On the subject matters of the discussions, Madam Speaker, there is a very full agenda put together bilaterally by the government of British Columbia and ourselves.

ENERGY

JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE OIL

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I will ask my question of the Prime Minister.

A few days ago the government of Newfoundland, through its spokesman, the minister of energy, indicated it had received no communication from this government of Canada as to its position regarding the dispute with Newfoundland over the jurisdiction of offshore oil. I would ask the Prime Minister whether it is still the position of his government to refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada and, if so, when will such reference be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot speak on the statements of the Newfoundland minister, but this government has made very clear what our position was, and is. It is twofold: it is that if proprietory rights have to be decided, they should be decided by the Supreme Court of Canada and not by any unilateral action either of the provincial government or of the federal government.

I think the hon. member would agree with that, that only the Supreme Court of Canada can decide, in the final instance, what the constitution says about ownership offshore. I regret, in that regard, that we have not been able to get from the province of British Columbia consent to a joint—

An hon. Member: Newfoundland.

Mr. Trudeau: Newfoundland, consent to a joint—

An hon. Member: It is on the other coast.

Mr. Clark: There are three coasts, the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Arctic.

Mr. Trudeau: I know, Mr. Clark, but I don't lose my luggage when I go to one coast.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What about John Munro?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You lost B.C., and you lost a minister.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, as to the second part of our policy, it is to state again to Newfoundland what we have stated many times before, that if it wants to set aside the question of ownership and work out an administrative arrangement which will be advantageous to the province in money terms and in administrative terms, it just has to look at the agreement that was signed a few years ago by the three maritime provinces.

We are prepared to set aside any discussion of ownership to reach an agreement which would be advantageous to the people of Newfoundland in money and in administrative terms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that the agreement with the maritimes is not acceptable to Newfoundland. The Newfoundland government has also indicated that if this matter is not resolved to its satisfaction, even if it is referred to the Supreme Court during that period, it is prepared to use the powers it already has to hold up production of the very important Hibernia well which is now commercially viable.

My question to the Prime Minister is: In view of the fact that the Newfoundland government indicated in a statement this week that it is prepared to negotiate, and in view of the position it has taken regarding its difference of opinion with the federal government—that is, to hold up production if there is not settlement—is the Prime Minister and is the Government of Canada prepared to accept the good will expressed by the Newfoundland government and immediately sit down and negotiate?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, would the hon. member mind clarifying his statement about holding up production? I did not understand what that reference was.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Madam Speaker, I would be glad to. I am referring to a statement made on Monday by the minister of energy and mines for the province of Newfoundland, in which he stated that the Newfoundland government was prepared to use the powers it already has to hold up commercial production of the Hibernia well until this matter—that is, the dispute with this government—is resolved to its satisfaction.

I say that is a very important new development. In view of that very important new development, and in view of the importance of the potential of the Hibernia well to eastern Canada, will the Prime Minister at least order his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to immediately sit down and negotiate with the Newfoundland government?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it does not seem to me that the context quoted by the hon. member is very conducive to fruitful negotiations. If the minister of the Newfoundland government is stating that unilaterally they will take measures to hold up production of something over which their ownership is not established, I would hope that the minister of Newfoundland would reconsider his position.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

NATIONAL INQUIRY INTO DOMESTIC AND INTERNATIONAL POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I see he is not present; therefore, I would like to direct it to the Prime Minister.

Our government initiated a national inquiry into domestic and international nuclear policy in Canada. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to reconvene that national inquiry so that Canadians may have an input and there can be an assessment with respect to the direction of our national nuclear policy?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, there is no intention at the moment to begin a public inquiry of the type the hon. member has raised but, rather, to pursue an internal review as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced a few days ago.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, that announcement will come as a very great disappointment to literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians who feel they should have an opportunity to present their views on this very serious and important question.

My question to the parliamentary secretary, in view of the fact that he is answering on behalf of the minister, is: Will he be able to table as soon as possible the terms of reference with respect to an internal inquiry, and will the minister be in a position to let us know precisely the nature of that inquiry? Will the inquiry be open, and will the people of Canada have an opportunity to participate, whatever form it may take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I was involved in the discussions of this matter with the parliamentary secretary and the minister. On behalf of the government, I would like to explain why we are not at this time organizing a public inquiry: it is because the time schedule for keeping our industry viable is very, very short.

We are now in danger of seeing the Canadian industry become obsolete and lose its chance to sell in other countries of the world unless we make some quick decisions on some basic questions. It is in order to get these quick decisions that we in the government want to establish our own policy in a firm way.

There is no intention of preventing the Canadian public, concurrently or subsequently, from participating in various ways and expressing their views, but we cannot wait for a long inquiry to decide whether we stay in the game or get out of the game. That is the essence of the situation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is not the question. Shameful.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEFENCE PROCUREMENT CONTRACTS—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN AWARDING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. It is based on the remarks which he made in the House last Friday.

Could the minister explain why he is discriminating against industry in western Canada and in Atlantic Canada in defence procurement contracts? Could he also explain why work on the F-18 which was earmarked for British Columbia was moved from that area to central Canada, and why he committed in this House last Friday the work associated with the frigate program to Quebec without offering a fair share to the people of British Columbia and Atlantic Canada? Also, why has the minister not made available full details and fair opportunities on the new truck acquisition, choosing to make vague promises to the province of Quebec, rather than outlining how such a contract of defence procurement could help the government's national industrial strategy?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the question put by the hon. member of the New Democratic Party is rather lengthy and would take some time to answer, but I can say this, in general: when we are discussing various contracts and supplies for the Department of National Defence, we take into consideration the basic principle of the Canadian confederation, namely, the equitable distribution of the economic impact throughout Canada—that means all provinces, including Quebec, British Columbia and Ontario. That is the principle we apply when giving out the various contracts we must award.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBERTS—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF LANGUAGE USED BY HON. MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER SOUTH—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Yesterday, the hon. Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) questioned the language used by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). I indicated that I would check Hansard. I had said that I had not heard the hon. member for Vancouver South say anything which seemed to me to be unparliamentary. I have checked Hansard and found that the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver South was as follows:

> They have completely circumvented the right of the hon. member for Peterborough to raise that matter in this House on behalf of his constituents and receive an honest answer from a government which, in this case, is not only acting dishonestly, but shabbily.

The words which presented the difficulty are not directed to individual members of the House but, rather, to the government. I must rule as my predecessors, that such words directed to the government collectively are not unparliamentary.

MR. WADDELL—COMPOSITION OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On May 23, which will be coming up shortly, the Canadian-United States interparliamentary group will be going to San Diego for a conference. With respect to this conference, there are only two members of the New Democratic Party who are able to go.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: They are the environment critic and the finance critic. The seminars which are being held at the conference—and I have examined the itinerary in some detail—involve the environment, Canadian-American relations; finance, Canadian-American relations; and energy, Canadian-American relations. As the energy critic for our party, I am not invited to attend, even though very important questions came up in the House today.

The delegation consists of seven senators and they are going by chartered jet from here to the conference. It seems to me that this is a great cost to the Canadian taxpayers because we as members have the privilege of an allotted number of flights. This delegation could fly to the west coast and take another flight from there.

As a member of the House of Commons, I object because this infringes on my privileges as a member and because, instead of a proper delegation representing Canada, it is a delegation, as I have said, of senators who do not do anything with respect to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: —these matters and they have no responsibilities. I am raising a serious matter of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: I note that members of the Liberal party and the Conservative party are prepared not only to subsidize these senators to enable them to attend, but to fly them there in a chartered jet. I think that it is a shame for the Canadian taxpayer and that it infringes on my privileges as a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There is not a dry eye in the House, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I am not quite sure whether I can accept the question of privilege raised by the hon. member. It seems to me that the formation of delegations to meetings of interparliamentary associations is a matter that is dealt with among the members, and I am sure that the New Democratic Party had a representative at the meeting when that particular delegation was decided upon. I suppose that the hon. member is entitled to raise some complaint in the House, but I am not sure that it should be addressed to the House.

Would the hon. member please address himself, rather than to the House, to the whips or committees which have the responsibility of forming these delegations. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I understand that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: I have given the floor to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I was worried that the government House leader would not hear me over the din coming from the end of the chamber. I wonder if I could ask the House business question today. Could the President of the Privy Council give us some indication what we will be dealing with later this week and, if possible, into next week?

● (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as was announced yesterday we will proceed today with the consideration of the bill to revise the Bank Act. We will interrupt it tomorrow to study legislation to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods and, if possible, legislation to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers, that is Bills C-18 and C-21. Next Monday, as all members know, the Prime Minister of Japan will address Parliament in this House. Question period will therefore begin at 4.30, following which we will resume consideration of the bank legislation. I hope that by the end of next week we will be able to complete our consideration of bills on the Small Businesses Loans Act, the Employment Tax Credit Act and the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

I also intend to allot an opposition day next week. I will specify the exact day later on after consultation with the House leaders of both opposition parties, but there will definitely be an opposition day next week.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the President of the Privy Council for that information. A couple of questions arise with respect to House business. The first is the continuation of the throne speech debate. Now that we are consider allotted days, would the minister consider finishing off the throne speech debate? A number of members want to speak. I am particularly interested in hearing a speech to be made by the hon. member for Joliette and I know that others in the House want to have the opportunity to make a contribution.

The other matter has to do with the question of allotted days. In the past, a practice has been developed whereby a schedule of allotted days might be submitted to the leader of the government for discussion. If that is agreeable to him, I will be glad to prepare a schedule.

Last week I asked the minister about the possibility of a reference that would permit the parliamentary delegations that go out across the country—and indeed across the world from time to time—to report to the appropriate standing committee. Has the minister considered that? Perhaps he has not had time to do so but I would appreciate it if he would. I undertake that there would be no debate with respect to this matter.

Business of the House

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one about House business. We have had some discussion about certain matters that might be referred to committees. I wonder if the government House leader would consider a reference to a committee, whether standing or special, of the report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission? As he knows, there are some pretty important recommendations in that report and it seems to some of us that it should be considered.

May I also ask him, following the questions asked earlier today by the hon. member for Saskatoon East, whether consideration could be given to a day's debate on the north-south situation as recommended by Willi Brandt to all independent parliaments.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, first of all I should like to reply to the three questions which the House leader of the official opposition has asked. We have interrupted the throne speech debate to have more time to deal with bills which have accumulated because of the two elections we have had within a year. My hon. colleague is well aware that this week, thanks to the co-operation of all parties in the House, we have come to an agreement to dispose of the supply bills, which is already a giant step.

On the other hand, there are several bills which are urgent and must be adopted by June 30. That is why I cannot confirm to my colleague that we shall resume and complete the throne speech debate before the end of June. This remains a possibility, although highly improbable, because of the accumulated legislation we must deal with. If everything goes well and if all parties continue to co-operate the way they have this week, we might complete the throne speech debate before our summer recess and hopefully before September 1.

As to the hon. member's second question concerning the allotted days—

An hon. Member: September 1?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, I said September 1, and I hope it will be earlier.

As to the allotted days, I fully agree with my hon. colleague. I have asked my officials to set a number of dates which they will discuss with the House leaders of the other parties. We shall then try to come to an agreement on these dates before the summer recess, if there is one.

The hon. member raised a third question, namely: Should the reports of our foreign delegations be referred to House committees?

I think I mentioned before that that is a suggestion we will take into consideration. We have not decided anything in that regard. We shall have to decide whether consultations will take place and we shall also consult members of the New Democratic Party. If a decision is reached, I assure my colleague we shall inform him in due course.

In his first question the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre inquired about a committee on the Human Rights Commission report. This is an excellent suggestion worth considering and I shall report to him on it as soon as possible.

We must also keep in mind that the committees are already quite busy with the consideration of the main estimates. We are studying the possibility of striking a special committee to which would be referred the reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages. There should be an agreement on that matter soon. I would say offhand his suggestion is a positive one. I would not commit myself today but I shall give it serious consideration.

The same can be said about his last suggestion of a one-day debate on north-south relations. It is interesting and I shall make our position known about it without delay.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the reference of the hon. gentleman with respect to the joint committee on the Official Languages Act brought to mind something that I wanted to convey to him so I take the opportunity of doing it now. If he would put down that reference, we are prepared to have it go to a joint committee without debate in order to save time.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I wonder if a decision on that might be delayed for an hour or two. I had said that we would be willing to agree to that being put, with a limitation of one speaker per party. Now the suggestion comes that there be no speakers. I should like the opportunity to consult and perhaps we can come to an understanding later this afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): All right.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOMM—PARKS CANADA—PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege as a result of a debate which took place in the House yesterday when a question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) and in which the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) joined. Several statements were attributed to me, Madam Speaker, which unfortunately are not correct.

The hon. member for Peterborough stated as reported on page 572 of Hansard:

The hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) advised the media the day after that he and the minister—

Meaning my colleague, the hon. Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), who is responsible for Parks Canada.

—thought the same.

That statement is totally incorrect, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. minister but I made a ruling on that question of privilege yesterday. I would have needed notice in order to entertain the remarks that the hon. minister has to make.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. S. ROBINSON—NOMINATION OF MEMBERS FOR STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my point of order is with respect to the appointments to be made by this House to the joint parliamentary committees of the other place and the House of Commons. I am concerned members of the other place have for some time now had their nominations put forward for those committees and that this House has not taken any action to appoint our nominees.

There are a couple of committees which we are particularly concerned about, including the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which has a very heavy work load and which should be getting under way in the very near future. I have requested on several occasions the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) to take this matter in hand and I have received yet another note that the matter is possibly going to be dealt with next week. I would hope that we could deal with some dispatch with this important question.

• (1520)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it is correct that I did inform the hon. member today that we hoped within the next week to make nominations from the House of Commons to these special joint committees and I would ask for the hon. member's patience. There has been a lot of work going on in the last week or so in the organizing of the House. It is not our intention to delay, and we hope within the next week that everything will be sorted out.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING GUIDELINES

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) undertook to this House a fortnight ago, I should like to table in his name, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), copies in both official languages of correspondence which the Prime Minister has sent to all ministers and parliamentary secretaries concerning this government's conflict of interest guidelines.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELEGATION TO THE NETHERLANDS ON THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF LIBERATION

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members that May 5 is the thirty-fifth anniversary of the liberation of Holland. Those five dark years of oppression through the Second World War came to an end for that country, but at the cost of thousands of Canadian lives.

I shall lead an official delegation to The Netherlands from May 2 to 9. This delegation will include four senior Second World War Canadian military commanders and representatives of the Royal Canadian Legion and National Council of Veterans Associations. I will also have with me two members of the Senate, two members of the House of Commons and one winner of the Victoria Cross, the Commonwealth's highest decoration for gallantry during the liberation. We will renew the bonds of friendship and respect which have linked the Dutch and Canadian people for well over a generation. We will also share with our Dutch friends deep feelings of sadness for the more than 7,000 young Canadian servicemen who died in that struggle of 35 years ago and now rest in Dutch soil.

The passing years cannot erase in our minds the memory of those gallant men who paid, with their lives, the cost of those great ideals which our countries have come to share and stand for: democracy, freedom and justice.

We can find comfort in the knowledge that Canada's sacrifice from every province of our country and that of thousands of Dutch people during those years was not in vain. The people of Holland rose from the ashes of their war-devastated country to great heights of renewed nationhood. Since that time, 35 years ago, Holland and Canada have enjoyed a fruitful, rewarding relationship, a relationship which will continue to blossom just as The Netherlands Royal Family's annual gift of tulips does here in Ottawa each year around this time.

The links and memories that unite us are strong. We will ensure that they are never allowed to fade. We must also be vigilant to see that the ideals for which Canada fought, and preserved, are not lost but always held high. We will continue to maintain a vigilant guard over the legacy which thousands of Canadians have bequeathed to us on the battlefields of northwest Europe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in remembering the thirty-fifth anniversary of the liberation of Holland. I am sure the minister and his party will receive a very warm welcome.

I should also like to mention the great care and dedication that the Dutch have demonstrated in the maintenance of the graves of those 7,000 young Canadians buried in their soil. Canadian families visiting Holland have always commented on the sympathetic understanding of the people of Holland in this regard.

As the minister so correctly pointed out, our two countries have come to share a stand for democracy, freedom and justice. However, I feel we in this country have been somewhat remiss in our attention to the justice we have meted out to our veterans who returned to Canada. To this end I would call upon the minister to use this occasion to reintroduce the former Bill C-28, the Progressive Conservative legislation of the last Parliament which took the first step in measuring out some of the justice to which the minister now refers. Had a spirit of justice existed in this House when the former minister introduced Bill C-28, the opposition parties would have adopted the attitude of co-operation necessary to get this legislation through.

I congratulate the minister on the recognition he is giving this thirty-fifth anniversary of the liberation of Holland and call on him to provide some economic liberation to veterans and widows of veterans in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my colleagues and I also feel that it is appropriate for us to recall that day, May 5, 1945, when Canadian forces participated in the liberation of Holland. We think it is appropriate that we pause today to remember in particular the sacrifice of more than 7,000 lives of young Canadians, and, with the minister, we say that we shall never forget them. May we also never forget their survivors and their families.

We are glad that the minister is taking a delegation over to Holland this next week. We know, because of the warm relationships that exist between the Dutch people and the people of this country, that the delegation will have an interesting and enjoyable experience.

As I said, we join with the minister, and with all members in this House in remembering the sacrifices made by Canadians. Let us remember them in every way we can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADA-ONTARIO TASK FORCE RESPECTING POLLUTION CONTROL

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I wish to inform the House that my Ontario colleague, the hon. Harry Parrott, is announcing today the publication of a new draft pollution control order covering Inco's smelter complex in Sudbury.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank God for the Tories in Ontario.

Mr. Roberts: I wish to congratulate Dr. Parrott on the step he is taking; I know it was not an easy decision. I believe it is an important and courageous one. This draft order will be the subject of public meetings to be conducted over the next few weeks. This decision, which I salute and support, results from close co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in the sharing of research and detailed information.

The intent of the new order is to ensure that there is no increase in sulphur dioxide emissions from Inco, Sudbury, that reductions reflecting present developments in the production process, pyrrhotite rejection, be implemented in two years, and that detailed examination of specific technological means of reducing the emissions still further be undertaken by the company on an urgent basis.

An Ontario-Canada task force will be established to consider the implications of Inco's control options as well as those which might be developed for Falconbridge smelters in a wider environmental and socioeconomic context. The task force will also provide governments with an independent technical capacity to assess such options.

Our belief, based on existing studies, is that Inco is able to absorb the expenditures which may be required by a major emission reduction program. There is, however, a need to be sure that we fully understand the broader socioeconomic and environmental implications of alternative control methods. The joint study will also assist in providing the future basis for developing the most satisfactory mix of control strategies. That is why we are establishing the joint task force.

Members of the House I hope are aware of the government's efforts to develop an effective air quality agreement with the United States. Action within Canada against the largest single emitter of sulphur dioxide will have important results. I will strengthen Canada's case and encourage my counterparts in the United States in their attempts to develop control policies aimed at reducing acid causing pollutants. Reductions in emissions from the Sudbury region will also benefit areas within Canada downwind from Sudbury which are particularly susceptible to acid rain.

I would like to elaborate briefly on those two points. With regard to the first, as hon. members know I met with environmental protection agency administrator Costle and Secretary of the Interior Cecil Andrus on April 18 in Washington. I expressed Canadian concerns for the proposed coal conversion program which could result in increased sulphur dioxide emissions. I also made it clear that Canada remains committed to drastic reductions in Canadian source emissions and would continue to look for a similar commitment from the United States. It was clear from that meeting that in order to secure a similar reduction from the U.S., we will need to move forward on the control of domestic emissions, as the province of Ontario is doing today.

● (1530)

With regard to the second point, the best available simulation techniques show that Inco emissions alone account for approximately 30 per cent of the sulphur deposition in Ontario. About 25 per cent of the sulphur deposited in the Ottawa area originates from the Inco operations at Sudbury. With respect to the Muskokas, which are particularly susceptible to damage from acid rain, approximately 40 per cent of the sulphur deposition originates from this source.

While I acknowledge that these simulated projections may not precisely reflect real life levels, their approximate relative magnitudes certainly point to significant benefits for the Canadian environment as a result of reductions.

I know hon. members are interested in our progress towards the bilateral agreement on transboundary air quality that the United States and Canada have committed themselves to developing. We are currently reviewing a U.S. proposal calling for the establishment of bilateral working groups to develop the basis of the agreement. This approach was successfully employed in negotiating the Canada-U.S. agreement on Great Lakes water quality. Given the length of time the development of an agreement might require, we are also seeking interim commitments to emission reductions pending completion of the formal agreement. The objective of the interim reductions commitment would be to preclude lenient interpretation of existing legislation which would allow for emission increases, apply existing legislation to effect further reductions from current levels, and identify the need for new legislation required for a long-term control strategy program.

Canadian moves to address the problems of acid rain sources in our own country will, I believe, considerably increase the chance for success in the negotiations we have now entered into with the United States.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, like other hon. members, I listened with great interest to the minister's statement. It is, I think, the first such statement on motions the minister has made in the House in his capacity as Minister of the Environment. Given that fact and given the forum in which he has chosen to make his statement, I was expecting something important, something major, especially in view of the importance of the subject matter. However, what we have been treated to is little more than an announcement by the federal minister that his colleague, the minister of the environment for Ontario, is making a statement elsewhere this afternoon.

I nevertheless welcome the statement of the federal minister and I especially welcome the announcement about acid rain that the Ontario minister is making in Toronto. But I am concerned on a number of counts. Coming from Prince Edward Island and the Atlantic region, I am not an uncharitable person, nor am I unkind. Yet, the temptation is almost irresistible to accuse the minister of attempting to coat-tail on initiatives being taken by Ontario. Indeed, there is the urge to accuse the minister of trying to scoop his colleague in the province of Ontario or even of seeking to share in some reflected glory from what measures have been adopted by the Ontario government.

The statement I am asked to respond to is essentially that of the province of Ontario, not of the federal government. As the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has suggested, it took a great deal of courage for Ontario and the environment minister in particular to make the kind of statement being given this afternoon in Toronto. It took leadership. My regret is that that same kind of leadership is not being provided by his colleague at the federal level.

My party is enormously concerned about the problem of acid rain. We are concerned about the pollution emissions from Inco and we certainly welcome whatever initiatives come from either the Ontario government or the federal government.

The previous minister of the environment, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), once described the problem of acid rain as the most serious environmental problem ever to have been faced by Canada. I agree with that sentiment. Acid rain is killing our lakes, threatening our fish stocks, and devastating our forests, our wildlife and our land. The implications are profound. They are especially profound when one considers that something like three-quarters of our country's exports are related in some way, either directly or indirectly, to our natural resources, in their raw or finished state.

I remind the minister, therefore, that this is not just an Ontario problem, however important acid rain pollution may be in that province. It is a Canada-wide problem. I hope that, as the minister proceeds with his negotiations with Ontario and the United States, he will keep that fact in mind.

For example, in my own region, the Atlantic provinces, acid rain has badly hurt the salmon stocks. The ban on sport fishing of salmon is directly related to the problem of acid rain. It is thus a little worrisome that the federal government has seen fit to take the lead from Ontario. It is counting on Ontario to provide the leadership that is so badly needed. But acid rain is a trans-Canada problem and an international problem. For that reason the federal government has legitimate constitutional authority in this area and also a responsibility to provide the national leadership so badly lacking.

I want to direct my remarks now specifically to what the minister has read to us. In some places the statement is gloriously ambiguous. I welcome the suggestion that there will be an Ontario-Canada task force. I suspect, however, that it is not a terribly new measure. Negotiations have been going on between the federal government and Ontario for some time.

Presumably these consultations have also involved to some extent formal channels, machinery and procedures.

Thus I question whether such a task force is anything especially innovative, however welcome it might be. It also begs the questions, for example, of who will head it, who will comprise it, what will be its specific terms of reference, to whom will it report. I hope the minister will be forthcoming with information along those lines.

The minister has stated his priority to reach a fairly early agreement with the United States on the control of acid rain on both sides of the border. I welcome that priority. He suggested in his statement that the United States has proposed a number of consultative groups and a bilateral arrangement by which the two governments will consult, will keep one another informed, and will exchange views, leading it is hoped to an agreement of the sort I just described. My reservation is that the minister may be so preoccupied with the machinery, the formality and the procedure involved that time will be lost in actually getting the agreement accomplished that we desperately need. The minister has implied that that particular U.S. proposal will be reviewed carefully by him. I hope he will do just that.

The bilateral agreement between the United States and Canada is what we all want. There is some danger, though, that while we proceed to the agreement, time will be lost in preventing acid rain pollution from increasing.

I hope the minister will honour his commitment to seek some interim measures designed not only to prevent acid rain pollution from increasing, but also to reverse it. In that connection, I suggest that Canada must negotiate from a position of strength and that the strongest part of our foundation in negotiations with the United States must be a solid data base on acid rain pollution.

● (1540)

We require information of various kinds. For example, we need to know more about the different sources of acid rain, about how fast damage from acid rain occurs, and about the extent to which acid rain pollution is irreversible. In that connection, I would remind the minister that the former minister, who was so concerned about the problem, was able to secure from his colleagues in cabinet an agreement in principle on a substantial increase in funding for acid rain research. This priority was conveyed to the head of the U.S. environmental protection agency in January, 1980. Such a commitment was very important because it showed the strength of Canada's resolve to deal with acid rain pollution within its own borders.

The other day in the House, last Tuesday I believe it was, I addressed a question to the Minister of the Environment asking him in clear terms whether his government recognized acid rain research as a high priority and whether it planned to honour the commitment made by the previous government to increase funding for research in that crucial area. Mr. Speaker, I did not get an answer, nor have we been able to get much other information from the minister with regard to this serious problem, one which calls for a great deal of federal leadership. I hope that in future a lot more information and leadership will be forthcoming than we have seen to date at the national level.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I was not aware that when ministers in the Ontario legislature make statements of intent with regard to legislation and regulation they have some way of seeing that the matter is brought to the attention of the House of Commons. I think that is wonderful; I wish it could be done in every instance.

I was reading with interest a copy of the statement the minister made and I must say it would have been very helpful if the control order had been in our hands so that we could determine exactly what the minister of the environment in Ontario means to do and the measures through which he intends to enforce the new regulations he proposes to put in place. As I read the statement, it says the new order is intended primarily to ensure that there is no increase in sulphur dioxide emissions from Inco or Sudbury. I must confess that in my view a commitment not to increase the sulphur dioxide emissions is hardly a commitment at all.

The statement goes on to say that most of the province of Ontario, at least the southern part, is suffering considerably as a result of the acid rain which results from the emissions in Sudbury and it points out that these emissions account for approximately 30 per cent of all the emissions in Ontario and for 25 per cent of the sulphur deposited in the Ottawa area.

With this in mind, to say that the new control order is designed to guarantee that pollution will not be increased hardly speaks to the problem at all. I am sure there are people in the Ontario legislature who might well be bringing to the minister's attention that he ought to be putting forward a much more forceful provision which would guarantee that this part of Ontario will no longer suffer at the hands of International Nickel, a company which, incidentally, has the wherewithal in its corporate structure to take whatever steps are necessary, at whatever financial cost, to eliminate, at least to all intents and purposes sulphur dioxide emissions.

Another part of the minister's statement which I found interesting had to do with the intent of the order, which was to ensure that reductions reflect present development in production processes. I see the minister's brows are being furrowed. He will read in the second paragraph that it is the intent of the new order that reductions reflecting present developments in the production process be implemented in two years. That, of course, when taken together with the original statement that no increase shall occur, leads one to believe we can hardly expect very much by way of a reduction in the output of emissions by International Nickel.

As far as the joint agreement is concerned, I want to say two things. First, to what extent is the Government of Canada prepared to provide money to clean up the mess which already has been created throughout most of southern and southeastern Ontario? Obviously, money will be needed. To what extent will the Government of Canada be prepared to put money into the cleaning of the lakes which have suffered such damage as a result of acid rain? I hope the minister will address himself to that question.

In addition, the minister referred in his statement to the reciprocal reductions by the United States and the need to achieve an understanding between Canada and the United States with regard to further reductions. I suggest to the minister that when he attends this meeting and talks about the reduction in the amount of acid rain which falls on the province of Ontario and, indeed, on other parts of Canada, he also raises one point which is of considerable concern to people in the Niagara area. We seem to experience a lot of difficulty getting the government of the United States and the companies under its jurisdiction to understand that we cannot afford to have them dumping their garbage into the Niagara River. It matters not whether it is acid rain or whether it is effluent from manufacturing processes; the fact is, on the surface at least, there is long-term damage suffered by the Niagara River and also to the area of Lake Ontario where the river enters the lake, as a result of a lack of enforcible regulation and the absence of an enforcible reciprocal agreement between Canada and the United States.

I suggest to the minister that as he talks about the further negotiation of the bilateral working agreement and about the bilateral working groups which are being set up, he keeps in mind that in any discussion about the effects on either country of pollution emanating from either jurisdiction, what is happening to the Niagara River, its effect on people who live downstream in the Buffalo and Niagara area and the effect of pollution spilling into Lake Ontario be one of his primary concerns. Just as acid rain is detrimentally affecting life in our lakes, so there is no question that a lack of adequate regulation is detrimentally affecting the Niagara River and the portion of Lake Ontario which is affected by the spill-out.

I hope that whatever negotiations are undertaken will be undertaken with this in mind, and that whatever the detrimental effect has been—and it will likely be long term in terms of acid rain fall-out in southern Ontario and in the Muskoka area—there be a commitment by both the federal government and the government of Ontario to do whatever is required in order to reclaim those lakes and the surrounding foliage. We must do everything possible to restore them to full use for recreational purposes because they afford by far the finest recreation potential which Ontario has to offer; they are certainly in the forefront of Canadian recreational potential as far as the possibility of their use by families in the immediate metropolitan areas of southern Ontario is concerned.

As I said earlier, I really would have liked to see the control order. The reference made to it does not give me a lot of confidence. I have dealt with Harry Parrott before. I do not know whether the minister has. If the minister has dealt with Harry Parrott, the minister of the environment of Ontario, he will understand that at times his word is perhaps questionable.

I can distinctly recall statements made by the minister with regard to sanitary land fill and with regard to the disposal of liquid industrial waste and many other areas of environmental concern. Just not many weeks ago there was a statement about the closing of a sanitary land fill site and an industrial waste site in the area I represent. Just yesterday he announced that it is going to open again, and I really do think we need to adopt a measure with more teeth in it. Perhaps a minister with more teeth would be helpful. I am not talking about our minister here in this House, but I would suggest to him that he require of the provincial minister a clear indication not only of what his hopes are—because I think we probably all share his hopes—but also how he intends to implement measures to protect the environment in Ontario and how he intends to stand up to industry that undoubtedly will tell him that the costs are far too great and it will have to shut down.

That is the inevitable result of everything that is said when it comes time to sit down and negotiate the industry's financial involvement in the protection of the environment. Inevitably the response is that they can find the sources necessary for their ongoing manufacturing processes in other parts of the world. International Nickel has effectively done that in the last few years, has moved its operations substantially and reduced the emphasis that Sudbury once had in the world community for the production of nickel.

International Nickel Company will, I am sure, over the course of time, plead poverty and be prepared to run some serious risks with that community and its economy in an effort not to live up to its responsibilities. That has been the pattern; that has been the history. I think that to whatever extent this government has power in the field—and there is some question as to how much power one can exercise—legislative power or other power, it should be exercised to the fullest extent in order to extract from International Nickel the cost of cleaning up that which International Nickel itself created.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister would entertain a question about his statement. I acknowledge the contribution of the federal government in connection with the case that Ontario made against Inco as far as levels of acid rain pollution are concerned and, in particular, the studies made available to the government of Ontario by the federal minister and his department which made the Ontario case pretty formidable. But the clear impression from newspaper reports, in any event, is that the studies to which the federal government had access, and which it in turn made available to Ontario, were very much fortuitous. The federal government practically stumbled upon certain information, certain leads, and certain "deep throat" connections, as the newspaper reports described them.

Would the minister indicate whether, in his view, his department now has the research capacity it requires to proceed with all due dispatch, for example, in its negotiations with the United States, or does he think there is a case to be made for a substantial increase in federal funding for acid rain research?

If so, is the minister preparing to put before cabinet specific proposals toward that end, and when might we expect an announcement in that regard?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I think I will reply briefly to the hon. member in two ways. Yes, I think we do have a very good capacity within the department, but it is also useful for us from time to time to hire outside consultants who can bring in specific expertise and knowledge which may not be readily available.

The second point I would like to make to the hon. member in response to the direct question in his statement today is that it is true that the previous government made commitments in principle. I think the hon. member will find that the funding of acid rain research by this government will exceed the commitments which were contemplated by the previous government.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my successor in the Department of the Environment for the interest he has been taking not only in his department but also in this very vital matter. I know that he and I are in absolute agreement that it is going to require the co-operation of all Canadians in order to solve it.

I would like to ask a couple of specific questions. In January two working groups were established. One was a strategy group chaired by a representative from the province of Quebec. The other was a technical and scientific group chaired by a representative of the province of Ontario. Then there was an over-all steering committee chaired by myself as federal minister of the environment, as I then was, the minister of the environment from Quebec, the minister of the environment of Ontario and a minister representing the maritime provinces.

Is that basic structure continuing and, if so, where does the federal-Ontario task force with respect to Inco itself fit into that structure? I wonder if the minister might help the House understand just how the structure is proceeding and whether it has been maintained.

While I am on my feet I would like to put another question to the minister. It is interesting that the discussion today has involved only one company. As the minister well knows, while Inco is a significant producer of sulphur emissions, it is not, by any stretch of the imagination, the only producer of sulphur emissions in Canada. In addition to that, as the minister knows, the acid rain problem involves more than just sulphur. In fact, there is evidence which certainly was available to me—and I am sure that the new minister has been made aware of it—that nitrogen emissions are becoming an increasingly large part of the acidic precipitation problem.

I noticed that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) confined his remarks only to sulphur, whereas in fact in Canada, as in the United States, the nitrogen oxide problem is now contributing very significantly, we think, to the over-all acidic precipitation problem.

I wonder if the minister could direct the first part of his answer to the question of the structure of this task force and how it fits in, and the second part of his answer to the question about other sources of emission. Particularly, what can we do about the increasing problem of nitrogen, which is something we cannot just blame all on Inco?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I welcome the question; I hope I will be able to respond to all its parts. It gives me a chance, which I did not have when the hon. member was attacking me yesterday, to pay tribute to his work as minister in the environment portfolio. Much of what I am now doing is a continuation of the efforts which he has already made. I know that he and I share a very strong concern about these problems, and from time to time I will be seeking his counsel as well as his questions in the House.

I will try to respond to his specific questions. The structure has not been changed. He described it accurately, and we will be continuing with that structure. The committee which has been described, however, will be a special committee between Ontario and Canada. I am sure that the information which is produced will filter through the system, but technically speaking it will be a separate committee.

We have mentioned today specifically Inco, although there was a reference in my remarks to the Falconbridge situation, and we will be considering in the committee other sources of emissions. The hon. member is quite right—and I am dealing, I think, with his fourth point—that we are extremely concerned not simply about sulphur dioxide but also about nitrogen emissions. That is a particular concern in relation to thermal plants as sources of pollution. We are aware of that problem; we are concerned about it. The order that the hon. Harry Parrott has issued today does deal with sulphur dioxide emissions. However, the hon. member is quite right in suggesting that nitrogen oxides are equally a serious problem, and it is one to which we will be paying a great deal of attention.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) concerning the task force. I assume that the objective of the task force is to make recommendations to reduce or ultimately to eliminate the problem of acid rain. I was wondering if it is within the scope of the task force to look at methods of reducing the potential of the fuel that goes into the production, say, of energy or into the refining processes such as those Inco use to remove the sulphur dioxide from the product before it is used. I think the example used was coal scrubbing whereby the byproduct is used for fertilizer, and also it removes the sulphur dioxide from the coal before being used in the plant. I was wondering whether these preventative measures are within the scope of the task force.

● (1600)

Mr. Roberts: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, but I was distracted for a moment in the middle of the question; I am not sure that I understood its full purport.

The scope of the task force is to examine both the capacity to use practicably the present techniques which are available or new ones which may be refined. Also it will deal with a variety of larger issues. It extends quite widely. If I properly understood the scope of the hon. member's question, I believe those matters which he described would fall within its consideration.

Perhaps I could check Hansard to see if I misled the member. I am not trying to do so deliberately, but I am not quite sure I caught all of the aspects of the question he presented to me.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I should like to put that in the way of a supplementary question. Basically I was asking if it was within the scope of the task force to look at preventative means rather than emission control.

Mr. Roberts: Preventative means of what? We are looking at the prevention of the levels of emission which are now taking place. That is why I am not sure I understand exactly the distinction the hon. member is making between preventative means and emission control.

Mr. Anguish: The question I should like to ask of the Minister of the Environment is if he is aware that there is a process now for scrubbing coal which removes the potential harm of sulphur dioxide being given off and as a byproduct produces fertilizer? If he is aware of that, will it be within the scope of the task force to study such processes?

Mr. Roberts: Yes, I am aware of that. I am not sure whether the hon. member is referring to thermal generation or specifically to the Inco situation.

Mr. Anguish: I am referring to the problem of acid rain.

Mr. Roberts: If the hon. member is referring to acid rain, yes, we are aware of those problems. As I understand it, there are at least two techniques which appear to be practicable in relation to the Inco situation. But I think the problem he is raising in relation to washed coal, for instance, is something which is more directly related to the oil and gas conversion plans which President Carter has presented to Congress. We are looking at all ranges of possible techniques, but there are two pre-eminently which are under consideration in relation to Inco.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, several days ago, as reported in The Globe and Mail, the minister of the environment for Ontario, Mr. Parrott, was quoted as saying that while he welcomed the interest of the federal government on the question of acid rain, and particularly the problems in Sudbury as a result of the Inco operation, he made it quite clear that the decisions as to what would be done and when would be made by his government and not by the federal government.

I should like to ask the minister two questions. First, what authority will this joint task force have; and second, is the minister aware of the fact—and I do not have the report here—that in that report the Ontario minister of the environment set back by several years the date at which Inco would be required to really clean up the pollution it is creating? Has he agreed to a further delay on the part of Inco to getting rid of the pollution it is creating?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I will reply in a twofold way. The present legislative base for action is in the hands of the province of Ontario. It is quite true, as the hon. Mr. Parrott has described, that the control order is within his authority and that it is his decision as to the issuance of that control order. Our participation at the federal level has been in the studies and the research which we believe have been very helpful to the government of Ontario in deciding to move at this point.

Our continuing role will be in studies with the province of Ontario to try to ensure that we have a sufficiently large knowledge base to be accurate as to what kind of control is possible and at what pace it should be brought forward.

The control order Mr. Parrott issued today caps the Inco emissions at the present level, which is far below the permissible levels of emission, with a provision for further lowering those levels of emission within the next two years. The third phase is the one to which our studies will be particularly directed.

I hope the hon. member understands that the order is within the legislative base of the province of Ontario, but that the province of Ontario and the Government of Canada have been working closely in a co-operative way to try to ensure that the steps taken by Mr. Parrott are taken as promptly and as efficaciously as possible.

Mr. Orlikow: If I understood the minister correctly, he said that the amount of emission now from the operations of Inco is less than the limit, but I think the minister will agree that they are far too high. Unless they are pressed to get on with the job of moving closer to the time when there will be virtually no pollution, I do not know how the minister can go down to the United States and put any real pressure on the United States to get their polluters to take the kind of action which is required, because just as our pollution moves over their land, their pollution moves over our land. Unless we can show that we are really putting the pressure on corporations polluting water, air and land, I do not know how we can expect the United States to do better than it has done, and they have not done very well up to now.

Mr. Roberts: Perhaps I have not communicated sufficiently the point I was making. The capping at the present stage is followed by a subsequent and rather immediate stage which involves a considerable reduction in the levels. As I have said publicly, my very strong belief from the information we have is that within four or five years the emission can be reduced by 50 per cent to 60 per cent. I can assure the hon. member, as a result of the conversations I have had with United States officials, that the steps we have taken with Inco will not only be welcome but I think will lead to considerable pressure for a more responsive action on their part, not only in relation to possible future problems with the oil conversion program, but also in dealing with the present problem of what we consider to be too high emission levels in the present American polluting situation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have two brief questions on the subject of the announcement today. I should like to preface them by saying that I think the House should give some recognition to the former hon. member for Nickel Belt who, as the House will be aware, campaigned long and hard to see a reduction in the level of acid rain which is taking place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): He is no longer in this House, but I am sure his influence is being felt in this matter. I would ask the minister, if I might catch his attention for a moment, first: in view of the fact that it has been Inco itself which has given rise to the problems which resulted in this task force being formed, will he assure the House that indeed it will be Inco that pays the cost of this task force and not the taxpayers of Canada?

Second, I would ask whether the terms of reference of the task force will be broad enough to encompass a study of the effects of the sulphur dioxide emissions on the workers in the Inco mine and on the people of the community of Sudbury?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understand exactly the relevance of the second part of the question. What we are dealing with here is the long-range airborne transportation of pollutant particles, whereas I understood the second part of the hon. member's question to be relating this problem to the condition of the workers in the mines. The impact of acid rain is not immediately in the area where it is generated but may fall 300 or 400 miles from the source point. So it does not seem to me, on the face of it, that the question he raised, which may be a very important one, would naturally fall within the purview of the committee. The financing of the work, which will essentially involve existing civil servants on the staffs of the two governments of Ontario and Canada, would be met in the normal way.

● (1610)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my first question to the minister is in relation to a statement that I believe was made last week regarding emissions. The minister referred to 40 per cent to 50 per cent reduction. I wonder whether he could clarify if that was in relation to the orders which, I believe, allowed emissions of 3,600 tonnes per day, particularly in view of the relative decline in production by Inco, certainly in recent months, which has brought that down, I believe, to 2,200 tonnes per day? Would the minister comment first on the release he made, indicating whether the 40 per cent to 50 per cent reduction was on the 3,600 tonnes or the 2,200 tonnes, which is the present rate of production?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I hope I am accurate in saying that the figures I used were that within four or five years there could be a reduction of 50 per cent to 60 per cent on 1.1 million tonnes generated each year. I do not have a calculator with me to make the calculation, but my belief is, on the basis of the information which I have received, that a 50 per cent to 60 per cent reduction on that figure could be—

Mr. Fulton: On the generated quantity?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman says "on the generated quantity". Yes, a 50 per cent to 60 per cent reduction on the generated quantity could take place over the next four to five years.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, having regard to the cost to the environment, I wonder whether the minister could comment regarding particularly those lakes that we already know are dead. Could he also comment on the relative costs? Could he give us a ball park figure on the cost to the environment to date of the pollution from Inco within Canada? I recognize there is some from outside our boundaries.

Would he also state whether in his view it is the responsibility of Inco that these lakes be revitalized, and should it be required that at some point in the future the various types of vegetation and animals whose health has been affected will have to be revitalized to bring them back as closely as possible to their original condition? Could he indicate whether in his view at this point such cost would be the responsibility of Inco, or within federal or provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Roberts: On the first point, Madam Speaker, it is very difficult, with the state of knowledge that we have now, to link specific consequences with specific causes. It is very difficult to make that linkage. It is also difficult to estimate the over-all cost of acid rain to the environment. We know it is very, very considerable. It is easier to assess the impact in relation to lakes, and less easy at the moment to assess in relation to forestry, but we are talking of consequences in the hundreds of millions of dollars. It is difficult to trace back specific consequences in an area to specific source points. Perhaps it would be helpful to say that the Inco emission is not well over but slightly over 50 per cent of emissions in Ontario and about one quarter of emissions in the eastern part of Canada. So clearly Inco emissions represent a considerably important factor in those deleterious consequences, even though we are not able to bring exact consequences back to exact sources.

I think the second question the hon. gentleman posed, if I understood him properly, was whether Inco was able to afford to undertake these measures on its own. If that is the question, my response would be that I believe that Inco can well afford to take the steps which would be imposed to bring emissions down to 50 per cent or 60 per cent within the period I described.

Madam Speaker: When I recognize another hon. member for the purpose of asking a question we will have spent about an hour on this particular statement. I will recognize another member now, but I will ask the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), who has had a chance to make an important statement and ask a few questions, if he will voluntarily defer his questions today and pose them at another time. I recognize the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, since acid rain is a particular problem in northern Ontario where we have granite rock and, consequently, the water is not buffered, and where we have an inflow of pollutants from the United States mid-west and the whole industrial complex there, I should like to direct some questions to the minister.

I am aware that a certain amount of research has been going on at the Great Lakes Forest Research Laboratories at Sault Ste. Marie in northern Ontario, but I am wondering whether there is a commitment to additional funding for more research, especially in those parts of northern Ontario where we do not have the large bodies of water such as the Great Lakes to buffer the effects of these pollutants. Is there a commitment to more man-years and dollars for research to overcome the difficulties associated with the acid rain problem?

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Madam Speaker. As I tried to make clear in reply to earlier questions, considerably increased efforts in this regard were made, as a matter of principle, by the previous government. The funding for these commitments was never confirmed. It is our intent to increase the funding in relation to acid rain research beyond the figure which had been projected by the previous government. I cannot be specific on the exact details, at least at this moment, as to how much of that research will take place in various parts of the country, but I will certainly search for that information and provide it to the hon. member.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR SUBSTANTIAL INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SENIOR CITIZENS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a petition signed by nearly 5,000 persons, mostly from Saskatchewan but also Alberta and British Columbia. The petition was produced and distributed by the Saskatchewan Senior Citizens Action Now Association, a few members of that association being with us in Ottawa today.

The petition earnestly requests a substantial increase in the amount of pensions paid to our senior citizens; it asks for consideration of ways and means to facilitate older people continuing to live in their own homes; and it makes other suggestions to enhance the dignity of our older people.

I am happy to present the petition on behalf of the nearly 5,000 persons who signed it.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 206, 252, 310, 311, 312 and 314.

Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REGULAR FORCES—INFANTRY STRENGTH

Question No. 206—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each year on January 1, 1967 to 1979, what was the infantry strength of the regular forces?

2. What is the projected infantry strength for January 1 (a) 1980 (b) 1981 (c) 1982?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence):

1. Infantry Strength on January 1

Year	Total
1967	9,112
1968	8,907
1969	8,558
1970	8,097
1971	8,185
1972	8,050
1973	7,930
1974	8,205
1975	7,973
1976	8,014	* Note 1
1977	7,651	"
1978	7,649	"
1979	7,614	"

2. (a) (b) and (c)

It is expected that current strength will be maintained.

* Note 1

The reduction of strength from 1976 to 1977 and up to the present is due to a change of accounting in that infantry recruits who had been on regimental strength—accounted for as infantry men—were transferred to a basic training list.

CHARTERED BANKS—ESCALATION OF PENSIONS

Question No. 252—Mr. Herbert:

Did the Minister of Finance or the Inspector General of Banks acting for the minister, have any discussions with the chartered banks since May 22, 1979, concerning the annual escalation of pensions to retired employees or the period of vesting for existing employees?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): It is not government policy to suggest or impose conditions on private pension plans beyond those contained in the Pension Benefits Standards Act. However, the inspector general of banks in the conduct of his duties regularly discusses with the banks the conditions of their pension plans. I am advised that the chartered banks are continuing to pursue previously reported practices of making supplementary payments to their older pensioners, with increases in the cost of living being the primary factor in the determination of the amount of the supplement.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—NATIONAL DEFENCE

Question No. 310—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years was any Defence Construction (1951) Limited work carried out for any department or agency other than the Department of National Defence and, if so, what was the dollar value and by whom was the work authorized?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): There was no work carried out by Defence Construction (1951) Limited for any department or agency other than the Department of National Defence during the past five years.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—TENDER CLOSINGS

Question No. 311—Mr. Herbert:

1. Of the 680 head office tender closings of Defence Construction (1951) Limited in the fiscal year 1978-79, how many had a response of (a) one (b) two tenders?

2. What was the total value of tender closings where only one tender was received?

3. For how many tender closings where only two tenders were received was the differential between the two tenders (a) more than 20 per cent of the low tender (b) more than $50,000?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence):

1. (a) 53
   (b) 105
2. $5,339,336.16
3. (a) 38
   (b) 10

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED—CONTRACTS FOR RENOVATIONS

Question No. 312—Mr. Herbert:

For the fiscal year 1978-79, what was the total value of contracts for repairs and maintenance (renovations) awarded by Defence Construction (1951) Limited?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Value of repairs and maintenance—renovations—for 1978/79 was: $40,286,430.

AGRICULTURE—PUBLICATION

Question No. 314—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Department of Agriculture issue a publication, Monograph No. 25 entitled "A revision of the Gymnusini and Deinopsini of the world; Coleoptera: Staphylinidae, Aleocharinae"?

