Hon. J. H. CAMERON (Cardwell) contended that as the House had affirmed the principle of a change in the Constitution by a majority of members and a majority of the Government having voted in favor of it, the further prosecution of the scheme should be left in the hands of the executive. If the vote just given could be fairly supposed to reflect the opinions of the country and if the proposed change were as admirable as the hon. member who moved it appeared to think, it was the duty of the Government to direct the further movements necessary to its being placed upon the statute book. He hoped at least the House would have an opportunity of seeing the resolutions printed. He felt satisfied that the judgment of the whole House had not as yet been pronounced upon the matter, and if it came up again during the session there was certain to be a further struggle. He could not help feeling that it was strange this should occur twenty-one years after the principle which it affirmed had been originally adopted, and upon that occasion he had expressed the opinion that if he lived to the ordinary term of life he had no doubt that he would see a measure carried making the Legislative Council nominative. It was strange that he had lived to see the principle of a nominative Senate voted down again; it showed how capricious was public opinion, and what curious changes took place. He would assure his

hon. friend, however, that he had advanced but a very short distance on the road along which he was travelling. It was very kind in the hon. member for Bothwell to permit the Senators to live out their little day; but if he had put the case more strongly, the Senators would have been very likely to object to it. When we remember how many of those Senators had played an important part in the political affairs of the past, how many of them had been elected members of the Legislature for their Provinces and the old Province of Canada, it was hardly likely that their connection with public affairs would be terminated so quickly and easily as the hon. member appeared to anticipate. He complimented the hon. member for Bothwell on the manner in which he had submitted the question to the House in calm temper and gentlemanly language. In reaching the point at which the hon. gentleman had arrived, he had undoubtedly secured a great victory. The Committee should rise and report progress, and the duty of placing the position before the country and obtaining public opinion thereon would devolve upon the hon. member for Bothwell.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell, in reference to the position of the Government, stated that the Government, as a Government, had taken no position on this vote. He had not discussed the matter before the vote was taken for the reason that he thought it most desirable that an independent opinion of the House should be expressed in such a way that there could be no party pressure of any kind placed upon any member, and he did so the more readily because he had always admitted that this was a matter for speculative opinion. When the subject was discussed in the old Parliament of Canada in 1865 he had stated:—"There is evidently room here for great latitude of opinion as to the Constitution of the Upper Chamber, and I do not think we can be fairly charged with retrogression because we choose to make the members of the Upper House nominative instead of elective." He was discussing at that time, the Constitution of the various Second Chambers in different parts of the world and pointing out the mode in which they were respectively constituted, and he stated:—"Our people comprise but one class, and if the members of the two Chambers are to be chosen by the same electors, it is very clear that it would be extremely difficult for both to maintain their individuality, possessing similar powers and privileges, and avoid collision. It is evident that two Chambers which have originated in precisely the same way will claim to exercise the same rights and privileges, and to discharge the same functions; but were the Upper Chamber nominative instead of elective, the jurisdiction of that Chamber would be, of course, correspondingly changed, and the chances of collision made more remote." On one or two occasions since then he had expressed the opinion that the view he then took had not turned out as he expected. He did not mean at all to reflect upon any member of the Upper House, or to express any opinion upon the wisdom of the course they had taken, but he wished merely to express the opinion that in the light of our experience he did not believe that the power of nominating Senators should remain in the hands of the Government of the day. He was committed to no particular scheme; he was merely committed to the principle that it was desirable that there should be a change in the mode of constituting the Senate, and it would be the duty of the Government to consider, in the first place, whether public opinion throughout the country was in such an advanced state as to justify the Government in proposing a change to the Legislature, and when they were satisfied of that it would be their duty to use that public opinion in order to procure such a change as would fairly meet the views of the country. Although the majority for the resolution to-night was very small yet he was inclined to think it would have been larger rather than smaller if the House had been full. He had merely to say in reply to his hon. friend from Cardwell that he might depend upon it the Government would not shirk their full responsibility in this matter whenever they thought the proper time for action had arrived. At present he quite approved of the course which his hon. friend from Bothwell proposed to take, viz., having carried his motion and submitted his plan to the House, to proceed no further at present.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE observed that after the announcement of the First Minister and the observations of the member for Cardwell the way was clear for the adoption of the course indicated by those gentlemen. In his opinion it would be well for the member for Bothwell to submit the details of his proposed plan to the House and the country, and then allow the matter to stand for further consideration. He fully agreed with the remarks that had been made in reference to the wisdom of proceeding slowly in matters involving constitutional changes, and, therefore, he approved of allowing the matter to stand over this session.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said that it was with great surprise and regret that he found the Government had allowed a matter involving so important a change in the constitution of our country to go to a division without a single word from them in reference to their own position. He held that it was the duty of the Government to lead the House on a matter of so great importance. He believed that upon more mature consideration the decision of the House would not be sustained, and he therefore approved of the suggestion that the resolution be laid upon the table for future consideration. No case had been made out against the present mode of constituting the Senate, and he sincerely hoped that the Government would pause before they took any action in this matter. Perhaps the time might come when the Constitution of the Senate might be required to be changed, but that would not be while we occupied our present position in relation to the British Empire. But there was no necessity for a change now. There had been no agitation in the country for it, and there had been no dead-lock between the two Houses which might supply a reason for such a change. He deeply regretted the vote which had been passed, as it would create an impression that our Constitution at this early period needed to be changed, and thereby would cast a reflection upon those who framed it. He regretted also that harsh expressions had been used in reference to the present Senate in the course of the debate. From his own personal knowledge, he could bear testimony to the ability, the independence and the sincerity with which the members of that body fulfilled their important functions.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said it was a mistake to suppose that the resolution before the House was an attack upon the Senate. It had been stated on high authority that responsible government was on its trial throughout the empire, and the Senate, theoretically, might well be upon its trial without Senators being attacked. They did not require the compliments of the hon. member for Northumberland, as they were respected in their high position by all the members of this House. All that was done to-night was to record the opinion which had been recorded in old Canada over and over again that the nominative principle of constituting the Senate was not the true principle. The Senate was a very distinguished body, but if there was an element of weakness in the Constitution it was not fair to assume that the people's representatives who ventured to discuss it were treating disrespectfully the members of the Senate.

Mr. DYMOND said he did not rise to continue the discussion, but merely to say a few words in regard to an allusion that had been made to him in the early part of the debate by the hon. member for West Toronto, who had unintentionally placed an opinion in his (Mr. DYMOND'S) mouth which he had not expressed. It was quite true that when this subject came up for discussion a year ago he had in a few hurried remarks alluded in somewhat strong language of condemnation to the system of an Upper Chamber, and in still stronger language to the experience we had of an Upper Chamber since Confederation. He did not, however, express the opinion then that the Upper Chamber should be abolished. He did not know to what his argument pointed, but he was careful to avoid coming to that conclusion. At the same time he would state frankly that theoretically he disbelieved in the necessity for a second Chamber. He would be glad to see the second Chamber abolished, and he did not believe that the country would suffer if that were done. He was equally certain, however, on the other hand, that neither the public opinion of the whole Dominion nor the feeling of security in the several Provinces, especially in the smaller Provinces, would be consulted by any act of that kind; and he had therefore, desiring to influence practical rather than theoretical legislation, recorded his vote for the resolution.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL observed that he had spoken of the Senate as he had found it, not because he thought they needed any defence, but in answer to the very harsh and severe expressions which had been used towards that body by the member for Bothwell and others.

Mr. MILLS said he had been accused of using harsh language towards members of the Senate. He certainly thought the Senate was defective in regard to its present constitution, but he had not brought any charge against any of its members, though he had used some pretty strong language with reference to the manner in which the hon. member for Northumberland and his colleagues had made certain appointments to that body.

After a few remarks from Hon. Mr. MITCHELL and Mr. PLUMB, the Committee rose and reported progress, and

On motion of Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE the House adjourned at 11.10.

CORRECTIONS.—The following corrections in the addresses of Messrs. MASSON, DESJARDINS, GAUDET and CARON, on the amnesty question, have been handed to the Editor of the Debates, to be inserted as the correct expression of their views and opinions.—EDITOR.

M. MASSON—After the words "au meurtre de SCOTT" in the 3rd line of page 25 February 12th, add the following

"M. NAULT est un de ceux qui sont accusés d'avoir contribué à la mort de SCOTT, il est même actuellement sous les verrous, et si, ainsi que le dit M. le Ministre de la Justice, on ne doit pas demander que Lord Carnarvon dit ne vouloir accorder c'est-à-dire une amnistie complète; s'il faut que les inculpés subissent une peine semblable à celle imposée à M. LÉPINE, il est inutile de voter les résolutions du gouvernement. D'un autre côté si le gouvernement espère par ses résolutions, faire revenir les autorités impériales sur leur décision relativement à M. NAULT et aux autres inculpés, nous avons tout lieu de croire qu'il en ferait autant pour MM. RIEL et LÉPINE si nous le lui demandions."

M. DESJARDINS.—Page 30, 12th February in the 8th line, in lieu of the words, "que nous avons prise," insert the following "que la Province de Québec a prise."

In the 29th line, in lieu of "nos ennemis acharnés," insert "aux ennemis acharnés de l'amnistie."

After the words "qu'elle me fait" in the 32nd line add "Ils sont logiques dans leur hostilite, mais cela ne doit pas m'empecher de l'etre dans la conviction ou je suis que MM. Riel et Lépine ne méritent pas le traitement qu'on veut leur infliger.

M. GAUDET.—Page 30, 12th February in lieu of the words "les hommes du passe ont fait des fautes" insert "Les hommes du passe peuvent bien avoir fait des fautes."

M. CARON.—Page 34, 12th February instead of the, "Il espere que les memes difficultés reviendront l'année prochaine," insert the following "Il sait d'apres ce que les hons. députés qui l'ont précédé ont dit, que les memes difficultès reviendront l'année prochaine."

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 2nd, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:

Mr. COCKBURN—To consolidate the enactments relating to the Northern Railway Company of Canada, and to provide for the consolidation of the loan capital of the company. In answer to the Premier he explained that this Bill was simply to re-arrange the capital and it was entirely independent of the Bill prepared partly, at the instance of the Government.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—To incorporate the Anglo-French Steamship Company.

Mr. JETTE—To incorporate the Canadian Land Investment Guarantee Company.

Mr. JETTE—To incorporate the Metropolitan Insurance Company.

Mr. JETTE—To further amend the Acts 14 and 15 Victoria, Ch. 36, incorporating the Canada Guarantee Company.

Mr. DESJARDINS—To incorporate the National Insurance Company.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN NORTH-WEST.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act respecting the administration of Justice and the establishment of the Police Force in the North-West Territories. He stated that the object of this Bill was to amend only two clauses, 26 and 25 of the existing law. These two clauses were re-enacted almost entirely with the addition of some provisions respecting desertions, which were not made an offence in the present Act. and there was no provision for the punishment of deserters. The present Bill made desertion an offence punishable by fine. Under the present law the Commissioner alone had the power of punishing offences. By the present Bill it was proposed to extend that Bill to the Assistant Commissioner and other officers in command, so that any commanding officer in an isolated position would have the same power as the Commissioner in relation to the offences mentioned in the Act. The second clause of this Bill, amending Section 25 of the present act, provided that any deserter found in any of the Provinces might be sued, fined and imprisoned for his offence.

Bill read a first time.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved the House into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions on the subject of the salaries of the County Court Judges of the Province of Nova Scotia; also to consider certain resolutions respecting salaries proposed to be paid to the Chief Justice and Judges mentioned in the Bill No. 31 to establish a Supreme Court and a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion of Canada. Mr. SCATCHERD in the chair.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said that by an Act recently passed in the Province of Nova Scotia it had been provided that seven County Court Judges should be appointed, and for that reason it became the duty of Parliament to provide for the salaries of those Judges. By the resolutions which he would submit to the Committee those Judges would be placed on the same footing as the County Judges of Ontario and New Brunswick, their salaries, travelling and retiring allowances being the same. He proposed to change the resolutions so as to place the County Court Judge of the City and County of Halifax on the same footing as that of the City and County of St. John, who received $2,600 salary and travelling allowance, because the population of the two districts was about the same and about the same amount of business came before each Court. He therefore proposed the following resolution:

1. That it is expedient to provide that the salaries of the County Court Judges of the Province of Nova Scotia shall be as follows, namely:—

To seven County Court Judges, each, not less than $1,000, and not more than $2,000, to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and that a sum not exceeding $200 for actual travelling expenses to be fixed as aforesaid, may be allowed to any of the County Court Judges, except the County Court Judge of the City and County of Halfax, whose salary shall be $2,600.

2. That it is expedient to provide that the said County Court Judges shall be subject, as regards retiring allowances or annuities based upon their salaries above mentioned, as is provided in respect to County Court Judges in either of the Provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, by the provisions of the 37th Vic., Ch. 4, sec. 8.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that some years ago the salaries of the County Court Judges in Ontario were arranged upon the principle—although not with respect to figures—what was laid down in the resolution before the House—that was to say—that there was a certain minimum and maximum between which the Governor in Council was empowered from time to time to fix and determine their salaries. That plan had not worked well in practice. It was found that those persons who received increases of salary were not just the persons who were best entitled to them; and irrespective of that he thought there was a theoretical as well as a practical objection to the Judges being dependent for their salaries upon the good-will of the Government of the day. It was quite true, at this age of the world, that this objection was less substantial in practice than was formerly the case, but he did not know any sufficient reason why Parliament should delegate its powers with respect to the question of the salaries of the Judges, he advanced in this matter within the last two or three years under the late Administration to a more correct principle, and the salaries of the Judges in Ontario were not now determined on the principle laid down in this resolution.

There was a certain minimum salary fixed from which they increased after a certain number of years service to the minimum, so that the amount of salary was made dependent on their length of service and was therefore an automatic operation. Unless there was some special reason, of which they had heard nothing, why the same principle should not be adopted in Nova Scotia, he thought the policy pursued in respect to the County Court Judges in Ontario should not be retrograded from. He invited the attention of the Minister of Justice to these considerations and asked him to determine before the next step was taken, whether the Government could not apply to the Province of Nova Scotia, as well as to other Provinces, a general principle of gradual increase if that was a correct principle, and if it was not some modification of that principle.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said that when the Bill was prepared the salaries would be fixed.

Mr. PALMER asked whether the salaries of these Judges in Ontario did not in point of fact differ from the salaries of Judges in New Brunswick in this respect —while the salaries of the latter were fixed, the salaries of the former advanced according to age. That was his impression of the matter now, and he thought it was very desirable that they should be put on the same footing in all the Provinces.

M. CIMON : Il devra m'être permis de poser une question au sujet du salaire de certains juges de la province de Québec, savoir ceux des districts de Saguenay et de Gaspé, qui ont un salaire inférieur au salaire des autres juges de même jurisdiction. Autrefois cette différence pouvait avoir sa raison d'être, parce que les juges de ces deux districts avaient moins d'ouvrage que les autres juges. Mais maintenant que ces juges sont appelés à donner leur attention à des affaires aussi considérables que celles qui sont apportées devant les autres juges, leur salaire devrait être égal à celui de leurs collègues. Cela ne me parait que juste, et j'espère que l'honorable Ministre pourra me donner une réponse satisfaisante à cet égard.

L'hon. M. FOURNIER : La question de l'honorable membre n'a aucun rapport à la résolution maintenant devant le comité de la chambre. Si l'hon. député de Charlevoix désire avoir des renseignements à ce sujet, il devra faire une interpellation régulière, je pourrai me consulter avec mes collègues et lui donner une réponse à ce sujet.

M. MASSON : Il me semble que la circonstance justifiait pleinement le député de Charlevoix de poser sa question : car il s'agit d'une distribution d'argent et de l'augmentation du salaire de certains juges. La question posée par l'hon. député ayant précisément rapport à ce sujet, je crois que l'hon. Ministre de la Justice devait, suivant son habitude, donner une réponse plus satifaisante à la question qui lui était posée.

L'hon. M. CAUCHON : l'hon. député de Terrebonne doit observer que l'hon. Ministre de la Justice lui a aussi dit qu'il lui fallait se consulter avec ses collègues, avant de pouvoir répondre à l'hon. membre, ce qui est une réponse satisfaisante.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL trusted the hon. Minister of Justice would amend his resolutions in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John. The system of graduated salaries, of which he entirely approved, should be applied to the New Brunswick Judges as well as to those of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it would be quite impossible to amend the resolutions in such a manner as to add to the charge on the country. The only mode was to introduce a new resolution.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thanked his hon. friend for the suggestion. He did not so much care how it was done as to have it done.

M. TREMBLAY : Puisqu'il s'agit du salaire des Juges, je ferai au Gouvernement actuel la question que j'ai faite au Gouvernement précédent. Je demanderai donc pourquoi le Gouvernement n'augmenterait pas aussi les salaires des Juges de Bonaventure et de Gaspé. L'Administration précédente m'avait répondu que ces Juges ayant moins d'ouvrage n'avaient pas droit à un salaire aussi élevé que leurs collègues plus occupés. N'ayant pas trouvé cette raison suffisante dans le temps, je voudrais savoir ce que le Gouvernement actuel pense faire à ce sujet.

M. CIMON : le député de Charlevoix posant au Gouvernement la question que je lui ai posé sans résultat, l'hon. Ministre de la Justice lui donnera sans doute une réponse plus complète et plus satisfaisante que celle qui lui a été faite à lui-même.

L'hon. M. FOURNIER : Je ne suis pas en état de donner au député de Charlevoix une réponse autre que celle que j'ai donnée il y a un instant au député de Chicoutimi. Ma réponse est la même et le cours à suivre est le même pour l'un que pour l'autre.

Mr. GOUDGE said he could see no reason why the Judges of Halifax City and County of Halifax should receive higher salaries than any other Judges in Nova Scotia, and suggested that they should receive the same amount for their services. He gave notice that he would lay his views on the subject before the House at a future stage of the measure.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE called the attention of the hon. members for Northumberland, (N. B.) and the City and County of St. John to the fact that the Act of 1873 placed the Judges of New Brunswick on precisely the same footing as the Judges of Ontario.

Hon. MITCHELL said the Act referred to had entirely escaped his notice.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) in reply to the hon. member for Hants explained that it had always been the policy of the Government in appointing Judges to so large a place as Halifax, to give them something more than rural Judges. It was so in the city and county of St. John as well as in the city and county of Halifax. He quite approved of this policy, and so would the hon. member for Hants if he knew the difference in expense between living in a large city and living in the country.

It was agreed to amend the first resolution so as to fix the salary of each of seven County Court Judges at $2,000.

The Committee then rose and reported the resolutions. Concurrence to-morrow.

SALARIES OF SUPREME COURT JUDGES.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved that the House do on Thursday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions respecting salaries proposed to be paid to the Chief Justice and Judges mentioned in the Bill to establish a Supreme Court and a Court of Exchequer. —Carried.

POSTAL REGULATIONS.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD moved that on Thursday next the House do resolve itself into Committe of the Whole to consider certain resolutions for the purpose of amending the Act 31 Vict., Chap. 10, for the regulation of the Postal Service.—Carried.

SALARIES OF PENITENTIARY OFFICERS.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved that on Thursday next the House do resolve itself into Committe of the Whole, to consider certain resolutions respecting the salaries proposed to be paid to the officers mentioned in the Bill respecting penitentiaries and the inspection thereof.—Carried.

MARINE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to regulate the construction and maintenance of Marine Electric Telegraphs (Mr. JETTE in the Chair). The Committee rose and reported the Bill without amendment, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. JONES (Halifax), said he desired, before the motion passed, to bring before the notice of the Government and the House the case of a public servant who, in his judgment, had been hardly dealt with by the Government. It would be remembered perhaps by some of the older members of the House that about three years ago he presented a petition to the House on behalf of Mr. EDWARD DUCKETT, who for forty-five years had been connected with the public service in Nova Scotia. After that length of service he became unequal to the task (he was in charge of the Savings Bank), and previous to the Union, the then Government of Nova Scotia suggested to him that he should retire from his responsible position and have his name attached to the Custom service in Nova Scotia at the reduced salary of £150. This was done on the understanding that no duty was expected of him, for it was well known that he was no longer fit for active service. He (Mr. JONES) presented a petition to this House setting forth the facts of the case, and the Government of the day promised to take the subject into their consideration. It should have been stated that at the date of Union the Government found Mr. DUCKETT' name on the list of officials at Halifax, and they superannuated him at $600 instead of $1,200, which was the allowance agreed upon by the Government of Nova Scotia. Many hon. members would recollect the circumstance, and the members of the late Government would also know that Mr. TILLEY had written a letter to Mr. DUCKETT on the subject. It was to be regretted that the hon. member for Cumberland was not in his place, as he was well acquainted with the circumstances. He (Mr. JONES) now desired to bring the subject before the House and the Government. Mr. and Mrs. DUCKETT were very old people, some 75 or 76 years of age, and they were reduced almost to a state of penury. It would certainly not be the wish of the House or the Government that any one who had served the country for nearly half-a-century should suffer any injustice. A copy of the petition referred to had been placed in the hands of the Minister of Justice last year, and if its contents were examined every member of the House would be convinced that Mr. DUCKETT was really entitled to the additional allowance claimed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he recollected that the hon. member brought this matter before the House some two or three years ago, but he was not aware that it had not been settled until the hon. gentleman mentioned it to him privately last night. He would see the hon. member for Cumberland concerning it. It was impossible they could give Mr. DUCKETT anything more than the present allowance under the Superannuation Act, because all allowances of that nature were governed by Statute. There might be a method, however, of doing what was thought to be just and of fulfilling any arrangement made by the Government of Nova Scotia. It would be better to place Mr. DUCKETT's name on the pension list, for which of couse a direct vote of the House would be necessary. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) would look into the matter before to-morrow afternoon, and would then be able to say what could be done.

The motion was then carried.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SCATCHERD in the chair.

Item 69, $915,000, Intercolonial Railway, was passed without discussion.

On item 70, $139,000, Extension into Halifax,

Mr. JONES (Halifax) inquired what the Minister of Public Works intended doing with reference to wharf accommodation at the centre of the city. It was proposed by Mr. BRYDGES to acquire the Queen's Wharf property, which was believed to be the cheaper expedient than carrying the road into the centre of the city. He desired to know what steps had been taken in the matter.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the plan decided upon last year was to have the passenger station located between Water street, Lockman street, and North street. It was proposed that heavy freight should be conveyed between the wharves at Richmond station and this point by means of tugs and barges. At that time it was supposed that the Queen's wharf could be obtained from the Imperial Government. Upon application being made to that effect, however, a reply was received that they were willing to give it, provided accommodation were given them (the Imperial authorities) elsewhere. This was of course impracticable, and the necessary wharf accommodation would therefore have to depend upon arrangements yet to be made.

The item was carried.

On item, 71, $200,000, increased Intercolonial Railway accommodation at St. John, N. B.,

Mr. PALMER inquired where this additional accommodation was to be had, and whether the Government had the same plan in view as formerly. He desired to know why it was that the Government had not made available the ballast wharf.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government did not take that property because they could not get it. He might state that the property offered by the city was in the first place utterly useless, and in the second place the price was far beyond what was deemed proper. The proposal to have the terminus at Rankin's wharf had many advocates, and it seemed to him (Mr. MACKENZIE) to be the best place. There were some objections raised to it in connection with the navigation of the river, but he thought they could be overcome. There was no actual suffering in the meantime for want of the increased accommodation, and there was no reason for hurrying. As soon as the city would make a suitable proposition it would be attended to. Two places were suggested for building the bridge. According to one, it was proposed to bridge the river near the Suspension Bridge, forming a connection with the Western Extension. The Government had had some communication with the railway companies in the city and with the Western Extension to ascertain to what extent they would be disposed to assist in bridging the harbor to Navy Island or at the Suspension Bridge, the latter of which projects was thought most advisable. These communications hod not yet resulted in anything, and it would be some time before it would be possible to say whether anything would come of them or not. This arose largely from the great depression in railway business in the United States and Canada. The Government, in the meantime, had taken some steps regarding the property at the Rankin wharf, to see whether they could not have their deep-water terminus there. The matter was not yet decided, and it had not yet been settled whether it would be most convenient to go there or to the place originally proposed.

Mr. PALMER said he was satisfied that both the terminus at the Rankin Wharf and a bridge at Navy Island would be an advantage. He did not see why the Government should not have the power to take the property at the Ballast Wharf, for he believed the Board of Works Act gave them such power. That Act provided that a person should be appointed by the Government to value the property, and the city would have to hand it over at his valuation. He thought it would be a pity that the Ballast Wharf should be abandoned, as a large sum had been expended in completing a line of railway through the city to that place. He was glad that the Government had not come to any final decision on the subject, and he urged upon them to locate the terminus at the Ballast Wharf, and bridge the River St. John at Navy Island. He hoped before any other conclusion was arrived at that most ample inquiry would be made. The people were desirous that something should be done in the matter soon, but they were opposed to anything that would be likely to militate against the navigation of the river or the usefulness of the harbor.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said the last correspondence had been between the Corporation of St. John and the Public Works Department. Since that time the Corporation of St. John had never raised the question in respect to the Ballast Wharf, and if he understood the feeling aright, it was because of the movement made to place the harbor of St. John under commissioners. In respect to the bridge across the river he believed the proper place would be near the falls.

Mr. PALMER said the officers of the city understood the correspondence was closed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE remarked that $20,186 of the sum placed to that item was due to the representatives of the estate of ROBERT F. HASTINGS for the purchase of five acres and a half of land taken in the city of St. John. The representatives of the estate had, for some unexplained reason, not called for the payment, and the Government had decided to formally tender the amount.

Item carried.

On items 73 and 74, Lachine Canal $1,600,000 ; St Lawrence Canals $1,000,000.

Mr. JONES (Leeds) asked for explanations.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that part of the works at Lachine were under contract, one of the large basins was nearly completed and the excavation at the locks was almost completed, and the other basin would be proceeded with as soon as the Government could get the contract let. The work for the enlargement of the canal above that point was almost ready to be let. The Government had experienced great difficulty in having the works contracted for, pushed forward as rapidly as they desired, but they had endeavored to make the best possible arrangements in order to push the works to an early completion. The Government expected within less than two months to have the entire line under contract.

Mr. JETTE said he desired, while this item was under consideration, to offer some explanations with regard to a matter rather personal to himself, but which, from certain articles in the Opposition press, had become to some extent a matter of public interest. Last winter, with some friends, he purchased a tract of land on the Lachine Canal, and last fall they offered a part of this property for sale at public auction. He was accused by some of the Opposition press in the Province of Quebec with having used his influence with the Government in order to obtain information in advance of their plans. He believed this was the proper place and time for him to make, as he did, a distinct denial of this charge, and to inform the House that he had demanded from some of these newspapers a retraction of the accusation they had made against him, and all except one had retracted, and against that one he had brought an action in the courts. He noticed, however, that another newspaper in Quebec had renewed the accusation, and he had finally decided to pursue the same course with regard to it that he had done with regard to the newspaper in Montreal. Some of the Opposition press had stated that this matter would be the subject of a Parliamentary inquiry, as soon as the House would assemble. No motion had yet been offered for such an inquiry, and he now desired to state that he would be very glad if an inquiry was demanded, and he would use whatever influence he might have with the Governmet to induce them to consent to such inquiry, in order that it might be shown that all these accusations against him were as false as he had always said they were.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that no such application as was stated had ever been made to the Government to purchase the lands of his hon. friend, or any other lands. No lands were offered and no information was asked for further than this: A map was brought showing lands that these parties had advertised for sale or were about to advertise for sale, and they wished to know whether the Government desired to obtain any land in that quarter, and, if so, whether their sale would interfere with any of the Government's plans. He informed them that the Government had not decided whether to enlarge the canal or make a new canal, and he therefore declined to offer any advice as to whether they should proceed with the sale or not. That was all that took place that he was aware of, and he was quite sure that nothing took place anywhere else than in his own office, so that the hon. gentleman was entirely clear of the remotest suspicion of wrong-doing in this matter.

Mr. Jette.

On item 74, for St. Lawrence Canals, $1,000,000,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked for general explanations with regard to this item.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said with reference to the Welland Canal,—the principal work in many ways because it was the only one which paid a considerable revenue over the amount expended in working it—nearly all the contracts were let providing for the construction of locks 270 feet long, 45 feet wide and having 12 feet of water on the mitre sills. The work was making satisfactory progress and during the coming year a very large portion of it would be completed. On the St. Lawrence proper, between Prescott and Montreal, we have the Williamsburg and Edwardsburg Canal, the Cornwall, the Beauharnois and the Lachine Canals. The Government were still considering what steps they should take in the public interest in regard to several of these works. On the Lachine Canal, the plans and specifications for the work were nearly completed, the report of the engineer having been made some time ago. The contract would be let in accordance with the plan sketched as to the size of the locks and prism of the canal early in the spring. With regard to some of the minor canals, such as that at Williamsburg and Pointe Aux Iroquois, comparatively little expense would be incurred, but the plans were not yet completed. There was one serious difficulty in connection with the depth of water in the river itself. At one place near Prescott there was a very serious shoal in the river which must be cut through to give a channel of fourteen feet. This would be necessary to supply twelve feet of water at all times as the depth was materially affected by the wind. The expenditure at this place would reach $500,000. The next point, coming downward, where a serious impediment was met in the river was immediately at the upper end of the Beauharnois canal. In order to obtain the necessary depth of water in the channel, an expenditure of over $500,000 would be required. Expensive dredging would also be necessary between Beauharnois and Lachine, involving an outlay of nearly half a million more. So that in deepening the river itself, apart from any improvements in the canals, an expenditure of $1,500,000, in round numbers, would be incurred. In answering a question, the other day, in reference to the depth of water on the mitre sills of the canals, he stated that it was inexpedient to attempt to obtain more than twelve feet, the reason being that it would be difficult to get fourteen feet of water in the river itself. The Government did not consider it expedient in the public interest that they should endeavor to obtain more than twelve feet. It would not be at all impossible to get fourteen at a future time if it should be found that the traffic of the country required it. For the present the Government intended to confine themselves to the operations indicated. He had also stated on a former occasion that there was no very particular hurry with the works on the St. Lawrence Canals, between Prescott and Lachine, until the Lachine works, which were the heaviest, were completed. He had merely given a general explanation, and was prepared to answer any specific question.

Mr. LANTHIER said as a report on the proposed extension of the Beauharnois Canal had been prepared, he would like to know what would be the length of the line adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the engineer reported as follows :—

"Between Lachine and Beauharnois, through Lake St. Louis, a distance of about 15¼ miles, there is abundance of water, except at a few places, through the shoals on which the light ships are moored. These are of a nature, however, that can be readily removed. But at Lachine a rocky shoal extends out for a considerable distance, so that it becomes questionable whether the present entrance should be deepened or a new outlet formed about 1¼ miles higher up. Two lines were lately surveyed on the north shore of the St. Lawrence opposite the Beauharnois Canal, both commencing at McIntyre's Bay, a little below the old steamboat landing and the lower entrance of the Ordnance Canal at the Cascades. One line passes chiefly on the upland, and is about 14½ miles in length, with 7 locks, 5 of which are of 14 feet lift, 1 of 11½ ft. lift, and the guard lock 1 to 5 ft. lift. Estimated cost, including tow-path, $3,360,000. The other line, which is suitable only for tug navigation, passes through Chambery and Riviere à la Graisse Gullies, and is about 14¾ miles long, with seven locks of the same respective lifts as those of the other line. Estimated cost, $3,000,000. Another line adopted exclusively to steam navigation, was examined with a view of utilizing that part of the River St. Lawrence between the Coteau and Cedar Rapids. Apart from permanent objectionable features met with on this route, the probable expenditure necessary to render it navigable is greater than required on the last of the two lines above described."

Mr. LANTHIER said this contained no reference to the expense of re-constructing the Beauharnois Canal or of making harbors. There was no harbor, no depth of water, and no channel at either end of the canal. The engineers had ascertained that the only available channel for vessels drawing twelve feet of water was on the north side of Lake St. Francis. Vessels entering the canal had to pass by that channel and cross the lake to the other side. The experience of navigators had shown that there was no way of making an entrance at the west end of Beauharnois Canal unless it was done at an immense expense. The bottom was of solid rock, and this was so well known that the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department had given instructions to run an extension line about two miles from the present entrance through the back country to give the canal a new outlet. With the extension below, it would be some three miles longer, giving about seventeen miles of canal, and that he believed was the shortest distance. The Committee would like to know what would be the expenditure on the Beauharnois Canal on this new plan, and the means of having a harbor at each end. It was always practicable to make a ditch through a country, but if vessels could not reach it, it would be of no use for navigation. That was precisely the difficulty with the Beauharnois Canal. There was nothing in the report which had been read to explain to the committee what was to be done to ascertain whether it would be possible to deepen the channel on the south side. He had come to the conclusion that it was a matter of utter impossibility to obtain the proper depth of water there unless at an immense cost—at a greater expenditure, in fact, than would be incurred in constructing a new canal on the north shore. To re-construct the Beauharnois Canal would interfere with trade for one year at least, which would not be the case if a new canal were built on the north shore. The ice remained longer on the south than on the north shore. In fact last summer seven or eight vessels were moored alongside of the ice, and the Government had to obtain the services of a large number of men with saws and axes to cut the ice and open the channel. At one time there were no less than two hundred men thus employed, while on the north shore there was no such impediment to navigation. By constructing a canal on the north shore, navigation could be opened six days earlier in the spring, and it would continue six days later in the fall. It had happened that vessels, on arriving at the Beauharnois Canal late in the fall, were obliged to return to Prescott and tranship their grain to the Grand Trunk Railway to be forwarded. By opening a canal on the north shore, twelve to fifteen days navigation could be gained each year. These were considerations which he had no doubt, would be well weighed by the hon. Minister of Public Works before he concluded which route should be chosen.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the report stated that twelve feet could be secured by the expenditure at the upper end of the canal of $500,000 and a similar amount on Lake St. Francis at the lower entrance to the canal. This was the engineer's estimate, and he was usually above the mark in his estimates. With regard to the canal on the north side, it should, no doubt, have been placed there in the first instance, but he was not prepared to say whether it should be built there now, or that the old one should be enlarged. The estimate for the new canal was $3,500,000.

Mr. McCALLUM called the attention of the Government to the necessity of feeding the Welland Canal from Lake Erie instead of Grand River. A work for that purpose was commenced some years ago, and completed all but one thousand yards of excavation. A subsequent report by an engineer showed that the feeder could be completed for $60,000. It was doing an injustice to the mill owners on the Welland Canal to delay this work so long. Years ago they invested a large amount of capital on the line of the canal, expecting to find a sufficient supply of water there. Now, they had not water enough for four months of the year, and still the Government collected full rates. If the Government did not take steps to complete this work, the present canal would be useless. With another dry summer there would not only be a deficient supply for the mills, but not enough even for navigation purposes. Again, in Port Colborne harbor there was not sufficient water to admit vessels drawing ten feet of water. In 1871 he drew the attention of the Government of the day to this matter. At that time they let the contract for removing rock from that harbor. He predicted then they would fail in the work, and that prediction was verified. At the same time they decided to deepen the feeder of the Welland Canal. They expended between $150,000 and $200,000 on this work, to draw water from the pond on Grand River. They got eleven feet at high water, but there was a depth of only seven feet over the culverts, and the feeder was only twenty feet wide at the bottom. Take an ordinary-sized vessel into this cut and it would stop the water supply, and it was therefore useless for purposes of navigation. He regretted to hear the Minister of Public Works talk of deepening the Welland Canal to twelve feet instead of making it fourteen feet, which could be done by getting the water supply from Lake Erie. The promise made to his (Mr. McCALLUM's) predecessor by the Government, that they would examine this question and cause a survey to be made of the two routes, had not been fulfilled.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We have not had time.

Mr. McCALLUM said the contracts should not have been given out until the examination was made. At Maitland harbor there was twenty feet of water, and the harbor was sheltered from the winds during all weathers. Last year it was charged against Port Colborne that there was a strong current in that harbor. The Grand River failed to supply the Welland Canal with water, and the balance was therefore drawn from Lake Erie, causing a current into that harbor. Another advantage possessed by Maitland was that the harbor was open two months earlier than that of Port Colborne. The canal policy of the present and the late Governments was directed by one-man power. While admitting that the official he had indicated was an able one, at the same time he disapproved of millions of dollars being placed in his hands to expend. Reports should be obtained from independent engineers, who were not pledged to a certain route. He trusted the Government would appoint a commission to inquire into the grievances alleged, in order that justice might be done.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said that his intimate knowledge of the Welland Canal led him to understand that Port Colborne was the legitimate mouth of the canal. The hon. member for Monck had spoken for that part of the country in which he was interested. With respect to carrying out the improvements, he (Mr. THOMSON) was quite willing to leave the work in the hands of the Minister of Public Works and the Government engineers, for the Government were well aware as to what was required. With respect to the mouth of Grand River being open two months earlier than Port Colborne harbor, that circumstance was of no consequence because the ice held longer in the St. Clair River through which all the vessels had to pass. He desired, however, to direct the attention of the Government to the depth of water in the Welland Canal. An agitation had been going on for many years in favor of the construction of a ship canal round the Falls on the American side, and if the Welland Canal was only made to a depth of twelve feet an American canal of greater depth would be built. But if the Welland Canal were constructed of sufficient capacity to allow the largest ships to pass from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario, it was more than probable that a canal on the American side would never be built, and therefore the Welland Canal would prove a profitable work to the country. He had always been an advocate for so deepening the canal as to provide greater depth of water than twelve feet.

Mr. McCALLUM said it was in the interest of the whole country, and not merely of one section, that Port Maitland should be made the western terminus of the canal, and that the canal should be made fourteen feet deep. At any rate, if the canal was only to be made twelve feet deep, the mitre sills should be sunk fourteen feet so that subsequently the canal could be again deepened without moving the sills.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he considered it a mistake that water privileges on the Welland Canal had ever been granted; but the hon member for Monck was wrong in stating that those parties who had the water privilege had been compelled to pay the full amount. They might have been compelled to do so, as their lease simply gave them the surplus water; but their rents had been reduced in proportion to the time their mills had to remain idle. He was quite willing to cancel the leases altogether, and not require them to pay anything if they would let the water alone. With regard to the hon. gentleman's remarks about the proper entrance to the canal, he (Mr. MACKENZIE) must take the opinion of competent engineers in preference to that of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK was sorry that the Minister of Public Works could not hold out any expectation that the Welland Canal would be deepened to fourteen feet. The additional expenditure which would be incurred by making it that depth would be small compared with the immense advantage it would give us in competing for the carrying trade of the west. From what he had been able to gather from the remarks of the member for Monck he supposed it was out of the question to get fourteen feet at the present entrance to the canal.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No, no!

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he was glad to hear that such was not the case; and he hoped that the works now going on would be constructed with a view to increasing the depth to fourteen feet at no distant day. He would like to know from the Minister of Public Works if he could give an estimate of the cost of deepening the Welland Canal to fourteen feet.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he could not do so at the present moment. He proceeded to say that the extra cost of deepening the canal to fourteen feet at some future time as compared with now would be very small. With regard to the present work, contracts were now given out to the extent of about five and a quarter millions. Two or three contracts were still to let; one had been kept back chiefly on account of the difficulty of crossing the Great Western Railway. The Government had proposed that the railway pass under instead of over the canal, and that arrangement was likely to be carried out, and that section would be placed under contract immediately.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—When are these works on the Welland Canal likely to be completed?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am not quite sure, but I think there is little doubt that they will be finished before the end of 1876.

Item passed.

On item 76, St. Anne's Lock, $200,000, in answer to Mr. HAGAR,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this vote was for the work under contract. The total estimated cost of the whole work, including the upper entrance and excavating shoals below, was $466,200.

Mr. HAGAR—Is that all below the Locks?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No; the upper entrance is included.

Item passed; also items 77 and 78. On item 79, Rideau Canal, $8,000,

Mr. HAGAR asked the Minister of Public Works whether in view of the letters received by him written by Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN respecting the arrangement that was made between that gentleman when he was Minister of Public Works and the town of Perth, respecting the amount granted for a bridge across the Rideau Canal, the Government intended to pay the town of Perth out of this vote.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had not decided to pay that amount. The whole question in controversy was this: an arrangement was made by which the Government was to pay $10,000 on condition that $8,000 was furnished from local sources. The bridge was supposed to cost $18,000. As a matter of fact it did not cost anything like that amount, and the Government felt themselves bound to pay only in the proportion of ten to eight. The town of Perth considered that they were only to pay whatever might be required over $10,000, and that the Government were bound to pay $10,000 although they were not bound to pay the $8,000; but he was not able to take that view of the matter.

