CHANGED—BUT NOT FORGOTTEN.

In one of the old-fashioned places of resort called 'ten gardens,' on the outskirts of the good old town of Norwich, two young men, looking like respectable mechanics in their best, were sitting on a summer's evening, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight. They had strolled thither to spend an hour together; the last, it might be, for many years.

The scene around was very rural, and bordered on the picturesque. Before them flowed the sluggish river Yare, spanned by a railway bridge, crude in structure, but sufficiently strong to serve its purpose, and quite in harmony with the view beyond it, a stretch of meadow and water, with Crown Point, once called Whittingham in the distance.

The tea-gardeners need little description. Tea could be had there if desired, but the majority of visitors preferred something stronger, for the sale of which the place was duly or unduly, as many may think, licensed. On a table before the young men was a quart pot, containing beer, and two glasses; one full and the other nearly empty.

Come Jack, said one before whom the empty glass was standing, you don't drink.

I am not so much a hand at it, Harry, replied the other. It seems to me that I could get along better without it. I've given it up off and on, and whenever I save my money I have my health.

Nonsense! rejoined Harry, laughing. I've never seen you the worse for drink in my life; and I am sure if it hasn't done you any good, it hasn't done you any harm.

If it doesn't do any good, said Tom, thoughtfully, why should we waste our money upon it?

Well, old fellow, returned Harry, we won't argue about it to-night, as we are about to part, and it may be years before we meet again. Have a drop extra in honor of the occasion. No, was the firm reply, drinking will not honor our parting. And look here, Harry, we served our apprenticeship together, and have been good mates in and out of the shop, and it has given me pain to see you are getting a strong liking for this sort of thing.

Oh! I'm right enough, said Harry, earnestly. I know when to pull up as well as any man. Drink up, No! Then I will, for it would be a pity to spoil good beer.

He filled his glass, and was about to raise it to his lips, when Tom laid a hand upon his arm.

Stop a moment, he said. Your glass and mine are full; this pewter pot is empty. Now will you do something to please me?

Yes, if I can, replied Harry, with a dubious glance at him.

Let this be the last glass before we part.

Agreed, said Harry; and now old fellow, here's luck to you and your jolly good—

Stop, one thing more, said Tom. We will pledge each other in a different fashion. We will throw the beer into the river and bind ourselves never to touch a drop more until we meet again.

No, said Harry. I'm dead set against any sort of pledge, and I've said so many a time. I won't decide you, but I'll not drink so much as I've been doing lately. Come that's something.

Not enough, replied Tom, shaking his head. I feel sure of that. I've seen so much of the evil of drink, that I am determined not to have any more of it.

But you've been drinking with me to-day.

True, and I was weak in doing so. I feel I am weak, and to keep clear of the mischief-maker, I must shut it altogether.

Well do as you like, said Harry, raising his glass to his lips. Good fortune to you in the big city you are going to. Of course you will write and let me know how you are getting on.

All about my darling, said Harry, laughing.

Make it part of your letter, said Tom, rising; and now we will stroll home. I have some things to pack, and I am off by the first train in the morning.

Tut, tut, said Harry; good luck to you! I say again.

Tom touched his glass, and as his friend tossed off the beer with great gusto, he threw the contents of his glass into the river.

A cruel waste, said Harry, as they sauntered on by way of the house, passing through the bar, where two farm laborers were drinking. Have a glass of wine—that won't hurt you.

No, said Tom, hurrying on, I've done with everything intoxicating for good and all.

His friend stopped by the bar, and put down two pence on the counter.

Give short, miss, he said to the barmaid.

He was served quickly, and as Tom, missing his friend, looked back, he saw the small glass raised hurriedly and emptied in a moment.

And h-h-him, poor fellow, he said, miserably, and forgive me for being so weak as to come here with him.

That night the two friends parted, Harry Brown to remain at work in the township where he was apprenticed, and Tom Daly to make preparations for the life before him.

And what led to this parting? Simply the desire of Tom Daly to get away from the 'bad school' of the builder's shop where he had toiled as an apprentice and worked for nine years.

They were a hard-drinking body of men, who ridiculed all aspiration to a better life, and Tom, feeling his weakness, resolved to fly from the dangers that beset him. He made a great effort to induce his friend to accompany him, but Harry declined.