2. Was the publication issued in the English language only and, if so, on what date and for what reason was a French language version not made available at the same time?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes.

2. Yes, on October 15. It was published only in English because the complexity of the highly scientific subject matter makes translation almost impossible. The text is so technical that a scientist with the competence to translate the publication is not available to prepare a French language version. For this reason, certain highly technical scientific papers of limited interest—such as Monograph No. 25—are normally published in the language of the author.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

INDUSTRY

LAY-OFFS IN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move that adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the immediate crisis reflected in the automotive industry in Canada with over 25,000 Canadian workers laid off; the further announcement yesterday of additional lay-offs by General Motors of Canada; the cancellation by Chrysler today of its planned building of a new V-6 engine plant; the impasse in the negotiations with Chrysler Canada regarding future plans; and the failure of the Government of Canada to seek formal renegotiation of the automotive agreement with the United States to ensure that Canada obtains its fair share of investment, jobs and research and development.

Madam Speaker: Standing Order 26 provides for emergency debate and allows a member who feels that a matter is urgent to ask the Speaker for leave to set aside all other business before the House so that the House can proceed to debate the urgent matter. However, there are severe and strict limitations placed on this right, and they are set out in Standing Order 26, which I would like to read in part to the House. Section (5) of Standing Order 26 reads in part:

> In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, the Speaker shall have regard ... to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

Section (16)(a) of the Standing Order states:

> The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration;

Can the matter raised by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) be brought before the House within reasonable time by other means? That is the question which I must answer.

It would seem to me that, not only can this matter be brought before the House, but that it already has been before, namely, during the oral question period today. The many problems facing the automotive industry have been discussed during the address debate by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, the member who is now requesting leave to move a motion under Standing Order 26. May I remind hon. members that there are still two days remaining in the address debate and that there are 18 allotted days provided for under the special order adopted by the House on April 29.

Moreover, the estimates of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) have been referred to a standing committee and these estimates will be before the committee until November. Thus, I feel there is ample opportunity for the hon. member to raise the matter in other ways. On these grounds alone, I feel that the hon. member should not be allowed to proceed.

However, there is the further point that a request for leave to proceed under Standing Order 26 must relate to a genuine emergency. On June 26, 1978, Mr. Speaker Jerome, in ruling that an hon. member could not proceed under Standing Order 26, stated that matters raised under the Standing Order must not be of a continuing nature. In this present session alone this matter has been raised many times and, in my view, it will probably be raised again.

Thus, I must rule that the matter is not a proper one for consideration as an emergency debate under Standing Order 26.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, in proceeding this afternoon with second reading of Bill C-6, this Parliament continues the decennial revision of the Bank Act which is well beyond its original scheduled completion date of July 1, 1977. Since then Parliament has been required three times to extend the power of the banks to carry on business, the most recent extension being to April 1, 1980, with an automatic extension of 60 sitting days in this session. The bill now before us to revise the banking legislation of this country is an important one. It is comprehensive and will modernize the legislative and regulatory framework of Canadian banking and also establish a new payments association for managing and developing our payments system. At this stage, Mr. Speaker, there is little need for me to emphasize how urgent it is that this bill be considered and passed into law as soon as possible. The current revision of the Bank Act began in September, 1974, when the then minister of finance requested briefs from interested parties. These helped form the basis for the white paper on the revision of Canadian banking legislation which was issued in August, 1976. The Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce received briefs and held hearings on the white paper. Its report of June, 1977, together with other public comments and suggestions, influenced the final form of Bill C-57, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, which was introduced but not passed in the third session of the Thirtieth Parliament.

This bill was reintroduced as Bill C-15 and received first reading on November 2, 1978; the subject matter of the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and also underwent review by the Senate banking committee. The committees received numerous briefs and direct representations from interested parties, and presented their reports to Parliament immediately prior to its dissolution in the spring of 1979. Both committees were in substantial support of the policy thrust and proposals in Bill C-15. Nevertheless, they did recommend many changes to the bill.

During the administration of the previous government senior officials studied the reports of both committees and agreed that many of their recommendations would improve the bill.

All the substantive changes to Bill C-15 were in response to those recommendations. Approximately 40 of the recommended changes have been adopted in their entirety and more than ten others were incorporated with some modification. I have adopted the modified bill but have also found it necessary to make a number of technical corrections and changes. Details of the major changes have been set out in tabular form in the news release and summary which the previous minister of finance made available to the House.

At this point I would like to acknowledge the tremendous contribution made by the committees of the Senate and the House in the development of the proposals contained in the present bill. The extensive hearings by both committees allowed interested parties to be heard and their views carefully considered. I should also like to acknowledge the most recent review of Bill C-14 by the Senate committee.

This is an extremely long, complex bill, Mr. Speaker. It lays down the framework or ground rules for the establishment, operation and supervision of the chartered banks, the Quebec Savings Bank and the Montreal City and District Savings Bank. Provision is also made, for the first time, for the establishment of foreign-controlled banking subsidiaries in this country. In providing for the creation of a new Canadian Payments Association, it will also allow the full participation of the near banks—credit unions, caisses populaires and trust and loan companies—as well as the chartered banks, in the organization, administration and development of the Canadian payments system.

Over all, the main purpose of the bill is to strengthen and develop the Canadian financial system through the promotion of effective and equitable competition. This is true of the proposals relating to the Canadian Payments Association, easier entry into banking, chartering of foreign bank subsidiaries, authority for banks to lease and factor, the reduction in banks' reserve requirements, and the broadening of the geographical operations and business powers under the Quebec Savings Banks Act. The third part of the legislation deals with amendments to the Bank of Canada Act. The fourth part is about the establishment of the Canadian Payments Association Act. The fifth and final part concerns related and consequential amendments to other legislation.

What about the Bank Act? The main part of the present revision is of course the Bank Act itself. The chartered banks, serving the public from over 7,450 branches, with total Canadian dollar assets at the end of 1979 in excess of $147 billion and foreign currency assets, based on their domestic and international business, of about $82 billion, are central in Canada's financial system. In a very real way they tie the country together by providing their services on a national basis and bringing similar banking services at similar costs to almost all Canadians. In addition to making provisions designed to implement new policies in areas such as entry into banking, foreign banks and the business powers of banks, the structure of the Bank Act has been redesigned in order to ensure that its provisions, where appropriate, are consistent with the principles and provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Among the banks themselves, the concentration of business in the hands of the five largest banks has been diminishing gradually and, since 1964, four new banks have been successfully established. Nonetheless, a continuing concern has been felt about the share of market of the five largest banks and the small number of banks. Consequently, the government has continued to seek ways to ease access to banking and thus to increase the number of alternatives available to Canadians. The proposals regarding entry into the banking business should make the establishment of a new Canadian bank a somewhat less difficult and uncertain undertaking while continuing to ensure that only soundly conceived enterprises are launched. These proposals include, first, the incorporation of banks by letters patent as an alternative to a special act of Parliament. Second, incorporation provisions to facilitate the conversion of an existing financial institution to a chartered bank. Third, the permission for provincial governments to hold and vote up to 25 per cent of the shares of a new bank—with provisions for reducing provincial ownership to 10 per cent over ten years. Fourth, an explicit indication in the act that Canadian financial institutions other than trust companies or deposit-taking institutions would be authorized to own and vote up to 25 per cent of the voting shares of a new bank, and higher percentages as may be approved by governor in council, for a period of ten years, after which the 10-per-cent rule would apply. Fifth, provision for foreign banks to establish banking subsidiaries in Canada.

I have also agreed with a proposal to remove the requirement in Bill C-15 that co-operative credit corporations as a group be disallowed from holding more than 25 per cent of the voting shares of a bank. Following closely the recommendations of the parliamentary committees, it is being proposed to associate all locals, centrals or regionals, and federations where they are linked by membership and operate within a single province. Each associate group will be able to acquire up to 10 per cent of the voting shares of a bank. Any existing holdings of up to 25 per cent would be "grandfathered."

With regard to the incorporation of new banks, whether they be Canadian-owned or foreign bank subsidiaries, the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has recommended in its reports a system of public review of applications for letters patent of incorporation. The Senate committee concluded that a parliamentary form of review is inappropriate and that the public review should be conducted by the Inspector General of Banks. The inspector would be authorized to conduct such a review for all new banks, with the power to make appropriate recommendations to the minister to grant or refuse such applications.

I have considered the Senate committee's recommendation most carefully but have decided not to accept it for the following reasons. The letters patent approach has been added to the special act approach to facilitate the incorporation of new banks and I do not want to introduce measures which could conceivably frustrate this objective. Such procedures might also hinder our reciprocity negotiations and the access of Canadian banks to other countries.

In addition, adequate safeguards have, I think, been built into the legislation. First, an intention by a potential applicant to apply for letters patent along with the proposed content of such letters patent would have to be published in The Canada Gazette and a Canadian newspaper once each week for a period of four consecutive weeks, thereby giving the Canadian public the opportunity to make representation on a potential application. I shall welcome such representations and give them careful consideration. Second, the assessment of the application and the applicants by the Inspector General of Banks would be no less rigorous than the current assessment by Parliament. Banking standards would not be lowered. Third, the Minister of Finance would be given the authoriy to issue letters patent at his sole discretion once approval was granted by governor in council, thereby avoiding the complicated administrative function with inherent delays. For those applicants who were unsuccessful in getting incorporation by letters patent, there would be the possibility of seeking incorporation by special act.

One of the most important provisions in this bill would allow foreign banks to establish banking subsidiaries in Canada. Foreign banks have greatly intensified their activities in Canada since the last revision of the Bank Act. The bulk of this activity has been conducted through financial affiliates incorporated under provincial charters. About 100 Canadian corporations in which foreign banks have an equity interest and which appear to be engaged in financial activities have been identified. About 50 foreign banks have an equity interest in these corporations.

Approximately half are U.S. banks and the balance, except for seven, are from countries of the European Economic Community. In addition, 50 foreign bank representative offices have been identified, of which about 30 represent banks which do not appear to have any investments in Canadian financial corporations. Total assets of Canadian affiliates of foreign banks reporting to the Bank of Canada currently exceed $6.4 billion. Clearly, the time has come to provide a way for foreign banks to operate in Canada within the framework of our federal banking legislation. This will provide for more competition in the financial markets for the benefit of Canadians. At the same time, the measures contained in the bill will ensure the preservation of a predominantly Canadian-owned and controlled banking system. It is proposed that foreign banks be allowed to establish banking subsidiaries in Canada, and be disallowed from undertaking banking business in this country except through these subsidiaries. It is also proposed that there be no limit on the number of branches which a foreign banking subsidiary may establish in Canada, but ministerial approval be required for other than the first. It is also proposed that at least half the directors of a foreign bank subsidiary be required to be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada. Further, in accordance with the House committee's recommendation, all committees established by a bank board would be required to have at least one-half of their membership Canadian. It is also proposed that foreign bank non-bank affiliates be required to provide information and, in the case of financial affiliates, unless expressly authorized, be disallowed from borrowing in Canada with the guarantee of their parent.

It is also proposed that foreign banks be allowed to maintain representative offices in Canada but with regulation. Foreign bank-owned subsidiaries will have broadly the same powers as Canadian banks; the Bank Act will be their charter. The new bill provides for licensing of such subsidiaries, with initial and renewal licences for periods of up to three years. As will be the case with other schedule B banks, banks whose capital stock is closely-held, their growth and branching will be closely controlled by governor in council. For example, governor in council will approve the initial authorized capital and all future increases. The bill provides a maximum-size control for domestic assets of 20 times the authorized capital. In addition, the domestic assets of all foreign bank subsidiaries will be restricted in aggregate to 8 per cent of Canadian dollar and foreign assets booked in Canada with Canadian residents. This formula is different from that in Bill C-15 and reflects the recommendation of the House committee on this issue. However, it has not been found necessary to adopt the 10 per cent figure recommended by the committee. Our calculations show that, with the new base, 8 per cent provides adequate scope for the establishment and growth of the foreign bank sector. Using year-end 1979 figures, it is estimated that the maximum permitted size of all domestic assets for all foreign bank subsidiaries would have been about $12.5 billion at that time. This limit would also grow with the banking system.

Bill C-15 required that foreign banks operate in Canada only through subsidiaries. I should note that the House committee recommended that foreign banks should be allowed to establish either branches or subsidiaries in Canada, provided that proper regulatory provisions could be enforced. It is the government's view that the subsidiary alternative, requiring capital in Canada, a board of directors at least 50 per cent of whom must be Canadians, and subject only to Canadian law, is the preferred route.

It was also proposed earlier that a foreign bank subsidiary be limited to five branches. Both committees recommended the elimination of this limit and the House committee further recommended that ministerial approval not be required. Reflecting these recommendations and the submissions received by the committees and the government, this bill incorporates the House committee's recommendation by removing the ceiling entirely. However, ministerial approval is retained to help ensure reciprocity and some regional distribution of the branches of foreign bank subsidiaries.

In addition, Bill C-15 proposed to disallow foreign bank subsidiaries from having interests through the parent in non-financial corporations that were not permitted to a Canadian bank. This restriction, however, would effectively disallow a number of major foreign banks, particularly from the European Economic Community, from establishing bank subsidiaries in this country, unless they were prepared to divest present holdings and avoid acquiring, directly or indirectly, any future ownership in such corporations in Canada.

Both parliamentary committees recommended longer divestiture periods than were originally proposed in Bill C-15. It is proposed that present holdings be grandfathered, that foreign bank subsidiaries be prohibited from providing banking services to affiliated non-bank related companies, and that allowance be made for future indirect investments in Canadian non-financial corporations by a foreign bank through an affiliate. These clauses provide new flexibility and safeguards not found in Bill C-15, and are needed if a number of major European banks are not to be excluded from establishing banking subsidiaries under the act.

Mr. Speaker, I would like now to review some of the proposals which are being made to change the business powers of the banks. These were originally set out in the white paper of 1976 and they have been thoroughly considered since then. Some are designed to extend existing powers to promote competition; some constrain existing powers to prevent serious conflicts of interest. Others are designed to indicate certain limits to banking powers.

The major proposals are: First, financial leasing of equipment will be permitted subject to certain regulations, but only through subsidiaries. The existing Bank Act does not provide for banks to engage directly in financial leasing. As proposed by the House committee, Bill C-6 provides that banks be allowed to engage in this activity in a subsidiary that is required to meet certain conditions specified by the House committee and be subject to regulations prescribed by governor in council. The regulations will ensure that the leases are the functional equivalent of credit by requiring that the lease be tied to specific equipment; be on a non-operating basis, that is, the bank will have no responsibility for the operation, maintenance or repair of the equipment; and the lease must be on a full pay-out basis. By allowing banks into this type of leasing it is thought that the increased competition would increase the availability and lower the cost of financial leases.

Second, banks will be allowed to engage in factoring, again only through subsidiaries.

Third, the 10 per cent ceiling which presently applies to a bank's investment in conventional residential mortgages will be retained. You may recall that Bill C-15 proposed that the current 10 per cent ceiling on a bank's holdings of conventional residential mortgages be removed. The trust companies and some of the mortgage companies voiced concern about this, and both parliamentary committees recommended the retention of a ceiling, the Senate committee recommending 15 per cent and the House committee the original 10 per cent.

• (1650)

We have decided to accept the House committee's recommendation. Any mortgage lending above that ceiling will have to be undertaken in a subsidiary working under the same rules as competing institutions.

Fourth, banks will be prevented from offering data-processing services directly or indirectly except for "banking-related" services that may be offered subject to regulations.

Fifth, banks will be specifically excluded from fiduciary activities in Canada.

Sixth, banks are precluded from having any involvement in the management of mutual funds but may act at arm's-length as agents in the sale of mutual funds. While banks are permitted to offer directly deposit-based RRSPs and RHOSPs, all other of these instruments can only be marketed on the same terms as mutual funds.

Seventh, restrictions are to be placed on the authority of banks to deal in securities. In particular, they will not be empowered to underwrite corporate security issues or to act as an agent in the direct placement of corporate securities. They will, however, be allowed to act as a member of a selling group. The basic policy aim here is to ensure that the securities industry will continue to play a major role in the capital markets.

Eighth, banks will be empowered to participate in consortium or syndicate lending where not less than one-half the total principal amount of the loan is advanced by banks, domestic and foreign.

Ninth, in general, banks will not be able to own more than 10 per cent of the voting stock of a Canadian financial corporation or of a non-financial corporation. However, we propose to make some exceptions to the general rule. These include bank service corporations, export finance corporations, mortgage loan corporations, leasing and factoring corporations, and venture capital corporations. Existing investments in excess of 10 per cent in non-financial corporations will have to be divested within a period of five years, unless a further period is approved by the minister. Excess investments in financial corporations are subject to grandfathering provisions prescribed by governor in council.

And finally, tenth, banks are to be given, for the first time, the same flexibility as other corporations in the raising of capital funds.

Section 88 of the existing act has been amended somewhat and, as recommended by the House committee, extended to include wholesale and retail inventories. It appears as clause 178 in the bill before us today. A similar section has been part of Canadian banking legislation since the first act in 1871. In general it has served Canadians well. However, a few provincial governments have recently passed personal property security legislation and others are considering such legislation. This legislation overlaps section 88 and may result in certain confusion in the law. Furthermore, the Senate committee and the Cattlemen's Association have expressed concern about certain other features of clause 178 of the bill. The government will seek to prevent overlapping and confusion in the law and to ensure fairness in its operation.

A reduction in the cash reserve requirements of the banks is proposed in the bill. This reduction would be phased in over a three and a half year period beginning one month after the enactment of the bill. The rate on Canadian currency demand deposits will be lowered from 12 per cent to 10 per cent. In the case of Canadian currency notice deposits, the rate on the first $500 million will be lowered from 4 per cent to 2 per cent, and on the rest from 4 per cent to 3 per cent. In addition, the reserve requirement on non-encashable term deposits with an original term to maturity of one year will be completely removed.

I support these changes because the current level of reserves is not necessary for the effective implementation of monetary policy. The reduction of reserves would retain some degree of competitive balance among deposit-accepting institutions, which was visualized in the white paper. The lower reserves may redress a bias which has made it advantageous for some companies entering the deposit-taking business to do so in the form of near-banks rather than banks. Other proposals for easier access discussed earlier will also work in this direction. Finally, the lower reserves will reduce the cost of banking to the benefit of the customers and shareholders of banks.

With regard to the 3 per cent reserve requirement on foreign currency deposits used in Canada which was proposed in Bill C-15, the Canadian banks have correctly noted that this would place them at a disadvantage relative to foreign banks; foreign banks would be able to bring foreign funds into Canada with no reserve requirements and lend those funds to Canadians, while Canadian banks would have to maintain a 3 per cent reserve whether the funds were raised in Canada or abroad. Consequently, it is proposed that the 3 per cent reserve requirement be placed only on foreign currency deposits of Canadian residents booked in Canada. This would achieve the objective of removing an incentive for Canadian banks to encourage their clients to hold deposits in foreign currency rather than in Canadian dollars, while ensuring that Canadian banks are able to compete with foreign banks in offering foreign currency loans to Canadians.

The provisions in the existing banking legislation which empower the Bank of Canada to fix the level of secondary reserves which must be held by the chartered banks will remain unaltered. Mr. Speaker, it will no longer be necessary for bank directors to hold qualifying shares. This removes what might have been a substantial financial barrier for certain people, and particularly women, to sit on the board of a bank. Clause 59 of Bill C-15 would have prohibited officers or employees of a chartered bank from serving on the boards of directors of most Canadian corporations. This was proposed because of a concern that bank officers or employees who serve as directors for another corporation could be subject to conflict of interest in that corporation's relationship with chartered banks. This proposal has met with considerable resistance from senior officers of Canadian corporations who have indicated that chartered bank officers and employees are valued members of their boards, providing a high level of specialized expertise.

The submissions have stated that there has been no evidence of conflict of interest, that corporations have not felt constrained to deal with any one bank because of the presence of a bank officer on the board of directors, and that this provision would operate to the detriment of the Canadian business sector. Accordingly, I am proposing to adopt the recommendations of the parliamentary committees. Officers and employees of a bank will continue to be able to sit on the boards of other corporations subject to the approval of the board of the bank.

Bill C-15 contained a provision prohibiting directors and employees of Crown corporations from serving on the board of directors of a chartered bank. Our review of this provision indicated that a change of this nature would hamper the ability of the federal and provincial governments to attract qualified directors for their Crown corporations without commensurate benefits. It is being recommended therefore that, while employees of a Crown corporation should not serve as bank directors because of their direct ties to government, directors of Crown corporations will be permitted to serve as bank directors.

The Quebec Savings Banks Act applies to only one institution, the Montreal City and District Savings Bank. This savings bank has many of the characteristics of the loan companies and owns a trust company. Part IV of the bill proposes certain changes that will broaden the geographical operations of this savings bank to all of Canada and will improve its powers to provide a wider range of banking services to its retail clientele. Some of the important changes proposed for the banks such as those affecting shares and shareholders, broader powers to raise capital, requirements for auditors and capital adequacy are also introduced into this legislation. Mr. Speaker, certain amendments are proposed to the Bank of Canada Act. These will, for the most part, update the act, and make the consequential changes required by the new Canadian Payments Association Act.

Mr. Speaker, I would like now to deal with the Canadian Payments Association Act. Arising out of the growing importance of the near bank deposit-accepting institutions, and changes in the way Canadians may make payments as a result of increasing use of the computer, this bill introduces a totally new act, the Canadian Payments Association Act. At the present time, the cheque-clearing system is the responsibility of the Canadian Bankers' Association. The banks, however, make this facility available for the clearing of cheques drawn on near-banks. The proposed association will provide a framework for the direct participation of the near banks in the operation and planning of Canada's payments system. This represents an important advantage to the near banks and will help ensure their continuing ability to compete in the offering of financial services as the system continues to evolve.

The association will be run by its members. They will be grouped according to their institutional character for the purpose of voting. No single group will be able to control the association. To ensure that the broad public interest will not be neglected, the bylaws of the association will be subject to approval by governor in council. The chairman of the board will be appointed by the Bank of Canada, and the Inspector General of Banks will report annually to the minister on whether or not the association is operating in conformity with the act and its bylaws.

While the proposals has been generally welcomed, certain aspects of it were criticized by the provincial governments and the near banks. One particular concern was that the federal government would use the association as a vehicle to regulate provincially-chartered near-banks. That, of course, has not been the intention. It has been decided that membership in the association should be voluntary except for the banks which are still the most significant financial institutions in the payments system. We continue to believe it is important to have as members of the association all the major institutions accepting transferable deposits. The members of the association will have certain obligations. They will be expected to co-operate in the effective running of the system and to bear their share of the operating costs. The chartered banks will continue to be required to hold cash and secondary reserves under the Bank Act, but it has not been thought necessary at this time to extend this requirement to the near banks. Settlement balances for these members will be a matter for the by-laws of the association. Finally, to ensure financial stability, every CPA member other than the Bank of Canada will be required either to belong to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, have its deposits insured under a provincial enactment that also provides for the inspection of financial institutions, or belong to the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society and hold a valid certificate under the Co-operative Credit Associations Act. This new act significantly changes the institutional framework within which our payments system will evolve. As I have noted, it is an important initiative in helping to ensure a continuing strong competitive position for deposit-accepting near-banks.

I would like to say a few words about regulations. In a number of instances in this bill it has been found necessary to provide for regulations. This reflects, in part, a more complex and diversified banking system and, consequently, the need to provide flexibility to respond to future developments. The government has sought to keep the power to issue regulations to a minimum, and is also proposing that it be mandatory for new regulations and changes to old ones to be published in The Canada Gazette at least 60 days before the regulations are to come into effect. This will ensure that interested parties have an opportunity to seek changes in the regulations before they come into effect.

Regulations on the calculation and disclosure of the cost of borrowing and charges and rates of interest on deposit accounts are being proposed. Their form has been influenced by consultations with the provinces. Because these consultations are continuing, I have made a commitment to the provinces to provide sufficient flexibility in the Bank Act to permit subsequent modifications of the regulations if the provinces and the federal government together agree to adopt common standards in this area. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I recall that since 1967, when the last Bank Act was passed, the financial institutions and capital markets in Canada have undergone considerable growth and change. This says a great deal for the flexibility of the present legislation and regulatory framework, but it now requires early modification not only to reflect the underlying real changes but to anticipate those which are expected, such as developments in the electronic payments system.

The process of the decennial revision has now been underway for five and a half years. All of the interested parties have been heard many times and their briefs carefully considered by parliamentary committees, ministers and officials. The banks, the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, the caisses populaires and the credit unions, as well as other financial institutions, want the new bill passed and the uncertainty removed.

Sound, efficient and well-functioning financial institutions and markets are necessary for the smooth operation and growth of our modern industrial economy. It is our responsibility to provide the legal framework within which the financial institutions can operate successfully, and through consideration of Bill C-6 on second reading, it is the enormous task the members of this Parliament are called upon to perform.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to express my thanks to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for letting me speak, in a sense out of turn—something I am not accustomed to doing—because of another engagement. I want to give him my assurance that I do not plan to use unlimited time in responding to the speech the minister has given.

I also congratulate the minister on his speech which, I believe, is the first he has given in the House regarding the Bank Act since his appointment as minister.

I would like to advise the House that the New Democratic Party will be opposing this bill at second reading. We will have a number of amendments to put forward in committee. We will have a number of speeches to make and recommendations to make to the government because of our concerns about the market power of the banks; the lack of provision in the act to provide adequate protection to the Canadian consumer; the lack of protection for near-banks and other competitors with the banks in certain fields such as computer services and auto leasing; concerns we have about limitations on the abilities of provinces to buy into our chartered banks and limitations on the abilities of credit unions to buy into banks; concerns about the arrival of foreign banks in Canada; the unfortunate decision of the government to allow bank directors to continue to occupy as many other directorships as they can; and the fact that the banks are coming before us, as they do every ten years, to request that they achieve security in the Canadian financial system and that they have a guaranteed status and a guaranteed profit.

At the same time, those people who are working for the banks are treated among the most poorly of all employees in Canada. The fact remains that one chartered bank in particular, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, has been condemned time and time again by the Canada labour relations board for a systematic pattern of discriminatory behaviour. We in this party can see no reason why we should be prepared to give quick and speedy status to our chartered banks when they are not prepared to treat their own employees with any kind of respect or with any guarantee of security.

Let us look, first of all, at the animal which we are regulating. The five largest banks in Canada hold more assets than the 200 largest non-financial corporations all rolled into one. The largest of the big five, the Royal, has 3.5 times the assets of the Bank of Canada. It is 25 times the size of General Motors of Canada. The smallest of the big five, Toronto-Dominion, is almost as big as the nation's two largest Crown corporations, Ontario Hydro and Hydro-Quebec, together.

We have seen a dramatic and quite fantastic growth in the assets of the big five since this House last considered the Bank Act in 1967. Since 1970 alone the assets of all the big five chartered banks totalled together have increased some 480 per cent, from some $43 billion to just over some $206 billion at the end of 1979.

When we consider the colossal market power that these institutions have, we have to look at the Bank Act as the sole protection that the Canadian consumer and the Canadian businessman has against the banks' abusing that market power in order to impose their own financial interests and financial wishes on either the Canadian consumer, the Canadian borrower—be he a small borrower, a small businessman or a middle-sized corporation—or the Canadian lender, whether he be a moderate-sized lender buying term deposits of $4,000, $5,000 or $10,000, or a Canadian depositor who is simply saving from day to day and trying to get whatever return he can from the bank.

With the government's interest rate policy the fact has been that since 1976 the banks have doubled their assets and their profits, so that in 1979 the profits of the banks totalled over $1.2 billion. As interest rates have gone up, as they have under this government and under the previous government, we have also seen—

Mr. MacLaren: The rates have gone down again.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Etobicoke North (Mr. MacLaren) says that the rates have gone down again. That is certainly not the result of the policies of the government, and I find it very difficult to see how a government which fails to take responsibility for rates when they go up can now start claiming responsibility for rates when they come down.

The fact remains that we have been allowed to see, with the dramatic increase in interest rates, the way by which the banks have been able to manipulate the rates which they charge to lenders and the rates which they pay to depositors. We have been able to see the way by which they have been able to take advantage of a high interest rate policy.

The banks have argued that they, too, are squeezed by high interest rates. If I were making $325 million in the first quarter of 1980, that would be some squeeze. I wish somebody would squeeze me like that. They are arguing that they are being squeezed, but the fact remains that whether or not high interest rates cause a great deal of volatility in terms of bank profits—and there is no question that they have had some effect in that regard—the way by which the banks allocate their credit decisions and the way by which they decide who will receive what rate is something at which the government has to look.

When we on this side of the House raised the matter of the way by which the banks were manipulating interest rates and charging the lowest possible amount to Canada's least sophisticated and least wealthy savers, the people who deposit in a normal savings account, it was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who said that he would be taking a very close look at this, that this was something the government would be looking at. In fact, he suggested that we would have to wait for the publication of the new Bank Act to see what stand this government was going to take with respect to interest rate spreads and the ways in which the banks are able to use their market power in order to take advantage of Canada's economic situation.

Well, the fact remains—and it comes as no surprise to those of us in this party—that when the time came for the government to publish the Bank Act, there was nothing there. The Bank Act is totally silent on the question of profits. The Bank Act is totally silent on the question of interest rate spreads, and it is entirely silent on the subject of interest rate control.

• (1720)

The Bank Act is equally silent on the subject of consumer protection. We have the statement from the minister today that of course there are matters which must be included in regulations because they are subject to continued consideration by the department as to exactly what they will do. Yet, I would have thought that the Bank Act would provide the government with the best opportunity possible to give confidence to every single Canadian consumer. I would have thought that this was an act designed not for the banks or for the convenience of these tremendously powerful financial institutions, but for the protection of the lowly consumer, the average citizen.

Let me relate a personal experience, having had a loan at a credit union and having had a loan at one of Canada's chartered banks, the Bank of Montreal. When the time came to pay off the loan at the Bank of Montreal which I wanted to pay off earlier, I was penalized by the Bank of Montreal because of the way in which they calculate their interest payments. They used the so-called "Rule of 78", the sum of digits approach, for calculating the payment of consumer debts as opposed to the normal amortization approach.

There is a complete contrast between the kind of penalty facing each and every consumer who have loans with one of our three chartered banks that continue to use the "Rule of 78" method and the method used, since their formation, by Canada's credit unions, a method that has been followed by two chartered banks but not all of them. The fact remains that the banks are taking systematic advantage of those Canadians who choose to pay off their loans early because of the way in which they calculate payments of interest.

Mr. Orlikow: It is theft.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) says that it is theft. Some rob you with a six-gun and some rob you with a fountain pen, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rose: White collar crime.

Mr. Rae: It is white collar crime, as the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) calls it. The fact of the matter is that the average consumer who walks into a bank is less sophisticated and does not know the method under which the bank calculates its interest payments on loans. If that consumer goes into a credit union, he gets a much better deal and much greater protection than if he goes into one of Canada's chartered banks. The reason is that truth of lending provisions are absent from the Bank Act, because they indicate that they will be in the regulations, which we will hardly ever see and which no one will understand. Understanding the Bank Act itself is difficult enough, let alone the regulations under the Bank Act. There is no guarantee that the average Canadian consumer can walk into a bank and have the same protection and the same confidence that he is not being taken for a ride as he would if he walked into a credit union. This is a point that we have been making for some time.

It is rather surprising, when the minister talks about competition and so forth being one of the primary goals of the act, that the government would have decided simply to leave it to the banks to decide what method of calculation they will use. It is a technical matter. Not everyone understands the "Rule of 78". One requires a blackboard to show how the banks do it. But I am sure the minister is aware that when the chartered banks calculate consumer loans using this notorious method, the result is that consumers who pay off their loans early pay a penalty to the bank. The banks reap a simple windfall because we do not have a government that is prepared to bring in legislation under the Bank Act to provide protection for the average consumer.

The minister mentioned that encouraging competition was one of the major aspects of this bill. He mentioned the Canadian Payments Association of which we are in favour. We have some concern about the amount of consumer participation in that association, but we are happy that the Canadian Payments Association is going ahead and that the caisse populaire and credit union movement will finally be able to compete a little more fairly with our chartered banks. But I find it ironic that the other two methods the minister described as encouraging competition are the banks engaging in leasing and factored activities, and foreign banks. I suggest that the competition in leasing will last for about two years; then it will be over because the banks will have taken it over.

I should like to refer briefly to a couple of meetings which I have had with the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), representatives of the automobile dealers and other people engaged in the leasing business, and of course the bank subsidiaries that are interested in getting into the business. All members of Parliament received a letter from the Canadian Bankers' Association, that well-known eleemosynary institution, a charitable foundation. It was from a Mr. Mackintosh who is a very distinguished man and very able spokesman on behalf of the banking community. The thrust of the letter was that the automobile dealer should not be upset because the banks are not interested in getting into automobile leasing, maintenance and servicing. He said that the banks cannot perform such services by law, nor do they intend to get involved in servicing automobiles.

I should like to refer to another letter which was sent to an automobile dealer in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, from RoyLease Ltd. As the minister may know, RoyLease is a subsidiary of the Royal Bank which is engaged in the leasing business. The letter indicated that in an effort to provide their clients with an effective leasing portfolio, they are developing a maintenance program.

Another letter indicated that all of the client representatives of RoyLease will be issued a Visa national account credit card. It indicated that this will be in the form of a regular Visa card with a RoyLease sticker on the right side of the white band. It requested that upon presentation of the Visa card they allow a 20 per cent discount on parts and a 10 per cent discount on labour to be applied to the driver's bill. If that is not getting involved in the maintenance and servicing of cars and using their market leverage in order to impose their will on a dealer, I do not know what is. That is exactly what has happened; that is exactly what is going on. That is a question which must be resolved in committee.

Unless we deal with that problem there is no question that the banks will use their market power to exercise leverage over automobile dealers and over the small dealers in Canada, some 4,000 of them, and they will be putting those dealers out of business in very short order. Now, that is the bank's definition of competition. They say that they can provide a better service, just as they did in 1967 with consumer loans. But there is another public interest involved here and that is whether we want the banks to be the ones that can control the leasing business in Canada. There is no question that they can do it, if they put their minds to it, in very short order. This is a question which must be discussed at committee stage.

Also there is the question of the involvement of banks in computer services. I am sure the minister is aware of the case currently before the Supreme Court of Canada involving Central Computer Services Ltd., Comcheq Services Limited and the Toronto-Dominion Bank. That case was one that involved these firms saying that the bank was not engaged in the business of banking under the 1967 act but was engaged in computer and payroll activity which was outside the realm of banking.

Of course, we will have to wait for a decision from the Supreme Court, but let me suggest that this is a very critical question. It may not be adequate for the government to say that it will not provide a definition of banking in this legislation because banking is what bankers do. In effect, that was the decision of the majority of the Manitoba Court of Appeal which threw out the application for an injunction from the computer companies once that application had been granted a trial. It was thrown out because they said that the essential definition of banking is whatever bankers do. What bankers do is banking, and if bankers engage in payroll activity or in extensive use of computer services, then that is their role in the future. The same thing could apply to auto repairs, and the same thing could apply to a lot of other areas. You have to look at banks here in terms of their relationships with these businesses.

● (1730)

These businesses are going to the banks for their own financing while the banks, at the same time, are engaged in activities which are directly competitive with those small businesses. This is not really competition; it is like comparing a butterfly and a steamroller. There is no comparison.

The government will have to look very hard and carefully, and may, indeed, have to look again in committee, at the question of whether we have provided in the act, not just in the regulations but in the act itself, adequate protection for those sections and sectors of the business community we feel deserve to be protected from the monolithic power of competition from the banks.

Let us not in the name of competition eradicate competition, because competition is something that can only be protected in some cases if we limit the market power of quasi-monopolistic institutions such as chartered banks. I suggest that allowing the chartered banks to get into some fields of activity may in fact lead not to competition, except on a very temporary basis, but, over the next ten years, to an even greater concentration of activity in their hands.

There are three other points I want to make, Mr. Speaker, before I close. First of all, we deeply regret the decision of the government to, in a sense, double-track its earlier decision on the question of bank directors. We agreed very much with the decision, or the recommendation, of the Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration, the thrust of which was to reduce the requirement that directors ought to be shareholders. We are very concerned about the fact that the government has backtracked on its original decision. We know it was subject to a lot of corporate pressure from many of its corporate backers, but the fact remains that we are deeply concerned with the extent of corporate concentration in Canada, with the problem of corporate linkage and the way in which the intercorporate directorships can be used to increase market power and increase the forces of concentration in Canada.

We know we have a tax system which encourages concentration because, it allows all large corporations to deduct interest payments on funds they borrow from banks in order to finance takeovers. I find it hard to see why these financial institutions that occupy such a fiduciary relationship with the Canadian people—a position of trust with the Canadian people—should not be subject to far more careful consideration by us, in terms of conflict of interest and in terms of the problem of corporate concentration. I know my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), will be referring to these questions as well as to the issue of consumer protection when he speaks later on in this debate.

Again the minister stated that we need more competition in Canada, and that is why we need to bring in foreign banks. The government admittedly reduced this from 15 per cent to 8 per cent, but our party still remains opposed in principle to the notion that banking, that critical activity in the Canadian economy, should become the subject of the entry of foreign banks, and should become the subject of foreign penetration.

I find it ironic that a government which pays such strong lip service to the notion of Canadian economic autonomy, and which pays such strong lip service to the notion of competition in our financial system, would tell us that the only people who can really compete with our Canadian banks, and the only way we can have competition, is not to encourage or make it easier for near-banks—caisses populaires, credit unions and trust companies—to engage in banking activity and become competitive, but to allow in foreign banks.

I suggest that some of the consequences will be to reduce the ability of the government to control outflows of capital at times when outflows of capital are not in the best interests of the country. I suggest to the minister that allowing the arrival of so many foreign banks will limit the ability of the minister to control Canada's economic policy. When we have a Minister of Finance whose view of the market is such that he does not see how he can control the situation, such as the minister we have today, that may not be such a bad thing. When we have a New Democratic minister of finance it will clearly be of some disadvantage to have some 50 or 60 foreign banks that may be subject to the laws of foreign jurisdiction, particularly American corporations.

While I have stirred the minister to life, and I am glad to see that, I think the tendency will be to decrease the ability of the Minister of Finance to exercise some important controls on the economy, and to limit the ability of the government to exercise some important controls on capital flows and capital markets. I think it will tend to make it more difficult for Canadians to form banks, because I think the tendency will be for foreign corporations to skim off the most lucrative foreign investments and foreign business, and the result of that market penetration will be that Canadians who are involved in wanting to form banks, or get involved in banking, will have a far harder time reaching the marketplace. The tendency will be for less competition rather than more.

Finally, I want to say a word about unfair labour practices in the banks. I mentioned at the beginning that these banks come before us looking, as they do, for protection. They are seeking protection and they are seeking regulation in their own interests. However, we have the Canada Labour Board saying in one of its recent decisions involving a bank in St. Catharines, and it follows on a number of decisions, that it has become apparent throughout the organizational attempts at various branches of the employer across the country by several unions, that the employer, and I am referring to the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Mr. Speaker, has embarked on a campaign designed to discourage its employees from exercising their rights under the Canada Labour Code. The board states that some attempts were blatant and blundering, while others were more sophisticated and subtle. That sounds like the performance of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in other matters.

The fact remains that we have our largest financial and, indeed, our largest corporate institutions, coming before this Parliament cloaked in a mantle of some respectability—indeed, we almost all fall on our knees in the face of bank managers, be they large or small—yet we are told by the Canada Labour Board that the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce has been engaged in a systematic attempt to subvert the rights of Canadians under laws passed by this Parliament.

I think this is a very fundamental question. Why should we in this Parliament be granting such security and status to our largest financial institutions when they are not prepared to accept, indeed, when they are subverting systematically, to use the words of the Canada Labour Board, the rights of Canadians passed by this Parliament? I must say that that is something that is lost on me and lost on members of this party. We are not prepared to grant banks such security until such time as we can be sure that the rights of employees of the banks are respected and guaranteed, and until such time as the employees working for the banks have the same security as the banks are asking from this Parliament.

I want to end by suggesting to both ministers of finance who are with us today that we look forward to a long, healthy, and vital debate. We realize that this matter has been before this House in one form or another for quite some time. We are also convinced that hasty passage of the bill, and that, if one listens to the rumours one hears on the floor of the House, a refusal to allow the committee to call witnesses or that the Bank Act will be considered in Committee of the Whole and not even referred to the finance committee, would not serve the best interests of Canadians. We give notice to the minister that we will be pressing in committee for the calling of witnesses on the critical questions of corporate concentration, market power, competition, and consumer protection.

I can assure the minister that we will be giving him a list of amendments and that we will be co-operating with him in terms of not letting our guard down, just as I did when the Conservative party was in power and we presented them with amendments on different bills to let them know exactly where they stood and where we stood. We intend to let the minister know, with the changes in the House of Commons which have taken place since 1977 and with the fact that we now have a very large turnover of membership, that we intend to have a close look at this legislation.

In closing, I want to contrast the kind of activity which we expect to take place in the committee with what Mr. George Haig, who was then the general manager of the Bank of Toronto, said in providing a candid description to his fellow Canadians as to how the 1871 Bank Act was written, "Representatives of the chartered banks from all parts of the country sat in conference, day by day discussing the clauses of the proposed act one by one. We sat in one of the committee rooms of the House and discussed the bill with considerable sense of responsibility, being well aware not only that our conclusions would affect the whole banking interests of the country, but every other interest; commercial, manufacturing, industrial, not to speak of the interests of the government itself".

This is not an act which we think is written by banks for banks. This is an act which is written for the people of Canada by the people of Canada to determine the best, safest, most human, fair, and industrious way to use credit and the granting of credit for the benefit of our industry, our small business, our economic sovereignty, and for the benefit of the interests of each and every consumer in Canada. We intend to bring that perspective to the committee in a constructive way.

Indeed, on second reading, we will have a number of speakers who will be going into more depth on the points on which I have only been able to touch. I would like to give the minister a word, not of warning, but of assurance, that we intend to see that this legislation is understandable to Canadians, that it provides them with protection, and that it is a piece of legislation in which they, not simply the banks, will have a great deal of confidence for the next ten years to come.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time that I participate in a go-around on the Bank Act. It is too bad that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has been called away from the chamber because I think perhaps one could offer him, considering his enthusiasm and recent arrival in this House, some words of caution and advice with regard to the Bank Act.

It has been over a year since I have had an opportunity to address this House. I would like to make a few preliminary remarks before I get into a fairly extensive examination of the legislation which is before us and the reports of the committee that laboured very greatly, certainly on the basis of two major parties in the House, in producing the report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which appeared in Votes and Proceedings of March 20, 1979.

I find it strange, while I look at the benches across the way, with hon. members dispersed in their own seats, that there is a tendency in this House—and it is not done here as far as I am concerned—for hon. members to gather behind a speaking member in order to background an attendance in the House. We have a TV flying squad. I could not care less how many members there are sitting behind me. If that camera is aimed in this direction, the television will show no members, but myself.

I am passing on my reflection on the matter as a result of a number of years in this House—and I have spoken to other members who have the same feeling—feeling that the appearance of television in this chamber has changed greatly the concept, the behaviour, and so much of this chamber. This is no longer the forum where hon. members speak to fellow elected members. This has become a stage where people with claques respond because an hon. member has risen to ask a simple question during question period. Why? Clapping used to be an ironic gesture at times in support of a member who had risen perhaps 20 times or more in an attempt to catch the eye of Mr. Speaker. There was this ironic cheer that he had finally made it, but now we have a claque. Why?

Is this a stage or a hippodrome where some people are coming on for return so that there must be all this clapping? It seems to me to be a total debasement of this chamber, and it should not be a practice that continues. It is something new in this session, and I will pass my judgment on it. I do not like it, and it is not in keeping with this chamber, nor do I think that these travelling squads are in keeping with the chamber.

The third point which I would like to make deals with a matter which I have raised in committees in the past and which I have discussed privately with a good number of members. That is the practice which has grown up in the past three years of Mr. Speaker occupying the chair primarily for the question period, the votes, and occasionally to come in to deliver a ruling. Mr. Deputy Speaker or the Assistant Chairman of Committee of the Whole—

Mr. Evans: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is very difficult for me to interrupt the golden oratory coming from the other side of the House, but I fail to see where this commentary has any relevance whatsoever to the Bank Act which is before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I had indicated that I intended to deliver a few remarks. The hon. member during the last session had an opportunity—

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, to my knowledge there is no provision in Standing Orders which gives the hon. member the right to make a few remarks that go on for 15 minutes.

Mr. Lambert: I have only been on for four minutes so far. The hon. member is pretty thin, because we listened to him speak out of order in extenso last fall on a number of bills. Be that as it may, I do not like the practice of the Deputy Speaker or the presiding officer sitting in judgment in the House, giving rulings on procedure, and then, when the debate is terminated, going out and voting. It is not done.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have listened with some interest to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I might say, for the benefit of other hon. members, that he indicated before taking the floor that he had an interest in this subject. The last matter he raised was with the Chair itself. It was somewhat hesitant about interrupting his thoughts on that matter. I think he has now placed on the record some observations that may be worthy of hon. members' attention. I can now ask the hon. member if he would address himself to the Bank Act.

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not want to intervene, but I would think that the remarks just made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) reflect upon the ability of the Chair to continue to preside. Before he continues, I would ask that he withdraw those remarks which cast aspersions on Your Honour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I do not think that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has raised a point of order. In any event, such comments as have been made by the hon. member for Edmonton West do not, in the opinion of the Chair, cast any aspersions.

Mr. Lambert: That is fine, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall just find another way to make the remarks I intend to make on that subject.

This afternoon it is indeed unfortunate, in some ways, that this debate came on. I indicated to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that the change in the order of business caught some of us at an awkward time. There are not too many members of the House who are veterans of the Second World War, and those who are were looking forward to attending the screening of the film, "The Liberation of Holland", which took place at four o'clock this afternoon. However, those of us who have responsibilities in the House regarding this legislation are aware that our rightful place is here, so we had to deny ourselves the opportunity of attending the screening in company with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) and others.

I, too, Mr. Speaker, would like to join in the sentiments the minister expressed this afternoon regarding the participation of Canadian troops in the liberation of Scotland, an event which will be celebrated at the beginning of the week.

Mr. MacEachen: Scotland!

Mr. Lambert: Holland. I am afraid the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) would rise in indignation and I apologize to him if I were to suggest that Scotland has ever been subjugated. Maybe some people have felt Scotland has been subjugated, but no Scotsman has ever been subjugated. I do not know if that is a Freudian slip or not, Mr. Speaker—it was just one of those things.

This debate has been twice around the horn, Mr. Speaker. The last debate took place in late 1966 and early 1967. May I say that, based upon the experience of that time, I can assure both the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) and the Minister of Finance that there is going to have to be a Bank Act continuation bill.

According to my calculations, if the House does not sit on May 19, June 24 or July 1, then at one minute after midnight on July 10—I may be out a day but it will be one minute after midnight around that date—Canadian banks will not be able to open their doors unless there has been passed by both chambers, and promulgated, a Bank Act continuation bill.

The reason I say that, without even indicating that there is going to be an extraordinarily long debate in this House, is that even with the best of intentions it would not be possible to meet the deadline. There are pages and pages of regulations made under various sections of the act which are published simultaneously with proclamation. Sixty business days are provided in which the public may make recommendations to the government and so too may members of Parliament, I presume, with regard to the regulations. There is no way the banks can operate under a Bank Act with this multitude of regulations in suspense.

For instance, there are regulations with regard to leasing, regulations covering the operations of affiliates and subsidiaries of foreign banks, and any number of other regulations, which, of course, may be modified at committee or as a result of private representations to the government before and after proclamation. In all honesty, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see how anyone can anticipate the date being before November 1. It could be January 1 and that might be better, in order to give the banks the opportunity to conform. Some of them are going to have to modify their positions as a result of this legislation.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may remember, as I do, that early in 1967 the Bank Act was passed, and was proclaimed, but was to be effective on July 1, 1967. All this is by way of advice, Mr. Speaker. It would make things much more comfortable for Parliament. Our colleagues on the left, incidentally, are now apparently filled with "wim and wigour", but at committee hearings they distinguished themselves by almost total absence. I do not know whether they have a belated conversion to some views, or what.

The revision of the Bank Act is almost three years over due, and I suggest it will be three and one half years over due before we are through.

During the committee hearings I found a phrase which I think was apposite and I do not apologize for using it. I think in many ways that what we are doing here is akin to laying down the rules for the manufacture of horse collars in an age of jet propulsion, rockets, and advanced electronics.