Mr. HAGGART said the Government could not have had any misunderstanding about the cost of this bridge because the engineer before the contract was let reported to the Minister of Public Works that it would only cost between $12,000 and $13,000. The understanding with the town of Perth was that the Government would give $10,000, no matter what the bridge would cost.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had stated twice last session that the Government had not determined to give that money, and he had not been able to see that the town had any claim to it.

Mr. HAGGART said in answer to a deputation, the Minister of Public Works had stated that he would take the matter into consideration.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had not stated so. The deputation brought letters which he had not seen before from the late Minister of Public Works, which the deputation said admitted that he had made a promise to give $10,000. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) promised to look into that matter, but he held out no hope to the deputation that there would be the least likelihood of that amount being granted. He objected to persons out of office writing letters to endeavor to bind the Government to some verbal arrangement that did not appear on record, and he would not pay much attention to any such letters coming from ex-Ministers.

Mr. HAGGART asked if the Government would allow the town of Perth to bring an action against them for this claim.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied in the negative.

Item passed; also items 80 and 81.

On item 82, St. Peter's Canal, $75,000,

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) ssked when it was likely this money would be expended. The widening of this canal was a matter of very great importance to the people of Cape Breton, inasmuch as six or seven hundred vessels passed through there in the course of the month during which it was in operation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this was a re-vote. Last season the attention of the engineer in the Lower Provinces was chiefly directed to harbor improvements. Late in the year, however, he received instructions to proceed to this work, and he (Mr. MACKENZIE) presumed they were now about ready to receive tenders for the work, and they hoped to have it well under way during the summer.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he had visited that canal four years ago, and he satisfied himself that it was of great importance to the trade of the Lower Provinces.

Item passed.

The committee rose and reported progress, and it being 6 o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS

The House again went into Committee of Supply.

On item 83, Baie Verte Canal $1000,000,

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness) said that annually since 1872, an appropriation had appeared in the estimates for the construction of the Baie Verte Canal. The work was recommended by the Canal Commissioner appointed in 1870, and which reported in 1871. The report of that commission constituted the basis upon which the appropriation had yearly been made. The commission was appointed to consider the canal system of the Dominion and to inquire upon the different works. In proceeding to the discharge of their duty the commission very properly prepared a circular, in which they asked for information, copies of which circulars were sent to all the Boards of Trade in the Dominion and the Boards of the United States—to all the Canadian newspapers and the mercantile communities. The report of that commission was untrustworthy in two respects:—First, because it recommended the construction of the Baie Verte Canal on the assumption that it would cost only three and a quarter millions, while the report of the Engineer-in-Chief, recently laid before the House, placed the probable expenditure at eight millions; secondly, because it pretended to furnish information on the subject both pro and con. But it appeared that there was not a single letter from any individual who reported against the construction of the work. The report only contained the opinions of three gentlemen in Nova Scotia, namely, Hon. Mr. DICKEY, Mr. MACFARLANE and Mr. FAIRBANKS. This circumstance proved that the report of the commission was untrustworthy, and yet upon it the House, without any discussion, was called upon to vote a very large appropriation. He opposed the construction of the Baie Verte Canal on two grounds; first, he considered it was impracticable, and such was the opinion of celebrated engineers who had examined and reported upon it. Captain CRAWLEY, of the Royal Engineers, in 1825, examined and reported the work to be impracticable, as many others had done since. He opposed the work in the second place because, admitting that it was feasible to secure open navigation between Baie Verte and the Bay of Fundy, the cost would be more than its usefulness would warrant. If the work, however, was to be constructed at all the sooner it was undertaken the better, for every year the estimated cost increased. In 1825 the estimate of Mr. TALBOT and another engineer, was £155,897, or $700,000; while a few years afterwards when the Canal Commission proceeded to inquire into the project the estimated cost was placed at $3,215,000. Afterwards a report was made by Mr. KEEFER, who placed the cost at $5,000,000; and to-day the Chief Engineer of the Dominion said the work could not be carried out for less than $8,350,000, although he stated that a canal one-half the size of that proposed could be constructed for $7,700,000. The construction of the canal was recommended for various reasons by the commission. They said that it would open communication between old Canada and the Maritime Provinces by the Gulf of St. Lawrence. If, however, the canal was constructed vessels would only use it in going from the Gulf into the Bay of Fundy, and the canal would not be used in making any port east of Yarmouth. The Commission stated that the distance from the Gulf to St. John would be reduced 600 miles, but such was not the fact. the reduced distance not being more than about 400 miles. A further argument adduced by the commission was that the canal would remove obstacles to trade being carried on between Montreal and the Bay of Fundy. He did not, however, know of any trade that was carried on between these points, or that would ever be carried on between them; or that there was anything of importance to ship from the Bay of Fundy. Of course there was fish, and there were some grindstones; but surely the Dominion would not believe a canal costing eight millions of money, to ship a few grindstones, a little shad, and some pickled herrings, was a necessity. A further reason the commission gave was that the canal would afford an improved and shorter route between Lake Huron and Boston. But the people of the United States did not appear very anxious to promote or encourage trade relations with us; and even if they did, they derived an equal advantage from the trade with the people of Canada, so that if the canal was essential to that trade, the people of the United States should contribute towards its construction. Moreover, any trade we had with the United States would go by the way of the Strait of Cauzo, and not by the tortuous and dangerous navigation of the Bay of Fundy. Again, it was argued that the coal, fish, and lumber trade of the Maritime Provinces would be benefited by the construction of the canal. He could not, however, understand in what way the fish trade could be benefitted, for if the Maratime Provinces exported fish to Ontario and Quebec, it was from the Gulf of St. Lawrence; and he could not understand either how the coal interests would be benefitted. It had been asserted by the Canal Commission that the coal of Cape Breton would go, not only through the Baie Verte Canal, but through the St. Peter's Canal; but that any of the coal of Pictou or Cape Breton should ever go through the Baie Verte Canal was absurd. As to the lumber interests of St. John being benefitted, he failed to understand how it would be profitable to send lumber from St. John to Canada, for it would be like carrying coal to Newcastle. A still further argument was this—that a shorter route would be found for fishing vessels sailing from Yarmouth to the Gulf, whereby those vessels would arrive at the fisheries one month earlier in the spring of the year. Yarmouth vessels left for the banks about the 1st of April, and remained there until June, and it was July before they entered the Gulf. The Canal Commission endeavored to find another argument for the construction of this work in the statement that the country contiguous to Baie Verte was unsurpassed, even by Quebec and Ontario, for its agricultural produce, and for the fertility of its soil. It would, however, again be sending coal to Newcastle, to ship agricultural produce from any part of the Maritime Provinces to Ontario. Although it was asserted thas the work was intended to benefit the Maritime Provinces, not a single favorable reply to the Canal Commission's circular was received from Nova Scotia, and the only three gentlemen who recommend it do so in very mild terms. He desired to see laid on the table of the House the answers forwarded to the commission by merchants, shipowners and newspaper editors of that Province. It was said, however, by some that the expenditure of eight millions of dollars in Nova Scotia was a desirable object. He admitted that they desired money to be expended in that Province, and while he protested against the expenditure on the Baie Verte Canal, and hoped the Government would this year strike the proposed appropriation from the estimates, he trusted they would grant the same amount of money to the Province, to be expended on works that were required, and which would not only be a benefit to the Maritime Provinces, but to the whole Dominion. A great many interests in the Maritime Provinces were suffering from want of the usual aid by the the Government. One-third of their export trade was in fish, yet almost nothing had been done on benalf of that class of men who made their living on the dangerous deep. If some hon. gentleman who lived in Ontario, and who probably never saw a fishing smack in their life, had only the opportunity of witnessing the sad sight of taking up a dozen dead bodies at one time—all dead on account of the absence of proper harbor accommodation—they might change their opinions somewhat. The country was expending large sums of money for the purpose of building up an army, but if ever we went to war, we would also require the assistance of a navy, and there was no class in this country upon whom we could depend in that emergency, but the fishermen. He hoped that the appropriation would not be expended on the Baie Verte Canal, but that the money would be devoted to improving the harbors of the Maritime Provinces and developing their fishing industry.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said, after the speech the House had just listened to, he was forced to give credit to a rumor he had heard outside that an arrangement had been come to between the Government and some of their supporters who had formerly favored the construction of the work to oppose this appropriation. This seemed almost incredible after the Government had announced the measure in the Speech from the Throne, after having sent an engineer to examine and report upon the work, and after they had submitted to the House a sum which they had apparently proposed to expend upon it. They had also invited contractors to go to a remote section of the country for the purpose of being prepared to tender for the work, and he expected that the pledge they had thus given to the House and to the country would not be lightly broken. If the little piece of by-play they had just winessed signified anything, it singnified that the Government had been trifling with the people on a very important question. He repudiated the idea that he advocated the construction of this canal because it was a work affecting the Maritime Provinces, and referred to the opinions of the Dominion Board of Trade, the Canal Commission, and the Press of the entire Dominion, all of whom had united in urging its early construction, to shew that any expenditure of public money upon it was not only approved but worthy of approval. The canal would be less than twenty miles in length; it would pass through a level portion of country, and would be easily constructed. It would connect the waters of the St. Lawrence with those of the Bay of Fundy. It would bring Toronto, Montreal, and Quebec 300 miles nearer New York than any other possible water route, and these great commercial centres would each of them be brought nearer to Portland by 400 miles, and to St. John, N. B., by 500 miles. It was not surprising that all the people and all the interests of this country with one voice demanded the construction of this work, for the Confederation of the Provinces was worse than useless if we could not arrange for welding and consolidating the public sentiment and commercial interests of the various Provinces by such means as this. It would have the effect of drawing closer commercial communication between the Provinces. It would effect a great saving in freight charges, and half a million tons of shipping, on the most moderate estimate, would annually pass through it. He would not ask the House to sanction so large an expenditure as this unless the objects to be attained were national objects, although he could quite understand that there were gentlemen in this House who took a sectional view of the matter, and would oppose it from considerations other than those which ought to engage the minds of statesmen. He contended that if the Government had asked for tenders for the construction of the canal, and had laid those tenders before Parliament, they would have been excellent data from which to arrive at an estimate of the probable expenditure. He further believed that that estimate would be very much lower than appeared to be anticipated. Mr. KEEFER, one of the ablest canal engineers in the country, sustained by Mr. GZOWSKI, had staked his reputation upon the statement that the work would be executed for less than one-half of the amount estimated by the engineer of the Public Works Department. He believed that Mr. PAGE had taken a strong dislike to the construction of this work. Probably the late Government were somewhat to blame for this, for he (Mr. TUPPER) had a firm impression that Mr. PAGE was offended at having been overlooked when the Canal Commission was formed. He gave Mr. PAGE credit for the most thorough honesty and the possession of the highest professional attainments, and, where his prejudices had not been aroused, he (Mr. TUPPER) would place the most complete confidence in his judgment; but in this case he believed his prejudice and disappointment had prevented him from giving this work that fair and dispassionate consideration which it would otherwise have had at his hands. He (Mr. TUPPER) hoped that the impressions he had received regarding the intentions of the Government and the observations he had thought it necessary to make to-night would turn out to be unfounded. He hoped that the Government had not been trifling with the House and the country, and that they had not placed this sum on the estimates with the tacit understanding that a large number of their followers who had formerly sustained it were prepared to vote it down. He trusted, on the other hand, that the Government was really serious, and that they would make up for valuable time lost in the past by a vigorous prosecution of the work in the future.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness) said the hon. member for Cumberland could not have read the last report made by the Engineer in Chief.' If he had he would not have said that all the eminent engineers advocated the construction of this work. Mr. PAGE's whole report abounded with expressions as to the impracticability and inutility of the work, and he condemned, in the strongest terms, the plans of Mr. KEEFER, while Mr. KEEFER on the other hand, condemned Mr. PAGE's plans. Was it not, therefore, the duty of every hon. gentleman in this House to pause before passing this vote. The hon. member had spoken of the trade that would spring up between Toronto and Montreal and the Atlantic ports. What was that trade? There should be no Utopian ideas on this question. It should be dealt with as a practical business matter before embarking on an expenditure of this kind. He contended that vessels would rather keep out at sea and travel 250 miles further than use this canal, and encounter the dangers of the Bay of Fundy.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the member for Cumberland had stated broadly that at least 500,000 tons of shipping would pass through this canal annually if it were constructed. Would the hon. gentleman supply the data on which this statement was founded? If he could be satisfied that anything approaching that amount would pass through the canal all the misgivings he now had as to its execution would vanish, and he would join the hon. gentleman in pressing for the commencement of this work. But it was simply no means of making such an estimate that he doubted the wisdom of constructing the canal. He had looked in vain for data supplied in reports submitted to Parliament, in reports of boards of trade and articles in the press.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said this subject had engaged the attention of Boards of Trade, the Canal Commission and various engineers who made it their special business to investigate these points. After most careful examination and investigation by these parties, it had been estimated that not less than 500,000 tons of shipping would annually pass through the canal. He would also refer the hon. member for Chateauguay to the best informed newspaper supporting the Administration in the Lower Provinces—the St. John Telegraph. That journal, in a very elaborate article, estimated that 500,000 tons of shipping would immediately require to use the canal. He (Mr. TUPPER) had read these calculations very carefully and found they were not exaggerated. No persons in the world formed more accurate views as to the traffic that would pass over a public work they were engaged in the construction of, than engineers. Mr. PAGE himself stated to him (Mr. TUPPER) that the canal as proposed would not be equal to the traffic that would offer for it. He took that, coming from a gentleman not disposed to recommend any hasty expenditure for this work, as reliable. The most successful commercial men Canada had known advised the construction of that work. Every source to which this House could look for reliable information had joined in urging the building of the canal as a work which would be attended by the greatest commercial results. It was impossible in a work like this to estimate correctly the amount of traffic that would be required at first. It had always been found that they enormously increased trade. One of the arguments against Confederation was that there was no trade between them. But the trade over the Grand Trunk Railway via Portland alone had since grown from $300,000 to $3,000,000. Our statistics did not furnish us any figures as to the increase of inter-Provincial trade by the political union, but if they could be obtained, he believed they would astonish the House. The enormous fleet of American fishing vessels would alone contribute very considerably to the 500,000 tons that would use the canal.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he never had the advantage of reading the articles in the St. John Telegraph, but he had examined most of the reports that had appeared in relation to this proposed work, and he had not found any business-like statement of the traffic that was likely to seek that channel if it should be opened for traffic—no statement of the kind of traffic, the number of barrels of flour for instance, that would go to the West Indies.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the newspaper he had just sent over to the hon. gentleman showed that the Board of Trade estimated that 700,000 barrels of flour would pass through the canal.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he would like to know where it was to go. It was exceedingly unlikely that flour would seek the Gulf of St Lawrence in order to get into the Bay of Fundy and thence go South. Of course this proposed canal was entirely off the route to Western Europe, where most of our flour went, and from which most of our ocean traffic flowed into the St. Lawrence. What he would like to see, and what all the speculative advocates of this work never condescended to give—unless this paper which the hon.

gentleman had sent him did—was some business-like statement of the traffic—not so much the volume of traffic as the kind of traffic, which might be sent through this channel. As to fishing smacks seeking this channel, he knew very little personally of that business, but he had grave doubts whether this canal would lie in their path at all or to any considerable extent. The only traffic it appeared to him that could flow through this canal was the traffic in produce and lumber from the interior of this continent to the southern portions of the continent, and to South America and the West Indies, and the return product of those countries that might be required here; and a very simple calculation made by any one familiar with the business of transportation, as conducted on this continent, would show that that canal would be entirely off the line of such traffic as could be advantageously carried on between the valley of the Great Lakes and the southern parts of this continent and the West Indies. Such was his conviction, and he had never yet seen any paper that really grappled with this, the kernel of the subject, if he correctly apprehended it.

Mr. DOMVILLLE pointed out that it would be impossible for traffic to go from the interior of this country to the south by way of this canal, when the canals were only twelve feet deep. The foreign trade would sooner seek the the Gut of Canso. As regards the traffic in flour, it should be remembered that before Confederation, out of 710,000 barrels of flour that were imported into the Lower Provinces 700,000 came from the States, and 10,000 only from Canada; but now only 10,000 came from the States and 700,000 from Canada. As to return cargos they would be made up of fish, coal, plaster, &c. It was a necessary sequence of Confederation that the best possible facilities should be provided for the interchange of products between the various Provinces, and without it Confederation could not be successful. At present the freight from Great Britain to Quebec and Montreal was $2.50 per ton, while the railways charged $6 a ton from St. John to Montreal. This showed the necessity of having water communication. He thought the Government should not put a grant in the estimates year after year if they did not intend really to go on with the work.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Cumberland seemed to think that there was nothing to prevent the Government from having tenders for this work ready to be laid before the House as an authoritative statement of its probable cost. Now, he could assure the hon. gentleman that if he would call at his office he would satisfy him that every possible effort had been made to get the plans ready, in order that estimates might be obtained early in October. They had reason to expect that Mr. BAILLAIRGE, who had charge of this business, and had given his entire attention to it for months, would have been able to have had his plans in such a state in January as that tenders might be asked for. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) pressed the matter upon him and upon the other officers of the Department, in order to have this done, if possible, for he felt that if Mr. BAILLAIRGE'S and Mr. PAGE'S estimate of the work was correct it would be a very serious undering for the result. He felt very much the want of satisfactory information as to the commercial advantages of this canal, and he applied to Mr. PAGE for information of that kind. He was surprised to hear the member for Cumberland say that he had obtained information of that nature from Mr. PAGE, for Mr. PAGE had told him (Mr. MACKENZIE) that he had utterly failed to find any sources of information on the subject. Looking at the work geographically, it did seem as if it was a work that might accomplish a great deal That there were tidal influences in the Bay of Fundy that made the work peculiarly difficult no one could deny. It was an exceptional work; there was nothing like it in the world. The tide at low water being from 35 to 40 feet at one end and from 5 to 9 feet at the other, was a state of things that made it peculiarly difficult either to design or execute the work. Looking at the estimate of Mr. BAILLAIRGE of the cost of the work he was quite sure it was within reasonable bounds. He knew from the cost of works that had been executed within the last two years, and from the schedules of recent contracts that the prices estimated by Mr. BAILLAIRGE were much below these which the Government were paying at the present time. As would be seen by his report he (Mr.

BAILLAIRGE) estimated the excavation in loam and clay, and dredging in sand, at 30 cents, whereas 30 cents was the minimum price which they had paid for dredging. Some went as high as 50 and 60 cents, although in ordinary dredging of that kind they occasionally got work done as low as 25 cents, but that was under the most favorable circumstances. Excavations in sand Mr. BAILLAIRGE estimated at 20 cents; in fluid muck at 10 cents, and in rock 50 cents. Now, when he would tell the House that in the neighborhood of this city, in the ordinary limestone of the Ottawa Valley, they had been compelled to pay as high as $2 for excavation they would see how reasonable Mr. BAILLAIRGE's estimate was. With regard to the estimates for bridging and the piers at the termini, he had not the means of testing them by schedule prices to learn what the actual cost might be; but if the quantities were correct he thought it probable the estimate was within the mark. The piers would require to be built of stone in the most substantial manner. They would enclose what would be practically a tidal harbor because it would be impossible for a vessel to rush into the lock with such a tide behind her as there is on the Bay of Fundy. All these matters would require careful consideration. The Government had acted in perfect good faith. They considered that if it was possible to execute the work at prices corresponding somewhat with Mr. KEEFER's estimate, which originally was three and a half millions, and subsequently five millions, it might be a very considerable advantage to do so. He had inquired very particularly about the ordinary trade of the Gulf. The cruise of that trade was chiefly to South America, the West Indies, and Europe, and he had no doubt whatever in his own mind that that trade would seek an outlet by the ordinary channels now pursued by vessels; but that there would be a large local trade from the parts adjacent to the canal was possibly as little doubtful. Whether that local trade would be of such dimensions as to fairly call for the execution of the work was a question that the Government and the House would have to consider. He was not at all sure but that it might be advisable that a commission of experienced men should be appointed, not to decide upon the canal itself, but upon the probable amount of commerce which might seek an outlet through the canal. In the meantime, they proposed as soon as the plans were ready to call for tenders, and if these tenders bore any reasonable relation to the estimates that were formed by the gentleman whom the hon. member for Cumberland had characterized as a hydraulic engineer of very high character, they might be able to act upon the authority which the House would give them. He thought it was but respectful to the hon. gentleman opposite that he should answer his remarks so far and afford to the House the fullest information of the course the Government had adopted in the matter. Whether their views were right or wrong they had endeavored faithfully to ascertain all that could be ascertained in relation to this matter; and this estimate was placed before the House with the understanding that it was to this extent conditional that if they found that the ideas entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite and which seemed to be entertained by the House were not realized when they obtained the statements of practical men, then the question was one that must be opened for consideration.

Mr. PLUMB said he had endeavored, but without effect, to ascertain whether it was the intention of the Government to adopt the Baie Verte Canal project as part of their policy. If the Government did not intend to do so, why should a sum appear in the estimates. The hon. First Minister had spoken of tidal influences. There were ocean tides and political tides, and the Government might have found it necessary to keep the item in the estimates, in order to keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope. The fair and manly way of dealing with the question was for the Government to come forward and announce whether they intended the canal to be built or not; but the explanations offered by the hon. First Minister only rendered matters more obscure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said he quite concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland, that it was high time this question was disposed of, and that the policy of the Government with respect to the expenditure on the Baie Verte Canal should be settled by an expression of the opinion of the House. He, however, repudiated the charge made by the hon. member that some hon. members, at the request of the Government, opposed the appropriation with a view of preventing the expenditure of the sum placed in the estimates. It was known to members from Nova Scotia that from the very initiation of that project the hon. member for Cumberberland stood alone in the position he assumed among the representatives of that Province. Last year the Nova Scotia members addressed a memorial to the Government requesting them to stay their action, and not make any appropriation for the purposes of the canal. But when the present Government took office they found that the question had been dealt with as a Government measure by their predecessors, and that the hon. member for Cumberland, doubtless aware of the great advantage which would accrue to his county from the canal being constructed through it, had succeeded so far in inducing the Government to incorporate the construction of the canal into their public policy as to obtain an appropriation of half a million dollars for that purpose. He (Mr. JONES) could well understand that the present Government knowing they had to contend against the opinion which the hon. member for Cumberland had sought to create in the Maritime Provinces, that the people of Ontario and the Reform party were less favorable to the Maritime Provinces than were the Government of which the hon. member for Cumberland was a member, might not even from political considerations be disposed to remove the appropriation from the estimates at the commencement of their term of office. Personally, however, he would have been better pleased if the Government had reconsidered the whole question, and struck out the grant. To the argument that the project should be carried out because it was approved by the Dominion Board of Trade, he replied that the members of such boards represented some particular hobby or idea, and in the consideration of public questions arrived at conclusions which, while satisfactory to themselves, were not satisfactory to the mass of the people. The Dominion Board of Trade had made certain recommendations in favor of adding an additional portfolio to the Government, and also respecting the Washington Treaty. It was well known, however, that the Dominion Board was engaged in opposing the treaty, and, although there was a small clique in Halifax who were opposed to it, yet there would not have been a member from Nova Scotia found voting against the treaty if it had come before the House. The hon. member for Cumberland next argued that the construction of the canal would shorten the route between Montreal and New York. But any trade between those points would never follow the intricate and dangerous navigation of the Bay of Fundy, but the vessels would stand out to sea and avoid that difficult navigation. Again, it was said that a New Brunswick editor had said half a million tons of shipping would annually pass through the Baie Verte Canal. But the moment that the statement was subjected to criticism it appeared that the total had included all the shipping trading in the Bay of Fundy. It was argued by the hon. member for King's County that if the canal was constructed the cost of the transport of coal from the Lower Provinces to Canada would be cheapened. The whole coal fields of Nova Scotia, except Spring Hill and a few small mines, were on this side of Pictou and Cape Breton, and, therefore, no advantage or disadvantage would be derived from the construction of the canal. Another argument used was that it was difficult to estimate the great volume of trade which would follow if the canal were once built, and the House was asked to look at the amount of trade done by the Maritime Provinces now and before the Union. This point was, however, capable of explanation. When the people of the Maritime Provinces went into the Union there was a tariff of $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in operation. Since then the tariff had been more than doubled, and under it the Maritime Provinces were shut out from the English markets by a Chinese wall of protection, which the policy of Canada had thrown around the Dominion, and they were compelled to come to Ontario and Quebec and open trade with them. The Maritime Provinces did not receive any more goods now than before the Union. As a representative of Nova Scotia he advised the Government—and the whole of the representatives of Nova Scotia in the House would concur in this opinion—not to expend seven millions of dollars upon a work which in no way compensated for the outlay. He was also satisfied that the fair-minded people of New Brunswick, as well as those of his own Province, would support the view that if the Government had so large an amount of money at its disposal it should be expended on useful public works which would prove of public advantage. He did not object to the course pursued by the hon. First Minister because it was a safe one ; and one by which the Government would become satisfied that the views he had expressed were correct. The more the project was examined the more fully would the Government become satisfied that the scheme should not be proceeded with ; and the more completely public opinion in the Maritime Provinces was ascertained the more thoroughly would the Government be satisfied that they should not again submit any appropriation for the Baie Verte Canal to the House.

Mr. CAUCHON called attention to the fact that the engineer's estimate last year placed the cost of the work at eight million dollars, which before the work was completed would no doubt rise to thirteen or fourteen millions. In return for that expenditure the country would get a canal which could only be entered at the fifth hour of the tide. There was a difference of forty four feet in the tides between the Bay of Fundy and the Gulf. According to all reliable reports the quantity of mud which would be carried in the locks, fi the canal was opened before the fourth hour of the tide, would fill up the works, and a dredging machine would have to be employed to clean out the canal. The reports of PAGE and BAILLAIRGE who surveyed two hundred superficial miles to obtain, if possible, a practicable route, went to show that climatic difficulties, such as winds and tides, were altogether antagonistic to the enterprise. Of course, with an ample supply of money, it was possible to remove mountains, but in respect to this canal we could not obtain a practical result if it was supposed that neither the Gulf trade to Europe or the United States would pass through the canal. The vessels would have to wait four hours at each end of the canal, and the canal could be navigated only twelve hours out of twenty-four. Then suppose the work cost twelve millions, which was the lowest possible calculation, the interest on the money and the expense of keeping the work in repair would add another million to the cost. He hoped the Government would not spend a cent until they were convinced that they would be remunerated for the outlay. This canal, if constructed, would be of service only twelve hours in twenty-four. Was that a work on which millions should be expended—a canal filled with mud every day ? If the hon. member for Cumberland could show that this work would give a return for the outlay, he did not mean a direct and immediate commercial result, but that it would develop the resources of the country—he would support it. But it would be found that the work was impracticable and the money would be lost.

Mr. MCKAY (Cape Breton) said the representatives of Nova Scotia felt it was not their duty to allow their feelings in connection with their own province to override their duty to the Dominion at large. It would not be right for them to mislead the people of the other Provinces and induce them to consent to place a large amount in the estimates to build a canal which they believed would be of no national benefit to the Dominion. One engineer reported that the canal would cost between fourteen and fifteen millions of dollars, others that it would cost five or six millions. When the immense difficulties in the way of constructing it were taken into consideration, it would be found that it would take the larger amount. In the Bay of Fundy the tide rises forty or fifty feet ; on the other side, only five or six feet. Any one could see the difficulty of constructing a canal under such circumstances. Then, again, the navigation of the Bay of Fundy was very difficult, and was rendered more so by heavy fogs. It was stated that 500,000 tons of shipping would pass annually through this canal. Where were they to come from ? They must come from the Gulf or from United States ports, but such vessels would pass through the Straits of Canso, the highway of nations, which was open all winter when the canal would be closed. Did any one suppose that the 700,000 barrels of flour sent to the Lower Provinces would go to the Bay of Fundy, the only place that would be served by this canal ? There was a very serious obstacle in the way of building the canal, in the fact that the locks would fill up with sand, and every time they would be opened to allow a vessel to pass through, it would take hours and sometimes days to clear out the sand. This question had now, to a certain extent, been ventilated in this House. The discussion of last session had set hon. members thinking on the subject, and it seemed to him that the sentiment of this House was pretty generally against the passage of this amount. The suggestion of the Premier was remarkably good, and it would be wise for this House before committing itself to this appropriation to inquire by a commission into the advisability of building that canal. If it could be shown that the advantages which it was said would accrue to the nation at large would result from it, then construct the canal, but until this House was assured that it was of national importance, it would be unwise to spend any money at all in so speculative a work as the construction of a canal to connect the Bay of Fundy with the gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. PALMER attributed the opposition to this scheme to the rivalry of Halifax and the other ports on the east coast of Nova Scotia. When it was urged that the money required for this work should be expended in constructing harbors of refuge to prevent loss of life on the dangerous coast of Nova Scotia, he could not help thinking that it would be better to build this canal, so as to prevent the necessity of navigating such a coast. If this canal were constructed every barrel of flour now carried via Portland to St. John would go by way of Baie Verte. At the Quebec conference, although the very words were not in the agreement, it was understood that a more convenient avenue for trade should be given than existed.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—That meant the Intercolonial Railroad.

Mr. PALMER said it meant more, the Intercolonial being the subject of a distinct agreement. Putting aside the trade of the West Indies, the canal would have the traffic of the Bay of Fundy with a coast line of six hundred miles, and the United States coast trade between New Brunswick and New York, 600 miles more—a total of 1,200 miles on the South. On the North there was the trade of Prince Edward Island, the coast of New Brunswick and Newfoundland—a coast line of 1,500 miles. A great deal of the trade of Prince Edward Island now carried by rail to St. John could be carried cheaper by water. He predicted that the trade passing through this canal would increase one hundred per cent. in five years. Its construction, instead of hindering those of Western Canada, would forward them in the course of time. It was useless to ask him for statistics, as his hon. friend from Chateauguay had done, and it would just have been about as appropriate to ask for statistics in reference to the Welland Canal when the Niagara Falls made commerce between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, an impossibility, as did the isthmus between the Bay of Fundy and the waters of the St. Lawrence. However, there was no one knew every foot of the country more thoroughly than he (Mr. PALMER) did, and had he expected to be called upon to give statistics, he would have been in readiness to do so. The trade from St. John, in "small lumber," or building lumber, which was used along the American coast very extensively, was an article which was very largely exported. Here that class of timber was burned, because there was no market for it, and he anticipated that were this canal constructed, we should have an immense trade from the west in this same material. He denied that the Bay of Fundy was characterized by any such storms and high tides as had been represented, and asserted that he had never, in the course of thirty years, known a single life to be lost or a single valuable vessel to be wrecked upon its coast. The tide, he believed, did not exceed three miles an hour. Its navigation was the best in the world. He defended Boards of Trade from the allegation that they were picked for particular purposes, contended that they fairly represented the different interests of the country, and considered that upon a point of this nature their judgment was better than that of most men. He felt sure, unless the Government intended to proceed with this work, that they would not have mentioned it in the Speech from the Throne. The country westward from the Bay of Fundy was deeply interested in this work, and although the country to the eastward was naturally hostile to it, he sincerely trusted the Government would not be deterred from proceeding with it.

Mr. MACKAY (Cape Breton) denied on his own behalf, as he thought he could do the same on behalf of the other members from Nova Scotia, that he had ever heard the suggestion mentioned by the hon. member for St. John and the hon. members for Cumberland, with regard to the probable channel into which the money voted for the canal would be diverted in case it were not immediately used for that purpose.

Mr. KILLAM said the memorial alluded to was merely drawn up in order to show the Government that there was no pressing necessity for the immediate construction of the canal and that the money would be better expended in other parts of the Dominion, notably on railways in Nova Scotia. He was not opposed to the construction of the canal, and he was not prepared to say that there would be no trade passing through it if it were constructed, but neither could he agree with the hon. members for Cumberland and St. John that the question must be settled now. In a case of the kind where there were two bodies of water with so little land dividing them, there would always be some people, and especially some politicians, who would like to unite them, but it was a matter which required grave consideration. If the canal were in operation there must be a certain amount of local traffic pass over it. In twenty years, and likely in less time, if the harbors on the western shore of Nova Scotia were properly looked after, there would be a considerable coal trade to the St. Lawrence and American ports, in connection with which it would be found advantageous to use this canal. Prince Edward Island would also necessarily benefit by it. He urged that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway eastward to Lewisburg was a much more important matter to the Dominion than the building of this canal, and there were other works to which preference should be given. He was not satisfied with the surveys that had been made, and thought there was a good deal of force in Mr. KEEFER's suggestion as to the comparative merits of a half and three-quarters tide canal. The whole question, he repeated, required a great deal of consideration.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that when the memorial was drawn up it was with the understanding that the money should be appropriated for other purposes?

Mr. KILLAM said he had not intended to convey that impression. His own object at the time had been to impress upon the Government that it was not necessary to proceed immediately with the construction of the Baie Verte Canal.

Mr. McDONNELL denied that there was any understanding with the Government as had been alleged. The circular referred to was a mere remonstrance against the construction of the Baie Verte Canal and nothing more. The question was dealt with entirely upon its own merits.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said he was rather surprised at the warmth with which some hon. gentlemen discussed this question. It would seem to indicate that there was an apprehension that if this canal was built it would draw some of the trade that now was enjoyed by some of the gentlemen who opposed this work. This was a question which had agitated the public mind in the Lower Provinces for forty or fifty years. The practicability of the work had been disputed. He confessed he had always had very grave doubts as to its practicability, but he never had any doubts as to its utility. He did not wish to take up the time of the Committee, but merely to state that he was willing to leave the matter with the Government in order that they might fully investigate it. He did not wish to urge upon the Government any public work that was not for the advantage of the whole Dominion. If this work was proved to be not for the advantage of the Dominion and not practicable he would say do not undertake it; but he hoped the Government would not be diverted from their course by the opposition of those who had a sectional interest in opposing this work. The trade returns showed that there were 7,500 coasting vessels that would use this canal if it was constructed, and these represented a very large trade. If it was decided that the work was praticable he had no doubt that it could be proved to the satisfaction of the House that it would be to the advantage of the whole Dominion.

Mr. FORBES said he was pleased with the suggestion of the Premier that a commission should be appointed to examine into the advantages of this canal from a commercial point of view. He himself thought that the canal would be built at some future day, but whether the business that it would now serve would warrant the expenditure of the very large sum of money that would be required to build this canal, was a question which required a great deal of consideration. It was difficult for individual members to say what would be the effect of this canal upon trade. There was no doubt that there were serious obstacles in the way of the construction of this canal, owing to the fact that there were extraordinery high tides at one end, and very low tides at the other. It would, undoubtedly, cost an immense sum of money, and whether that sum of money could be spent to greater advantage for the whole Dominion on some other public works, was a question for the Government to consider. Very little had been said about the difficulties of the navigation of the Bay of Fundy; but he could speak from experience when he stated they were very serious. He was surprised to hear the hon. member for St. John say there had been no wrecks on the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. PALMER—I said between St. John and the head of the Bay of Fundy. The danger is between the entrance of the Bay and St. John.

Mr. FORBES—Are there any vessels that go up there at all?

Mr. PALMER—Ask the people who live along there.

Mr. FORBES proceeded to say that this canal, if built, could never be used during six months in the year, and he doubted the propriety of spending so large a sum of money on a canal which would have to be idle half the year. The hon. member for St. John attributed motives to the members for Nova Scotia, in this matter, which were entirely unfounded in fact. They had no motives other than those which led them to regard the interests of the whole country. He would be very glad to see this canal built, but not at the present time, and he therefore was glad that the Government did not intend to hurry on the work but that they were to take time to give the whole subject the fullest consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR said the frequent appearance of a vote in the estimates for this work, and the many attempts to postpone operations on it, showed that the whole subject required a great deal of consideration. He thought the House should be grateful to the representatives from Ontario who had taken the position that if this work was proved feasible and practical it should be proseeuted, but if not it should be dropped. It was very difficult for any one to estimate the volume of trade that would be served by this canal, because the increased facilities which it would afford would enhance the volume of trade to an extent that could not now be estimated. St. John was growing very fast, and the trade of that section of the country was largest and most rapidly carried on in the fall of the year; the very time when navigation around Nova Scotia was dangerous, and therefore if the canal were built a great many coasting vessels would use it in the fall of the year. He was very doubtful, from the reports about the practicability of the work. If he was satisfied on that point, he would have no hesitation in voting for the appropriation, because he had not the slightest doubt that it would be a great advantage to the trade of the Maritime Provinces, and also to some extent to the Upper Provinces. This work should not be looked upon as a sectional but as a a national work. If the canal was built it would be found that enterprising men in New Brunswick would build steamers adapted to it to run through to the American coast, and a trade would spring up that could not at present be estimated. The only point he was in doubt about was as to whether the work could be constructed for anything like a reasonable sum, and in order to settle that point he thought the Government were wise in taking more time to acquire more accurate and fuller information.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had listened with very great attention to the opinions expressed by gentlemen from various parts of the Lower Provinces, but he saw no reason to modify what he had stated a little while ago. He then stated that he had most serious doubts as to the practicability of the work, but as to that they must be guided by the opinions of eminent engineers. If, when the plans were completed and tenders received, the cost was found to be reasonable, it would then be a matter for consideration as to what extent the Government should go in executing the work. He proposed making further enquiries as to the practicability of the work. As soon as the engineer had completed his plans, they proposed to ask for tenders and to ascertain in this practical manner what the cost would be, and to take other means to ascertain the extent to which the commerce of the country would be benefited by the canal. He thought after this statement the Committee should leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and he could assure them that the interests of the country and the opinions expressed to-night would be fully considered.

Mr. OLIVER asked if it was the intention of the Government, should they find this work practicable and feasible, to spend any part of this appropriation before the next meeting of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that part of the money would necessarily be expended, though it was not likely any very large portion of it would be spent. But if it was found that commerce would be largely benefited by the canal, and that it could be built for a sum approaching the estimate of Mr. KEEFER, he thought the work might fairly be considered a practicable one. If on the other hand the cost would approach the sum mentioned by Mr. PAGE he thought it would be necessary to pause in the matter and obtain fuller information and a more decided expression of the opinion of Parliament before proceeding with the work.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he did not intend to enter into a discussion of the merits of the canal project, because that point was settled by the engineers' reports, now before the House. Although the various engineers who had examined into the subject differed with respect to the means to accomplish the work, they were all agreed that it was a work which could be satisfactorily constructed by the Government. He deeply regretted the statement of the First Minister that the Government did not intend immediately to proceed with the work. He disapproved of the practice of placing a large sum in the estimates if it was not intended that the money should be used, and such a course, he did not think, was constitutional. The position taken by the Government to-night indicated that they had determined to abandon the work, and he regarded such a position with very deep regret. The Baie Verte Canal would not only be of benefit to the adjacent sections of country, but it would confer great advantage to the trade of Montreal and Toronto, and indeed of the whole Dominion. The late Administration were satisfied from the reports they had received of the feasibility of the work, and so far had the matter gone, that had it not been for the action of some gentlemen, now on the Ministerial benches, the work would have been under consideration before the late Administration went out of office. He desired to hear from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Customs, explanations as to the action they pursued. The people of New Brunswick had not been treated fairly in respect to this public work.

Mr. GILLMOR said he was fully satisfied with the explanations of the hon. Premier, which were very reasonable. He was surprised at the united opposition offered to the proposed vote, no member for Nova Scotia having expressed himself in favor of the canal. He judged from the remarks of the hon. Premier that the Government had taken this work in charge nevertheless, he did not desire to see millions of dollars expended on a work if it should appear that it was not in the public interest. He hoped the Government would not blot out the item from the estimate, but that the necessary information would be obtained as indicated by the hon. the First Minister.