I am in a comfortable shop, he said, and among good fellows. Why should I throw away the substance and grasp at the shadow? I'm sorry to part with you, but I'm not a man who cares to run risks, so here I stick.

Tom Daly went to London, and in the course of a week or two got work at a large builder's. There he found all sorts of men—too many like those whom he had left behind. But there was not the same close association, for they lived apart, and he was allowed to act up to his temperance 'craze' without any more than an occasional bit of 'chaff.'

This he bore philosophically, and toiled as a happy, contented, well-to-do young fellow. At the end of a fortnight he wrote to his friend Harry, and in a week received a short reply. In that letter nothing was said about drink, which, in Tom's eyes, was a bad sign.

He wrote again ten days later but received no reply—the first letter he received from Harry Brown from the old place was the last.

One Saturday afternoon ten years later, a healthy, well-bearded man, having the appearance of a well-to-do mechanic, in his 'best' clothes, sauntered into a butcher's shop in a by-street in the West End of London.

He wanted a leg of mutton for Sunday's dinner, and he was very particular about the sort of a leg he had. For, said he, it's my wife I'm thinking of—she is getting strong again, and the doctor says she may have a piece of meat.

How's the baby, Mr. Daly? asked the butcher, with the air of a man speaking to an old acquaintance.

Hearty and well, was the answer, just such a merry little joker as the other two were at his age.

That's a comfort, remarked the butcher; you are getting a nice little family about you. But they cost a lot to keep.

But I never found they make so much difference, said Tom Daly, or previous acquaintance, of course. You see we are careful people.

And don't do this, said the butcher, jerking his hand towards his mouth; that's the way the money goes. There's the joint for you.

Tom assented, and after it was weighed he paid for it. I'll take it home, he said; it isn't far to walk with it. No, thank you, I don't want it wrapped up—there's nothing to hide nor be ashamed of.

With the leg of mutton in his hand he left the shop, and immediately came face to face with a wretched-looking man, smoking a short pipe and carrying a small bundle in his hand.

He saw too many like this man every day that he might have passed him by but for the quick motion by which he seemed to be trying to hide the bundle.

Then Tom looked at him more closely, and there was something in his face that seemed to be familiar to him. In the eyes of the man there were decided signs of recognition.

Another look and Tom Daly knew who it was, and the shock he felt deprived him for a moment of speech.

Harry Brown, he said, after a struggle.

Yes, I'm Harry, was the somewhat enigmatical reply. What then? You have passed me two or three times lately and been too proud to speak.

I give you my word, Harry, said Tom, with deep emotion, that I did not know you.

Well, said Harry, I am changed a bit; but I am not one of your lucky workmen. I don't get into regular jobs, or, at least, I don't stop in them long.

When did you come to town? asked Tom, ignoring the subject of good or bad luck for the time.

Five years ago, said Harry Brown. The old shop broke up. The gaffer died, and his son—you remember he used to work with us—went all to pieces. In the old town things were slack, so I came up here to try my luck, and a precious rough time I have had of it.

Are you married?

Harry nodded.

Any children?

Two, and a wife who is always grumbling, although I do as well as I can. I've been spending nearly all my wages on her, and—here he looked at his bundle with a rueful eye—I've done my stent from decomposing bodies in the mine is daily becoming more sickening and unbearable. If the miners do not leave voluntarily the militia will be called out to clear the town.

The flood on Thursday at Londonderry, N. B., did great damage. The water rose twenty feet and carried away three houses many barns, sheds, etc. It also swept away the wooden bridge across the Londonderry river, 100 feet high and 150 ft. long. The new iron bridge across the east branch of the river built by the local government, was also partially destroyed. The post road to Londonderry station is rendered impassable. Sixty feet of the great flume which carries water to the blast furnaces were swept away. There are also several bad breaks in the iron company's narrow gauge road. On the eastern side of the Cobequid mountains fifty feet of the intercolonial railway track was washed away and near Debert the foot bridge was carried away.

Further reports show that Great Village, Port a Pique, Port a Pique Mountains, Bass River and Economy, N. B., suffered severely from the flood. There is scarcely a bridge left standing between Londonderry and Economy. The Union Furniture company of Bass River lost their dam and much valuable lumber. Several houses at Bass River floated off their foundations, and one was swept into the bay. Many narrow escapes from drowning are reported. James Miller & Co., of Economy, are reported to have lost a large quantity of logs. Farms and crops are badly damaged.