We have been putting up a fence to contain the encroachment of foreign banks. If we look at the proceedings of the committee in 1966 we see that I, for one, asked the minister of finance of the day and the superintendent of banks at that time to do something about the comprehensive Bank Act which would allow foreign banks in for competition. We went through a gestation period with one foreign bank at that time, the Mercantile Bank. How that exercised the committee and the country, Mr. Speaker, when all it did was shore up one particular banking operation very soon thereafter! Because the market attracted them and the Canadian banking system did not have the facilities themselves, we had British merchant bankers, representatives of French banks and German banks and, of course, branches, in essence, of American banks.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, at the six o'clock adjournment I was speaking about what the tendency has been on this occasion and in fact on the previous occasion when major revisions of the Bank Act went through, but in particular on this occasion. We are merely legislating to cover deficiencies and anomalies of the past, rather than what I would like to see, and I think that the majority of members on my side of the House would like to see, that is, legislating for the next 25 years in the future with regard to the banking system of Canada. I do not share the views of the now absent New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: But I want to say this: as they take some views, we take different views—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Here is the cream of the crop.

Mr. Lambert: —with regards to the importance of the framework of our financial system here in Canada.

I remember in 1966 insisting upon provisions for merchant banking. The former member for Eglinton, Mr. Sharp, who was then the minister of finance, and the then inspector general of banks, would not hear of it, but we have seen merchant bankers move into our Canadian economy. What we are doing now with this act is trying to put containing fences around them. We are talking about limiting the banks in data processing. We are talking about limiting the banks in the leasing of equipment. In 1966, and 1967, the banks warned us, and we were told by witnesses, that the only way you could, at that time, finance the leasing of major ticket equipment in this country was through major American subsidiaries. Frankly, we had the courage in 1966 of supine individuals with wet noodles for a spine in so far as it came to banking. Today we are doing the same thing.

I have been connected with the examination and the study of our financial system for over 20 years in this House, and I will confess that my early career was as a bank clerk but I could not stand the dull mechanics of it. I put a challenge to this government, as I did to my own administration, and I have here before all of this House the first carbon copy of a letter of my commentaries with regard to the Bank Act on the bill presented by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who was then the minister of finance. It is less than it was against that of the hon. member from Shawinigan who was the then minister of finance.

Mr. Kaplan: It was the same bill.

Mr. Lambert: But I simply say—and the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) will know because he was chairman of the committee of which I was a member—that our biggest problem is that we have been too timid with our bank system, our financial system. We do not gear for the future. We are merely trying to shore up for the past; contain the present, and then God help us in the future.

It is alleged that the Canadian Payments Association, or system, is going to provide the necessary vehicle for the electronic transfer of funds. That is nonsense. It is too limiting.

● (2010)

I do not think that what we have in this act provides us with the proper vehicle for the Minister of Finance to discharge his constitutional duties properly where he is given exclusive jurisdiction, or the Parliament of Canada is given exclusive jurisdiction, over money and banking. My old expression of wet noodle courage in 1966 motivated the then administration not to insist upon its exclusive jurisdiction in monetary policy and in banking with regard to deposit insurance and, secondly, with regard to that which is banking.

What is wrong with this act is right at the core, at the guts of it. It refuses to define the business of banking, yet it has the gall to use the phrase "of business and banking". I, as a solicitor, and I do not apologize for the number of solicitors in this House because I think they reflect the right thinking of the Canadian public—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: Jealousy will get no one anywhere.

An hon. Member: You are living proof of that.

Mr. Lambert: If any individual representing financial interests, or an individual trying to put together financial interests, were to come into the office of a solicitor engaged in corporate business practice and say, "We want to carry out certain operations. Can you tell us whether they infringe the restrictions on the business of banking?" An honest solicitor would say, "I cannot tell you because section 295 of the act says that a non-financial affiliate of a foreign corporation cannot engage in the business of banking." Well, what on earth is the business of banking? At 5.30 or thereabouts the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood quoted from a Manitoba judgment. I think that judgment is out to lunch.

An hon. Member: So are the NDP.

Mr. Lambert: No, the judge was. He said the business of banking is that which bankers carry out. In Alberta we have Alberta treasury branches. They carry out every function that a chartered bank does, and they sell gaming licences. At one time they took your picture for your driver's licence. Are those the functions of a banker? No, no, no.

I invite hon. members to look at the deliberations of the committee on finance which culminated in the March 20 report presented to this House on behalf of the committee by the present Solicitor General. He will admit it is a good report. In fact he pops his vest buttons that it is a good report.

The first item in that report insisted that banking should be defined in the act. I can tell the minister that I went looking for that and I got the recommendations and the testimony from most reputable witnesses on behalf of the Canadian bar, the bankers' association, the manufacturers' association, all types of organizations, and they are not generic when I name those, and private individuals. They said the business of banking had to be defined in the same way that the term deposit has to be defined.

People assume, for instance, that in a deposit with the trust company, that money on deposit with the trust company is on deposit. It is not. It is money left in trust with a trust company. It is not a deposit in the same sense as it is with a bank because those funds cannot be expended for any purpose. They are directly returnable to the individual who left them with the trust company, but the act refuses to define deposits.

These are two fundamental lacunae. I was told that defining the business of banking might excite some of the provinces. I will repeat the argument that I have made time and time again. The fact that a provincial administration incorporates a trust company and that it has jurisdiction over certain credit unions, does not give it jurisdiction over the operations of that institution or that society if that society, institution or corporate body engages in the business of banking, any more than a company incorporated under provincial statute for the operation of aircraft. They all come under the Ministry of Transport. There is not one scintilla of the operations of that company, other than filing its annual return, naming its directors and its shareholders, that a province can control. The same is the case with a broadcasting company. They are incorporated under a provincial charter. They name their directors, they file their annual statements, but again not one scintilla of their operations come under provincial control.

A grain marketing company is incorporated under provincial charter but again not one scintilla of its operations comes under provincial control. Its employees are under the Canada Labour Code. A trucking company that crosses a provincial boundary, again its operations to truck are under sound federal control. Its employees are under the Canada Labour Code. Why, then, do we come around suddenly to recognize that organizations engaged in the business of money and banking incorporated under a provincial charter somehow or other have a totally provincial concept? To my mind, that defeats logic.

When we consider that over 35 per cent of moneys on deposit today, and presumably almost the same amount of chequing operations, are drawn through the near banks and the money lending operations, where is the determination of monetary policy which, under the constitution, is assigned to the Minister of Finance? Where is the determination that money and banking are exclusively jurisdictions of the Government of Canada? I would expect, by the same logic, the provincial governments to insist that education and a few other fields come exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. But with regard to money and banking the position is clear under the Bank Act and associated legislation dealing with monetary policy. I may be a hardliner and I am not too sure that all my hon. friends share this view.

This afternoon we heard the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood arguing that the Bank Act is a multi-purpose document. I do not recognize it exclusively as a social document, as he and his hon. friends tend to do. In fact I think they are "out to lunch" in opposing quid pro quo, as one might say, labour policy against monetary policy. By that, I mean the organization of our monetary institutions. To my mind, it is illogical, it is hare-brained, and destined to failure. I think it is—

An hon. Member: A dangerous move to the left!

Mr. Lambert: Members over there may laugh, but I am bearing in mind the contributions of that group on the left during the last determination of these issues. Perhaps I might quote to them the words of their former financial critic at the time I was finance critic for my party—he is somewhat of a revered institution in that party or, at any rate, he should be to a lot of its younger members. I refer to the former hon. member for Waterloo. He used to say, "Marcel, when you have covered a bill there is nothing much left to say."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: I am going to review these documents at some length, Mr. Speaker. This is an omnibus bill, a huge, massive thing, and for the benefit of the television audience tonight I am going to show it.

An hon. Member: You are not supposed to be talking to the television cameras.

Mr. Lambert: I know. But some of the hon. members here might as well be part of that television audience because, frankly, I do not believe they have looked at this bill in its entirety. It is in four parts.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member may die of old age—and it is premature old age because he is still young in appearance—and in mentality.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: There is the Bank Act. Incidentally, the Bank Act is not just a general act, it serves as the equivalent of a memorandum of association or letters patent of all existing chartered banks and it is not, therefore, a document to be treated lightly. It is the charter of their operations. Then there are amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act which cover only one institution, the Montreal District Savings Bank. Then there are amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, and finally there is part IV which deals with the creation of the Canadian Payments Association. This in itself is a most complex and difficult study because it is the point of departure as far as the whole business of this legislation is concerned.

I do not intend to talk at this moment about part IV, though. I want to talk about the Bank Act and, as I said, I want to talk about the report of the committee of this House tabled a little over a year ago which, incidentally, was about 80 per cent incorporated by the Department of Finance and put together in the presence and with the co-operation of the Inspector General of Banks. A lot of the points were negotiated with him. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the Solicitor General will tell you, that members both on this side and on the other side of the House, in the spirit of putting together a workable document, negotiated privately and arrived at a consensus, a communality of opinion. The administration which took office in June of last year did not entirely share our views in certain respects. They had the benefit of the views of our colleagues in the Senate whose opinions may have varied from ours. We do not claim we have a monopoly on sagacity. But we believe we arrived at a pretty fair solution. I should like to outline to the House the areas in which we take issue with the present bill and the former administration.

First, as to the business of banking. I have often looked upon government on the national scene as though it were a referee in a hockey game—I understand there are some hockey games starting just about now. We have all watched professional hockey, and we have always known that if the referee in the first period is lackadaisical and allows elbows, high sticks, boarding, and generally rough play, by the second period the boys are into the act and the situation is no longer under control. The situation has got beyond him, and we have precisely the same situation here.

By the refusal of the Parliament of Canada to define the business of banking we have allowed chaos to pile upon chaos, and precisely for those policies that the New Democrats would like to see, the Government of Canada is as impotent as a eunuch to act because there has been a refusal to define the business of banking and the word "deposit". So the Government of Canada says, "This is the jurisdiction with regard to money and banking. Let it be known." It has been sniped at, it has been pulled at, and, frankly, what have we got? Oh, the chartered banks' operations work rather well, but I invite the hon. minister to go into Montreal, Toronto, Calgary, Edmonton or Vancouver—I think I have named the five principal financial centres in the country—to see the foreign banks operating, from one extent—the suitcase operators—all the way through to the 15 or 18 branches of the Bank of America in Newfoundland, not under the name of the Bank of America but the First America.

● (2030)

[Translation]

What do we say about the Bank of Paris in Montreal, Calgary and maybe elsewhere?

And what do we say about the Bank of The Netherlands and the Bank of Switzerland in Montreal? Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the operations of those people.

[English]

One of my colleagues is going to talk about the financing of heavy construction equipment and the foreign bank agency which was the only one which was able to take it on because it quoted a lower price. That is competition, and a number of managers in our chartered banks have told me they were beat out on this deal or that deal by representatives of foreign banking interests. The problem there is that neither side is protected. It is the black market of finance. Neither is the foreign banking operator protected by supervision, and particularly by the representatives from the left who seem to think that everything has to be on the tabletop so they can examine all the guts. I do not know what visceral satisfaction they get out of it, but they cannot see the operations of these foreign banking interests.

Our Canadian clients are not protected. You do not know what sort of deal they are in, and when I look at foreign banking interests and talk to them, as I have done with the Swiss, I ask, "What protection have you got here? You are not under any act. You do not have section 88. You have nothing except taking action in one of our courts against possibly a man of straw".

"Yes", they say, and I say, "All right, and how does that affect your interest rate?"

"Well, we protect ourselves against that". So therefore where do you think bridging loans or factoring gets to except at higher interest rates, which are a protection against risk? And who supports the bottom line? The Canadian enterpriser, who has to resort to that. And who then picks up the real bottom line but the Canadian consumer?

This policy with regard to banking is about as stupid, illogical and unenlightened as our energy policy, where we subsidize Canadians to buy more of our disappearing energy resources so that we depend upon more foreign offshore resources on which we pay subsidies. Out of whose pocket? The Canadian. Talk about lunacy and idiocy! The Canadian economy has been put through the wringer of lunacy during the past few years on this particular score. It is the Canadian consumer who is paying for it all the way through, and now we are asking for a continuation. It is not quite so expensive. We are not spending $3.5 billion to subsidize the consumption of foreign oil at the expense of Canadians and Canadian companies—western Canadian companies primarily—and to subsidize United States tourists who daily fill up foreign air carriers which tank up.

Here are a few million dollars or a few hundred million dollars. Here is more, but it all adds up to a policy that is equivalent to that of the old Roman empires. Give the mobs bread and circuses, and they will elect you; until the Roman mob ate up the Roman emperors. We are doing it.

I want a banking system which will take care of the needs of Canadians financially. I want there to be Canadian merchant bankers. I want our chartered banks to be strong, and not just here in Canada. I want them to be able to go abroad without penalty and on the basis of reciprocity. We cannot expect other than that, but why hamstring our people? We have a Canadian characteristic that if a Canadian operation is satisfactory and making money, the best thing to do is to go out and hamstring it, either through the tax system or some other way. We have that niggardly spirit when it comes to our Canadian presence.

I am not going to point the political finger, but I can assure you that every step that is taken to penalize the initiative of Canadian corporate businesses or individuals is in the direction of giving the outsider encouragement and strength. In so far as the Canadian individual is concerned, he is condemned to ulcers, high blood pressure and worry, and then the ultimate knacker's axe because that is the way we consider Canadian initiative and enterprise, that is the way our tax system is designed.

People complain about the loopholes that apply to foreign corporations. God, I wish they would turn their attention to the damage that they do to our Canadian enterprise. Therefore I say that in so far as our Canadian banks and trust companies are concerned, and here I include federations and the credit unions because they have now reached the stage—I want to talk to them about their chartered bank which has its headquarters in my home city—they draw their funds in part from pension funds and credit unions. That is the Canadian Commercial. Then there is the Northland branch which is, frankly, a far more overt outlet into the banking field of funds accumulated by the federations and the other groupings of credit unions. That is where real money is made. Those two banks, in the discussion of whose charters I participated, are good money makers, and so is the Bank of British Columbia, once we got the government of British Columbia off it. They are good and they are doing the job. They are three out of the four which have been incorporated since 1968. I appeal to hon. members in the House that we do not put unnatural hobbles on our financial system.

We are going to be able to consider a lot of amendments in the committee, I trust, but I do not see that many changes between this bill and the bill that was before us in December. Yes, there are a few changes, for instance, foreign banks having to go to cabinet—their minister having to go to cabinet—in order to establish another branch. That is nonsense. It is the Inspector General who should look after this. Why do you hire a watchdog and then do your own barking? Cabinet is too busy and has too many things on its plate, and it is ill-qualified by reason of the complexity of the work that it faces to be able to arrive at the right decision.

Let us say the Bank of America, which has many branches in Newfoundland, wants to establish another one in Nova Scotia in a shopping mall or in one of the major towns. Does it have to come to cabinet here? What utter nonsense! Let us take the case of Barclay's or the First National Bank of Seattle with its branch in Edmonton. It wants to establish another branch in Calgary. Why should it have to come to cabinet? That is one of the things we want to talk about in committee. It will require the mere change of one word, but the government went against the opinion of the committee on this.

There are some other matters about which we want to talk. I want to mention the fact that 8 per cent of Canadian assets of Canadian banks is the ceiling beyond which foreign banks cannot penetrate. What is so magical about 8 per cent? The committee proposed 10 per cent. I saw the government's reasoning in this regard, and, frankly, I do not buy it. We are not legislating for today with inflation at this high level, and we are not legislating for yesterday. Again we have this foolish nonsense of containment. Le me say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that we are legislating for the next 15 to 20 years. Why do we limit ourselves?

The Inspector General of Banks is the watchdog for government, and, thank goodness, in this act he is finally being given an active role. In the previous act—and I complained about it—he was the mere recipient of reports, a toothless dog. He admitted it, but the government of the day would not do a damn thing about it. Now, thank goodness, we have a more activist concept in the role of the Inspector General of Banks. In part we are meeting a social need. I am not one who believes that every group of self-appointed consumer activists should have the right to sit on the board of a bank or on the Canadian Payments Association. Gracious me, they do not realize that the chaos and the delays they cause ultimately add up to $2 on the bottom line where $1 had been the price before, but it gives them some self-satisfaction! Perhaps they love to see it in the headlines, I do not know, but it does not go that way.

Now I come to the question of incorporation. Until now it has been necessary to incorporate through a private bill. In many instances that is tough, but let me assure you that in the case of the Continental Bank, which is IEC's application, thank God it had to go through the sieve in the Commons committee. Our friends across the way, on the recommendation of the then inspector general of banks, allowed this through, with which I disagreed, and I am not recognized as a leftwinger in this House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: I found some things in that application that were absolutely repulsive, such as, for instance, that four directors of the Royal Bank were going to be directors of the Continental Bank. There was a whole bunch of things. Of course we sent them peddling their fish very quickly. My colleague from Nova Scotia says I must not peddle fish. The act was cleaned up, and I am glad to say that the Continental Bank is well launched today and in operation. I wish it every success in the world.

● (2050)

That pointed out the validity of an examination of the explanation by the Commons committee. If it had been passed merely on the examination by the Inspector General of Banks of the day with a recommendation to somebody, as he recommended to our colleagues in the Senate, we would have ended up with a Frankenstein monster.

It is now proposed that the letters patent route shall be used involving the Department of the Secretary of State and then the Inspector General of Banks. However, anybody and everybody can comment on such an application, but the Inspector General is not authorized to hold public hearings to obtain the pros and cons.

Any branch of the public service is the creation of legislation and holds only those powers granted to it by statute. The Inspector General cannot hold public hearings on the application of a bank. Anyone could comment, make smears, or we could even have an application such as the original Continental Bank application, yet the Inspector General has no power to receive representations in making an examination.

My colleagues on this side of the House and a sufficient number from the government side agreed with me on this point and we made such a recommendation in our committee report. Lo and behold, that has been one of the most sterile recommendations made.

The Inspector General of Banks must have the power to hold public hearings and to examine representations being made in respect of the incorporation of any bank, and in respect of the registration of any foreign bank. Surely that is fundamental. I can assure you, Mr. Minister, if my colleagues and I do not get our way in this regard, the passage of this bill will be a lot slower. We insist that there shall be the right of public examination, as we had under the parliamentary route, and we insist that there shall not be the quiet bureaucratic route.

The present Inspector General might well be the man who would want to do this the most, but he does not have the power to do so. His powers are defined by statute, and if the power is not defined there he cannot do it. I see the minister nodding his head and I assume he has taken note of my point. I would commend it to him as I am sure we are going to hear a great deal more in the future about the incorporation of banks.

I do not want to talk at length about co-operatives, as my colleague from Winnipeg will do so, but there are certain restrictions imposed upon co-operatives. I do not think that co-operatives today, whether combined or in any other form, should have the right to have directors on the board of a bank. The members of any other financial institution do not have that right to be directors of a bank.

The committee made recommendations to tidy up this aspect of the act. I hope to meet with representatives of co-operative societies in the next few days. I hope they do not misunderstand my point of view in this regard. I want to treat co-operatives as mature financial institutions, which they are. If they want to participate in the Canadian Payments Association, along with the big boys, they are going to behave like big boys. They insist that bank directors shall not be directors of trust or mortgage companies. The same should apply to directors of co-operative federations. Co-operative federations are financial organizations and their members cannot be directors of banks. What special status do they claim? Certainly the director of a federally incorporated trust company cannot be a director of a bank, and I agree with that principle. That must also be so in respect of the directors of co-operative federations such as caisses populaires and credit unions.

I have another bone that sticks in my craw. Why must Le Mouvement Desjardins own 25 per cent, or perhaps 27 per cent, of the share capital of the Banque Provinciale, when no other shareholder in the world is allowed to own more than 10 per cent of the shares of any of our chartered banks?

The bill provides for a grandfather clause. I would go much further than the hon. member on the other side on a personal basis. I do not want a grandfather clause. Le Mouvement Desjardins must be subject to the same treatment as the Dutch bank and the Mercantile. They should reduce their interest over a period of years because we cannot have this type of situation.

[Translation]

What does that mean now, the Mouvement Desjardins in the new National Bank? I am not familar with the distribution of shares but what does their proportion of 25 per cent to 27 per cent and here I am not entirely certain about their share in the Banque Provinciale—what does it mean, "in the National Bank?" Remember the National Bank is no longer the Banque Provinciale active only in Quebec but perhaps the bordering areas of Ontario, but in my riding there are branches of the National Bank which eventually would have reopened links with the French-speaking communities in our western cities for the former Bank Canadian National. So, Mr. Speaker, we need to have justice here. I said justice—no, rather equality. In committee I will be moving an amendment to the act on the proportion of shares of a bank owned by a federation or any co-operative movement. After all, they would be the first one to object to a bank or a trust company having by any means 25 or 27 per cent equity in a co-operative movement. Those people are not kids. And I do not want to see them subjected to a floor or ceiling because the co-operative movement and the caisse populaires were set up primarily to fill a gap. There was healthy expansion and now they are very serious people. All the better for them but we have reached a point where the rules of conduct are the same for everyone except that they do not have the rights of the chartered banks nor do they have their responsibilities.

• (2100)

[English]

I see that the Inspector General of Banks has delivered his undertaking to the committee that there shall be adequate provision, in section 156(4), for the storage of computer data so as not to hamstring a great number of Canadian operators in this field. I think that the amendment which he has put forward is quite satisfactory. The committee simply said, "To define this precisely is impossible." They simply said that the presence of the data shall be disclosed to the inspector general and shall be readily accessible to him at all times, whether or not it is in the United States in data banks of a peculiar nature that cannot be duplicated, simply because we do not have the financial resources. The operations are too big. There are only two in North America. However, if the Inspector General of Banks knows where the data is and has access to it, then fine, because all the banks will agree on the matter. I would think that the provision has been adequate.

I do not wish to talk at great length about leasing. It is a subject that has excited a great deal of interest on both sides of the House. All I will simply say is that I think that, notwithstanding the regulations published in October, we have already seen efforts by some of the chartered banks, and presumably successfully, to get around the situation. The idea of the banks engaging in the business of leasing passenger vehicles and trucks up to a certain commercial weight will not fly, period. There is plenty of scope in the big ticket items because there is no way that we will continue that parody of earlier years, where people who are buying big ticket items were having to finance them through American financial institutions or having to go to the United States.

A 14½ yard front-wheel loader used in the oil business today can cost over half a million dollars a copy. One D-10 tractor is worth $650,000 in Canada today. Will we condemn our Canadian operators to leasing that equipment? In many instances it pays a great deal more to finance through a leasing agreement than having to purchase such a unit. If we throw the baby out with the bath water and prohibit the banks from engaging in leasing operations, we will merely drive Canadians who require this kind of equipment to financing through American resources and that, to me, has to be the height of stupidity.

I can agee with regard to ordinary automobiles and trucks up to a certain weight. I believe that the automobile dealers, the banks and the government, will ultimately agree on a ceiling figure. It may be 18,000 pounds, 9,000 kilos or so many tonnes capacity, but not a dollar value. Those unroad vehicles shall be limited to dealers to finance. They have done a good job. I can see where some of the abuses are coming up with regard to some of the projected operations of the chartered banks. That is enough on that field.

I would like to turn now to a last item because I wish my colleague from Mississauga to have an opportunity to address the House. It is believed that there is a grandfather situation right here, that there is no way that we can tell any foreign bank to get out of the country, providing, Mr. Minister, that the country of its domicile is prepared to enter into reciprocal agreements with us. The reciprocal agreement is the bottom line. There are many Japanese interests that want to enter into Toronto and western Canada, but Canadian banks, which have been knocking on the door of Japan for many years, must be able to enter on a reciprocal basis.

[Translation]

It is the same, but I believe that things are going rather well in France and also reasonably well in Switzerland. In Germany as well things are going fine because certain Canadian banks have purchased German banks and we have common interests. In the United States, the situation can vary; certain states are somewhat more difficult than others, but in general, things are going well.

However, as concerns other countries, I believe that if we developed this question of mutual interests among equals and if the inspector general were in a position to make a request in this regard and present a recommendation to the minister—and I do say a recommendation to the minister because I recognize that this must be done at the ministerial level—it is quite possible—and I have no doubt that my colleague from Esquimalt-Saanich shares my views on this subject—that financial relations would have an impact on foreign affairs. Therefore, there could be liaison at the ministerial level between external affairs and the Minister of Finance.

In this regard, I believe that the activity should remain at the ministerial level and not go any higher because in issues of this type we need flexibility instead of rigidity and all kinds of orders and regulations.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Simmons: I am especially interested and, indeed, intrigued by what the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr.

Lambert) said a few moments ago about the need, in his view, to define—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Is the hon. parliamentary secretary raising a point of order?

Mr. Simmons: No, I was going to raise a question, Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. member yielded to my request to put a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. parliamentary secretary should realize that he may put his question and receive his answer with the unanimous consent of the House and consent of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Simmons: I was saying that I was quite interested in what the hon. member for Edmonton West had to say about the need to define "bank" and to have a definition in the legislation. The hon. member will agree, I am sure, that the bill before us is almost identical to Bill C-14, introduced by his colleagues in the Tory administration last fall. In view of the fact that they are so identical, will the hon. member for Edmonton West tell the House, and me in particular, if the lack of a definiton of "bank" is as glaring an omission as he says it is, and would he tell the House if he made this point then as well as he has tonight? Did he make it as eloquently then to his Tory colleagues when they were drafting Bill C-14? If he did, then did they subscribe to his logic? If they did not, could he indicate to the House why that was the case?

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to answer that. I did raise the question. I am not going to disclose in what endearing terms I couched my criticism. May I say, however, that I do not think it was in terms any more constrained than I would have made to the present Minister of Finance. Perhaps the hon. member does not know me, but if I am going to call someone an s.o.b. on one side of the House I will call—

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Lambert: Come on! The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) should sit down. If I am going to call anyone in those terms—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I allowed the question and I am perhaps sorry to say that the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has raised a point of order.

An hon. Member: He thought he heard his name taken in vain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have to recognize the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, my only question is about the term s.o.b. I think the interpretation of that expression is quite well known and would be unparliamentary.

An hon. Member: Withdraw!

Mr. Lambert: I want to tell the young hon. member for Ottawa Centre that in the department of defence an s.o.b. is known as a "substitute order of battle".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair does not mind these interruptions as long as hon. members accept the fact that there ought to be some order in the proceedings. If the hon. member for Edmonton West wants to go on with his definition, that is up to him, but in due course I shall have to rule one or the other or both out of order.

Mr. Lambert: I think the hon. member for Ottawa Centre recognizes that he was entirely out of order. I will give him another definition of s.o.b. As my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) says, it is "serene old boy".

An hon. Member: Quit while you are behind.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the Bank Act. I do not care who was on the receiving end of the criticism. It is constructive criticism, and it is well-known criticism. I am satisfied that it was received in the spirit it was given—on a constructive basis. I am satisfied that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), when he was minister of finance in a former government, received this type of criticism from me in the spirit in which it was offered. I trust that the Minister of Finance today will receive the suggestion in the same way, and I think the hon. member need not worry on that score.

I shall continue my speech, Mr. Speaker, and if I have time at the end, I shall answer the hon. member.

Mr. Simmons: One further question—

Mr. Lambert: No. I want to leave time for one of my colleagues, and I have just a few minutes left.

The last point I wish to make concerns the Canadian Payments Association. It is a new departure, and I am not personally satisfied as to its import. I have a feeling that it is just another facet of the interventionist philosophy of this government. I think that is because the Canadian Payments Association will be under the chairmanship of some employee of the Bank of Canada, named by the Bank of Canada. How else could they get their finger in the pie? Until the present time the Canadian Payments Association or a clearing system has worked very well through the chartered banks. As a former employee of a bank I know that no system is any more strictly policed than it is. One of the difficulties is that the near banks have to clean up their act. Their administration is sloppy; that is why they are cavilling against some of the strictures of the clearing association.

If the idea is to substitute the Canadian Clearing Association so that some of the near banks feel that they can pay the cost of participation in clearing on their own account and can meet their responsibilities, that is fine, they have matured. At the time of the committee hearings, however, it was our information that not one of the organizations, apart from the chartered banks was prepared to enter into the clearing system as independents, yet they wanted seats on the board of directors. I simply say that if they want a role in the policy determination of an organization, they should pay their dues and assume their responsibilities. There is no free ride for these things. I have an intimation that there are some of the near banks which in the last three years have now grown to a point where they are prepared to come in. Fine, we will see. I hope this will come up.

● (2120)

In closing this particular stage of my intervention with regard to the Bank Act, basically I commend this act to this House. There are some difficulties in some of the provisions. I think I have made the House aware of some of them. I trust we can get a flexibility on the part of the administration where it will be prepared to accept amendments. This is one of the biggest problems with the Canadian committee system that ministers enter committees with their minds made up: thou shalt not yield one inch. Of course, it makes a mockery of the whole operation. The opposition are not out to do dirt to the administration of Canadian affairs. If we have a good idea, and God knows government does not have a monopoly on good ideas, but whether a good idea comes from the New Democrats or whether a good idea comes from this side for an amendment to the legislation, then a sensible minister should be prepared to accept it.

I hope that I have been pretty strong in some of my criticism tonight but may I assure the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), and the Minister of Finance that I and my colleagues on this side, in so far as the Bank Act is concerned, are motivated by the best interests of the country at large.

In closing I ask: will the ministry please at this stage consider the calling of a royal commission on banking and financial institutions at the earliest possible date? The Hon. John Turner accepted my proposal personally in 1972 but he could not get his colleagues to agree. The net result is that we have been legislating for the manufacturing of horse collars. Let us legislate the next time around—I do not expect that I will be here, but the good Lord might inflict me on you—

Some hon. Members: We will be here.

Mr. Lambert: —but let this House be in a position the next time it is considering the Bank Act to base its consideration upon a fulsome document based on the requirements of this country for the next 25 years, and not merely to shore up the deficiencies of the past, put up containing fences, and therefore do half a job.

I thank the House for its consideration in hearing me for this rather lengthy period, but may I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if there has been anything that has been near to my heart all these years in this House of Commons, it is having proper banking and financial legislation. We are far from it now, but God willing we will get to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this particular bill. As I mentioned in my question to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I was rather intrigued by his comments on the need for a definition of banking in the legislation. I listened for some time, indeed throughout his entire speech, hoping that we would hear from him, with his undoubted knowledge in the area, something by way of his version of the definition; in other words, what it ought to be in his view. Of course, we did not hear it.

It is very easy to point the finger and talk about what is wrong with something. It is a little more difficult, and it requires a little more responsibility to offer an alternative. I heard no alternatives in the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton West during the past hour or so. He did admit in responding to my question a few moments ago that he had no more success, that his batting average was as abysmally poor with the Tory minister of finance as it was with the former Liberal minister of finance, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), and as abysmally poor, I assure him, as it is going to be with the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

In the very eloquent statements made by the hon. member for Edmonton West there are a few glaring holes and a few weaknesses in the arguments that need to be addressed. When the hon. member calls so piously for a definition to be incorporated in the act, he does not pursue it. He does not analyse what some of the ramifications will be.

Mr. Lambert: Do you want me to go for another hour?

Mr. Simmons: Not particularly, I say to the hon. member. But if in that hour we could get a definition, then at least that hour would be much more profitable than the last hour and a half. I invite him to speak. I am prepared to suspend the rules if other members will. I invite him to get up if he has a definition.

An hon. Member: Enough is enough.

Mr. Simmons: I agree enough is enough, but a little suffering, as my friend from St. John's says, is short-term pain for long-term gain, and I suppose we could endure him for another hour if it meant that we got a definition that has eluded us and eluded legislators for 110 years.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Have you got it?

Mr. Simmons: Not only has he got it, Mr. Speaker, but he hoards it. He will not give it to us. Second, he may well be prepared to—I would hope indeed that he is prepared to—but he is not giving us his point of view in terms of what some of the ramifications will be.

For example, I ask him the question what will be the implications if we incorporate in the Bank Act a definition, as he advocates, for the trust companies? Does he want to throw the trust companies, the caisses populaires in Quebec, the credit unions, into chaos? Does he want now, by bringing into the Bank Act a definition of banking, to remove the provincial jurisdiction as it relates to trust companies, credit unions, caisses populaires? Is that what he is saying? If so, I hope his leader is listening. Because what he is saying in effect is that in matters of banking, in matters relating to credit unions, caisses populaires and trust companies, he wants to fly in the face of the stated policy of his party of giving it all away to the provinces. On this one he wants to do an about face. He does not want to pursue the stated and demonstrated policies of his leader and his party of giving more and more to the provinces, to the point where one wonders if the Tory administration had existed in power for another year or so if we would have had anything left to call a federation.

I wonder if at times when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, if they ever grasped the difference between a common market—a free association of a number of states for economic reasons—the difference between a common market and a federation. What they were talking about and demonstrating on a number of points had nothing to do with a federal system whatsoever.

• (2130)

Now there is a peep of hope, a little glimmer from the hon. member from Edmonton West. He tells us all is not lost in the Tory party, at least in the matter of banking, trust companies, caisses populaires and credit unions. He wants the Tory party to step back from the brink, to become a little more centralist. He wants the Tory party to remove from provincial jurisdiction their present ability to give life to licence, to authorize the operation of caisses populaires and credit unions. He wants to do away with that.

He wants to put a definition of banking in the act that would in effect have the federal power, as provided for in the BNA Act in our constitution, have the federal power declared in effect as it is in the words of the constitution right now. That is what he is advocating. That perhaps is one of the very good reasons why he really skirted the issue and never did talk about a definition.

Mr. Lambert: Come to the committee and I will talk to you.

Mr. Simmons: I will be glad to talk to the hon. member in Committee. I promise him I will be there. He may not remember, but he and I talked a couple of years ago in August when we tripped up to Fort MacMurray during the parliamentary conference. He and I had a good conversation then about a number of matters. I got some insight into the tar sands, thanks to him. I am sure if I talk to him I will get a fair amount of insight into banking. I will not assure the hon. member I will listen to everything he says. I may not agree with all he says, but I will do something more than his colleague just behind him is doing. I will listen to him. I will at least listen to what he is saying.

That is more than the Tory party did to him when they were in power and when they were drafting Bill C-14. They might have listened, but they did not heed very much. They might have listened. Courtesy knows some real strains. One has to do a lot in the name of courtesy. Did they heed the advice? If so, I say to the hon. member for Edmonton West, where is the proof? I invite him to dig up Bill C-14 introduced by the Tories last fall during that mercifully brief period they were in power. Dig it up.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member knows that the bill that was introduced by the former minister of finance—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, of course I will permit a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Lambert: If hon. gentlemen would not close their ears, I ask the hon. member did he compare the bill presented by the hon. member from Shawinigan, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), when he was minister of finance, with the bill that was presented in December by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and then take as abridged the committee report, and he will see that the Conservative bill accepted 80 per cent of the recommendations of the committee of the House? Then he may ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who is the inspiration for most of the changes in the original bill as represented by the committee report—my colleagues and I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to respond to the question, such as it was. I heard the hon. member ask, among other things, whether I had compared the bill of the now Minister of Justice which he sponsored as minister of finance in 1976 with Bill C-14 of the Tory administration last December. I say to the gentleman from Edmonton West that in 1976 I was so terribly busy in the Newfoundland House of Assembly trying to keep his now colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, straight, that I frankly admit that, no, I did not compare the two pieces of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: That was in 1978.

Mr. Simmons: I am here just barely. I was here a few days in December and seven days after "you shut her down on me". I have been here fourteen days as of tonight in this session, twice as long. I just want to give my friend a chance to hear himself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary has the floor. Would he continue with his speech?

Mr. Simmons: I cannot tell the hon. member for Edmonton West who was the inspiration. I can tell him I had a chat with the Solicitor General and I know who was not the inspiration, but that is another issue. This bill before the House compares almost identically to Bill C-14 which the Tories introduced in December, almost identically.

Mr. Rose: Are you proud of that?

Mr. Simmons: What I want to know from the hon. member for Edmonton West, if he suggests that he indeed was the inspiration, is why his inspiring argument about definitions for banking did not get through to the Tory minister of finance. To hear him talk tonight, that seems to be the central problem with our banking legislation, a lack of definition. I hope in time he will provide the House with an answer to that particular question.

My friends in the instant solution party—

Mr. Rose: Nice to see you recover.

Mr. Simmons: That is more than I can say for the hon. member. My friend in the party of instant solutions scoffs because there are a lot of similarities in the two bills.

Mr. Rose: I didn't.

Mr. Simmons: I said almost identical.

Mr. Rose: You are damn right.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Simmons: This bill does take into account most of the considerations of the House committee and Senate committee. We have heard in the last two or three years all kinds of representations on the white papers and the previous revisions of the act. There has been exhaustive consultation, negotiation and modification. As the hon. member for Edmonton West says, he was an integral part of that consultation. He was on that particular committee. He provided a very important voice on that committee.

I come for a moment to the question of foreign banks. It should be pointed out, when we talk about foreign banks, that they are not under federal control as such because we have not asserted our power which is in the constitution with respect to banking; banking is clearly a federal area of jurisdiction. They are operating in Canada, but they are not under federal control. They are under provincial control.

The Bank Act, to which we are proposing revisions tonight, will ensure uniform federal control without, at the same time, I say to the hon. member for Edmonton West, cutting the legs under trust companies, caisses populaires and credit unions. That is not nor will it be our policy. We will listen to the hon. member for Edmonton West, but we will not follow his advice on that matter. We cannot afford to do so. We will not cut the legs under the credit unions and trust companies. We shall not do it no matter how eloquently, how loudly, how endlessly he talks.

This revision will have the effect of increasing banking competition, and I believe it will lead to better service for business borrowers. It will mean that our banks will have access to foreign markets. I hope everyone in this House is proud of the degree to which the Canadian banking system, because of its stability, because of its international recognition—

● (2140)

Mr. Skelly: Loans to Cuba!

Mr. Prud'homme: I do not think they are proud of them over there.

Mr. Simmons: Well, I am proud that our banks are providing leadership around the world. I don't expect the socialists to be proud of it, though. In fact I have yet to find very much that they are proud of. They are so busy knocking everything that they have no time, anyway, and if they are not knocking things they are advancing instant solutions to things—tonight, the interest rate, tomorrow, inflation or something else.

An hon. Member: You have said that before.

Mr. Simmons: Yes, and I want to say it again because it takes a little time for the people I am talking about to understand it.

Mr. Blaikie: You have learned nothing in 113 years.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, allow me abjectly to apologize for all my sins in the last 113 years. Now the hon. member wants me to carry on my shoulders all the problems of the last 113 years. Talk about instant solutions!

An hon. Member: You never change.

Mr. Simmons: We change, Mr. Speaker. We have changed in Newfoundland. We rooted out the socialists down there. We did the same thing in Nova Scotia, and we are going to do it out west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Your speech was funny the first time I heard it.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member was awake the first time he heard it.

Mr. Knowles: This is the third time. It is losing its punch.

Mr. Prud'homme: How did you remain here for so long?

Mr. Simmons: I thank the hon. member for coming back so often to hear me. He likes it so much that this is the third time, he says.

This legislation allows easier access into the banking system. I believe it will lead to greater competition and that it will allow existing financial intermediaries to widen their scope and compete more effectively in the marketplace. Do hon. members of the socialist party say this should not be the case, that these financial intermediaries should not have wider scope and be able to compete? Are they against that, now?

Mr. Prud'homme: Of course. They are against everything.

An hon. Member: Clarify that.

Mr. Simmons: There are many aspects of the bill which commend themselves to the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mention some of them.

Mr. Simmons: For example, the provisions dealing with leasing. The proposed legislation calls for leasing to be restricted to the equivalent of credit. I am told this will satisfy the auto dealers and others who have expressed concern over this matter. I am sure all members have received representations from the auto dealers' lobby across the country.

Then again, the question of the disclosure of consumer transactions is addressed positively in the legislation. This is another provision which I commend to hon. members. I agree that the federal regulations ought to be as strong as the provincial legislation in matters of banking or, in the case of the provinces, of near banks. Extensive federal-provincial consultations on this subject have been going on for some time. There has been a good dialogue, and I do not want to see progress of this kind destroyed by such hare-brained schemes as we heard tonight from the hon. member for Edmonton West. I do not think anybody in his party subscribes to his suggestion that we assert power federally to the point at which we place in jeopardy the whole of the near-banking operation which is now proceeding under provincial licence and jurisdiction.

The policy we prefer is one of consultation rather than railroading. This does not mean acquiescence. The former prime minister equated consultation with acquiescence. Consultation does admit to the possibility of disagreement, but it is consultation nevertheless. Had the right hon. gentleman learned the lesson that there was a difference between consultation and acquiescence we would not find ourselves in the mess which exists today in terms of the Loto Canada arrangements, for example.

We recognize that as this process of consultation with the provinces continues and brings about further resolution and benefits, there will be need for further modification in the regulations made under the Bank Act. That is why, in the wisdom of the draftsmen, certain latitude is left to the regulations. This has to be done in legislation of this sort which comes up for review after a fixed term. There is all the more need, then, for flexibility in making the regulations.

Mr. Speaker, I rose mainly because I felt the House was being misled, not deliberately, I admit, on a very important point, namely, the need for a definition. If one is going to address himself to an area as complex as that, he at least owes it to the House to give hon. members an inkling of the implications involved. I hope that in the course of this debate we shall hear from various members on that point.

● (2150)

I hope the opposition House leader will tell us why the administration of which he was a part rejected what appears to be a very logical suggestion from his colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West. I invite the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to rise in his place and give us the benefit of his knowledge on this subject.

Mr. Whelan: That won't take long.

Mr. Simmons: Finally, I commend the provisions of this bill to hon. members. I hope we can put to bed very soon the entire subject of a definition of banking or, if not put to bed, at least keep it awake and alive in some sensible framework.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

I am intrigued by the instant knowledge of the hon. parliamentary secretary of this legislation, but has he examined the testimony of almost all of the witnesses who were questioned on the point of the definition of banking, and has he studied their answers? I would say they were 99.9 per cent in agreement with me, and there were some definitions worked on, but I am prepared to work—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked his question. He has previously been recognized.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, first I will respond to the hon. member's preamble in which he lauded my instant knowledge. I thank him for that. Second, I will tell him that I do not have and do not profess to have very much expertise on banking or banking legislation. If we in this House get to the point where the only people who can rise on an issue are those who are recognized experts in their particular fields, we are going to have a pretty sterile debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: What I do bring to this debate—and I defend my right to do so—is the concern of ordinary Canadians I represent that the banking legislation we put through this chamber be the kind that can serve them best, and for that reason I make no apologies to the hon. member for Edmonton West for the kind of knowledge I have about banking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member asked me if I have examined the transcripts and the questions put to the witnesses, and their answers. He also asked me whether I am in agreement. No, he said it another way. He asked if I knew that some 90 per cent were in agreement with him. Here is my response to his question, in two parts: The first part of the answer is no, I have not read the transcript. I do not know what it says, and I probably would not understand it if I did read it. That is number one.

Number two, and more important, if the hon. member listened to me carefully he would not have heard me imply that I was even in disagreement with him on the need for a definition of banking. I do not quarrel with him on that subject. All I invite him to do is tell the whole story, and if he is going to advocate what sounds just like motherhood, namely, that there ought to be a definition, I agree with him that there ought to be, and nobody in this House would disagree on that. There ought to be a definition. Of course there ought to be. All I have done is to invite him to tell the whole story.

If the hon. member advocates a definition, he should at least give some of the reasons why, for 110 years, we have not been able to get a definition. I also invite him to tell the House what the implications of putting that definition in the act would be.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I have a question. Since the hon. member's time has elapsed, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Simmons: Sure.

Mr. Rose: I was very interested in the mea culpa of the hon. member who just spoke and in his loud defence of ignorance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member ask his question, please.

Mr. Rose: The hon. member spoke in defence of the legislation now before us, and I agree with him that our party—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Rose: The House is committed to the lay examination of any legislation before it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Rose: I wonder if I could repeat my question, please.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Simmons: It was a good question, anyway.

An hon. Member: What is the answer?

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of remarks to make, but preliminary to what I would like to say in this session on this bill I remind hon. members that this bill has been before this House on a number of occasions. In the Thirtieth Parliament Bill C-15 was analysed in detail by a committee of this House. That committee held innumerable meetings and finally came up with a report in March of 1979. Ten members of that committee are no longer members of Parliament. There have been two federal elections since that time, and consequently there are a number of new people in this House, perhaps particularly from the New Democratic Party—although I do not speak on their behalf—who will want to question people and go over the evidence which was taken by the committee in the Thirtieth Parliament.

It is important in a matter of banking legislation that we do not forever hash and rehash, just because there is a change in the make-up of Parliament, evidence which was brought before committees. I think it is important when we consider this bill in committee that, before we even think of calling witnesses, every member of Parliament on the committee review the testimony already heard by a committee of Parliament on a bill very similar to this one, Bill C-15, so that we do not waste the time of Parliament and of the people of Canada going over old straw.

Before I get to a number of things I want to say, I remind hon. members that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) earlier today indicated an attitude on the part of the New Democratic Party which I thought was less than fair to this piece of legislation. He indicated that the banks have grown awfully rich. He said they doubled their profits between 1969 and 1979. Well, of course they have. We have had more than double inflation. The value of a dollar is considerably less today, less than half of what it was in 1969. Of course profits would have to be more than doubled, just to stay even. Members of the New Democratic Party know as well as anyone else that the profits of the major banks have in fact declined in the past year.

Mr. Blaikie: Not true.

Mr. Blenkarn: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood said this act should deal with interest rates. The hon. member knows full well that there is an Interest Act in our statutes. That Interest Act should be replaced. It should be amended. Many things should be done with respect to interest rates and the definition of interest, but certainly that is not a question which is properly in a bank act which is, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said, a charter for banks. That is another issue the New Democratic Party has been trying to flail before this House as an indication that it should stand in objection to a statute which, depending on the ability of our financial institutions to build the stability of our country, needs to be passed.

Finally, and even more important, the New Democratic Party came up with the proposition that because one of the chartered banks, in the opinion of a labour board, was unfair to its employees, this legislation should be blocked as a form of secondary boycott, as so often happens in labour relations matters, to hold up the business of Parliament, to hold up the financial arrangements of this country, and to damage the interests of depositors and of everyone. The secondary boycott concept is the kind of proposition that I was embarrassed to hear coming from the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, for whom normally I have a high respect. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—OVER-THE-SIDE SALE TO FOREIGN FISHING FLEETS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) on April 28 concerning the ramifications of over-the-side sales of fish. I consider this to be a topic of sufficient interest and I would like to pursue it further this evening.

First of all I would like to say to the parliamentary secretary—I do not see the minister here tonight—that I would be the first to concede that not all over-the-side sales of fish products are bad, but it is very important, to use a phrase coined by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), in the financial sense, not to sacrifice long-term gain for short-term pain.

I would like to explore with the minister or his representative the possible ramifications of what could happen if the concept of over-the-side sales of fish is not proceeded with very carefully. Not all over-the-side sales are bad. There are many situations where the quality of fish cannot be maintained unless frozen at sea. Examples of species which fall into this category are: mackerel, silver hake, and argentine. If we, as Canadians, wish to participate in these fisheries, we will have to freeze at sea, since local plants cannot process the fish or handle the volume that can be caught. In this situation, over-the-side sales are justified. However, if over-the-side sales are used as a price fixing mechanism, which could be the case, it could lead to a disruption in the Canadian fishing industry. Let me explain.

As I understand it, there are guarantees being paid to Joint Trawlers Limited for mackerel at 12.3 cents per pound or $270 per ton, which must be one of the highest prices paid anywhere in the world for this type of product. This could ensure that Canadian processors who wish to develop the finished product and get into the world market for mackerel cannot compete. Since there is a tremendous market in Germany for smoked and canned mackerel, the Canadian industry could get into this market if it could purchase mackerel at a realistic price, having regard to general world market conditions.

Under the present policy we may have difficulty in developing our own capacity to process mackerel. However, there is a catch 22 involved here as well because, as I understand it, the federal Department of Fisheries is attempting to develop an off-shore purse seine fishery for mackerel in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They do not want the small boat fishermen to complain about the development of this fishery. It is possible that they do not want any large factory freezer-trawlers in the gulf as they feel the offshore fishery would lead to less fish coming inshore. This is just another consideration.

Over-the-side sales to factory freezer-trawlers is a demonstration of the need—and this is one of the main points of our Canadian fishing industry. We need these vessels to get into quality markets, and once we are into these markets we can bring into the world market some of our lesser quality fish. World markets in the processing industries are beginning to stabilize after the extension of jurisdiction, and unless Canada develops a capability to participate in the high quality markets, the opportunity is not going to exist forever and we may have great difficulties later, which is what I meant when I spoke about sacrificing short-term gain for long-term pain.