Mr. GOUDGE adverting to the reference made to the unanimity of the Nova Scotia members in opposition to the proposed vote, declared, as one of those members, that there was no union on his part with any of the members to oppose the vote. He approached the question with a great deal of diffidence, and if he was not ready to-night to state distinctly a wish that the item should pass, it was because the magnitude of the interests involved, required that he should give the question very serious consideration. He was much gratified with the explanation of the hon. First Minister, which must prove satisfactory to the House. There were two questions involved in the appropriation now under discussion:—First, the cost; second the advantage to be derived therefrom. It was proposed to ascertain the first by inviting tenders, whereby the Administration would be able to learn the cost of the work. By the appointment of a commission, as was proposed, an approximate calculation could be arrived at as to what would be the probable amount of shipping passing through the canal. In regard to the fogs and tides spoken of as existing in the Bay of Fundy, he was able to state that there had scarcely been a life lost in that bay within his memory. A ship might leave a point at the head of the Bay of Fundy and proceed to St. John at the rate of four miles an hour, and it would be hardly possible to run her on a rock, even if it was desired to do so. The representatives of the Maritime Provinces would not ask the House and the country to engage in any enormous outlay unless it would be demonstrated that the expenditure of the public money would be beneficial to the people of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that this item for the construction of an important public work — important especially in point of expense—had for a long time appeared in the estimates, and he regarded it as the settled policy of the country, which at any rate he was not prepared to dispute, that an equal amount, supposing the Baie Verte Canal should not be constructed, should be expended for some public purpose of national importance in the Maritime Provinces. He thought that the people of Ontario—he spoke now only for his own constituency—would sustain him in the statement that it having been the settled policy of Parliament, for a considerable number of years, that a large expenditure should take place upon this work they would be agreeable if it were proved to be unreasonable or impracticable to carry such work out—to an equal amount being expended in some other public works in which the Dominion had an interest. Therefore so far as he was concerned, speaking for his constituency, the only question he had to consider was whether that particular work was a fit one on which to expend the funds of the Dominion; upon that question he did not express any opinion. He thought it would not be becoming in him to solve the question which from the statement of the leader of the Government it appeared was not ripe for settlement, the necessary information to that end not being yet forthcoming. But it did seem to him, while he agreed to the expenditure of that sum of money on that or some other public work of national importance in that quarter, that he ought not to be called upon to agree to the expenditure of that amount of money on this public work until there was a case before the House on which Parliament could safely pronounce. Now he did not understand that the House was asked to pronounce in favor of the construction of that canal at this time upon the evidence before it. He understood it to be said that the evidence was not such upon all the points as would justify the Government in committing itself to the prosecution of that work absolutely, and until the evidence was in such a state as would justify the Government of this country in asking Parliament to make such an appropriation, he did not think Parliament ought to be asked to do it. He thought the true position to take in the present state of the case was this—that the Government ought to take such a vote as was necessary in order that the investigations which the hon., the First Minister, had stated he was about to institute might be carried forward; and the House ought to be left perfectly free and unpledged as to whether $6,300,000 of the money of this country should be spent on that work.

Mr. McDONNELL (Iverness) said he did not propose to offer any resolution to the House when in committee, but on concurrence being taken he would probably submit a motion in order that it might be generalized. Entertaining the opinion that he did on this question, he could not accept the proposition made by the First Minister because the work would be useless whether it was practicable or not. Holding these views he felt satisfied that no inquiry as to the necessary outlay, and the practicability of the work, would convince him that it should be carried out, and he was determined therefore to oppose the passage of the item on every occasion when it came before the House.

Mr. CAUCHON asked if the statements made by the hon. member for South Bruce were to be taken as in any way indicating the policy resolved upon by the late Government, or as indicating the policy of the present Government. He was not going to bind himself to say that because a certain amount of money had been voted for a certain object, it must be expended whether that object was practicable or not, as compensation for abandoning it.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said his remark was that speaking for himself and his own constituents he was content if that particular object turned out to be impracticable, and if there were objects of national importance in that section, to vote an equal amount towards those objects. He spoke merely for himself and not for the hon. member for Quebec.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK dissented from the view of the Premier that it was a Constitutional principle to vote large amounts of money which the Administration claimed the power to expend on the report of a commission. The correct principle was that the report of that commission should be laid before this House, which alone should determine how the money should be voted. When he found hon. gentlemen opposite asking the House to pledge themselves not only to an expenditure of $1,000,000, but of $6,800,000, an outlay which from past experience he believed would not fall short of $10,000,000, he contended this expenditure should not be hastily incurred. This work was of a most doubtful character. Mr. PAGE reported Mr. KEEFER'S plan as most impracticable and foolish; Mr. KEEFER reported similarly on Mr. PAGE'S plans. If there were any other reports on the subject they should be submitted to Parliament, and this House should decide whether the work should be proceeded with or not. He dissented entirely from the view that by putting this vote in the estimates the country was pledged to give to the Province, either for this work or for some other works, an equal amount if they should be considered of national importance. If there were works of national importance to be undertaken, they should be constructed whether this Baie Verte Canal was built or not, but he did not say that because this work did not go on they must get a similar sum. Though the hon. member for South Bruce did not use the word "compensation," his language bore that inference. He did not approve of that principle. He intended to vote against this appropriation, but would cheerfully vote for placing money in the hands of the Administration to inquire into the practicability of the work.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked the Committee at present to pass this vote, and on concurrence upon the vote the Government would be prepared with some distinct proposition on the subject.

The item was carried,

Item 85, public buildings at Ottawa, $375,125, was carried.

On item 86, improvement of navigable rivers, $56,000,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked what steps had been taken towards the removal of chains and anchors from the St. Lawrence.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was found very difficult to get a suitable vessel built. However, the work would be accomplished very rapidly in the spring.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if the Government intended to dredge Wallace River?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the only dredge suited for the work, the Capé Breton, had been engaged all the season in other parts of Nova Scotia. The work would be done as soon as possible.

Mr. RYAN asked if the item voted last year for the improvement of the navigation of Red River, Manitoba, had been expended?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—A portion of it.

Mr. RYAN—Will the remainder of it be expended?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is not required, I believe.

M. CIMON : L'hon. Premier Ministre me permettra de lui poser de nouveau une question que je lui ai déjà faite, pour lui demander si c'est l'intention du Gouvernement d'améliorer cette partie du Saguenay appelée le "Bras de Chicoutimi." Il existe en cet endroit une batture longue d'un mille et large de 10 à 15 pieds, et ce n'est que depuis un certain temps que les bateaux à vapeur s'aventurent trois fois par semaine à marée haute, jusqu'à Chicoutimi. Si le Gouvernement prenait ce sujet sous sa considération, et qu'il n'en coutât pas trop cher pour faire cette amélioration, il ferait un grand bien à la cause de la colonisation dans les districts de Chicoutimi et du Saguenay, qui constituent un des endroits les plus importants du pays. Tout ce que je demande c'est qu'un ingénieur visite cet endroit et y consacre quelques jours à faire un examen sérieux de cette partie de la rivière du Saguenay qui a besoin d'être débarrassée de cette batture. Les ingénieurs sont payés par tout le pays, et il me semble que Chicoutimi peut aussi bien requérir leurs serivces que les autres parties du pays. Il n'y a rien dans les estimés pour Chicoutimi, et il n'est que juste que le Gouvernement accède à cette demande.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that instructions had been given the engineer to make a report on it.

The item was passed.

On item 87, Lake Superior and Red River route, $100,000,

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether the Government intend to give the contract for the Dawson Route to the same parties who had it last year.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it had been given them again.

Mr. SCHULTZ wished to know if it was the intention of the Government to give closer supervision over the route.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not aware that the supervision was not close. The Government expected that there would be a corps of engineers in connection with the Pacific Railway survey at both ends of that route during the whole of the coming season, and the business of the road would be conducted hereafter in connection with the Pacific Railway survey.

Mr. MASSON said it was deplorable that the Government had not a better means of taking emigrants to the North-West than they had last season. While he was going to Red River himself last season, he was dissuaded from going by the Dawson route by the very persons whose duty it should be to urge him to go that way. He was informed by great friends of the hon. Minister of Public Works that the road was managed in such a way that really emigrants could not go up. A gentleman from London had a span of horses with him, and had very great difficulty in getting them off the boats at the portages. There was no management at all. The huts were dirty and could hardly be used. Now, he knew the Minister of Public Works could not see to everything himself, and he merely drew the hon. gentleman's attention to the facts. So long as that road was leased with a bonus it would not give satisfaction. It would be better to give larger prices to transport emigrants than to follow the present system, because the contractor now is merely interested in keeping the road open to get the bonus. The road should not be leased but managed by the Government. Emigrants were now going by the United States. He knew it was not the intention of the Government to drive them that way, but that was the effect of their policy.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he came into office in December 1873, and was obliged to do the best they could with this route. He was able, however, for the sum of $76,000 to do what it took over $400,000 to accomplish the year before, and he contended the arrangements were better under the lease than under the management of the Government. There were more emigrants carried over it, and there was more comfort.

Mr. MASSON could not contradict the hon. gentleman, but he moved for returns which had only been brought down to July 1873, showing the number of emigrants who had passed over the road. Until later returns were furnished him, he could not say anything on that subject.

Mr. YOUNG said the enormous expense of the Dawson route under Government management made a change desirable. That change was one which, on the whole, had worked in a tolerably satisfactory manner. One cause, no doubt, that had prevented it from working so well as expected was, that there was a great rush of emigrants just at the beginning of the season, before the contractors had time to complete their arrangements. But, just before the close of navigation, he knew from gentlemen who had passed over the route that they travelled with tolerable comfort. It would be too soon to pass judgment on the system of the present Government. Next season, he had every reason to believe, the management would be satisfactory, and the country would be saved great expense.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, in reply to Mr. MASSON, said he understood the number of passengers on the Dawson route last year was between 2,000 and 2,500, and fully one-half of those were carried within the first three weeks after the road was opened, and before the contractors were quite ready for them. He remembered years ago the laborious trip up the St. Lawrence before railways and steamboats were available, yet people thought comparatively little of the three weeks' journey. Now there were complaints from emigrants if it took half that time to go twice the distance. He had an exact statement of the provisions sent to the various points on the line, and he found that the contractors only received some $39, while carrying 1100 passengers over the line. In fact, there was a kind of a mob at one time, and they used the contractors as they pleased. He heard that there was suffering at the North-West angle at one time, and he telegraphed to Lieut. Governor MORRIS to inquire into the condition of the supplies there. It was found that the principal part of the suffering was simply because of people eating the contractor's meal without paying for them. They were compelled to refuse these parties food when they would not pay for it. Some of them, no doubt, had very little money, and might have suffered a little, but there was no serious distress.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the actual expenditure on the Dawson route for the year ending June 30th, 1874, was $419,368.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said this was not a fair comparison. A large amount of this should have been charged to capital account, having been expended in the construction of houses, bridges, etc.

Mr. SCHULTZ said it was true that some of the stopping places on the route were dirty and the management was bad, but the road had proved of great service to the country. It had caused a reduction of rates on the American lines to our country. That fact alone would warrant the expenditure on the road. It was no fault of the Government that they expended so much on the road, since by doing so they secured lower rates on the American lines. While he could not agree with the hon. member for Terrebonne as to the value of the road, he could not agree with the Premier as to its management during the past year. He (Mr. SCHULTZ) believed it was thoroughly mismanaged, and reports from emigrants over it would bear out his statement. There was no responsible agent in Winnipeg. Almost every emigrant who came through complained that his goods had been damaged by water, and he had grievances of all sorts, but no one to make them to. If he went to the officers of the Dominion, they protested that they had no responsibility, and the whole matter was in the hands of the contractor. He did not mention these matters to censure the Government, but to suggest the propriety of finding out whether this vote were sufficient to carry out the work satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the officer who had been employed by the late Government to superintend this work, Mr. DAWSON, had been continued by the present Administration. It was quite impossible to get the goods of the emigrants transported without getting wet, but the real hardships complained of were the want of food, and the nature of the shelter at the halting places. The statements generally were greatly exaggerated. The great difficulty arose in the first three weeks of the season, when more emigrants passed over the route than had passed over it for three years before, and before the new contractor had got fairly to work. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) had seen a number of people who had travelled by the route, but so far as he could learn, at least after the first three or four weeks, there was no case of real suffering. The contractors had in several instances been obliged to pay heavy damages for injury done to goods from getting wet in the course of the transit. With regard to the expenditure upon the route, $198,000 had been appropriated in 1873 for the service; subsequently there were Orders in Council passed for sums of $30,000 and 15,000 respectively; there was a cash revenue of $15,000; and besides these amounts he had himself to make provision for $145,000 after coming into office; no portion of which was for any work upon the road. He then submitted a detailed account of the expenditures, which amounted in all to $399,628, besides which there were some additional items not paid in that but in the following year.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was quite impossible that the expenditure had been so grossly extravagant as the figures quoted seemed to indicate, and the fact that the Government continued in office the inspector under whose supervision those expenses had been incurred was the best proof that they thought there was no mis-management, and that under the circumstances the best had been done that was possible. Much of the money referred to in the statement read by the Premier must have been in connection with the improvement of the road.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Much of it.

Hon Mr. TUPPER said there was what was commonly known as "cheap and nasty," and it was just possible that if hon. gentlemen opposite were willing to spend more money upon the route the term would be less applicable to it. Every one knew there had been loud and grievous complaints against the management of the road during the past season, and no doubt our American neighbors pocketed the results of it in the shape of railway fares. He considered it was a great misfortune to us that those who were seeking our western prairies could not be conveyed over our own lines of communication. No doubt the contractor labored under great difficulties, and the Government would be justified in giving him such remuneration as would enable him to do his work in a manner creditable to the country and comfortable to the passengers

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the service was efficiently performed, and after the first three weeks there was no unusual difficulty. If the buildings were nasty, as the hon. member for Cumberland had intimated, they were in the same condition as they were left by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. If the Government had dismissed the officers of all the mis-managed departments, an entirely new set of officials would be required. With respect to the service referred to, the Government had made a wholesome change and next season still further improvements would be effected. Without a railway it would be impossible to compete with the American means of transportation, and every possible effort would be made to push forward the line from Lake Superior westward and from Georgian Bay eastward. In the meantime the navigation would be improved so that in the course of two years at least we would have reduced the journey to Manitoba to a journey occupying something like two or three days.

Mr. WHITE did not know that there was very great reason to find fault with the manner in which the service had been performed. The contractors were honorable men and very anxious to do their duty, and there was every reason to hope that next year they would do better.

The item was then passed.

On item 88, $370,000, Public Buildings in Ontario,

Mr. WOOD inquired if the Minister of Public Works proposed to erect the immigrant sheds at Hamilton on Government property. He pointed out the difficulty and danger there was in having the sheds located in their present position.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE promised the necessary information on concurrence.

Mr. McMILLAN said there was a considerable amount of money expended last year on the Post Office at London, and he was informed no tender had been asked for, either in the newspapers or any other public way. He desired to know in what way the contract was given out.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the officer of the department had given the contract. He promised to bring down papers with all the information.

The item was passed.

On item 89, $233,500, for public buildings in Quebec Province,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated there were several explanations he would call for on concurrence.

The Committee then rose and reported, and the House adjourned at 12.50 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 3rd, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

A QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved that the petition which he had this day presented from FRASER, REYNOLDS, & Co., asking that they be heard by Counsel before the Public Accounts sub-Committee, be now received and read.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—That motion cannot be made without notice.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK read the rule of the House upon the subject and contended that the present case was one of urgency which brought it within the rule which allowed petitions in certain cases to be brought up immediately.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the motion for the reception of a petition could only be made on the day on which it was receivable by the House of a subsequent day, and this petition was not receivable till the day after to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER observed that this case clearly came under the exception specified in the rule of the House which allowed a petition to be immediately dealt with. He proceeded to point out the urgency of the present case, stating that very grave charges had been made against the petitioner which were now being examined by a committee, and he now petitioned to be heard before that committee by counsel.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the hon. gentleman was out of order in discussing the merits of this case. He should confine himself strictly to the point of order.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was confining himself to the point of order. He was showing the urgency of the present case, which would bring it within the rule allowing immediate action to be taken upon it.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said the question of urgency was one to be decided by the SPEAKER. If the SPEAKER decided that the present case was one of urgency then it would be in order for the House to deal with it at once. But if he decided to the contrary, the ordinary notice would have to be given. He cited to the House three precedents in the English Parliament in support of his position.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the precedents quoted by the hon. gentleman were not to the point because there was no personal grievance complained of in the present instance.

Mr. SPEAKER said his impression was that the question of urgency did not arise at the present moment. The House was not in fact at the present moment in possession of the petition presented by the hon. member for Kings, and would not be technically in possession of it until two days had elapsed from the day it was presented, unless the House agreed unanimously to suspend the rules and order the petition to be received at once. The practice in our Parliament in this respect differed he believed from the practice of the Imperial Parliament. In the Imperial Parliament petitions were presented and received upon the same day, but under our rules two days had to elapse between the presentation and the reception. For this reason he did not think the precedents cited by the hon. member for Cardwell were in point.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that as this was a matter of common justice he would appeal to the House to allow the rules to be suspended. He moved—"That the rules be suspended, and that the petition of FRASER REYNOLDS & Co., be now received and read."

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE.—There has been no notice given of that motion!

Mr. MASSON said he desired to raise the point as to whether a motion could be objected to before it had been read by the SPEAKER. He referred to the motion he had made the other day on the subject of the Menonite Loan, and stated that in that case his motion had been objected to and ruled out of order before it was read by the SPEAKER. He wished to have that point settled.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said it was out of order to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. gentleman was not acting with his usual fairness. It was a matter of some importance to the minority of the House to know whether when they presented a motion it could be ruled out of order before it was read by the SPEAKER, and consequently be prevented from going upon the journals of the House; and it was that point which he now wished to be cleared up.

Mr. SPEAKER read the motion of the hon. member for Kings, and said that as his attention had been called to the fact that no notice of this motion had been given he must rule it out of order.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the motion could be received by the unanimous consent of the House, and it did not appear that any one had objected to it.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the Premier had stated that no notice of this motion had been given, and that was equivalent to an objection; therefore the motion could not be received. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Terrebonne, he observed it was contrary to the practice of this House to allow every motion that was ruled out of order, no matter how obviously out of order it was, to go upon the journals of the House. With reference to the other matter referred to by that hon. gentleman he was prepared to deal fairly with the hon. gentleman upon that subject whenever he brought it up in a proper manner before the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE remarked with reference to the statement, that because a motion was made by any hon. gentleman it must therefore go upon the journals of the House, that if that were done it might lead to very offensive motions appearing on our journals simply because some member might choose to propose it. That practice had not been followed in this House and he was satisfied it was not permissible either here or in England.

Mr. MASSON said it was of the utmost importance that the minority should be protected by allowing their motions, which might be ruled out of order on account of referring to money matters, to go upon the journals of the House. If that practice was not followed, then no member of the House could make any motion with reference to the expenditure of public money without moving a vote of non-confidence in the Government, or else moving to reduce the amount. The Minister of Public Works was mistaken when he said that motions which had been ruled out of order had never appeared upon our journals. He (Mr. MASSON) remembered that in 1870 no less than three such motions were so entered.

HON. Mr. CAUCHON said the hon. gentleman was altogether mistaken. If he would look at the journals of the English Parliament he would not find in them a solitary motion which was declared out of order. Such motions, with the decisions of the SPEAKER thereon, were to be found in Hansard. Any member could put his opinions on the journals of the House by adopting the proper mode.

Mr. MASSON said he had moved amendments to the tariff in 1870, which were ruled out of order by the SPEAKER, but which could be seen in the journals of the House.

HON. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was a difference between those amendments and the motion before the House—the former were out of order because of something they contained; it was the puttting of this motion that was out of order.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER explained that the motion was not put from the Chair. On reading it he declared it out of order and returned it to the mover, not because some one said it was out of order, but because he (Mr. SPEAKER) considered it should not be put.

Mr. YOUNG quoted MAY, page 259, contending that the SPEAKER had taken the right course in ruling the motion out of order when he saw it was informal.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:—

Mr. SCHULTZ—To incorporate the North-Western Manufacturing Co.

Mr. JETTE—To grant further powers to the Montreal, Chambly and Sorel Railway Company, and change its name.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—To amend the Act respecting the Public Debt and the Raising of Loans authorized by Parliament.

Mr. MOSS—To legalize and confirm certain agreements made between the Niagara Falls International Bridge Co., The Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Co., and the Great Western Railway Co.

INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT introduced a Bill to amend the Act respecting insurance. This measure, he said, would be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and would be considered by them in its details. The object of the Bill was to make licenses renewable from year to year on a company's complying with the requirements of the Act. It also imposed certain restrictions on Mutual Insurance Companies in order that when their business was extended beyond the limits of the Province in which they were incorporated they might be placed on the same footing as other companies. The Government desired to institute a supervision and superintendence over such companies, and to create an officer to be known as the Superintendent of Insurance, whose duty it shall be to enquire into the solvency of Insurance Companies doing business in the Dominion. It was the intention of the Government in the first place to revise the Acts referring to Life as well as Fire and Marine Insurance Companies, but on full consideration of the matter it was determined to do no more at present than extend this supervision to the former. The Life Companies would not be otherwise meddled with in this respect—they would be expected to submit their affairs for inspection to the Superintendent of Insurance on the same terms and conditions as the Fire and Marine Companies. There were certain minor details which they proposed to consider more carefully in the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG asked the hon. Minister of Finance if he proposed to interfere in any way with companies that are doing business in a single Province, or if the Bill was intended to apply simply to those companies whose business extends throughout the Dominion or more than a single Province. Considerable interest was being taken in the Bill by the people; he had himself received several letters in regard to it, asking for information on the point he had raised.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—As a general thing I may say that it is not the intention of the Government to interfere with Local Corporations, incorporated by the Provincial Legislatures, and doing business within the limits of their own Province; but as the question of Insurance is one among those specially relegated to the care of the Dominion Parliament, I am not prepared to say that in some respects it may not be found necessary to extend superintendence over them. Our general object, however, is to deal with those companies only that do business throughout the Dominion.

Mr. YOUNG was glad to learn that the Bill was to be confined to companies doing business throughout the Dominion generally. He did not think it would be advisable under present circumstances to interfere with the Mutual Companies in the Province of Ontario whose business was confined to that Province, and which as a general rule had worked well. Some fear had been entertained by those companies as to what legislation the Dominion Government proposed, and they would no doubt hear with satisfaction that the Bill did not refer to them. There are, however, a number of Mutual Companies in Ontario who were carrying on business in other Provinces, and it was absolutely necessary in the public interest that supervision should be exercised over their manner of conducting business; their responsibilities were so great that an inspector should be appointed whose duty it would be to ascertain whether their business was conducted so as to insure the safety of the insured. The inspection of Life Companies he considered was a step in the right direction. He had suggested the adoption of that course—a suggestion which had no doubt been also made by other hon. members—and in the course of time it would be found to be in the public interest to have as strict examination into the working of those companies as of the Fire Companies. Probably, in the meantime, the Government were going as far as was necessary in the public interest.

The Bill was read the first time.

NEW ARRANGEMENTS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNSTER asked when the Government intend to lay the printed papers before the House relating to any new arrangements made with the Government of British Columbia regarding the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government have nothing to do with printing of papers. The Government has laid the manuscript on the table, and the printing rests with the Printing Committee; I understand, however, they are printed, or almost completed.

CLAIMS OF CONTRACTORS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. PALMER asked whether it is the intention of the Government to take any, and if so, what measures for the settlement of the claims of contractors on the several sections of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—All the claims of the contractors are being settled as they come up.

SALARIES OF JUDGES OF COUNTY COURTS.

Mr. BLAKE asked whether the Government intends to propose any re-adjustment of the salaries of the Judges of the County Courts.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have had an informal correspondence with the Government of Ontario with relation to the salaries of the County Judges. Complaints have come from all quarters of the inadequacy of the present salaries. But we also found that there were more County Judges than seemed to be necessary to perform the duties devolving upon those officials, and it has been a question with the Ontario Government whether a lesser number of Judges could not discharge those duties, in which case the same amount that is now disbursed for salaries might be disbursed among a smaller number. If such an arrangement as that can be carried out, it is the intention of the Government to consider the propriety of making some addition to the salaries of the County Judges.

SYDNEY AND EAST BAY CANAL.

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton) asked whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision this year for the building of the Sydney and East Bay Canal in Nova Scotia, as per engineer's report.

SCHOOLS FOR INDIANS.

Mr. GOUDGE asked whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a school or schools among the Indians of Nova Scotia similar to that established in some of the other Provinces?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—The Government generally aid to some extent Indian schools, provided an application is made showing there is a probability of having a good average attendance of scholars maintained.

RAILWAY COMPANIES' BY-LAWS, &c.

Mr. DELORME moved for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of returns made by the different Railway Companies of their by-laws, and especially for the rules and regulations for the management of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, by which their rates for passengers and traffic have been increased during the last six weeks.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — With respect to the hon. gentleman's motion I have to say that I am afraid there have not been regular returns made of the fares and regulations as provided by the General Railway Act; but it is the intention of the Government to exact a stricter compliance with the terms of the act in future, and to have the tariffs of fares and rates sanctioned before they go into operation. While the motion may pass, I do not think there are many papers to bring down in connection with it.

The motion was carried.

THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. NORRIS moved for an "Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all estimates and reports of the engineers in charge of the Welland Canal, showing the cost of removing the rock bottom at Raney's Bend with a view to obtaining Lake Erie level." He said it was a well-known fact that the streams of water which years ago were sufficient to feed the Welland Canal were rapidly drying up. The water of the Grand River which was the feeder of the canal, had for years past been diminishing as the country was cleared up, and, indeed, during the last ten years there had been an inadequate supply of water for manufacturing purposes. For years past the country had been promised that the Lake Erie level should be obtained to feed the canal. During the last two or three years he had himself frequently seen vessels grounded in the canal for six or eight hours at a time, and under these circumstances the Government should lose no time in obtaining the Lake Erie level, especially when the engineers' reports would show that it could comparatively easily be effected. In 1867 the Commissioner stated that since 1850 the Port Colborne approach from the junction had been gradually enlarged and deepened to obtain the Lake Erie level with a draught of ten feet of water, which object was nearly achieved. The engineer on the work reported to the Commissioner in the same year that, with the exception of a strip of solid rock, consisting of about 1,000 cubic yards, and the removal of some loose rock in the rock cutting, and some eighteen inches of other material in other portions of the canal between Raney's Bend and the lock at Port Colborne, the excavation was nearly completed. The Engineer and Superintendent of the Welland Canal reported in 1869 that the operations for the purpose of obtaining the Lake Erie level was nearly completed, with the exception of a strip of rock and some other work, and estimated the total cost at $82,000. Mr. Page in his report of the 8th June, 1869, said that the failure of the Grand River at certain seasons to furnish the necessary supply had rendered the lowering of the water to the level of Lake Erie, a matter which could not judiciously be much longer delayed. He (Mr. Norris) was afraid that if the ensuing summer season was as dry as during the past two or three years, vessels would not be able to pass through the canal unless some new arrangements were made. When the canal was first constructed, and during many years afterwards, mills and factories were erected on its banks and were supplied by the Government with water-power. At that time it was never anticipated that the supply of water would be so largely diminished. To such an extent was this the case that at the present time these establishments only had water one-half of the time. In 1869 or 1870, while the late Government was in power, Mr. BROWN was employed to remove the rock at Raney's Bend, but owing to an accident happening to the dam, the works were suspended, and they have not since been proceeded with. He hoped the work would be resumed by the Government at the commencement of next winter, when navigation had closed, and would be completed at as early a date as possible.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said instructions had been given to use every possible expedition in getting the water of Lake Erie into the canal. On the particular point referred to by the hon. gentleman there had been an expenditure up to the 31st December of about $140,000. The entire amount of the contract for that work was about half a million. Peculiar difficulties had been encountered in prosecuting the work, as the hon. gentleman knew, but he (Mr. MACKENZIE) hoped to have the whole of the remaining work that had to be done to obtain a depth of twelve feet put under contract at an early day. He would not say anything about the other work at present because it was quite possible that he might have something to say on concurrence of the item in the estimates relating to that canal in the way of giving some more specific information in answer to the inquiries of the hon. member for Monck.

Mr. McCALLUM said that in 1866 the engineer reported that the work upon which the Premier had just stated $140,000 had been spent could be done for $60,000. He read an extract from the engineer's report on that point, and proceeded to say that he had urged this question upon the Government year after year, and he thought the mill owners and others living along the canal had good grounds of complaint against the Government for their dilatoriness in prosecuting the work. He did not believe the work could be completed by the end of 1876, as the Premier had stated. It might be completed by that time between Thorold and Lake Ontario, but if the Government persisted in their determination to make Port Colborne the entrance of the canal they would do well if they finished the whole work by the end of 1880.

Mr. SCATCHERD said the work on the Welland Canal was of as much importance to the whole Dominion as it was to the people living in its neighborhood, and it should not be considered in regard to the interest of any particular individuals but to the interest of the whole country. The expenditure upon this work should be made in the interest of the whole Dominion and not in the interest of a few mill owners living on the canal, who according to the statement of the Minister of Public Works were only entitled by their leases to the surplus water. A great many complaints had been made that the canal was not deep enough, but he submitted that the House must be guided in that matter by the opinions of the engineers of the Government who had only the public interest to serve in preference to the opinions of those who had private and sectional interests to serve, and who had no professional knowledge whatever upon the subject. It was time that this whole question should be regarded from a Dominion point of view rather than from the view of mill owners and others who had their private interests to serve.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon. member for Lincoln had large experience in the navigation of the Welland Canal, and it was not right to attribute selfish motives to the hon. gentleman in bringing this matter before the House. The mill owners on the understanding that the Government would furnish a good supply of water had expended a large amount of money in building up valuable properties on the line of the canal. Before the trade of the Lower St. Lawrence was developed, the Welland Canal depended largely for its business on these very mills. The question should receive the careful consideration of this House.

Mr. NORRIS denied that he brought up this question from any selfish motives; he spoke entirely in the public interest. If the canal should run dry, as he very much feared it would next summer, the whole country, and especially Montreal, which depended nearly altogether on the trade of that canal, would suffer. It was quite true that the leases of the mill owners did not legally bind the Government to supply the mills with more than the surplus water, but the Government were morally bound to furnish them with as good a supply as possible. Then why was this work delayed? It would cost as much ten years hence as now. Though a large amount of money had been expended to furnish water, none of it had been spent to get it from Lake Erie. The whole outlay was to procure it from the Grand River, where an increased supply could not be had. Three years ago, as one of a delegation, he brought this matter under the notice of the Government, but no steps had been taken to make the improvement desired. He spoke not in favor of the mill owner or of any private individuals but the country at large.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the terms of the leases to the mill owners were very explicit indeed. They were entitled to the surplus water and more mills had been built than this surplus water could supply. When the canal was built the supply of water from natural drainage was greater than at present, and extended over the whole year. The rapid clearing of the country had almost dried the marshes in the woods which formerly filtered through the soil and kept up a constant supply of water. Until the Lake Erie level was obtained it would be quite impossible to supply the mills—on the upper levels at all events—with all the water required. The Government had done all they could for the mill owners by exacting a merely nominal rent. More than that could not possibly be done. He regretted exceedingly their unfortunate position, but it was quite impossible that the Government could pay them compensation or purchase their mills. Some of them were quite unreasonable. One man who had paid no rent for eight or ten years, resisted its collection on the ground that he was prevented from building a mill for two years by the failure of the Government to furnish a sufficient supply of water, and he considered the consequential damages covered the rent. What the Government could fairly do would be done. He would see the engineer with reference to the line of the Lake Erie feeder.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Norris.

DOMINION NOTE CIRCULATION.

Mr. WILKES moved the appointment of a select committee to report on the question of the Dominion note circulation generally, and as to whether the continuance of such currency in circulation is in the public interest; such committee to have power to send for persons, papers and records. He said this motion was based on a statement brought down last session, showing the amount of Dominion and Provincial notes issued on the 1st January, and the 1st of July, in each year from 1868, with the amount of such notes at each period held by the chartered banks as reserve, and the amount of specie held by the Receiver General at each period; also the circulation and paid up capital of the chartered banks at each period; also the estimated cost of the Dominion note circulation in connection with the Receiver General's Department, together with an estimate of the nett gain to the revenue by the Dominion note circulation. For the period covering six years, given by periods of half-years, commencing June 30th, 1868, when the circulation was $3,795,000 to December 31st, 1873, when it was $12,095,086, the amount varied, a large increase taking place in 1871. The average circulation of the total period of six years was $8,133,870; the specie reserve held by the Receiver General during the same period was $2,011,128. This reserve also varied from year to year, the largest amount being held in December, 1871. The first return showing that Dominion notes were held by chartered banks in lieu of specie was in December, 1871, when the amount was $6,719,418. It increased to $8,582,638 in December, 1873. The return brought down last session also gave the estimated profit resulting from this circulation, premising that the money was worth five per cent. to the country. The amount of such interest in 1868–9, was $188,580; cost of management, $204,857. In 1869–70, the interest was $264,317; cost of management, $209,434, showing a profit of $54,883, upon a circulation of seven millions of dollars. In 1870–71, the interest was estimated at $283,075; cost of management, $273,511, showing a profit of $9,564. In 1871–2, the interest was $369,727; cost of management, $183,707. In 1872–3, interest $434,261; cost of management, $71,076. For convenience sake he had made an average of these figures for the five years from 1868 to 1873. The average total issue amounted to $8,133,000; average note issue over specie reserve, $6,122,000; average specie reserve, held by the Receiver General, $2,011,000, or 24¾ per cent.; average interest at five per cent. on the circulation over the specie reserve, $306,000, and average expenses, $188,000, showing a nett profit of $199,475, or a profit upon the actual note circulation in excess of the specie held, of 1.95 per cent. He repeated that the profit for five years, on the total circulation of the country, was less than two per cent., supposing the money was worth to the Government the full amount of five per cent., and there were no secondary considerations diminishing that amount. The average Dominion notes held by the banks amounted to 15¼ per cent. of their capital over the same period of five years. The average circulation of the banks to their paid up capital was 45 per cent. during the same period. The average Dominion notes in actual circulation, that was to say, in the hands of the public, deducting the amount held by the banks, was $3,442,881 or less than three and a half millions. The average proportion of Dominion note circulation to the bank-note circulation was one-eight, or 12½ per cent. It might be argued that this return did not fairly state the position of the Dominion note circulation and the benefits arising from it. He had, therefore, compiled a second statement which he had obtained from the Auditor General, giving the figures in another arrangement, and to a later period. It would be remembered that during a portion of the period between 1867 and 1871 the Bank of Montreal had controlled the Dominion note circulation or was the only bank that came into the terms of the circulation act. During the period from 1867 to 1871, the average note issue over the specie reserve was $4,152,000; average interest at five per cent., $207,000; average expenses, $205,000, or a sum of $2,292 as the total profit resulting per annum from the circulation during the period referred to up to 1871, or .55 per cent. —a little over a half of one per cent. This he designated as the weakest period of the Dominion note circulation. The return for the further period from 1872 to 1874 showed the average note issue over specie reserve to be $8,493,000; average interest, $424,000; average expenses, $99,000, showing a profit of $325,000, or 3.80 per cent. Now, by putting the two together and giving the average for the eight years ending with 1874, the profit upon the whole issue of Dominion notes amounted to 1.77 per cent. It would now be asked, was this profit made in the latter period between 1872-4 any actual gain to the country. It had been the custom of the Government of this country for a number of years to deposit in most of the chartered banks. In 1870 the amount so deposited in the chartered banks was on 30th June $2,387,000, and it continued in varying sums up to 30th June 1873 when it amounted to $5,500,000; in 1874 it stood at $5,125,000, and on 31st December last it was $4,110,000; making during those five years an average deposit of $3,958,000 in the hands of the banks without any interest being paid thereon. That amount was distributed among twenty-nine chartered banks in sums varying from $50,000 to several millions. Taking the average amount stated,—almost four millions—the interest, at 5 per cent would amount to $197,900 on which he would make the following comparison:—The average profit from Dominion note circulation between 1868 and 1873 was $119,000, the interest at 5 per cent on the average amount of Government money on deposit in the chartered banks without bearing interest, was $197,900 thus showing an absolute loss of $78,000 per annum. For the period of 1872-73-74 the average profit on note circulation was $325,000, against which, if interest at 5 per cent on the amount of Government money in the chartered bonks is deducted, there remained $127,516 as the total profit of the Dominion note circulation on twelve million dollars. He did not propose to debate the question as to whether that was a profitable operation or not; if any hon. member thought it was, he was entitled to his opinion, but he (Mr. WILKES) has taken the liberty of submitting to the House a statement of the facts. It could not be shown that the profit to the country from the Dominion note circulation had been anything more than a bagatelle. The point he wished to establish, and it was established by his figures, that about one and three-quarters per cent.

was the total benefit per annum reverting to the country from the Dominion note circulation, supposing the money to be worth five per cent.; and when from that sum was deducted the amount belonging to the Government, not bearing interest, held by the chartered banks, there was an absolute loss entailed by the system. Of course, it might be said that the Government deposits were not made in respect of Dominion note circulation. He was aware that Sir FRANCIS HINCKS proposed in his Bill of 1870 to hold about one million and a half in special deposit in order to supplement the 35 per cent. of gold reserve which he proposed to hold for all the circulation exceeding nine millions; but that deposit was never authorized by law, and although it appeared in the public returns, it was purely nominal, because it was an ordinary Government deposit. But he took the simple fact that the Government as the custodian of the public money of this country, has habitually deposited money in the chartered banks without interest, that, at the same time, the Government were enjoying the advantage of the amount of circulation which the banks held on the Government behalf, and also the amount of Government notes in circulation in the hands of the people, which was a very small proportion of the whole. A careful estimate showed that only three millions of Dominion notes were in actual circulation, the balance being held by the banks. The system at present in operation was, however, not the creation of the present Government. On turning to the debates of 1870, he found that Sir FRANCIS HINCKS in the debate which occurred at the time when the Dominion note circulation was being introduced, expressed his opinion strongly in favor of the theory that the best system was a government bank of issue, the profits of which should go to the public. The question of a government bank issue was one open to debate, and if Sir FRANCIS HINCKS had introduced a measure to establish a government bank issue, he (Mr. WILKES) could understand the course Sir FRANCIS had pursued. His issue, all told, only amounted to one-eighth of the total circulation of the country, and two-thirds remained in the hands of the chartered banks; therefore so far as supplying a currency to the people, the Dominion note circulation did not give a currency at all. He would not now discuss that question, but should it ever be introduced into Parliament it was one worthy of debate. But it had not been tried by this country and he thought he might risk the opinion that it was likely to remain a long time untried. That policy was not the one introduced, but the hon. gentleman who then had charge of the finances stated what his views were, and therefore, he (Mr. WILKES) might reasonably conclude that Sir FRANCIS HINCKS regarded his measure as the entering wedge of a Government bank issue, and that in the meantime the profits would go into the pockets of the people. In this matter the Government of to-day were not responsible for the action of their predecessors, but they must take the responsibility of dealing with the question. In the debate on Sir FRANCIS HINCKS' measure, Mr. MACKENZIE, the present Premier stated: "He thought that both (Sir A. T. GALT "and Sir F. HINCKS) were wrong; that "the country regarded as a failure the "policy of that time, and any new banking scheme looking that way would be a "failure." Mr. CARTWRIGHT, the present Finance Minister stated: "The Finance "Minister (Sir F. HINCKS) had laid down "positions which he (Mr. CARTWRIGHT) "must controvert. The first was that it "was expedient that the Government "should assume control of the circulation." "The second was that the State had an "inherent right to the profits arising from "circulation." "If the Government took "the circulation into their hands it would "terminate in an irredeemable currency "with all its evils." "As to the question "of the practical monopoly of small notes, "he need not say that he was utterly "opposed to it as a matter of principle." "He was greatly opposed to Government "interference in banking, as proposed, "as he would be to appointing the Government to exercise judicial functions." Giving it clearly as his opinion that he was opposed to the introduction of the scheme which SIR FRANCIS HINCKS had stated was in the direction of a Government bank of issue, Mr. MACKENZIE also stated further: "In Ontario the "scheme was opposed on popular reasons. "It was regarded there as a scheme to "obtain more money, and as a plan on the "part of the Government to force them"selves into the banking business," "He "thought that the circulation of bank "notes ought to be in accordance with the "public requirements and should not be "retarded or restricted by any arbitrary "provisions." During the course of that debate it was moved in amendment by Mr. CARTWRIGHT, "That "the Speaker do not now leave the "chair but that it be resolved that it is "not expedient to authorize the issue of "legal tender notes in the manner author-"ized by the said resolution." The vote on this amendment stood; yeas 29, nays 110, and among the yeas he noticed the names of BLAKE, CARTWRIGHT, DORION, GEOFFRION, HOLTON and MACKENZIE. He would also quote from the remarks made by the hon. member for Chateauguay on that occasion that hon. gentleman said: "The proposition of the Government was "in the nature of a forced loan in the "first instance and therefore objec-"tionable in principle, and might be "clearly shown to be fraught with "very dangerous practical consequences." "He could well understand the policy of "repressing the circulation of the banks "altogether, and superseding that cir-"culation by a Government issue." "The "chiefly objectionable features of the Bill "were the suppression of the small note "circulation of banks; and to invest a "large portion of their reserves (50 per "cent.) in the paper money of the Gov-"ernment."

These enunciations of sound views did not need his (Mr. WILKES') endorsement, but it might not be amiss for him to say that in the west particularly, and he dare say in other places, that the Government of the day were expected to carry out as far as possible the opinions they had entertained while in Opposition. He would detain the House to present another, and, in his estimation, a very important aspect of the question, namely; how it affected the circulation in the hands of the people, including also the question of reserves. 1st, the average total circulation of Dominion notes in six years was $8,133,000; specie reserves held by Government, $2,011,000; or 24¾ per cent. Now, he was very much pleased to notice that the Finance Minister had introduced a Bill authorizing him to increase this reserve from about 25 per cent. to a very much larger sum. Although practically nearly 25 per cent. had been held, the Act of Sir FRANCIS HINCKS only called for 20 per cent. of gold reserve up to nine millions, and 35 per cent. for any issue beyond that up to 12 millions. The bank deposits on the 31st December last were in the neighborhood of $85,000,000; bank circulation, $28,000,000; and Dominion note circulation $12,000,000, making a total liability to the public of $125,000,000. To meet this liability the Government and the banks were holding a certain amount of reserve. Specie held by banks, say, $7,500,000; specie held by Receiver General, $3,098,000, making in round numbers $10,600,000, or 8½ per cent. as against the total liability. What he desired to call the attention of the House to was this, that for all practical purposes the Act of Sir FRANCIS HINCKS had reduced the reserve of the banks; and that the amount of gold held by the banks and by the Receiver General had never been sufficient for what was wise and prudent to keep in this country, and that therefore the tendency of the system was towards a reduction of the specie reserve, as no amount of Government bills held by the banks was sufficient for all the contingencies of banking and trade. With the permission of the House he would compare the reserves held in the United States with those held in this country by the Government and the banks. It would be noticed that he did not take recent dates, because it would not be fair to select a time when there was a tightness in the money market from exceptional causes, and therefore he took the figures only down to 31st December of last year. In the United States the deposits in the national banks amounted in 1874 to $293,000,000 on the average; circulation of the national banks, $454,000,000, for which they held in round numbers, legal tenders, $32,000,000; gold, $2,375,000; in the hands of redemption agents, $52,000,000; and redemption bonds, $11,000,000, making in all reserves of one sort or other, $100,000,000, or 13⅜ per cent. Putting it in another form the legal tender issue of the United States amounted to $348,000,000; National Bank circulation, $454,000,000; National Bank deposits, $293,000,000, making in all $1,096,000,000. The estimated specie held by the Government and the banks in the United States amounted to $166,000,000, or 15 per cent. of the total liability. Now, if in the United States upon the legal tenders of the Government, and the issues of the National Banks were not redeemable in gold the total gold in the hands of the Government and the banks amounted to so large a proportion as 15 per cent. of the total liability, that seemed to him to be a strong reason why the gold reserves in this country should be very largely increased. Having treated of the reserves, and of the tendency of our system to reduce the reserves of gold lower than the circumstances of the country would justify, and of the results of our system of mixed currency, he would now make a few observations on the subject of our circulation as compared with that of the United States. The bank capital of Canada amounted to about $74,000,000, and the bank capital of the United States to about $490,000,000. In the United States there were 1,971 banks and in Canada 42. But, the point he wished to call the attention of the House to was the proportion of bank capital per capita of the population. In the United States it was $12.25 cents per head of the population and in Canada $18.50, or one-third more in Canada than in the United States. The circulation of the United States amounted to $348,000,000 legal tenders; and $454,000,000 National Bank currency; in all $803,000,000 as against our total circulation of banks $28,500,000; Government legal tenders $12,000,000; in all $40,500,000, showing—and this was the point to which he wished to direct the attention of the House—that the circulation in the hands of the people of the United States was $20.85 per head of the population whereas with one-third larger banking capital we had only a circulation of $10 per head of our population. The same comparison would hold good with reference to the deposits. The bank deposits of the United States were $293,000,000, or $7.32 per head; and in Canada $85,000,000, or the enormous sum of $21.25 per head, or nearly three times as large an amount of deposits as in the United States in proportion to our population. He ought here to remark that this amount was properly reduced by an element which he did not find in the United States returns, and he hoped the time would come when we would not find it in our returns, namely; Government deposits which amounted to $17,000,000, so that the $85,000,000 of deposits in Canada would be reduced by that amount, which represented both Dominion and Provincial Government deposits reducing the amount of deposits to $17 per head. Still our deposits were nearly two and a half times greater than the deposits made by the people of the United States. From these figures he thought it could be clearly established that the circulation in the Dominion of Canada was insufficient for the requirements of the trade, and consequently anything that tended to limit that circulation or restrict it was not in the interest of the country. He was aware that it was frequently held that the calculation which he had now made was for a currency which was not redeemable in gold, and that therefore the circulation of the United States, amounting to eight hundred millions of dollars, did not fairly compare with our forty millions. But this he held was a fallacy. The circulation in the hands of the people would purchase all the commodities required by the people, and this circulation answered all their purposes just as well as our circulation answered the purposes of our business.

Mr. CHARLTON asked whether the statement which the hon. member had just made with respect to the deposits in the banks of the United States included deposits in the Savings Banks and in the State Banks as well as Federal Banks.

Mr. WILKES said it did not include deposits in the savings banks, because he had not included the deposits in savings banks in Canada. He had only taken the deposits in our chartered banks, and in the National banks of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON said that the deposits in the savings banks in the State of New York, alone exceeded the amount which the hon. gentleman said was deposited in the National banks.

Mr. WILKES said that the deposits in our savings banks would compare very favorably in proportion to our population, with the deposits in the savings banks of the United States. It might be said that the figures he has just given to the House, merely presented the monetary aspect of the question, and that, in order to make the comparison complete, it should include a comparison of the trade of the two countries. Instituting that comparison, it could be shown that if the trade of the United States required a circulation of twenty dollars per head, it would become the duty of the Government and this House to devise some means by which the circulation in the hands of the people of this country for the purposes of trade would be increased. Last year the exports the United States amounted to $586,000,000, and the imports to $567,000,000, being a total of $1,153,000,000. The exports of the Dominion were $89,000,000, and the imports $128,000,000, making an aggregate of $217,500,000. Bringing these figures to the same test as before which he maintained was the only true test, namely—the test of population, it appeared that the total trade of the United States was $28.22 per head of the population, whereas the total trade of the Dominion amount to $54.39, or nearly double that of he United States. He maintained therefore that as we had double the foreign trade of the United States in proportion to our population we certainly required at least an amount of circulation per head equal to that of the United States. Again, take the tonnage of the United States. It amounted to 4,800,000 tons, being .12 of a ton to each head of the population; whereas the tonnage of the Dominion was 1,073,000, or .27 per head of the population—more than double the tonnage of the United States in proportion to our population. He was not prepared to take the position that some take, that our national debt was an element of strength. He would say that the fact that we had a larger volume of trade per capita than the United States, and the United States had a larger debt, was an additional argument why our circulating medium should be increased. The debt of the United States was $2,290,000,000, or $57.50 per head. The debt of Canada amounted to $140,000,000, or 35.25 per head, showing that even on this basis the comparison lay in the same direction. The revenue of the United States amounted last year to $289,000,000; the revenue of Canada to $24,000,000, showing $7¼ per head of the population of the United States, as against $6 per head of the population of the Dominion. When it was considered that the rate of duty in the United States was at least double what it was in Canada, both in the tax on imports and the rates of excise, it would be seen that the comparison was very favorable indeed. He was aware it was not a very interesting subject with which to weary the House, but he had put the long array of figures as concisely as possible, without giving details, in order that they might be less difficult to remember. He would summarize them in a few words. We have in this country a double system of banking, described by a gentleman on the Treasury benches as an attempt by the Government of the day to force themselves into the banking business. The system of currency in this country was, so far as he was aware, without a parallel in any country.

Mr. PLUMB—I think there is a similar system in the United States.

Mr. WILKES said they were not analagous in the last degree. The currency of the United States was irredeemable, and no gold reserve was held for it, whereas the currency of Canada professed to give one dollar in gold for every dollar bill on presentation. This was the distinction between the two systems, and he was not aware that any country in the world possessed a currency like ours. That greater evils had not resulted from it than had been manifested might not be due to the system, but to the restriction placed on the system. After all, it would appear to any one on the slightest reflection that the system of attempting to supply the requirements of this country, where there was a circulation of something like $31,000,000 in the hands of the public, by a Government circulation of $3,000,000 was a failure, and did not meet the requirments of the country. The actual effect of the Government issue was simply to place a certain amount of Government legal tenders in the vaults of the banks of the country. There was one useful purpose which this circulation answered. Formerly, banks in settling their balances with each other day after day had to pay the balances in gold. This was a tedious process, and attended with some risk. Now, the advantage of the Dominion note was that the banks were able to pay over their balances in notes of very large denominations. Consequently, a very small package made a large amount, and the balances were easily settled. This was of great use, but beyond that he had been unable to trace any justification for the Government of this country undertaking to make an issue of bills payable in gold and at the same time take all the risk consequent upon such a large amount being held by monetary institutions that might at any day require gold. The question of profit could be easily disposed of. There was no reason why the Government should not be entitled to the benefit of our circulation instead of the chartered banks. The risk had hitherto been on the part of the country, and the profit infinitessimal. If it were urged that the profit was likely to be larger in the future, he would ask was it well for this country, for a paltry three per cent., to allow $3,000,000 of its capital to remain idle, and to risk disturbing the trade of this country. The system was bad, and the Government would be entitled to the gratitude of the country if they would deal with it in a satisfactory manner. The system in England, New York and elsewhere, would meet in a better way all the necessities of the bank exchanges. In the leading cities of the Dominion it would not be a difficult thing for the banks to arrange among themselves, if they were so disposed, or the Government were to indicate such an arrangement, that they would have a clearing house in which balances could be settled without the use of gold at all. Consequently, the benefit of the Dominion note circulation could be gained in another manner.

At six o'clock the debate was adjourned, Mr. WILKES still having the floor, and the House rose for recess.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read a second time :—

Mr. JETTE—To incorporate the Royal Mutual Life Insurance Company of Canada.

Mr. JETTE—To amend the several Acts incorporating or relating to the Richelieu Company, and to change its name.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Montreal West)—To amend the Act incorporating the Canadian Navigation Company.

THE FISHERY QUESTION.

The Order was called for the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. MILLS for an address praying for correspondence in reference to compensation to be paid by the United States to Canada under the Treaty of Washington for the right of fishing in Canadian waters.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he objected to the two propositions laid down by his hon. friend from Bothwell in discussing this question, namely; that the commission to meet at Halifax had no power to deal with the fishery boundaries, and therefore could not ascertain the damages; and secondly, that before the commission met, the British Government should be asked to obtain the settlement of the question of boundaries. While he entirely agreed with the object of the hon. gentleman's motion, he dissented from the reasons the hon. gentlman gave for making it. He was free to admit that any decision which the commission might arrive at would not be binding upon either country beyond the provisions of the Washington Treaty. In his judgment it would be most suicidal for this country to ask Great Britain to approach the United States in order to obtain the settlement of the question of our fishery limits before the commission should meet at Halifax. Our true position was to claim all those rights which had been recognized as ours for over half a century, and not throw doubts upon our claims by asking England to seek a negotiation with the United States to define what our rights were.

Mr. MILLS—Why did you send a commissioner to England for this very purpose ?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he was prepared to discuss that question at the proper time, but at present he would proceed with the plan he had marked out for himself, namely : to give an historical résumé of this whole question of our rights as regards the fisheries. After the American war of Independence it became necessary to consider what were the rights of England in relation to the fisheries of the shores of what was now the Dominion of Canada. The United States as the successors of the old British colonies claimed that as they as colonists had helped to conquer what were now the British Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec from France, they possessed a co-equal right of fishing on the shores of those Provinces with those of the old colonists who remained loyal to the British Crown from whom they voluntarily separated themselves, and in the peace of 1783 they succeeded in getting considerable concessions. He read article 3 of the Treaty of 1783 showing that under it the Americans were allowed to fish on the coasts of British North America in the same manner as the subjects of Great Britain, but no right was given to them to do so. It was merely the liberty to fish that was granted to them, but with respect to the deep sea fisheries the right was conceded to them as to all other nations. It was important to observe the two-fold sense of Article 3 of the Treaty of 1873. In the first portion of the Article there was a clear recognition of a continuing "right" of fishery which "the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy" in those parts of "the sea" which had been commonly used by colonists to the exclusion of the French; then, in the other portion was an equally plain and distinct concession of "liberty" to use certain specified waters and coasts within the jurisdictional limits of the British possessions in common with British subjects. In this position the matter stood till the war of 1812, and the question was how far that war affected the treaty of 1873 as regards the fisheries. Some American jurists claimed that as their "right" to independence and to the deep sea fisheries were not abrogated by that war so also the "liberties" to use the in-shore fisheries, which were granted them in the same treaty, were not abrogated. At Ghent the American Commissioners went further, and claimed that the treaty of 1783 must be looked on as of the nature of a contract, and that the right to the fisheries was upon the same footing as the right of independence. After the close of the war of 1812, the convention between England and the United States contained no reference to the question of the fisheries. The fact was that the commissioners found it was impossible to come to any understand on that question and therefore it was left in abeyance. It was not till 1815 when Lord BATHURST sent out instructions to absolutely enforce the rights of Britain and exclude American fishermen from the in-shore fisheries that the Americans were compelled to look the question fairly in the face, and consider what was the best way to remove the difficulties under which their fishermen labored. The negotiations culminated in the convention of 1818. With reference to the effect of the war of 1812 upon the fishery clauses of the treaty of 1783, he would with permission of the House cite a few authorities. He read an extract from Wheaton's Law of Nations page 325 on this point. Further on the same author stated: "The entire instrument implied permanence and hence all the fishing rights secured under it to the United States were placed on the same foundation with their independence itself." Mr. ADAMS and Mr. CLAY maintained the same view, stating in a proposition presented to the British Commissioners that the Americans "held their rights of fishing by the same tenure as they did their independence." To this doctrine there was one dissentent voice among the American Commissioners. Mr. RUSSELL held that "the treaty of 1783 in relation to the fishing liberty was abrogated by the war." These pretensions of the majority of the American Commissioners that the fishery article of 1783 survived the war of 1812 were at once met by the British Commissioners, who were sustained by their Government, by the proposition that the war put an end to all treaties, and that in relation to the treaty of 1783 the "concessions" or "liberties" therein conceded as distinct from "rights" clearly terminated with the declaration of hostilities. In support of this proposition he read extracts from the following authorities: Twiss' Law of Nations, London, 1861, page 377; President's Message, 1847; Kent's Commentaries on American Law, vol. 1, p. 175; Supreme Court of the United States, Sutton vs. Sutton, Russell and Mylne's Reports, vol. 1, p. 663; and Wheaton, p. 494.

In accordance with the position thus assumed by the British Government and sustained by the law of nations, on reference to Wheaton, page 463, it appears that,

"During the negotiations at Ghent, in 1814, "the British plenipotentiaries gave notice that "their Government did not intend to grant to "the United States gratuitously the privileges, "formerly granted by Treaty to them, of fish-"ing within the limits of the British Sover-"eignity, and of using the shores of the British "territories for purposes connected with the "British fisheries. In answer to this declara-"tion the American plenipotentiaries stated "that they were not authorized to bring into "discussion any of the rights or liberties which "the United States have heretofore enjoyed in "relation thereto; from their nature and from "the peculiar character of the treaty of 1783, "by which they were recognized, no further

"stipulation has been deemed necessary by the "Government of the United States to entitle "them to the full enjoyment of them all."

Wheaton further adds, that :—

"The Treaty of Peace concluded at Ghent, "in 1814, therefore contained no stipulation on "the subject ; and the British Government "subsequently expressed its intention to ex- "clude the American fishing vessels from the "liberty of fishing within one marine league of "the shores of the British territories in North "America, and from that of drying and curing "their fish on the unsettled parts of those ter- "ritories, and, with the consent of the inhabi- "tants within those parts which had become "settled since the peace of 1783."—Wheaton, p, 463.

By article 8 of the same treaty of 1783 it had been agreed :—

"'That the navigation of the River Missis- "sippi, from its source to the ocean, should for "ever remain free and open to the subjects of "Great Britain and the citizens of the United "States.' And, although it was described in "that instrument as a 'right' secured to Bri- "tish subjects for ever, it was withheld, and "has been ever since enjoyed exclusively by "the United Statas, because the participatory "right 'had not been renewed by the Treaty of "Ghent.' If a definite 'right' of navigation on "the waters of a foreign State be annulled by "war, how much more should a participant "'liberty' of fishery be subject to the same "contingency."

On this point he referred hon. members to Wheaton, page 353. During the war the Americans practically abandoned the Fisheries, and their common uses with British subjects was incompatible with a state of hostilities. The liberty conceded ceased with war and was withdrawn by the British as it was practically abandoned by the Americans; and by their assent to the convention of 1818 they agreed to an actual abandonment of their rights and to accept a limited enjoyment of conceded privileges, however, repugnent it may have been to their views. In support of these points Mr. MITCHELL quoted from Mr. ADAMS' despatch of September 15, 1815, and Mr. MUNRO'S statements, and read the instructions given to Vice Admiral KEATS in the despatch of Earl BATHURST of 17th June 1815, in which (said Mr. MITCHELL) the views of HER MASESTY'S Government were clearly expressed and the position they assumed in relation to the treaty was defined. In the course of that communication Lord BATHURST said :—

"I am commanded by HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS "the PRINCE REGENT, to instruct you to abstain "most carefully from any interference with the "fishery, in which the subjects of the United "States may be engaged either on the Grand "Bank of Newfoundland, in the Gulf of St. "Lawrence, or other places in the sea. At the "same time you will prevent them, except "under the circumstances hereinafter men- "tioned, from using the British territory for "purposes connected with the fishery, and will "exclude their fishing vessels from the bays, "harbors, rivers, creeks and inlets of all HIS "MAJESTY'S pessessions. In case, however, it "should have happened that the fishermen of "the United States, through ignorance of the "circumstances which affect this question, "should previous to your arrival, have already "commenced a fishery similar to that carried "on by them previous to the late war, and "should have occupied the British harbors, and "formed establishments on the British terri- "tory, which could not be suddenly abandoned "without very considerable loss; HIS ROYAL "HIGHNESS the PRINCE REGENT, willing to give "every indulgence to the citizens of the United "States which is compatible with HIS MAJES- "TY'S rights, has commanded me to instruct you "to abstain from molesting such fishermen, "or impeding the progress of their fishing dur- "ing the present year, unless they should, by "attempts to carry on a contraband trade, ren- "der themselves unworthy of protection or "indulgence ; you will, however, not fail to "communicate to them the tenor of the instruc- "tions which you have received, and the view "which HIS MAJESTY'S Government take of the "question of the fishery, and you will above "all, be careful to explain to them that they "are not in any future season to expect a con- "tinuance of the same indulgence."

The result of these prompt and decided measures on the part of the British Government induced American Statesmen to see the folly of their pretensions in the recent negotiations, and advances were made which resulted in the convention of 1818. The fishery article of that convention provided :—

"And the United States hereby renounce for "ever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed "by the inabitants thereof, to take, dry, or "cure fish, on or within three marine miles, of "any of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of "HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S dominions in "America, not included within the above men- "tioned limits ; provided, however, that the "American fishermen shall be admitted to enter "such bays or harbors, for the purpose of shelter "and of repairing damages therein, of purchas- "ing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no "other purpose whatever. But they shall be "under such restrictions as may be necessary "to prevent their, taking, drying, or curing fish "therein, or in any other manner whatever "abusing the privileges hereby reserved to "them."

By this article the American Government in place of obtaining the concession made then, in the treaty of 1783 of equal rights of fishing with HER MAJESTY'S subjects, deliberately renounced any liberty they had heretofore enjoyed or claimed, and agreed to their exclusion from the fisheries within three marine miles of the coasts, bays, creeks or harbors, of British Dominions in America. In order to a proper understanding of the question, Mr. MITCHELL proceeded to inquire as to what are the rights of nations in relation to the fisheries on the high seas, and which are universally recognized and admitted, and what are those exclusive rights which pertain to nations in certain waters. He quoted the following authorities:—Twiss' Law of Nations, pp. 252, 253 and 264; Wheaton, p. 326; Angell on Tide Waters; Vattel, 128; Selden, 182; Marters, 161; Wheaton's Elements of International Law, p. 320; Haute feuille Droits des Nations, p. 89; Bynkershoek, p. 323, of Lawrence's Wheaton; Kent's Commentaries, pp. 25, 29 and 30; Grotius de jure belli et pacis, L. II.; Halleck's International Law; Puffendorff Law of Nature and of Nations, L. I V.; Vattel's Law of Nations. Mr. MITCHELL (continuing) said he would next consider the effect and scope of the convention of 1818. That convention left the rights of Americans and British to participate in the fisheries of the open sea just as they existed under the treaty of 1783; but it curtailed the liberty which the Americans formerly enjoyed of taking fish within the three mile limit, while it gave them enhanced facilities for curing. After signing the convention of 1818, Great Britain continued to exercise and enforce the exclusion of American fishermen from our shores, and construed the treaty to mean a limit of three miles from headland to headland, and from three miles outside of the mouths of bays. From that time until the reciprocity treaty of 1854, our exclusive right to the use of the fisheries was rigidly enforced by the British Government. True, our rights were often infringed upon by the Americans, but they were never yielded. In 1841 the Americans began to poach more extensively, and the subject was brought under the notice of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and on June 8th in that year the following questions were proposed by the House of Assembly for consideration of HER MAJESTY'S legal advisers:—

"I. Whether the treaty of 1783 was annulled by the War of 1812, and whether citizens of the United States possess any right of fishery in the Waters of the Lower Provinces other than ceded to them by the Convention of 1818; and if so, what right?

"II. Have American citizens the right, under that Convention, to enter any of the Bays of this Province to take fish, if, after they have so entered, they prosecute the fishery more than three marine miles from the shores of such bays; or should the prescribed distance of three marine miles be measured from the headlands, at the entrace of such bays, so as to exclude them?

"III. Is the distance of three marine miles to be computed from the indents of the coasts of British America, or from the extreme headlands, and what is to be considered a headland?

"IV. Have American vessels, fitted out for a fishery, a right to pass through the Gut of Canso, which they cannot do without coming within the prescribed limits, or to anchor there, or to fish there; and is casting bait to lure fish in the track of the vessel fishing, within the meaning of the Convention?

"V. Have American citizens a right to land on the Magdalen Islands, and conduct the fishery from the shores thereof, by using nets and seines; or what right of fishery do they possess on the shores of those islands, and what is meant by the term shore?

"VI. Have American fishermen the right to enter the bays and harbors of this Province for the purpose of purchasing wood or obtaining water having provided neither of these articles at the commencement of their voyages, in their own country; or have they the right only of entering such bays and harbors in cases of distress, or to purchase wood and obtain water, after the usual stock of those articles for the voyage of such fishing craft has been exhausted or destroyed.

"VII. Under existing Treaties, what rights of fishery are ceded to the citizens of the United States of America, and what reserved for the exclusive enjoyment of British subjects?"

To these questions the law officers of the Crown replied as follows:—

"1st Query.—In obedience to Your Lordship's commands, we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honor to report, that we are of opinion, that the Treaty of 1783 was annulled by the war of 1812; and we are also of the opinion that the rights of fishery of the citizens of the United States must now be considered as defined and regulated by the Convention of 1818; and with respect to the general question 'if so, what right,' we can only refer to terms of the Convention, as explained and elucidated by the observations which will occur in answering the other specific queries."

"2nd and 3rd Queries.—Except within certain defined limits, to which the query put to us does not apply, we are of opin-tion, that by the terms of the Convention, American citizens are excluded from any right of fishing within three miles of the coast of British America, and that the prescribed distance of three miles is to be measured from the headlands, or extreme points of land next the sea, or the cost, or of the entrance of bays, or indents of the coast, and consequently that no right exists, on the part of American citizens, to enter the bays of Nova Scotia, there to take fish, although the fishing, being within the bays, may be at a greater distance than three miles from the shore of the bay, as we are of opinion that the term 'headland' is used in the treaty to express the part of the land we have before mentioned, including the interiors of the bays and the indents of the coast.

"4th Query.—By the Convention of 1818 it is agreed that American citizens should have the liberty of fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and within certain defined limits, in common with British subjects; and such convention does not contain any words negativing the right to navigate the Passage or Strait of Canso, and, therefore, it may be conceded that such right of navigation is not taken away by that Convention; but we have now attentively considered the course of navigation to the gulf by Cape Breton, and likewise the capacity and situation of the Passage of Canso, and of the British possessions on either side, and we are of opinion that, independently of treaty, no foreign country has the right to use or navigate the Passage of Canso; and, attending to the terms of the Convention relating to the liberty of fishing to be enjoyed by the American citizens, we are also of opinion that that Convention did not, either expressly or by necessary implication, concede any such right of using or navigating the passage in question. We are also of opinion that casting bait to lure fish in the track of American vessel navigating the passage would constitute a fishing within the negative terms of the Convention.

"5th Query.—With reference to the claim of a right to land on the Magdalen Islands, and to fish from the shores thereof, it must be observed, that by the Convention the liberty of drying and curing fish (purposes which could only be accomplished by landing) in any of the unsettled bays, &c., of the southern part of Newfoundland, and of the coast of Labrador, is specifically provided for; but such liberty is distinctly negatived in any settled bays, &c., and it must therefore be inferred, that if the liberty of landing on the shores of the Magdalen Islands had been intended to be conceded, such an important concession would have been the subject of express stipulation, and would necessarily have been accompanied with a description of the inland extent of the shore, over which such liberty was to be exercised, and whether in settled or unsettled parts, but neither of these important particulars are provided for, even by implication, and that, among other considerations, leads us to the conclusion that American citizens have no right to land, or conduct the fishery, from the shores of the Magdalen Islands. The word "shores" does not appear to have been used in the Convention in any other than the general or ordinary sense of the word, and must be construed with reference to the liberty to be exercised upon it, and would, therefore, comprise the land covered with water, as far as could be available for the due enjoyment of the liberty granted.

"6th Query.—By the Convention the liberty of entering the bays and harbours of Nova Scotia for the purpose of purchasing wood and obtaining water is conceded in general terms, unrestricted by any condition expressed or implied, limiting the enjoyment to vessels duly provided with those articles at the commencement of their voyage; and we are of opinion that no such condition could be attached to the enjoyment of the liberty.

"7th Query.—The rights of fishing ceded to the citizens of the United States, and those reserved for the exclusive enjoyment of British subjects, depend altogether upon the Convention of 1818, the only existing treaty on this subject between the two countries, and the material points arising thereon have been specifically answered in our replies to the preceding queries."

After the Treaty of 1818 was concluded, it became necessary for the British Government to enact a law of the Imperial Parliament to enforce on the coasts of British America, respect to the provisions of that Treaty. Such a law was passed by the Parliament of Great Britain on the 14th of June, 1819, and has been in force ever since that time. Under it the Treaty rights have been enforced, seizures of foreign vessels have been repeatedly made, and the same proceeded with to trial, and, in many cases, to condemnation.

The Parliament of Nova Scotia, in 1836, passed an Act, based upon the Imperial Act of 1819, which received the sanction of the Imperial Government, under which that Province provided the legal machinery for enforcing respect to their territorial jurisdiction of three miles from the coasts, bays and harbors of that Province; and subsequently, in 1840, adopted an amended law, which is still in force.

Under these laws, the first of which was in active operation for twenty-eight years, numerous seizures of American vessels were made for encroaching and violating Treaty rights, and our rights of exclusion were repeatedly enforced up to the period of the passage of the Reciprocity Treaty.

A similar law was passed both in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and in 1868, after the formation of the Dominion, a law, almost the exact transcript of the Nova Scotia law, was passed by our Parliament for the "Regulating of Fishing by Foreign Vessels." After the Provinces were united, the Parliament of Canada passed a similar law to the Imperial Act of 1819 which had been in force for fifty years. The American fishermen, followed up the policy which they had ever pursued in relation to our fisheries; endeavored to quietly assume rights and encroach upon our fisheries where they could do so with impunity. From 1818 to 1841 seizures of American vessels were frequent. Thus matters stood in 1841, up to which period the British construction of the treaty of 1818, including their views of the headland lines was enforced and acquiesced in, though reluctantly, by Americans. For the first time, in 1852, the Americans set up their peculiar claim in relation to the construction of this treaty. DANIEL WEBSTER, however, on the 6th of July, 1852, recognizing the legal force of the British claims to the only point then in dispute, wrote as follows:—

"The British authorities insist that England has a right to draw a line from headland to headland, and to capture all American fishermen who may follow their pursuits inside of that line. It was undoubtedly on oversight in the Convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that those vast inlets or recesses of the ocean ought to be open to American fishermen as freely as the sea itself, to within three marine miles of the shore."

Notwithstanding this authority the Americans set up the claim that the Bay of Fundy was open to American fishermen. The question arose on the seizure of the schooner Washington while fishing in the Bay of Fundy, ten miles from land. HER MAJESTY'S Government, while denying the right, consented to leave the question in abeyance, at the same time referring this particular case to arbitration. It was decided that the Bay of Fundy being partially bounded by American territory at its mouth, was not, so far as the limits of that territory formed its bounds, a British bay. In July, 1853, when the question arose in reference to the rights of Americans to fish in the Bay of Fundy, Mr. RUSH, the only surviving American Commissioner who took part in making the treaty, gave his views in reference to it as follows:—

"They meant no more than that our fishermen, whilst fishing in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, should not go nearer than three miles to any of those small inner bays, creeks, or harbors, which are known to indent the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick."

It would thus be perceived that while Mr. RUSH coincided in the American view with regard to the right to fish in the Bay of Fundy, on the ground that it was an "arm of the sea," he clearly admitted their exclusion from the smaller bays, creeks and harbors, and practically disavowed the claim of a line three miles from the sinuosities of the coast put forward by Americans, and thus far sustained the British construction in all but the larger gulfs or bays, which he claimed to be "arms of the sea." He (Mr. MITCHELL) had given a resumé of the history of our rights in regard to these fisheries from 1785 to 1854, and the grounds upon which England claimed and enforced these rights. In 1854 the Reciprocity Treaty gave the Americans concurrent rights to fish on our coasts, and these continued until 1866, when the treaty terminated. When the United States Government gave the year's notice that it was to terminate, the then Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, with the approval of HER MAJESTY'S Government, sent delegates to Washington, in October, 1865, to endeavor, if possible to secure its continuance, or else to effect some other trade arrangements which would meet the approval of both countries. In this they were unsuccessful. The delegation held several conferences with the Committee of Ways and Means, and the record of their proceedings proves that there was really no desire evinced to renew commercial intercourse with the Provinces on any basis at all resembling the principles of reciprocal free trade. The efforts of our delegates proved fruitless, and they returned about the middle of November following. On the 20th of February, 1866, a Royal Proclamation was issued by the GOVERNOR GENERAL of Canada, notifying American fishermen and United States citizens of the termination, on the 17th day of the ensuing month, of the fishing privileges which they had enjoyed under the said treaty, and warning them of the legal penalties which they would incur by trespassing upon the in-shore fisheries of British America, belonging exclusively to HER MAJESTY'S subjects. HER MAJESTY'S Government felt disposed to allow the freedom of fishing that had prevailed since 1854 to continue for the season of 1866, on the distinct understanding that, unless some satisfactory arrangement between the two countries should be made in the course of the year, such privileges would cease, and all concessions made in the treaty, just about to expire, be liable to withdrawal. It was important that friendly relations should be maintained with the United States. The Americans had always been sensitive with regard to these fisheries. They claimed that as England through the aid of her American colonists had won them from the French, and as it was only by the treaty of 1818 that they were lost, should now be admitted to the use of them. The Canadian Government feared that it would be impossible to keep the 1,500 or 2,000 fishing vessels of the United States outside the limits if they were once allowed to come in and fish without control on our part. They would after a time claim the right by use to our fisheries. Notwithstanding the strong opinions entertained by the Canadian Government, they reluctantly acquiesced in the views of the Imperial authorities and adopted the temporary expedient of issuing season lincenses to United States fishing vessels at a nominal tonnage rate, so as formally to preserve the right of sovereignty without occasioning any serious complications. It commenced with a rate of fifty cents per ton and subsequently was increased to $2 per ton. The refusal of American fishermen to avail themselves of this privilege would be seen by the following statement, showing the number of licenses issued each year since 1866. In 1866 there were 354 licenses : in 1867, 281 ; in 1868, 56 ; in 1869, 25. For himself he always felt that while the licensing system might do very well as a temporary arrangement which would ensure a recognition of our rights, as a permanent system it was very unsatisfactory. The result was fully as much as he had anticipated. The licensing system having proved a failure it became necessary in 1868 to adopt a different policy, but at the request of the British Government the system was continued for another year in the hope of a removal of the Reciprocity Treaty. The year 1869, however, passed without any progress having been made in that direction. He might mention that in 1866 Lord CLARENDON then Foreign Minister, at the request of Mr. ADDERLEY, sent a despatch to the United States proposing that an arrangement should be made by which the fishery limits should be defined ; but to that despatch no answer was ever received. The licensing system having proved a complete failure the Government of Canada determined in 1870 to adopt a more decided policy. They abolished the licensing system and established a Marine Police Force which, aided as it was from the first by the British fleet, excluded the American fishermen from the three mile limit following the sinuosities of the coast, for the British Government requested that our right to three miles from a line drawn from headland to headland should be left in abeyance for subsequent settlement. The point he wished to impress upon the House was that all the rights which we enjoyed from 1818 to 1854 when they were suspended by the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty were restored to us by the abrogation of that treaty in 1866. Those rights were recognized by the American Government under the licensing system, and they were maintained by us up to the passage of the Washington Treaty. He held therefore that the Halifax Commission would have power to deal with the question of boundaries and to ascertain damages, and that it would be unwise on our part to throw doubts upon our own rights by asking England to open negotiations with the United States in order to have these rights defined. What would be the answer of England? She would say that under the Washington Treaty, the Americans have the right to use our fisheries for eleven years, and that in the meantime the Halifax Commission would have full power to determine what damages should be paid to the United States (if any) for the use of our fisheries for eleven years. He was free to admit that outside of the question of damages no decision of those commissioners would bind the two nations, and after the expiration of eleven years any decision of theirs upon the question of boundary would not be binding. But, at the same time, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of damages to be paid by the United States, the commissioners had full authority under the Treaty of Washington, because we enjoy the same rights now which had been enforced by England from 1818 to 1854. This question of the existence of our boundary limits was one which had been the subject of negotiation for many years. In 1866 Lord CLARENDON, in a despatch in reply to Mr. ADAMS, expressed the anxiety of the British Government to arrive at some friendly arrangement on this point, and in a despatch of 21st April, 1863, Sir EDWARD CARDWELL stated:—

"I recognize in this minute with much pleasure the moderation and forbearance shown by the Canadian Government.

"The suggestion that American fishermen should be allowed to fish during the current year in all Provincial waters, upon payment of a moderate license fee, meets with the full approval of HER MAJESTY'S Government, and I shall inform the Governors of the Lower Provinces that I trust they will readily concur in it.

"In anticipation of this result, Sir JAMES HOPE will be instructed to act upon it as soon as he shall have been informed that the arrangement is concluded."

In 1870 a Minute of Council was passed, abolishing the license system, and excluding American fishermen from the waters of Canada, and Mr. CAMPBELL was appointed to go to England to call the attention of the Imperial Government to this matter; and, in June of the same year, he was instructed to inform HER MAJESTY'S Government that the time had arrived when it was necessary to abolish the licensing system, and adopt some other means of more effectually protecting the Canadian fisheries.

In his report of the 10th September, 1870, Mr. CAMPBELL stated the result of his proceedings as follows:—

"I urged upon Lord KIMBERLY the great importance to Canada of the fisheries, which employed a large number of seamen, and had many collateral pursuits and industries dependent upon them. We possesed the whole of the herring and mackeral fisheries on the western side of the Atlantic, the Americans having no in-shore fisherics of any great value. This possession was of the first importance to us, and we felt exceedingly anxious that it should be maintained in accordance with treaty rights. Induced by a strong sense of the responsibility involved in the matter, and out of deference to Imperial views, we had proposed in 1865 the license system; we had given every possible opening in this direction at a sacrifice of our immediate interests in order that our affairs might not tend to endanger the peace of the Empire. This system had been continued to the present year, and we were satisfied that no advantageous results would be obtained from it.

"Lord KIMBERLEY admitted that the time had come when Canadians might reasonably expect that the state of things anterior to the Reciprocity Treaty should be reverted to, or that some other definite arrangements with the Americans on this subject should be arrived at. He added that he was glad that I had not mixed up the two questions of reciprocity and the fisheries, because he saw no reason to expect a renewal of that treaty; he agreed, he said, that the fisheries question should be treated by itself. I said that we in Canada had arrived at similar conclusions. The policy of conciliation had been fully tried, and we ceased to expect anything from the Americans from it. We thought the only course now open to us was to ask the Imperial Government to fall back upon the rights which we enjoyed and maintained anterior to the Reciprocity Treaty, and I was directed to request this at the hands of the Government."

Lord KIMBERLEY in his despatch of 10th Oct. 1870, stated:—

"The object of HER MAJESTY'S Government is, as you will observe, to give effect to the wishes of your Government appointing a joint commission on which Great Britain, the United States and Canada are to be represented with the object of inquiring what ought to be the geographical limits of the exclusive fisheries of the British North American Colonies."

Mr. MILLS—Has that been done ?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said it had not been done because the Canadian Government would not accept an arrangement which implied by inference that there were any doubts as to the limits of the Canadian fisheries.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—They did accept.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said they did not accept it. but they asked the British Government to adopt some means whereby our rights could be enforced. The results of Mr. CAMPBELL'S mission was the negotiations which led to the Washington Treaty.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Hear, hear !

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said his hon. friend did not very much approve of the Washington Treaty, but he could tell him that while he (Mr. MITCHELL) did not think the treaty was all that the people of Canada would like it to be, it was not the fault of the Government of Canada. His views upon that subject were pretty well known and while he did not entirely agree with the conclusions arrived at, he believed that the Canadian Commissioner did the very best he could for Canada. That gentleman found that the interests of the Empire stood in his way, and that unfortunately matters of greater importance to the Imperial Government intervened in the negotiations, and the fishery question had to take a secondary place. It was to be regretted that we were placed in that position, but that was a matter which could not be helped. This question of the fisheries was of far more importance than many people imagined. The value of our fisheries was about fifteen millions a year, and the actual catch of our fishermen was supposed to be between six and seven million dollars. The fish taken by the Americans within our waters according to the best estimates amounted to about eight million dollars a year. He found in a able article in the St. John Telegraph the following statement of the value of the products of the sea fisheries for four years :—

Nova Scotia,	1870	$4,019,424

With reference to Ontario he was glad to notice the great success of Mr. WHITCHER and Mr. WILMOT in their efforts in establishing fish breeding establishments. He was informed that there would be three millions of young salmon taken out next spring from the fish-breeding establishments of Mr. WILMOT ; and Canada might well be proud of her position on this matter, as the United States were following our example. But, coming back to the question he wished to enforce, he would repeat that it would be useless for us to ask England to seek from the United States a definition of our fishery limits.

He assured his hon. friend that the course he intended to take must fail. If the Imperial authorities were asked to appoint another commission, and to open communication with the United States for the purpose of selling our fishery boundaries, the answer would be that our rights had been already established by use and practice of upwards of fifty years. They would tell us that the commission already appointed could go on and define what the damages would be, and if they could arrive at no agreement, it would at least be eleven years before this question of boundaries could be re-opened. He (Mr. MITCHELL) felt very certain that the British authorities would decline to again open up this question until the expiration of the period covered by the Treaty of Washington. There was no reason in the world, in his opinion, why the commissioners could not define the amount of remuneration due to us for our fisheries under the Treaty of Washington, and while that arbitration was pending he could assure his hon. friend that the result of the course proposed would simply be to create national antagonisms without bringing any benefit to this country in the end. In conclusion he apologised to the House for having occupied so much of their time, but as the subject was so very important, he thought it due to the House and the country that he as one who had had something to do with the fisheries; one who had given to them no small amount of attention; one who had done his best to encourage and develop them, that he should put upon record what he believed to be a correct historical statement of the facts, which had led up to the present situation.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had intended to make a few remarks on this motion, but the hon. gentleman's speech had been so long that if it had not exhausted the subject it had at least exhausted the House. The hon. gentleman had made lengthened references to the Treaty of Washington, which he admitted was not all that he expected or desired, but was nevertheless in the hon. gentleman's opinion very good. He (Mr. BLAKE) desired to point out something which to him appeared very material to the question of whether we were likely to arrive at any conclusion in regard to the compensation due to us by means of arbitration. The treaty provided in several distinct parts for the settlement by arbitration of several distinct questions. In regard to the Alabama question, which was provided for in the 2nd., article in the treaty it was expressly stated that all disputed points considered by the tribunal should be decided by a majority of the arbitrators. In like manner it was stipulated that questions to be determined under the 10th and 13th sections should be settled by a majority of the arbitrators, but in regard to the 23rd section, in which provision was made for the appointment of the Fishery Commissioners, it was not stated that the decision of the majority would be final. The result of that would be that the Americans would insist that a unanimous decision was required to a final settlement, and unless the Government of the United States and the Imperial authorities should previously agree to some arrangement, the American Commissioner would dissent from the opinion of the majority, and we might never arrive at a settlement.