In summary, I believe that a couple of points should be made for the purpose of debate. As I said, we should not necessarily condemn the concept of over-the-side sales. They are only justified, I believe, when the off-shore capability is not available to handle the fish and quality cannot be maintained. I believe that such sales as a price fixing mechanism or the commensurate benefit concept, as the minister referred to it in this chamber the other day, are not necessarily the best thing for the Canadian fishing industry, and providing guarantees to foreign fishing nations or joint venture firms such as Joint Trawlers Limited could be a form of a price fixing mechanism.

In 1980 it is serving a dual purpose, perhaps, of offsetting or anticipating the complaints of inshore fishermen about off-shore catches of mackerel. If the worst comes to worst, and we do not neglect our opportunities, we can add to our Canadian fishing capability a few modern freezer trawlers. It is a fallacy to suggest that these vessels have to strain our total allowable catches or that they could not fish, if needs be, because they have the capability, far away from Canadian shores. There are other areas in the world that they can fish if they find difficulty in catching enough fish in our own quota waters. If we do not do this, the capacity Canada has to exploit the fishing markets of the world is not going to be realized.

I would like to continue these remarks with the minister on another occasion because I am sure he is aware, and he has the reputation of being aware, that there has to be a balance between the needs and opportunities of both inshore and offshore fisheries. In my own province of Nova Scotia, as I have already told the minister, there is a very great need to look at the licensing, and other considerations, that are presently existent, and to get young, capable fishermen into an area where they can not only earn a living but can do this country a great deal of good in catching and utilizing a very valuable product that is now going to foreign fleets.

It is for this reason that I open this subject tonight and invite the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, or his capable parliamentary secretary, to let us have the benefit of the justification for some of these policies that involve over-the-side sales of fish.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, regarding the direct sales arrangement in the maritimes, Joint Trawlers will provide five freezer vessels to purchase approximately 3,500 metric tons of gaspereau at a price to fishermen of seven cents per pound, and approximately 9,000 metric tons of mackerel at 12.3 cents per pound. This is an over-all increase in price of 11 per cent in the 1980 contract with Joint Trawlers compared to a similar contract in 1979.

Under the agreement with Joint Trawlers, the foreign vessels will be from countries which have a bilateral fisheries agreement with Canada. The vessels will be stationed at various times in a number of maritime ports during the next four months to purchase gaspereau and mackerel.

In return for the commitments given by Joint Trawlers, to supply five freezer vessels for a number of months and purchase the fish at a predetermined price, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has agreed, as an extension of its commensurate benefits policy, that Joint Trawlers will receive a direct allocation this year of 6,200 metric tons of species which have not been traditionally fished offshore by Canadians, including grenadier and Greenland halibut in the Davis Strait in Canadian waters, mackerel or silver hake, and a small amount of squid. No contract has yet been signed with Joint Trawlers and exact quantities of each species are still being discussed. The harvesting of this direct allocation will generate revenues of approximately $125,000 to the Government of Canada as the foreign vessels will be subject to all foreign access and fishing fees in accordance with Canadian regulations.

We cannot be absolutely certain where the fish that are the subject of this arrangement will end up being marketed but, as the offshore allocation and the inshore program are mostly composed of mackerel, it will likely be sold in east European and West African countries.

In 1979 revenue to fishermen from over-the-side sales accounted for less than 1 per cent of the total value of fish landed on the Atlantic coast. Departmental officials met at the request of the minister with processors and fishermen in the maritimes earlier this year. The processors were not prepared to make firm commitments on prices and quantities of gaspereau and mackerel. On the other hand, the offer from Joint Trawlers is for at least 9,000 metric tons of mackerel, at a price of 12.3 cents per pound. I ask hon. members to compare the alternatives. The facts speak for themselves. There are many areas in the maritime provinces—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

IMMIGRATION—TIMOTHY LEARY—ENTRY INTO CANADA—HOTEL ENGAGEMENTS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, April 21, I had occasion to ask certain questions of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) about one Timothy Leary. Mr. Leary is a citizen of the United States and was convicted of certain offences, which make him an unacceptable person to Canada unless he obtained, prior to coming to this country, permission from the minister through a minister's permit by order in council.

Apparently, Mr. Leary, through his agents and lawyer, applied for permission to come to Canada. He had previously applied on other occasions and had been turned down by previous ministers. Mr. Leary apparently applied, according to the minister's statement in reply to a question by me in this House, on April 23rd, because he wanted to come to Canada to perform in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal.

Strangely enough, Mr. Leary turned up in Winnipeg as his first port of call. The minister, unfortunately for him, is a limited partner in a hotel in Winnipeg which is managed by his brother, and the minister is responsible to the people of Canada in exercising his quasi judicial ministerial responsibility. I asked the minister a number of questions, and I was not satisfied with his answers. In one of his answeres the minister said that his officials had prepared the material. This left me with the impression, and I am sure the House as well, that instead of making the decision himself as to who should come into the country, he had left the matter in the hands of his officials.

In so doing the minister abrogated his ministerial responsibility by delegating his authority. Probably this is what happened, because I am sure that the minister, knowing him as I do, would not have deliberately exercised his authority to deliberately cause Mr. Leary to come to Canada to look after his brother's hotel. The problem, however, is the minister's, and according to the act he is responsible and not allowed to delegate his authority. Therefore he must stand responsible for what in fact has happened.

What happened was that a ministerial responsibility was exercised and clearly, a concrete explanation is necessary. It may well be properly explained in that the minister may have been deceived by his officials. If that is the case, then the minister should have no particular reason not to file the application which was originally presented in order to have Mr. Leary considered this time around for entry into Canada. Neither should the minister have any concern in tabling in the House, because this is a serious matter, the details of the application.

However, when the minister was asked in this House to table these documents on April 21, the minister refused or did not offer to file the material. On April 22 a question of privilege was raised by the minister, and there was a reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. However, that reference is not clear as to whether it refers to the Leary matter or another matter which the minister himself brought to the attention of the House with regard to certain grants paid to the same hotel with respect to employment of handicapped people. I admire the efforts that have been made in existing statutes to encourage the employment of handicapped people and of all unemployed people.

• (2215)

One of the concerns of this House must be the detail and specific requirements of section 16 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. It may be that when the legislation was drawn in 1878 the section was appropriate, but it is totally inappropriate in today's situation where all sorts of statutes of Canada provide for payment to individuals of Canada or corporations of Canada, of money from Canada. Members have been known to collect the old age pension; their wives have been known to collect baby bonuses, and members have been known to receive money for the shipment of their grain, their oil, their milk and so on. There are a number of statutes including those relating to manpower and taxes, that were never contemplated in 1878 when this section was introduced into legislation. It may well be that we need a clear definition of this in committee, and that is something to which we can look forward.

I should like to have an assurance from the minister or his representative tonight that, in addition to the matter he raised concerning handicapped people or the use of a manpower grant by the hotel in Winnipeg, he will provide details on the Leary case to the committee, and that it will be one of the principal matters before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is a question that brings up the whole problem of ministers and ministerial responsibility. I must say that I suspect the minister did not go out of his way—and I do not wish him any ill will at all—to do certain things with respect to administering his portfolio. Perhaps the burden placed on ministers under the terms of the Immigration Act is too great. The fact remains that there is a responsibility and the minister is seized with it. I think it is essential that the matter come before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at the responses already given by the minister to this question, and have only the following comments to add.

I wish to remind hon. members that it is the policy of this government to recognize freedom of expression in Canada and the free circulation of ideas.

With the realization of the good sense and maturity of the Canadian population, our government believes there is no need to inhibit the free circulation of ideas. Consequently it has been our policy to facilitate entry of those who otherwise would be inadmissible under immigration law, but who have been invited by Canadians to speak or perform, provided we are certain their presence in Canada will not endanger the health, safety and good order of Canadian society.

Mr. Timothy Leary has in the past been refused entry as a visitor to Canada to guard against his advocating to students the use of LSD and other drugs. This time the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) concurred with his officials to allow Mr. Leary time for the specific purpose of presenting a comedy night club act.

The hon. members may note that when the minister's decision was taken on March 6, 1980, Mr. Leary intended to present his comedy act only in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. It was only after his engagement in Ottawa was cancelled that immigration officials gave him permission to perform also in Winnipeg. The minister, may I add, was not informed of this change.

Adjournment Debate

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DEFENCE PROCUREMENT CONTRACTS—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN AWARDING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my concern tonight relates to a question I addressed to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) and to which I received what I considered to be a totally inadequate answer. The basic question dealt with the allocation of industrial benefits that were generated by government procurement, specifically procurement of defence equipment, and the impact that this procurement would have on national unity.

● (2220)

Specifically, I mentioned the F-18 project in which industrial benefits according to the latest figures we have—and we do not believe those to be the latest figures—show that 47 per cent of those benefits accrue to the province of Quebec, 41 per cent to the province of Ontario, and 12 per cent to the rest of Canada, for a total of 88 per cent of those benefits winding up in central Canada.

Our information is that further figures have shifted even more of those benefits into central Canada. I would point to one example of a G.E. components plant in the lower mainland of British Columbia which was moved. These remarks were generated particularly by the minister's comments last Friday on the frigate program. This is another indication that benefits would accrue in the province of Quebec without a fair share being considered for the Pacific coast, British Columbia, and Atlantic Canada. I would point out that it is extremely important in the interests of national unity that industrial benefits be generated in those areas, especially in natural areas such as shipbuilding and the allied trades.

Mention was made also of the truck acquisition program. The purchase of about 2,500 to 2,800 trucks at a cost of roughly $200 million was announced by a Liberal government member, and work for this program would also accrue in central Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec.

I would point to some other things that concern us seriously about the benefits generated by the Government of Canada and the effect on the rest of the country and national unity. For example, the automotive industry program has in the past seen great benefits accrue in central Canada. Prebuilding of the pipeline and the steel industries will see those benefits largely accrue there. We wonder how allocations will be made in the future to the fishing vessel acquisition program that will probably run around $90 million. That information is very difficult, if not impossible, to acquire.

There is an announcement on refitting the coast guard, in the amount of $250 million. Where will those programs come from? In particular, I would like to comment on the cutbacks concerning the Minister of National Defence, in his role as co-ordinator of search and rescue. In the SARCUP program, which will see only 11 of 14 helicopters provided with the modifications necessary to do the job, I would ask the minister if he would not mind commenting why the other three, one of which is on the Pacific coast and two on the Atlantic coast, are not included in the SARCUP program.

It would appear to me that the government's program for procurement of equipment is being allocated on the basis of political patronage, particularly in the province of Quebec where big promises are made to people. Rather than help, I would suggest that they simply aggravate the issue of national unity; in other words, promises, then betrayals. Clearly we need an industrial strategy, particularly in the shipbuilding industry and allied trades. Government procurement must be used to enhance that strategy. This method in the long run will be far fairer and seem to benefit everybody in this country, including the province of Quebec.

I would appreciate a more detailed comment from the minister than the one I received today in the House.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed touched by the deep interest in things military on the part of a member of the NDP. It is unfortunate he cannot share his interest with his Ontario colleagues.

The minister's answer in the House this afternoon was very clear and totally adequate. This government aims to share the benefits of its activity in all regions of our country. However, I must remind the hon. member that, without abdicating any extremely important defence responsibilities, contract negotiations are the responsibility of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), and industrial benefits are within the authority of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) is, of course, deeply concerned with these matters in that it is he who ensures that military needs and specifications are met. Therefore the matters raised by the hon. member are the subject of close co-operation among all three departments.

However, especially at this moment in our history I believe the hon. member does himself, his party, and certainly his country no service in misinterpreting the remarks or the intentions of the minister which were made clear in the House today.

● (2225)

The Liberal government negotiated a good deal, indeed a great deal, for Canada, for all Canadians in the new fighter aircraft program. McDonnell Douglas is committed to place at least 60 per cent of the offsets in the aerospace and electronics sectors of Canadian industry. Some specific projects are planned for specific regions, but most benefits are not specifically apportioned by region. The contract includes incentives to promote the distribution of benefits to areas of high unemployment and underindustrialization. The result will be wide distribution of benefits favouring those companies and regions which most aggressively pursued specific contracts with McDonnell Douglas and subcontractors to McDonnell Douglas.

Canadian shipyards from the west to the east coast, including Quebec shipyards, are in a position to compete for the building contracts for the frigate program. Once a decision has been reached on finalists to enter a competitive contract definition, shipyards on both coasts and in Quebec will, no doubt, be negotiating production proposals with the prime contractors representing the industrial group finalists.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

AID TO NEWFOUNDLAND UNDER DREE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that, for the first time since the inception of DREE, Newfoundland does not have a forestry agreement with Ottawa, that the cash flow under DREE agreements with Newfoundland will decline from approximately $60 million a year to under $40 million during this year, that the Forestry 2 agreement, a land survey and mapping agreement, an amendment to the Nordco agreement and a new Nordco agreement have been ready for execution for months, with a coastal Labrador agreement pending as well, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion attend to urgent matters in his department, including correspondence and telexes from the premier of Newfoundland, and that the minister sign immediately the Forestry 2 agreement, the land survey and mapping agreement, the Nordco amendment and new Nordco agreement, and the coastal Labrador agreement so that work can commence in Newfoundland and Labrador under these agreements immediately, supplying needed facilities and creating needed employment.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLISHING

GRANTS FOR PROMOTION AND MARKETING OF CANADIAN BOOKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Since companies which receive grants under the Canadian book publishing program do not have to show how these moneys are spent, and since the Secretary of State has already issued a cheque for nearly $300,000 to Macmillan of Canada under this program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan):

That this House instruct the minister to take immediate steps to ensure that the money will be used for the aggressive promotion and marketing of Canadian books now that the company has been sold to Gage Educational Publishing.

AIR TRANSPORT

EASTERN PROVINCIAL AIRWAYS—ATLANTIC CANADA SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the fact that the president of Eastern Provincial Airways has said that the airline may have to shut down some of its local routes, that the reason given was the Canadian Transport Commission's decision to extend CP Air's service to Halifax, that the former temporary prime minister and his party overwhelmingly supported CP Air's application to extend service to Halifax, and that these Atlantic communities depend on EPA's regional carrier service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Minister of Transport guarantee to the residents of Atlantic Canada the continuation of EPA's regional carrier service to all communities presently receiving these services, and that EPA be granted the Halifax-Toronto route instead of Canadian Pacific Airlines.

REQUEST THAT GRAIN TRUCKING OPERATIONS NOT BE CURTAILED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, in view of the success of trucking grain from Manitoba to Thunder Bay, especially in creating an alternative to the railroads in grain handling and transportation and, further, that this development has increased the grain transportation capacity in our region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That trucking operations not be curtailed through the imposition of government regulations which would make the trucking of grain from Manitoba to Thunder Bay impossible.

PROJECTS FOR EASTERN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Despite the government's admission of the danger of dependence upon foreign oil as the source of energy generation in east coast provinces, alternate energy projects like Cape Breton coal development and construction of the eastern extension of the natural gas pipeline are being delayed. I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to prepare and present immediately a plan to implement alternate energy projects in eastern Canada and include a schedule for the construction of the natural gas pipeline extension to reduce eastern Canada's dependence on foreign oil.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

DISPOSAL OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the decision yesterday by the British Columbia Supreme Court to award $458,700 damages to three firms in Surrey, British Columbia, who were deceived into buying radioactive waste while under the impression that it was land fill, and in light of the fact that the award was given because this material was considered harmful, yet more of this waste exists on other property in Surrey but cannot be removed because an appropriate disposal site has yet to be found, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House immediately authorize the Atomic Energy Control Board to remove this waste to the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited waste site at Chalk River.

VESSEL SUBSIDIES—FORMS REQUIRED TO BE COMPLETED BY FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Recently, the government changed the requirements for fishermen receiving vessel subsidies from the federal government. Whereas it is now necessary for fishermen in western Canada to fill in a myriad of bureaucratic forms which previously were unnecessary, and whereas in light of these developments many fishermen in remote communities may be discouraged or prevented from purchasing new vessels, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller):

That in the opinion of this House the government should take immediate steps to eliminate these needless bureaucratic requirements and to ensure that the procedures for necessary vessel subsidy will be the same as they were prior to the 1980 fiscal year.

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT GRANTS—STATUS OF APPLICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that when the Canada West Foundation phoned the office of the Minister of Employment and Immigration two days ago to determine the status of their application for a student summer employment grant, the minister's officials stated delays were due to tardiness by the member of Parliament, and given that I returned my analysis of the applications prior to the minister's deadline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees):

That this House calls on the Minister of Employment and Immigration to tell his officials to stop fallaciously blaming the MPs for their own bureaucratic incompetence.

In view of locating postal lock-boxes as far as two blocks' distance away from a householder and calling this "suburban service" which is a misnomer of Orwellian proportions, and since older subdivisions receive doorstep letter carrier service while new residential areas are condemned to suburban service, and since awarding of an inferior service to one set of taxpayers and a superior one for their neighbours is unjust and discriminatory, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That this House urge the Postmaster General to halt the expansion of suburban service forthwith and to proceed with letter carrier delivery as rapidly as possible.

OBJECTION TO PROPOSED MOVE OF DVA TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning branches of the Canadian Legion in eastern Ontario and throughout Canada with regard to the proposed move of the Department of Veterans Affairs to Prince Edward Island announced a year ago by the Liberal government, which constitutes blatant political patronage that the Progressive Conservative administration was saddled with. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

In view of the objections of dozens of Canadian Legion branches across Canada to this completely unjustified action, that this House requests the government to immediately cancel all plans for the movement of DVA to Prince Edward Island, leaving the department where it now is and where it is better located to serve the veterans of this country.

That the Mennonite families of Canada who are now facing deportation, even though their parents were born in Canada and moved to Mexico, where these families were not informed of the regulation that they would have had to state their intention prior to their twenty-fourth birthday to remain Canadian citizens, be given the same consideration as other refugees and be granted Canadian landed immigrant status on compassionate grounds.

TARIFF TO PROTECT BRITISH COLUMBIA POTATO GROWERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the plight of potato producers in British Columbia.

In view of the fact that the actions of successive Liberal governments have virtually eliminated the french fried potato industry in British Columbia, thus destroying a major market for B.C. potatoes, and in view of the fact that potatoes imported from Washington state and Oregon are undermining Canadian producers by flooding the B.C. market with cheap potatoes from large factory farms, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the government move immediately to impose a seasonal tariff to protect British Columbia potato farmers from low-cost, imported spuds, by implementing the fast track method which was devised by the previous Progressive Conservative minister of agriculture and announced by him on October 22 of last year.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

COST OF IMPORTED OIL—SOURCE OF ADDITIONAL MONEYS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a question I would like to have addressed to the Minister of Finance. In his absence, I will direct it to whoever would presume to be the acting prime minister.

Given the notice by Saudi Arabia and Mexico in the last few days of their intention to significantly increase oil prices, and recognizing that this will immediately cancel out the $1 billion that we now understand the government has found a way to secure from the total oil dollar package, can the acting prime minister indicate to the House today where it is he intends to find and pay for this lost $1 billion which, of course, will result from the pending increases in oil that we will learn about on May 7 from OPEC?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State, Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows quite well that all negotiations on the domestic oil price are under way, that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been doing considerable work in that field, that the Minister of Finance has begun a preliminary consideration of the next budget, taking into account those negotiations as well as their results in the preparation of that budget. The hon. member will then obtain a more explicit answer to his question.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I think I would prefer the "Stengelese" of the Minister of Transport, who in fact is the acting prime minister, to that kind of gobbledygook, because the question is very important.

I want to find out from this government whether before the Minister of Energy embarked on his tour—for which we wish him well—as he visits the provinces, if advice given to him included advice to seek the support of the non-producing provinces for further increases in the total oil dollar that is now available. What I am seeking is information as to how the government intends to replace the $1 billion that has been wiped out in the last 24 hours.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have been reflecting on and admiring the quality of the answer that was given by the Minister of State.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: One might refer to the fact that we had a discussion on that yesterday in this very House. A number of possibilities were indicated. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—rightly, in my humble view—has repeatedly said that he is not going to comment on a daily basis on the consultations in which he is presently involved.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I do not know whether it occurs to the acting prime minister, humble though he would lead us to believe, that it is a fact that Atlantic Canada is dependent upon a significant amount of imported oil.

We would like to know from what source the government intends to raise the money to pay for this oil and thus enhance the possibility of secure oil supplies for that part of Canada. This is a very serious question. We now face a $4.3 billion oil compensation deficit. Where is the government going to get the money to pay for it? How can we in Atlantic Canada feel assured that we can afford to buy the imported oil that we require to sustain ourselves?

• (1120)

Mr. Pepin: I can understand the hon. member's curiosity, but the answer to his query will be given in due course.

ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question which might have been directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, but since it involves general policy I will direct it to the acting prime minister.

The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that the budget introduced in December, 1979, contained a special provision pertaining to Atlantic Canada's dependence on foreign oil as a source of electrical generation. Under this special provision, Nova Scotians would have been protected from additional costs of electrical generation caused by oil price increases through federal grants which would have exceeded, in total, $300 million.

Does the acting prime minister agree that such an assistance program is justified, and will he assure the House that his government will provide the same or a similar assistance program when his made-in-Canada price is established?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will pass the question to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, and to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I cannot help underlining at this point that the record of the government in terms of protecting consumers, particularly in the importing provinces, is an exceptional one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: I appreciate the difficulties under which the acting prime minister operates in this field, but these are matters of great concern to the people of Atlantic Canada.

In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the premiers have announced that if this program of assistance is continued, the price of electrical energy can be maintained in 1980 and 1981 despite increases in the price of oil. I should like to know whether the acting prime minister, or anybody else on the government side, can assure us that this assistance will be continued and that electrical prices will not be increased, as they would not have been increased under the Progressive Conservative budget.

Mr. Pepin: Because of his very special interest in that area, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance will obviously bear that in mind when he prepares his budget.

HOUSING

ACTION TO SOLVE PROBLEMS OF RENTERS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for CMHC. Since Canada is suffering the most serious housing shortage in recent history, with a drop of 17 per cent in housing starts predicted for 1980, and since those who are suffering most are tenants who will never be able to own a home, will the minister tell us what action he intends to take to solve this housing problem, particularly in regard to renters who are paying well over 30 per cent of their incomes for shelter?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity, at the beginning of this week, of speaking to the minister responsible for housing in the province of British Columbia and assessing at first-hand some of the problems in the riding of the hon. member who raised this question.

I certainly share her concern. I intend to speak with all the provincial ministers with whom I have not yet spoken, and I can assure the hon. member that the question of the supply of rental accommodation is high on the priority list of both my department and of the corporation.

Mrs. Mitchell: I appreciate that the minister was in British Columbia and listening intently to the concerns of the west last weekend, with no commitments being made. However, his own CMHC report shows that Vancouver has the worst housing crisis in North America, and that cities like Calgary and Victoria are not far behind. In Vancouver, over a quarter of the population has housing problems: some 11,000 people, for example, have inadequate housing and there is a minus zero vacancy rate and a migration of 25,000 to that region.

• (1125)

Will the minister be specific and tell us what measures he plans to take to alleviate these problems in cities which are suffering from huge migration?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, as I indicated, the problem is not necessarily one which can be addressed by the federal government or by the corporation itself. The whole question of housing, as hon. members can well appreciate, is one which involves many jurisdictions. For example, I am heartened to see that in the province of Alberta this week, that province redirected $60 million from its surplus toward addressing problems in some of the tight market areas there.

As I indicated—and I will repeat it— I am working with the ministers from the provinces. I hope there will be a federal response, but the response will be one in co-operation with the provinces.

REQUEST SOCIAL HOUSING ALLOCATIONS BE INCREASED

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, my final supplementary is to the acting prime minister, who, I believe is the Minister of Transport.

Given the fact that the minister responsible for CMHC a week or so ago tabled information showing that this government has failed by some 9,000 units of housing to meet the demand of Canadians for non-profit and co-operative housing, and that this housing is essential as a first step in dealing with our housing crisis, and since co-operative and non-profit housing groups—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member please come quickly to the question?

Mrs. Mitchell: Will the acting prime minister reverse this cutback policy, go to the cabinet and insist on an increase in government allocations for social housing in 1980?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will pass the message on to the Prime Minister and I am sure he will consult with the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I am quite sure the minister himself has borne all factors in mind in his decisions.

URGENCY OF SOLVING PROBLEMS OF RENTERS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In view of his answer in this House this morning, would he explain why in the Vancouver Sun earlier this week he is quoted as saying that he identifies the problem of rental housing as second in urgency?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the answer is quite apparent. The answer is that I was asked in this House upon taking my portfolio to respond to the needs of people facing mortgage renewals. It is history that this government has responded to that very serious problem, and that was our initial response.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SAFETY OF PERSONS LIVING IN PROXIMITY OF PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of the murder of a local citizen, allegedly by an inmate from the Mountain prison in British Columbia, can the minister advise this House and the community what measures or changes in policy he is contemplating to ensure the safety of the residents of that area?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have asked for a report on that particular incident, but I have learned in the meantime that the Mountain penitentiary has only a single fence around it to protect it. Double fence was intended to be built, but it had been delayed because of a decision about construction inside the yard. I have ordered a second fence to be built, and that is currently being built.

In view of the incident referred to, that news is small comfort but, as hon. members will be aware, the escaped inmate has been captured by the RCM Police.

Mr. Andre: And he will be out on the weekend with a pass.

Mr. Patterson: Considering the series of incidents involving inmates from penal institutions in the Abbotsford-Matsqui area, including the abduction and murder of a female employee of an all-night store, allegedly by an inmate, has the minister ordered a full inquiry into all these incidents in order that the legitimate fears and growing resentments of the communities may be allayed, and confidence in the Canadian penitentiary service restored?

• (1130)

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member if there had been an increase in the rate of escapes across the country or in any particular region. That is not the case. I am still concerned about every incident and, as hon. members know, I have received a report on each of the escapes. However, I do not think the situation justifies a general investigation of the problem which is no more serious now than it has been in the past. I am approaching them on a case-by-case basis.

ENERGY

EXPORT TAX ON HYDROELECTRICITY—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the acting prime minister, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and ask him whether the government is considering the imposition of an export tax on hydroelectric sales from Canadian provinces to the United States. If this is the case, has the government passed this intention on to the provinces or given any indication to the provinces that they want to enter into negotiations on the imposition of such a tax?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I find it somewhat unfair—because this question has been around for so many years—that the hon. member should ask me, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to answer it. It is not a new matter at all. I am not aware of an intention such as the one the hon. member refers to, but I suggest that the hon. member for Provencher ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on Monday.

Mr. Epp: The acting prime minister might take some small comfort from his words, but he is acting prime minister and he is speaking on behalf of the government in this House today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where are the rest of them?

An hon. Member: Inform yourself.

Mr. Epp: I should like to ask the acting prime minister the following question: The Prime Minister keeps insisting that the federal government will realize the same amount of revenue from its total energy package as that contained in the December 11 budget, while at the same time not imposing any excise tax and keeping the price of oil to the $4 a barrel level.

I should like to ask the acting prime minister whether the government is considering imposing such an export tax on hydroelectric sales to the United States, and whether such contemplated revenue is part of the total package of revenue which the federal government is considering?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I think I should protest to a certain extent: this is somewhat unfair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: If the government were going to change their policy to any extent on this important matter, it would not be announced by the acting prime minister or the acting minister of energy, mines and resources on a Friday morning. My hon. friend is not being fair in pressing for an answer at this very moment.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My supplementary question is for the acting prime minister. What does he do here?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SALE OF 25 PER CENT INTEREST OF PETROCAN IN ARCTIC PILOT PROJECT

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

It was recently announced that PetroCan would sell a 25 per cent interest in the Arctic pilot project to private interests led by Dome Petroleum. Can the minister tell the House why the decision was made to reduce our national oil company's interest in this project despite a commitment to expand its role in frontier development, and was this a full cabinet decision?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I know from speaking to the chairman of PetroCan that it is very much his desire to carry out government policy and to diminish foreign ownership in this whole vital resource area. That sale was undoubtedly designed to afford further capital for PetroCan to invest elsewhere and still maintain majority ownership.

Mr. Ittinuar: Madam Speaker, I think the minister is ad libbing in his answer. Can he give the House an unequivocal assurance that the reorganization of this project will not lessen Petro-Canada's control over all aspects of the project, and especially that the dialogue between the people of eastern Arctic and PetroCan on socioeconomic issues will not be disrupted or impeded in any way?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am encouraged to hear the hon. member indicate that PetroCan has been carrying on a useful dialogue with the native population in the territories. I feel very certain that PetroCan will maintain control of the project to which the hon. member referred.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INCLUSION OF NORTHUMBERLAND IN EASTERN ONTARIO SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENT

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On several occasions I have drawn to the minister's attention since this session began, the very real need for including the county of Northumberland in the Eastern Ontario Subsidiary Agreement.

As this need has recently become even more urgent by the moving of the Eldorado plant to northern Ontario and the closing down of the very large Winchester-Western plant in Cobourg, would the minister advise the House what progress he is making in bringing the county of Northumberland into the Eastern Ontario Subsidiary Agreement?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): First, Madam Speaker, I should like to pay tribute to the dedication of the hon. member for Northumberland, because he has made extensive and repeated representations to me about the plight and the problems facing his constituency. Second, I should like to assure the hon. member that within two weeks, at the most, I will try to reach a decision about his representation. Third, perhaps I could appeal to members in all corners of the House, including the Prime Minister and all other ministers and the official opposition, to help me arrive at means to help Canadians, wherever they live, achieve equal opportunity.

We have to decide where our priorities lie. Should we restrict expenditures, or will we have the means to help Northumberland county and other ridings facing economic problems? I have looked at the economic indicators in the riding of Northumberland and have found them to be very close to the indicators for the province of Ontario as a whole. However, I understand that Northumberland county has specific problems, and I will try to deal with them and give the hon. member an answer within two weeks at the most.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ACTION TO IMPROVE ECONOMY OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Does the minister realize that, for the first time since his department was created, there is no DREE forestry agreement entered into with Newfoundland, that the cash flow from DREE agreements in Newfoundland has declined from $60 million, on an average, for the last five years to something like $30 million, and that the forestry agreement, the land mapping survey agreement, the Nordco agreement and the coastal Labrador agreement are all waiting for his attention and have been waiting now on DREE, passed by the Treasury Board in the last two or three months?

Will the minister also explain to the House why he is not replying to correspondence from the premier of Newfoundland, who is also the minister of intergovernmental affairs, on these questions? When are we going to get some action? Does the minister realize that Newfoundland is still regionally disadvantaged and has not yet come into its great millenium?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I am quite surprised by the approach taken by the hon. member. I can assure him that I know of the plight and the need of the province of Newfoundland. He has referred to some areas where his own government, the former Conservative government, rejected appeals put to them by the province of Newfoundland.

I do not want to deal with regional disparities in a partisan way. I have said that the member of Parliament for each region, whatever his party, will be my privileged partner in the fight against disparities, and the hon. member can rest assured that because Newfoundland may be the most needy part of the country, it will have my closest attention.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I have not a doubt that the minister has very good intentions, but what Newfoundland is waiting for is some action. The agreements to which I referred were approved and passed through Treasury Board months ago and still have not been executed. The government of Newfoundland cannot even get any response to their correspondence or telexes from the minister's department.

● (1140)

I do not know whether this is a partisan matter, or what the matter is, but it is a matter that requires immediate attention because this year the cash flow of DREE in Newfoundland is cut in half so far, and all of these agreements are to be attended to. Can the minister give the House an assurance that there will be some action taken in the next week or two to deal with these very pressing matters, because employment opportunities are just vanishing in Newfoundland, with its very heavy unemployment this year and a very low construction program?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, the budget with which I am dealing for the moment is to all practical extents the one that was decided by the preceding administration.

Mr. Crosbie: There is no money for that either.

Mr. De Bané: For instance, take the Nordco one: it was the Treasury Board of the previous administration which rejected the appeal put by the provincial government of Newfoundland for an extension of the money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. De Bané: So, I am really very strapped with the financial constraints I have. Even if we do not answer or do not take one more commitment, the financial resources of the department now are stretched to the limit. I have barely enough just to honour the commitments that were made by our administration before and the hon. member's administration.

What I am saying is that we must decide our priorities, all of us. Are we going to give the means to help those poor areas of Canada which desperately need economic development? Give me the means, and my job is to answer positively to all of those requests.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE CANADA

PROPOSAL TO CONSTRUCT HIGHWAY THROUGH LANDS IN OTTAWA

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture of which I have given notice. As the minister knows, there is growing public concern in areas of the city of Nepean, notably Manordale, Woodvale, Trend Village, Arlington Woods, Merivale Gardens and other areas, concerning the proposed extension of the Knoxdale-Hunt Club arterial which will necessarily cut through lands owned by Agriculture Canada. There is a proposal that that be done.

Has an agreement been made between the Government of Canada and the regional municipality or any other local government group which would allow that extension to be carried forward?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, there has been no agreement whatsoever as far as our department is concerned, and no notice whatsoever as far as our department is concerned.

I would be surprised if the province of Ontario would be allowing that kind of thing to take place, to construct a four-lane expressway through the agriculture research station that we think is also important. We will be doing some further checking, but so far we have not found anything at all.

IMMIGRATION

LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS FOR MENNONITES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since Canada has shown a great deal of sympathy for refugees in recent years—as most recently demonstrated in the case of Indo-Chinese refugees—would the minister consider showing the same concern for the Mennonite families now in Canada who have come here from Mexico?

They are able to find work or they have jobs promised to them if they are permitted to work, yet they are facing deportation even though their parents were born in Canada or moved from Mexico years ago. These families were not informed of the regulation that they had to state their intention prior to their twenty-fourth birthday to remain Canadian citizens. Would the minister consider giving landed immigrant status to these people and to other Mennonite families who were not informed of the regulations, on compassionate grounds?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this is a long-standing case which has been with us many years. What we are doing with the Mennonite workers who are presently in Canada is indicating to them that if they wish to apply for status in this country and to apply under the Citizenship Act to redeem their citizenship, we will stay any deportation orders or any proceedings against them.

Also, they have full access under the act to apply for refugee status. However, the act indicates that if they want to apply for landed immigrant status—that is a very different set of categories—they would have to leave the country and apply from their country of origin. But we are now looking at the case and we have forestalled any action on deportation at the present moment.

Mr. Orlikow: Would the minister consider permitting them to go just to the closest United States port of entry and applying for a landed immigrant status from there, rather than going all the way back to Mexico, as they probably have to do?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, there is absolutely no restriction on our part as to where an individual may apply for landed status. If they are able to do so from the United States, that is certainly permissible with us. But as the hon. member knows, we have had some difficulty with the United States in recent months in using the border stations as a place for application. I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs has raised that issue with his American counterpart. It is under negotiation and we hope to have that problem solved, but certainly we are prepared at any point to accept their application.

ENERGY

FORMULA FOR BLENDED PRICE OF OIL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the acting prime minister. In this connection the acting prime minister certainly has had a role in determining such a vital point of government policy as the blended price.

Will he kindly inform the House or give us some sort of intelligent interpretation of how the blended price or the fair return element to oil companies of the blended price is being arrived at? Will we see the oil producing industry as well as the gas industry set up under some form of public utility control so that each individual company whose costs are different from others will still be entitled to that fair return?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was here a few days ago when the Prime Minister explained all that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: Being only the Minister of Transport, I am sure that I cannot do better than he can.

An hon. Member: Do you understand it?

Mr. Pepin: We will leave it at that. I will send a copy of the answer to my hon. friend wherein the Prime Minister explained the blended price.

Mr. Lambert: I have heard what the Prime Minister attempted to do, shall we say his flights in cloud cuckooland when it comes to the oil industry—

An hon. Member: Low blow.

Mr. Lambert: —and his ideas with regard to what are costs and the facilities and difficulties of establishing costs for individual fields, individual producing companies—all of this. Oil production is not running across the prairies on a pogo stick and simply making a hole and expecting oil or gas to come out of it. That is what the Liberal policy looks like.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lambert: Would the minister who took part in establishing this policy tell us what he considers to be the method they will use for establishing a fair return?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend was probably not in the House a few minutes ago—

Mr. Lambert: I was.

Mr. Pepin: —when I answered a similar question. At that time, I simply said that it has been the policy of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources not to comment on the development of negotiations now ongoing with the provinces, the producers and others. The remarks my hon. friend has just made are really a good introduction to the speech he will obviously make when the subject comes up for debate in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: That is truly Paul Martin.

Mr. Pepin: He was a good man.

EMPLOYMENT

PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the importance of direct employment programs in high unemployment areas, especially Ontario, and considering that the former Progressive Conservative government cut off this program last fall, I wonder if the minister will be instituting such a program this fall for the high unemployment areas.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as we indicated very clearly in the Speech from the Throne, we intend to announce new job-creation programs as soon as the proposals are examined by cabinet. After we undertake consultation with the provinces, and some of the employers and union groups, we will be in a position to make announcements in this House that will correct the actions taken by the previous government in cancelling the direct work programs.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—LACK OF DISCUSSION WITH ONTARIO

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday, the minister appeared in this House and made reference to the initiatives of the Ontario government, through the Ontario minister of the environment, Dr. Parrott, and his new control order for Inco. The hon. minister had said that this was an important and courageous stand. At the same time, the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario was referring to the same "important and courageous stand" as pathetic.

There are those in the United States who do not want an abatement of the acid rain situation and who will seize upon any disagreement in Canada to add to their arguments against the very efforts which the hon. minister is making. Can the minister explain to this House why it is that he had no consultations with Dr. Smith, the Liberal leader in the province of Ontario, and whether since yesterday he has spoken to his colleague in the province of Ontario and straightened him out?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I think as a general rule that political battles at the federal level should be fought out here, and that political battles at the provincial level should be fought out at the provincial level.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, given the fact that any open conflict between the federal government and the provinces in these very important months of negotiation to get agreement with the United States is very dangerous, and I know that the minister has been working to make sure that such a thing does not happen, can the minister assure this House that he will consult with his Liberal counterparts in the provincial parties to make sure that the minister and the federal government are not scuttled in their negotiation attempts with the United States?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I intend to consult very widely. I know that the steps that were taken yesterday will be welcomed by those in the United States who are fighting to achieve the same objective that we are trying to reach in Canada, that of considerably reducing these dangerous emissions. I know that the hon. member is very interested in this issue and I welcome the kind of concerns that he has expressed.

I can tell the hon. member that I will be consulting very widely and that I will be making the case as effectively as I can to our American counterparts. I know they feel that the steps which were taken yesterday, both in Ontario and those announced here, will help them in their struggle to improve the situation in the United States.

TRADE

PACIFIC RIM CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of State (Trade). Our government had undertaken plans to hold a Pacific area trade conference this year. Can the minister advise me whether or not it is his government's intention to proceed with those plans?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State, Trade): Madam Speaker, in order to help achieve the industrial objectives of western Canada, this government is paying attention most favourably to the recommendations concerning the Pacific Rim conference. There are, however, a few changes which I would like to have made to the original format. I will be discussing these changes with my colleagues and announcing our decision to the House in due course.

INDUSTRY

AID TO CHRYSLER CANADA—IMPACT ON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last Friday, I asked the minister whether any aid to Chrysler Canada would have an adverse impact on the economic development programs of this country. I received a very ambiguous answer. Something has come to my attention quite recently which illustrates the importance of this concern.

For some months CAE Industries has been working with General Motors on an aluminum casting plant for transmission cases for GM's new energy-efficient X cars. A relatively small amount of financial assistance was required for the project. The Ontario government has said that they would provide this assistance. It only requires some action by the federal government to get the project in motion. The project would mean 200 to 400 jobs and $20 million to $30 million a year in business for a strong, growing Canadian—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Wilson: My question to the minister is: Why did it take a notification from CAE Industries that they had lost this business before he would take action and notice the urgency of this matter? Would the minister advise the House whether or not his preoccupation with the Chrysler Canada decision has caused him to ignore the plight of Canadian-owned companies?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, as my speech last night to the automotive parts manufacturers indicated—and it received a very favourable reception—I am giving due attention to all segments of Canadian industry, in particular the automotive parts manufacturers and generally to the Canadian-owned segment of our economy.

The whole matter with respect to the CAE application was under consideration before any statements were made by them about their relationship with General Motors as it presently stands. The matter was under consideration and it remains under active consideration. I hope to have an answer on the matter very soon.

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROJECTS—REASON FOR DELAY IN APPROVING APPLICATIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It has been reported to me by people in Manitoba that a delay in approving the Summer Youth Employment projects scheduled for that province, as well as other provinces, has caused people suited for these jobs to seek other employment, and that this has put back the scheduling of the summer programming of the groups concerned.

Can the minister tell the House whether or not some changes or announcements are pending related to these delays, and when these groups can expect to have this uncertainty cleared up?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the only reason for delay is the change of government and the requirement to re-establish some of the criteria for the Summer Youth Employment program. All the applications from the provinces are now being processed as quickly as possible. Announcements are being made. Several provinces have already received, or will be receiving, their announcements this week. I expect that any further announcements about the matter will be made very soon.

There really is no delay. Announcements are on time according to the schedule we announced in a press release some time in early April.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the groups to whom I spoke this morning had every expectation that they would hear whether or not their project was approved this past Wednesday. It seems to me that there has been a delay, but the delay is not a problem in and of itself. I am asking the minister, why the delay, and when can these groups expect to hear whether or not their programs will go forward?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I realize that there are always very high expectations, but we did indicate very clearly that we would be aiming at a May 15 target date for the announcement of these projects in those provinces from which we have received applications, from both the groups involved and also on the advice of members of Parliament, which is a system we reintroduced.

As far as I understand the situation, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill and other members of the New Democratic Party from that area have not submitted their advice, and that is one of the reasons why we have had problems.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

TWO-PRICE WHEAT SYSTEM—INQUIRY WHETHER AMENDMENTS PROPOSED

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as spokesman for the Canadian Wheat Board. I am sure the minister is aware that under the current pricing structure as it is outlined in the two-price wheat act, wheat sold for domestic, human consumption is considerably below the export marketing price, resulting in rather extensive subsidies provided by the producers to the consumers. These subsidies can amount to as much as $1 million per week.

Would the minister tell the House whether or not his government is giving any consideration toward amending the two-price system so that it will more accurately reflect the increased costs of production and more accurately correspond with world prices.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I had a conversation with the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board on that very subject yesterday. If there are announcements to be made in the coming weeks, they will be made by him. I can assure the hon. member that he is looking into the matter.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, having regard to the fact that the act under which this two-price system was introduced is scheduled to expire on July 31, 1980, could the minister indicate whether or not he has had discussions with the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board as to the disposition of the act? Will another act be introduced, or will the existing act be extended?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I have had discussions with the minister. However, this matter falls under his jurisdiction and any announcements should first come from him.

Privilege—Mr. Nielsen

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ALLEGED DELETION IN OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise now in the hope that I can contribute to getting this session off on the right foot as far as alterations to Hansard are concerned. Because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not in his seat today I intend to raise the question in detail on Monday, but in order to afford you, Madam Speaker, the officers of the House, Hansard and the staff of the Prime Minister the opportunity to check the substance of the question I intend to raise on Monday, I might refer them to page 598 of yesterday's Hansard. In the right hand column, the last paragraph but one, the Prime Minister is recorded as having said:

● (1200)

We believe that the companies themselves and the producers themselves have some contribution to make in this.

Now, there has been the deletion of two words. Two entire words have been deleted from that sentence. I heard them clearly and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) heard them clearly, but so that there would be no doubt, the tapes of yesterday's proceedings were checked today. The two words that were deleted are "the producing" so that the sentence would have read: "We believe that the companies themselves and the producing the producers themselves have some contribution to make in this."

Madam Speaker, I think we should get this session off to the proper start with respect to significant deletions, alterations to Hansard. It may be that the Prime Minister and his staff did not make this deletion. It may be that Hansard themselves made it. But it is my belief and the belief of those of us on this side that whatever is said in this House should be recorded faithfully, completely and accurately.

Madam Speaker: I suppose the hon. member will be giving me written notice of the question of privilege.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Concerning that kind of innuendo, of course I would rather let the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) give the necessary details on his return from Montreal where he is today delivering an important speech on the unity of this country which we all want united and strong. My colleague should understand that, in spite of the many innuendoes heard during question period about the absence of the Prime Minister, his absence is justified indeed. We all know that the Prime Minister is now speaking to the Montreal Chamber of Commerce to plead the cause of Canada. As for the hon. member's comments about the answer given by the Prime Minister to a question put to him yesterday, I am sure that the Prime Minister will be in a position at the first opportunity to give the necessary explanations and remove any doubt resulting from the remarks made by my colleague.

MR. BLAIKIE—SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT—DENIAL OF DELAY IN SUBMITTING PROJECTS BY NDP MEMBERS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): I rise on a question of privilege, Madam Speaker. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has implied that the delay in the approval of Summer Youth Employment projects is because of the failure of New Democratic Party members of Parliament to take their responsibilities seriously vis-à-vis the minister's recommendations that members submit indications of which projects in their ridings they would deem worthy of funding.

The minister knows full well that members of this party are not in a position where they have delayed approval of projects, but they have made representations to the minister that he change the way in which approval is given for funding. The minister asked that there be input from members of Parliament as to which projects should be worthy of funding, but did not, on the one hand, give members any final say so that they would be responsible for the input they gave into the funding process, nor, on the other hand, did he make provision for any sort of community input.

We made representations to the minister that if he was willing to set up a community participation process for input, if he was willing to set up committees at the community level, we would be willing to go ahead with that.

This would have been consistent with all the rhetoric about community participation that the Minister of Employment and Immigration was so fond of indulging in prior to his election to government.

We did send in our forms and we indicated to the minister what our position was on this. There is no way that our actions have in any way delayed approval of these projects; if anything, they should have speeded it up because he did not have to go through the process of sorting out what the input of the various members of Parliament was with regard to projects in our ridings.

The implication of what the minister said with regard to our carrying out our responsibilities is wrong. It misleads the people of Manitoba, it misleads this House, and it does not do justice to the facts. I submit this should be regarded as a question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in all honesty, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) may have a certain difference of opinion, but he certainly does not have a question of privilege. I would just like to point out to him certain facts that would support my case.

The first is that when this government took office the procedure by which consultation would take place on a local level through members of Parliament had been totally cancelled. The previous government had decided for its own reasons not to allow any form of consultation on the local level. At that point the Summer Youth Employment program was already in progress. The announcements had already been made, the advertisements had already gone out and applications were already being submitted.

It was our feeling, based upon a very strong commitment to the notion, that before deciding on Summer Youth Employment programs there should be some avenue by which the local community is represented and priorities judged. The best way to do that is to consult with the member of Parliament concerned. It may be that the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill does not have the same respect for the role of the member of Parliament as we on this side.

I should like to point out that one of the reasons a person is elected is to speak for his or her community. There was certainly no prohibition whatsoever in the instructions or information we sent out that would have prevented the hon. member or any of his colleagues from consulting with groups in his own community in order to set up whatever form of procedure he wanted to follow.

I should also like to point out that the matter only came to my attention in a letter that I received, I believe yesterday or it may have been the day before, from the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), indicating that members of the New Democratic Party caucus were not going to participate in that consultative feature.

Where the delay occurred was simply that we were waiting for them to come in. It is certainly their right if they do not want to participate or give advice and there is no compulsion for them to do so; but we were waiting for those applications. Now that we know they are not going to submit them, we will proceed with the evaluation and assessment without that kind of input.

As I say, Madam Speaker, it is their right to do that and I was not suggesting they were doing anything wrong. But the procedure was set up and we were only informed a few days ago that they would not be participating.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) has raised a question of privilege to indicate his disagreement with a reply given to him by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). He should know that the question of privilege cannot be used for that purpose. What we have here is indeed a divergence of opinion with the minister and the contents of his reply; that is quite clear, I think. Therefore, I would ask the hon. member to raise that question under different circumstances. For the moment I must rule that there is no ground for a question of privilege.

[English]

I recognize the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), as long as he is not speaking on the question of privilege that I have just ruled upon.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the question that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) was an important one that I had intended to rise on and address before you quickly ruled upon it.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

An hon. Member: You are questioning the Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: The accusation comes from the opposite side, from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, that I am questioning the ruling of the Speaker. He is not telling the truth because that is not what I am rising on. What I am rising on is a question that affects the privileges of all members of the House.

• (1210)

Mr. Chénier: Kick him out.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier) says "kick him out". I am sure an opposition is a bit of a nuisance, as described by his leader from time to time, and he would like to get rid of it entirely. But we do not operate in Canada yet as they do in Ghana, although the hon. member would like that to happen. The question that I raise affects the privileges of all members of this House and it affects the responsibilities of the minister involved in the previous question.

Even if there were a constituency advisory group, the final decision on these matters still rests with the minister. It was the practice of the Liberal government that preceded us, when asking for opinions from members of Parliament, that once the selections were made—if the member for Timmins-Chapleau will be patient he will hear the question of privilege that I am raising.

An hon. Member: He just has a big mouth, that is all.

Mr. Nielsen: The only time he opens his mouth is to change feet.

The privilege involved here is that the Liberal government that preceded us, after it had received the advice of members of Parliament on this side, would write a letter to the successful applicant for assistance saying that the minister was pleased to make that grant, making no mention of the participation of the member of Parliament. He would write to all of the unsuccessful applicants and tell them that their applications had been rejected after having consulted with their respective member of Parliament, and name him, so that the member of Parliament on this side was blamed for these rejections. That is what affects the privileges of the members of this House, and that perhaps explains the delay in the minister having these forms returned.

Perhaps the minister could rise in his place today and give his assurance as a member of the cabinet, as an hon. member of this House, that he will not follow that odious practice and blame members of Parliament on this side—I am sure that it did not happen over there—for the rejections. He might then find more co-operation. Will the minister give us that assurance? If he does not, it gives rise to a very serious question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: The minister is entitled not to reply to this intervention if that is his choice.

Does the hon. member want to speak on a question of privilege? I will not entertain any more interventions on that question of privilege because I have already ruled on it. I am sorry, but I cannot accept further representations from the hon. member.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, with great respect I must rise on a question of privilege respecting my rights and duties as a member of Parliament in serving my constituents. Some of my constituents are aware of the proceedings of this House and if those constituents read the proceedings of today's House with respect to this very important question of the youth employment program, I have a university and an institute of technology in my constituency, and I and all other members of Parliament, at least in this party, have submitted applications—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe that if the electors of the hon. member's constituency read Hansard they will have the full benefit of the discussion that has taken place in the House and they will be able to judge—

[Translation]

—whether they have been deprived of their rights, whether the electors have been deprived of their rights or whether the hon. member himself has been. I think that it is quite clear, judging by the interventions from both sides of the House, that this is matter of divergent opinions between one or several members and the minister who replied to statements made. I do not think that there are grounds for a question of privilege.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF FINAL REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON UNIFICATION OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of tabling in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), in both official languages, the final report of the Task Force on Unification of Armed Forces of Canada.

[English]

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKINNON—LACK OF OPPORTUNITY TO DEBATE TASK FORCE REPORT ON UNIFICATION OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning the document which the minister has just tabled. The practice of never hearing a statement on motions from a minister is infringing upon the privileges of members of this House. This particular minister has managed to choose a new fighter aircraft and has signed the largest contract ever signed in Canada without a statement on motions or giving members an opportunity to discuss the matter. Now we have this very important report commissioned by the former administration submitted to this minister six weeks ago tabled without comment.

This report is of great interest to the people of Canada, to the people in the armed forces and to this House. If we are not going to be given an opportunity to understand the government's position on this report, then the normal debate that is so healthy for our democracy is going to cease happening here. What we get are press releases and it is most difficult to debate things through a press release issued by the minister somewhere, some time and replied to somewhere, some time, by the opposition.

I would like to point out that the minister, who unfortunately left the House when I rose, would have had an opportunity to indicate the government's position on this report in reply to my raising this question of privilege. There are some 30 recommendations in the report. Perhaps he could say whether he accepts half of them or all of them or when he is going to accept them. At the very least he could have said he would refer it to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for consideration.

If the important business of the government is going to be conducted in this clandestine manner without public debate in this chamber, I feel that it infringes upon the privileges of all members and of Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, because of the intervention of the hon. member, I think it is important to define a few things at this point. All of this is covered in our standing orders. What the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) has just done is to make public and table a report. Nothing forces him to make a statement. Standing Order 15(3) stipulates that a minister "may", in French the word is peut, make a statement or announcement. The Minister of National Defence chose not to make one today. It is his privilege, his right to so choose; it is quite in order for him to do so.

The colleague who rose on a question of privilege, which it really is not, will have many opportunities of putting questions to the Minister of National Defence. He can do so during the oral question period that will follow tabling of this report, and also in committee when the estimates come up for study. Moreover, between now and December 10, the opposition will have 18 days allotted to them for the discussion of the topics of their choosing. In light of this, it is unfair to claim that the opposition is being deprived of the opportunity to discuss the report tabled today by the Minister of National Defence. On the contrary! All that is in the standing orders: As a matter of fact, they are most generous and provide the hon. member and his colleagues with ample opportunities to put questions and debate the subject dealt with in the report the Minister of National Defence tabled today. In closing, Madam Speaker, this is definitely not a matter of privilege and I think hon. members should see to it that this procedure of bringing up questions of privilege should be not be abused lest it no longer be taken seriously.

It may happen on occasion that hon. members' rights are really infringed upon. I would hate to see the day—because hon. members are developing the habit of getting into all sorts of political argument under the guise of questions of privilege—when our rights are really infringed upon and the question of privilege be ruled out of order because abuse will have been too obvious in the past.

[English]

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I feel that I must object to what was an extraordinary statement made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and government House leader. He stated in essence that members of his government feel obliged to cater to the democratic responsibilities of this institution only when the rules specifically demand them; otherwise we can resort to press releases and that type of debate. That is absolutely unacceptable and it certainly infringes on the privileges of the entire nation as well as members of this House.

● (1220)

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I find myself in the unusual position of agreeing with two speakers from the Conservative party on this question of privilege. In both instances in the last few weeks that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) has brought forward two very important positions on national defence, they have not been brought before the House. We are in a position right now where there are some very important questions to be answered with regard to the future of our armed forces, and the minister brings them in, tables them and does not allow us to debate the matter in this House.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) said that we are raising these questions of privilege so often that they will not be taken seriously. I submit that by the type of action the Minister of National Defence has carried on in the last few weeks, Parliament will not be taken seriously in the future if we are not allowed to debate important issues, issues that will make a major difference to our armed forces in the future.

There are some very important questions asked in this task force report. These are questions that must be answered very soon. Members of this House as the representatives of the people of Canada must be allowed to debate these questions and try and find some good solutions and answers to the problems. I urge that this question of privilege be upheld, that the minister make a statement and that we be allowed to question him on it.

Madam Speaker: The rules are quite clear. They stipulate that the minister may make a statement when he is tabling documents. That has to mean that he may decide not to make a statement when tabling documents, if he so chooses. That may be wise or unwise; it is not for the Chair to decide. The Chair cannot force a minister to make a statement when tabling a document.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Madam Speaker: May I refer at this point to the balloting practice which has been followed to determine the precedence for the introduction and first reading of Private Members' Public Bills. On today's order paper there are listed some 395 bills standing in the name of various hon. members.

It was not practical or possible for the Chair to review the provisions of each of those bills. Might I therefore suggest to the House that we adopt the procedure which was agreed upon in the past several sessions; namely, that we proceed to the introduction, first reading and orders for the printing of these bills so that each may be scrutinized between now and its being called for second reading in order to allow the Chair to consider whether there is any defect in the bills in respect of the practices and usages of the House.

I suggest that, by unanimous consent, all the Private Members' Public Bills listed for introduction on today's order paper be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading, ordered to be printed and to stand for second reading at the next sitting of the House, subject, as always, to a subsequent examination as to the regularity of each bill.

In order to ensure that bills at the top of the list will not have to stand because they have not been printed and distributed when called, I am requesting the Deputy Speaker, with the co-operation of the Table officers, to give the necessary instructions to ensure that printing and distribution priorities will reflect the order determined in the draw and, to that effect, the word "printed" will be added to the order paper entry for each bill when received by the distribution branch.

Is the procedure to which I have referred agreed to by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall all the questions stand?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is unusual there are no questions being answered. Perhaps there is an explanation. If there is, can the parliamentary secretary indicate to the House why that has happened?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that is a very good point. I would like to assure him that on Monday afternoon we will be giving more answers. It is just the way the answers have come back from the various departments. As hon. members know, we do not have any control over the actual answering; we rely on the process in the government departments.

I would like to point out, Madam Speaker, that I checked the records. The Thirty-first Parliament opened on Monday, October 9, 1979, and the Speech from the Throne occupied eight sitting days. On Tuesday, October 23, 1979, only one order paper question was answered, two weeks after Parliament opened.

I would like to point out that we started to answer questions immediately upon suspension of the throne speech debate, which in this case was only six days. Therefore, I think the government has an excellent record so far. If my friend would look at Hansard, the total number of questions answered thus far exceeds the number of questions answered by the government of which the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was a member.

Madam Speaker: Shall all the questions stand?

Mr. Alexander: Madam Speaker, I do not want to say it is the same old bunch, but I do not think I heard an answer to the question that was put. I now ask the parliamentary secretary if it is his intention to speed up the process whereby the answers that members of parliament require in order to satisfy their constituents can be done in an expeditious way. Never mind this flim-flamming and trying to slip and slide around the House. Answer the question in terms of what the hon. member intends to do in order to see to it that we do not have this embarrassing situation again whereby the parliamentary secretary stands up and says, "We will not be able to answer any questions today." That is unacceptable. Will he kindly answer the question that was put to him by the opposition House leader?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the expedition of these questions occupies me constantly. In my previous answer to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, I outlined that the government's record so far has been very admirable in answering questions. Certainly it is a much more admirable record than the one of the previous government in the Thirty-first Parliament.

Mr. Alexander: Answer my question.

Madam Speaker: Shall all the questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT

MEASURE TO IMPROVE PUBLIC SAFETY

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-18, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

He said: For the fourth time in two years, Madam Speaker, a government is calling upon Parliament to adopt transportation of dangerous goods legislation. The Hon. Otto Lang, the then minister of transport, introduced Bills C-53 and C-17 in May and November 1978, respectively. In turn, my immediate predecessor, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) introduced Bill C-25 in November 1979. These three bills, namely, Bills C-53, C-17 and C-25, have fallen victims to the parliamentary timetable.

As I refer to two previous attempts at legislating this increasingly important issue, I cannot gloss over hon. Jean Marchand's contribution. In 1973, he is the one who, as minister of transport, took upon himself to consult the various provincial governments for the purpose of streamlining their respective legislation and regulations concerning the highway transportation of dangerous goods. He is also the one who set up an interdepartmental committee to scrutinize the federal government's legislation and regulations concerning the transportation of goods.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, while it is unfortunate that this legislation should have been delayed so long, I believe that each return to square one has resulted in an improved bill. Indeed, each new version has received amendments incorporating suggestions found in submissions and comments made by industry and by provincial governments on the previous attempt. I will identify in committee only, because this is highly technical, the changes in Bill C-18 as compared with the former Bill C-25. On the other hand, other suggestions from industry have not been adopted and I will give reasons for rejecting them, again in the committee.

Another benefit derived from postponement is that more time has been available for informal consultation, particularly with industry, with respect to the development of the regulations which will be promulgated under this legislation. Finally in these introductory remarks—I should have said remarks introductory to my introductory remarks—in the time since the first proposal concerning the transportation of dangerous goods was submitted to this House, a number of accidents involving dangerous goods in transit has focused public attention on the subject. I consequently believe that growing public awareness of such risks will result in increased popular support for this legislation.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be the "minister most likely to succeed" in getting this legislation on to the statute books, because I intend to make safety one of my main preoccupations during my tenure at Transport Canada.

This is not an easy bill, Mr. Speaker. My reading of the proceedings of the previous committee persuaded me there was a great deal of frustration among members of that committee. The very breadth of the subject matter is one of the causes of that frustration. The concept of umbrella legislation is another, because it involves to a great extent the acceptance of much of the status quo as opposed to the entire fresh look which one sometimes finds in legislation. Indeed, in desperation, one of the members of the committee suggested that Bill C-25, the bill which preceded the one in front of us now, was a "do nothing bill" and some members of the public have made the same allegation. Well, then, what is Bill C-18 all about?

[Translation]

Let us look first at the situation as it exists now in this field of transportation of dangerous goods. At the federal level, we find all sorts of legislation—the Railway Act, the Aeronautics Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Nuclear Liability Act, the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, the national ports and harbours bill, the Explosives Act, the Fertilizers Act and so on—a whole series of more or less specialized legislation dealing with particular goods or with general areas.

At the provincial level, we also find a variety of legislation. The Ontario gasoline handling act, the Quebec explosives act, legislation on pressurized containers, prevention and many others, of course.

At the municipal level also, there has been a growing awareness of the risks to public safety caused by the transportation of dangerous goods in urban areas. That led, for example, to the drafting of municipal bylaws dealing with zoning and the transportation of those products. A number of self-regulating bodies—for example those responsible for the operation of bridges, tunnels, canals—are imposing conditions on the transportation of dangerous goods in or on such facilities.

So there is a considerable number of very varied legislation and regulations involving various penalties at the three levels of government.

Now, from a practical point of view, that leads to a lot of confusion and conflicts. I have here a paper from my department commenting on that. It reads, and I quote:

> Manufacturers, distributors and transporters of dangerous goods and their containers must sometimes ignore regulations or in certain circumstances contravene them directly to ensure the movement of those commodities.

The paper goes on to say:

> There is no harmony between policies and enforcement authority, and the strict implementation of existing regulations not only does not ensure security but in certain cases could worsen the damages that could be caused by an accident.

So the point I want to make here is that such an accumulation of unco-ordinated legislation generates untold difficulties for transporters and adversely affects the domestic and international trade of this country.

[English]

This confusion is an obvious one. I want to emphasize the confusing maze of regulation varying, according to the means of transport being used, the substance being shipped and the places to or from which the goods are being carried.

Now, Mr. Speaker, believing, unlike Hamlet, that it is nobler in the mind to take up arms against a sea of troubles and by opposing end them, my predecessors in Transport Canada and I found ourselves faced with three possible options. This is really the gist of the matter.

The first option would have been to issue a code to be adopted and enforced by agencies at the federal or at the provincial level, using their own laws and regulations. The government would have issued such a code in the hope that authorities—federal, provincial and municipal—would incorporate these standards in their legislation or regulations.

As a second option, we could through some constitutional means have totally pre-empted the field, rendered all existing laws invalid and introduced a single piece of federal legislation. That would have been a federal takeover of the area using some general power that the federal government has or some emergency power, whatever it is. So that would have been the second way of going at it.

A third way is to adopt a sufficiently broad umbrella legislation which will provide a focus for co-ordinated activity. All my predecessors, and I today, have chosen this third avenue as being the best of three very difficult options.

Clearly, a code of standards would be unlikely to result in uniform regulations or regulations that could be enforced uniformly, since the powers conferred by the various statutes to the implementing agencies are unequal. So are the penalties. In other words, this code would have been implemented differently by different orders of government or under different bills, and in some ways while it might have resulted in some relative progress, it might also have added to the confusion that presently exists. So that was not too good as an option.

The second, the pre-emptive act, would have occasioned a major disruption in the administration, for one thing, because all these agencies would now have been superseded by legislation and, presumably, by an organization of some kind which would have taken over all these responsibilities. Not terribly good either.

Another reason is, of course, the constitutional issue. Each person arrested or sentenced under this pre-emptive law could have claimed that the bill was unconstitutional. He would have taken any number of appeals, going right up to the Supreme Court of Canada. Lawyers would have been very busy, but transportation would not have been helped very much.

The third option is the one which was selected by my predecessors and which is selected now. It is the typical Canadian compromise. It offers an umbrella type of law, an umbrella under which we find a number of basic principles and references to other laws and regulations, trying to incorporate most of it. It is not an easy matter to handle. That is why so much co-operation will be needed on the part of federal and provincial agencies in order to bring the maximum degree of uniformity to this area of regulation governing the transportation of dangerous goods.

I have read the bill a number of times and I, too, find it frustrating. This is why the committee will have to accept the frustration and move as well as it can to get the best common denominator.

I was speaking to a friend the other day. Jean Paul Sartre has just died. As we know, he was the grandfather of existentialism. I referred to this bill as an existentialist one. It will be in constant devenir. It will be in constant fabrication in some ways. One does not go to school for so long in his life without wanting others to know about it at one point, and this, presumably, is what I am doing now. I just want to emphasize that there is really, in my view, no other way of going at it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to give a few basic elements on the contents of Bill C-18, for the benefit of those who are going to read my remarks. As I indicated, the objective is very simple. It is to establish a single legislation under which existing agencies, whether federal or provincial, can apply everywhere in Canada a set of regulations governing standards, procedures and labelling for the handling of dangerous goods by any means of transport.

This bill is an effort to consolidate existing regulations. The legislation establishes three new types of offence. First, the handling, the offer to transport or the transport of dangerous goods which do not comply with the regulations. This is the first offence. The second offence relates to packaging and labelling of dangerous goods which do not comply with the regulations.

A third offence concerns non-compliance with orders given by the minister or his agent in emergency situations.

The bill also provides for the appointment of inspectors who will be authorized to visit the premises, to inspect the goods, the packaging, the means of transport, the facilities and the warehouses, to take any measure deemed necessary or to request that such measures be taken, including the seizure, the removal and the destruction of dangerous products or goods and the evacuation of persons. Of course, these inspectors will also be able to issue tickets and deliver them to the offenders. However, once again, in most cases these inspectors will be those of the agencies already in existence at the various government levels. There is no question of creating a completely new inspection system for the administration of this act. The cost of this would obviously be prohibitive.

The bill also provides that inspectors and others will be able to take corrective action whenever there is an accident involving dangerous goods; it also provides a strict obligation concerning the expenses incurred by Her Majesty in right of Canada to prevent, remedy or repair any resulting damage. In other words, if an offender did not take preventive action before an accident occurs and Her Majesty is forced to repair the damages, Her Majesty will have a right of recourse against this offender. The bill also provides for inquiries to be made in all cases of accidents or incidents involving dangerous goods which have resulted in death or damage to property or the environment.

The minister or his agent can also issue orders to deem foreign standards equivalent or publish decrees in the areas where there are no general standards in Canada. In this way, we can simply adopt the measures which exist elsewhere in the world to use them internally.

The minister can also require information on the chemical composition of goods to determine first aid care to be given in an emergency. Everyone knows what this means. Some of these goods technically involve commercial secrets and if there is an accident, the minister will have the right to ask for the formula to determine the care to be given.

[English]

A few more pages, Mr. Speaker, a few words on the subject of regulations, a very popular subject in the last committee.

As I explained at the outset, the range and variety of the regulations attached to existing legislation is enormous. At the instigation of Senator Marchand, to whom I referred a moment ago, an interdepartmental committee was established to attempt to harmonize the regulations during the normal process of keeping them up to date. This exercise was frustrated by traditional practices in the industries affected and by the diversity of the various enabling acts. I hope I have at least given a clear impression of the diversity, variety and amplitude of the regulations existing in this area. I am trying to create a psychological climate. Much as we want to improve that situation, we have to be very realistic and know that progress will take time. Listening to us, and seeing us work in the committee, as we will, the public must not be possessed by aspirations and expectations which are immensely beyond the capacity of that law.

I am just trying to build a good amount of realism into this so that members of the committee and the public at large will know that, while progress can be made if there is a great amount of co-ordination, there are also a number of principles and rules which have to be firmly established. It will take years before we get the optimum result in this area. That is the practice of the art of the possible; that is what politics is all about.

● (1250)

Just over two years ago, in anticipation of this new legislation the Department of Transport issued a rough draft of the amalgamated regulations. Industrial associations were invited to comment, and since then two more drafts have been produced and circulated. Because of the need to identify some 3,000 individual substances and to regulate the design and construction of packaging containers and transport vehicles in which these products may be carried, the regulations appear bulky. In fact, they are less than half the number of regulations that now apply to the transportation of dangerous goods. A good deal of streamlining has taken place.

I have one more remark which I must make at this point. It is with reference to Mr. Justice Samuel Grange who, as hon. members are aware, is conducting an inquiry into the railway accident which occurred at Mississauga last November. A copy of Bill C-18 has been sent to commissioner Grange and I have requested that he provide us with comments on it to the extent that he sees fit to do so.

It is not the commissioner's mandate to examine Bill C-18, but I hope that as a result of his inquiry into the cause of the accident at Mississauga and the adequacy of existing railway regulations, he may have some suggestions to make about the bill, particularly concerning the regulation-making powers and the regulations themselves. Any comments that Mr. Justice Grange makes in his final report, which is expected in September, concerning regulatory reform will, of course, be available to the Standing Committee on Transport.

I want to urge hon. members not to consider delaying consideration of this bill until the report is tabled. Again this is a question of practicality. It is unfortunately to be expected that following the Grange report there will be other accidents and other inquiries, and if we decide to wait until we have all the inquiries made available to us as a committee, the certainty exists that we will never pass a bill. So again I think we must be very practical and, as far as possible, invite Mr. Justice Grange to the committee hearings and not wait until we get his full report in September before we move.

Finally, my predecessor once removed said that he was tackling this job with an open mind. I want to say that my mind is as open as his and that in working all together we might achieve a bill which will be the beginning of great things.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that one has the opportunity of making three speeches on the second reading of a bill in this chamber. I am in that rather unique position inasmuch as this is the third time that I have participated in the second reading debate on a bill entitled the transportation of dangerous goods act. As the minister has indicated, this bill has been before the House on three different occasions, and perhaps even on four.

Bill C-53 was introduced in May of 1978 and was never debated; it died on the order paper. It was repeated in the form of Bill C-17, which, I believe, was essentially the same. That was introduced in November, 1978, debated for about 20 or 30 minutes one Friday afternoon in February, and did not proceed beyond the half hour debate which took place in this House.

I believe it is important to lay that groundwork because, while this particular piece of legislation is important and while there was a considerable demand for it, it was not proceeded with immediately. As a matter of fact, I said at the time, and I have said this before, that during those days it was used more or less as a piece of legislation to fill out the activities of a Friday afternoon. The previous minister of transport on that occasion was not even in the House at the time second reading debate on that bill was introduced, so there was not a great deal of urgency attached to it at that time.

However, as the minister has indicated, the call for this kind of legislation has intensified rather dramatically, both from provincial and municipal levels of government as well as from the citizenry at large. As he has indicated as well, there have been a number of accidents. I can well appreciate what the minister said when he pointed out that trying to put together a piece of legislation which would co-ordinate all the rules and regulations and provide the necessary uniformity which could be understood and respected at all levels is a truly tangled web.

I can say to the House and to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) that our government recognized the importance of this legislation. We recognized that, given the complexity of the situation, it required intensive consultations and discussions with the provinces, with municipalities and indeed with the industry because, if this bid is to work, it must have the co-operation of all levels of government.

It must also have the respect and the understanding of the industry because, as I said, I believe, when I introduced the former Bill C-25 last November, it provides for inspectors; but we cannot have an inspector in every trailer or every train, so there has to be that kind of an understanding. As has been alluded to by the minister, the bill that we introduced was an improvement over the previous one. I agree with him when he used the phrase "constant fabrication". I am sure that this kind of legislation will evolve because in many cases we are breaking new ground and it is undoubtedly true that we all want the most effective instrument possible to do the job.

We commenced the review of the previous Bill C-17 immediately after we assumed office in early June and recognized that the effectiveness of that bill would only come about with the co-operation of the provinces and the understanding of the industry. We recognized very quickly that if this legislation was to be successful, we could not take unilateral action but rather should move in a co-operative fashion.

Our bill was restructured rather extensively, but the objectives remained the same. We feel that essentially we strengthened the bill in some areas, and we have felt that some of the federal-provincial issues were clarified, we had hoped in the spirit of promoting greater understanding and respect for the legislation. Also we wanted to relieve somewhat the regulatory burden imposed upon the industry itself. I am sure that these discussions have been going on since this our bill was introduced and since it died on the order paper. I suggest that discussions should continue even though this bill might very well pass into law in this Parliament.

I should like to pay tribute to and commend the former minister of transport, now in the other place, who set up the mechanism for developing the necessary framework to proceed with this bill. I think it required a lot of patience. I am sorry that the bill did not become law when we introduced it on November 19. It was given second reading on November 27 and it was our intention to enshrine the previous Bill C-25 in our law books in early January, because at that time there was some sense of urgency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rose): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. At one o'clock the House was taking into consideration Bill C-18, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) had the floor. I understand the hon. member for Vegreville is prepared to recognize the distinction between Madam Speaker and Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I have not really made that conversion in total, but I will have no trouble referring to Your Honour as Mr. Speaker.

Also I should like to point out that I am very pleased the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) is in the House this afternoon, because he too had a role to play in the facilitation of the passage of legislation dealing with the transportation of dangerous goods, inasmuch as it was he who introduced the previous Bill C-17 on Friday, February 16, 1979. I had the opportunity of responding to his intervention at that time. As I pointed out for the benefit of hon. members earlier, this is the third occasion on which I have intervened on second reading of this kind of bill to enact a transportation of dangerous goods act.

• (1410)

Prior to the adjournment I had indicated that our government introduced Bill C-25 on November 19, 1979. Second reading took place on November 27, 1979, and the bill had been passed on to committee. It was our intention that this bill be passed into law in early January. At that time there was a great sense of urgency about the passage of this legislation.

The opposition NDP-Liberal alliance were huffing and puffing for legislative action which had arisen largely as a result of the misfortune that occurred at Mississauga. We responded at that time with our bill. At the time the House of Commons became infiltrated with instant experts in all sorts of areas related to the transportation of dangerous goods. There were all sorts of charges and countercharges. Our government responded shortly thereafter by introducing our bill. The accident had occurred either on November 11 or November 12. We responded and the opposition stonewalled once we got into committee. There were all sorts of objections. They wanted to see regulations. They introduced all kinds of committee manoeuvres and tactics to see that the bill did not proceed.

The Minister of Transport has talked about realism, and I agree with the minister. He was not involved in the committee at that time, but I am sure that he has looked at the committee proceedings, and noticed that there was not a heck of a lot of realism among the NDP and Liberal members on that committee. There were such charges as, for instance, cutbacks in the CTC and cutbacks in safety inspectors.

Just to set the record straight, the initiative of any cutbacks within the CTC was taken by the formal Liberal administration. There were some 100 person-years to be reduced. it was up to the discretion of the CTC the president of the CTC to determine where those cutbacks should take place. It was up to him to determine if they would be at the administrative level, the secondary level or within the safety inspector services. That was a decision which was made by the CTC, and that charge cannot be accurately laid at our government's feet.

The stonewalling also consisted of a demand to see the regulations, which included some 1200 pages. I defy any member of this House to understand such a volume with any degree of expertise. We introduced the regulations. It was one of the first occasions in the history of parliamentary procedure in this country wherein the regulations were submitted to the committee for consideration at the same time as the bill was under consideration. That was the kind of co-operation and response which this government undertook to alleviate a very urgent and pressing situation. We gave the committee what they wanted, we extended the committee sittings, but the forces of the NDP and Liberal holy alliance played politics and stonewalled. As a result of those manoeuvres, the legislation is not in effect today. Those two parties huffed and puffed about all sorts of things.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They blew the House down.

Mr. Mazankowski: But, lo and behold, on December 13 they had other things in mind. Dangerous goods legislation was no longer a priority. It no longer had a sense of urgency and political opportunism overrode safety considerations. So here we are once again, dealing with this piece of legislation which should have been enshrined in the law many, many months ago.

Mr. Evans: Let's get on with it then.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says "Let's get on with it". That is precisely what we intend to do. We will not stonewall, and I give the Minister of Transport and the hon. member that commitment. This legislation is needed very badly.

I am amazed at the cynicism and irresponsibility of some of the hon. members who served on that committee, not for the purpose of moving the bill and passing it into law, but for the purpose of playing politics and scoring political points. Like many other measures introduced by our government, this measure was deferred and delayed indefinitely. Some of our other good measures have been cancelled completely. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am not directing my remarks to the Minister of Transport; he was not involved at the time, nor did he participate.

It is not my intention to review this matter unduly because it is political history, but those members who are responsible I hope will reflect on their performance. I am sure that they will recognize that they probably acted in bad faith and not in a spirit consistent with parliamentary democracy.

I believe that this bill should be dealt with in the most non-partisan fashion possible. I refer to the incidents which I have mentioned only because they did occur. It is not because there was a basic objection to the bill or because there was disagreement with the principles of the bill, but because some members wanted to participate in political gamesmanship.

We on this side support the principal objectives of this bill. The bill has the same objectives as the previous bills, and I do not wish to go into detail. The minister has pointed out the number of areas in which changes have been made. I am sure that those changes have been made for the better and will serve to strengthen and provide a more effective piece of legislation. That is good. This Parliament should demand the most effective piece of legislation possible because our citizens demand it.

I submit, as the minister has indicated, that this legislation will probably evolve, because of the kind of flexibility incorporated into this bill which will allow changes and amendments to take place from time to time, into a solid piece of legislation. I am sure that, on the basis of experience, many good recommendations and suggestions will flow from the Grange report which the minister will table, and I am particularly pleased that the minister has indicated that he welcomes any suggestions submitted to him by the Grange commission.

I agree with the minister that it is not necessary to delay the passage of this bill when there are the necessary provisions to incorporate further changes to the bill including any further recommendations. Naturally, based upon previous experience of the administration of this bill, undoubtedly there will be a demand for changes and modifications to the regulations and to certain specific provisions of this piece of legislation.

Reference has been made to the regulations. Surely the regulations are the core of this bill. What we have in terms of the legislative framework are not simply the principles but the real heart and core of the bill. The bill's provisions are very complex and technical in nature, but I would hope that during the committee proceedings we will have an opportunity to hear an overview of the latest version of the regulations in the clearest form possible.

I understand that there have been continuing consultations with the provinces and industry with respect to the development of the best set of regulations that can be utilized and implemented. We would like to have an opportunity to look at these recommendations and to deal with them to ensure, in a parliamentary and official sense, that those who may have some reservations or concerns about any part of the bill will have the opportunity to express their views in committee.

We will also want to invite witnesses to participate in the further discussion of this legislation. It is not our intention to delay unduly passage of the bill as it seems to have been around for some time, but it would only make sense to allow the provinces, if necessary, industrial components and municipal government or associations that have a concern about the legislation to have the opportunity to state their views before the committee in an official capacity.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the Minister of Transport for introducing the bill early in the session. I also want to pay tribute to the dangerous goods branch in the Department of Transport. We are very fortunate in this country to have a branch served by such competent, dedicated and committed people. I refer particularly to Mr. Duncan Ellison who worked for many years on this legislation. It has been a very demanding job and I think he tried to accommodate all the views put forward in a manner which is consistent with the theme of the legislation. Taking into consideration the complexity of the bill and its legal ramifications, I think the department and indeed the nation is well served by Mr. Ellison and his colleagues, and I want to compliment them at this time.

I should also like to assure the minister that we on this side of the House will co-operate to see that the bill proceeds. We will want to deal with the various clauses and hope we can receive testimony from witnesses at the committee hearings, but it is not our intention to delay unduly its passage; rather, it is our intention to ensure we have the most effective and workable piece of legislation that is possible in order to satisfy a very important need.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my approval of this bill being brought before the House so early in the session. In principle, our party approves of the bill which is entitled the transportation of dangerous goods act. As the previous speaker indicated on behalf of his party, and as I might indicate on behalf of this party, we will not unduly delay its passage.

I do feel constrained, however, to correct the record because of the distorted recollections of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) regarding what went on last fall. As one who participated in that process and represented my party on the transportation committee when the bill came before it, I must point out that at that time we requested from the then minister of transport no more than the hon. member for Vegreville has indicated he wants from the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)—that witnesses be called and questioned on various aspects of the legislation. It certainly was not our intention then, and it is not our intention now, to delay passage of the bill.

If anyone was acting in a politically opportunistic way last fall, it was the Progressive Conservative government. In response to the Mississauga event, they created the impression that the transportation of dangerous goods legislation was a panacea for the kind of anxiety that was created in the public mind as a result of that event. They pretended to bring forward legislation that they had intended to bring forward anyway as a very fast response to the Mississauga event. In fact, it had been on the order paper of the previous Liberal government and was something that the New Democratic Party had brought up before the Mississauga incident.

In my first question in this House I asked the then minister of the environment when he intended to bring forward legislation on the transportation of dangerous goods. That was exactly one month before the Mississauga event. The minister of the day replied "Yes, and soon." Mr. Speaker, that was my first lesson in how to put a question and how not to be put off with short answers. I learned how to get in my supplementaries.

The fact is that the government intended to bring the legislation forward in any case, and for the hon. member for Vegreville to say his party was responding to the Mississauga event was a distortion of history.

Mr. Mazankowski: Stop distorting the facts.

Mr. Blaikie: Let us have a little accuracy when we talk about history.

Bill C-18 is basically the same bill as was Bill C-25 in the last Parliament. There are some changes which it is important to note for the benefit of the record. For instance, in the new bill there are more ways to defend a charge that a person has contravened safety regulations. Under the new bill a person must establish only that he acted in good faith and took reasonable measures. Under the old bill he had also to prove that his contravention of regulation was not caused by his acts or omissions.

Another change is that when property seized by an inspector is essential to the livelihood of the person who wanted it returned that is no longer one of the reasons for it to be returned. This comes under subsection 15(4).

Under the old bill there was a duty to report an accident or incident that results in a discharge, emission or escape of dangerous goods. Under the new bill there is a duty to report a discharge, emission or escape of dangerous goods. This is an improvement because it broadens the scope with which the bill may be brought to bear on dangerous products.

Under the old bill the government could recover costs of emergency action from a person unless he established that he complied with the regulations. Under the new bill the government could recover costs unless he established on balance of probabilities that he and others for whom he is responsible complied with the regulations.

Under the old bill inspectors did not have the power to seize or remove dangerous goods if there was imminent danger to the environment. Under the new bill they have that power. The new bill does not, however, restore the power of the minister to hold an inquiry if a discharge, emission or escape of dangerous goods results in damage or danger to the environment. It is in this area that we may offer some amendments in committee to restore the environment as a reason for the minister to be able to hold an inquiry. In our view, damage to the environment should be regarded equally as serious as damage to life, health or property.

Two new powers of making regulations are given to the governor in council. First, that of prescribing circumstances in which the handling, offering for transport or transporting of dangerous goods is prohibited; and second, that of specifying dangerous goods that shall not be handled, offered or transported in any circumstances. This should give the power to make regulations affecting modal safety in addition to labelling. In the past, however, the government has not had the will to get tough with the railways and there is not much reason for hope in this area.

These are some of the provisions in the bill before the House which were not contained in Bill C-25 as introduced by the last Progressive Conservative government—and one hopes it was the last Progressive Conservative government.

Mr. Nystrom: You mean "regressive" Conservative government.

Mr. Blaikie: Yes, regressive Conservative government. It is important to clear up some of the false expectations that have been created in expectation of passage of this legislation. There is a public anxiety about the transportation of dangerous products as a result of the Mississauga event and the subsequent derailment in MacGregor, Manitoba.

It is important to clear up false expectations about this legislation. Not that the legislation is bad in and of itself; indeed as we have already said, it is good legislation in that it harmonizes and integrates what was once a rather piecemeal approach to the regulation of dangerous goods. In so far as its intentions are concerned, this is a good bill.

I have said what the bill will accomplish, Mr. Speaker, but I think that it is important to put on the record what it will not accomplish. I have read far too many newspaper articles and editorials over the last several months, particularly since the MacGregor spill in Manitoba, which call for the speedy passage of this legislation, in a way that suggested that the passage of this legislation would somehow prevent rail disasters such as that at Mississauga or MacGregor. This is an illusion that must be dispelled.

● (1430)

As I said before, the legislation in itself is a good thing, but it does not pertain, for instance, to rail safety as such, according to Transport Canada officials who appeared before the House of Commons transport committee. This is why I think it is so important to bring this point up. It is the testimony of Transport Canada officials themselves which clears up the expectation that somehow this bill deals with rail safety.

On November 29, 1979, in response to questions posed by myself and by the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley), Transport Canada officials in their answers before the committee indicated that the transportation of dangerous goods legislation had nothing to do with rail safety as such—whether or not cars containing dangerous goods were to have roller bearings, or were to have the traditional friction bearings, or whether the tracks on which the dangerous goods were to be carried were safe and well maintained. This all had to do with regulations that came under the auspices of the Canadian Transport Commission. It had nothing to do with the transportation of dangerous goods bill. From testimony that I have before me, which I will not read into the record but ask members to look it up for themselves, it appears that the only thing the proposed dangerous goods act would change with regard to the Mississauga derailment is that hopefully when firemen arrived at the scene they would know what was in the cars. They would know what had actually spilled in the derailment. This is an improvement not to be taken lightly, but it has nothing to do with whether the derailment would have occurred in the first place. Transport Canada witnesses consistently, when asked about the proposed legislation's effect on the rail safety aspect of the transportation of dangerous goods, said that this question was under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission.

This brings me to a second area of concern, and that is the role of the Canadian Transport Commission. Under section 227 of the Railway Act the CTC may make regulations; and under section 296 the railways are required to carry dangerous goods in conformity with the CTC's regulations. Clearly a good deal of responsibility has rested and continues to rest with the Canadian Transport Commission in seeing to it that the public and the employees of the railroads, or for that matter employees of any other mode of transport, are protected.

Along with that responsibility, the Canadian Transport Commission should be given the resources to do the job. For example, the CTC will require more safety inspectors to ensure that its regulations are being adhered to. I admit the hon. member for Vegreville was right on one thing: government restraint was not a creation of the Progressive Conservative government, it was something that started long before when the Liberal party, prior to the election of May 22, began to prove conclusively that it is the second right wing party in Canada. This government restraint had already begun to affect the Canadian Transport Commission. I do not quote my own imagination here; I quote what the president of the Canadian Transport Commission said before the House of Commons transport committee, as follows:

> The people we have I think do a pretty good job based on the numbers we have spread across the country, which I think is something like 78 (rail safety inspectors), which bothers me. It probably should be 178 instead of 78.

On November 13, 1979, Mr. John Magee, commissioner of the Canadian Transport Commission, testified before the same transport committee that the Treasury Board directed the CTC to reduce its staff even further. The recently published annual report of the Canadian Transport Commission showed an 11.4 per cent reduction in person-years assigned to the work of the commission.

It is a federal responsibility to make best use of existing authority. Therefore, the restraint program as it affects rail safety must be eliminated immediately. In this as in other areas, the public well-being should not be sacrificed to ideological obsessions about government spending. As well, the federal government, through the Minister of Transport, has the power already under section 100 of the Railway Act to apply to the CTC for an order that a railway company constructing a railway which has been aided by a subsidy from the Government of Canada make repairs, additions or improvements to its lines or equipment to promote safety and efficiency. If the company fails to comply with the order, the Crown can put a first lien or mortgage on the railway company for the amount of the subsidy.The power has always existed to promote greater rail safety; it is a power which simply has not been used.

A third area of concern has to do with the fact that railway companies in this country are chartered to render a service to the people of Canada in a safe, efficient manner whether dangerous goods are on board or not; but the railways are carrying more and more freight with fewer and fewer employees. The number of person-hours required to run Canadian railroads decreased 39.5 per cent between 1956 and 1975, while the amount of freight carried increased 86.8 per cent during the same period. Between 1976 and 1977, Canadian railways eliminated 60,000 jobs, 31,000 of which were eliminated from road and equipment maintenance, a policy which directly affected safety.

We respectfully suggest that the Canadian Transport Commission be instructed to review the guidelines so that the railways are required to have adequate numbers of maintenance employees for tracks, adequate numbers of employees to do the switching of freight cars and an adequate number of employees to work in all aspects of safety as it pertains to the railroads. In addition to keeping an adequate number of employees, the railways must be required to modernize their plant and equipment. Hotbox detectors should be installed along the heavily travelled main lines. Roller bearings should be installed on all cars carrying dangerous goods. Of course, too, even this will not deal with the problem adequately since the freight car carrying dangerous goods is not always the one that causes the derailment, a fact which points up again the need for general rail safety as a component of safety as it applies to dangerous goods.

The movement of certain dangerous goods may be required in the national interest. Therefore the nation should share the responsibility. Society at large, through its elected officials, should have the right and the responsibility to make decisions about whether particular dangerous goods should move and under what conditions, taking into account all costs and benefits to society, not just the conventional business costs and benefits to a private company.

An appropriate public policy toward dangerous goods shipments must balance the cost of the risk of moving a particular goods with the benefit of having the goods transported. We believe that when it comes to dangerous goods moving in large volumes by rail, the motivation of profit, as the supplier of transportation service, cannot possibly meet the test of balancing all costs and benefits to society.

We support social ownership of railways and the public ownership of Canadian Pacific, because we support the principle of integration of the entire transportation system; that railway transportation not only be perceived as but truly be an instrument of national policy directed toward national unity and economic development. The NDP insist that rail transport receive the massive long-term investment it needs to purchase equipment, improve roadbeds and electrify major heavy traffic sections of transport corridors. I say this in order that the headline from a Winnipeg newspaper I read recently which said that the eighties belong to the railways may become a reality, instead of a dream in this energy crisis situation in which we find ourselves.

Crown corporations like VIA Rail should become an instrument through which there can be a restoration of passenger service in this country, instead of a Crown corporation supervising the demise of same. Crown corporations have a role not only to ensure economic benefits to the public, but to ensure that economic development happens in a human and environmentally sound way, free as they are—although I know it bothers my colleagues to the right—from strict profit considerations.

• (1440)

While we are convinced that an accountable, publicly spirited management of our railways would significantly improve railway safety, it would be naive to think that railway accidents involving dangerous goods can be totally eliminated. Accidents on the railways will occur from time to time.

Mr. Benjamin: And trucks.

Mr. Blaikie: Accidents will occur from time to time with trucks, airplanes and all manner of transport.

One of the things I regret about the focus which has been placed on the whole issue of the transportation of dangerous goods is that so much has been said about rail transport as a result of the Mississauga event. Sometimes it appears we have completely forgotten that dangerous goods are transported in planes, trucks, boats, and other modes of transportation that I leave to the imagination of hon. members. Therefore, it is not just rail safety which is at stake here. However, it is important to concentrate on it today because it is rail safety that is in the mind of the public as a result of the events at Mississauga and MacGregor. The best way to reduce the frequency and severity of these accidents is to reduce the amount of hazardous substances being transported. To do this, we must address the question of our dependence on non-renewable resources, which is my final concern.

We must consider the non-transportation solutions, such as reducing our dependence on non-renewable resources and changing our lifestyles accordingly. Too often we seek as a civilization, never mind just here in Canada, only technological solutions to technological problems, thus compounding our problems by refusing to see that certain technologies as such may be the root of a problem. For instance, our traditional sources of fibres and household goods, such as cotton, leather, and wood, have been replaced by synthetic goods and fibre which are extracted from and/or manufactured with the aid of non-renewable dangerous goods. This has created great conveniences in our way of life, and even greater profit for those who had the advantage of owning and marketing these new technologies and goods. But all this has happened at the expense of the environment, of those left out of work by the abandoning of labour-intensive technologies and of upcoming generations whose access to non-renewable resources for those purposes which only particular non-renewable resources can serve will be severely limited.

Consumption and disposal rather than repair and recycling has created a deficit for the future far greater in real terms than anything governments can do by way of deficit spending or borrowing, because non-renewable resources cannot be paid back. We would be far greater served as a country and as a Parliament if my colleagues on my right spent as much time whining about the deficit in non-renewable resources as they do about the deficit of the government when it comes to budget time.

In recent years more and more attention has come to be paid to the environment, both as it pertains to the non-human environment and as it pertains to human health. But we have a long way to go before we mature into a society that wants to know, and does know, the full effects of its way of living on human life and health, and on the rest of creation in and with which we must live. The science of toxicology, and especially of eco-toxicology, is in its embryonic stage. The fact that so very few people in the recent MacGregor spill in Manitoba seemed to know about the carcinogenic qualities of vinyl chloride, and the confusion which prevailed about the best way of dealing with it, cannot be reduced in the final analysis to the abilities or inabilities of those actually involved or to the legislation that was or was not in force at the time.

Society as a whole has been and continues to be guilty of gross negligence in the attention it pays to actual and potential harm being done to human life by dangerous products, whether it be asbestos, PCBs, methylmercury, arsenic or acid rain, or radiation, to mention a few. We must stand up and take note and consider for once that perhaps we should mend our ways and our doings, lest we find that we have sown the wind and reaped the whirlwind in the form of ecological disasters as yet unrealized but maybe only a short time away, given the often exponential evolution of ecological effects.

In the meantime, before we come to our senses about technology and a great many of the things we are up to these days, the federal government has its responsibilities, the Canadian Transport Commission has its responsibilities and the railways have their responsibilities to see to it that dangerous goods which continue to be transported are transported safely, through special measures designed to take into account the existence of these products. And that is how I see this particular bill. But we will only know how good a bill this is when we have had some time to see what the regulations are like, how they are enforced, whether the new bureaucracy that is created under the auspices of this bill has the money to enforce the new regulations, whether there is the political will to make this bill work. We will only know that as time passes.

However, it is a step in the right direction. In the meantime, as I said before, the government, the Canadian Transport Commission and the railways have a responsibility to ensure that the general context of safety, whether it pertains to rail, air, or marine transportation, is improved so that we do not have derailments and the like in the first place.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-18. In Winnipeg, Manitoba, we have had some very serious rail spills and some other very serious problems dealing with rail relocation. This has caused the citizens of Winnipeg some concern over the last couple of years.

The minister stated that he does not want delays with this bill. I can assure him we will act in a more responsible manner than we saw the NDP and the Liberals act in the last Parliament, especially in the transport committee. In the middle of the committee meetings, they wanted to put aside the transportation of dangerous goods bill and to call in Air Canada. So much for their being so concerned and worried about the transportation of dangerous goods. They are not the least bit interested at all and their actions in the committee fully back up my statement. It was only a contest of filibustering and blocking.

I want to congratulate the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on the swift action he took with regard to the Mississauga tragedy. He initiated a judicial inquiry immediately. I want to touch on the terms of reference on the appointing of that judicial inquiry and I will do that in just a moment.

The minister stated that we are going to benefit from the delays in passing these bills. I do not agree with that at all. These delays have allowed more time for spills, something I am going to touch on this afternoon. Tell the people from Mississauga that we are going to delay and stall this type of legislation!

When the hon. member for Vegreville appointed the judicial inquiry to look into the Mississauga tragedy, which probably was one of the most severe rail tragedies in Canadian history resulting in an evacuation of a quarter of a million people, it was not to be the panacea to end all rail accidents for all time. It was something he had to do and he did it immediately.

The commission was asked to inquire into the contributing factors and causes of the derailment at Mississauga, Ontario on November 10, 1979 and the subsequent accident; the steps which could be reasonably taken to reduce the risk of recurrence of such an accident; the level and adequacy of existing federal law, regulations, rules and standards and of the practices and procedures governing railway safety with respect to this accident and the prevention of future similar accidents involving the handling of and the carriage of dangerous goods by rail.

If we had completed the former Bill C-25 in the committee hearings last year, it could have been law by January and we would have been months ahead in dealing with this serious problem, instead of asking for Air Canada to come before us in the middle of the committee meetings.

I have been concerned about rail safety for some time. I made inquiries of a previous minister of transport in 1977. A matter was brought to my attention regarding the possible explosion occurring at the Symington yards in Winnipeg during handling of propane tank cars. I received an assurance from the minister's department that in the handling of liquefied petroleum gas carloads they took the following precautions. Perhaps I might put part of that assurance on record:

● (1450)

The commodity code for liquefied petroleum gas produces a computer generated instruction with the advance journal which requires:

When humping—LPG carloads to be humped singly, and car following the LPG car into same class track to be humped singly.

When flat switching—LPG carloads to be shoved to rest, and car following the LPG car into same track to be shoved to rest.

I understand these self-imposed instructions, bulletined to all yardmasters, car retarder operators, yardmen and enginemen, are reissued monthly and are being practiced. What we have to find out as we proceed with this bill is whether all these instructions and guidelines are being followed.

We have another serious problem in Winnipeg. I was hoping that the minister would have been able to make a statement yesterday or today about whether he has found it possible to obtain funds from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for rail relocation in Winnipeg. He said he would tell us within a week and Thursday was the end of the week. Today is Friday, yet we have had no statement from the minister.

This is causing us great concern in Winnipeg. Costs are multiplying for the city council in consequence of the delays; we do not know whether they are going to provide $100 million for CP Rail relocation, we do not know whether we are going to get a permit to put in the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass, we do not know whether the city is to be reimbursed to the extent of $3 million in respect of the delay and the added cost for building the overpass. So we are actually more confused than ever as a result of this bill dealing with the transportation of dangerous goods because of this stalling and procrastination.

I cannot put the blame entirely on the shoulders of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) because I think the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) has done a real job of leading hon. members opposite up the garden path into this business of providing funds for rail relocation. I do not think the government has any intention of providing or intended at any time to provide, $100 million as its share of rail relocation.

I want to touch on the serious concern in Winnipeg on the subject of rail relocation and the transportation of dangerous goods and, in doing so, to quote part of an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 26. It stated:

> Federal Liberal politicians, such as Lloyd Axworthy, played around with the relocation question for political advantage. Now that they are safely in power again, the Liberals cynically reject any help, even financial support for the overpass which has climbed in cost by several million dollars because of their manoeuvring.