Mr. BUNSTER was surprised to hear the hon. member for Northumberland defend the Treaty of Washington in which the existence of British Columbia had been entirely ignored. He complained that British Columbia was practically shut out of the San Francisco oil market, and the Hudson's Bay Company and other oil exporters had their profits greatly curtailed by the cost of transportation to the European market.

Mr. MILLS said it was not his intention when he introduced the resolution to enter into any historical discussion of the various treaties between Great Britain and the United States. It seemed to him that it would be moro proper to enter into such a discussion at a later stage when the House had all the papers before it. He was surprised when he heard the hon. member for Northumberland observe that it would be a highly imprudent proceeding on our part to ask that the limit line should be drawn while the question of compensation was under consideration. He was all the more surprised at this when he remembered that the hon. gentleman was a member of the Government which sent a Commissioner to England to invite the Imperial authorities to bring this matter before the Government of he United States with a view to its settlement. It was very extraordinary, if to ask this much would compromise our rights. The American Government had shown a disposition so to construe the treaty of 1818 as to exclude us from the very rights which the hon. gentleman said were established by usage and practice. The Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member issued licenses to American fishermen because of this difficulty, but the system proved a complete failure in one year. He had called the attention of the House to this subject on a former occasion, as on this occasion, with the object, when the papers were brought down, to submit a motion asking that the Imperial Government might take the initiative in a correspondence with the United States to finally dispose of this question. It was all the more necessary that this should be done because it was quite clear that the parties who negotiated the Treaty of Washington had shown a disposition which he characterized as almost cowardly to let our rights go by default. Those rights, which were considered of great consequence by the Americans themselves, should not be disposed of in this indirect manner without our having an opportunity of securing a formal decision upon the convention of 1818. The hon. gentleman had discussed not only everything which was pertinent to the subject, but many things which were not at all connected with it. In fact, his speech reminded him (Mr. MILLS) very much of Knickerbocker's History of the World. If we were to receive any value for our fisheries we must first secure a fair construction of the convention of 1818, by which an understanding would be arrived at as to what our fishery rights really were. Then the commission appointed under the Washington Treaty would be in a position to go on with the inquiry with which they were charged, but until the fishery boundaries were defined he did not see how they could proceed with their labors in an intelligent way. It could not be held that we had abandoned our just pretensions because we asked to have our rights defined.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he did not propose to enter into any discussion on this matter. We were not in a position to discuss the question at present, nor yet were the Government in a position to bring down the papers. The arbitration had to be proceeded with, and was proceeding at present. All necessary steps had been taken by the Government, and although some of the papers might be laid on the table without any harm, they would lead to no result, and he, therefore, considered it was not advisable to bring any of them down in the meantime. With respect to the point that before any proper arbitration could be had as to the exclusive right of fishing in bays more than six miles wide at their mouths, he understood the hon. member for Northumberland to maintain that the point should not be even raised until the question of compensation was settled. He thought, on the contrary, it would be very desirable to know what rights we possessed before we were asked to determine upon the value of those rights. That was a proposition as logical as it was self-evident, and he was therefore surprised at the hon. member having raised the question. Whether that proposition would be recognized by both powers was quite another matter. By the terms of the Treaty of Washington he believed the settlement of the controversy had been made as difficult as possible, but the Government would endeavour to secure the greatest possible benefit to the country. He hoped his hon. friend, the mover of the motion, would withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On motion of Mr. OLIVER, the Bill to amend the General Railway Act was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraphs.

TRADE MARKS.

On motion of Mr. BERNIER, the Bill to amend the act respecting Trade Marks and Industrial Designs, was read a second time and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Items 93 and 94 were passed without discussion.

On item 95, $364,000 on penitentiaries,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE referring to an amount of $100,000 for a general penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces, said there was at present no penitentiary upon Prince Edward Island, and the prisoners sentenced to a long term of penal servitude had to be taken to the penitentiary in Nova Scotia. The penitentiary at St. John was practically useless as such, and besides the Dominion had only temporary possession of it. It was thought desirable to have one central prison or penitentiary to which prisoners from the three Provinces might be sent. The Government asked the appropriation to be made without having decided precisely as to the spot on which the building would be erected, but it was proposed to place it somewhere between Truro and Moncton, which it was thought would be a convenient position. No time, he thought, should be lost in proceeding with the erection of the buildings, and therefore the vote was asked without their location being exactly determined.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL concurred in the desirability of erecting a general penitentiary for the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE further explained, in reference to the item for penitentiaries, that the Government had decided to place the whole architectural management, in respect to these institutions, under the care of the Public Works Department. The $119,000 for Manitoba, and $100,000 for British Columbia, were asked to carry out contracts under progress for the erection of penitentiaries in those provinces ; and $20,000 were asked for such additions and repairs to penitentiaries as might be found necessary.

The item was passed.

On item 96, $230,500 for rents, repairs, &c.,

Mr. YOUNG asked for explanations in respect to the proposed appropriation of $170,000 for rents, repairs, furniture and heating. &c., which he thought was a large sum to be required.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the item included the entire expenditure for heating the public buildings, and for rents, repairs and similar matters. A very large proportion of last year's vote was expended in finishing the attics of the Departmental Buildings, running up brick fire-proof partition walls to the roof, and completing the whole of the unfinished part of the buildings. For heating there was expended in 1873, $38,-894 ; in 1874, $39,390 ; and the appropriation asked for next year was $40,000. $3,500 were asked for removing snow. The expenditure during the past year was very much less than that, but that was an exceptional year. For supplying gas to the public buildings $12,000 were asked. Under this item, too, a great many repairs and additions to public buildings, custom houses, post offices, &c., throughout the Dominion, were included.

The item was passed.

On item 97, $387,500, for Harbors and Break-waters,

Mr. WOOD inquired if the House proposed to expend $24,000 on the Kingston Harbor Works, which he thought were of a local character.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it did not constitute a local work. The amount placed in the estimates was for the removal of a rocky shore at the entrance of the harbor, where it was absolutely necessary to have the entrance for vessels coming in from the lakes, and where 12 feet of water were required for canal purposes. Last year's survey was very imperfect, for it was then considered that a very small amount would be required to remove the shore. This, however, proved to be a mistake, as the depth of water had been under-estimated, and the expenditure of the amount obtained had only resulted in the removal of a small portion of the shore. $24,000 added to the $6,000 represented the total cost of removing the shore, whereby a depth of 13 feet of water would be obtained. The Government proposed during the coming year to remove a portion of the rock from the shore at a cost of $6,000, and it would afterwards be a question for consideration whether the balance should be expended or not. With respect to Cobourg harbor, that was simply a re-vote. The work was placed under contract one year ago, and the contractors failing to carry out the arrangements made, the work was re-let to other contractors. The town of Cobourg paid one-third of the entire amount expended in building the break-water for the protection of the harbor. In regard to the proposed vote for Port Hope, the work was also under contract. The vote of $7,000 for Port Stanley harbor was first taken two years ago, and an arrangement was made by the late Minister of Public Works with the Railway Company to have that sum expended by it in improving the condition of the harbor. The Government now proposed to have the money expended under the direction of the Public Works Department. Bayfield Harbor was also under contract, the Township of Bayfield paying $10,000 of the amount, which sum had already been paid in to the Government. The sum of $12,000 for Kincardine Harbor was to continue the work which had been carried on in that harbor—the most important, next to Goderich, on Lake Huron, and one at which a very large number of vessels sought trade and shelter. A large proportion of the amount would be necessary for dredging work, as the depth of water was entirely insufficient for the class of vessels which now visited the port. The Government owned a dredge which was at present engaged in the Sydenham River, and as soon as it had completed its work it would be taken down to Kincardine. At Owen Sound the local authorities had contributed an amount for the purpose of carrying on the dredging at the entrance to that harbor so as to enable access to be had by vessels in all weather. Port Darlington was a harbor owned by a private company who had expended $78,000 upon the work. It was at present filling up so as to make it impossible for vessels to enter it which drew more than 9 feet of water. Port Burwell was also a harbor owned by a company whose trade had fallen off very materially recently, it being a large lumber exporting locality. A considerable amount had been expended by the company on the harbor, and all the revenue that could be collected for harbor purposes had proved to be entirely insufficient. The engineer of the Public Works Department had reported that to preserve the harbor for the purpose of shelter it was necessary for this appropriation to be made. Chantry Island harbor and Goderich harbor on Lake Huron were simply appropriations to carry out works entered into three years ago.

Mr. WILKES hoped the Government would be able to place an amount in the supplementary estimates with the object of carrying out the experimentary works in Toronto harbor.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not prepared at that moment to state what would be done in regard to that question. After the conversation in the House a few evenings ago the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department received instructions to again consider the position of the entrance to the Toronto harbor, with a view to ascertain if it was possible to carry out some experimental work in order to determine the proper mode of protecting the entrance and securing free access to that harbor. He hoped to be able in a few days to ascertain precisely what could be done in regard thereto.

The item was passed.

Item 98, for harbors and break-waters in Quebec, was carried without discussion.

On item 99, $183,000, for harbors and break-waters in New Brunswick, Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that Dipper Harbor was situated some distance from St. John. There was no particular trade at the place, but it was a point where a harbor of refuge was required. Unfortunately, during some heavy storms of last year, the works were almost destroyed. He had not at that moment accurate information with regard to the present position of the work, but the appropriation taken would be sufficient to renew the whole structure if it had been washed away. The work at Pointe du Chêne was in connection with the railway, and was absolutely necessary. For Richibucto Harbour the vote asked was to carry out the present contract. The amount for Shippegan Breakwater was a re-vote. For St. John Harbor the vote taken was simply a continuation of the vote proposed last year for the construction of the break-water between Partridge Island and the main land.

The vote was passed.

On item 100, $151,500, Harbors and Break-waters in Nova Scotia,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the amounts for Jordan Bay, Oats Point, and Pictou Landing were re-votes. $50,000 would be required to repair the break-water at Cow Bay, which had been seriously injured by storms. That harbor was owned by the Messrs. ARCHIBALD & Co., colliery proprietors, who obtained an annual vote of $14,000 from the Nova Scotia Government. They had expended $86,000 on the break-water previous to last year, and $3,500 last year. The value of the work erected by themselves, exclusive of the amount given by the Province of Nova Scotia, had been estimated by the engineer of the Public Works Department at $25,000, and the Government proposed under the authority of the Act passed last session to purchase that harbor from Messrs. ARCHIBALD & Co., paying them $25,000 therefor; and they propose to expend $50,000 upon it, in order to put it in thorough repair; and they would levy a tax on all vessels entering the harbor either for trading purposes or for shelter.

The item was passed as were also items 101 to 104 inclusive.

On item 105 dredging $110,500.

Mr. KILLAM inquired when they might expect to have the dredge at Yarmouth. They expected the dredge "Canada" there this winter, but it was frozen up at Pictou and was unable to proceed further. If it had reached the harbor it could have worked two or three months this winter when it would have been impossible for it to do anything in any other harbor. It was important that the work needing to be done at Yarmouth should be done as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the dredge would soon finish its work at Bathurst and would then proceed to Lunnenburg, and do a little work ; thence to Yarmouth.

Mr. BUNSTER called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the necessity of some improvements being made at the harbor of Nanaimo and other harbors in British Columbia.

Mr. McKAY (Colchester) inquired whether any dredging was to be done at Yatamagouche.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the dredges were now all fully employed and the chief engineer in charge of those works endeavored to carry on dredging operations at the places of the greatest commercial importance.

The item was passed as also items 106 to 108 inclusive, and items 154 to 156 inclusive relating to treaties with the Indians in the North-West—also items 168 to 179.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE the House adjourned at 11.40 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 4th March, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P.M.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time :—

Hon. Mr. SMITH—To amend the Immigration Act of 1872.

Mr. BLAIN—To incorporate the Dominion Railway Equipment Co.

CULLING AND MEASURING TIMBER.

Hon. Mr. GEOFERION moved that on Tuesday next the House do go into Committee of Whole to consider Resolution amending the Act, Chap. 46, of the consolidated statutes of the late Province of Canada, entituled, "An Act respecting the culling and measuring of lumber."—Carried.

APPOINTMENT OF HARBOR MASTERS.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved that the House do go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider resolutions for the purpose of amending the Act 37 Victoria, Cap. 34, providing for the appointment of harbor masters at certain ports.—Carried.

INTRODUCTION OF MR. GLOBENSKY.

Mr. GLOBENSKY, the member elect for Two Mountains, having been introduced,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved : That in admitting G. A. M. GLOBENSKY, Esq., elected to represent the electoral district of Two Mountains, to take his seat on the production of the duplicate indenture only, and without the return of the indenture to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and the certificate of the latter officer, the House still recommends a strict adherence to the practice of requiring the production of the usual certificate.—Carried.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions :—

1. That it is expedient to amend the Act 31 Vic., Cap., 10, for the regulation of the Postal Service.

2. That it is expedient to make the following amendments to the several sections of the said Act, relating to the rates and mode of payment of postage ; that is to say : 1. The 19th section shall be so amended as to read as follows :—

"19. On all letters transmitted by post for any distance within Canada, except in cases herein otherwise specially provided for, there shall be charged and paid one uniform rate of three cents per half-ounce weight, any fraction of a half-ounce being chargeable as a half-ounce ; and such postage stamp or stamps at the time of posting the letter, otherwise such letter shall not be forwarded by post, except that letters addressed to any place in Canada on which one full rate of three cents has been so prepaid, shall be forwarded to their destination charged with double the amount of postage thereon not prepaid, which shall be collected on delivery."

2. The 20th section shall be so amended as to read as follows :—

20. On letters not transmitted through the mails, but posted and delivered at the same Post Office commonly known as local or drop letters, the rate shall be one cent per half-ounce in weight, to be in all cases prepaid by postage stamps affixed to such letters.

3. The 22nd, 23rd, 24th and 25th sections shall be repealed and the following sections substituted for them :—

"22. The rate of postage on newspapers and periodical publication printed and published in Canada, and issued not less frequently than once a month from a known office of publication or news agency, and addressed and posted by and from the same to regular subscribers or news agents, shall be one cent for each pound weight or any fraction of a pound weight, to be prepaid by postage stamps or otherwise as the Postmaster General may from time to time direct: and such newspapers and periodicals shall be put up into packages and delivered into the post office, and the postage rate thereon prepaid by the sender thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may from time to time direct."

"23. Newspapers and periodicals weighing less than one ounce each may be posted singly at a postage rate of half a cent each, which must be in all cases prepaid by postage stamp affixed to each."

4. The 26th section shall be so amended as to read as follows:—

"26. On all newspapers and periodicals posted in Canada, except in the cases hereinbefore expressly provided for, and on books, pamphlets, occasional publications, printed circulars, prices current, hand-bills, book and newspaper manuscripts, printers' proof-sheets, whether corrected or not; maps, prints, drawings, engravings, lithographs, photographs, when not on glass or in cases containing glass, sheet music, whether printed or written; documents, wholly or partly printed or written, such as deeds, insurance policies, militia and school returns, or other documents of like nature; packages of seeds, cuttings, bulbous roots, scions or grafts, patterns, or samples of goods or merchandize, the rate of postage shall be one cent for each four ounces or fraction of four ounces."

"Provided that no letter or other communication intended to serve the purpose of a letter be sent or inclosed in any such newspaper or other package or thing mentioned in this or the next preceding section, and that the same be sent in covers open at the ends or sides, or otherwise so put up as to admit of inspection by the officers of the Post Office to ensure compliance with this provision, and the postage rate shall be prepaid by postage stamp or stamped post bands or wrappers, in all cases when any such articles as are mentioned in this section are posted in Canada."

5. The 29th section shall be amended by adding at the end thereof the following provisions:—

"And when any letter or other mailable matter is posted in Canada without prepayment, or insufficiently prepaid, in any case in which prepayment is by this Act made obligatory, the Postmaster General may detain the same, and return it, when practicable to the sender."

6. The 40th section shall be amended by substituting "three cents" for "five cents," as the additional postage to be charged on dead letters to defray the costs of returning the same.

7. The 44th section shall be amended by striking out the provision that the expense of carrying United States mails over any portion of Canada, shall be paid by the United States.

3. That it is expedient that the said amendments and such other of the amendments proposed in the Bill, No. 11, now before this House, as may be adopted by it, be incorporated with the said Act, 31 Vict., cap. 10, so as to consolidate the Statute Law regulating the Postal Service.

Hon. D. A. Macdonald.

Mr. BOWELL said he regretted that the Postmaster General had not seen his way clear to adopt more of the suggestions thrown out in the course of the debate on the Postal Bill than he had done. However, the hon. gentleman had amended his Bill in one important particular, namely; in allowing letters with insufficient postage stamps to go to its place of destination and then charging the receiver an additional three cents. That was an important improvement upon the original Bill. He regretted that it was determined to insist upon prepayment of letters in all cases, as he was satisfied that the operation of that provision, particularly in the rural districts, would cause a great deal of trouble and annoyance. Taking the Bill as a whole, it seemed to him to have been carefully and studiously prepared in the interest of the Post Office Department rather than in the interest of the people of the country. In other words, the object of the Bill was to save the department from a great deal of trouble and annoyance which they contended arose under the provisions of the existing law. He was quite convinced that the Postmaster General could not have considered the question of newspaper postage as closely as he should have done, or he would not have proposed to place such a serious tax upon publishers throughout the whole Dominion. It was all very well to say that it would not come out of their pockets but out of their subscribers' pockets. Any one who had any experience of the business would know that the very smallness of the tax would preclude the possibility of adding the amount to the subscription price.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They can add more than the amount.

Mr. BOWELL thought the Premier, from his experience in doing the hard work of a country newspaper, ought to know better. The Act coming into force at once, and newspapers having a large circulation, the tax must necessarily fall upon the publishers. The Postmaster General has stated, as would be seen in the Hansard, that eight copies of the Globe would weigh a pound. This would give sixty pounds to the ream, and if the circulation of the Globe was as large as it was said to be, some 10,000 a day, it would impose a tax of $3,912 on the publishers of that newspaper. But the Postmaster General also stated in his speech, as reported in Hansard, that large numbers of newspapers were now sent by express. That was true, and it was done to save to subscribers the postage which was at present imposed on newspapers. The Postmaster General claimed that this small impost, which would fall on the publishers, would soon put an end to the sending of newspapers by express. He (Mr. BOWELL) predicted that the result would be entirely different. If this Bill were passed, publishers, not only of city, but also of country newspapers—that is, small towns—would of necessity make arrangements with stage drivers to carry their papers to the different villages. The Postmaster General had overlooked another fact. When he stated that eight copies of the Globe weighed a pound he no doubt weighed them dry. Those acquainted with the business knew that it was necessary to wet paper before printing it, thus increasing its weight at least ten per cent. The lighter the paper the less water it absorbed, the heavier the paper the more was required. With this ten per cent. increase in weight it was sent to the post, and the publisher was obliged to pay for that much water. What he objected to, and he objected to it strenuously, was that this Bill imposed a tax on a certain class of people, which could not be distributed as the Postmaster General supposed it could. There was scarcely a country newspaper in Ontario that would not be taxed to the extent of $150 or $200 a year. The hon. member for Bothwell had contended that the Department had no more right to carry newspapers free than any other common carriers. In the main that might be correct, but he had yet to learn that the Post Office Department had to pay any more for carrying newspapers on which postage was charged than for carrying them free of postage. The contracts for carrying the mails would be the same in either case. If newspapers should not be carried free, on what principle was free delivery to be established? It would cost $45,000 to deliver letters free in certain large cities. Now if it were wrong in principle to carry newspapers free, was it not equally wrong to deliver letters free? Besides, why should certain large cities have free delivery while residents of cities of seven, eight, nine or ten thousand inhabitants must go the to post office for their letters? If the system was to be adopted it should be extended to all cities towns and villages. In the town in which he resided the post office was a mile distant from some points, and a working man returning from work at six o'clock, could not reach the office before it was closed, and was therefore obliged either to spend time at mid-day to call for a letter or send a messenger for it. But the point to which he wished especially to call the attention of the House was this, that the Government were about to expend from $40,000 to $50,000 to secure free delivery of letters in certain cities, while at the same time they proposed to impose on the publishers of newspapers a burdensome tax in order that the Post Office Department at Ottawa should not be troubled with the accounts which they received from time to time. There were provisions in the law on which he proposed to offer some remarks when the Bill was under discussion, but as only the resolutions were now before the House he would confine himself to that particular point, and he hoped in the interests of the whole Dominion that the hon. Postmaster General would see his way clear, if not to adopt the policy of abolishing newspaper postage altogether, he would so amend the resolutions as not to impose that heavy tax on publishers throughout the country. He entertained however, very little hope that the hon. Postmaster General would concede that point, from the fact that it had been a pet scheme in the Post Office Department for a number of years; this was not the first time on which the attempt had been made to impose the tax, but the Government, knowing they had a very large following in the House at the present moment, thought this was the most opportune time to carry into effect the scheme. He had failed to find a single newspaper in Canada that had approved of the proposed scheme. No doubt the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would say, "It is not likely journals will approve of a scheme which will impose a tax and burden upon themselves;" but the hon. Postmaster General, having those facts before him, should carefully consider whether it was right that the proposed tax should be imposed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon.

member for North Hastings had spoken of the scheme as one imposing a tax on the circulation of newspapers.

Mr. BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that a country weekly newspaper, having a circulation of one thousand copies, paid two hundred dollars a year for postage, being at the rate of twenty cents per number, while under the proposed scheme it would pay only $45 per annum, being a reduction to the extent of three-fourths of the present postage upon newspapers. But what the hon. member really meant to object to was the payment of postage to subscribers by the publishers.

Mr. BOWELL said he had not complained that the Government imposed a tax on the circulation of newspapers; what he did complain of was that the scheme removed the payment of postage from subscribers, and placed it on publishers.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member had, however, spoken of the Government proposal as one which imposed an additional tax on newspapers, whereas it was really one which reduced the cost of postage by three-fourths. It was necessary in order to effect the reduction that the publishers of papers should be called upon to prepay the postage, for it would be very difficult to collect five cents per annum from each subscriber to a weekly journal. The amount would be five cents, supposing ten copies weighed one pound, but twelve, thirteen and even fifteen copies of some papers were required to weigh a pound, so that the tax was very trifling. In regard to the assertion that the scheme would entail a loss on country newspapers of from $150 to $200 a year, he did not believe there were three journals outside of the cities which had a circulation of 4,000 copies. If it was impossible for publishers to obtain a higher price for their journals from subscribers, it must be simply because the publishers had resolved at all hazards to send their papers at a fixed price, for they could fix the charge at what they pleased, and when a reduction was made in the charge for postage, which under the new law would be prepaid by the publisher, subscribers would never object to paying a small increased price for their papers. The cost of mailing the Daily and Weekly Globe was estimated to cost the publishers $10,000 a year, and yet the hon member for Hastings proposed that the Post Office Department should carry the enormous mass of papers represented by that payment without charge. The Government had placed the postage at the lowest possible figure, and to mail free the papers published in the various parts of the Dominion would be to impose too heavy a burden upon the public treasury. With respect to the free delivery of letters in cities, the Government were only carrying gradually into operation the law at present existing, and the "drop" letters which were being sent in enormous numbers would go far towards paying the cost of free delivery. The time would come when the free delivery system would be extended to other places besides the large cities, and when that time arrived the Government would consider how far it should be extended, and no doubt the system would be extended just so far as the necessities of the localities called for its extension with a fair prospect of receiving some remuneration therefor.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he fully concurred in both propositions laid down by the hon First Minister. First, that postage could scarcely be regarded as a tax because it was a charge for services rendered by the Government; and second, that it could not be regarded as the imposition of a tax, if it were held to be a tax, because it was a reduction instead of an increase. But the Government having gone so far in the direction of reduced rates of postage, they should have gone a step further and removed postage from newspapers altogether. He hoped the hon. Postmaster General would reconsider the subject with a view to removing the newspaper postage from which, under the new law, a very small revenue would be received by the department. The great objection to the proposed change in the postal regulations was, that the large reduction it made would be most beneficial to those who were best able to do without it. The change of altering the charge for the carriage of newspapers to a certain amount per lb. had this effect—it favored those who published daily and had a large circulation through the country.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that publishers of daily newspapers sent by express.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER contended that notwithstanding this, the benefit would be largely in favor of extensive publishers. It was, of course, important, that those larger organs should circulate as widely as possible ; but he thought there should be some benefit, as far as possible, extended to smaller organs which had a more limited circulation ; were almost exclusively sent singly, and would, therefore, be subjected to a much higher rate of charge.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They were all sent for the same charge.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was not so much the amount charged as its vexatious character that he complained of. He was satisfied that the small amount the Government proposed to obtain from this surce would be wisely surrendered, in consideration of the immense convenience and satisfaction it would give the people of the country. There was another point in this connection to which he desired to call the attention of the Postmaster General. That was the charge on periodicals. There was no country in the world were it was more desirable that the periodical press should be fostered than in Canada. The difficulty in the way of sustaining that class of literature was very great. It had not the same general or party objects in view as the newspaper press, and publishers of periodicals were obliged, therefore, to depend upon the kind of effort they made, or publish at a loss. He thought if the hon. gentleman would take these things into consideration he would feel that he might relatively reduce the charge proposed upon periodicals, which he thought, in the interests of the country, should be encouraged. There was another feature of the measure—excellent, on the whole, as that measure was—to which he thought great objection would be taken in the country, and, he was afraid, would be productive of great loss and misery in many cases. He saw no pressing necessity for it, and he hoped it would be abandoned. What he referred to was the prepayment of letters.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—I had anticipated my hon. friend's wishes in that respect.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was very glad, indeed, to hear it. All that he had intended to ask was that a letter should go forward, whether pre-paid or otherwise, and seeing that measures had been taken to secure that end, he had not another word to say.

Mr. YOUNG said he had intended to defer any remarks upon this Bill until the House went into Committee of the Whole, and had reached the resolution referring to this matter. However, the hon., the First Minister had stated that he did not see how any one could object to the reduction made, and he (Mr. YOUNG) was prepared to show where and how the objection was taken. The press did not object to the reduction. He (Mr. YOUNG) stated distinctly that he gave credit to the Government for the reduction they had made up to a certain point, but the very fact that they had thrown off the postal charge, except a small amount, was, in his opinion, a very good reason why it should be abolished altogether. As he had stated, the press did not object to the reduction ; what they did object to was, the arrangement in this Bill which made pre-payment absolutely necessary—an arragement by which the postage was virtually placed upon the heads of the publishers. There could not be the slightest doubt that the country publishers would have to pay this postal charge out of their own pockets. Undoubtedly the press of the country were themselves best able to understand whether it would be to their interest or not to have this clause of the measure carried through or otherwise, and it was remarkable that not a single country newspaper, or, at any rate, scarcely a country newspaper, but had taken ground against the pre-payment of postage being made compulsory. He had one or two telegrams in his possession on this subject ; one of them from the President of the Press Association, stating that a petition was on its way to Ottawa, asking that the Government should forego this portion of their measure. He was aware that this charge could not be regarded in the light of a tax, but that was not really the question before the House. The Government had decided to throw off a large proportion of the amount received from postage on newspapers, and the question before the House was not really whether a newspaper ought to pay postage or not, but whether the Government, having abolished the existing postage, except to the small amount of about $10,000, it was a proper thing to make pre-payment compulsory, thereby saddling the publishers with this amount of expense. He held that having gone so far the Government should have gone further, and he did not think it just that the whole of an amount like this should fall upon any particular class of the community. It was claimed that a very large amount of additional matter would be carried through the mails, provided that postage were reduced as proposed. He was not very sure that that would be the case. He was not very sure either if the present scheme were put into force that the newspapers, which send their publications by express at present, would use the mail to any greater extent, for the reason that the postal rate would probably be as high as the express rate (for he did not think that the express rate was more than 12½ cents per 100 lbs.), whereas if sent by post they would have to wait for half an hour or an hour at every post office along the line of railway before they could be delivered, and on the other hand, the express companies would deliver them at once. The total revenue which would be derived from this source would be a mere trifle. He did not think it would exceed $15,000 or $20,000. He took the ground that the proposed regulations would be injurious to the country press, and to some extent beneficial to the city publishers, who sent most of their daily issues by express. It was well known that at present they paid a considerable amount by way of commission to news-dealers, which would be saved by sending their papers through the mail at the reduced postage. The compulsory pre-payment of newspaper postage would compel newspaper publishers in the country to pay from $40, to $60, $80 and $100, and in a few cases $200 a year, which amount would come out of their own pockets, as any one acquainted with the business knew it was impracticable to increase the subscription price of the newspapers so as to cover that amount. The result would be that while city publishers and the public generally were to derive benefit from the reduced postage, this remaining charge left upon newspapers would fall exclusively upon one class, instead of upon the readers of the newspapers. If it was right that the publishers should pay the newspaper postage why was it reduced at all? Evidently the Government felt that in removing this charge from the readers of newspapers to the publishers, they could only do so by reducing the amount, thereby indirectly recognizing the injustice of imposing the charge exclusively upon one particular class. Twenty or twenty-five cents a year on each newspaper was not much to the public, but an additional charge of $100 to $150 without any corresponding benefits, was a good deal to most of country publishers. It should be remembered that the Government possessed a monopoly in the carrying of the mail, and therefore there was all the more reason why they should be careful not to impose any charge that would fall exclusively, and therefore unfairly, upon one class. It was clear at any rate that it would be absolutely unjust to bring this provision of the Bill into force at once. Publishers had already made their contracts with their subscribers for this year, and if they were now called on to pre-pay the postage they would incur a considerable loss; and besides, in a good many cases the subscribers themselves had paid the postage for this year. The whole amount that would be received from newspaper postage was so small that it was not worth while to retain it, when it was shown that it would all have to come out of the pockets of only one class of the people. Another result of the Bill would be that a premium would be offered to publishers to use inferior paper, because the lighter the paper the less would be the postage, and this would tend to the production of an inferior class of newspapers. He believed that the people of this country would gladly make up in some other way the small sum of $15,000 or $20,000, which this postage would produce, and he hoped the Government would yield to the very general feeling there was in the House and the country, and abolish newspaper postage altogether.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked who would benefit by the reduction of newspaper postage from 20 cents to 5 cents.

Mr. YOUNG said that no doubt the readers of newspapers, who were the parties who should pay the postage, if there was to be any, would be benefitted in the first place by the reduction; but whatever they paid at the Post Office, would have to be paid to keep up the Post Office Department, so that there was no real saving to them, whilst the publishers would be injured, because the charge, though reduced, would fall exclusively upon them. The proposal before them would tend to depreciate the Press, whereas the total abolition of postage upon them would help to elevate and improve them, and thus tend to increase the intelligence and morality of the people.

Mr. OLIVER expressed his gratification that the Postmaster General had agreed to consolidate all the postal laws into one Act, but he regretted that the postage on newspapers was retained. It had been stated that the abolition of this postage would reduce the revenue of the Post Office Department; but if it was right to reduce the revenue by providing for the free delivery of letters in cities, and the free transport of the public documents of the various Provinces, why should not the press of the country receive a like benefit? It was stated by the Postmaster General that the free delivery of letters in cities would cause a loss to the revenue of $45,000, but he (Mr. OLIVER) from the best information he could gather, calculated it would be considerably more. The loss that would be occasioned by allowing the public documents of the Provinces to go free would be about $20,000; the two losses amounting to over $65,000, while all that would be derived from newspaper postage would be at the utmost only $25,000. Now, if the people of the cities were to have their letters delivered free, why should not the Government as a set-off grant to the press the abolition of newspaper postage. It was stated by the leader of the Government that the postage on drop letters in cities would pay free for the delivery, but that postage was part of the general Post Office revenue, and should therefore be used for the benefit of the whole country. It was also stated that the amount of postage on newspapers was small, but when it was placed exclusively on one class it was large enough to be oppressive. They had a paper in his own town, Woodstock, that had a circulation of 3,500, and the amount the publisher of that paper would have to pay under the proposed regulations would be $175 a year. It was useless to say that the publisheas could increase their subscription price, because any one that was acquainted with the business knew that that could not be done without causing areduction in the circulation. He trusted it was not yet too late for the Postmaster General to amend his Bill in the direction he had indicated.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for North Hastings and the hon. member for South Waterloo had attacked the free delivery of letters in cities to aid their arguments against imposing a small tax upon newspapers. He would dispose of the objections to the free delivery system, by reading the House the result of it in Montreal since its adoption on November 14th. The number of drop letters in the first week was only 4,961, the next week 6,000, the next 8,000, and it continued to increase until, as shown by the last return received by the Department, it reached 16,365 for one week. He made this statement to show that before he consented to introduce the free delivery in large cities he studied it carefully with his able assistants. They came to the conclusion, from information they had, that the day was not far distant when the free delivery in cities would be self sustaining. He was now in a position to state that it had exceeded their most sanguine expectations, and that he believed at the end of the first year the local postage that they would get through the delivery of letters would about pay the whole expenses of free delivery. With regard to the objection that it was not extended to towns as well as cities, he reminded the House that in the United States there was no free delivery in cities with a population smaller than 20,000.

Mr. BOWELL—What do they do in England?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said it would take many a year before we could become as perfect as England. He was following the example of England in the management of the Post Office as rapidly as he could. The improvement in the postal service was a step in that direction. He had taken a less population for free delivery in this country than they had in the United States. It would be extended to London and Kingston each of which had a population less than twenty thousand. The system would be put in operation as rapidly possible. It was hardly fair to attack the system while it was yet in its infancy. The experience of England and the United States was sufficient justification for its adoption in Canada. With regard to the newspaper postage, he thought when a reduction was made from a yearly charge of 20 cents per paper, or 4½ cents per pound, to one cent per pound. the Government were conferring a boon on the country. The publishers would pay a trifling sum for handling such a large mass of newspapers and making it much easier to handle them, and he was satisfied that before a year or two publishers would find the circulation of their newspapers so largely increased by the removal of this postage that their gain would more than counterbalance the loss. The whole country complained of the nuisance of newspaper postage. The department must have something for handling the newspapers. To meet the objection that the Bill was coming into operation too soon, it was proposed to extend the time to six months hence. In the United States that much time was not given. Prepayment was made compulsory on the 1st January on all mailable matter. No later than last night he received a communication from the Postmaster of New York, stating that: "The circulation of publicaions has increased considerably, owing to the change in the postage rate, and particularly the manner of prepayment, and the publishers are well satisfied throughout. The service is giving most abundant satisfaction, the detail and annoyance inseparable from the old plan being entirely avoided." That was from the Postmaster of the State of New York. He (Mr. MACDONALD) had another communication saying that there was a great increase in mailable matter, although the new system had only commenced on the 1st of January. With reference to under-paid letters, they would not be returned to the parties sending them. It did not seem to be generally understood how newspapers were to be mailed. It was proposed that all papers should go by weight. The half cent postage only referred to transient newspapers, or those not sent from the office of publication. It made no difference whether a publisher mailed say fifty copies to one post office or to fifty different post offices. They would in either case be put into the scales and the postage charged by the pound. Under the convention with the United States, the Department was not prepared to forward letters unless they were fully paid. Letters over weight and insufficiently prepaid would be returned to the sender. In the convention with the United States, they would not undertake to collect anything for us, and consequently we would not undertake to collect anything for them. It would be well, therefore, that the public should know that all communications with the United States must be prepaid, with other foreign countries, with which we have no convention or understanding of that kind, the system would be the same as now until it was regulated, which he hoped would be before long. After carefully weighing and considering the matter, and for months working at it, he had come to the conclusion that it was but fair this small tax should be put upon papers. If one interest received special privileges, others would look for them. The amount of postage was so small, and the time proposed for its coming into operation being the 1st of August, there was no reason why publishers should not make arrangements with their subscribers by which they could charge more for their papers than they were now doing. He hoped the House would take this view of it, and if after a year or two it should be found possible to make a further reduction, no doubt it would be done. He believed this was a step in the right direction, and that the country would find, after having some experience of it, that the Government were justified in bringing in this measure.

Mr. PICKARD said if the effect of this measure would be to increase the amount of mail matter, adding to the weight to be carried by the contractors, he would like to know whether it would increase the cost to the country of carrying the mails.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD replied that the contractors were bound to carry the mails that were delivered to them. There was no weight mentioned in the contracts with them. He believed the effect of this measure would be to increase the bulk of the mails, but the contractors must carry them at the contract rates.

Mr. DYMOND said if the supporters of the Ministry had nothing worse to defend than the acts of a Government which was giving us a free delivery of letters in our cities, a reduction of 75 per cent on newspapers, and a postal convention with the United States, furnishing the freeest possible communication between two great nations, speaking the same language on this continent, they would return to this House in as safe a condition as when they last appealed to the people. If there was one act for which the Government was to be commended, it was for taking a broad and liberal view with regard to the postal service of the country. It was perfectly absurd to spend $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 on building a great railroad, to spend hundreds of thousands in constructing telegraph lines, and in making and deepening canals in all directions, if we did not at the same time improve the channel for the current of free thought and information in the country. At the same time it must be remembered that the postal service was still entailing loss upon the country, and likely to do so for many years to come. Therefore, while we might desire to enjoy the luxury of cheaper postage, either for newspapers or letters, it might be that the enjoyment of that luxury would be imprudent. When a lady once wrote to SYDNEY SMITH suggesting that he should advocate a war in aid of certain weak nationalities, he replied :—"It is true that to go to war in such a cause would be a luxury, but it is the business of a prudent, sensible man, to guard against luxury." In carrying out liberal measures for the extension of the postal service, the mechanical labor of the department should be reduced, and when the Postmaster General was charged with endeavoring to avoid trouble at Ottawa or elsewhere, he was merely charged with exercising the truest economy. With reference to the newspaper postage, he believed that any trade in this country would be delighted to contract with the Government for the delivery of the whole of its products at the same rate. The store-keeper was glad to pay $2 a week to a boy to deliver parcels to his customers, yet some hon. gentlemen complained because publishers were charged at the rate of one dollar per week for the delivery of the entire products of their week's business. Having some little acquaintance with the subject he believed that the circulation of every newspaper would increase to a large extent, provided the article supplied deserved the approval of the public, by this reduction in postage. People in the country districts thought a great deal of very little money, and a reduction of twenty cents a year on the price of a newspaper would be a reason with many of them for taking it. It would be well worth while for newspaper proprietors to use these fifteen cents in increasing the circulation of their publications. He did not mean by that the mere profit on the newspaper which was trifling, but every additional newspaper brought with it additional advertising. The Postmaster General had given a satisfactory reply to the question why free delivery was not extended to towns and villages as well as to cities, where free delivery would pay for itself. He hoped the day would come when every man in the land would have his letters brought to his door, as in the old country. This measure was characterized by very wise liberalty and showed a sound practical knowledge of their business on the part of those who had devised this measure, and due regard for economy in the public expenditure for which they were entitled to the thanks and confidence of the House.

Mr. WILKES said it was a mistake to say that free delivery in cities was a tax on those who resided in the country for the benefit of the urban population. It was simply giving further service for the same price It would be as unreasonable as to say that the residents of places where there was only a daily or tri-weekly mail was delivered were paying for the two or three mails delivered every day in large cities. The Postmaster General's reply on this question would be satisfactory to the House. He (Mr. WILKES) had taken the trouble to refer to the experience in England from 1839 to 1873. The number of letters supposed to have been delivered in 1839 was four per head of the population of England and Wales, or say one per head of the United Kingdom. In 1873 the number for England and Wales was 32, or 13 per head for the Kingdom, making an increase of thirteen times from 1840 to 1873. Hon. gentlemen would remember that cheap postage and free delivery were introduced within this period. He did not hesitate to say the increase was largely due to free delivery in London and the large metropolitan districts. It was reasonable to expect that a similar result would attend the introduction of the system into Canada. He wished to know what provision was made for compulsory pre-payment of postage.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—If there is a stamp upon a letter, even if that letter is over weight, the over weight will be charged ; if there is no stamp at all, the letter will be sent to the Dead Letter Office.