That is an example of what we have been going through with the Liberals and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry for the last couple of years since he started interfering with the plans of the city of Winnipeg.

One cause of our concern is a recent CP tank car spill in Winnipeg when a tanker car containing highly flammable liquid methanol was punctured after being sideswiped by an eastbound train in CP Rail's Winnipeg yards on Higgins Avenue north of Lizzie Street. About 13,000 of the derailed car's 25,000 gallons of methanol leaked into the atmosphere during the night.

The people of Winnipeg are naturally fearful about such accidents. They wonder whether there is likely to be a continuance of such hazards. Is rail relocation to take place or not? The minister has a responsibility to the House and to the citizens of Manitoba to make a statement on this. I should like to have the hon. gentleman's attention, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the NDP member who is engaging him in conversation would speak to him later. As I was saying, I hope a statement will be forthcoming from the minister as to whether funding will be available, whether the federal government intends to drop all plans for rail relocation, or whether it intends to provide the $100 million required in this connection. I think we are entitled to an answer from the minister on this issue.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He could do it when he sums up.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Our House leader suggests it could be done during the summing up and I hope he will do it then.

I might add that the Winnipeg Free Press also has covered this subject of rail relocation along with the transportation of dangerous goods. It did so very accurately in a recent editorial under the headline "Mr. Axworthy's dead end". This editorial stated in part:

> There was no need for a delegation consisting of the mayor, councillors, city officials and the minister of urban affairs to traipse down to Ottawa to get that simple answer (that no funds were available). Mr. Axworthy belongs to the same cabinet as Mr. Pepin. Former city councillor Bob Bockstael is his parliamentary secretary. They could have determined much more quickly that relocation of the yards is not on. They could have passed that message to city councillors instead of getting them cranked up to push for relocation. If they cannot do that, it is not clear what use it is having Winnipeggers in the government or close to it.
> Councillors and the city at large should be wiser for the experience. Mr. Axworthy can promise but he cannot necessarily deliver.

I trust the minister will deliver and straighten out the dilemma which the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry has caused for us by his interference in this issue of rail relocation.

A member across the way interjects that the minister thinks very highly of me. What he thinks of me is of no concern to me and I shall lose no sleep about it. I will continue to expose him at every opportunity for what he is—nothing but a political opportunist. The city council and the people of Winnipeg are finally wise to him.

Talking about political opportunism, in the Liberal TV commercials during the last election they could not have picked a better individual to lie for them on the problem on interest rates, saying day after day that interest rates should not have gone up, they should not have gone up. If they should not have gone up, then they should have gone down.

Some hon. Members: Ord :r!

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) naturally goes on at great length and in a very partisan way. We are all used to that. We have know him for many years. But he said a few moments ago that the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), the Minister of Employment and Immigration, lied.

An hon. Member: No, he did not.

Mr. Collenette: That is how it sounded and I should like to check the blues. If he did say that, if he accuses any member of this House of lying, I would ask him to withdraw that statement forthwith.

Mr. McKenzie: What I said, Mr. Speaker, was that they could not have picked a better man to lie for them. I said it collectively. I did not single out one Liberal. He was speaking on behalf of the Liberal party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne, Northumberland-Miramichi): Order, please. It seems to me the debate is deteriorating below an acceptable level.

Mr. Hees: The understatement of the week!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne, Northumberland-Miramichi): It is a commonly accepted principle of the House that one member does not reflect upon the character of another, and I would ask that hon. members adhere to this convention.

• (1500)

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to give notice that I reserve the right on behalf of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), to raise a question of privilege should the blues show that the hon. member impugned his character, whether he was referring to him directly or by implication. I would like to reserve that right. Perhaps on Monday we will raise a question of privilege, if we so find in the record of the House.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I hope that that is raised on Monday. I would welcome another opportunity to enter into that debate. The hon. member can be my guest.

As I said earlier, there is not going to be any delay on this side in dealing with this bill, but I want to ask the minister once again whether he will finally clear up the issue about providing funds for rail relocation in Winnipeg or in any other city, and will he make a statement as to whether he is going to issue a permit to the city of Winnipeg for the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass?

I have to insist that the minister give serious consideration to providing $3 million in funds to the city of Winnipeg to cover the additional cost of the delay which was brought about at the insistence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the previous Liberal minister of transport. I hope the minister will not lead us down the garden path any longer as has been done with the city of Winnipeg for the last 14 months, and I hope he will seriously consider clearing that up this afternoon.

Mr. Benjamin: Regina has been waiting six years.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be standing to speak about Bill C-18, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods. I am particularly pleased to be speaking about this because people I know are seriously concerned about dangerous situations surrounding the port of Vancouver and particularly in my riding, the riding of Vancouver East.

My colleague has said that we approve this bill as far as it goes, and I might say to my colleagues to my right that this is the stand we took on Bill C-25 in the last House. We approve this bill, and we want it passed quickly.

The bill provides for safety standards for labelling and packaging of dangerous goods. This is necessary. The bill establishes policy for more inspectors. This is absolutely essential, and I would like to point out to the minister that in the B.C.-Yukon area I understand that there has been only one inspector to enforce federal safety regulations in the past. This bill also proposes legislation to enforce safety guidelines strictly, and this, of course, we need very much.

However, there are several essential points and questions I would like to raise, just as I raised these questions when we dealt with Bill C-25.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Raise them in committee.

Mrs. Mitchell: Will the bill cover dangerous situations in all modes of transportation?

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

Mrs. Mitchell: I think not. For example, in our riding of Vancouver East there have been several situations where trucks carrying dangerous products have overturned on roads. There have been explosive and potentially very dangerous situations, requiring evacuation of our citizens.

The roads to the port are extremely dangerous. The planning—or lack of planning—of the federal government has never accommodated the development of a Vanterm on our waterfront. I have driven the roads on our waterfront, and workers in that area have pointed out to me that terminal trucks getting out of the waterfront area must pull up over railway tracks at intersections. Nothing is being done to develop proper access to our port areas. There are very dangerous situations.

We also have a convergence of both aeroplanes and ships coming into our port. There have been major incidents in the past which have been very serious. Ships carrying explosives have gone into our port threatening three, if not four, very important and densely populated ridings.

I know my colleagues will be speaking at length about the problems regarding rail transportation. In my riding of Vancouver East there have been several situations where there have been runaway cars. In one case there were explosive materials, and voluntary evacuation of the area was required. I stress "voluntary", because there appears to be no one authority responsibie for the over-all co-ordination of safety regulations in this area. This situation at the port of Vancouver, which involves four major ridings, is not peculiar just to the west coast. I am sure it also affects other similar waterfront areas across our country.

What authority will this bill provide municipalities and other levels of government to enforce safety regulations? For example, I am told by the Vancouver fire department that there is no advance warning to them about dangerous commodities which are going to be transported by CP or CN. Can you believe, Mr. Speaker—I hope the minister is listening—that the fire department in Vancouver receives notification of dangerous goods having been shipped through this area one week after the dangerous goods have passed through? I really do not know what this bill will do to prevent major catastrophes.

We also know there is no co-ordination with fire boats. In fact there is only one fire boat in the port of Vancouver, and it belongs to the city of Vancouver. This boat is no longer available to other municipalities, and it should be the responsibility of the federal government under the National Harbours Board and the Canadian Transport Commission.

There are many problems facing areas like the port of Vancouver. Those problems must be raised at this time, and hopefully the matter will be clarified as much as possible during debate on this bill. The Mississauga evacuation and near disaster served as a warning to all of us. It can happen again. In fact there are statistical projections to show that it will happen again, and I wish the Progressive Conservative members from the areas surrounding the port of Vancouver were here today.

The quality and nature of hazardous goods shipped into and through Vancouver are considerable and diverse. It is not unusual to see trains transporting combinations of liquid propane, chlorine, and fertilizer, tripling the danger of explosion. We know that a typical liquid propane tanker has a capacity of about 34,000 gallons. The fire department tells us that the danger of a BLEVE, as it is called in technical terms—boiling liquid expanding vapour explosion—which is associated with such tankers, now being transported along the Vancouver waterfront, is considerable. The danger zone for a BLEVE is considered to be 3,000 feet, or about ten city blocks. Approximately 20,000 people in the city of Vancouver, not to mention the surrounding district, would then be in danger of a major explosion on our railway tracks or in our port. It is no wonder we are concerned.

I would also like to mention our concern that there is no co-ordination, and that this bill apparently provides no co-ordination among the different jurisdictions which are concerned with safety and also in relation to the different modes of transport.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who told you that?

Mrs. Mitchell: The CTC must take leadership in the port of Vancouver. I will tell the hon. member who told us this. Quite a bit of research has been done. The head of the port of Vancouver, the harbours master, was the one who told me this, and it was supported by workers in several unions on the waterfront and by representatives of city council and other municipalities who have carried out major studies in this regard.

• (1510)

There is no co-ordination and no contingency plan in this area to deal with emergencies. In fact the truth is that no one is in charge. There is a morass of conflicting jurisdictions involving four levels of government, a variety of government agencies and transportation companies. We feel that the CTC must take the lead, although other jurisdictions, and particularly municipalities, are essential in developing an over-all safety plan.

From consultation with the sources which I mentioned in the Vancouver area—I hope the minister is aware of this—it appears that the only solution is to establish a transportation safety authority with leadership from the federal government but which will involve all jurisdictions and all methods of transportation. Such an authority would develop contingency plans to deal with the emergency, would pool the resources and divide the responsibilities of governments. It would employ inspectors, the number of whom will be increased under this bill, to enforce safety regulations. Workers should be trained, particularly workers on the waterfront. Truck routes for the transportation of hazardous materials must be studied and designated by such an authority. There must be liaison among everyone concerned with the transportation of dangerous goods.

I hope that all this will be considered by the minister and that this bill will be expanded in its application. I hope that meetings will be initiated by the federal government to develop a transportation authority, particularly in the greater Vancouver region.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise and take part in this debate. I think it is important for those of us from the rural parts of the country to have a say in what goes on in the movement of dangerous goods around the country. In my riding of Portgage-Marquette in central Manitoba there are over 200 miles of main CN and CP rail line that run through the constituency, and it is on the main lines that goods are transported. I think it is important that we not only think about the movement of dangerous goods relative to the problems that are caused in moving them through large urban centres but that we also think about the transportation of dangerous goods as it relates to movement throughout the country.

I am glad to see that this bill includes provisions to look after many aspects of the movement of dangerous goods, from the way they are packaged and handled before they are transported to the type of containers in which they are moved. I should like to make reference to this later, relative to the train wreck we had at MacGregor last March and the problem we had with vinyl chloride.

It is very important that these regulations not be so all encompassing and involved that they lack common sense, because the most important thing we must have in terms of enforcing them, contrary to what some of my friends to my left would like to think—they would like to regulate everything into the ground—is that they be practical. You must have a certain degree of common sense associated with them or they will not work. If you do not have good will, the best intentions in the world will not work. I think it is important, with as complex a bill as this is, that the regulations be workable.

I agree with what the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) said, that it was a breakthrough when the regulations were being examined by the committee. I was part of that committee and I think it was a very important step. The regulations are so large and there are so many of them that it is important that we have a chance to look at them. I hope the minister will proceed in the same way as the former minister in our government did with regard to letting us look at the regulations when they get to committee.

I hope the minister is serious when he says that he will make the movement of dangerous goods a priority. I hope that he does, and I hope that this bill will contribute to making the movement of dangerous goods a little safer throughout the country.

I would like to refer to something that was said in the last Parliament by the member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), when he said that the minister will have to use the leverage, influence, and power of the government to bring the railroads into line to co-operate in changing the formulas and equations by which the whole relocation process is being administered in this country. It is fine to relocate rail lines around major centres but, as we found out at MacGregor, people live throughout the country and there are problems no matter where you move the rails. Simply moving the rails will not necessarily deal with all the problems.

The main thing we have to think about is that when we do move goods we should take every precaution we can, not only in the movement but in the way that they are packaged to ensure that they reach their destination in good condition. My constituency is a large rural riding and the problems are just as important to us. The fact that some people live in smaller centres does not mean that they would be less concerned about the safety of their families and their communities than people in the larger urban centres, so I am a little upset when I hear people talking about the movement of dangerous goods in cities only. People live throughout this country, and everyone is important.

We had an experience at MacGregor which, although it did not turn out to be as serious as the one at Mississauga, potentially had as many problems associated with it. It involved the derailment of something like 12 tanker cars of vinyl chloride back on March 10. I had a chance to visit the site of the wreck twice and to see some of the clean up procedures that were undertaken. The problem there was how to handle communications relating to the chemical that was spilled, the amount that was spilled, and the associated hazard after the derailment. The wreck took place on a Sunday at approximately 1.30 a.m. A week later there was still a lot of concern in the town of MacGregor as to what had actually spilled, how much had spilled, and the kinds of problems that vinyl chloride would cause in that area. I found this to be extremely disturbing. I think we learned a lot of things from that, and I think that if it happened again we could do things better.

I was interested to hear my friend from Manitoba, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), say that it was the responsibility of everybody to ensure we have the proper communication. I would like to suggest that if you look at the behaviour of his party in the provincial legislature in Manitoba you will find that it was anything but responsible in terms of ensuring that the public was kept properly and fully informed of the hazards.

An hon. Member: Slanderous!

Mr. Mayer: Instead of ensuring that people's worries are put to rest, the party contributed to doing the opposite. I think it is incumbent on many of us as politicians to see that we contribute to people's ease of mind rather than doing the opposite. I might add that the lone member who belongs to the party opposite in the Manitoba legislature did a very good job for the only one in the House to add to that confusion. So I think there is a lesson in all of that to be learned, that we must act responsibly.

An hon. Member: Holier than thou!

Mr. Mayer: I would like to see people check the records on that because I am sure the records will bear me out.

One of the things that I learned from the wreck is that there should be better labelling on some of the cars that move dangerous chemicals. When I had the chance to visit the site, I found a small tag, approximately six inches square, which said that dangerous chemicals were being carried. I would see nothing wrong with having something a lot more visible so that, if computers break down, communications are set up to get information to the people involved in cleaning up the wreck. They would not have to rely on this; they could simply visit the site and take a look at the labelling on the containers. They would know from that the kind of chemical that is in the cars that are having the problem.

I am glad to see the minister in the House as I would like to refer to a letter I wrote him on March 20 regarding the inquiry into the wreck at MacGregor. In that letter I suggested that it would be appropriate for the Grange commission set up by the former minister to take a look at the wreck at MacGregor and that I thought we could learn something of the way the communications were handled and from the fact that the people in the town of MacGregor were kept in the dark for too long. I received a reply from the minister just this week in which he pointed out that the CTC was holding hearings at present. I am well aware of that, and in fact I attended the first day of hearings they had in Winnipeg two weeks ago.

I know some of the commissioners personally, I know they will do a good job. It will be a long inquiry. I am sure they will come up with some answers as to what caused the wreck, but I would like to suggest that the Grange inquiry would also be an appropriate vehicle to look at this. Simply because the wreck happened in a place where there were rural residents does not make it any less important than it would be in the town of Mississauga. I would hate to see the minister using that as an excuse for not suggesting to Justice Grange that he go to MacGregor and hold some hearings there. If the vinyl chloride spill had occurred in an area with a larger population, probably more pressure would have been put on and it might have been easier for the minister to see fit to recommend to the justice that he hold some inquiries into the MacGregor spill.

● (1520)

Also I should like to suggest to the minister that the terms of reference are more than broad enough to cover the situation at MacGregor. I should like to refer to the last point in the terms of reference, which reads as follows:

> Within the existing jurisdictional and constitutional framework how best co-ordination and co-operation between the various agencies and jurisdictions involved can be assured in the investigative and corrective action required immediately following a rail accident involving dangerous goods. This is not intended to include matters such as the evacuation of residents at large and other related matters falling clearly within provincial jurisdiction.

I think it would be more than appropriate for the justice to go to MacGregor to hold some type of hearing there in order to learn from the people of MacGregor what some of their concerns were, and, if they had an opportunity to go through such an experience again, how they could be better served by the type of actions that were taken.

One of the problems I have with the CTC, despite the fact that I had every confidence in the commissioners, is the fact that the CTC itself is involved in accidents of that sort. When I was at the site I had a chance to talk to a CTC representative, a very capable gentleman. He informed me that he had been on the site since the time the accident happened. I think we have a certain element here of the CTC investigating itself. By having Justice Grange look into this kind of an accident, I think he would remove completely the possibility of someone saying that the CTC will investigate itself. I urge the minister to take a serious look at carrying out the suggestion I have just made.

I do not want to prolong the debate any longer than necessary because I think it is a very important piece of legislation. The sooner we can get to committee with it the better. I think we should look at the necessity of moving dangerous goods in this country. Today I heard a figure which indicated that something like 3,000 goods are classed as dangerous goods that we move in this country. With the kind of lifestyle we have, obviously we will produce things that are hazardous in one form or another either to ourselves or to the environment. But in the case of vinyl chloride and the experience at MacGregor, I think the vinyl chloride as a monomer is a potentially hazardous chemical. It has very strong explosive characteristics. The major concern at the MacGregor wreck was at the time of the accident when there could have been a large explosion. But it is also true that in large doses it is a carcinogenic chemical and it has a record of causing certain types of cancer if people are exposed to it over a prolonged period of time, or if the exposure is very large over a short period of time.

In this case the chemical is made in Fort Saskatchewan near Edmonton. It is moved to Sarnia where it is polymerized. When it is polymerized, it is made into things which are commonly used. It then becomes a polymer of vinyl chloride which is used in garden hoses and various plastics associated with the wire industry. It becomes a very harmless chemical, and I suspect that all of us come into contact with that chemical on a daily basis.

When we talk about moving certain chemicals, I think it may be well worth our while to see if we could organize ourselves in this country so that we could make use of those chemicals before they are moved, so that when we move the end product from those chemicals there is in fact no danger to the public. I think an industrial strategy or some kind of awareness of that before the fact would go a long way toward eliminating the necessity to move these kinds of goods. In this case it is too late. The facilities for polymerizing the monomer vinyl chloride are located at Sarnia. It must be moved there in order to be manufactured into things that we use every day.

Mr. Cullen: Good for Sarnia.

Mr. Mayer: In closing I should like to point out that I look forward to having a chance to work on this bill at committee stage. I compliment the minister on bringing it forward as quickly as he could. I think the former minister did an excellent job of getting the thing together, so that it was probably easier for the minister to bring it forward as quickly as he did. I suggest the minister has a tough act to follow the former minister. If, in the minister's four-year term of office, he can come close to doing the kind of things which his predecessor had on track in the nine months that he was in office, then the minister will be a very successful Minister of Transport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise on what I thought would be a non-partisan debate on Bill C-18, which was formerly Bill C-25. I congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the former minister for seeing the importance of a bill of this nature. Non-partisan it has not been in this House, and I should like to respond to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) who accused the New Democratic Party of trying to hold up this legislation so that indeed it was not in effect by January. The hon. member is aware that in this House of Commons we were operating in a minority government situation. If his party had recognized that in the last House and had tried to co-operate with members, we may well have had that bill passed, and we may well still have had a Conservative government.

Mrs. Mitchell: Well put.

Mr. Miller: Also the hon. member should be aware that it was not only the members of the House of Commons who brought about the defeat of the Conservative government, but the electorate on February 18 justified the stand of the opposition parties.

The bill before us has a particular interest in my riding of Nanaimo-Alberni. In that riding and surrounding areas there are three major pulp mills which involve the use of chlorine and sulphur dioxide gases, as well as the use of caustic soda. There is a chemical plant in that area which results in chemicals going through our community, many of which we are not aware of as citizens. The community was concerned. It was concerned before the occurrence of Mississauga. Certainly that was the focal point of community involvement and discussion within those communities as to what types of emergency procedures we had in our riding in order to meet the demands of an emergency such as the one at Mississauga.

At the meeting held in conjunction with the Canadian Transport Commission, there were represented municipal councillors, mayors, regional board directors, union representatives from two major pulp mill unions in British Columbia, and we had industry in the form of a representative of the largest forest products company in British Columbia, MacMillan Bloedel. Also we had firemen, fire chiefs, and emergency planning co-ordinators. Not only did we have the support and co-operation of the Canadian Transport Commission in our inquiry, but also we had public support.

In introducing the bill before us today, the minister said that there is a danger we may have too high expectations of it and of what it may do for commodities transported on rail, on sea and in the air, by cars, trucks and other means of transportation. But I should like to tell the minister that the public has high expectations of this bill. The public in my riding has high expectations. People are expecting that this bill will address itself to rail transportation in particular.

Rail transportation on Vancouver Island does not have a good record. There was an attempt by the CPR to curtail passenger service. There was an attempt by the CPR to downgrade or let their railway tracks be downgraded so that indeed they could not have passenger service. Usage had to be curtailed until the CTC demanded that they replace the trestles. The record of that railway on Vancouver Island is very poor. Four derailments within a matter of two months brought to a head the concerns of that community.

I would like to talk about Port Alberni, a major lumber producing town that has a major pulp mill. I would like to discuss the geographical location of that town to indicate the real concerns which the people of Port Alberni feel about railway transportation, the health of that transportation system in their area, and about this bill. Port Alberni is completely surrounded, with the exception of a small valley or inlet on the west coast. There are periods of climatic weather inversions, which means that the air stagnates within the valley. Because it is located on the west coast there is fog, and there is also pollution from the pulp mill, all of which hangs in the valley.

Our concern is that if Port Alberni is put on that railway transportation system, a derailment coming into the valley resulting in the giving off of chlorine or sulphur dioxide gas could mean that the fumes will remain in the valley and cause irreparable damage to human health and human life. It is a distinct possibility if one looks at the railway transportation system coming into that valley and the regulations which govern the transportation of dangerous goods on that rail link.

In introducing the bill today, the minister also indicated that we could not expect a great many more inspectors because the bureaucracy required for enough inspectors to ensure safety in our communities would be too costly. We all share a concern about how many people the minister intends to hire to fulfil the jobs which this bill will create. However, there is a need to look at how many inspectors we have today on the railway transportation system. I am not very confident when I look at the minister's estimates for fiscal year 1980-81 in comparison to fiscal year 1979-80, which is the estimates that were recently tabled in the House.

Under the CTC allocation for personnel, we see a reduction of 99 person-years from 1979-80 to 1980-81. Under regulation and control there are 47 fewer person-years and under railway safety, which has already been mentioned today, there is a reduction of five person-years, from 105 to 100 person-years. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), said earlier that the CTC chairman had indicated that there are only 78 railway inspectors in Canada. In British Columbia, as my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), has indicated, there is only one inspector for all accidents in that province. There is also the question as to whether we even have that one inspector or whether they are about to hire an inspector.

The same kind of situation can be seen with regard to equipment operators. It is important that we have these inspectors. If one looks at the description of what railway safety means and what it involves, one gets a good idea. I think it is important that we understand why these inspectors are needed, so I would like to quote their duties as they are outlined under the railway safety regulations. It reads:

Development of regulations, standards and procedures respecting rolling stock, apparatus, appliances, signals, methods, devices, structures and works used by railways; monitoring inspection and enforcement to ensure effective application of legislation, regulations, standards and procedures in respect of operations, maintenance and construction of railway equipment and facilities—

I will not quote the whole section, but that is the essence of this bill. If the people are not there to enforce and implement what we hope to develop in regulations through this bill, then it has no point. When the minister says that we cannot expect a significant increase, or even an increase, in the number of inspectors, then I think he should re-assess the inspector situation under the CTC. Inspectors are in short supply, and with this umbrella bill there will not be the protection which the people of Canada expect.

We have high expectations for this bill, expectations that one can gain from the provincial and municipal governments, and other agencies, the co-operation which the minister is asking for today. The co-operation within my riding, and I am sure that it is shared throughout Canada, between municipal governments, fire departments, emergency agencies and others in that community has been amply demonstrated. The Minister of Transport is responsible for involving the official agencies—provincial governments, municipal governments and industries—which he has mentioned.

There is a public concern and a public willingness to contribute to the discussion of this matter and to have an opportunity to provide input into the regulations under discussion while this bill is in committee, and also into the changes to those regulations in future years. I am pleased to be able to support the principles of this bill. I hope to participate in committee and give suggestions which I will gather from my riding and which, I hope, will form part of the regulations.

There are a number of things about which we are concerned. We feel the emergency planning activities which go with dangerous cargo and railway safety are not given adequate recognition in this bill. While in committee we will be making further representations about railway safety. As many hon. members know, there are no rail safety standards in Canada. In the case of the E & N Railway on Vancouver Island, safety standards as they apply to the protection of the public on the railway system, are applied in cases where the railway inspector feels that the system is not safe at the speeds at which the trains are travelling and the loads which they are carrying, and they take the form of reducing the speed of the train.

If we do not demand upgrading of our track beds in Canada the ultimate effect of that policy will be that trains will grind to a halt. In fact Canadian trains have already ground to a halt in certain incidents because of that policy. The commitment of our party is to see that this bill does not grind to a halt, but that it is implemented with the necessary changes to protect the Canadian public.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in the debate on this bill, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods. I have worked for railways in the area of transportation for 30 years, and I have a few comments which I would like to make. I want to commend the minister for bringing forward this bill, but within it I can see some very serious shortcomings.

There was one drastic accident in Mississauga, and the trade unions and other groups have been investigating that accident. To my knowledge they are still investigating the accident. It disturbs me that those groups who are so concerned about the employees for whom they are working and the various avenues of the whole accident, have not had an opportunity to put forward their ideas with regard to what happened during that accident.

Another area which I would like to discuss deals with the fact that many of our tank cars which haul dangerous goods are not accepted at the interchanges of some of the railways which lead to the United States. If they are not accepted by some of the major railways in the United States, then we should take a very serious look at whether, in fact, they are acceptable by our standards.

I am interested in the handling of dangerous material, Mr. Speaker, because I come from a very mountainous area where there are steep grades and curves on the track which handles a lot of dangerous material. I have seen as many as 100 cars having pushers put into the middle of the train—indeed I have seen cases where they could not find a spot to put the pushers in because the material carried was so dangerous. The bill should provide some protection in cases such as that. I think there should be a limit of about 60 cars on trains that handle dangerous material.

Train crews have been cut to two men, one in the caboose and one on the engine with the engineer. The trains come down steep grades, 100 cars or more, carrying dangerous material, and we are here discussing a bill for the protection of people handling dangerous material!

Another matter of concern is that a train could leave Montreal and travel right across Canada, if it had no occasion to pick up an extra car along the way, without a number one brake test. It could go right across Canada without a test, Mr. Speaker. In many places in the United States trains are only permitted to travel a certain number of miles before they must have that number one brake test. I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to look into this and to see that a mileage limit is imposed on trains handling dangerous material before they must have the number one brake test. If we did that we could make sure that the trains are in perfect condition when they start out to travel across the country.

It has been suggested that the board of transport should have this responsibility. I want to commend the board for its work, but in my experience working on the railway, I came to resent the fact that the board of transport employees would come to inspect facilities and then, if there was a major accident, the same employees would come out to inspect their own work and make a report. I say that is wrong, Mr. Speaker. Some protection must be included in the bill that provides for the safety of not only the workers but of the communities along the route.

In the community of Revelstoke there are level crossings with means of stopping people from crossing the tracks to get to the other side of town. If there were a major accident it would be almost impossible for a fire engine to get to the other side of the train and protect that area of town.

These are all things that must be examined very seriously with the municipalities involved, Mr. Speaker, as well as with other groups. I look forward very much to the meetings of this committee where I hope to have some input, and I am glad to have had the opportunity to speak on the bill.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION ACT

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-21, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members on all sides of the House for their indulgence this afternoon in getting Bills C-18 and C-21 through second reading stage and on to committee. I think that augurs well when we are just two or three weeks into this session of Parliament. I would hope that we may now move into private members' hour, Mr. Speaker, and that I may make a few comments.

There have been consultations with hon. members on all sides. It has been agreed to proceed with Motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), since the sponsors of Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 are unable to be present this afternoon.

I take it we have agreement to proceed in this manner and preserve the order of members whose motions have been passed over today. I hope that is agreeable to all of the members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) requests that the House call it four o'clock for private members' hour. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed with motion No. 5 and that Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 keep their place on the order paper.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I must note that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was unable to be with us this afternoon. It is a rare Friday that he is not in this chamber. I am sure all hon. members will join with me in tendering best wishes on the fiftieth anniversary of his graduation from Brandon University, in Manitoba. He is the chancellor of that university and is present there this afternoon to preside over the convocation ceremonies.

With him is another distinguished former member of this House who, at one time, respresented the constituency of Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. They graduated from the same class in 1930. I am sure it is the sentiment on all sides of the House that we extend our best wishes to both gentlemen this afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the parliamentary secretary in expressing, on behalf of this party, the best wishes that he has extended to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to Mr. Tommy Douglas. I did not realize that Brandon University bred such revolutionaries as those two distinguished gentlemen.

The parliamentary secretary noted we are marking their fiftieth graduation anniversary. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre carries on in his usual way, I suspect that we shall be marking his one hundredth anniversary in this House! May I express the wish that all of us will be here on that occasion to pay tribute to him.

We are pleased with the arrangement that has been made and that motions Nos. 1 to 4 will have their place reserved on the order paper. I think it is quite appropriate that we now move on to private members' hour.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I want to join in extending best wishes to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who is celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of his graduation from that revolutionary college, the Brandon University. It is not a very conservative institution, I gather.

Since I arrived in this House in 1968 at the same time as the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has only missed attending one day per year. That is the day of convocation at the Brandon University. It is a very rare day indeed when the desk right next to me is empty.

On behalf of my colleagues I should like to extend our best wishes to the hon. member and to Mr. Tommy Douglas, the former member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, as well as to some 25 of their colleagues on this, the fiftieth anniversary of their graduation from the Brandon University.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): On behalf of Madam Speaker, the Chair wishes to associate itself with the compliments paid to both hon. gentlemen.

On a more personal note I might mention that I wondered whether something was peculiar this afternoon. I now realize that it is not merely that I am a newcomer in the chair but that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not in the House. I had been wondering what was bothering my perception.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) has proposed, and I understand there is unanimous consent, that we proceed immediately to private members' hour. These items, namely 1, 2, 3, and 4, shall not lose their place in the proceedings. We shall proceed to notice of motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin).

● (1550)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member and I do not intend to take any time of the House, but I believe the parliamentary secretary is in a position to announce the business for the balance of Monday, before we start private members' hour.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, before I do that I should just mention, since I forgot earlier, that the reason we joined together in giving our best wishes to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that he drew the first motion for business, and that is what we are standing today. This will explain the reason for our statements earlier.

On the question of business for Monday, we will proceed with the Bank Act. We expect that this will probably not be until the evening sitting since the House will not assemble for question period until 4.30 p.m.

As members know, the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Japan will be addressing the chamber, members of the Senate and the Supreme Court, in this chamber at 2.15. Madam Speaker has asked that all members be in their places by 1.45 p.m. so that the Prime Minister of Japan can proceed at that time.

Before I sit down I should mention also that it has been agreed among parties that next Thursday will be the first allotted day for the official opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I understand that private members' hour will end at eight minutes to five.

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing the Hall commission report, including major recommendations, to increase use of ports at Churchill and Prince Rupert, guarantee the Crow rate to the farmer, extend the Crow rate to the processed equivalent of raw materials, pay the railways directly for their losses, make the railways fix up their tracks and buy hopper cars, and give the Canadian Wheat Board more power to control grain movement.

He said: Before getting into the subject of my resolution I wish to apologize to my good friends, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) in that I will not be able to stay to hear their remarks. The parliamentary secretary and I will be making a desperate dash to the airport at about 4.30 p.m. However, I am hopeful, and I hope it is not misplaced, that the hon. gentlemen I have just mentioned will be most anxious to support and accept my resolution.

Mr. Pepin: The Benjamin grain policy.

Mr. Benjamin: Some of the Hall commission recommendations have been implemented and worked at by the previous Liberal government and the Conservative government of last year, but there are some other recommendations that still remain to be implemented. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) said after the Hall commission report was brought down, it was a Magna Carta for the west. We agree with that. I think people on all sides of this House and from the west, even though they may disagree with some of the minor details in the report, accept it as a package, as a whole. I think that has been agreed upon by people in all walks of life and political faiths.

In the recommendations of Mr. Justice Hall, he said that Churchill should be handling 55 million bushels of grain a year. It still handles only 24 million bushels. Its capacity is not being used to the fullest extent. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) made the unfortunate suggestion that Churchill is a luxury we cannot afford, but I was happy to note that other members of the Conservative party disavowed and dissociated themselves from that nonsensical remark. It can save about 1,100 miles in the transportation of grain going to Europe from Saskatoon if it goes through Churchill, but the insurance rates discriminate. This is something which the Ministry of Transport and the government should be examining. These rates are five times those from Montreal. There probably is as much risk and as many mishaps in the marine industry out of Montreal as there ever has been out of Churchill.

The Minister of Transport has, I think, made an effort to try to get the federal government off the hook for some of the money for Prince Rupert. He is finding that it is not working, and from events and statements made in the last week or two it looks as though the government has realized it better not do anything to halt, delay, or renege on commitments made for that port. I am assuming that it is well in hand and going ahead at full speed and that the money will be forthcoming in the full amount from the federal government, and it will not be trying to collect all the costs of the infrastructure, through user charges since infrastructure costs have been subsidized in every other port for decades.

The most important item in the resolution to be considered is Mr. Justice Hall commission's recommendation regarding the statutory rates, or what is commonly called the Crow rate. Mr. Justice Hall not only recommends that the Crow rate be maintained for the grain producers of western Canada, but he also recommends that the principle in the statutory rates be extended to finished and processed agricultural products. This includes other commodities in western Canada, not only grain.

The main reason for the statutory rates is not to provide some kind of handout or subsidy to grain producers for the existence of and the continuing and maintaining of the Crow rate in terms of costs of shipping grain for farmers in western Canada, but to keep us in a position to compete with the other grain exporting nations in the world. For example, the average haul of Canadian grain to the Lakehead or salt water ports is over 900 miles and the next longest haul is in the United States of about 700 miles, but most of that is accessible inland water systems, which are a much cheaper way to move any commodity. Australia and Argentina are among our biggest competitors. They grow about 90 per cent of their grain within a couple of hundred miles of salt water.

The benefits of grain exports bring in anywhere from $1 to $3 billion a year in foreign exchange, which benefits the nation as a whole. Therefore it is only fair and logical that the nation as a whole should share in the cost of getting that grain delivered to our ports.

We are not objecting, and never objected, to the railroads recovering their proven costs of transporting our grain. Mr. Justice Hall said, and this is another aspect of his recommendation, that if grain producers continue to pay the Crow rate, the national government should pay directly to the railroads the difference between the Crow rate and the actual proven costs of moving grain, in other words, the compensatory rate.

I noticed in recent months that the railroads now talk about the commercial rate, not the compensatory rate. That is another little bag of tricks coming from the railroads. The commercial rate on grain from Wakaw to Thunder Bay is something in the order of $3.15 a hundred whereas the compensatory rate—I am guessing but I think I am fairly close—is somewhere in the order of $1 to $1.25 a hundred at the most.

The Minister of Transport says, and he said it when he was in Winnipeg at the beginning of April, that there has been a dramatic shift of western opinion on the Crow. He admitted that the struggle to change the rate will not be easy. Well, he is perfectly right about that. If he thinks that he has ever been in fights before, they will be nothing compared to trying to meddle with the Crow rates. Those who use phrases like "Crow benefit" or "Crow value"—that, in my opinion and in the opinion of many grain producers and farm organizations, is a neat way of destroying the Crow rate that grain producers pay.

The minister and his two predecessors from time to time made reference to trying to get a consensus among the grain industry or farm organizations to the effect that there needs to be significant support from a major part of the agricultural community in the prairie provinces. For a long time, ever since the Hall commission report came down, we have had significant support from a major number of grain producers in western Canada and the most significant and major farm organizations.

The minister will be well advised to accept the recommendations of Mr. Justice Hall, not only in terms of justice and fair play, but politically. It is called for by the National Farmers' Union, the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture which represents something in the order of 25 or 26 different commodity groups in my province, and the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool which represents something in the order of 75,000 grain producers, about as many as there are in Alberta and Manitoba together. They are unanimous on this. That is why I urge the minister to get rid of the obstinancy and stubbornness of his two predecessors on fully implementing the Hall commission recommendations.

I know the minister will have problems with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and Treasury Board about the money the federal government would have to pay out, the difference between the Crow and the compensatory rate, but it will not be all new money. We can do away with branch line subsidies, quit buying hopper cars and putting up money to help the railways repair their box cars. Make them do it. It is their job.

The tragedy over the past number of years has been that we have refused, under the law that is now in effect, to make the railroads perform, to the point where the national government, the Canadian Wheat Board, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have had no choice but to purchase railway rolling stock, mainly hopper cars.

If Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations are implemented, this will not be all a new or additional cost to the national treasury. The major part of that cost will be made up from money already being paid out in the form of branch line subsidies, railway rolling stock, and the repair of railway cars.

It makes eminent good sense to implement this recommendation of Mr. Justice Hall. I have never been able to understand the reluctance of the two previous administrations to get it done. When you look at who wants the Crow abolished and who wants the Crow benefit or Crow value, when you look at who they are, who they speak for and who they represent, it tells you something. They represent the same kind of reactionary stuff that we had prior to ever having a wheat board. They speak for the private grain trade and the Winnipeg Commodity Exchange.

There are a few organizations on the prairies which agree that the Crow rate should be done away with. Who are they? Who do they represent? A few hundred. Compare that to what the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool speaks for. There can be no doubt that the overwhelming majority of grain producers and, I submit the majority of the public in western Canada, want the Hall commission recommendation implemented and they want it implemented immediately.

The official opposition was waffled on this, as has the governing party. In a campaign bulletin dated April 19 last year, the Conservative party said, and I quote:

We have promised that the Crowsnest Pass freight rate be maintained.

After the election we got a different story. The Conservative minister of transport told the UGG convention in Calgary:

I want to assure you that any change in application of the Crow benefit will come only after there is full consultation with producers.

That does not sound to me like maintaining the Crow for grain producers. When confronted in committee, the former minister said:

I want to assure this House that any change in the structure application of the Crow benefit, value or advantage will only come after there is full consultation.

That meant that even after consulting it was his intention, and that of his government, to change the structure and application of the Crow rate. If he had said he was changing it in line with the Hall commission recommendation, we and the grain producers would have had no doubt where he and his party stood on the matter. I hope today he will say unequivocally on behalf of his party that they fully support and accept the implementation of Mr. Justice Hall's recommendation as it pertains to the Crow rate.

I urge this House to accept this resolution. I want to say to the minister that, if the House passes the resolution, it is not mandatory but requests him to consider the advisability. It does not say he will do it. I hope he will accept it from the House as an expression of significant opinion, the opinion of not only Mr. Justice Hall but of tens of thousands of grain producers, local governments, the government of Saskatchewan and many rural and urban municipalities in the west which have called for this to be done. I hope members on all sides will accept this resolution and that the minister will go to bat for working on implementing the remaining recommendations of the Hall commission not yet implemented.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I too have to leave in a few minutes for Quebec. This will be my third speech today, although I did not give the one on containers. But I would be remiss if I did not comment on what the hon. member just put on the record.

I am stunned at my lack of decisiveness today! I have had great opportunities today which I missed! During the question period there was the possibility to me of deciding on the price of oil. There was the possibility of deciding on improving a tariff on the export of hydroelectric power to the United States. Now there is the possibility of solving all problems pertaining to the grain industry. Here I am without the guts, energy, and the audacity to do it, and I feel frustrated!

We on this side of the House could have agreed to this motion quite easily because the language is simply "should consider the advisability of". Therefore, one could have done a generous thing for the day, a BA, a bonne action, and approved of that because this motion contains ideas that one should indeed consider.

Some of this I thought had already common acceptance, for example, the "guarantee of the Crow rate for the farmer." I did not think that had to be considered because that guarantee is one of the basic foundations of the existence of Canada. I did not think it had to be looked at again. I am surprised to find it here as a questionable item. I do not think anybody would take it away from western farmers. What could be changed is the formula under which it is handled, but nobody intends to deprive western farmers of this advantage.

With regard to the "increased use of the ports of Churchill and Prince Rupert", I have read about Churchill in recent weeks. I have found that efforts are being made all around. The National Harbours Board is putting a considerable amount of money into dredging the port and improving its capacity in order to receive larger ships. The railway leading to Churchill is part of the railway rehabilitation system and substantial amounts of money are spent on that. The Canadian Wheat Board pays a lot of attention to that, so I do not think hon. members can say there has been a lack of interest on the part of the Canadian government and institutions in the development of the port of Churchill.

On Prince Rupert the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) was kind to me today—he has not always been as kind in recent days. My distinguished predecessor might use that as a subject of conversation today if he cares to do so. I have often repeated that what I have been doing there does not deserve the kind of treatment it has been receiving. Even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on one of the first days of the present session implied that I was being less of a Canadian than my predecessor was in my approach to Prince Rupert. I was not. I do not think I have to take any advice on how to be a Canadian even from the distinguished Leader of the Opposition, and I do not think my dedication to Quebec or to Ontario or to the west can be questioned.

I am one of those, and there are many in the House, who can claim that they have an affection for Quebec, for central Canada, an affection for the Atlantic provinces, and an affection for western Canada. So this sort of thing hurts me if I may say so in the intimate mood in which we are operating this afternoon in this chamber. It hurts me because my dedication to the success of Prince Rupert, of the grain terminal port there, is as great as anything I have felt in recent years. I am dedicated to the success of this venture and I do not think I am doing anything which does not make sense.

An hon. Member: We are worried.

Mr. Pepin: I worry, too. I do not think I have done anything very different from my distinguished predecessor in this matter. The question of who should build the wharf, the dock, is one which he left unclear. When I told the members of the consortium that they would have to compensate on a cost-recovery basis for the expenditure made on it, they were not surprised. I did not think I was that cruel or that unfair. I just thought I would put some finality to some of the discussions which my predecessor once removed had started. He was in a bit of an expensive mood in some of the communiqués he issued but I think he never did say to the consortium that they would get the dock free.

As a matter of fact, if hon. members read the communique of January 31 it is implied—it is even said—that the option was open to the consortium to build the dock itself or to let the National Harbours Board do so. If my distinguished predecessor had offered it free, then obviously there would not have been reference to the possibility of the consortium building it. Elementary, my dear Watson!

I am just saying to western Canadians through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Transport is rather sympathetic and a Canadian as good as any around here or elsewhere, and consequently he is not trying to "mess up" the Prince Rupert project. On the contrary, he is trying to make sure that it will be a success. So much by way of comment on Prince Rupert.

As to "paying the railway directly for their losses," well, there is discussion on that subject. If one is to convert the Crow rate to Crow "benefit" or Crow "value", I understand there is a great debate going on as to how it should be done—should it be done through the railways, should it be done through the farmers. I understand that intelligent men disagree on how to go about it. This is really the point.

Part of the motion says "Give the Canadian Wheat Board more power to control grain movement." Again, there is a debate on that point and the setting up of a grain transport commissioner is approved by most.

There are different points of view on many items in this motion. This is why, though I have great sympathy with many of the elements of this motion, I find some of them to be of a more debatable nature, and I find the totality to be unacceptable. I just want to say I am not against the resolution systematically.

There is one note on which I wish to end. It has to do with the approach taken to the Crowsnest Pass rate. To an easterner or a central Canadian this is a great challenge. The hon. member who introduced the motion referred to some words I have said on this subject. Indeed, in travelling in the west in recent days and listening to representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other people, I had the feeling that there is a desire on the part of many people, while defending the Crowsnest rate as an entitlement, to move away from it, having realized that although it has good aspects it has very negative ones also, that it is a double-edged sword preventing, for example, further processing of goods in western Canada.

I have received that impression, talking to people. Coming back to this House after a "holiday" of seven years, and having been the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in 1969, one of the most difficult years in Canadian history—and when things started to go a bit better the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave the job to my friend Otto—having come back to this subject now, I had the impression that there was progress because the Crow rate is a right but also a handicap, an impediment to what is considered by most Canadians to be the normal way of running a railway. This is why I thought one of the things I would like to accomplish as Minister of Transport is to begin that debate soon and, hopefully, to begin it in a mood of friendship, in a mood of search for the common good.

These are some of the remarks I wanted to make to the hon. member in answer to his contribution to this debate.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate on this very interesting motion. I certainly accept the apology of the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin). I know he is probably going out west. I am sure he will read with interest my remarks and we will probably have an opportunity to talk about the motion in more detail over coffee.

● (1620)

I also appreciated the remarks of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I think he has clarified, at least in spirit, some of the apprehensions which have been floating around with respect to Prince Rupert. The basic thrust of the motion deals with the implementation of the Hall recommendations and, without patting myself or the previous Conservative government on the back, I think more progress was made in the nine months of our Progressive Conservative government than in any period in total or in part since the Hall report was tabled.

When we look at the specific proposals in the motion dealing with increased utilization of the Port of Churchill, increased utilization of Prince Rupert, the matter of the Crowsnest Pass freight rates, the recognition that the railways need more revenue to support an adequate grain carrying fleet and the necessary infrastructure to do that job and the fact that we need hopper cars and motive power, I think in total we as a government addressed those very important considerations.

I know, and I think I am interpreting the Minister of Transport quite accurately, that in spirit he will attempt to carry on with a number of the proposals and initiatives we have started, and Prince Rupert is clearly one of them. As I have indicated privately and publicly, as long as the Minister of Transport and this government continue to carry out some of the important initiatives which have been started, they will certainly have my support and the support of my colleagues on this side of the House because the matter of grain handling and transportation has been cast aside for far too long. It is a very important element in the exporting of a very major and significant agricultural product, and many steps have to be taken. Some are steps which merely require streamlining and a more effective utilization of our existing facilities. Other steps have to be taken which constitute a major quantum leap in increasing our grain moving and handling capacity to meet the challenges of the eighties and on to the year 2000.

Mr. Speaker, you have been around here for a few years. You have heard talk of Prince Rupert for many, many years, and it has always been recognized as an important component of the grain handling and delivery system. Quite frankly, we have taken the approach that in this country we have four major grain delivery ports, namely, Thunder Bay, Vancouver, Churchill, and Prince Rupert. We need them all. We must utilize them all. Churchill can be utilized to a greater extent, and Prince Rupert certainly can be utilized to a greater extent not only to provide additional capacity but also to provide an alternative outlet when we have the kinds of breakdowns and difficulties we have experienced in the past at the port of Vancouver.

Hon. members know that our government took very positive steps to ensure that the Port of Prince Rupert was going to be developed in a co-operative way. We felt that the federal government had a responsibility because this development was needed not only in the interests of the grain producer and the western Canadian economy, but it was also needed in terms of the over-all national interest of Canada.

It was in that spirit that we moved toward putting together a memorandum of understanding at a very early date after assuming office with the consortium, and subsequently called upon and received the co-operation of the provinces and other components of the grain trade to ensure that this facility would be developed. It was in that co-operative spirit that we proceeded. The Minister of Transport and I have had some discussions privately on this matter, and I am pleased that the project is going forward on the basis of the memorandum of understanding and subsequent discussions which took place and that the commencement of construction of this facility will begin, hopefully, this month. I am hoping that that is the target the minister has in mind. Presumably on his venture out to British Columbia along with other cabinet ministers, confirmation of that will be made. I hope that will be the case. We would certainly applaud him and congratulate him on that because it is something that is needed. Unfortunately, in my view the port should be coming onstream today rather than simply being started in so far as construction is concerned.

We undertook to take steps to utilize the Port of Churchill to a greater degree. We were successful in bringing in the MV Arctic to take on a cargo of barley three weeks after the closing of the Port of Churchill. That was a very major breakthrough, which could pave the way for the extension of the shipping season and provide a more all-season port in that northern area.

We also undertook to continue the work of upgrading the rail line. That is something that has to be continued. We undertook to experiment with the utilization of ballast cars, which are owned by the federal government and which lie idle in the winter and are not being used. We undertook to experiment with the utilization of 125 in anticipation that they might very well be effective in carrying grain to the Port of Churchill. So there are those things which have been done.

As a result of the task force findings, we also undertook to increase winter grain movement by rail out of the Port of Thunder Bay. We were able to move something in the order of one million tonnes of grain to east coast ports this winter, and I think that is good because it does prove that we can utilize the system we now have in place in a more effective fashion.

The hon. member talked about the Crow rate. I really have difficulty understanding quite clearly what the hon. member is saying, because on one hand he is saying, "Maintain the Crow rate; do not touch a thing".

Mr. Pepin: And then change it.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member accused me, the present minister and the previous minister, of tampering with the Crow rate, and yet this very motion suggests tampering with the Crow rate. The hon. member says we should extend the Crow rate to processed products and pay the railways directly for the losses. We have been saying that the Crow rate in statute form enshrined in law must remain. We have also said, and the hon. member is now saying it in this motion, that the railways should be adequately compensated for the movement of grain.