Mr. WILKES said this would be received with general satisfaction. If the postage were left optional, and the public could pre-pay or not, it would entail a great deal of difficulty and decrease the amount of postal matter forwarded. Hon. members who condemned the newspaper postage seemed to forget that in the case of the large city newspapers, no such saving was effected. The publishers now pay the express companies. This amendment was simply a postal system undertaking to do what was now done by the express companies. He maintained that there was no just cause why our parcel delivery should not be largely increased, and why increased facilities should not be furnished on railways for this branch of the postal service. He did think that the time had fully come when that system should be taken hold of by the Government, as it was in France and Switzerland. The railways in England did their own express business, and they did it with cheapness and efficiency. He hoped that the carriage of newspapers, at least, would all be done by the Government ; but he could not see that it would be a proper thing to do it for nothing. It might perhaps be a very desirable thing, in order to foster certain industries in the country, that their letters should be carried free of charge, but what right would they have to get such a service performed at the public expense. Those who had the benefit of such a service should pay for it.

Mr. YOUNG—These are the subscribers in this case.

Mr. WILKES said no real argument had been advanced so far to show why this charge should be remitted. In fact, the country newspaper would profit more largely than any other by the proposed arrangement. The great difficulty with the country newspapers was that they were placed in competition with the weekly issues of the great central dailies. These were delivered in large qnantities by express, but the express companies did not send their messengers into the parts of the country to which the circulation of the country weekly was principally confined. He considered that the proposition of the Postmaster General gave these newspapers a chance of enlarging their circulation very considerably, because the paper was cheapened to the public, and would therefore be in greater demand. He hoped the proposal of the Government would be agreed to by the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN complimented the Postmaster General for having in this Bill taken a step in the right direction. The service that his hon. friend had performed in giving us greater postal facilities with the United States, was one that was received with great favor in Canada, and of itself the proposal to reduce newspaper postage, was a commendable one. It was unfortunate, however, that it involved somewhat of a grievance to country newspapers, and he observed that the country publishers were complaining that it was unjust that they should be taxed in the pre-payment of postage on their papers, on the ground that it would be a serious burden upon them, and would increase the expense connected with the publication of their papers. An increase of expense, as every one knew, was detrimental to the circulation. The majority of them had a circulation limited enough already, competition being very great. If it were at all possible he would like to see this matter rectified. He believed also the country generally would like to see a change made. The revenue derived from this source was very small, so small that he thought it might well be dispensed with. He heartily appreciated the advantages that had recently been conferred upon the people by the Post Office Department, and believed the country generally felt very grateful for them. He hoped this feeling would not be disturbed by insisting upon this provision which told so heavily against the Provincial press.

Mr. MILLS called attention to the wording of sections 22 and 23, which he was afraid would not be interpreted generally as they had been by the Postmaster General. He agreed with the hon. Minister that the proposals were very proper ones, but he was of opinion that these provisions would be differently understood by postmasters throughout the country. He thought it would be well if some verbal alterations were made so that the meaning of the resolutions might be perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL expressed satisfaction at the progress the Postmaster General was making in assimilating our system to the English one. He strongly recommended that the Government should allow this question to be discussed entirely apart from political feeling, and throw themselves open to accept suggestions from every side of the House. He (Mr. MITCHELL) strongly favored the entire removal of postage from newspapers, and he believed if a considerable majority of the House should be in favor of it, the Postmaster General should not insist upon retaining the clause to which objection was taken. The general circulation of newspapers he considered to be the best means of educating the people. He therefore hoped that the country publishers would not be placed at any disadvantage. He made these suggestions with a sincere desire to have such a bill as would be most beneficial to the public.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said it had been stated that the Bill was likely to operate in favor of the metropolitan papers, and against the country weeklies. Now, it so happened that five numbers of the Weekly Globe made a pound, and it required on the average thirteen ordinary country weeklies to make a pound. He failed to see in that case where the country newspaper was likely to suffer. On the contrary, he maintained it was likely to be a great advantage to them.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said they would suffer in this way—that while metropolitan journals could send their publications in large quantities and very cheaply by express companies, the country newspapers had to send the whole of their matter through the post.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said that the express companies would certainly not send the matter much cheaper than it was proposed to be sent by post under this Bill.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MCLENNAN in the chair.

Mr. YOUNG moved in amendment "That the following be substituted for the twenty-second sub-section of Clause 3: "That newspapers and periodical publications printed and published in Canada, and issued not less frequently than once a month from a known office of publication or news agency, and addressed and posted by and from the same to regular subscribers or news agents, shall be carried through the mails free, and such newspapers and periodicals shall be put up into packages and delivered into the Post Office, and the postage rate thereon prepaid by the sender thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may from time to time direct." He said that the arguments adduced in favor of the clause as submitted did not alter his opinion that the change was made mainly to suit the convenience of officials in the head office, and that practically it would operate disadvantageously to the country and advantageously to the city press. The city newspapers expended large sums in paying commissions to country agents, and those charges would be largely reduced by the system of mailing papers. The revenue derived from the newspaper postage would not exceed $10,000 per annum, and it was doubtful whether the newspapers would be sent by mail or by express.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), as seconder of the amendment, said the design of the amendment was to abolish entirely and completely the newspaper postage and to allow, as far as Government was concerned, the free circulation of newspaper literature. In Ontario, as well as in the other Provinces, a large sum was annually drawn from the public exchequer for educational purposes, the annual vote in Ontario amounting to half a million dollars. The educational vote in the different Provinces was among the most popular appropriations. Assuming the loss to the revenue to be $10,000, if the newspaper postage were abolished, the Government were liberally expending money upon objects which would be productive of less public good than that of securing the free circulation of newspaper literature throughout the Dominion. He hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I say most decidedly that the Government cannot accept this amendment. We have gone a long way towards cheapening newspaper literature. We have reduced the postage on newspapers seventy-five per cent., and if hon. gentlemen are determined to still further reduce it, the only effect will be to defeat the Bill altogether.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said after the very extraordinary announcement of the First Minister, he would like to know more distinctly its purport. Did the First Minister intend to intimate that the Government would treat the carrying of this amendment as a defeat, because if they did he had no hesitation in saying that he would vote with the Government, as he would be unwilling to bring about their defeat. However, he hoped the First Minister would not treat the matter so seriously, but would, good-naturedly, defer to the wishes of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am exceedingly obliged to my hon. friend for his promised support.

Mr. MILLS observed that the argument in favor of the abolition of newspaper postage on the ground that it would promote public education, would equally apply to the abolition of postage on books, pamphlets and other forms of literature. As he had before stated the Government in carrying the mails were performing functions that were no necessary part of governmental duty. They had nothing to do with the protection of life and property. The Government, as a matter of public convenience, had assumed the work of common carriers, and they imposed a charge for the work they performed. That charge was not sufficient to cover the expense incurred, and he thought the Government were going a long way towards encouraging newspaper literature when they carried newspapers for a less charge than it cost them. The expense of doing this work must be met in some way, and he knew of no fairer way than by charging it to those who were interested in having the newspapers carried. It must be paid for by those who did not take the papers if it was not paid by those who did. He was satisfied that the effect of abolishing newspaper postage would be to close up a number of small offices and prevent the opening of new ones in sparsely populated districts, because the revenue would be so reduced that the Government could not afford to keep up those offices. He was also satisfied that the people would rather pay the small postage on newspapers and have their post offices near at hand than be compelled to go five or six miles to find a post office.

Mr. BOWELL asked what was the present income from newspaper postage.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—About $85,000.

Mr. YOUNG said he had a return two years ago which stated the total amount to be $60,000, one-half of which was from postage on transient papers, and the other half from papers sent from the office of publication. In the Public Accounts of last year the revenue was put down at $72,000, one-half of which would be $36,000.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said he was satisfied that under the new Bill they would receive $40,000 from newspaper postage, the amount now received was nearly $90,000. The system of collecting the postage at the office of delivery was a demoralizing one, and it was impossible to get all the money that should properly be received. He was satisfied that in proportion to the rate a much larger revenue would be received under the proposed system than was now received. Under the proposed system the postmasters would be relieved of a great deal of trouble and annoyance, and the revenue could be much more easily collected.

Mr. PALMER wished to understand clearly what was the effect of the declaration of the First Minister. He was in favor of the amendment, but he was also in favor of the Bill, and he would not vote for the amendment if it was going to defeat the Bill.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said there would be no difficulty in understanding the purport of the observation of the First Minister. He regarded the portion of the Bill which was proposed to be amended as an essential part of the Bill, and if the House decided to abolish newspaper postage, it would be for the Government to consider whether they would go on with the Bill.

Mr. PALMER said he wished to know whether if the amendment was carried the Bill would be dropped.

Mr. BOWELL observed that there could be no misunderstanding the declaration of the First Minister. The only inference that could be drawn from it was that if the amendment was carried the Bill would be dropped, although it was understood at the outset that the measure was not to be treated as a party measure, but that the Government would be prepared to accept the suggestions of the House. He wished to call the attention of the Postmaster General to this fact. The hon. gentleman estimated that he would lose $40,000 by the reduction on newspaper postage, and that the present revenue from that source was $90,000. He also stated that he reduced the postage 75 per cent., which would reduce the $90,000 to $22,500. He (Mr. BOWELL), therefore, supposed that the Postmaster General expected to increase the $22,500 to $40,000 by the additional newspaper matter which would be sent through the post office on account of the reduction—an expectation which was not at all likely to be realized. With reference to the arguments of the member for Bothwell, if they meant anything they meant that the Post Office Department should be made self-sustaining, and that the postage on letters should be increased so as to cover the actual expense. The hon. member also argued that the effect of the removal of newspaper postage would be to close up a number of country post offices. Under the present system the postmasters were allowed a commission for collecting the postage on newspapers, and he (Mr. BOWELL) would like to be informed if the Government intended to pay postmasters for the loss of this commission. So far as the Bill for the House went, there was nothing to show that they would receive anything, and yet the hon. member for Bothwell would have us believe that the removal of the postage would close up a number of offices.

Mr. MILLS—My statement was that the Government could not afford to establish new offices.

Mr. BOWELL said they had yet to learn that the Government intended to pay the postmasters anything in lieu of the commission they were now receiving. If they did then the increased revenue that the Postmaster General anticipated would never be realized, because according to the member for Bothwell it would require the whole amount received from newspaper postage to compensate postmasters for the loss of their commission.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said the question of compensating the postmasters had not been lost sight of by the department, but that could not be settled until the new Act was in operation for some little time.

Mr. BOWELL in reference to a remark of the First Minister, proceeded to say that he had never attacked the system of free delivery in cities. On the contrary he approved of it, and did not see why it should not be extended to the large towns because the increase in the amount of postal matter which it would cause would be as great in proportion to the expense in the large towns as in the cities. In fact, he hoped the day was not far distant when we would have free delivery in the country parts also as in England. But what he had stated was that the principle of delivering newspapers free was based upon the same ground as the principle of delivering letters free. It was stated that the postage could be added to the subscription price, but that would be impracticable, and the result would be that the publishers would under the system of compulsory prepayment be obliged to pay the postage and get no return for it. While he would vote for the abolition of newspaper postage, he did not so much object to it as he did to the mode in which it was proposed to be imposed.

The Committee rose and reported progress, and it being six o'clock the SPEAKER left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the resolutions in respect to the Postage Bill; Mr. MCLENNAN in the chair.

Mr. YOUNG said every hon. member understood that in moving his amendment he had no desire whatever to interfere with the passage of the measure which the Hon. Postmaster General had brought down. He had stated on a previous occasion that the Bill, as a whole, was a good one, that there were many excellent features in it, and he gave the hon. the Postmaster General considerable credit for having carried out a convention with the United States with respect to postal affairs. At the same time he regarded the feature of the Bill relating to newspaper postage as a defect, but a minor one, and a question upon which hon. members might reasonably differ in opinion. He thought that on a minor point the Government would be prepared to accede to the general opinion of the House, and he was not, therefore, prepared to find the hon. Premier take the position he had with respect to that minor feature of the Bill, one which would not affect its principle in any essential particular. He (Mr. YOUNG) scarcely thought the ground ought to be taken that the Bill would be materially affected by a change made in that particular point. The whole matter in dispute was an exceedingly small one, and if the Government had seen their way to accede to the demand made upon them, and left it an open question to the House, they would have taken a step which would have given not only satisfaction to the country, but to the majority of the members of the House. The Government being determined to oppose the amendment, it was quite evident, after the statement made by the hon. the First Minister, that the amendment would necessarily fall to the ground. At the same time he held strongly the opinion that the Bill was defective in that regard, and that a hardship would be imposed on an important section of the community, of which they would have good reason to complain. In justice to himself he felt bound to notice some of the remarks which had been made by hon. members during the debate. The hon. Postmaster General had stated that the postage on newspapers was a nuisance — that the public looked upon it as a miserable arrangement. He (Mr. YOUNG) concurred in that view, and admitted that the public regarded the newspaper postage as an arrangement giving them much trouble ; but if the public had been asked to express an opinion, it would not have been that the nuisance should be taken from their shoulders and placed on the newspaper publishers in the country. With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell, he ventured to remind that gentleman that three or four years ago he voted for the total abolition of newspaper postage, and yet when the Government had removed three-fourths of the postage, he could not see his way to vote for its entire removal. With respect to the amount of revenue which would probably be lost to the Post Office if the newspaper postage were entirely removed, he (Mr. YOUNG) disagreed with the statement of the Postmaster General who now spoke of it as $40,000, whereas he understood him at first to say it would be only $25,000.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD explained that he anticipated receiving $15,000 over the amount which would be received under the present system, viz., $25,000.

Mr. YOUNG (continuing) said that even at his own calculation, it could not be so much as that. The present total revenue the Postmaster General stated to be $90,000. Taking one half as representing the papers sent direct from office of publication, we had $45,000 and if the hon. gentleman's bill reduced the postage three fourths, as he claimed, the total amount would not exceed $12,000. Adding any increase from papers now sent by express he (Mr. Y.) believed the revenue would not be greater than he had previously stated, that the loss to the revenue would not exceed $12,000. The real question, however, was whether the postage should be thrown upon this particular class. On the whole he thought it would have been a just and graceful act if the Government had entirely abolished this impost upon newspapers. The whole amount was a mere bagatelle. What was $20,000 to a department that expended so much. If they had taken this course it would have been an additional reason for giving thanks to the Postmaster General for a Bill which, on the whole, was a most excellent measure.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said that instead of finding fault with the Postmaster General the House ought to recognize the fact that the changes made by the Government on the suggestions offered them, were most acceptable to the country considering the large amount of revenue they were dispensing with. He (Mr. CAMERON) would have been exceedingingly glad if the Government had felt it was in their power to remove from the newspaper press the burden which so many gentlemen said would rest upon it under this arrangement. When the Government had made such large improvements by this Act, the House ought to be perfectly satisfied with what had been done and they should not expect more. If the Postmaster General had gone as far as possible he should not be embarrassed. He (Mr. CAMERON) was thankful, as a member of this House for the changes the Government had made in this Act, and was perfectly prepared to do everything he possibly could to support the Government in carrying this measure through.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said if the Government had not made this such a decided part of their policy he would have voted for the amendment. The complaint against the tax was not so much because of its amount as the inconvenience it entailed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE felt exceedingly obliged to the hon. member for Cardwell for tendering his assistance to the Government in this matter. They would carefully watch the working of this act, particularly noting this clause, and if it should be deemed advisable, to make further changes, it could be done at a future time.

Hon. Mr. POPE raised a question of order. The amendment was moved by an interested party—a newspaper man.

Mr. YOUNG said he was formerly connected with the newspaper press, but anything he had done in this matter was in the public interest.

Mr. BOWELL wished the Premier to understand that his opposition to this clause was not because he was once connected with the press, but because he believed he was right. On a former occasion when he moved a resolution to abolish newspaper postage, the hon. member for Chateauguay seconded his motion and voted with him. However the change from the Opposition to the Government side of the House, seemed to have changed the hon. gentleman's views.

The amendment was lost on a division, and the clause was agreed to.

The fourth clause was agreed to without discussion.

On the 5th resolution,

Mr. MOSS said this resolution seemed to provide that letters insufficiently stamped would be returned to the sender, whereas he understood the intention was to forward such letters, and charge the receiver double postage.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said this resolution applied only to letters addressed to the United States. Such letters, if not sufficiently stamped, would be returned, or otherwise the department would receive no postage from them at all. But in the case of letters addressed to any part of Canada, if they were insufficiently stamped an additional stamp would be placed on them, and they would be forwarded, and the receiver would be charged with the additional stamp. But if they were not stamped at all they would be sent to the Dead Letter Office, there opened and returned to the sender.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was sorry that this course had been decided on with reference to unstamped letters. Frequently in the hurry of stamping a number of letters some might be omitted or the stamp might be rubbed off, and very serious trouble and annoyance—perhaps in some cases loss of business credit or loss of human life—would be occasioned by such letters not being forwarded. Then parties might be so situated that it would be impossible for them to obtain stamps at a time when it was of vital importance that a letter should be sent without delay.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said the system of pre-payment of postage would be useless if they opened the door to non-payment by agreeing to send letters that were not pre-paid. If a letter was not pre-paid it would be immediately sent to Ottawa, and returned to the sender as quickly as possible. He would take care that the delay which occurred heretofore in returning letters sent to the Dead Letter Office would not be continued, but that such letters would be forwarded promptly to the sender.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) thought the Bill as it stood would give very general satisfaction. The cases referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland would occur very seldom, especially after the public became familiar with the law. He had received letters from his constituents, and others speaking of the importance of compulsory pre-payment, and asking him to urge it upon the Government.

Mr. CURRIER said no doubt it was objectionable that the Department should have the opportunity of examining private letters, but nevertheless the advantages of compulsory pre-payment to business men was so great that he would support it.

Mr. WILKES suggested that post masters be allowed to return unstamped letters direct to the sender in all cases where the address of the sender appeared on the envelope.

Mr. BOWELL pointed out the absolute necessity, if pre-payment was to be compulsory, of providing greater facilities than is at present for the sale of postage stamps, because very often business men and others wished to mail letters after the post offices were closed, and they could not be expected to have always a supply of stamps on hand.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said he had not yet refused a single application for permission to sell postage stamps. Since the House met the department had granted over fifty permissions to sell stamps.

Mr. BOWELL said he was not aware that the regulations had been relaxed.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD stated in reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Centre Toronto, that that was a matter of departmental regulation, and he would take care that unpaid letters which contained the address of the sender on the envelope would be returned direct to the sender.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL pointed out the disadvantages that business men would be under if letters which through the inadvertence or carelessness of a clerk were unstamped were to be sent to Ottawa and not forwarded to its destination. Such letter might contain an acceptance, and the result of its being delayed might cause very serious financial injury to the sender. He thought the Department would be sufficiently protected in the case of unpaid letters by charging double postage, and if that was not enongh he would prefer to see the fine doubled or trebled rather than that such letters should not be forwarded. He objected to the position taken by the Premier in reference to the amendment proposed, and with reference to a remark of the hon. member for Chateauguay, he said it was absurd to suppose that the amendment affected a vital and essential part of the Bill.

The fifth and remaining resolutions were then adopted and the committee rose and reported them. Concurrence to-morrow.

BANKS AND BANKING.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of a Bill to amend the "Act respecting Banks and Banking."

The Bill was read a second time.

The House then went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. BROUSE in the chair.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Bill which it was now poposed was a formal one merely intended to remedy certain manifest defects in one or two clauses of the Act relating to Banks and Banking; but it had been suggested—and the suggestion appeared to be a sound and reasonable one—that while Parliament was amending that Act it could with advantage remedy certain faults in other clauses of the Act. Under the present law banks were prevented from making loans on security of their own stocks, but he had been informed very recently that certain banks bought their own stock, and whatever objection might be urged to banks having money on their stock applied in a greater degree to purchasing their own stock. He, therefore, proposed to amend clause No. 6 of the Act to meet the case. He (Mr. CARTWRIGHT) moved that the House rise and report progress.

Mr. DOMVILLE objected to the form of the bank statements which were published, remarking that the two headings, "Liabilities not included under the foregoing head" and "Assets not included before" were of such a character as to practically cover up any deficiency and prevent stockholders from being able to ascertain, from the published statements, the precise position of the banks.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he would take the matter into consideration; but the present Bill was simply to amend the Act in mere formal particulars, while the objection raised by the hon. member was of a more serious character, and would require careful consideration.

Mr. YOUNG called attention to the circumstance that some of the banks in the Dominion did not regularly publish their statements. He inquired if some steps could not be taken to compel all the banks in each Province to publish their monthly statements with regularity.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said some of the banks acted under charters not granted by the Dominion Parliament, and until those charters lapsed the Government had not absolute power over them. All the banks which were entirely under the control of the Government published their statements regularly.

The committee then rose and reported.

INSPECTION OF GAS.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION moved the second reading of the Bill to amend the Act 36 Vic., Cap. 48, relating to the inspection of gas.

Bill read a second time.

The House then went into committee, Mr. PELLETIER in the chair, and reported the Bill without amendment.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER, in moving that the House do resolve itself into Committee on the Bill to amend the Act respecting controverted elections, stated that he intended to propose amendments in Committee in accordance with the suggestions made by several hon. members, especially by the hon. members for Cardwell and South Bruce.

Mr. MACKENZIE BOWELL thought some explanation should be given by the Minister of Justice for introducing this Bill, as he saw no reason to stay proceedings in connection with the trial of controverted Elections during the session of Parliament. The hon. Minister of Justice ought to furnish the House with satisfactory reasons for proposing to make this amendment to the act, for it was a direct interference with the courts in the different Provinces of the Dominion. If a gentleman occupied a seat in the House that he was not entitled to keep, there was no good reason why the House should intervene to prevent the courts from setting aside the Election. It might be convenient for hon. members whose elections had been contested that the House should intervene and stay proceedings, but he understood the object in passing the Controverted Election Law was to faciliate the removal of members from the House who had been guilty of corrupt practices. The hon. Premier in a speech delivered at Cornwall, not very long since, called attention to the fact that if trial by Judges had then been in operation, certain members of the House would not have held their seats for any length of time. Now we find that when a large number of seats are being contested and the cases are before the courts, that the Government come down with a Bill to prevent the courts from proceeding with the cases and voiding seats which are held by gentlemen who probably have no right to them. If the Bill in its present shape were adopted the Controverted Election Act had better be abolished altogether, and we had better revert to the old regime, by which members threw all possible difficulties in the way to prevent themselves being unseated. There might be the most flagrant cases of corruption if the law were amended as proposed, particularly if the election should take place immediately prior to the calling together of the House, every member so elected, no matter if it were by corrupt practices, would hold his seat for at least one session; that was certainly not the intention of Parliament when the Controverted Election Act was passed. He quite concurred, however, in the amendment to provide that parties contesting elections should be compelled to go on within a certain time, or drop the proceedings altogether, because election cases should not be held in terrorem over the heads of members for two or three years. Election cases that had been tried before the courts showed that corruption of a grievous character took place at the last election, when it was known that $20,000, and even $30,000 had been spent in some constituencies at one or two elections. Was the House to be told, particularly the party which had made this question their hobby, that those gentlemen, if they happened to be returned, should be permitted to hold their seats and assist in enacting laws, occupy positions on important committees, when in in fact they had no right to sit in the House? From the election trials which had taken place before the courts, it appeared not only that large sums of money were spent at elections in "elevating the standard," but several cases were brought to light where members of the Government had actually interfered and used their influence improperly to elect their own candidates, notwithstanding the fact, which the records of Parliament would show, that they placed on the journals of the House their opinions, condemning any act on the part of Ministers of the Crown in interfering, either directly or indirectly, with any official in election matters. Yet in one case it was proved that a Minister of the Crown promised indirectly that $8,000 out of the revenues of Ontario should be spent upon roads, if only a certain gentleman was returned. In another case a Minister of the Crown wrote to certain parties promising that he would provide a position for a certain young man if he voted right, and the Minister did give him a situation, which he, no doubt, now held. Contrasting those acts with the declarations made in the House not many years ago by the party opposite, the confessed it appeared to him to be as range procedure for the Government now to come down and ask the House to stop proceedings in controverted election trials during the Parliamentary session. There were many other cases to which he could call the attention of hon. members in which Ministers had interfered with elections by writing letters to constituents, in order to place a candidate then before the people in such a light as to induce the electors, if possible, to reject him, by sending telegrams, and using other means. When it was found that large amounts of money had been expended by the very people who had been preaching the doctrine of "elevating the standard of political morality," they should be the last persons to come to the House and ask it to pass a law which would prevent the courts from proceeding with their inquiry, and to decide as to who had the right to a seat in Parliament. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he expressed no opinion on the cases now before the courts, because he knew nothing respecting them; he was only speaking of what had transpired and what might possibly transpire in the future in connection with those cases that were to be tried. For these reasons he, as a member of the House, was opposed to any interference with the law as it existed in that regard. He hoped the hon. Minister of Justice would adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Cardwell, in order that all parties guilty of corrupt practices at elections might be punished; for until some provision was made which would compel the Judge who held the case to report those who had been proved guilty of corrupt practices, either to the County Attorney or, to this House, when it would become the duty of the Minister of Justice to send those cases to the courts in order that the guilty parties might be punished, all our legislation would fail to accomplish the object which Parliament had in view in passing the Controverted Elections Act, viz., the prevention of corrupt practices. A large number of persons guilty of corrupt practices at the late elections had been reported to the House, and yet no action had been taken on the part of the Government to punish those guilty of bribery or corruption. The reason for this could be interpreted in this way: both parties in the House had friends in that position, and neither wished to take action which would compel their punishment. If it were desirable to prevent the bribery and the corruption which had prevailed in the past at elections, the suggestion of the hon. member for Cardwell should be adopted in order to obtain the punishment of persons who had been guilty of such corrupt practices, and it would be well to amend the Bill so as to carry out the doctrine laid down in the resolution moved a year ago by the hon. Premier, to punish any member of the Government who attempted to interfere, improperly in the elections of the different constituencies.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had never objected to ministers interfering in elections, and he defied the hon. gentleman to point out a single case where he had made any such objection. He had, however, objected to ministers, or the chief officials of the Government bringing the power of the Crown to bear on any of the servants of the Government, in order to induce them to take certain action in elections; he objected to threats being made by a high official in the Post-Office to compel postmasters to vote in a certain way, and he made a motion on that occasion. But he never objected to ministers taking part in elections, for they were bound to look after their own party and their own interests in that respect. He, or any other minister, had precisely the same liberty as any hon. member of the House to attend election meetings and advocate, by fair argument and fair means, the election of their own friends. He did not know who the hon. member for Hastings alluded to when he spoke of some minister offering $8,000 for some specific purpose; he had never heard of it before.

Mr. BOWELL—I did not say so.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be much better when an hon. member made charges to make them specifically. He saw in the Tory press, last summer, that he had attended a large meeting and addressed the workingmen and engineers on the Grenville Canal in support of the present member during the election, while passing through that county. He made no public denial of the charge, because he thought it was not needed. He did not conceive it to be possible that he had been guilty of the wrong doing of addressing any of the Government employees on such a subject. He held no meeting—did not interfere, in any way whatever, with the election. If there had been a meeting of the county, he would have attended it and spoken in favor of the Government candidates, but it was an entirely different thing to accuse him of having endeavored to interfere with the action of employees of the Government in election matters. He had never done that, nor had he ever spoken to a single servant of the Government in respect to election matters. As to the other point of objection raised by the hon. member for Hastings to the Bill before the House, there was this to be said : the sessions of the Dominion Parliament now averaged about two months. If proceedings were taken after the House commenced its sittings, it appeared to be practically impossible to have an election case tried, a new writ issued, and a new member returned, before the close of the session ; and it was disfranchising a county when proceedings were taken, a member unseated, and a new election ordered during a sitting of the House, and it was not advisable that any constituency should be disfranchised in that manner. That view was taken by a large number of the members of the House. It seemed to him, although it was not brought to his attention until after the House met, that it was a very reasonable proposition, and it was for the purpose of giving effect to that proposition that the Bill was introduced. The Government were not called upon to take proceedings against those reported by the Judges as having acted improperly in connection with elections. That was a matter for those who had charge of the administration of justice in the respective Provinces, unless some law were passed making it a specific duty of the Government under certain circumstances. This had not been done. The law was in this respect somewhat different from the law in England, with which he presumed it was the purpose of the hon. member for Cardwell to assimilate our statute. There was no objection to that, but in the meantime the Government were not called upon to take the course the hon. gentleman proposed.

Mr. PLUMB said he was surprised to hear the arguments of the leader of the Government. So far as he understood it, the law intended that a man should not sit in Parliament who had been improperly elected. The trial of a protest should be as speedy as possible. The Premier stated that by proceeding with the trial while the House was sitting, the constituency interested was practically disfranchised, but it was surely better that the constituency should not be represented than that it should be misrepresented by a man who had got the seat by corrupt and improper means. Every means should be taken to see whether objections taken to a member's election were well founded, or whether he did not hold his seat properly. If this Act were passed, any man who had an ulterior object in getting into Parliament for a session might buy himself into his seat and hold it until his purpose was fulfilled. The responsibility would rest upon hon. gentlemen opposite for placing upon the Statute Book what he (Mr PLUMB) did not hesitate to call an atrocious Act.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said when his hon. friend from Niagara was pointing out the defects in the Controverted Elections Act he might have gone a little further and told the House that it was possible under the present law for a member who had been unseated by a Judge to take a sham appeal, an appeal he did not intend to prosecute, in order that time might be obtained for altering the constituency in some respects by a new list of voters being put in, and after that object had been accomplished—after he had used the process of law, not for the purposes for which it was intended, but for a sham purpose—to withdraw the appeal and go to the constituency again.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon. gentleman had referred to his own case, and he would therefore state that he forced the opposing counsel to bring on the trial as speedily as possible, and after he was unseated he found there was a fraudulent voters' list, and that a certain gentleman was endeavoring to bring on the election under that fraudulent list. Under those circumstances h took the appeal for the purpose of getting an honest voters' list, and preventing the perpetration of a gross fraud, and when he had accomplished that object he withdrew the appeal.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said the member for Hastings had stated that a Minister of the Crown had offered a bribe of $8,000 to a constituency.

Mr. BOWELL—What I said was that it transpired in evidence that a Minister of the Crown had been using his influence and directly or indirectly promising a sum of money out of the Ontario Treasury in order to accomplish certain ends.

Mr. McDOUGALL said if any discredit attached to any one in connection with that matter it rested with him. What transpired at his election trial was that allusion had been made by him at a meeting in his constituency to the fact that the Ontario Government were about to spend $8,000 in a portion of the constituency. He thought he was perfectly justified in calling the attention of the electors to the fact that a Reform Government were willing to treat that question of the constituency with more justice than the former Government had been. Thereupon an elector asked whether that was likely to be done by a particular person that was sent to Parliament. He replied that if such matters were treated in the same way as they had been by the former Government in all probability the amount would be affected in some degree by what was done by the electors in making their choice. If any blame was to be attached to any one for making that statement it was to him alone.

Mr. PALMER said he had very serious objections to this Bill. He could understand some reason for providing that no trial should go on during the session of Parliament ; but there was no reason why an appeal might not be prosecuted during the session.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said when he sent the draft of the Bill to the law clerk there was no reference in it to appeals. That provision had been inserted by the law clerk.

Mr. PALMER said if that provision was struck out the best part of the Bill would be struck out, but still he thought it was best to leave the whole question of whether a trial should be carried on during the session of Parliament in the hands of the Judges.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE remarked that as the Minister of Justice had stated he intended to embody some of the suggestions proposed by other members it would be well to go at once into committee and then the House would be aware of what suggestion the Minister intended to adopt.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON approved of the suggestion, and added that it would be well after the Minister of Justice laid his propositions before the committee for the committee to rise and report progress, in order that time might be given for full consideration.

The House then went into Committee, Mr. MILLS in the chair.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON contended that the question of whether a trial should proceed during the session or not might safely be left with the Judges. There were a great many proceedings in connection with these trials, at which it was not at all necessary for the member petitioned against to be present, and it would be a pity for these proceedings to be stayed. Then if it was necessary that the member should be personally examined, there were means for doing that at the seat of Government.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE thought that many of the observations of the hon. member for Cardwell were deserving of attention. The most injurious consequences of the Act as it stands were these : Supposing it should turn out that a member was unseated during a session of Parliament, it was perfectly plain that no new election could take place involving the return of a member to this House in time to take part in the business of the session. The constituency would remain unrepresented till the next session. In any case in which the presence of a member was not required at the trial, there could be no possible object in delaying it, but in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the grounds on which petitions were filed, were for bribery, either personal or by agents. In such cases the accused should be present at their trials. In that class of cases a member should not be interfered with during a session of Parliament. The House had also to consider the injury which might result from ten or twelve trials going forward during a session, occasioning the absence of as many members who might be leading men in Parliament.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said his idea was that Parliament should not take the matter out of the hands of the tribunal in which they had placed it, but in the amendment they were making they should direct the attention of the Judges to the point they were speaking of. It would never do to make the judges believe that now, after passing a stringent election law and Controverted Election Act, Parliament was setting itself against their operation. The Judges should be given power, where they deem it necessary, to suspend further proceedings so long as Parliament sits.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE was quite willing that it should be left to the Judges to determine whether there was really a case for the presence of a member at a trial, but the sense of Parliament ought to be manifested that if there should be a case for the presence of the accused, he ought not to be called away during the session.

Mr. PALMER quite approved of this view.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK also approved of the suggestion, but thought the Judges should not be led into the belief that if they were going to avoid the election they should postpone their decision. There was another particular in which the English Act might be copied. A distinction should be made between those constituencies which were reported to be untainted with corruption and those where corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. He wished to know the orders with reference to the issue of writs. The Kingston election case was decided on December 2nd, the writ was immediately issued, and the election was held on the 29th December. On December 5th, three days latter, the East Toronto case was decided. but the writ was not issued immediately as in the other case, nor until three weeks after He wished to know why the same course was not pursued in both cases.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The cause was that we wished to have the election held on the same day as the election for the Local Legislature, to save trouble. The same thing would have been done in East Middlesex if we had had time.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had communicated with his friend from Cardwell, and they had agreed upon an amendment. The clause, as he proposed to amend it, would read as follows:—Whenever it appears to the court or to the Judge that the respondent's presence at the trial is necessary, the trial of the petition shall not be commenced during any session of Parliament, and in the computation of any delay allowed for any step or proceeding in respect of any such trial, or for the commencement of such trial under the next following section, the time occupied by any such session shall not be reckoned.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER assented to the amendment.

On the second clause,

Mr. MACDONALD (Inverness), called attention to the fact that under the law as it stands, the security given by the petitioner might be perfectly solvent at the time the petition was filed, but when the trial stood over for nine months or a year, something might have occurred which would render him insolvent. He therefore asked the Minister of Justice whether he would not assent to the amendment of which he (Mr. MACDONALD) had given notice, dealing with the subject.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said he was going to place an amendment in the hands of the Chairman, which would obviate the necessity of that given notice of by his hon. friend. It provided that in case the trial of a petition was not proceeded with in six months the petition would lapse.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the amendment of his hon. friend from Inverness had reference to petitions now pending, while that of the Minister of Justice referred to petitions that might be filed in the future.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said he could not consent to any interference with the interests of the parties whose cases were now in court. He would oppose any legislation of that kind.

Mr. TASCHEREAU called attention to the fact that in the Dorchester election trial, argument took place before the Judge on the 7th December last and judgment had not yet been given.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said that this matter was entirely in the hands of the Judge, and the only way to effect a remedy was to resort to impeachment.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that where petitions were in the hands of Judges it was extremely difficult for this House to endeavor to limit the time within which judgment should be given, but he ventured to say that the function with which the Judges had been entrusted—of trying election petitions—was the highest function that could be given to them, and the discharge of it should, in his judgment, demand their earliest as well as their best attention. Judges who are charged with this duty should give it precedence over all their ordinary duties. Of course, their regular terms must be observed; but he did not hesitate to say that where appeals had been taken to the full court in term, it would be right and proper that judgment should be given at the earliest practicable day, and in preference to the ordinary business of the court. He spoke more particularly with reference to two cases which were appealed in the courts of Ontario, and in which a large number of judgments were given in the ordinary cases while the judgments upon these appeals were reserved, and not given until a later day. The true light in which the judiciary ought to view this law was that the cases brought before it should receive their earliest attention.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said the cases referred to by his hon. friend were somewhat unusual, and he had no hesitation in saying that judgment was given with the greatest possible despatch. There were several flagrant cases of delay in the courts of Ontario, but they had invariably arisen on account of the conduct of the parties to the suit, and the Judges had in every case threatened to dismiss the petitions unless they were at once proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said if the judgments were given at the earliest possible moment he did not complain. He had not said that there was any great grievance, but simply took the occasion to lay down the proposition that it should be the sense of Parliament that the decision of these election cases should take precedence of ordinary ones.

Mr. PALMER said the facilities for trying election petitions in the Superior Courts of New Brunswick were somewhat limited, and it might be impossible for a trial to go on within the six months to be fixed by the Minister of Justice. He suggested that in order to meet this exigency the clauses should be amended by inserting the words "Without the order of the Judge."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he would prefer to lengthen the time to nine months or even twelve rather than leave the matter to be thus disposed of by the order of the Judge because it made the language so uncertain.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said the second section, as he proposed to amend it, would read as follows:—"subject to the provisions of the next preceding section, and except it shall not be commenced or proceeded with during any term of the court of which the Judge trying it is a member, and in which by law he is bound to sit, the trial of every election petition shall be had within six months from the time that such petition has been presented, and shall be proceeded with de die in diem until the trial is over, unless the requirements of justice render it necessary that a postponement of the case should take place: Provided that in any case where the said period may have elapsed before the prorogation of Parliament at the end of the present session, such trial may be commenced at any time within two months after such prorogation."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was desirable to provide against any collusive arrangement being entered into between parties to a controverted election by which the trial might be put off from time to time and no evidence given in the premises. The people might thus be prevented from exercising their right to petition, if they believed a member to be improperly returned, by trusting to the efforts of whoever might have protested the election to bring it to trial, and would find it impossible to go into the case, when by this collusive arrangement they had been betrayed into permitting the period within which they could petition to pass. He proposed, therefore, that in case four months had elapsed after the petition was at issue, without the day for the trial being fixed, any one might, on application, be substituted for the petitioner, on such terms as might be considered just. He moved the amendment to that effect of which he had given notice.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON suggested that the time should be made three months.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE agreed, and the amendment was carried.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved an amendment to the effect that the Judge shall send in his report to the SPEAKER within four days after the close of the trial.—Carried.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER also moved the following amendment:—

"In case, on the trial of any election petition under either of the said Acts, it is determined that the election is void by reason of an act of an agent committed without the knowledge and consent of the candidate, and that costs be awarded to the petitioner in the premises, the agent may be condemned to pay such costs, and the Court or Judge shall order that such agent be summoned to appear at a time fixed in such summons, in order to determine whether such agent should be condemned to pay such costs.

"If at the time so fixed the party summoned do not appear he shall be condemned on the evidence already adduced to pay the whole or a due proportion of the costs awarded to the petitioner, and if he do appear the Court or Judge after hearing the parties and such evidence as shall be adduced shall give such judgment as to law and justice shall appertain.

"The petitioner shall have process to recover such costs against such party in like manner as he might have such process against the respondent, and no process shall issue against the respondent to recover such costs until after the return of process against such party."

—Carried.

Mr. TASCHEREAU suggeseed that some amendment should be adopted to prevent delays in rendering judgment. In the Dorchester election case, to which he had referred, although the case was argued on the merits as far back as the 15th December, no judgment had yet been rendered.

Mr. BABY said it should be remembered that no less than 120 witnesses were examined in that case, and that the enquete lasted nine weeks.

Mr. TASCHEREAU said that the evidence of only about twenty of these witnesses needed to be considered.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE agreed with the member for Montmagny that the delay in the case he had referred to was extraordinary, but it would be entirely unprecedented to limit the time within which a Judge must render judgment. He hoped the discussion to-night would induce the Judge to give due diligence to the case, and it was for that purpose he had referred to it.

The Committee then rose and reported the Bill with amendments.

CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLY.

The House then proceeded to concurrence in the report of the Committee of Supply.