Mr. Pepin: Right on.

Mr. Mazankowski: There is no disagreement on that. Where there is some debate and discussion—and there is no clear consensus, is on how the federal government will pay the difference. That is what is implicit in this motion—how it will be distributed. Will it be paid directly to the railways—that is what this motion suggests—or will it be distributed in some other form? There is not a clear-cut consensus on that point. The hon. member cannot have it both ways. He cannot suggest on one hand the maintenance of the status quo, and recommend change on the other.

The fact that our government, the previous Liberal government and, I suspect, this government, are looking at ways and means of improving is not to suggest that we are going to destroy that fundamental right of western Canadian producers. We have never talked about taking it out of statute form, but it is part and parcel of the NDP game of politics that they spread anxiety and fear amongst producers. I call that a sort of deceitful act on the part of the NDP, and it should not be tolerated by any political party. I think this is a very important issue. We all agree that the statutory freight rate is something very fundamental which should be enshrined in law and continued, but this motion is just one solution, and there have been other solutions proposed.

Surely it is incumbent upon anyone who is a responsible legislator to consider the views of producers at large and, hopefully, to arrive at a consensus which would be acceptable to all concerned. That does not deviate from or subtract from the responsibility of the federal government one iota. The thing is that if we are not going to look at the Crow rate, it means we are going to go on paying the branch line subsidies, buying hopper cars and rehabilitating railways, with the railways claiming losses.

What is suggested is that there might be a better way of handling the whole package, and at this point there does not appear to be a clear consensus regarding a satisfactory package. But the preservation and the enshrinement of the statutory freight rate is fundamental to the western Canadian grain producer. How it is distributed is part of the ongoing debate.

What must be considered is the impact of the freight rate as it applies to the further processing of agricultural products in western Canada. For example, if you look at the movement of rapeseed for export from Lloydminster, Alberta, and Saskatchewan to Vancouver, you find that the freight rate on raw rapeseed which goes to Vancouver and subsequently to the export market is 24.5 cents per hundredweight. If you move it in the form of oil in tankers, the freight rate is $1.03 per hundredweight. If you move it in the form of meal, which moves in the same hopper car as raw rapeseed, it costs $1.08 per hundredweight. So you see that in the application of those freight rates there is a disincentive to process that rapeseed in western Canada, an incentive to market it in its raw form to the market and thereby export jobs as well.

I see the hon. member shaking his head in the negative. If he can rationalize that, I would certainly like to hear it. I simply said that, essentially, the product moves in the same containers and, as a matter of fact, as a result of the CTC findings there is a compensatory rate which has been applied here and subsidies are currently being provided by the federal government as well as some assistance by provincial governments to reduce the differential. However, at present, there is a disincentive to the processing of the product in western Canada.

I believe we must look at agriculture in its total context, not only the production but indeed a further processing of agricultural products so as to broaden our industrial base and thereby to provide jobs to western Canadians. What I am saying is that there are no simple answers, as is suggested in this motion. I want to commend the hon. member for bringing forth the motion because this is a debate which should take place.

I hope the debate will take place in a rational and non-emotional fashion because the statutory rate or the Crowsnest Pass freight rate is an emotional subject. However, in the last three or four years, there has been a tendency on the part of producers, producer organizations and other groups, to look at the issue rationally. I think this is a good sign because we all recognize that there is a fundamental principle here. The production and marketing of grain are considered to be important to the nation as a whole—to bring advantages to all of us. I think it is generally agreed that a freight subsidy is required in order for the producers to remain competitive and so as to ensure that they have a fair chance of acquiring the necessary profitability, not only to produce grain for domestic consumption but to produce it for export consumption as well, thereby contributing, as the hon. member for Regina West indicated, toward our balance of payments.

Some of the other actions that were taken by our administration which synchronized with the thrust of this motion are, first, the fact that we tried to establish a spirit of co-operation and confidence within the grain handling and transportation system. It is fair to say that for quite a long time there was much fingerpointing. The farmers blamed the railways, the railways blamed the Wheat Board, and labour was blamed. We tried to bring the components of grain handling and the transportation system together. We brought in the provinces and, as a result, we were able to convince them that they too had a responsibility for this important industry. As a result, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, and even the railways, purchased hopper cars. CNR purchased 1,000 hopper cars for grain. The Canadian Pacific placed orders for some 95 locomotives which will be delivered by 1981. The CNR undertook to acquire some 35 locomotives each year.

There is considerable track upgrading, some double tracking, some additional trackage and some new sidings. There has been a co-ordination of grain handling and transportation system as a result of the appointment of Dr. Horner as the grain transportation co-ordinator, and I think the concept of having a co-ordinator has been accepted and endorsed by all parties in the House. There may be different versions of his terms of reference, but I think appointing a co-ordinator has provided an opportunity to gain better co-ordination and to utilize the system better. It has assisted the Canadian Wheat Board in the task of grain handling and transportation. My discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board have indicated to me that, given the steps that have been taken over the last 12 months, they are now able to go out with a greater degree of confidence and market the grain.

The smooth and efficient functioning of the transportation system enhances the integrity of the Canadian Wheat Board. So far as customers are concerned, confidence is very important. Given the improvements that have been made and that, I am sure, will be continued by the minister, we will be successful in achieving the target of moving 23 million metric tons of grain to export position this year. Perhaps it will be 22.5 tons. We established a fairly ambitious target, but I believe one has to establish ambitious targets in order to achieve that goal. If it is only 22.5 million metric tons, I will certainly not blame the Minister of Transport for the fact that it is half a million tonnes less. The fact is that steps have been taken and I hope he will be able to continue ensuring that those initiatives are taken, because if we can market the grain and move it, I have every confidence that the producers will produce it.

We have established a target and I am sure that this minister and the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Senator Argue) have accepted the target of 30 million metric tons for export by 1985 as being realistic. Given the steps that have been taken and the fact that the minister at least implied that he will continue to follow through on these initiatives—I am sure there will be others which will be brought to his attention which, we hope, he can act upon to improve the system and expand its capacity—I am sure we will be able to meet those targets.

I can assure the minister and the House that if we can meet that target, it will not only be healthy for western Canada but healthy for our total economy. Remember that when a farmer grows a bushel of grain he provides jobs in Ontario and throughout the whole country because the farmers' hired hands are working in the factories of Ontario and in other parts of Canada. That is a very important element. When that grain is exported, it provides us with needed foreign exchange and it improves our position as a nation. As the old saying out west goes, when the farmer has money, everybody has money. I hope we can continue to work together to improve the system. I do not think we should take rash steps in the short term but we can evolve and make progress in the long term.

● (1640)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, probably it is appropriate that one former minister should follow another former minister. We both came to this House in the famous class of 68. After some three weeks of being elected or participating here in the House, we went to the United Nations and straightened out that august body. I think it took us about two weeks to make that operation work the way we wanted to see it working.

I, for one, have returned to the House of Commons, particularly to the private members' hour, after some four or five years. For some years as a minister I did not participate in private members' hour. It was one of the areas which I missed during that particular period.

One item mentioned this afternoon was the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is a very regular participant in private members' hour. Over some seven years it was my privilege to debate on a very regular basis with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, either agreeing with him in some of the propositions he was putting forward, or in some other instances finding them so expensive that not even he really believed they should have been implemented.

Similarly Mr. Douglas, the then hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, participated in private members' hour. I remember when I was in this seat as parliamentary secretary to the minister of finance that the opposition had decided to gang up on a committee of the whole operation. At eight o'clock or 8.01 they had a quorum in the House of Commons and were prepared to vote on a particular motion in a bill. It was my responsibility to stand up as parliamentary secretary waiting for my minister to arrive to speak for some 20 minutes on that particular section of the bill. I well remember Mr. Douglas referring to me as "Horatio at the Bridge". So, there are many pleasant memories one has of private members' hour.

I think this motion is properly drafted. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) indicated that it probably could have been accepted by the government because of its wording indicating that the government should consider the advisability of a particular approach. I commend to any member who contemplates putting a motion in private members' hour that that is the wording which should be used. Quite often there is more possibility of the government accepting that kind of a motion—to study it, to look at it and to implement some of the items suggested—than by simply indicating that the government "shall" and putting that compulsion where it will be impossible for the government to accede to the request.

One of the better things which has happened to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is that he served as a minister of the Crown. Although he was a very dynamic member in opposition, I think he is probably better in that role now because he has had the experience of knowing what the demands are in a ministry, particularly in a very difficult portfolio. As one who sat on the outside for almost a year looking on, I would say that he was one of the ministers who had obviously done his homework. He was really dedicated and sincere in trying to make some changes, changes along the lines that he suggested here this afternoon, some of which were implemented by the former Liberal government and some by the Conservative government.

This is a splendid report which Mr. Justice Hall brought forward. We know that it was released in April of 1977. It strongly favoured the extended use of the Port of Churchill. I am pleased that motions such as this and reports such as the one brought forward by Mr. Justice Hall tend to emphasize that particular approach. Although it will not be used to the extent other areas are used for the export of grain because it may be small in the whole, I do not think it is something that should be ignored. Having lived in that particular area for some two years while working with Canadian Nickel, and later in the Northwest Territories, I know the importance given to that particular port. Something along this line to improve it is something which I think must be looked at very carefully by any government.

The report indicated that the potential of Churchill was to depend upon the continued use of government hopper cars on the Canadian National Railways route, improved marine navigation technology, extended shipping insurance season, continued high performance of the terminal elevator, and the orderly assembly of grain by the Canadian Wheat Board. The commission claimed that Churchill has the potential to handle 55 million to 60 million bushels of grain provided that improvements to rail—those are the magic words, "provided that". Certain things must be done.

Quite often we are looking for instant solutions where there are no instant solutions. Because of the difficulty involved, quite often there is a tendency to abandon the idea that such a conclusion can be reached, given the right spirit, forgetting about some of the political debate which goes on in the House, and recognizing that some of the goals are appropriate. Rather than saying that they should be done tomorrow or the next day, we should recognize that there is a term which must be used or applied when these things can be studied, so that they can be properly implemented and we will not be wasting a lot of money trying to do something in too much of a hurry to appease maybe the demands of people in the area, opposition members or, for that matter, members of the government who want to see particular actions taken.

I think it has been said by all three previous speakers that many of the recommendations contained in the Hall report in fact have been implemented. A great deal has been done by the federal government in support of the Port of Churchill. The National Harbours Board spent almost $16 million on port and port facility improvements between 1968 and 1979. My information is that they plan to spend a further $8 million by 1982. The CN rail line to Churchill is included in the prairie branch line rehabilitation program of the federal government. I am informed that expenditures between 1977 and 1979 approached $13 million, with planned expenditures of $4.9 million this year. This reconstruction work will increase the load-bearing and traffic volume capacity on the line.

I am advised that the Canadian Wheat Board will make the maximum feasible use of the port for grain exports, including co-operating fully with Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd. for the employment of the MV Arctic in grain service before and after the official Lloyds shipping season. The insurance underwriters obviously are under constant pressure from all interested parties to extend the shipping season, but we realize they cannot be ordered to do so.

The National Harbours Board has sustained an accumulated deficit of some $4.7 million between 1972 and 1978 in the operation of the port. Rather than looking upon that in a negative way, I think it is a good investment for something that is very definitely required, not only for the port but also for the export of grain.

I have other items I would like to comment upon regarding this particular motion. I know other members want to speak to this particular debate, so I will close by simply indicating that I think it is appropriate the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) brought forward this particular motion and that he has framed it in the way he has because I think the government must look at all the things suggested in the Hall commission report that are highlighted in a motion such as this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to make a short intervention in this private members' debate. It has been quite a number of years since the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) and myself came to this institution. I would say that the hon. member for Regina West is highly qualified to make remarks on this subject as he expressed them in his motion. I would say his qualifications go back to the days he spent in the CPR many, many years ago at a little town called Richmound, Saskatchewan, even to my own home town of Walsh, Alberta, and to Medicine Hat where we first had the privilege of meeting each other. It goes back quite a long way. But I would say that there is another approach to this very, very complex problem which I want to put before the House this late afternoon. Of course these are personal remarks which refer to the very specific portion of his motion that deals with the guaranteeing of the Crow rate for the farmer and the extension of it to the processed equivalent of raw materials.

● (1650)

I make no apologies when I say that some of these remarks are a repetition of what I said in the Speech from the Throne debate on April 18. At that time I described them as remarks that were too important for partisan politics. The Crow rate issue is a matter for which it is high time that it come out into the open and be given more discussions.

We are all very familiar with another enormously important debate which is going on in Canada now, and that is the referendum debate in Quebec. I would quickly add that the Crow debate presently under way in western Canada is, in its own significant way, every bit as important to western Canada, and I would even say for all of Canada, as is the referendum debate in the province of Quebec. Over the past two years there have been a number of excellent public debates on this issue, all of which have taken place in western Canada at special annual farm meetings or special symposiums called to discuss the subject.

The subject of the Crow rate is now freely discussed with not nearly as much emotion as it was for many, many years. Only in western Canada are these discussions taking place. There has never been a proper debate in this House of Commons or in Parliament on this issue. The closest we have ever come to such a debate was on the PC opposition day of May 26, 1977, when essentially the same subject, the Hall report, was discussed on that day.

Over the years we have all avoided a direct debate on the issue, by a variety of points of view expressed on the deliberately vague phrase, "Crow benefits". Various contributing issues dealing with such matters as hopper cars, producer cars, switching, offboard quotas and our domestic feed grain policy have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Dionne, Northumberland-Miramichi): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being five o'clock p.m., the hour provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired.

This House stands adjourned until Monday at 4.30 p.m. pursuant to an order made on Tuesday, April 29, 1980.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF TASK FORCE REPORT ON UNIFICATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In the report of the Fyffe Task Force on Unification tabled by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) on Friday, there were clearly identified nine major problem areas in the Department of National Defence and the armed forces. Furthermore, the task force made 30 concrete recommendations for the minister to implement in order to rectify these problems.

Bearing in mind the sanctimonious statement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) last Friday when he claimed that the other parties did "not have the same respect for the role of the members of Parliament as we on this side", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of National Defence make an order of reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to examine the task force report on unification and to allow the minister, his senior officials and other interested parties to appear before that committee to explain how best to implement the 30 recommendations contained in the report, so that the serious problems in the armed forces can be rectified.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. It there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FORESTRY

RECOGNITION OF NATIONAL FOREST WEEK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In recognition of the fact that over one million Canadian workers are either directly or indirectly employed by forest-related industries, that forest products' shipments exceed $21 billion annually, $12 billion of which is earned through the exports of finished and refined products, and that our forests provide a basis for a multi-billion dollar outdoor industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That this House recognize the importance of our forests to our country's social and economic well-being, that it pay tribute to the workers and professionals who manage our forest heritage in the week of May 4 to May 10 which—sponsored by the Canadian Forestry Association—has been designated as National Forest Week, and that the government in the course of this week address particular attention to the difficulties which are presently experienced by our forest industries.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE STEPS TO ALLEVIATE URBAN RENTAL CRISIS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that Canada is suffering from an acute shortage of rental accommodation which seriously affects many families and single parents in urban centres, and since the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has stated that this problem of rental housing ranks second in priority with his ministry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That the House instruct the minister to consider the shortage of rental accommodation as top priority and undertake immediate steps to alleviate the urban rental housing crisis.

SOLAR ENERGY

INCENTIVES TO PROMOTE DEVELOPMENT OF HOT WATER SYSTEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the supplies of non-renewable fossil fuels, primarily oil and natural gas, are being depleted, but that there are still many forms of renewable energy provided by the sun, pollution-free and inexhaustible, and whereas the national chairman of the Solar Energy Society of Canada said in celebrating "Sun" day on Saturday, May 3, "The government makes all kinds of noises about conservation but doesn't do anything about it", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

● (1640)

That this government should produce less talk on conservation and more action, and that as a first step allow federal tax rebates and incentives for solar hot water systems like the successful California programs of this type in the United States.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LOCATION OF DVA OFFICES AT CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact the Government of Canada has announced that it intends to move the site for the relocated Department of Veterans Affairs from the Charlottetown waterfront to uptown, the centre of that city, and in view of the fact that the change in site will involve a very substantial breach by the federal government of a binding agreement between the federal government, the government of P.E.I. and the government of Charlottetown, through the Charlottetown Area Development Corporation, and in view of the fact that the uptown site is vigorously opposed both by the government of P.E.I. and the city council, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That this House condemn the federal government for changing the site for the Department of Veterans Affairs in Charlottetown without consulting either the province of P.E.I. or the city of Charlottetown; and

That the House petition the government to proceed immediately with the relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs on the basis of the waterfront site, the one the province of P.E.I. and the city favour.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AIR TRANSPORT

MINISTERIAL USE OF GOVERNMENT JETSTARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter that is urgent, pressing and disgraceful.

In view of the fact that Liberal cabinet ministers have chalked up an amazing 82 flights in government JetStars during just eight weeks in office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House condemns the continuation of the "old Lang sign", "fly-me-at-public-expense" policy, and that the difference between economy air fares on commercial airlines and the cost of LearStar jet flights be recovered from the travel allowance of cabinet ministers and government departmental officials concerned.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

METRICATION

USE OF METRIC SYSTEM IN AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the concern of farmers in western Canada regarding metrication, particularly the use of the units tonnes and hectares in the grain trade and in agriculture generally, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture adopt the policies of their predecessors, namely, that both the imperial and metric systems be used in the grain trade and other agricultural fields where the previous Liberal administration had insisted on "metric only".

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST TAX INCENTIVES BE REINTRODUCED TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the information given to this House by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on April 21, that more than one million Canadians will be unemployed this year, and in view of the fact that on that evening he introduced taxation legislation which will raise prices but failed to introduce any legislation designed to increase employment opportunities for Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to reintroduce the employment-generating taxation measures that were contained in the December 11, 1979, budget.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FISHERIES

STEPS TO REDUCE POLLUTION OF THOMPSON DRAINAGE BASIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the salmon fishery on Canada's west coast is one of our most valuable national resources, and since the Fraser and Thompson Rivers form the last of the major, unobstructed salmon migration and spawning systems in North America, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That this House direct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of the Environment to use their considerable powers to provide assistance to communities in the Thompson drainage basin interested in establishing land disposal sewage treatment systems which would eliminate the present threat to this most valuable fishery.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED EVENTS AT IRANIAN EMBASSY, LONDON, ENGLAND

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the conflicting news reports on the situation at the Iranian embassy in London, I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs can provide any information to the House of Commons with regard to those tragic events.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the information I have is also somewhat conflicting: I have three or four different reports and none of them quite squares with the others.

As far as I have been able to put it together, there were several explosions which took place in the embassy, and it was subsequently stormed by British troops. I believe that the loss of life occurred during the explosions, and not during the storming, but I am not entirely certain of all the details at this point.

INDUSTRY

VIABILITY OF CHRYSLER CANADA—SPECULATION ON SUPPORT PROGRAM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the tragic loss of the V-6 engine plant from the Chrysler Canada development plans, in view of the widespread problems in the automobile industry in this country, and also in view of the concerns that I expressed last Friday on alternative investment proposals, is the minister having second thoughts about the viability of Chrysler Canada?

Is he still prepared to proceed with the massive support program that has been speculated about in the press recently, and would he be prepared to make a full report to the House of Commons about his views on the viability of Chrysler Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we still consider it worth while to try to reach an agreement with Chrysler Corporation on assistance for Chrysler Canada to assist it to retool and re-equip, provided we get the kinds of guarantees we think are in the Canadian interest with respect to such matters as jobs and production.

Mr. Wilson: A supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I must say I was expecting a little bit more from the minister in his answer as to whether or not he is going to provide a report to the House on the long-term viability of Chrysler Canada.

Over the weekend there was a report saying on the current status of the negotiations, and this is a quote from one of the minister's aides, "it is just a matter of time before one side or other gives in".

Does the minister feel it is realistic for Chrysler to give in, when the United automobile workers in the United States have indicated that a pledge to the Government of Canada to guarantee jobs is totally unacceptable to U.S. workers?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to rely on quotes from myself, not from anonymous aides. I certainly will be prepared to make reports to the House from time to time via the question period.

I do think it is quite realistic to expect that, in return for assistance provided by the Canadian government to Chrysler Canada, we do have a fair deal for the country with, as I have said before, provisions in it regarding our concerns with respect to Canadian jobs.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am somewhat amused at the minister's response. I have been waiting for about two weeks now to get anything like a report from the minister to this House on the status of these negotiations. They are very important ones, and the answers to date have been practically non-existent.

Is the negotiating position of the minister, with regard to these job guarantees, related in any way to his disappointment in not achieving the objectives that he set out to get in the Chrysler negotiations, things such as the engine plant, world product mandate, support for research and development, support for parts workers—anything along these lines?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I would question the premise of the hon. member's question. I do not think he should assume that I have failed to achieve any of my objectives until one sees the final conclusion.

An hon. Member: What are your objectives?

Mr. Gray: We are still working, as I have said, for a fair deal for Canada with arrangements with regard to key matters, such as jobs and production. So I do not think the hon. member's premise is correct; and we are continuing our efforts.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS TO IMPROVE EMPLOYMENT IN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister. In view of the massive lay-offs within the automotive industry as a whole, not only in Windsor—if I could remind the minister because he seems to forget from time to time—but in other parts of Canada as well, including Oakville, Brampton, St. Catharines, St. Thomas, and the list goes on, could the minister tell this House what economic development programs, other than the bungled-up financial aid to Chrysler which is taking so long, he and his government are considering in order to ease the over-all impact of these lay-offs in Ontario and across the country? And when, exactly, will this government begin to take specific and concrete action in order to remedy these problems?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have already begun to take specific and concrete action. We have had a series of talks with the presidents of the major motor vehicle manufacturers. We have met with the special trade representative of the United States to get his agreement on behalf of the United States to high-level consultations on the operations of the auto pact, and we expect the first meeting to take place before the summer. These are two examples of very concrete action.

An hon. Member: Which summer?

Mr. Gray: This summer; this year. You may want to forget this year after what happened to you on February 18.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: I am working actively for the interests of auto workers throughout the country and the communities in which they live. I am continuing those efforts. In one particular regard, I hope that we will soon be able to announce decisions on special loan guarantees or financing facilities for auto parts companies requiring assistance to take advantage of opportunities to build parts for the new generation of automotive technology.

Mr. Lawrence: You said that a month ago.

Mr. Gray: This is a very important priority, and for myself and the government the interests of auto workers and the communities in which they live, in every part of Ontario and across this country, are very important to us.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, notwithstanding the minister's answer, there has been no action; it has been just hot air. The fact remains that an estimated 22,000 Canadians within the automotive industry are either now out of a job or will be in the near future, and because unemployment insurance benefits alone will amount to a further $3¼ million a week, or $200 million a year, as a result—not to mention other negative side-effects— would the minister consider temporarily removing the 9 per cent federal excise tax on North American-built automobiles in Canada, in order to stimulate this ailing industry and reduce the number of lay-offs expected to take place?

• (1655)

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, this is a question very much within the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Finance. I think that the question should be directed toward his seat.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR DREE PROGRAMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who, as we all know, is the Deputy Prime Minister. On Friday, his colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion called regional disparities in Canada "a national disgrace". He went on to state that the financial resources of his department are stretched to the limit, and said there was "barely enough to honour the commitments made even by the previous Liberal government".

Given this extraordinary statement by his colleague, I wish to ask the minister why the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is forced to make public the lack of government financial support for DREE, and why his government is now providing inadequate funds to fight for regional development in this country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is obviously taking his work very seriously, and is obviously carrying his pleas beyond the rooms of the cabinet. To that I have no objection.

I would point out that there is a very substantial amount of funds already available within that department. I happen to be a representative of a client in that area of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. There is no one more sympathetic to his requirements than I am. At the same time, the hon. member must realize that we are operating under a policy of fiscal restraint at the present time, and it is not possible to escalate projected expenditures in the way that each of us might like individually but which in total would have a very damaging effect on the size of the deficit, inflation and the Canadian economy as a whole.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, contrary to what the Minister of Finance says, the minister responsible says that there are inadequate funds, and points out that whereas in 1970 some 2 per cent of the federal budget was allocated to DREE, with the present government that has dropped by some 50 per cent in amounts as a percentage of the total federal budget.

Given this reality, and given the promise in the Speech from the Throne that the government plans, "a program of action would be designed to promote national development and policy that provides jobs, stimulates growth and builds regional strengths", how can the government do as it promised without the money being there to do that job?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the job can be done by increased expenditures if, at the same time, the government either increases revenues or, alternatively, cuts out existing programs or, additionally, increases the deficit. There is no magic way to the destination the hon. member has described for the House.

It is from among these options that the government must choose in order to reach, not only the objectives of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but other ministers of the government who are putting forward increased spending programs which cannot be met at the present time unless we increase projected expenditures much beyond the present projection, which was thoroughly criticized as being extravagant by members opposite.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister cannot have it both ways: he cannot claim there is not enough money to do the job, and simultaneously build up false hopes in Atlantic Canada that the job is being done. That is what the government is trying to do.

Since the Premier of Nova Scotia and the president of the Sydney Steel Corporation have just recently expressed grave concern that unless the $50 million promised by this government—and the minister has already told us he is from the region—to Sysco is soon forthcoming, 400 more jobs are going to be lost, is the minister at least going to live up to his party's commitment made in the recent campaign to provide that money for people who want jobs, not hand-outs?

Mr. Crosbie: "The Sysco Kid."

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if I were inclined to be political—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —I might refer to what appeared to be inactivity on the part of Premier Buchanan, during those months of federal Tory regime, in seeking out the $50 million which had been decided upon by the preceding Liberal government.

• (1700)

Let me tell the hon. member that I have had meetings with Premier Buchanan—or, at least, one meeting and some conversations by telephone—and that I have invited him, on behalf of the government and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to submit concrete plans to the government. These will be considered in the light of the commitment which was made by the government and repeated by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign.

We shall seek to live up to that commitment within a program which will produce some results at the Sydney Steel plant. But it will not be the intention of the government to provide funds which will not in the long term bring about some solution to the important problems at that plant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

TRADE

INQUIRY WHETHER CONFERENCE OF PACIFIC RIM COUNTRIES WILL BE CONVENED

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the conference on the Pacific rim initiated by the former administration and postponed because of the election. Since the Minister of State for Trade has indicated an interest in holding this conference, and in light of the visit today by Prime Minister Ohira of Japan, himself the author of a report on the Pacific rim, would the Deputy Prime Minister inform us whether a new date for the conference has been set?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I regret I cannot give that information to the hon. member today but I will certainly get it and forward it to her.

Miss Carney: I should like to direct my supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since our senior diplomats and trade commissioners serving in the Pacific rim have advised us that the conference should be broad in scope and not restricted solely to trade, will the minister advise the House whether other aspects of Canada's total relationship, including political relations, defence, aid and immigration, will be included in the agenda of the conference?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the question assumes that a conference and its agenda will be announced. We are not in a position to confirm this at the present time. I can say, though, that we have been holding the widest discussions with Japanese authorities today on all matters dealing with the Pacific community.

FINANCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING RELIEF FROM CAPITAL GAINS TAX—READJUSTMENT OF VALUATION DAY

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance and, if you will permit, I should like to follow it with a brief question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the widely recognized fact that the capital gains tax is daily destroying family farms and small businesses, particularly on their transfer from parents to children, and in view of the fact that the Crosbie budget of December 13, 1979, provided capital gains tax relief from that date and a parliamentary committee to review the whole question, why did the minister completely ignore in his budget of April 21 both relief from capital gains tax and measures to set up a parliamentary committee to review the whole question?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I have not ignored the subject matter, Madam Speaker. In fact, I explained in my statement that these proposals made by the former minister of finance were not being proceeded with at the present time, but that in the meantime we would produce a discussion paper which would go into the whole question of capital gains and the role it plays. It occurred to me it would be better to have discussion prior to new measures, instead of introducing new measures and then having the discussion.

Mr. Thacker: My supplementary is to the Minister of Agriculture. The farmers of western Canada look to him for leadership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thacker: The Minister of Agriculture holds a position in which we look to him for leadership. He said during the campaign that valuation day should be, not December 31, 1971, but December 31, 1974. My question is this: Why did the hon. gentleman permit the Minister of Finance to bring in a budget without including that provision?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): First of all, Madam Speaker, we are the only nation in the world which permits a farm to be passed on to a son or daughter, who are operating that farm, without payment of any tax whatsoever. That law was passed by a Liberal government. The United States does not allow it, nor does Great Britain. No other country in the world allows that. A Liberal government passed that legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I have the utmost confidence in the Minister of Finance; that is why I allowed him to do what he did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister not admit that he himself voted to impose capital gains tax on all farmland in the original instance?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, it was a vote we on this side of the House supported. We have been pressured since that time by many farm groups, recognizing that if a farmer is going to sell to someone else other than a son or daughter they might need some special concessions. We said we would consider that, and we are doing so.

GRAIN

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO OFFSET LOSSES OF PRODUCERS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. In view of the continued decline of Canadian export wheat prices to 92 cents per bushel lower than on December 28 because of the decision of the Carter administration to embargo grain shipments to the Soviet Union, can the Deputy Prime Minister announce to the House today any immediate steps to assist Western farmers, thus honouring the commitment made by the Prime Minister during and since the election campaign that producers will not be the only persons to subsidize economically the United States government's embargo policy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to announce any immediate steps today but I shall take the hon. member's representation under consideration. I wish to assure him that whatever commitment was made in this respect by the Prime Minister will be lived up to, as will all the commitments we made during the election campaign.

Mr. Hovdebo: The North American market under the embargo differs considerably from the world market. The Argentine price is $1.36 higher per bushel than ours. Would the government, as a gesture of faith, assure the farmers that the initial price of grain will be established near the embargo price of $4.25 at which it is presently set?

Mr. MacEachen: I will bring the hon. member's representation to the attention of the minister concerned.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO HOG PRODUCERS

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Hog producers recently proved that, because of low prices, they are having a hard time solving their financial difficulties.

Can the Minister tell the House whether or not an offer has been made to them? How much will Quebec producers get and what percentage of them will be affected by that measure?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, announcement was made this morning, concerning stabilization payments. We had to make that announcement according to law because it is a named commodity under the stabilization legislation. Approximately $4.07 a hog will be paid to the hog producers. Over 90 per cent of all hog producers will be covered in all areas. A maximum for individual producers will be paid on 5,000 head of hogs, which will amount to some $20,000 for each producer. Up to three family units will be eligible to be paid.

● (1710)

However, no payment will be made to anyone who cannot prove he is a hog producer. If someone is managing a hog operation from some plush office in Calgary, Winnipeg, Montreal or Toronto, he cannot expect that payment from this minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE OF TASK FORCE REPORT ON UNIFICATION

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The report of the task force on the merits and disadvantages of unification identifies nine major problem areas in the present structure and organization of the Department of National Defence and the armed forces. Will the minister refer the report to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that the minister and his senior advisers and others can appear before it to study its 30 recommendations; or, if the minister does not intend to accept the recommendations, can he explain to the people of Canada how he intends to correct the serious problems identified by the report?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the former defence minister, and I regret his gloomy and negative attitude toward the armed forces when he said in his motion that there were serious problems in the armed forces. The task force report itself says that the morale of the forces is reasonably good, and I think he should realize that it has been improved since.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, had the former minister of national defence read the press release carefully, he would know that, as I said in the release, I did not intend to comment on the thirty recommendations of the task force simply because I want to establish a group to review all these recommendations so that we will know exactly what the cost of implementation and the effects on the organization of the forces would be, and also to study the recommendations so that a decision, either positive or negative, can be made. Madam Speaker, I think that the quarter of a million dollars that this task force cost could have been used more appropriately than to fund a group to tell us things we already know.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I was merely quoting the language used in the task force report itself, and I did read the minister's press release in which he said he would "appoint a review group to examine in detail the factors which may have given rise to, and the considerations which would be germane to, the disposition of the recommendations." I recognize the language well.

Could the minister indicate if he personally has read the report? Second, in his press release accompanying the task force report the minister indicated that he plans to have a review group. Is it true that Major-General St. Aubin was offered the job of heading such a review group but resigned rather than carry out the dirty work required of him, which was to suffocate this report?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, the former minister's allegation is totally false. Major-General St. Aubin resigned his post simply because he had the opportunity to pursue another career path outside the forces.

NATIONAL REVENUE

EFFECT OF NEW CUSTOMS REGULATIONS ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I might mention in passing that from what the Minister of Finance said today, it sounds like DREE again stands for "department for re-election expenses."

On the one hand, this so-called new Liberal government talks about helping small businessmen and, on the other hand, harasses them with new customs regulations like B-32 actions. Is the minister aware of what is going on in his department and the effect that this has on companies which can be forced to close their doors within 30 days because of the implications of that regulation?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question.

It is true that we have up to a two-year period to re-examine duty and tariff classifications. This is because we need the time to do research in the host country to make sure we are being fair. We do give the importer notice of this reclassification and, if he feels aggrieved, there is an appeal procedure.

It is not the intention of this government to harm small business but, rather, to encourage it, as my hon. colleague is doing. I will take the hon. member's question as a representation and make sure that we apply the law fairly.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, is the minister aware that it is possible to get three different classification judgments on one item by three different officers? If that happens within his department, how is it possible after two years to pass on those extra expenses from those extra tariff charges which now have to be affixed to the cost of the product? How can that be passed on by the company in order to recoup its expenses and still make a profit so that it can pay that tariff?

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, I understand the difficulty which the hon. member presents but, as I say, we need that time to make sure that the duty and tariff classification is fair. There are a number of people who have the authority to reclassify, including the deputy minister and the dominion customs appraiser.

I just want to say to the hon. member again that I certainly will take his representation very seriously and make sure we are applying the law fairly and in the best interests of small business.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

INQUIRY WHY CAPABILITY ON WEST COAST NOT UPGRADED

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. A freighter, the Lee Wang Zin, sank off the coast of British Columbia more than four months ago. At the same time 52 people in a two-week period died in the waters of British Columbia.

Would the minister explain why his department refuses to upgrade the search and rescue capability on the west coast of B.C. to a minimum acceptable standard and why he has cut back the improvements promised under the search and rescue helicopter program?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think on the contrary that our search and rescue program has been improved in recent years and we are continuing to improve it all the time. I admit that it might still not be as perfect as the hon. member would like to have it, but I can assure him we are doing everything we can to provide adequate service to the people in British Columbia and on the east coast.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the minister has in his possession two reports, one from the Ministry of National Defence and one from the Ministry of Transport, which analyse this particular accident and make recommendations. I wonder if the minister could explain why he is not prepared to submit to the House and to the public the outcome of those two reports?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, of course I am not aware of all the details in those two reports. I have them and I can assure the House that all the recommendations in those reports will be implemented as soon as possible in order to provide the Pacific coast with the service the hon. member would like to have.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST TO ACCELERATE TOURIST DEVELOPMENT IN LOWER ST. LAWRENCE AND GASPÉ

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In April, 1978, the Government of Canada signed an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec providing $76 million for tourist development, including $11.6 million for the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé areas. People in the Gaspé are now worried about the delay in the development of the Gaspé park. Could the minister contact his counterpart in the province of Quebec to get the work going and the necessary supplies for the development of the Gaspé park, harbours for inshore and educational fishing in Anse-au-Griffon and Anse-au-Beaufils, as well as for the outdoors base in Pabos Mills?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I understand quite well the concern of the hon. member because it has been over two years since the Department of Regional Economic Expansion made available to the government of Quebec over $6 million to develop tourist infrastructures in the peninsula and, according to the latest information I have, the government of Quebec will be spending only a few hundred thousand dollars during this summer. I would be very happy to convey the representations the hon. member is asking me to pass on to those people but, busy as they are with the referendum, I doubt very much that they will show any concern over the happiness of the people in the Gaspé or elsewhere in Quebec.

INCLUSION OF NORTHUMBERLAND IN EASTERN ONTARIO SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, in view of the rather stinging rebuke administered to him in the House by the Minister of Finance with respect to his cry for assistance from this government, I would like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he accepts that rebuke and now considers that the complaints that he made last Friday were justifiable and ones about which he feels strongly.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, what I said last Friday was in answer to the hon. member for Northumberland, who was asking me to include his riding in an agreement signed by the previous administration, which forgot his riding. I was telling him that there are two ways of doing it, either enlarging the territory, which would dilute the $50 million which was for that part of Ontario, or increasing the budget.

● (1720)

With regard to increasing the budget, I said I would like to know where the official opposition stands on that score, because the official opposition wants to restrain public expenditures. I said I would like to know from the hon. member's side of the House where they stand on the question: Should we increase the budget of DREE or, as they have been saying for months, should we restrain public expenditures?

Oral Questions

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FUNDING OF LONG-TERM DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, it was interesting and notable today in the House to hear—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Gilchrist: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister of Japan placed such stress on research and development, and during the Conservative administration stability was introduced—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member pursue his question.

Mr. Gilchrist: The objective of the present government of 1.5 per cent of the gross national product for research and development is commendable. In order to ensure this, it will have to sustain the program introduced by the Conservative administration which funded a five-year plan. I would ask the Minister of Science and Technology—I apologize for not having addressed him earlier—if he is prepared to tell the House that he will sustain that five-year program and the funding for the first year so that the scientific community will be able to plan a long- term development strategy.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I will do more than that; I will increase the funding considerably above the figures put forward by the Conservatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilchrist: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Reports have revealed the existence of a series of papers produced by government departments proposing financial assistance and other support measures to be provided to certain high technology industries in the context of a national industrial policy. Due to the crucial need for such an economic blueprint, when will the government make the studies public so they might be inspected and given open discussion by the science community and this House?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, it is my intention to make available all the relevant discussion papers. Perhaps I could check the hon. member's question, or perhaps he might deal with me directly to indicate exactly with which areas he is most concerned. It is my intention to make publicly available all the background material.

Oral Questions

YOUNG OFFENDERS

JUVENILE CORRECTIONS FIELD—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. There exists a very serious crisis in the province of British Columbia and elsewhere with respect to the provision of psychiatric containment facilities for juveniles who have come in conflict with the law. This crisis is so serious that a number of juvenile court judges have recently publicly condemned the situation. Also, detention centres are grossly overcrowded. I would ask the Solicitor General what action he intends to take in co-operation with the provinces involved, particularly the province of British Columbia, and whether he is prepared to convene an early meeting with the attorneys general of the provinces involved to deal with this very serious crisis in the juvenile corrections field.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am familiar with the situation and I have asked for a meeting with the attorney general of British Columbia while I am in the province at the end of this week. I am looking forward to seeing him and discussing this matter and some other matters with him.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, as the Solicitor General is no doubt aware, there have been no revisions of substance to the Juvenile Delinquents Act since it was introduced in 1908. Also, there was no reference in the Speech from the Throne to any such amendments. Could the minister indicate to the House what steps he intends to take to bring in amendments, which are long overdue, to this outdated legislation to deal with the whole area of young offenders and the law?

Mr. Kaplan: I should like to thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me the opportunity to inform the House that I am working on such legislation, which I intend to bring forward to my colleagues in cabinet in due course. I have been looking forward to presenting totally new legislation to that which was first brought in in 1908, and it will see the light of day soon.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

VANIER ARTERIAL PROJECT—PARTICIPATION OF RMOC IN ESTABLISHING TERMS OF REFERENCE OF ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Public Works who is also responsible for the National Capital Commission. Some weeks ago the minister complied with numerous requests made by concerned community groups and representatives at all levels for an environmental impact study on the Vanier arterial project and the surrounding communities it affects. This arterial is being built by the regional government of Ottawa-Carleton. In his letter to me dated April 25, the minister said:

> The commission will invite RMOC to participate with it in establishing the terms of reference for the review and in taking any appropriate action that may be required.

Since the construction by the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton is going ahead, can the minister say what action he has taken to invite the RMOC to participate in the terms of reference of this study which is so important, and whether the reactions of regional government have been negative, why, and what he intends to do about it?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have seen the reports that the region is not interested in participating. However, I have asked officials of the commission to check with officials of the region because I think it will be virtually impossible to draw the terms of reference of such an environmental impact study, particularly in light of the fact that the region itself is the contractor, not the NCC. I hope that when they realize the practical difficulties, there will indeed be some consultation.

ENERGY

ASSISTANCE FOR ATLANTIC CANADA TO MEET PROPOSED INCREASE IN OIL PRICES BY SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question, in view of the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the report that Saudi Arabia is considering increases in their crude oil price from approximately $30 Canadian to approximately $36 Canadian, has the government any emergency program or measure in mind to cushion the impact of this increase on Atlantic Canada similar to the aid contemplated for our car manufacturing industry, for example, since Saudi Arabia supplies some 37 per cent of Canada's oil imports and an increase of this nature will have serious implications on our electricity charges and on industry in our part of the world?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is in the maritime provinces at the moment. In the range of his discussions there, he will be touching upon the issue, and others, which the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, according to news reports, decisions are now being finalized relative to the allocation phase among provinces and industries concerning the rationing of energy in Canada. Can the minister inform the House what consultations, if any, have taken place between the representatives of the fishing industry and representatives of the agricultural industry, and assure the House that no restrictions will be imposed by this new plan which will in any way affect supply of fuels and lubricants to fishermen and farmers?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, the concerns and the interests of farmers and fishermen in the matter of energy allocation are being taken into account in any contingency plans that are being made.

PARKS CANADA

CANCELLATION OF PROPOSED RELOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE FROM CORNWALL TO PETERBOROUGH

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, we are all enthused by the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister. My question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and it stems from the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the Acting Prime Minister's statement to address regional disparities and show fiscal restraint, I wonder if the Minister of the Environment has any solution to offer for the lack of regional attention and the lack of fiscal restraint shown by the cancellation of the move of Eldorado and, at three o'clock this afternoon, the cancellation of the move of Parks Canada? What effect will this have in that region, namely, Peterborough? Is there any plan that this government has to offset the negative effect this will have on the economy of those areas, not to mention the taxpayers who have footed the bill for the intended move and now are expected to foot the bill for the move back?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to his great concern about the economic impact of this move on the region. My concern is primarily for the morale and the interest of the workers of Parks Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: It is on that basis that I took the decision which I did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1730)

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I choose to differ with the opinion of the Minister of the Environment on the position which he takes. My supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment is this: Is he not aware that the employees of Parks Canada in Cornwall were notified in 1973 that any locations there would be temporary, and that the impending move to Peterborough was in fact a recommendation of the former Liberal government, acted on by the Conservative government, and now reversed with a complete disregard for the taxpayers of Canada?

An hon. Member: Or for the morale of the workers.

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, the fact is that the hon. member, in putting his question to me, focused it entirely on the economic consequences for the city of Peterborough and that region. The fact is that I have gone to speak to the workers in Parks Canada in the Cornwall regional office, which I doubt the hon. member has done, and I can assure him that I believe the decision we have taken is the one which most meets the needs and interests of the people in Parks Canada. Regrettably—

An hon. Member: It meets the needs of Ed Lumley.

Mr. Roberts: Regrettably it is a decision which, no matter how it was taken, would adversely affect the interests of some of the employees of Parks Canada. That was inescapable. But the basis upon which I have taken the decision is to try to minimize the economic damage and inconvenience to those who are working so faithfully and loyally for Parks Canada.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Why did you make the decision in the first place?

Mr. Roberts: That was the basis of the decision, and I believe it was the right basis for the decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIRLINE TICKET SALES

Question No. 253—Mr. Herbert:

1. To the knowledge of the government, do airlines pay a standard scale of fees to agents in Canada for selling tickets?

2. Are agents obligated to sell airline tickets at the same price as the airlines?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Generally, the answer is yes. In the case of international and transborder travel to the United States, the scheduled airlines have established, via their international and North American industry associations, standard rates of sales commission to travel agents. In practice, these commissions can sometimes vary according to sales volume, although this is not recognized by most of the airline industry as a legitimate procedure. For domestic travel, Canada's scheduled airlines have not established standard commission rates via their domestic industry association. Nonetheless, a uniform commission rate for such travel has resulted among the major airlines. The case of charter air travel is different, as commissions are paid by the charterer (tour operator) rather than by the airline. Commissions for charter travel differ from those for scheduled travel.

2. Section 112(10) of the Air Carrier Regulations (Consolidated Regulations of Canada 1978, c.3 states: "no air carrier, or any officer or agent thereof" shall offer air transportation at a toll or condition different from those set out in the air carrier's tariff on file with the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC), unless prior exemption has been received from the CTC. The CTC does not have direct jurisdiction over travel agents, however, and the legal applicability of this regulation to the actions of travel agents has not been fully ascertained. In the case of charter air travel, the airlines are not allowed to sell tickets directly to the public. Retail prices are set by the charterer or tour operator. Although travel agents normally abide by such prices, it is not certain whether they are legally required to do so.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON BROADCASTING

Question No. 257—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government considering establishing a royal commission on broadcasting?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The government is not considering at this time establishing a royal commission on broadcasting.

EXPORT OF COAL

Question No. 382—Mr. Herbert:

Is Canada presently limiting the export of coal and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Government of Canada is not limiting the export of coal. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other departments are actively supporting the coal industry in its efforts to expand and diversify export markets.

DSS—LAWYERS

Question No. 615—Mr. Howie:

How many lawyers are employed on staff in the Department of Supply and Services?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): There are no lawyers employed on staff in the Department of Supply and Services. The Department of Justice has, however, assigned a total of 14 lawyers to provide the day to day legal counsel required by the department.

DSS—PUBLIC RELATIONS

Question No. 636—Mr. Howie:

How many persons engaged in public relations, publicity or media relations, are employed on staff in the Department of Supply and Services?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Two.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKING INSTITUTIONS

The House resumed, from Thursday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, when I rose on this matter last Thursday, I had only two or three minutes before the time of adjournment, so at that time I made some reference to some of the comments made by the New Democratic Party. I hope they will look at those comments because I think they are important when we think about this piece of legislation, which has been before the House of Commons on so many occasions already, a piece of legislation which really forms, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said, the charter and the basic working documents on which our banks operate.

The committee which thoroughly studied this bill when it was labelled C-15 in the Thirtieth Parliament was a committee that is no longer representative of this House in that at least ten members of that committee are no longer members of this House; and looking at the members who formed that committee, four of the members who remain as members of this House are now ministers of the Crown in the government in this Thirty-second Parliament. In all probability they will not be taking part in committee hearings. Nonetheless, before this bill goes to committee I think it is important that every member of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs thoroughly study the hearings and the representations made by various witnesses called by that committee, because it strikes me that the committee has done an excellent job in determining and making recommendations concerning this act.

Unfortunately there have been a number of economic changes in Canada since the spring of 1979. At that time we were appalled at prime rates being charged by the chartered banks of 12 per cent. We were appalled at that level of interest rates. Since that date and in less than a year interest rates have gone to 16.5 per cent, have been higher than that, and perhaps have settled down to that, but are still in excess by 33 per cent above what they were at the time the committee heard witnesses from the banks and other financial institutions.

There are a number of matters which perhaps should be studied by the committee before this bill is finally passed into law. In that sense I think we should study very carefully the past testimony and then hear from the officials of the ministry as to why certain of the recommendations made by that committee were not followed through when the bill was presented as it is presented now. Second, we should hear witnesses with respect to specific issues which seem now to have arisen that perhaps were not of concern or serious concern to the committee when it studied the bill in 1979.

I might suggest that those concerns are with respect to the activities of foreign banks. I think there has been a bit of a change in attitude. Certainly this government, in presenting its statement in the Speech from the Throne, indicated that it wished to take a much stronger pro-Canadian stand. Perhaps the government should explain very carefully to us in the finance committee why the strong pro-Canada stand indicated in the Speech from the Throne is not repeated in the suggested terms respecting foreign banks as set out in the bill.

A number of concerns have been expressed very dramatically recently with respect to automobile leasing and I would say with respect to other types of consumption-oriented leasing. The activities of the banks have been to some extent shown up over the past year. I want to deal rather in detail with respect to this leasing problem and to make the suggestion that it is imperative that the committee, in studying the act, thoroughly reconsider its position with respect to leasing.

Concerns have been expressed by Canadian cattlemen and there are certain other concerns regarding liquidity, and particularly with the problems which minor trust companies are having in this country today. It may well be that we should examine the extent to which banks should be entitled to stay in the mortgage field or in the long-term finance field, in view of the liquidity problem that massive changes in the interest rate structure such as have taken place over the last year in particular might create, impairing the safety and the ability of our banking system to continue to serve us well.

I might say at the outset that it is my view, and the view of members of this party, that the banking system in Canada is one of the finest banking systems in the world. It is important that that banking system be viable, that it grow, that it continue to serve Canadians and serve them well.