Items, 111 to 113 inclusive, were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked if the Government had not received an application from the Eastern Steamship Company at Halifax for a subsidy for a line of steamers running between Sydney and other ports in Cape Breton and St. Johns, Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We have an item in the supplementary estimates for that purpose.

Items, 114 and 115, were concurred in.

On item 116, Steam Service, between San Francisco and Victoria, $54,000, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked in what position that contract stood.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE —Tenders are asked for now, and it is supposed that a local company will be able to send in tenders that may be accepted by the department, but that of course we do not know.

Item concurred in ; also item 117.

Item 118, to provide for the examination of Masters and Mates, $5,500 was concurred in without discussion.

On item 119, for the purchase of life boats, life preservers, and rewards for saving life, $4,000,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he had received a letter from a very prominent merchant of Quebec, who had taken a very considerable interest in the trade and commerce of the St. Lawrence, in which he spoke as follows :—

"I have sent you a copy of the Dominion Board of Trade Report, and would call your attention to the resolutions on enquiries into shipping. By the former you will see that no less than 71 ships met with disaster in the St. Lawrence alone last season, and that no public enquiry of any sort took place, and no pilot was even tried by the Trinity House (your act having as I would say, taken away their jurisdiction.) One of these cases, the collision between "S. S. Norma" and the barkentine, "James Seed," was a terrible affair. Five lives were lost. It is stated that the pilot of the steamer was so stupid that no reliable evidence could be got out of him for the admiralty, and this is confirmed by one of the assessors. I asked the Minister why no enquiries were ordered, and his reply was the expense would be enormous. I wish you would put a question to him in the House, as surely some of the more flagrant cases ought to have been enquired into, and should not cost a large sum. Will you also please ask whether he intends to bring in a short Act to repeal or explain the 71st clauses of the Pilotage Act, to explain the powers of the Trinity House, which he said he might do on the Deck Load question. You will see some startling figures which I gave the Royal Commission. Their last report alludes to this question and they speak highly of your act. In the appendix you will find the names of the 71 ships."

Now, if it were true that 71 wrecks had occurred on the St. Lawrence and no investigation had taken place, this vote was insufficient to meet the service.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said in the majority of these accidents or wrecks the circumstances were so well known that an inquiry was unnecessary. It was only in cases of collisions where the facts were disputed, or serious loss of life occurred that an investigation need take place. He would make inquiries with reference to the particular case referred to.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said an opinion seemed to prevail that these accidents were frequently due to incapacity of pilots or drunkenness on the part of masters and engineers. Inquiries ought certainly to be made in some flagrant cases.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE promised to give his personal attention to the matter.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) hoped the Government would furnish the port of Sydney with a life-boat. Two lives were recently lost in an attempt to rescue persons from a wreck at that place, for want of a life-boat.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said steps had already been taken to furnish life-boats at such places on the sea coast and on the lakes.

The item was concurred in.

Item 120 was concurred in without discussion.

On item 121, expenses in connection with Canadian Register and Classification of shipping, $6,000, Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked what steps were taken to carry the measure on this subject into operation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that it was quite evident last session that the feeling of ship-owners, so far as they were represented in this House, was hostile to enforcing that Act, and the hon. member would acknowledge that it would not be advisable to force an Act of that kind on the great shipping interests of the Dominion. If public opinion was getting more reconciled to it, he (Mr. MACKENZIE) thought it would be exceedingly desirable to have the Act in operation, but not against the almost unanimous opinion of the parties interested. If it were the case, as it seemed to be, that public opinion was veering round in its favor, the Government would be very glad to put it in operation immediately.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL contended that public opinion was never against it, even in this House. The opposition was due to the activity and influence of a few ship-owners and not to any general disapproval of the measure.

Mr. GOUDGE hoped the Government would not put the Bill into operation until hon. members from the Lower Provinces had an opportunity to consult with their constituents on the subject.

The item was concurred in.

On item 122, to provide for salaries of Secretaries of Pilotage Commissioners at St. John, N. B., and Halifax, $1,600,

Mr. GOUDGE asked if it was proposed to pay salaries to the Secretaries of Pilotage Commissioners at other ports.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the Act did not make any provision for paying such salaries at any ports but the two named.

Mr. GOUDGE claimed that the Secretary of the Pilotage Commissioners at Windsor, should receive a salary.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) claimed that remuneration should be given to the Secretary of the Commissioners at Sydney for his services.

The item was concurred in.

Items 123 to 131, inclusive (with the exception of 128, which was allowed to stand), were concurred in without discussion.

On the item under the head of Geological Survey and Observatories,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER contended that the appropriation for geological survey should be increased. In England where the area of country was only 124,000 square miles, the geological staff consisted of 69 persons. In Canada with its 2,000,000 square miles of territory, our staff consisted of only eleven geologists. More could be accomplished in the North-West by the expenditure of a comparatively small sum in geological explorations than could be accomplished in any other way.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE quite agreed with the general remarks of the hon. gentleman as to the importance of this service. All the Provinces owned their own lands and economic minerals, and it was as much their duty as it was the duty of the Dominion to employ a geological staff. The present staff was established on a very small scale by the late Province of Canada, and was continued by the Dominion after Confederation. It had always been a moot question whether the Dominion could so well maintain that force as the local authorities. In the United States where there was a federal system like our own, each State has its own staff. This was a matter he had thought of for some time and, in the meantime, the Government had not arrived at any decision on that point. A considerable portion of the service that would naturally fall to the geological survey would be performed for some time by the engineers and survey ors of the Pacific Railway and partly by the surveyors employed in the North-West survey. It was proposed, for instance, in the surveying expedition which would be sent to the North-West beyond the bounds of Manitoba to establish base lines from which surveys might be extended to the north and to the south, a florist would accompany them. Steps were taken last year to bore at several places on the Pacific Railway where good water was somewhat scarce. Two important objects were to be attained—one to get a supply of good water from artesian wells, the other to get accurate information as to the strata underneath and the various depths of rock or coal which might be pierced. The amount, therefore, which appeared to the credit of the geological survey would practically be supplemented in the manner he had stated, and the Government would be able in that way to assist materially in extending researches into the geology of that quarter. It would be for Parliament afterwards to consider whether it was better to establish this branch as a permanent part of the civil service of this country.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER hoped the Government would hesitate very long before deciding to throw this work upon the Local Governments. The Provinces had not that direct pecuniary interest in the work as the General Government had.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD stated what had been done by the geological staff in the North-West last summer. The increase in the vote this year was chiefly to enable them to increase salaries.

Item concurred in; also items 133, 134, 135 and 136.

On item 137, grant for Meteorological Observatories, including instruments and cost of telegraphing weather warnings, $37,000,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he knew from his own experience in the Department of Marine and Fisheries that this amount was not sufficient to place our telegraph warnings on a proper footing.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER suggested the propriety of laying a submarine cable between Nova Scotia and Sable Island, a distance of eighty miles, such a cable would be the means not only of giving notice of storms coming from the direction of Sable Island, but would save the Government a great expense in having to send out steamers to ascertain if there were any wrecks on the Island in the case vessels were delayed. A great deal of property might yearly be saved if prompt communication was had with Sable Island.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would make a note of the suggestion, but he doubted if such a cable would be of much service in giving warning of storms, as they already had telegraphic communication with Newfoundland. With regard to the saving of wrecks, it might be of some service, and at any rate the Government would make inquiries as to the cost.

Item concurred in; also items 138, 139 and 140.

On item 141, St. Catharines Hospital $500, and Kingston Hospital $500,

Mr. NORRIS said this amount, which was all Ontario received, seemed to be very small compared with the amounts granted to Marine Hospitals in the Lower Provinces. Last year a grant was given for the building of the St. Catharines Hospital, but the work was not completed, and he hoped that it would not be forgotten in the supplementary estimates.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it should be remembered that the Lower Provinces largely contributed to the Marine Hospitals, whereas no contributions were levied on the lakes for this purpose.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said when the Act was passed, the representatives from Ontario objected to having the upper lakes included in it because they did not wish to have to pay the contributions. He would advise his hon. friend from Lincoln to have Ontario included in the Act, so that a contribution might be levied on the shipping of the lakes for the purpose of maintaining Marine Hospitals.

Mr. NORRIS said he did not ask anything for maintenance, but only for the completion of the building.

Item concurred in.

Items from 143 to 149, inclusive, were passed without discussion.

On item 150, under the head of Indians,

Mr. PATERSON desired to impress upon the hon., the Minister of the Interior, the necessity that existed for the revision and codification of the Indian laws, and also with respect to the desirability of the enfranchisement of the Indians. At a very large gathering of representative Indians, held after the last session of Parliament—during which session a committee was appointed to inquire into the condition of the affairs of the Six Nation Indians—the Indians resolved to ask the department to extend to them the right of enfranchisement. No more important subject could engage the attention of the Cabinet than that of Indian enfranchisement, and the hon. the Minister at the head of the affairs of the department was competent to carry through a measure of that character. It was an anomalous position of affairs that while this country offered inducements to persons of any nation, clime and color, political rights and freedom, the Aborigines, many whose education was of a higher standard than that of immigrants, were, by the action of the Indian laws, denied the rights of freemen. The Indians themselves desired enfranchisement—the interests of the community demanded it. He warmly pressed this question upon the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for South Brant was informed the other day that whatever had to be done with the Indians must be done with their consent. The President and one of the leading members of what may be called the Indian Parliament, visited Ottawa two or three weeks ago and asked the Government not to propound any measure this session, because they wished to have further time for consultation during the coming season, in order that the Bill might be prepared, submitted to their own council and their own people, for the purpose of obtaining their opinion upon it. After such an appeal it was out of the question to proceed with any measure which his hon. colleague, the Minister of the Interior, might have in contemplation. He quite agreed with the member for South Brant as to the general desirability to deal with this question, and as to the high character of many of the Indians, especially in the West. A more peaceable and orderly population it was difficult to have, and many of them were men of great intelligence and learning. The Government hoped at the next session to be able to present a satisfactory measure to the House.

The item was concurred in.

Items 151, 152, 153, 157, 158, 159, 160, 162, 163, 164, 165, 167 were concurred in.

On item 169 for Customs,

Mr. McCALLUM suggested that the offices of Collector of Customs and that of Canal Tolls could in many cases be advantageously combined. The Collector of Tolls at Port Maitland should also be appointed Custom House Inspector.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand), supported the suggestion of the hon. member for Monck.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was difficult to discharge officers at present employed, and until vacancies occurred the suggestion could scarcely be carried out.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked for explanations in respect to an appropriation of $10,000 to cover appointments, promotions, &c.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said he did not perceive the necessity of placing this amount in the estimates in this shape; but it had been so inserted in previous years.

The item was concurred in.

Items, 170 to 175 inclusive, were concurred in.

On item 176, salaries of Canal Officers, $35,170,

Mr. ARCHIBALD called attention to the fact that while the increase in the salaries of the men on the Cornwall, and other canals had been increased, that increase had not been extended to the men on the Williamsburg Canal. He hoped this matter would be attended to.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that he had called the attention of the chief engineer to this matter at the instance of the hon. gentleman, and the salaries of those men would be placed upon the same footing.

Item concurred in; also items 177 to 183 inclusive.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked when the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be brought up, and in what way.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was the intention of the Government to ask the concurrence of the House in the contract that had been let for the Georgian Bay Branch. He intended to give a full statement of the progress of the work on the vote on the estimates for the Pacific Railway. He hoped to be able to take up those estimates to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he noticed in a leading newspaper the statement that Mr. FOSTER, who was a contractor on the Pacific Railway, had resigned his seat in the Senate. Was that statement true?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said as a matter of Parliamentary etiquette, he must decline to answer any questions respecting the Senate here; but it was a fact that Mr. FOSTER was a contractor with the Government.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said there was no etiquette to prevent the Premier answering a question respecting any one who had ceased to be a Senator.

The House then adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 5th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:—

Mr. FORBES—To amend the Act to make better provision for the inspection of certain staple articles of Canadian produce.

Mr. BABY—To amend the Act incorporating the Intercolonial Express Company.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MASSON said he desired, before the orders of the day were called, to draw the attention of the House—having given due notice to the Premier—to a question that related to the completeness of the journals of the House. It would be remembered that on the 26th of last month, on the second reading of the resolution relating to the Menonite loan, he moved an amendment. That amendment was sent to the SPEAKER, and read by him. Ojection was taken to it by the Premier that it was out of order, and the SPEAKER declared it out of order, and it did not appear on the journals. He (Mr. MASSON) had on a former occasion stated that in his opinion a motion having been made, and put in the SPEAKER's hands, and read by him, whether put to the House or not, should be entered upon the journals of the House. He referred at that time to several precedents, showing that it was the practice of this House to enter upon the journals every motion that was declared out of order—not only those motions upon which the written opinion of the SPEAKER was asked, but every motion that was declared out of order. It was stated that it was the practice in England to enter upon the journals no motion that was ruled out of order. He had taken the trouble to look into the matter, and he found that it was the practice in England, or at least it had been frequently done, to enter upon the journals motions declared out of order. One case in point happened in 1857. A motion was made to add one more to a committee which the rules of the House had fixed at sixteen and the full number had previously been appointed. The SPEAKER refused to put the motion on the ground that the number could not be exceeded until the House changed the rule fixing the number at sixteen. However, on the journals there appeared the following entry:—

"A motion was made and the question was proposed, That Sir JOSEPH PAXTON be added to the select committee on rating the mines. But notice being taken that the House had ordered that this committee should consist of sixteen members, and had already nominated that number, Mr. SPEAKER stated that no other member could be added, without leave of the House previously obtained, and that the question therefore could not be put."

In 1860, a motion was made which was even more evidently out of order. A Bill had been sent up to the House of Lords and returned with a certain amendment. It was then moved that an addition be made to the Bill, which was clearly out of order and was so declared. Nevertheless there appeared the following entry in the journals:—

"The House according to order proceeded to take into consideration the amendments made by the Lords to the Ecclesiastical Commission, &c. Bill, * * *

"An amendment was proposed to be made thereunto by adding at the end thereof the words: 'In all cases where any schemes are proposed by the Ecclesiastical Commission by which the incomes of any Ecclesiastical dignitaries are altered or increased the same shall be laid before the two Houses of Parliament six weeks at least before they are submitted to HER MAJESTY in Council. But the said amendment not being consequent upon a relative to the amendment made by the Lords, the same was not put by the Chair. Then the amendment made by the Lords was agreed to,"

It appeared clear, therefore, that in England motions sent to the SPEAKER and read by him though, not put to the House on account of their evidently being out of order, were entered on the journals. That practice he thought was based upon sound principle, because it enabled any member to place on record his views on certain subjects which otherwise he would not be able to do. It had been objected to that practice that motions might go upon the journals which were insulting to the House, or derogatory to its dignity; but any such motions could by a vote of the House be expunged from the journals. He felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to this subject, and if the correction of the journals by the insertion of the amendment he had made was not permitted, he would, following a precedent established in 1864, move that the journals be corrected in the way he had indicated.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there could be no objection to the hon. gentleman putting himself right, and obtain a correction of a wrong if wrong had been done him, but if any hon. gentleman could get whatever he pleased on the journals, such a course would be open to very grave objections. MAY states that if any motion or amendment be moved in contravention of the rules of the House, it should not be put, and a motion that is not put should not go upon the journals. The hon. member for Terrebone knew perfectly well that his amendment was out of order, but he submitted it in order to have it put on the journals. It was quite evident that it would be a very inconvenient practice if an hon. gentleman could get any kind of motion he pleased put on the journals. Cases had occurred in England —he spoke purely from memory—in which motions declared out of order by Mr. SPEAKER, were not entered on the journals. If this House were to establish the rule that all motions placed in the SPEAKER'S hands must find a place upon the journals of the House, it would give rise to very grave abuses, which they were bound to guard against.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said our practice had not been by any means uniform on this subject. Formerly the doctrine enunciated by the Premier was acted on with very great rigor, and he knew that on several important occasions, as he deemed them, for instance, during the debates on confederation in Quebec, in order to have certain views of his on the journals, he was driven to the vey extreme course of appealing from the SPEAKER'S decision. Of course when an appeal is made the yeas and nays are taken, and the matter must be entered on the journals. Under Mr. COCKBURN—and, he was bound to say, partly through pressure from himself—the practice was somewhat changed. If a motion derogatory to the dignity of the House should be made, Mr. SPEAKER, as guardian of the dignity of this House, would refuse to put it, and it should not be entered on the journals. But when, as in the case under discussion, a motion was made, not obnoxious to the House, though out of order, the better practice would be to allow it to appear upon the journals. His suggestion was that the hon. member should not be required to make any motion, but by common consent, or by the connivance of the House it should be placed on the journals with Mr. SPEAKER'S decision.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was not necessary to go back several years to see that the practice was not uniform. Last Wednesday the motion with reference to the petition of Messrs. FRASER, REYNOLDS & Co. was ruled out of order as in the other case, yet it appeared on the journals.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE referred to a decision by Mr. COCKBURN on August 13th, 1873, when he (Mr. MACKENZIE) placed a motion in his hands in order to test this very matter, and have an entry of it made on the journals. It was not put to the House and there was no trace of it on the journals.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought the best course would be to leave the matter in the hands of Mr. SPEAKER in order that he might look into the precedents, and if he arrived at the conclusion that it was a motion which ought in ordinary practice—he would not say universal practice—to be entered on the journals of the House, he would direct the correction to be made.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had already looked into the case, his attention having been called to it a few days ago. He had consulted precedents, and was satisfied that it was a motion that might be entered on the journals, but whether it was obligatory or not, he was not prepared to say.

Mr. MASSON expressed himself ready to accept the proposition of the hon. the First Minister.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON suggested that a small committee should be struck which should decide the point and prepare a standing order.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON objected to any cast-iron rule being laid down by a committee, because it would prove inconvenient in practice.

Mr. SPEAKER said that in this particular he took it to be the sense of the House that the motion should be entered on the journals, and he would therefore direct the correction to be made.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole on Monday next, to consider the following resolutions:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act 31 Vict., Cap. 64, respecting the treatment and relief of sick and distressed mariners, and to provide that the word "year" in the said Act shall mean the calendar year, commencing on the 1st January; and that vessels now liable to the payment of the duty imposed by the said Act twice in any one year, shall hereafter be liable to pay the same three times in any one year, under like conditions.

Motion carried.

MASTERS AND MATES.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Monday next, to consider the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient so to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships as to make it apply to ships over eighty tons register, and to ships going to sea on a voyage to any port or place out of Canada.

2. That it is expedient to make provision for the examination of masters and mates of inland and coasting ships, as regards ships of over eighty tons register, and voyages commenced after the first day of April, 1876.

The motion was carried.

INSPECTION OF INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Monday next, to consider certain resolutions providing for the appointment of an Inspector of Insurance Companies and the scale of fees to be charged under the Bill (No. 67) to consolidate and amend the several Acts respecting insurances, in so far as regards fire and inland marine business.

Motion carried,

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On motion of Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT, the House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Mr. SCATCHERD in the chair.

On item 72, $6,250,000, for Pacific Railway,

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked the hon. First Minister to furnish the House with full information respecting the present position of the Pacific Railway, as promised.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said Mr. Chairman: the details given on pages 29 and 30 are not quite explicit as they should have been, and a fuller detailed statement will be prepared and submitted to the House before concurrence is taken. It may be convenient in the first place that I should go very briefly over the operations of the last year, and then indicate more in detail than it is possible to do in the pages of the estimates what the Government propose to do in furtherance of this work. Last year we took an estimate altogether, as will be seen, of about two and a half millions of dollars. At that time we were quite uncertain what arrangements might be made with British Columiab. We proposed at that time, if satisfactory arrangements could be made with that Province for an extension of time in accordance with the negotiations entered upon, to proceed immediately with the construction of the road from Esquimault to Naniamo, and in that case a very large expenditure would have been necessary, as we should have done a very large proportion, including the rails of that portion of the road, within the financial year. These arrangements, however, fell through, and although an ultimate arrangement was reached by which that work will be prosecuted after this, at that time there was nothing to justify us in refusing to make such preparations as might be needed in the event of our coming to some terms with that Province. The result, therefore, of last year's operations was practically this—we expended up to the first of this month $356,000 upon works in connection with exploratory and instrumental surveys. In order, sir, to place the House in possession of the present state of the surveys and their location, I will give a brief summary of the year's operations. I regret that it has not been in the power of the Government to publish some short report of the operations of our engineers during that period. This, however, proved to be impossible, for it is only within the last two or three weeks that the last of the parties came in, and they have been busily engaged since in plotting the results of the year's labors upon paper, and in preparing a detailed report of their operations. The vastness of the country which the parties have had to traverse and the extreme difficulties which they have encountered in various ways amply account for the delay in preparing at so early a period of the year a report of the operations of the past year. Early in the season a party was detached to make an exploratory survey from Lac la Hache via River Blue to the North Thompson, about the very centre of the Columbia region, with a view to ascertain the practicability of cutting off the bend west of the Lac la Hache to where it strikes the Thompson River, by following nearly a straight line across that angular part of country enclosed by the North Thompson and a portion of the Fraser River to the east and north in the neighborhood of Clearwater Lake. When the surveyors returned last year there was every probability of a favorable route being obtained through that part of the country. The result obtained this year has, however, proved so unsatisfactory, chiefly on account of the high altitude to be passed over, that any further expenditure in this direction was deemed inadvisable. A re-survey was made of the most difficult portions of route No. 4 which hon. members will find laid down as the connecting branch from Clearwater to Bute Inlet via Lac la Hache to the River Fraser below Soda Creek, and from this it appears that the heavy work referred to in last year's report may be considerably reduced, the gradients improved and the distance shortened. An exploration has also been made through the mountain chain between Lake Clear Water and the valley of the North Thompson on route No. 5, by which route it was confidently hoped a direct route from Tete Jaun Cache to Bute Inlet would be obtained. It has been established that the route is quite impracticable, the heavy range of mountains, running from north to south, rising in some places exactly across the route to be traversed, to a height of from 7,000 to 8,000 feet above the sea level, and proving a natural obstacle which was deemed quite insurmountable without a very extensive work of tunneling. A complete instrumental survey has been made from Tete Jaun Cache down the valley of the Fraser River, that is following the north bend of the Fraser by what is known as route No. 6, down to Fort George, where the Nechaco river falls into the Fraser. At that point it diverges somewhat west, but still following the valley of the Fraser, but ascending the Tete Jaun Cache. The distance from Yellowhead Pass to Fort George is 245 miles, with extremely favorable gradients and light works of construction. This result is obtained, as I remarked, by following the sinuosities of the Fraser river in a general way, and after leaving the Fraser river the route is marked No. 7, although it is No. 6 down to a certain point called the Old Fort. A survey was projected from Fort George across the Chilcotin country to connect with Lake Tatla with the surveys made in 187 to Bute Inlet. The whole distance from Fort George to Bute Inlet is about 305 miles, but a small portion of that route is still unsurveyed, being a portion of the country at the head of Nechaco river, a distance of fifty or sixty miles. Except over this small distance there is no practical difficulty whatever to be encountered in passing through the country, following the valley of the Fraser as I have stated, and this gap is being at present surveyed by a party on snow-shoes ; the only reason for doing that is to enable the Government at once to determine whether this part of the route presents any formidable physical obstructions, for if it does not, we shall then be able to locate at once the whole of the line through British Columbia, if we decide to adopt this route. We have no reason to believe there is any serious obstruction in those fifty or sixty miles of country; but as the engineers were formerly deceived by the loose reports of Indians about the Clear Water country, it was thought best not to assume that no difficulty existed, but to make ourselves certain as to the true facts, we sent a party through the country to make surveys. If these prove as satisfactory as we expect, then the only difficulty to be encountered between the waters of Bute Inlet and the passes of the Rocky Mountains is simply the descent to the sea by the Homathco Pass. That undoubtedly presents a very serious obstacle, although it is possible to obtain a grade of from 110 to 115 feet to the mile—one of the most favorable passes obtained through the Cascade Range. There are about fifteen miles of this grade. No other position of the route all the way to the passage of the Rocky Mountains presents any physical difficulty whatever, except the general fact of its extreme remoteness from settlement and the trouble and expense of affording supplies to those engaged on the work. In order to make a comparison in point of cost between the different possible routes in British Columbia, it was deemed important, amongst other things, to have an exact survey made of an average portion of the canyons of the Lower Fraser. The valley itself is sometimes contracted to about a mile or two in width from bank to bank, sometimes it presents precipitous sides of almost perpendicular rock, and at other times it is intersected by deep ravines running across its course in a lateral direction. Accordingly, a trial location survey, with numerous cross-sections was made from vale upwards, for a distance of fifteen miles. These measurements are now being reduced to paper, and the quantities of every kind of work are being ascertained, with a view to an approximate estimate being made. I will only remark, with regard to the Fraser Valley, that it presents by far the most favorable route surveyed so far, in respect of shortness of distance and easy grades. The great difficulty to be encountered is in these deep canyons, where we will occasionally have to make extensive tunnels in some places; in others we will be under the necessity of erecting large retaining walls, besides bridges over chasms and extremely difficult cuttings in the sides of the precipitous rocks. An instrumental survey has been made from Yale to Burrard Inlet, in order to complete the chain of measurements to the latter point, from Yellowhead Pass to the Pacific tide-water. The plans and profiles of this section are now being prepared. A thorough examination of the country easterly from Fort Hope has been made with the view of obtaining definite information respecting the passes reported to exist in that quarter. This is the portion of the country which lies towards the boundary of the United States on the south-eastern side of the Lower Fraser. The region of country lying between the Pacific coast, north of Vancouver Island and Fort George, and hitherto unexplored, has been examined in different directions, and much valuable information has been obtained. Several passes through the Cascade Chain, from Dean and Garden Inlets, have also been explored, but no route entirely favorable for the railway has yet been reported, But even if it had been found favorable, any route so far north as this is open to the serious objection that it would reach the Pacific from fifty to sixty miles north of the northern extremity of Vancouver Island ; it would be entirely beyond the present populated portion of the country, which is further to the south ; and it would be so situated that we could scarcely hope to compete for certain branches of the trans-continental trade which a more southerly line would secure. The route referred to as No. 7 in Mr. FLEMING'S report is probably the shortest reaching the head of the North Bentick Arm, but a portion of it is yet unsurveyed, and we are not able to ascertain whether it would be available or not. As I have said, it would be the shortest route to the ocean, but it would be opposed to local interests in Columbia, and would be beyond the reach of the inhabitants generally, if we except one or two places. The country through which it would pass is a very favorable one as regards grades, but we are scarcely in possession of sufficient information as to the duration of the winter, the depth of snow, and other matters of that nature to enable us to form a very correct idea of the adaptability of the country to sustain a very great population. In order to exhaust the exploration of the passes through the Rocky Mountains an expedition was organized to cross by what is known as the Smoky River or Pine River Pass, located between the Peace River and the Yellow head Pass—perhaps about half-way between them. If this pass should turn out to be favorable, and the North Fraser route should be attempted, the line would pass almost directly through by the north bend of the Fraser, and, after getting over the pass, would diverge southwards toward Fort Edmonton, where it would strike the other line. This expedition left Fort George in December last, so soon as the ice was sufficiently firm on the river to admit of travelling, and we expect they will arrive in Fort Garry some time during next month. This will enable us to have a complete survey of the Rocky Mountain chain, from the Peace river southward. Captain BUTLER passed through the country by that route, and so have several other gentlemen whose experiences have been given to the world; and from their evidence and the other sources of information at our command we know that while that route is tolerably favorable for the greater part of its course, it is intersected by immense valleys, perpendicular to the course of the river which would make it a very difficult route so far as cost of construction is concerned, although there is no doubt that it passes through a country, a great portion of which is extremely favorable for agricultural operations. I have made these general remarks as to the the exploration in British Columbia, because I know there is an impatience on the part of some of my hon. friends from that Province, and perhaps with other members of the House and a portion of the public, that the explorations have not been completed; but it was impossible to have had it done. Indeed, it would have been quite wrong to have hurried the surveyors any more than we did, because it is of the greatest importance, in constructing a great national highway, that we should have the fullest information as to the conformation and resources of the country, its topographical and physical features considered in relation to the maintenance of human life, &c., and before it is commenced, we should be reasonably sure that we have secured the best route as regards ease of construction, the shortest distance, and the best quality of land surrounding it, as to the progress made in the woodland and prairie region, the line of railway has been located for construction between the waters of Lake Superior at Fort William and Lake Shebandowan, about 45 miles. Plans, specifications, and quantitities, have been prepared, and tenders for bridging and grading have been asked for and received; the rates being somewhat less than the cost estimated by the Government. These tenders I will explain to the House by and by.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Will the First Minister be kind enough to say what engagements have been made with British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I intend to go back upon that as an entirely separate branch of the subject.

The railway has been located for construction between the northern extremity of Lake of the Woods at Rat Portage and the crossing of the Red River. Tenders for bridging and grading are now asked, and we expect on the 17th of this month to be able to lay the tenders for that portion before Parliament ere it rises, in terms of the Act of last session. The distance is about 114 miles.

I may say with regard to this portion that when Mr. FLEMING first travelled over the line he crossed the Red River in the vicinity of Winnipeg and passed to the south of Lake Manitoba and then northward after passing White Muck River till he reached the flank of the Duck Mountains near Fort Pelly, thus making Fort Pelly the objective point westward from Red River. But subsequent information led us to decide upon a different route altogether. We determined for various reasons to cross Red River some twenty-three miles north of Winnipeg. Our reasons for doing this were these. In the first place, no steamers navigating Lake Winnipeg could ascend the Red River at all times to where the crossing was originally proposed. We crossed therefore where we can reach the railway by steamers of any draft that can navigate Lake Winnipeg. Lake Winnipeg presents a very large area, and it is reasonably hoped that a large shipping trade will be done upon it before many years, it having a navigation of nearly two hundred miles from north to south besides various bays and indentations on both sides. The mouth of the Sascatchewan is considerably north of the mouth of Red River, and whether that river may be made navigable into Lake Winnipeg or not there can be no difficulty about having a tramway from the still water of the Sascatchewan to Lake Winnipeg, and any trade coming in that direction would reach the railway by steamers sailing southward to Lake Winnipeg and the crossing of Red River. Another reason was this: We found on exploring the country between Red River and Fort Pelly that we could pass almost in a direct line between these two points by crossing the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. That lake is contracted near its centre to the width of an ordinary river, and as the water is shallow there will be no difficulty whatever in bridging this narrow portion of the lake. The distance from Red River to Fort Pelly is 280 miles, and of that distance there are only—so far as we know at present, and I think we have information of nearly the whole of the route—about eighty miles of prairie, the remaining 200 miles passing through an exceedingly fine woodland country, where the best timber is to be found as has yet been discovered in any portion of the North-West country. We have in this tract of land the very finest tamarac and spruce that are to be found anywhere in our North-West territories. and, on the whole, it presents the most favorable features possible for the construction of a railway. The gradients are easy, the line is direct, and the timbers and the land are of the finest. It is quite true that this change of route caused some disappointment to the people of the town of Winnipeg and those living south-west of Lake Manitoba, where it was originally supposed the railroad would pass; but we cannot allow the general welfare of the public to be sacrificed for the benefit of a locality; and the committee will see it would be very seriously sacrificed if the former route was adopted. When I tellthem the route we have adopted is thirty miles shorter than the one originally proposed, and we will save, at the very least, $1,100,000, by taking the route we have taken—a route which we are led to believe passes through at least an equally favorable country. It will be remembered that very serious objections were made by many members at the last two or three sessions of this House to constructing the road from Nepigon eastward to Lake Nipissing through a country entirely uninhabited and believed to be practically impossible of settlement; and, at all events, whether that should be ultimately constructed or not, the polity of the Government, and of the House, was to leave that portion of the road in abeyance for the present, and to proceed with such intermediate stretches as would enable us to make land and water communication across the continent within the shortest possible time. Well, Sir, in pursuance of that policy the surveys from Lake Superior westward were completed with all possible expedition, and the portion of it requisite to obtain rapid communication from water to water are now being placed under contract. But I have always felt that it would be desirable, as soon as possible to obtain the eastward connection also, and though having no intention to move at present in that quarter, I thought it was advisable last spring to obtain some information respecting the country from the mouth of Nipegon river eastward. Accordingly, a party of engineers were engaged to examine the country between the mouth of Nipegon river and Michipicotan river with the intention that the exploration should be continued from that point to Batchewana and Goulais Bays, near the lower end of Lake Superior, and if it were possible to obtain a route along the front of Lake Superior it would tend greatly, we hoped, to shorten the distance and pass through a country otherwise much more favorable in point of mining and settlement than and mountainous ridge that fringes Lake Superior. This party succeeded only in reaching Pic River, a distance by the route surveyed, of something over one hundred miles, though the direct distance is only about eighty miles, showing an increase by curvage of forty to fifty per cent. If this route should turn out ultimately to be one that might be adopted, it might diverge from the north-east of Pic River by the south side of Long Lake, instead of north of Long Lake, as shown in the projected line laid down by Mr. FLEMING. In this respect we would be able to shorten it very materially, even if we should land in the valley of Montreal River, north of Lake Nipissing, and come down the valley of the Ottawa as originally contemplated. I mention this simply to show that the Government have given their closest attention to the examination of that country as preliminary to any possible future action, but not with a view to taking any immediate action. One of the most important things to be looked to in opening up our North-West country is to obtain speedy means of ingress from Lake Superior. It is felt that it is extremely difficult for us to pour a large population into that country, when the expense of transport from Fort William westward is so great; and it is deemed advisable that we should not be driven, for any length of time, to pour a tide of emigration through any portion of the United States, in order to reach our own territory. In addition, therefore, to the railway surveys from Lake Shebandowan to Lake Superior, a distance of 45 miles, and from Red River to Rat Portage, a distance of 114 miles, we have felt it desirable to make correct surveys, during the season, of the intervening distance. The entire distance from Red River to Lake Superior is in round numbers, 430 miles by the DAWSON route. Of this we have surveyed and located a line and asked for tenders for 155 or 160 miles. This leaves a distance between the two points of 270 miles. Of that distance we will be able, by constructing two cheap wooden locks at Fort Francis, to obtain from Rat Portage uninterrupted steam navigation for a distance of nearly 200 miles to Sturgeon Falls at the east end of Rainy Lake. From this point eastward towards Lake Shebandowan, although there is a continuous water navigation with a number of small portages, still the country is, on the whole, tolerably favorable. It is now being surveyed by parties sent out some little time ago, in addition to the surveys prosecuted some time since. It is possible from Shebandowan Lake to Sturgeon Falls that a favorable route may be found for the early construction of the railway, and, if not, we hope to be able to shorten the distance materially of the route now travelled. We hope within two years or two and a-half at the outside, that we will have a railway finished at the eastern and western ends, and with these and the locks at Fort Francis we expect that the distance altogether may be traversed in four or five days at the outside, that now takes on the average from nine to twelve days. It will be remembered that the plan of the Government as developed last session and adopted by the House unanimously, was what I have stated, and makes a line of land and water communication as speedily as possible. The western portion of Ontario, in fact, nearly all the Province, is in easy communication with various ports on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay, so that they have tolerably direct water communication from the termini of the various railways, say at Collingwood, Owen Sound, Southampton, Kincardine, Goderich and Sarnia. Railroads converge at all these points and steamers ply from them on the waters of Lake Huron and Lake Superior. But it was felt a more direct line of communication, in order to suit the great cities in Lower Canada and the eastern Provinces should be had by ascending the Ottawa Valley and reaching the most favorable point on Georgian Bay by as short a route as possible. It was, therefore, provided in the Act of 1874 that the Government should construct a branch from some point south-east of Lake Nipissing to Georgian Bay, and that they should have authority to subsidize a line connecting with that road at the most favorable point. In accordance with that intention and that decision of the House and the Act passed by Parliament, explorations were made of a comparatively slight character no doubt —mere explorations. One party was sent to make an exploration from Carleton Place to Parry Sound, which was represented as one of the most favorable routes. Another party was sent to examine the country in the neighborhood of the Meganatawan, known as Byng Inlet, on Georgian Bay, and from the mouth of French River, situated north-west of that point, to traverse the country eastward. We found that while a road from Carleton Place to Parry Sound could be built that it would serve local interests more than serve as a true national route, and we found also that the route from French River eastward presented much more favorable physical features than any other part of the country that had been visited. We, therefore, fixed upon that part as the terminus for two or three reasons—for the reason just assigned in the first place, and in the second place for the reason that if the road should be continued westward thus 85 miles that would be built by the Government as a Government work will be, generally speaking, in the line to be followed, and which may be carried out whether we pass slightly north-east of Sault Ste. Marie ultimately or diverge northwardly by the route to Long Lake, and passing from the south of Long Lake to Pic River, or by the north of the lake, where the surveys of last season terminated. The line that has been located from French River eastward is as direct a line as can be drawn upon the map down the valley of the Ottawa to the city of Montreal. Hon. gentlemen will observe by the contract which has been laid on the table and the Order in Council granting $12,000 a mile to the Canada Central, that a subsidy is given to this road to construct the line from where the Government line terminates 85 miles east of the mouth of the French River, east to a point in the vicinity of the village of Douglas. That is, in other words, between Douglas and Pembroke, at a point that will be determined by investigation of the Government engineers, which will suit for crossing the river by the Northern Colonization Company's road in that quarter. This will give the Northern Colonization Company precisely the same privileges as the Canada Central will obtain, and when the Kingston & Pembroke road is built they will also be secured in the same privileges. These privileges are simply that trains starting eastward from Montreal, which pass over their own lines to the crossing of the Ottawa River, will pass over the line nominally owned by the Canada Central, and have the same right of travel on that line as the trains of that company. Both lines are again secured the right of passage over the line being built by the Government from the point of intersection westward, thus securing to the fullest possible extent the rights of all companies, and securing the most direct possible communications from the east to the west. I may allude for a moment, in passing, to several interviews that I had the pleasure of holding with many gentlemen interested in the Northern Colonization Company, and also with certain public men, members of Parliament, and others, in relation to this matter. Their contention was this—that the proper line to adopt was to follow the Ottawa River on the northern side until opposite or nearly opposite the mouth of the Mattawan River, and thence in as direct a line as possible to the mouth of French River. This would have made a line from Montreal some twenty miles longer than the plan we have adopted, and also, so far as our information leads to a conclusion, a more expensive line than the one ultimately adopted by the Government. I am happy to say, at the interviews held, nearly every one interested was satisfied with the entire correctness of these statements. Now, I propose saying a few words about the contracts which have been and are being let at this moment. They will all be let this month. Gentlemen will remember that in both Pacific Railway Bills provision was made for building a line from Pembina to the neighborhood of Fort Garry, there to connect with the main Pacific line. It was early foreseen by me that it would be a matter of extreme importance to get into Fort Garry with a line of railway as soon as possible, because, if we are to commence the construction of the railroad from Red River eastward immediately, it is of great importance that we should have some way of getting in rails, rolling stock and other heavy material required for the building of the road. Owing to the extreme depression in financial circles in the United States, and the extreme depression of railway stocks in particular, the lines in course of construction in Minnesota have come to a complete stand-still. One line was projected towards St. Vincent, on the east side of the Red River. This road was graded to within 13 miles of the frontier. It was ironed to within 63 miles of the frontier, but still there was no traffic on the road from Glyndon northward. In order to stimulate these people to proceed with the line to the boundary we thought it advisable last summer to place the grading of the Pembina branch under contract. Tidings came to us of probable distress to the colony in consequence of another visit of the grasshopper plague. That visit, I am happy to say, turned out to be much less disastrous than was anticipated, but the first news was of so serious a character that we thought it desirable to proceed with the work at once, in order to furnish labor to such of the population as might be rendered destitute by the depredations of the grasshoppers. Tenders were accordingly invited, and the lowest was accepted, being that of JOSEPH WHITEHEAD, which was 22 cents per yard. He has already graded several miles, and will be able to grade the entire distance of his contract—about 48 miles—on or about the 1st of July next, and, as soon as it is possible to obtain access by means of the lines constructed in Minnesota, we will be able to proceed with the construction of the road. The distance to the connection with the main line where it crosses Red River is 32 or 34 miles from the end of the section already under contract, and this will be let early in the spring.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Is there any prospect of connecting with the Minnesota line?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am sorry to say there is no prospect yet, but I understand from gentlemen from Winnipeg that they ascertained in passing through Minnesota it is likely some legislation will take place this winter which will stimulate the prosecution of this work. We only let the grading upon this line because we thought it advisable while proceeding thus far not to proceed any further until we could get a general contract let for the entire line where we propose to build it now, which would cover all the more expensive parts of construction. For the same reason we are only letting the grading and bridging from Fort William to Shebandowan and the same from Rat Portage to Red River. The hon. gentleman asked me if I could give a general idea of the cost of grading this 45 miles.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I asked for an estimate of the cost of construction altogether.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am not able to give that, but the cost will not be heavy. The grading and bridging will not be far from $400,000. Of course this includes everything except ballast, ties and rails. Now, I propose to give to the House some detailed information of another branch of the subject. Early in the season, or about midsummer, when we found the price of iron and steel rails were getting very low in the English market, we thought it would be advisable to invest a considerable amount of money in the purchase of rails which could be made available at the earliest possible moment on the road. We accordingly advertised for tenders for these steel rails.