The committee dealing with this matter a year ago made reference to the need to define what is banking. The hon. member for Edmonton West made many remarks with regard to that matter and he was severely criticized by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) in debate. It was unfortunate that the hon. member for Burin-St. George's had not even had the Bank Act or any of the committee's reports. Indeed, he really did not know what they contained and admitted to this House that he was speaking largely from ignorance. However, that is the hon. member for Burin-St. George's.

With respect to the definition of banking, it is, indeed, surprising to me, as it must be to all members of this House, that under Section 91 of the British North America Act the federal responsibility in respect of this whole issue is clearly defined in five separate paragraphs, including banking, the incorporation of banks, the issuance of paper money, interest, legal tender, bills of exchange, promissory notes and, indeed, even savings banks. These represent specific federal powers. It is a specific list of federal powers that certainly must encompass all of the concerns in respect of money, money management and financial management at every level.

However, the response to the insistence by the House that a definition of "banking" be included in the bill was this. The House had insisted that there be a definition of banking. The ministerial comment was that a narrow definition would overly restrict the activities of banks and their development, and a broad definition could result in some extension of banking legislation into areas of provincial jurisdiction. Having read what is clearly in section 91, I do not see how the provinces have any jurisdiction whatsoever in this field, save perhaps in a minor way under their property and civil rights powers.

What has happened is that this federal government has refused over the years since confederation to really develop its powers under section 91 of the BNA Act. It has let other jurisdiction into the field, more or less by the incorporation of provincial trust companies and a provincial mix, if you want, of mortgage and investment corporations, lending and land corporations, and a whole stream of other types of institutions which, by their very growth, have become what are commonly called "near banks". They take deposits, they issue current accounts, they cash cheques on demand, they treat themselves entirely as banks and they operate totally unregulated by this government.

To suggest that to define banking would unduly interfere with provincial legislation is to indicate that this government is prepared to abandon its true field, as set out by the fathers of confederation in the British North America Act. Yet, at the same time, the problems that we have in respect of national unity in this country really boil down to an intrusion into provincial powers by this government when we legislate on health and welfare matters, on cultural matters and on a whole host of matters which, on anybody's analysis, must be matters of provincial jurisdiction. We should be using the jurisdiction we have and that is properly identified with this government to legislate on matters of economics, to make sure the money supply is controlled, and to make sure we are doing the things we are supposed to be doing.

The other day the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, issued a release to the major banks asking them not to make loans to enable U.S.-based companies to do an end run around U.S. credit controls.

One of the most important reasons the federal government is in charge of financial matters of this nature, with powers set out in section 91 of the BNA Act, is in order that the federal government can have fiscal control throughout the country. With the abrogation of federal responsibility, with the refusal to define "banking", and with the refusal—because we might get into someone's way—to act sensibly and in accordance with the constitution, we have allowed all sorts of situations in which the federal government can no longer fulfil its function. While the federal government can direct the banks, it cannot direct the trust companies, preventing them from making fancy transfers of foreign exchange from this country.

One of our problems in respect of interest rates is that there seems to be no way we can control foreign exchange matters. We wind up with problems concerning the balance of payments, and we have a situation in which we are told we cannot have our interest rates differ unduly from those of the United States. The reason, of course, is that we have refused to come to grips with the real constitutional requirement of having the banks and the entire financial structure totally under federal control. We have sat back and said we cannot interfere with matters of provincial jurisdiction. I think it is about time we started interfering with this matter and took ourselves out of some other matters where we should not have been in the first place.

The same question was asked in respect of what is a deposit. In this regard the minister's response was that it has not been possible to find a definition that is sufficiently flexible to account for present and future variations. Isn't that fine? We cannot even define a deposit! The reason is that the government says a deposit cannot be flexibly defined. It is obviously necessary, if we are going to control banking and determine what a bank can or cannot do, and if we are going to determine what those not licensed can or cannot do, that we define the word "banking", the business of banking and what is a deposit. We have to do that and we should do it now.

I want now to deal for a moment with some of the problems concerning automobile dealers. I thought perhaps for the enlightenment of the House I would read four short lines of poetry as follows:

Through the open window's space
Behold, a camel thrust his face.
"My nose is cold," he meekly cried,
"Oh, let me warm it by thy side."

That is just about what has happened in respect of our banking system and how it has managed to creep into almost every field of endeavour. We have been told in regard to leasing that it is important that the bank be available to use the leasing structure in order to finance massive capital purchases, and that this was the same as making regular, ordinary loans, just as they make commercial or household loans. For a moment let us consider the household lending field.

In the previous act banks were permitted to go into consumer lending activity. They went into it with full force. That was to make it easier for the ordinary person to borrow the money he needs in order to operate his home. Unfortunately, it became more than just that. There has recently been a flood of plastic cards across the country and there are big signs which say "Yes" or "We candu". I do not know whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) had something to do with that "Candu", but the Royal Bank now has "Candu". The effect of all these monster advertising programs is that the banking system has tended to become a merchandising system. The Bank of Commerce now talks about a "boots and saddles" loan or they advertise "Can't we get you a new car?". The question is whether this is banking or merchandising—whether Visa, Master Charge and the others are just merchandising or a form of advertising of the goods and services produced by the business community.

● (1750)

We must consider the question of leasing, Mr. Speaker. It appears that the banks have decided to get into this field and a number of us are concerned about that. I can easily see how important it is that people who need to buy large capital items like dump trucks, front-end loaders, airplanes and such things, should also have the opportunity to lease them. This is the type of financial transaction that we expect from the banks. But then the question arises, are we going to be able to lease suits, chainsaws, automobiles, pleasure sailboats, surf boards—that sort of thing? Leasing could have the effect of encouraging some people to go further into debt. I am not at all happy that leasing the type of things I have mentioned is an activity that the banking community should be involved in. It is really merchandising.

The banks have stated in their presentation—and clause 193 of the bill sets this out—that they can only be involved in financial lease. This gives rise to the question of when a financial lease ends and when a maintenance or repair lease, for instance, ends. What distinction is made between an ordinary consumer item and a large capital item that might be used in business?

I think it is essential, Mr. Speaker, that we examine the way financial leasing is being handled by a leading company, a subsidiary of the Royal Bank of Canada called RoyLease Limited. In the old act there was no provision for a bank to hold a company like RoyLease, although they were permitted to do so by a special order in council, more or less, pending revision of the Bank Act. Now all of the major banks have some sort of leasing arm and it is perhaps unfair to single out RoyLease. However, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has already mentioned this company and certain letters that have come into our hands which indicate that, while a bank is prohibited from going into maintenance leasing agreements—a situation where the renter of a car has maintenance included in his rental payments—that has not prevented RoyLease from insisting upon specific arrangements with specific garages.

This is what has been done with Mr. Lawrence Myers of Forbes Chevrolet-Oldsmobile Ltd. in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. RoyLease insisted on an agreement for a 20 per cent discount on parts and a 10 per cent discount on labour. This was to be done through a special Visa card with a RoyLease sticker on it. The letter ends:

This type of thing indicates that the banks in Canada are prepared to go beyond the normal and agreed "no maintenance" condition and "no licensing" condition and so on in a financial lease. It indicates that they are prepared to use tactics which may be described by some as strongarm tactics with respect to maintenance and purchasing.

The camel appears to have gone into the tent, Mr. Speaker. Automobile dealers express concern that while they are forced to borrow money from the banks in the normal commercial manner in order to finance inventory and receivables, the banks then force them to turn over their list of customers and list of receivables like any other business. The dealers are concerned that once the banks have the names of the customers and the amount of the lease of the vehicle, their customers will then become the banks' customers and that they, the dealers, will not be able to do anything about it because they still have to operate on a line of credit from the banks and co-operate with the banks or be left out in the cold.

We must address this question, Mr. Speaker. Surely there is a conflict of interest when the lender can also be the merchant. These are the most powerful lenders in the country. A current statement shows that at the end of February the Royal Bank of Canada had assets of $55.7 billion, the Bank of Commerce had assets of $49.3 billion and the smallest of the big five had nearly $30 billion in assets. And they should be big and powerful institutions, Mr. Speaker, capable of financing the commerce of Canada, but that should not be an excuse for getting into the merchandising of everything in the country.

It occurs to me that the camel in the tent has a cold nose, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately he is a pretty big camel. Indeed, one camel is the size of $55 billion, so when he gets into the tent there is not going to be room for the automobile dealer! Maybe the end result will be that more and more consumer items will be financed by our lending institutions.

This brings me to our concern with residual values, Mr. Speaker. Certain draft regulations were produced by the former government regarding leasing, but unfortunately they are not contained in Bill C-6 as presented by the government. We were surprised that these provisions are not in the bill as they were in the previous one, Bill C-14. The committee had insisted that leasing regulations be posted and contained in the material presented to the House. We are sorry that the regulations are not there and we will be insisting that they be included, because they determine how leasing will operate.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the debate was adjourned at six o'clock, the motion that Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time, was under review and the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, before the break for supper I was referring to the regulations propounded with respect to Bill C-14 before the previous Parliament, and those regulations stipulated that a lending institution, a bank, must provide in its leasing arrangements that the residual value of the leased equipment could be no greater than 20 per cent of the cost of acquisition of the property by the leasing corporation. Those regulations, and regulations like that, were referred to in a hearing before the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States with respect to bank holding companies in 1976.

In the United States there is an arrangement under the American consumer protection laws, and particularly under the consumer leasing act passed by the Congress of the United States on March 23, 1976, which specifically requires leasing corporations, if they are banks, to make sure that the residual value of the equipment being leased is the fair market value. In the event that at the maturity of the lease the equipment being leased is not the fair market value, the lessor of the equipment is not required to pay, if that is the case. So there is a real control to make certain that the leasing company makes sure that the residual value of the equipment being leased is in fact a fair residual value.

Clearly, the residual value is very important in determining the monthly rentals. If the residual value is estimated as being much higher than it reasonably could be in the normal case, then the rent charged can be considerably less than fair, and the American law makes that provision to protect the lessee of the equipment. One of the things we must concern ourselves with if we are going to allow the banks to get into the leasing field is to have regulations that ensure that the rental charged by the bank is a fair estimate. Our suggested regulations in October or November of last year with respect to the previous bill mentioned a residual amount not greater than 20 per cent of the acquisition cost.

I want to refer to what is in fact happening. I am taking some details out of a RoyLease lease with respect to a Chevrolet automobile where the original purchase price in the lease is quoted at $7,074.60. At the end of 24 months the vehicle is supposed to have a value of $3,256.74, or about 40 per cent of the value. That is the kind of lease that is being ordered by the Royal Bank of Canada through RoyLease in contravention of the regulations that were supposed to be in place with respect to this bill when this bill was before the House in the last Parliament. Indeed, it is not until the vehicle has been in the possession of the lessee for 36 months that the residual value of the vehicle is down to $1,345.16, which is just less than the 20 per cent requirement.

The point I am making is that the regulations as propounded in October or November of last year that have not been propounded by this government, and I make that point very clear, must be propounded by this government before this bill is to pass. However, those regulations have not been complied with by RoyLease, at least in determining how automobile leases should be worked out. They are talking about residual values considerably in excess of 20 per cent in their proposals to customers. What we have to look at is the kind of protection that Americans provide with respect to their consumer leasing act. That type of protection to lessees of equipment should be provided in our statute and in our regulations.

The next item I want to deal with is with respect to foreign banking. The details of foreign banking are set out in sections 302 and following. These banks are to be called schedule B banks. The minister was quite proud when he presented the whole matter to the House. He said that in no case will foreign banks be allowed to dominate more than 8 per cent of the total business of banking in Canada. Hon. members will recall I made some comments with regard to what is banking. The act does not define that. How the heck do you determine what is 8 per cent of the total?

When we brought the Mercantile Bank into Canada, it was not supposed to get even close to 1 per cent of the total amount of banking in Canada. That was the suggestion by Mr. Edgar Benson, minister of finance at the time. At the present time the Mercantile Bank has 1.5 per cent of the banking in Canada, so the growth factor is almost uncontrollable.

The practical matter is that once a bank is given a licence to operate in Canada, there is no practical way the Minister of Finance or indeed the Minister of State for Finance can in any way limit the percentage of business or percentage of gross assets that bank can have in Canada. Once you let the camel in the tent, it is totally impossible to tell how far the camel will go in the tent.

This government has made a great pretence of looking at a redefined Foreign Investment Review Agency, but we have a particular provision with the pious hope that you can limit foreign banking to 8 per cent. What has been the pious hope in the past? The pious hope with every business in the past is that Canada has been very poor at controlling foreign investment. We have an act that in fact authorizes and even encourages foreign investment. It is in ministerial discretion. Although the minister is to ensure that no bank increases its percentage of business beyond 8 per cent, I doubt whether that is totally possible to enforce.

Once banks get in the position of taking business, they will continue to increase it. The minister can be as pious as he wants about 8 per cent, but once he starts making bilateral deals with other countries about banks coming in and doing business in Canada, what is he going to say to an applicant from Japan, for example? Will he say that we already have 9 per cent foreign investment in banking so you cannot come in, or is he going to say we will amend the act to make it 10, 15 or 20 per cent. The answer is that there is no way, unless we are going to have total government control over the expansion of competing banks, for the Minister of Finance or any minister or government to regulate a particular bank specifically to a particular size of the market place.

The whole concept is to bring foreign banks in to improve competition. This particular suggestion of 8 per cent is totally unworkable and the minister knows this. It is there because it may be interesting to talk about today when we have not yet got there, but eventually we will get 8 per cent, 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 20 per cent, and the statute will go on to 50 per cent, we know where it will go from there. The answer is that there is no way of controlling this percentage, and the minister should know that. He has no regulation that will allow him to discriminate from one country's bank to another country's bank and so on.

One of the other problems that involves foreign banking was brought to my attention by an officer of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce with whom I had lunch, with respect to this.

Mr. Kaplan: Who paid for lunch?

Mr. Blenkarn: He said—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: I thank hon. members of this House. Unfortunately, I was interrupted three times. I can promise hon. members I will not exceed in the true sense the full 40 minutes allotted to me. I appreciate the opportunity to continue.

As I was saying, the matter concerning foreign banks was brought to my attention by an official of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. He said that what in fact will happen is that the foreign banks will skim. They will come into Canada and take the good business, the easy-to-get business. He said that the foreign banks will not put an office in Inuvik, Frobisher Bay, or some small community that really needs banking services to cash old age pension cheques and so on. You will only find them in the big cities. They are going to take the easy-to-get business. They are going to skim. The foreign banks are not going to make the small business loans. I spoke about that a week ago Monday. I am not sure that that act is worth anything.

The foreign banks will not make that kind of loan. They will not make the student loans. They will not do all the little things required of them. They are not going to pay any attention to the Minister of Finance when he wants certain things done in Canada. They are going to skim.

There is no provision in this act and the regulations concerning foreign banks to make them do the things that are socially acceptable in Canada. It is not possible to enforce such regulations. When they get in here, they take the easy-to-get business, the big business, the big buck deals that pay big bucks for them. They can repatriate their profits, but there is nothing in the act to make them do the socially acceptable things. In act after act passed by this parliament with respect to farmers, with respect to small business, with respect to students, requiring banks to advance the various easy or guaranteed loans for which we have provided, what will make the foreign bank advance those loans? That is skimming, and if we allow foreign banks in the country, surely we must provide in the charter that such banks take a fair share of the social responsibility which the large banks in this country have willingly accepted.

● (2020)

If we look at the Bank of Commerce, if we look at the Royal Bank, or the Bank of Nova Scotia, we find that they have willingly accepted social responsibilities. If new banks are to come into this country they must be particularly required to accept such responsibilities. It has been said that the schedule II banks will attempt to discourage the suitcase banker. It is said in the statute that we can stop his activities by not allowing him to conduct business. Unfortunately, the act does not define banking, so a company can come in here as the XYZ financial corporation, incorporated, say, in the province of Ontario, and since there is no definition of banking the company can do almost everything except call itself a bank.

There is nothing in this statute, despite the restriction on the offering of guarantees, which in any way inhibits the ability of a person to come into Canada and effectively carry on banking. The minister might argue that some of the sections—and I quote them to him—stop foreign banks. The truth is that there is more than one way to become involved in banking. There is one way well open to Canadians to become involved in banking, and that is to lend money to Canadian corporations and the interest can be repatriated to the lender in a foreign country without withholding tax. It is very simple to incorporate John Brown Financial Services Limited in the Province of Ontario, having the money that supports John Brown Financial Services lent to John Brown Financial Services on a floating charge debenture with a high interest rate, and immediately the foreign bank is in business; it hasn't got a foreign shareholder, the owner is a nominal Canadian. But, in fact, that foreign bank would be able, under the laws of this country, no matter what this act says, to do banking business in Canada, so this in no way inhibits that activity.

I said at the outset of my speech that the government has power under section 91 of the British North America Act, repeated and repeated under five separate headings, to control every aspect of banking. We refuse to define banking and refuse to interfere in the activity of foreign lenders coming into Canada and tearing our financial system apart for their own benefit. We refuse to use our federal powers in this area, and this bill does nothing to control the foreign banker who decides, for whatever reason, not to be registered as a section B bank. This is a serious defect in the bill and I say it is essential that we re-examine the whole subject of the Bank Act with respect to foreign banks.

The last thing I want to talk about briefly is a problem I have foreseen in the last year. Some ten years ago we allowed banks to become involved in the mortgage business. The mortgage business, by and large, involves long-term lending, and long-term lending should be backed up by long-term borrowing. Unfortunately, the activity of the banks is such that the banks have not engaged significantly in long-term borrowing though they have, in the mortgage field, engaged in long-term lending. The consequence is that the banks are presently receiving a return of about 10.25 per cent on their mortgage portfolios and are paying in excess of 12 per cent on their savings accounts, while charging business at a prime rate of 16.5 per cent and usually one or 2 per cent over prime—17.5 per cent or 18 per cent or so. The banks are thus suffering a negative return on their mortgage capital and, as a consequence, are forced to charge more than perhaps they should charge on business in short-term loans.

It is essential in this review that we look at the long-term lending practices of banks to make sure they are balanced by long-term borrowing. There is not quite the same balancing of long-term borrowing against long-term lending in the banks as there has been in the trust companies. What we did when we allowed banks into the mortgage lending field was purportedly to save the consumer interest on mortgage loans. There has been no proof of that. The banks have cut mortgage rates by maybe a quarter of a per cent. We have in effect hurt the liquidity of our banking system and, by that action, increased the rate the business community must pay for the business loans that banks are really there to make to give us the employment we need, to finance the inventories, the receivables and so on. So it is important, when we analyse this activity over the last year with the enormous increase in interest rates, that we look very seriously at how the banks have used their mortgage accounts, how they have used their consumer loans accounts, and how in all probability the business community has in fact had to pay rates of interest in excess of what they should normally have had to pay, in order to balance the losses the banks were taking on their mortgage portfolios.

My suggestion is that the banks should restrict their mortgage business. Perhaps we do not need the amount of mortgage money we did need at one time in order to finance construction. It might well be that insurance companies and trust companies could solve that problem. It might well be that the banks should no longer be in the mortgage business. The fact of the matter is that the banking business deals in short term deposits, demand deposits, deposits on three days' notice or whatever, and that money is being lent on long term, and the banks are not in the business of lending long, any more than anybody else is when they have to borrow short. This whole matter may seriously impair the liquidity of our banking system and while at the present time our banks are limited in the amount of mortgages they can take, if we continue to allow the expansion of long-term lending by the banks based on short-term borrowing we are likely to impair the liquidity of our banking system.

Again I want to emphasize that the banks have done a good job in Canada. Our banks are worldwide institutions which lend credit to Canadians throughout the world, and when Canadians say they bank at the Bank of Commerce or the Royal Bank of Canada, or the Toronto-Dominion Bank of Canada, those banks are well known. We are not in the situation in which the Americans unfortunately find themselves, with banks in every state and every city of all names, sizes and descriptions. We have institutions of which we can be proud. It is the job of parliament to make sure that those institutions are guided and developed and that they work in the interest of all Canadians.

In my view the chartered banks exist to provide a safe depository for funds of individuals and concerns and, within the limits of prudent banking practice, to make loans available to facilitate production and trade in Canada. That is the job of the banks. It is not the job of being a merchant or of promoting the sales of individual products or services. It is a job of providing a depository for funds and making sure that those funds are available for business and trade.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the hon. member opposite I wondered whatever happened to that initiative to have installed at the front of the House a large bell that 20 members of Parliament could approach, and ring.

• (2030)

Mr. Ittinuar: It should be over here.

Mr. Kaplan: If it were down there, I would want there to be 35 members who could ring it.

It reminded me of one of the main reasons why I wanted to participate in this debate, and that was because in a past Parliament I had the honour of being chairman of the finance committee, and such a large degree of consensus developed over the long period of time that this matter was before Parliament in one way or the other that I was hoping to be able to see the bill move very quickly through this procedure and finally lead to the decennial revision of the Bank Act only eight years after the period in which the revision ought to have occurred. Instead of it being a decennial revision we are having something like 18 years between revisions. That is undesirable. It was one of the reasons why I was hoping that the bill would move rather quickly.

The trouble is that banking is a subject of enormous interest and importance to the Canadian people. There is hardly a Canadian who does not for most of his life deal with one of the chartered banks and, if I may say so, the banking system of Canada is not, in my opinion, entirely satisfactory. Every Canadian has his own criticisms of it. Some of them are unjustified, but some of them are very much justified. It is a highly concentrated industry. It is an industry which offers the consumer very little real choice between the various institutions which are the chartered banks, and so each member who comes to this House has his own life experience with banks, he has all of the experiences of his constituents, he has all of the advice of the various groups which have made submissions to us, and it is very easy to have a long and serious debate at any time on the subject of banking.

What I would like to suggest, however, is that the time for that type of debate really should be regarded as being over, in view of what has happened with this set of banking proposals before Parliament. I was hoping that a degree of restraint would be shown by all hon. members which would permit this piece of legislation to go very quickly to committee and, having gone through the committee, to become law very quickly.

I ought to add that restraint is more to be expected from members who have been around for the last seven or eight years than from many newly elected members—and I think particularly of members in the NDP caucus which has so much new blood—who have not had a chance to participate themselves in the consideration of this particular Bank Act revision, and the enormous temptation that they will feel to consider it a brand new bill requiring all kinds of new consideration and prolonged hearings. In my opinion that would be a disservice to this piece of legislation and a disservice to the process which has preceded it. It would be a mistake.

Parliament first began and the government first began considering this revision back in 1974 when a white paper was put forward. It received an enormous amount of public interest. Many briefs were submitted. Letters were written to members of Parliament. Eventually legislation was brought forward which took account, at least, of the great deal of criticism which was made of earlier drafts, and then it was referred to the committee which, as I mentioned, I had the honour to chair. At the same time—in fact, even earlier—it had gone to the Senate and received very full consideration there. I believe three reports were prepared by the Senate.

In the years I have been a member of Parliament I cannot remember a major piece of legislation of this kind which was the subject of so much co-operation and participation by members of Parliament. I can recall in camera meetings of the House of Commons finance committee at a time when we were expecting an election to be called from moment to moment, and yet members of Parliament, with all of the priority of an impending election call, were willing to take time to come to in camera meetings of the committee where their constituents would never find out about their contributions and their efforts, and all because of the shared belief that we had that what we were doing was important, that it was important to deal with a decennial revision on a timely basis and to deal with the provisions and the briefs which were before us, and that Parliament and our country would be served by getting the job done, getting on with it and getting our report out.

It was not very long after our report was submitted that the government fell, and we looked forward in the next Parliament to seeing what the new Conservative government would do with the report of the parliamentary committee. Respect was paid by that government to the work which had been done by members of Parliament in the finance committee, and the legislation which was brought forward was right in line with our work and with our recommendations.

Now, of course, the Liberal government has returned, and we have just heard the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) criticizing the bill, as we heard last day when we heard the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) criticizing the bill. One wonders where they were in committee and in their own party when the legislation was brought forward at that time. The criticisms that they brought, as I said, are valid, are interesting and deserving of consideration, but surely we have reached the point where at least the Conservative party and the Liberal party should recognize a common commitment and a shared responsibility to see the legislation move forward, and not to re-open a great many old considerations.

I would like to deal in particular with the situation of foreign banks because I know there is much public concern about what is perceived as the entry of foreign banks into Canada. Those of us who were on the committee know perfectly well, as do most other Canadians, that in one way and another foreign banks are already here. When he spoke, the hon. member for Edmonton West was quite right in criticizing the absence of a definition of banking.

We undoubtedly have power in this Parliament to deal with the whole subject of banking, but the answer to that is that it is too late for the Parliament of Canada to assert that jurisdiction in the field and to define banking in a very broad and comprehensive way. The constitution does permit us to do it, but if we were to do it, our law would be paramount—that is, as I understand it, what happens in constitutional law—and we would overtake the operations and bring under federal control the operations of a number of institutions which are presently regulated by the provinces because, until now, the federal government has not asserted jurisdiction to cover the field completely.

The caisses populaires, the credit unions, many provincial trust companies which, in effect, carry on operations which could be defined as banking, and many other provincial institutions, would come under federal jurisdiction. I submit to the hon. member for Edmonton West and the others who hold the view that there should be a broad definition of banking in the act that, if we were to do that, we would create a minor, but important, constitutional confrontation with the provinces.

In the original legislation brought forward by the then minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), monetary control was proposed to be asserted over provincial institutions. That was found to be extremely objectionable to all the provincial governments, and eventually in the course of negotiation and on the advice of the governor of the Bank of Canada, the legislation was modified to withdraw from the confrontation and to assert less control over banking than I believe—and most constitutional experts believe—the federal government has. Now here we are—after having seen the bill revised, brought forward, approved, recommended on, and eventually a bill which deserves consensus having been brought forward—finding members going back to the fundamental argument that there should be a broad definition of banking. Surely it is too late for that kind of criticism.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is nonsense, and you know that.

Mr. Kaplan: If we had asserted a broad definition of banking many, many years ago, foreign banks would not be present in Canada in the way they are now.

Mr. Blenkarn: If you had exercised your jurisdiction, they would not be here either.

Mr. Kaplan: If jurisdiction was going to be exercised, it should have been exercised back in 1930 when the caisse populaire and credit union movement first began to be established. That would have been the time to settle, as between levels of government, where the responsibility for banking ought to lie.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is an excuse.

Mr. Kaplan: I have no doubt that if we had acted and defined banking back in the decennial revisions which took place back in those days, if they were here in Canada the foreign banks would be here on our terms, not on the terms which have been established by the various provincial governments. The credit union movement would be under federal control. But I regard that as a non-starter and I can hardly imagine that being put forward as a serious proposal by any members with any experience in federal-provincial relations, least of all members of the Conservative party who had the opportunity to provide a broad definition of banking when they were the government and who did not do it, for the very good reasons which I have just described.

● (2040)

The parliamentary committee recommended, and the Conservative and Liberal governments have responded positively, that the bill include a number of safeguards about the foreign banks. My friend opposite criticized the dangers of having the 8 per cent limit and wondered how it would be enforced. I think the 8 per cent limit will be easier to enforce than the controls which exist at present on foreign banks provincially. They are not really being controlled by this Parliament, and will be if this legislation moves quickly through Parliament. As I said, I hope it will.

There are other provisions which have been added to the legislation over the last two years of its consideration by this House to control the operations of foreign bank subsidiaries in Canada. As I said, in my view these controls make the foreign banks more subject to federal regulation than they presently are, and it will make it easier to have a handle on their operations in this country than it presently is.

In order to allow the government to maintain a tighter control over the performance of foreign bank subsidiaries, the new bill provides for the licensing of such subsidiaries, which was the recommendation of our committee, with initial and renewal licences for periods of up to three years. The original bill did not propose any licensing or any review other than the decennial review of the Bank Act.

The new measure also redefines the proposed limit on the over-all size of foreign bank subsidiary operations in Canada. I think, frankly, the new proposals are more workable than the proposals that were put forward in the original legislation proposed by this government. It strengthens the prohibition against foreign banks operating in Canada except as subsidiaries, so as to encourage them to bring their Canadian operations under the supervision of the Bank Act.

It would remove the Bill C-15 ceiling limiting a foreign bank subsidiary to no more than five branches, but any branches in addition to the first would require ministerial approval to ensure the protection of Canadian-owned banks and to promote a wider regional distribution of such branches. This really is the answer to the criticism of the hon. member for Mississauga South that the foreign banks will come in and will skim the cream. I would assert that even in the areas where there is cream, more competition would be in order and would give a break to Canadian business and to Canadian consumers in giving them more choices of where to go. The formulation that is proposed in this legislation will permit the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to say to a foreign bank which wants to come to Toronto, to Calgary, to Edmonton and to Montreal, "Have you looked at some other places where there is less competition than in these areas? Have you considered taking the responsibility of serving some of the regions in Canada which could benefit from it?" I do not think the response would always be negative.

I think that there are very good reasons why some foreign banks should go into some of the areas of this country where there is less economic activity because in those areas there is less competition. I think foreign banks will be able to offer quite a lot of new alternatives to the Canadian consumer and to Canadian business and they will cause important changes to take place within the Canadian banking system.

I know that during my years as a member of parliament we have seen the incorporation of some new Canadian-owned banks. When you look at the banking community and see how much concentration there is and how small is the number of banks in the field, you want more competition to take place. Of course Canadian competition would be better, if we could find a way of encouraging more Canadian banks to be established and to go into business.

Mr. Blenkarn: How do you help small Canadian banks?

Mr. Kaplan: I am just coming to that point. The trouble is that in ten years of hoping and waiting, we have found that new Canadian banks are few and far between because it is very difficult to establish an institution that can compete with these giants which are already in the field. That is one of the justifications for giving the foreign banks more status here. If there were new Canadian banks, if there were an easy formula for creating another ten or fifteen substantial banks to offer competition with the banks to which the hon. member has referred, with the Toronto-Dominion Bank, with the Bank of Commerce, and so on, that would be another matter. But there is a lot of difficulty in establishing a new bank and competing with such enormous institutions. It is much easier for some large foreign banks to come in. They are in a better position to stand up to the heavy hitters that are presently in the Canadian economy. I am not worried about competition injuring the major banks which are here in Canada. I do not think foreign competition which will come in will damage them very substantially, if at all.

Mr. Blenkarn: It will squish the little Canadian banks.

Mr. Kaplan: What I see is that real competition will be provided and Canadian business and the consumer will get a better deal out of it. That is the main objective. We would like to see more domestic Canadian institutions grow and flourish. In fact the bill contains new provisions for facilitating entry into banking by new Canadian institutions. Let us hope that some major Canadian corporations that have a substantial financial base go into the banking business and offer to compete with the major banks. It has not happened in the past to any degree at all, but there have been some such cases. It will be easier for them do that under the legislation that is proposed. But I do not think that will provide enough competition or enough choice for Canadian business and for the Canadian consumer.

I should like to conclude now, Mr. Speaker. I will not ask for the indulgence of the House to continue unduly because I am trying to set an example of speaking briefly, recognizing everything that has been done by the last Parliament and the Parliament before that and the Parliament before that, as well as by all of the committees that have looked at the act and all of the briefs that have been submitted. Let us not think that now is the time to re-invent the wheel. We have legislation before us that many will criticize—there are many things you can say about it, many differences of opinion about it. The point is that if we go through a very long exercise, we will end up with something that will also be subject to criticism in many ways.

I think the interests of Parliament and the interests of the country are best served by regarding this legislation as something which is essentially in the nature of housekeeping, as something that members of Parliament should recognize as having already been worked on. Let us get this through and get on to some of our other business which is newly before this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Bank Act

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on Bill C-6 and the Bank Act. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) pointed out last week, if we do not get this piece of legislation through, the banks will not be able to open their doors this coming July because it will not be legal for them to do so. The way the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) was going on, I thought he was going to blame R. B. Bennett for this delay in the Bank Act, but it is actually the cause of the previous Liberal government in the Thirtieth Parliament which procrastinated with the Bank Act. The Liberals in those days seemed to be having some problems with the caisses populaires in Quebec. I hope they have cleared up their problems so that we can get this piece of legislation out of the House and into committee.

Now I wish to speak briefly with regard to credit unions, caisses populaires, and some of their concerns with regard to the Bank Act. I see they have received some very well-deserved recognition this week in the April edition of Focus, in which an article stated the following:

Credit where it's Due

Caisses populaires and credit unions have worked hard to rise from grass roots to riches.

● (2050)

The emergence in recent years of credit unions and caisses populaires as major competitors with the banks and other financial institutions for consumer deposits and loans has given the movement a unique "banking" status.

In fact the Toronto-based Canadian Co-operative Credit Society Ltd., which provides financial and support services for 2,200 credit unions and caisses populaires outside Quebec, had examined the possibility of seeking a federal charter to form a full-service bank of its own.

The Bank Act, however, in its present form, Bill C-6, does not provide the mechanism to fit the credit unions into the federal regulated banking system. That was said by George S. May, the chief executive officer of the CCCS. The article continues:

Besides, the credit unions have developed "almost the same powers" as the banks, so the organization concluded there is really no reason to look further into forming a chartered bank.

Without reading the whole article, I should like to refer to the brief warning of Mr. May contained in the last paragraph, which reads as follows:

Commenting on the decade ahead, May says credit union expansion is not likely to be as marked as it was in recent years. Because of wildly fluctuating interest rates and our failure to conquer inflation, he says, "for any financial institution it is a time for consolidation, to take a conservative approach to growth."

We hope that the credit unions will have a hearing at the committee meetings. Many of us will be meeting with credit union members this week to hear their concerns. This should also help us in committee when we are considering Bill C-6. The credit unions have prepared an excellent document on some of their concerns and wishes. I should like to read a couple of them into the record. In the credit union document entitled "Banks and Banking Law Revision Act", they have stated the following:

The credit union system has supported the proposals encompassed in the government's banking legislation and urges their early adoption.

The credit union movement would benefit from the proposal in the bill to create a new Canadian Payments Association through which, for the first time, non-bank financial institutions that accept chequable deposits would be permitted to participate directly in the clearing system.

The credit union movement supports rapid passage of the new legislation for the following reasons:

(a) It is in keeping with the government's stated intention to provide more equitable competition within the Canadian financial system;

(b) Credit unions require equal access to the CPA in order to protect their future competitive position, especially since the CPA will become the focus for the evolution of electronic funds transfer systems;

(c) Although the present clearing system, controlled exclusively by the chartered banks appears to work efficiently, there is no indication that it is cost effective from the point of view of credit union system;

(d) Direct access by near-banks to the clearing system has been recommended by the Commons finance committee in its 1967 report on the Bank Act, by the Porter Royal Commission on Banking in 1964 and by the Economic Council of Canada in its 1976 study of deposit-taking institutions.

As the credit union movement has devoted considerable resources during the past four years to preparing for its proposed participation in the Canadian Payments Association, further delay would cause additional hardship and inconvenience.

They are experiencing enough problems right now with high interest rates which are the direct cause of the Liberal-NDP coalition in the Twenty-ninth Parliament when all limits on spending were lifted. Of course this caused the spiral and the eventual result today of high interest rate problems due to the high interest rate policy of the coalition in the Twenty-ninth Parliament.

The document continues:

In addition, other less controversial legislation, guiding the market behaviour of such financial institutions as trust and investment companies and credit union centrals, is being seriously delayed pending resolution of the banking legislation. It is time to get on with this work.

I will sit down now. I hope we will get on with this work in committee in the very near future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to take part in this debate as a new member of Parliament, although almost a veteran after 11 months, of course. Perhaps the question that concerns me as much as anything else, to begin with, arises from the previous Liberal speaker who suggested that there may be an attempt by new members of Parliament to hold up this particular piece of legislation. When the bill was first introduced they mentioned a great deal of concern about how this particular bill had been introduced three times in three different parliaments. They stressed a need to push the bill through, a great urgency to get rolling with it. I would suggest that many of the people who sit here feel that the real need is to take a very careful look at this particular legislation.

Our feeling is that there are some important changes here which will substantially alter the business of banking in Canada. In addition, we have had three elections, and certainly there have been some very significant changes in the composition of the House of Commons. There are new people here representing new ideas. Who knows? It may just have been the Bank Act presented by Liberal and Conservative governments that was a determining factor.

There are new situations in the world which would justify a more careful look at this particular piece of legislation. We have seen interest rates take dramatic and unacceptable rises. We have seen oil prices driven up far beyond what they were when this particular legislation was introduced. We have seen the decline of the United States as a major and dominant economic force. We have seen the national debt go up astronomically. We have seen bank profits increasing in spite of economic recession. I would suggest that these are all relatively new things since that particular bill was introduced, and that what it really justifies is a new and more careful look.

A need for a new approach is important also. We have looked at the question of the philosophy of banking in this country as represented by the other two parties, as a very serious matter. But I think the members in these particular benches feel that this legislation should be dealt with effectively and efficiently. There is the question of some very objectionable sections in it that might, by informal discussion, be dealt with, rather than in the typical confrontation that has taken place in many parliaments here.

I was very pleased to hear not many weeks ago when they discussed the banking legislation that the government would be open to amendments. I think this was a move forward. If in fact this legislation is to go forward quickly, I would suggest that perhaps there should be some discussion about the more objectionable features in it and an openness toward those amendments. I am sure as we move forward to committee that the matter will be considered seriously. If this kind of a procedure is followed, no doubt good legislation will develop which can be accepted by the majority of members in this House.

Maybe the reason we take such a vital concern in this piece of legislation, whether there is a fear on the benches opposite that this will be held up, is that from our point of view banking is a privilege, as indeed is any other corporation in this country. Through the corporate procedure risk is reduced in order to earn a profit, but banks seem to have the best of both worlds—a zero risk and excellent profits. I do not personally recall when the last bank failed, and I do not personally recall when the last bank failed to pay a dividend. But I am quite certain that all of us here are concerned about the social responsibility of those corporations, particularly whether we should allow foreign corporations into this country.

In our opinion, banking is one of the safest activities. We have made it that way in the Parliament of Canada, and for that privilege we expect a return to the people. We want some control on bank profits. We want banks to align their financial power with social goals that are held by Canadians. Banking, from our point of view, has tremendous power in shaping the Canadian economy. All corporations, all goods that are produced, and all services depend upon these particular banks. All employment and the shape of the economy in the future will be determined by these banks, and we are seriously concerned that this legislation be given adequate consideration in this House and in the committee.

● (2100)

As a previous Liberal speaker mentioned, banks touch everyone and everyone has personal experience with them, but not all satisfactory. When the banking committee sits here in Ottawa members often hear from bankers and occasionally from other organizations, but they do not reach the people who live in Comox-Powell River, northern Canada, or in many other places throughout this country. We are concerned that when this legislation is considered it be given adequate consideration by all members of the House. We do not see the urgency in passing this legislation, but we do see the need for careful planning for the future and a thorough examination of this particular piece of legislation. Governments have changed and members have changed. Of course, I did mention the accessibility of the particular committee which studies this to all the people in the country.

I think perhaps one of the themes is that we could proceed quickly by co-operation. I mentioned previously the possibility of informal discussion about objectionable procedures and about agreements on some amendments. I also believe that this particular piece of legislation, since there will be extensive debate on it and work in the committee, will probably set the tone for the Thirty-second Parliament, and I would suggest that we all see a sense of importance in this legislation, with a willingness to co-operate and see it through. We should do that with the theme that we need a thorough examination, and in that regard I would suggest the government probably has two particular options, a plan (a) and a plan (b), if you will.

Plan (a) is what we have seen so often in the past; forced passage, forced sittings, Committee of the Whole rather than, as was suggested the other day, allowing the opportunity for members to question expert witnesses, and then, eventually, closure. It is kind of a war measures approach to passing legislation. Again, the urgency concern that has been expresed on the other side of the House worries me. We may find this to be a reaffirmation of the old arrogant, inflexible government approach.

The government's plan (b) could be another option, a new look. We would suggest that the present legislation be extended for a period of six months. We suggest that the government should lay all its cards pertaining to this piece of legislation on the table and allow an opportunity for serious consideration with a fair hearing. Through this process of co-operation we might find that we could do a better job in order to represent the people who are very concerned about this legislation.

This business of holding off and having the government lay all its cards on the table is of great concern to us. Bank profits have been a concern in the past. It is my understanding that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is studying mechanisms that might control bank profits. Apparently that department is seriously concerned and is looking at the whole question of interest rate spreads. It is very important that we have access to the material that is generated by those studies before we pass this particular legislative item.

The Post Office is studying the possibility of becoming involved in some banking services. It is my understanding that this has been done in other countries. We have had experience in this country with post office banking during wartime.

Im my particular riding, and this might be of interest to hon. members opposite, banks have withdrawn from communities. There are now communities in my riding and in other ridings where banking services are not provided to the people. The banks have closed branches and they are not accessible to the people. There are only about 7,000 bank branches in the country, but there are 8,000 post office outlets. It might be relevant for the Post Office to become involved in some banking functions, providing competition through the public sector. This would also provide involvement through the federal government.

By and large I think the main concern is that we want all the cards laid on the table. What is the federal government considering, and what plans does it have in this area? We should have that information before we put that stamp of approval on this piece of legislation.

Another area of concern involves foreign investment guidelines. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has suggested we are going to seek guidelines for the performance of foreign corporations. I would like to see these guidelines clearly spelled out, indicating how they will apply to foreign banking institutions. If we are going to become involved with foreign banking operations within this country I think it is premature to pass this particular legislation before we know what kinds of goals for economic nationalism we are going to define, and what kinds of guidelines for the performance and operation of foreign corporations will be brought forward in this country. We should have all the cards on the table.

I notice that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) has dashed away, but even some of the things he might want to report to this House on, such as the activities of foreign banks involved with the Central Intelligence Agency, or activities in foreign countries, we might consider questionable.

There are certainly a great number of things the government is looking at now that should be laid before Parliament before we become involved in making a decision on this legislative item. There appears to be a great deal more information that members could have in order to deal with it effectively.

There are many areas in this act which we, in our party, feel could be improved. For example, I think of alternatives to incorporating banks by letters patent. That should be the subject of serious concern. We are concerned about the possibility of deleting the power of the banks to become involved in other areas of enterprise. We are seriously concerned about the control of corporate concentration in the banking industry, and we are particularly concerned about the prohibition on bank directors from sitting on the boards of directors of other corporations, or possibly holding other elected offices. We are concerned about provisions for making more effective disclosure of financial information, and we are concerned about a policy and a procedure being developed to assist banks to help Canadians attain important national goals.

We listened to the previous speaker outline what a tremendous role banks have played in helping Canadians achieve those social goals, and how foreign corporations might fail to do this. I suggest to you there are many people in this country who feel that the social obligations of banks have not been met. I suggest that banks provide one of the classic illustrations of this failure. It has often been said by small businessmen, fishermen and farmers, that in order to obtain money from the banks you first have to prove that you do not need it. They really do not serve the kinds of needs we are looking at.

We would like to see programs to assist with regional development and assist in decentralization of economic decision making. We would like to give some powers to the provinces to become more involved in banking. We would like to provide mechanisms for consumer protection, and the involvement of consumers in the decision-making process.

As the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) suggested, we would like to see a fair labour relations program followed by the banking industry, that last bastion of reaction in this country. We would, of course, like to see greater assistance for small businesses, farmers and fishermen.

We have a great deal of concern about the structure of the Canadian Payments Association. Finally, we have a very, very serious concern about and an objection to allowing foreign banks to function within Canada.

Perhaps just a comment or two about each one of these points might be appropriate. First let me refer to incorporation by letters patents. This, undoubtedly, is of great convenience and would allow foreign banks quicker access to Canada with the formation of new banks here. There is a serious need for competition in this field, considering the structure of the five major banks and the stranglehold they have on the Canadian economy. I would suggest that at the same time this procedure allows for a loss of accountability for the people of Canada. The function of banking, rather than being considered by the elected representatives of the people, then becomes less direct. It is streamed by the director general of banks through the Bank of Canada, through the minister of finance, through cabinet, and eventually to Parliament. With so many other things to take into account it seems there is a tendency to move away from the elected representatives of the people to consider the basic businesses that affect them. That is concentrated in the hands of cabinet and the prime minister's office.

Then there is the whole question of information to consider. There appear to be attempts to get safeguards to provide people with the information they need if we were to allow the incorporation by letters patent. I suggest this has been difficult in the past and to date we have not seen much action on the whole question of freedom of information. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it may even be a little premature to consider this bill until the freedom of information legislation has come before us. People must be able to obtain the information they need in order to make judgments about the whole incorporation procedure.

When this legislation was introduced several days ago I recognized the phrase "trust us—we will round it out and flash it up in the regulations." I do not believe that history will bear out the fact that this is what happens. One would have been very naive indeed to trust some of the former governments of this country! As far as the entire procedure of incorporating by letters patent is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the government—non, merci. The charter by Parliament will safeguard the interests of the people.

Then there is the question of involvement in interests other than banking. This subject has been dealt with at great length, Mr. Speaker. There is some fear that leasing will put banks in a position to establish a beachhead in other businesses and then that beachhead will become the next area for expansion. We will see them in one area now, in another area later, and see them gradually expanding their business interests. Banks are probably the most efficient corporations that exist, but that is only because they happen to control access to money. If we allow them, they will eliminate competition; they will expand their business. Their profits—which are already enormous in the eyes of many people—would allow for cross-subsidization and the destruction of competition.

This tremendous market power should be checked; this capability to destroy a competitive system and loss of protection to consumers should be checked. We feel it is a conflict of interest to allow banks to consider loans to their competitors. Considering loans is the primary function of a bank—not going into other areas of enterprise.

Another matter to be concerned about is corporate concentration. It is interesting to note that the Bryce commission, which paid lip service to the task of examining corporate concentration in Canada, came to some of the most amazing conclusions. These corporate apologists, however, even singled out the banks for special consideration and critical comment.

In spite of the ease with which the government is allowing banks to form, or hopes that they will form, increased competition is virtually impossible because of the size of the market already controlled by the Big Five. From 1920 until the present, bank assets ran 80 to 90 per cent; in 1976 the Big Five controlled $108 billion of $121 billion in assets. It is difficult to see how any corporation no matter how easily it forms—except possibly the large multinationals—is going to enter the banking business and supply serious competition to the entire business.

In 1976 the Big Five had a majority of the branches throughout Canada. There were 7,018 branches altogether and the Big Five controlled more than 6,000 of them while all the other banks together had less than 1,000 branches.

It is very difficult to see how any corporation can be competitive in the banking industry in Canada. No matter what we do to provide competition, it is still akin to a closely controlled economy. As I understand the theory of workable competition in a free market economy, it is that many small firms have easy access to the market place in order to compete, and that competition will not have any influence without limiting the size and scope of the activity of these major corporations. That is impossible.

There are some things to be said about the control of corporate concentration in this industry, Mr. Speaker. In 1976 a white paper dealt with the whole question of disclosure and the Bryce commission paid special attention to banks and the question of disclosure. It advocated greater disclosure in order to meet the needs of the people.

The United States is far less timid than we in this area. When we want information about a Canadian corporation, we no longer attempt to find out from the government or the corporate headquarters in Canada; we ask in the United States where they have adequate disclosure facilities and are not afraid to ask corporations to show what they are involved in. If Canadians want to find out the salary of the chairman of the CPR they can get the answer from the United States where they are not afraid of disclosure and where the provisions that apply to banks are much broader than in this country. I do not know what we or the banks have to fear, Mr. Speaker, so I urge that the provisions for disclosure in this legislation be dramatically expanded.

The Bank of America, for instance, has voluntary guidelines and some of the principles they are prepared to follow are worth noting. Customers for deposit services of the Bank of America are entitled to the information necessary to understand, evaluate the terms, conditions, availability and safety of the services provided. Borrowers are entitled to know the standards for credit eligibility and all information necessary to evaluate the credit extended, including all charges, and the methods by which they are calculated, as well as the conditions and obligations involved.

Investors in securities of the Bank of America corporation and its subsidiaries are entitled to the information necessary to judge the quality of their investments, the adequacy of the management and the value of their holdings. Employees of the Bank of America's companies are entitled to the information necessary to make informed decisions about their pursuit of personal objectives within the organization. Customers for the specialized financial services provided by the Bank of America are entitled to information needed to evaluate the terms, conditions, and quality of the services offered.

The vendors, suppliers and other businesses with which the bank deals are entitled to the information necessary to make sound business contracts with the corporation. This includes information about policies and agreements, transactions, competitive practices, non-discrimination practices and standards of fairness. The Bank of America believes that the public is entitled to the information necessary to judge the value and adequacy of the bank's contribution to economic and social well-being and its adherence to legal and ethical standards.

It is interesting to note that this government and its predecessors do not seem to recognize the necessity to provide citizens of this country, the employers and users of banking services, with the kind of information that is supplied in the United States. That is very disappointing, Mr. Speaker; it is objectionable and should be changed.