It will be observed there is a sum of two millions of dollars asked for the purpose of paying for these rails. One reason that led us to adopt this plan was this:—From Fort William to Red River it was quite evident that that there could be no probability of obtaining any rails for construction purposes unless new rails were taken to those places. In the older parts of the country, where rails may be obtained almost at a few days notice, it is an easy matter to construct railways; but we felt it would be desirable to have rails on hand at Fort William and points on Georgian Bay, where they were to be used almost as soon as the works of construction commence, as the contractors will be able to avail themselves of the use of these steel rails. The lowest tenders for steel rails were accepted, I think to the extent of fifty thousand tons, at an average price, delivered in Canada, of about $54 per ton, being the lowest price at which steel rails have ever been sold since they were first made.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Will they be delivered in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They will be delivered at Montreal. GUEST & Co., Liverpool, will deliver 5,000 tons at $54 per ton; the same firm will deliver 5,000 tons at $55.24; Ebbro Vale Co., 5,000 tons at $53.53; Mersey Company, 20,000 tons at $54.26; West Cumberland Company, 5,000 at $53.53; West Cumberland Company will deliver free on board of a vessel at a port in England 5,000 tons at $48.67; and NAYLOR, BERGON & Co. will deliver 5,000 in the same manner at $51.10, these latter rails being intended for shipment to British Columbia. The entire expenditure for steel rails is therefore about $2,665,500. We do not expect, however, that more than half of the rails will be delivered, and probably not half during the coming season. And as we are not sure of the precise amount that will be so delivered we make an estimate of $2,000,000 to cover the expenditure. The hon. gentleman has inquired in regard to the arrangements made with British Columbia, and I observe that my hon. friend beside me (Mr. BLAKE) has placed a question on the paper as to the course we propose to pursue in Parliament in relation to it. It will be observed by every one who has read the correspondence that the practical results obtained are these: After Mr. EDGAR returned from British Columbia Lord CARNARVON made an offer by telegram to arbitrate in the matter between the Dominion and the Province of British Columbia. We declined any arbitration as there was nothing to arbitrate upon, but we were quite willing as was stated in the Minute of Council to leave HIS LORDSHIP to say whether the Dominion had not offered what was under the circumstances the most reasonable and fair terms that could be expected. Our views were, generally speaking, adopted by Lord CARNARVON but he suggested certain things that might be done. It will be remembered that we offered through Mr. EDGAR without at all committing ourselves to Esquimalt as the ultimate end of the railway to construct the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, and as there would be no serious difficulty in locating the line we were willing to proceed with the construction of it at once—that is last year; and that we would prosecute the surveys on the mainland with all due despatch consistent with a proper regard for public interests, and further that we would expend the sum of not less than one and a half million of dollars per annum within the boundaries of that Province until the road should be completed. These terms, I may say, were declined, or rather they were not considered, but an issue was raised on the point as to whether Mr. EDGAR was authorized to offer them or not. I therefore terminated the negotiations by directing Mr. EDGAR to return, and leaving it to the Government of British Columbia to make any other proposals that they thought proper, we holding ourselves prepared to consider any proposition that might be made. Lord CARNARVON, as will be seen by the dispatches in the papers, considered that the grounds we took were quite reasonable; but he thought on the other hand that it would be more satisfactory to the Province, and that the Province might reasonably expect to have a definite period named for the completion of the line, and he put the case in his letter of the 17th November in this way:

"Adhering then to the same order in which, on the 16th August, I stated the principle points on which it appeared to me that a better understanding should be defined, I now proceed to announce the conclusions at which I have arrived. They are:—

1. That the railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible, and completed with all practicable despatch.

2. That the surveys on the mainland shall be pushed on with the utmost vigor. On this point, after considering the representations of your Ministers, I feel that I have no alternative but to rely, as I do most fully and readily, upon their assurances that no legitimate effort or expense will be spared, first to determine the best route for the line, and secondly to proceed with the details of the engineering work. It would be distasteful to me, if indeed, it were not impossible to prescribe strictly any minimum of time or expenditure with regard to work of so uncertain a nature; but happily, it is equally impossible for me to doubt that your Government will loyally do its best in every way to accelerate the completion of a duty left freely to its sense of honor and justice.

3. That the waggon road and telegraph line shall be immediately constructed. There seems here to be some difference of opinion as to the special value to the Province of the undertaking to complete these two works; but after considering what has been said, I am of opinion that they should both be proceeded with at once, as indeed is suggested by your Ministers.

4. That $2,000,000 a year, and not $1,500,000, shall be the minimum expenditure on railway works within the Province from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction. In naming this amount I understand that, it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on with all speed the completion of the works now to be undertaken, the annual expenditure will be as much in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 as in any year may be found practicable.

5. Lastly, that on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the railway shall be completed and open for traffic from the Pacific seaboard to a point at the western end of Lake Superior, at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of railway through a portion of the United States, and also with the navigation on Canadian waters."

So that the terms recommended by Lord CARNARVON, and which we have accepted, are simply these, that instead of one and a half million we propose to expend two millions a year within the Province of British Columbia, and we propose to finish the railway connection through that Province and downward to the point indicated by the year 1890, being an extension of time of nine years. With respect to the question raised by my hon. friend from South Bruce I may say that I have nothing to ask from Parliament. We have no authority to obtain, but have merely to communicate to Parliament this decision and rely upon the House supporting us in accepting the terms that have been made through the intervention, or intermediation of Lord CARNARVON, and that support I do not doubt will be cheerfully accorded. I have now only to say a few words regarding another portion of the subject that I should have alluded to at an earlier stage—that is in relation to the construction of a telegraph line. He felt from the first that it was absolutely indispensible to have telegraphic communication with the various points on the line in order to prosecute a successful survey and in order to conduce to the settlement of the North-

West territories as well as to lay out the line upon which the road should ultimately be built. We accordingly advertised for tenders for a line of telegraph extending from Fort William westward. The specifications, as hon. gentlemen will see who have looked at the papers stated that the telegraph line should be built along the route of the railway as settled by the engineers—that where forest occurrs it will be cleared for a width of 132 feet and that the line should be erected in the best possible manner. We have given out contracts from Lake Superior to Fort Garry to Messrs. OLIVER, DAVIDSON & Co., at $243,150—from Fort Garry to Fort Pelly, to Messrs. SIFTON, GLASS & Co., at $107,850—from Fort Pelly to Fort Edmonton to Mr. W. FULLER at $117,250 —from Fort Edmonton to Cache Creek to Mr. F. J. BARNARD at $272,250. A large proportion of this work is now being proceeded with; and some of the wires have been stretched. At the present time there are some 200 or 300 men employed on the work connected with the erection of this telegraph line. The clearing of the timber for the line will as a matter of course form part of the expenditure on the Pacific Railway itself as that work when done will simply be a part of the work to be done by the contractors when the contracts for the building of the road are ultimately given out. I should state that the contracts in connection with the telegraph, are for its maintenance as well as its construction for a period of five years, and that all Government messages will be passed over free. The average price per mile, under these contracts, will be for prairie $180; woodland districts, from $480 to $490; the number of acres cleared per mile, being about sixteen. Any profits received from messages sent by private parties will accrue to the contractors of the line. Now, sir, it will be observed that the works we have entered upon so far, are merely anticipatory to giving out the general contract which we hope to do in a scheme yet to be developed and brought to maturity, and to which the sanction of Parliament will have to be obtained. We hope to connect with the construction of this road an emigration scheme, which will at once assist in settling the vast territory through which it passes, and in getting the road built in the cheapest possible manner. All the measures we have now taken are simply with a view of doing the little preliminary work which can be done at a comparatively small expense, so that we may not lose a season's work before it will be possible to prepare a scheme. As I stated on a former occasion last year, nothing appears to me more suicidal or un-business like than to lay out contracts without any knowledge of the country or any certainty as to the extent of the work of construction or the physical difficulties we might fairly apprehend as having to be met. We have, therefore, spent a year, and we will spend a very considerable portion of the coming year, in getting such a knowledge of the country as will enable us to present to contractors some idea of what lies before them, and not have them complaining at a future day that we misled them by the data placed before them. There are no difficulties to contend with on the branch from Pembina to Fort Garry, nor yet on the main line from Red River eastward to Rat Portage, and from Lake Shebandowan to Fort William. We have availed ourselves of all the resources that Parliament placed at our disposal as best we conceived it possible, and in such a way as to facilitate to the utmost possible extent future operations in the construction of this road. And while we still adhere to the policy we formerly intimated of, at least for years, utilizing the water communication at various points, we shall always endeavor to proceed with the work as fast as the circumstances of the country—circumstances yet to be developed—will enable us to do, so as to obtain as soon as possible complete railway communication with the Pacific Province. How soon that time may come I cannot predict, but I have no reason to doubt that we shall be able to keep our obligation to British Columbia as now amended, without seriously interfering with the march of prosperity. There is no doubt, however, that it will place a serious responsibility upon the country, and we shall therefore proceed with the caution we have always advocated, whether from this side of the House or from that. I have given a brief sketch of the position of affairs as they stand at present. I will now give a detail of the expenditure for which we ask this vote, and at the same time I promise to lay upon the table of the House the whole particulars in a very short time. For telegraph construction, there are five contracts, amounting in all to about one million of dollars. Steel rails, for which we ask a vote of two millions, amount, as I stated to $2,665,000. We only ask for two millions for this year, however, and it is almost certain we shall not expend as much. For grading and other works upon the Georgian Bay Branch we ask $500,000, as being the utmost possible amount that can be expended this year. For grading upon the Pembina Branch, 48 miles, $106,000, being the balance of the contract price, which was $120,000. For the portion from Fort William to Lake Shebandowan we take $500,000, and for that portion from Lake of the Woods westward, $500,000. For the locks at Fort Francis, $150,000; for improvements between Sturgeon Lake and Lake Shebandowan, $240,000; and for the portages between Manitoba Lake and the River Sascatchewan, $50,000. I may say that the Lake of Manitoba connects very closely with Lake Winnipegoosis, and it is possible to ascend by the Hen River from one lake to the other. The difference of level is about 18 feet 9 inches. The Hen River is extremely tortuous to ascend, the distance is some 30 miles, and there are large boulders in the bottom, so that it may after all be found desirable to have a portage. There are three or four miles of portage between Lake Winnipegoosis and Sascatchewan River. Once there, we are in a position to ascend to the very heart of the territory. The Hudson's Bay Company have built two steamers for service upon this part of the river, and they have succeeded in ascending almost the whole of the North Sascatchewan, and I believe the South Sascatchewan is equally capable of being navigated by boats of this class. We have therefore taken $50,000 for the construction of two small steamers to navigate this river, and $60,000 to improve the navigation at certain rapids. We have taken $500,000 for expenditure between Esquimault and Nanaimo. We hope to be able to locate that route early in the summer and place it under contract, a very large portion of the year may be utilized for work upon that route, and there is nothing, I think, to hinder the construction being carried on during the whole of next winter up to the time we meet here again. We have also taken a sum of $250,000 for possible work upon the mainland of British Columbia. It is uncertain whether we shall be able to use this vote, but it is likely we can at least expend the money upon preliminary works. I have therefore asked for the vote in order that no time should be wasted during the ensuing season. We have also taken $500,000 as a subsidy to the Canada Central Railway. This completes the estimate to which the assent of the House is now asked—an estimate amounting altogether to six millions and a quarter. I may say in conclusion that if there is any further information required, in regard to any matter, which I have not already given to the committee, I shall be very glad to give it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Mr. Chairman: The committee have listened with attention to the very interesting statement addressed to it by the hon. Minister of Public Works in connection with what I have no hesitation in calling the most important subject that could at any time engage the attention of this committee. I must ask your kind indulgence while I place my views upon this question before the committee as briefly as I can. I regret that these views should differ in the least from the statements we have heard, because I confess I regard the great question of the Canadian Pacific Railway as one so important in its character, having such an important bearing upon the future progress and greatness of the country as to require that all personal ambition, all party interests, should stand in abeyance in its presence. I can assure you, Sir, and this committee, that nothing would give me greater pleasure than that there should be propounded from the Treasury benches a policy to which I could give my hearty and cordial co-operation. The fact that the hand of Nature has given to Canada the prominent position that it has in relation to this question—the fact that on this continent is to be found a line so favorable for communication between the Old World and China—the fact that every light in which the Canadian Pacific Railway can be regarded Canada possesses the most prominent advantages—these facts, I say, are sufficient to direct the attention of every Canadian statesman to the question as one deserving of his most careful and patriotic consideration. When we look at the fact that by a line of railway passing through our own country even the people of New York and the people of Montreal are brought 300 miles nearer to Fort Garry; when we contemplate the fact that the inhabitants of New York, Portland and Boston must find their shortest communication with the Pacific coast and the distance between those points greatly reduced by travelling our line of railway, nothing more requires to be said to show the enormous advantages which our topographical position gives us. When it is remembered that we shall have a line of railway that will shorten the distance to be travelled between Fort Garry and Montreal by 637 miles, and Toronto, the great commercial centre of Ontario, by 416 miles, as compared with the distance by existing lines, nothing more needs to be said in order to show that as regards distances, we have everything that can possibly be desired in connection with this railway. If we refer to the character of the country through which it passes, we find we have nothing to desire. The very interesting statements made by the First Minister today with regard to the explorations of last season instead of throwing any doubt upon the character of the country, have proved that the high expectations we have already formed of it are largely exceeded. For a long tract of country from the eastern side of Manitoba to Fort Pelly, the line runs through a magnificently wooded country, furnishing what has been a great want in the western prairies of the United States, and the timber is of the most valuable description. From the interesting reports of the Director of Geological Surveys, which have already been laid upon the table, we see that Canada possesses the finest agricultural country in the world, that country is enriched with vast deposits of coal and iron, and upon the Saskatchewan and in British Columbia, especially, with gold. When it is remembered that our line of railway will run throughout its entire length through an excellent country, a great portion of which will bear favorable comparison with anything to be found on the face of the globe, it is not surprising that members of this House and the people of the country have come to the conclusion that no responsibility rests upon the shoulders of those charged with the administration of public affairs, more weighty than the duty of seeing to the rapid and steady progress of this great national work. But, sir, the fact of the engagements which the First Minister has just stated were entered into with British Columbia during the past season set at rest and forever any question as to whether we are in a position that would allow us to doubt and hesitate a single instant what course to pursue. I am not going to call in question the propriety of this engagement for a moment. I feel that the Ministry of the day are entitled to the support of this House, and especially the gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches, in any measure which is required to carry out the pledge—perhaps a somewhat imprudent pledge—that was given by their predecessors in relation to this great work; and I feel they may look with confidence to this side of the House for the most energetic support of the measures they have taken —I believe wisely taken—for the redemption of that pledge. I say that these negotiations are of a character that must convince every person that the time for doubt and hesitation as to the steady and rapid progress of this work has gone by; and that it would be utter insanity on the part of any Government to bind themselves, as this Government have bound themselves, to make large expenditure west of the Rocky Mountains unless it was intended to supplement that expenditure by such a vigorous prosecution of this work as could alone justify that expenditure and render it advantageous to the country. Now, the great difficulty that has presented itself to the minds of those who have paid attention to this subject, is the question of cost. It is a fact that in relation to the resources of our country the cost of constructing a Canadian Pacific Railway is very great; and I ask this committee whether, in the presence of that fact—in the presence of that great difficulty which presents itself at the threshold of this question—the Government of the day are not bound to husband their resources, to prosecute this work in such a way as will enable them to use effectively every dollar of public money that the country can spare in order to its economical and successful prosecution. Now, the exception I take to the policy of the hon. gentlemen, and the exception which I took a year ago is this: not that he proposes to make a large expenditure in connection with the construction of this important work, but that he proposes to make an enormous expenditure of money entirely unnecessary and outside of anything that is required for the construction of this work. Parliament after the most thorough discussion deliberately fixed the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at a point south and east of Lake Nipissing. That point I admit was a compromise between various sections of this country that entertained different opinions as to whether it should be on the Matawan in a direct line from the north-west to Quebec, or whether it should be brought a little further into the Province of Ontario. After, I say, the most deliberate examination of the question Parliament adopted a point south and east of Lake Nipissing as the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why? Because they felt they were bound —grappling with a work so gigantic, with a work which involved such enormous expenditure of money—they were bound to make that terminus no farther east than to a point which could be reached by the private resources of railway companies, aided by Provincial subsidies. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, who had formerly taken exception to the great cost of this work, the moment he was clothed with power to deal with it ministerially, propounded the extraordinary policy of building a line of railway from that point to Georgian Bay, I must ask the indulgence of the committee while I draw their attention for a few minutes to the amount of public money it is proposed to expend eastward of the point which Parliament fixed as the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I will put it to the First Minister whether he can justify himself to this committee and to the country for adding to the enormous amount of money that all admit must be expended in order to construct this work, the sum of ten million dollars of public money and public property. I shall endeavor to show the committee that that policy will prevent Canada possessing that advantage which it is evident God and Nature intended from the physical configuration of our country she should possess. My hon. friend from South Bruce says "hear, hear!"

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—No; I said if God intended it we would not be likely to prevent it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I say that no part of this continent is more plainly intended than this "Canada of Ours" to be the great highway of communication between Europe and the eastern world, and though the hon. gentleman may tell me we cannot defeat the designs of Providence, I fear it is in the power of man to deprive us by procrastination and indifference of the benefit of those advantages which Providence has conferred upon our country. If my hon. friend thinks that these are questions beyond the control and influence of man, then I ask him what statesmen are for if not to carry out vigorously and efficiently such a line of policy as will enable this country to profit from the advantages, which by the blessings of Providence have been showered upon it. Now, the First Minister has said that this House last session settled this question of public policy; but he will remember that he claimed great credit for the adoption of the principle—I will not say a new principle—of asking Parliament at every step of this great work to review the policy of the Government with regard to it. He has kindly volunteered, and I thank him for the confidence he has shown the House in that respect, to place the contract now on the table before the House for their consideration; I say under these circumstances we are in a position to review the whole subject in all its bearings. The First Minister in his address to the House a year ago quoted Mr. Fleming as an authority for the statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway would be comparatively useless—would be a burden upon the resources of the country, and cost a very large amount for its annual operation—unless we could throw three millions of people into the North-West. That statement commends itself to the judgement of every intelligent man in this country. If we wish to make this great work accomplish for Canada what it may be made to accomplish we must adopt the means which will rapidly throw hundreds of thousands of people into the great North-West. Now, I shall invite the attention of the committee to the expenditure that is proposed to be made outside altogether of what I maintain Parliament fixed as the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. The hon. gentleman a year ago told us that the Canadian Pacific Railway was divided into four sections, the first commencing at a point south and east of Lake Nipissing and running to Nipegon 557 miles, and the second from Nipegon direct to Red River, 416 miles. I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the policy now propounded is a new policy; that instead of taking up the section from Nipegon to Red River, a distance of 416 miles, it is proposed to diverge away to Thunder Bay and to run a line which will strike the main line from Nipegon to Red River, at a distance as I estimate by measurement on Mr. FLEMING'S map at about 150 miles, but I will take half that distance and call it 70 miles. We are therefore not only called upon to make an expenditure outside of the Pacific Railway proper, as defined by Parliament for subsidizing a line from Renfrew to Burnt Lake, which I will designate as the point where the Government line, as my hon. friend intimates, commences—we are not only called upon to subsidize a private company to the extent of $12,000 a mile, and for what purpose? For the purpose of enabling them the better to compete with another private company running a line on the other side of the river, and which is obtaining no subsidy at all from the Dominion. We are called upon not only to pay that subsidy, but also to pay, as I shall show, an enormous sum to secure the construction of a line from Burnt Lake to the mouth of French River, on Georgian Bay, outside altogether and independently of the Canada Pacific Railway proper, as divided into four sections by the hon. gentleman himself a year ago. I say the act upon our statute book makes no provision for a line from Thunder Bay to Fort Garry, or for connection between the main line and Thunder Bay. Now, I shall ask the attention of the committee to the expenditure that is proposed to be made outside altogether of anything which is necessary for the construction of a through line of railway from a point south and east of Lake Nipissing to the Pacific—the only line of railway that was contemplated by Parliament in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear!" Perhaps he will remind me that there were to be branches from Pembina to Fort Garry and from the main line to Lake Superior. But he must allow me tell him he cries "hear, hear!" before he has mastered the subject; that when we contemplated that all the surveys we were in possession of, led us to the conclusion that we would have to run the main line north of Lake Nipigon and therefore a branch of 60 or 80 miles was necessary, and he will allow me to tell him what the First Minister stated to-day—that subsequent explorations not only proved that we can obtain a good line of railway from a point south and east of Lake Nipissing to Nipigon Bay, but that the line will skirt the waters of Lake Superior thereby obviating the necessity of a branch. The committee will perhaps permit me to read a single sentence on that point from Mr. FLEMING'S report. He says:—"Route No. 2 passes south of Lake Nipigeon and touches the navigable waters of Lake Superior near the mouth of Nipegon River; its total length is 1,038 miles." He says again: "Route "No. 2 would require a branch of about "ten miles in length to reach a point on "Nipegon Bay, designated Red Rock, "where steamboats now touch, but the "surveys which we have made establish "the fact that by straightening and dredg-"ing out the channel between Nepigon "Bay and a sheet of water known as Lake "Ellen, the navigation of Lake Superior "could be extended to the head of the "former lake, ten miles inland. The "main line, by route No. 2, would touch "the head of Lake Ellen, and thus by the "improvements referred to a branch would "not be required," so that it will be seen that these branches are not now any necessary part of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. I will not detain the committee with the evidence that I have under my hand from Mr. ROWAN'S report, showing that the waters of Nepigon Bay are as accessible as Thunder Bay, both in point of navigation and as regards the ice. The Minister of Finance shakes his head, but if instead of taking the statements of interested parties who have expended large amounts in mineral lands in the neighborhood of Thunder Bay, he will take the evidence of the ablest engineers who have examined the route; he will find that Nipegon Bay is nearer Sault Ste. Marie, and in point of freedom from ice and security to navigation, is equal, if not superior to Thunder Bay. Nobody can read the speech delivered by the Premier last year, without being led to the belief that the road was to be constructed from Nipegon Bay to Red River, I read from the speech of the hon. First Minister in submitting the Pacific Railway Bill:—"They (the Government) propose to divide the road into several sections, one from Nipissing to Nipegon, a distance of 557 miles. This was a section that the Government did not consider it at all necessary to be carried on for some time. The next section was from some point on Lake Superior to Red River, a distance of about 416 miles. This section must be proceeded with immediately." We have been told to-day that the distance from Thunder Bay by the route proposed is 440 miles.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That distance includes the sinuosities of water navigation.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—The hon. gentleman will not be able to change my position by that statement, because he will see if he gave one section of 557 miles from Nipissing to Nipegon, and another section of 416 miles, which is the distance from Nipegon to Red River, my statement is sustained, that the intention was not only to go direct but to put the section from the head-waters of Lake Superior at Nipegon to Red River, under contract as soon as possible.

At six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The following Private and Local Bills were read a second time:—

Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell)—To consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Provincial Insurance Company of Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa)—To confirm articles of agreement and consolidation between the European and North American Railway Company for extension from St. John westward; and the European and North American Railway Company of Maine, and for other purposes.

Mr. JETTE—To incorporate the Royal Mutual Life Insurance Company of Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN—To amend the Act passed by the Parliament of the late Province of Canada intituled "An Act to incorporate the Montreal Board of Trade."

Mr. IRVING—Act respecting the International Bridge Company.

Mr. MOSS—To amend the Acts of Incorporation of the Great Western Railway Company.

Mr. JETTE—To incorporate the European and American Express Company.

Mr. FRECHETTE—To amend the Act incorporating the Board of Trade of the Town of Levis.

Mr. COCKBURN—To consolidate the enactments relating to the Northern Railway Company of Canada and to provide for the consolidation of the Loan Capital of the Company.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER resumed his speech on the Pacific Railroad, in Committee of Supply. He said:—I stated to the Committee that the principal ground of objection that I have to the proposition of the hon. First Minister now before the House is the fact that a large amount of money is required to be appropriated for a purpose which I contend is not necessary for the construction of the Pacific Railroad proper, and I will now invite the attention of the committee to the specific amount of money and assistance which, in my judgment, are thus frittered away (if I am permitted to use the term) on measures not required for the purpose of accomplishing that great work. The contract which the hon. First Minister has laid on the table of the House, to the consideration of which the attention of the House is invited, provides, in the first instance, for a subsidy to the Canada Central Railway from Douglas to Burnt Lake. I will use the term Burnt Lake as designating the point at the 85th mile from the Georgian Bay. The first expenditure of which I complain is a subsidy of $12,000 per mile to the Canada Central Company for 120 miles, involving an expenditure of $1,440,000, or, in round numbers, a million and a half. In the next place, this contract provides that the Hon. A. B. FOSTER, the contractor, shall be paid $10,000 per mile for the 85 miles from Burnt Lake to the mouth of French River. Now, I understood the Premier again and again to refer to these 85 miles as a Government railway. As I understand it now, this is not a Government line at all. It is Mr. FOSTER'S line. The contract, as I understand it, provides that all these sums of money, all these payments to which I wish to call the attention of the committee, are not for the purpose of constructing a line for the Government, but for the purpose of constructing a line for himself. Tenders were invited for two purposes—one for the construction of a road to be owned and operated by the Government, and the other for a road to be owned and operated by the company, themselves. If I understand this statement, it is that the contract with Mr. FOSTER provides that all these payments shall be made to him for a line to be owned and operated by himself. Well, Sir, $10,000 a mile for 85 miles adds $850,000 to the expenditure. Then, he is to receive 20,000 acres of land per mile which I estimate to be worth $2. per acre. The committee will remember that when we occupied the Treasury benches, we valued the lands in the North-West which were to be appropriated for the Pacific Railway, at a minimum price of $2.50 per acre. For the purpose of removing any question on this point I will assume that these lands shall be valued at $2. per acre, and I may say that if the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway will not result in giving this value to our magnificent land in the North-West, so glowingly described by the Premier, then there is no person in this House that will say it is worth while to make the road at all. When I place the value of these land at $2.00, I place it below rather than above the mark. Mr. FOSTER receives 20,000 acres per mile on the 85 miles, either along the line of railway, or if that is not available—if the Government should not succeed in effecting such an arrangement with the Ontario Government, then he is entitled to 20,000 acres per mile out of the lands owned by the Government in the North-West. That amounts to $3,400,000 at $2.00 per acre.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—Why not make it $5.00 an acre?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I could safely make it $5.00 per acre provided I have the selecting of the land. The whole character of the land from the eastern limits of Manitoba to Fort Pelly is worth $5.00 per acre as well as $1.00, and will fetch that sum. If the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway will not render these lands in the North-West, of which we have more than one hundred millions of acres at this moment of magnificent prairie and wooded lands, worth $2 an acre when the railway is built, they are worth nothing. No person would undertake to say that the lands would not be worth that amount—or why undertake the construction of the line! The hon. member for Chateauguay knows that the Northern Pacific Company's land along the length of the line constructed is sold at from $4 to $10; $4 being the minimum. With my characteristic moderation, I will, however, place the value of the land at $2 per acre, which would give Mr. FOSTER $3,400,000. That, it appears, is not a sufficient subsidy, and Mr. FOSTER has obtained an additional amount of 4 per cent. per annum on $7,400 per mile for 25 years on 85 miles, which is equal to $609,000. Add these sums together, which the Government has contracted to pay, and which it is for the House to approve or disapprove, and it will be found that the subsidies to be paid to the Canada Central Railway from Douglas to Burnt Lake, and from Burnt Lake to French River, amount to $6,299,000. That is not the only expenditure which is outside altogether of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. Parliament fixed the point of the eastern terminus of the road at a point south and east of Lake Nipissing. The hon. Premier says that as soon as possible we must have a national through line, and every man in this country says "Amen" to that sentiment. When you have constructed that line you have to build a road from Burnt Lake to Lake Nipissing, a distance of 35 miles; that is, that for the accommodation of Mr. FOSTER, in addition to the seven millions of dollars in round numbers, which he will receive for the construction of a line which will not belong to the Government, but be his private property, a road will have to be made from the point south and east of Lake Nipissing for a distance of thirty-five miles. I think this House, after seeing the amount of subsidy which the Government has been compelled to pay Mr. FOSTER for the construction of this, will agree with me that I make a very moderate estimate; one far below the scale of payment to be made to Mr. FOSTER, when I place the cost of those 35 miles at $40,000 per mile; equal to $1,400,000. This brings the expenditure on lines before the point fixed by Parliament as the eastern terminus of the road is reached, up to $7,600,000. The hon. First Minister has shown that he has almost committed a breach of faith with the people of Winnipeg, because the statements made a year ago in this House led the people to suppose that the line would cross the Red River near Fort Garry. Although the First Minister thus disappoints the natural expectations of the people of Winnipeg, he has shown that by carrying the line twenty-three miles north of that point the length of the route is shortened by thirty-five miles, and that I hold will be a justification for making the change, which is one every one will approve. But following the same, the hon. First Minister would be compelled to carry out the view he held a year ago, that the Government should build a national through line, not only from Lake Nipissing to Lake Nipegon, but from thence in a direct line to Red River, and onwards to the Pacific, and not add sixty miles to the length of route by going to Thunder Bay from Nipegon and from Thunder Bay westward. I, therefore, assume that the hon. First Minister will keep faith with Parliament and act according to the wishes of the country, for it would be unjust to compel every traveller over our national highway to travel sixty miles further than was necessary. A direct line should be struck from Lake Nipegon to Red River. The cost of the Thunder Bay branch of seventy miles he would assume at $40,000 a mile, making $2,800,000, which added to $7,699,000, brings the total to $10,499,000, being the amount of public money which the committee is asked to vote for purposes outside of the construction of the Pacific Railway, and for roads not one mile of which would ever be seen or traversed by any one who was going to the Pacific cost from Montreal or Toronto. The hon. First Minister may say, "It is very easy to pull down but not to build up, to criticise my policy, but where is your own." He has a right to ask this question. and I will put before this committee in plain, succinct terms the policy which I consider in Canadian interests should be adopted in carrying out this great work. The hon. First Minister has shown that from the eastern terminus at a point south and east of Lake Nipissing, as fixed by Parliament, the distance to Lake Nipegon is 557 miles. As he stated one year ago that he intended, as early as possible, to construct a line from Lake Nipegon to Red River, and as that portion is not touched by the arguments I am addressing the Committee, I will deal with the proposed expenditure and the construction of the line from Nipegon to Nipissing. The committee has seen that the Government policy is to expend ten and a half millions, in round numbers, as I contend, altogether outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. as I now invite attention to the expenditure that would be required to give us a national through line, and to save the necessity of expending a single dollar of those ten and a half millions of dollars. To construct a line from Nipissing to Nipegon, 557 miles, at $40,000 per mile, would cost $22,280,000. Deduct $10,499,000 of unnecessary expenditure provided the work was at once grappled with and accomplished, and there remains $11,779,000. But where are your lands? You are granting 1,700,000 acres, or $3,400,000 towards the construction of the Georgian Bay branch, and there is no one either in this House or the country who did not feel that in undertaking to open up the great North-West, the Government was justified in appropriating land as far as possible to secure the construction of the railway, which was to pierce the country. Appropriate 20,000 acres per mile for the 557 miles from Nipissing to Nipegon, and estimate its value at only $1 per acre, and you obtain $11,140,000, thus leaving $639,000 as the amount which it is only necessary to expend in addition to the ten millions and a half which I have shown the Government are expending without accomplishing any useful purpose or constructing a mile of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Will any hon. member tell me what purpose the expenditure thus proposed by the Government is intended to accomplish? When I asked the hon. First Minister the question a year ago, he said the object of the expenditure was to utilize the water stretches, and give the people access to the Georgian Bay; but I may tell the committee, as I told it last year, that if the eight millions of dollars which it is proposed to expend, to give access to Georgian Bay, were all spent, a person travelling from Montreal to Lake Superior would not see one mile of the road so built. Why? Because at this moment private enterprises and private companies have accomplished the work before the hon. First Minister has undertaken it. When I tell the House that from Renfrew to the mouth of the French River is 217 miles, from Renfrew to Ottawa 70 miles, and from Ottawa to Montreal 120 miles, it will be seen that after these eight millions have been spent, a person will have to travel 407 miles from Montreal to reach the mouth of French River. Now, what is the state of things to-day? At this moment private capital has tapped the waters of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay at no less than six points, and at the end of the present season they will be tapped at seven points, for the last 25 miles for Orillia to Midland City near Pentanguishene on Georgian Bay are now under construction. When that is done there will be railway communication to Georgian Bay, as follows: Montreal to Port Hope 270 miles. Port Hope to Orillia 87 miles, and Orillia to Midland City 25 miles, or 382 miles in all, or a route 25 shorter than the hon. gentleman will accomplish after the expenditure of eight millions of the public money. Now, I ask any intelligent man if he can justify to the people of this country, having regard to the great expense of this work of itself, the expenditure of eight millions of the people's money to accomplish that which is already accomplished in a better manner. The Government I say are doing a deep wrong to the people of this country. They should encourage private capitalists who come into this country to spend their money, and who have opened up railway communication between the great commercial centres and Georgian Bay; but instead of doing that they propose to take the public money, and build a rival line to do the work which is much better done without the expenditure of any public money. It is not only a deep wrong to the people of this country, it is not only the useless expenditure of eight millions, but it strikes a blow at the credit and character of Canada, and it will deter capitalists from investing their money in railway enterprises in this country. Will any member of this House pretend to tell me that the Canada Central Railway Company themselves, that the Northern Colonization Railway, and all those lines in Ontario running to Georgian Bay would not be better satisfied to do without any subsidy whatever and be allowed to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway at its Parliamentary terminus, a point south and east of Lake Nipissing, and thereby secure the immense traffic of the great North-West that will flow down the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no intelligent capitalist that will not say that these lines would be infinitely better off with the traffic of the North-West without one dollar of subsidy than with a subsidy of $12,000 a mile under the proposed arrangement. We have the evidence before us to show that not only will these eight millions be worse than wasted for it will be used for a purpose that is better accomplished by private enterprise, but that after the road is built, it will be worthless. The tenders that have been sent to the Government show that in the opinion of those best qualified to judge such will be the case. I am not going to discuss that question, but I believe I could show the committee on the authority of those best informed on the subject that after we have spent these eight millions to reach Georgian Bay; after having created by this unfair appropriation of public money a rival line to draw away traffic from existing private lines, we have only reached a point which is inaccessible in summer and frozen up for six months in the year. So that after all this expenditure winter traffic would have to go round by St Paul, and in the summer, people going to the North-West would prefer to leave Lake Superior at Duluth and thence by the Northern Pacific rather than going by the mixed rail and water communication from Thunder Bay that was proposed; and Canadians will have the mortification of finding that all they have been doing has been to play into the hands of the United States. I cannot illustrate more forcibly the view I hold upon this subject than by reading an extract from the Toronto Globe which when this proposal was hinted at, when it was intimated that we should utilize the American lines, used this language :—

"If this scheme is carried out, our national "enterprise, instead of being the successful "rival of the American Company, competing "for the Asiatic trade, which is now in its "infancy, and building up the Dominion as no "other undertaking will do, will simply be the "Canadian branch of the Northern Pacific "Railroad, entirely under its control, and dictated to by it relentlessly."

There is not an intelligent man in this country that will not say that this language reflects solid, substantial sentiments, and that after wasting eight millions of public money on an unnecessary enterprise—an enterprise that fails to accomplish that which it professes to accomplish—we are left dependent upon our American rivals for access to our own country, and have postponed, indefinitely—during our lifetime, at all events—the attainment of the proud position of having a through national line of railway to the Pacific. But I said I would show from these tenders themselves that the line when built as proposed, will be a burden to the country. These tenders disclosed two facts of the most startling character. The First Minister said that the Government intended to proceed with great caution; that they did not intend to make a contract for a mile of the railway or to locate a mile of the railway, till by surveys they had exhausted the whole subject. Where are the surveys of this line of railway? Mr. LEGGE, an authority on that subject, the able engineer of the Northern Colonization Railway, has shown that the Government actually invited tenders for the construction of this line of railway without having a brass instrument on the line—there was evidently a good deal of brass somewhere, but it was not in the shape of a theodolite. The result is—and the First Minister knows it—that although the contract binds him to pay over six millions to Mr. FOSTER this Parliament has established the precedent of increasing the amount of money contracted to be paid. The hon. gentleman knows that on the Intercolonial line of railway the contractors for the first seven sections came to this House and asked a vote of a sum of money in addition to that which the Government had contracted to pay them at the outset. And on what ground? Years had been spent on the survey of the Intercolonial Railroad, it was located, every information that could be given to the contractors was given, save that the road had not been cross-sectioned and the quantities ascertained. The consequence was the contractors applied for an additional amount on their contracts, and this House voted a large sum in order to meet that defect, and for which the hon. gentleman will tell me I am responsible. But I say that that circumstance ought to make us wiser, and in view of that act it requires neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet to foretell that the six millions of dollars which we propose to expend will be utterly inadequate to accomplish the object proposed, and that Mr. FOSTER will come to us, and, quoting the precedents that were established in regard to the Intercolonial Railway, will show that he was called upon to tender for a line, the route of which no man had ever walked over. I do not believe that Mr. HAZLEWOOD, who made the exploratory survey, walked over the section of country within miles of the location of the line, and yet the Government asked for tenders to build the road, and pay away six and a quarter millions of the public money. These tenders disclose the fact that the ablest men in this country have asked for the construction of this work—how much does this House suppose? Mr. FOSTER, it appears, has obtained an assignment from a Mr. MUNSON, an American in Boston—a very significant circumstance. Every person knows what a howl was raised throughout this country when it was supposed Americans were to have any part in the construction of our national highway. Now, this tender is assigned by a gentleman in Boston, whose tender was the lowest to Mr. FOSTER. We all understand what that means—that it is a partnership instead of an assignment and the position that Canada is to be in is this, that assuming that this line is to be utilized as a part of a Canadian Pacific Railway, we are to have MUNSON, and his American associates in control of 120 miles of a link in our great national highway. Well, sir, when I tell the committee that the firm of C. & E. ENGLISH, of Toronto, which I understand embraces gentlemen of the highest commercial standing, have asked no less than four per cent. guarantee on $100,000 per mile, per annum, instead of $7,400 per mile, which is Mr. FOSTER's tender, the committee will understand what position this road was in to be tendered for. When I tell the House that one contractor asks $40,000, another $75,000, another $90,000, another $100,000, another $30,000, another (the tender that was accepted) $7,400, and Mr. FOSTER's own tender $12,500, and Mr. ENGLISH's tender $110,000 per mile, the House will understand what opinions these gentlemen hold as to this road. But there is another fact, a most startling one, with respect to the paying qualities of this road in the opinion of these gentlemen. What will the committee think when I tell them that they actually offered to build the road and surrender it to the Government for a less sum than they asked to build the road and run it themselves. Messrs. ENGLISH & Co., were willing to build the road for the Government for a guarantee of 4 per cent. on $100,000 per mile in addition to a land grant of 20,000 acres of land per mile, a subsidy of $10,000 per mile, but to build it and bind themselves to run it, they asked a guarantee on $110,000 per mile showing that they believed they would be fortunate men if, after they had constructed the road they could get the Government to take it as a present off their hands. So that after this expenditure of eight millions of the public money we shall have a road that no person is willing to own. Now, I ask the committee whether any man can justify to the people of this country the adoption of a policy of that kind in view of the fact that the Northern Colonization Railway Company without a dollar of subsidy from this Government, aided only by Provincial and local grants, are prepared to extend their line to meet the Canadian Pacific Railway proper at a point south and east of Lake Nipissing; thus opening direct railway communication from the sea-board at Quebec to the heart of the continent; in view also of the fact that the Canada Central Railway Company can go into the markets of the world to-morrow and get all the money they want without a dollar of subsidy from the Government, provided you enable them to say "when we reach a point south and east of Lake Nipissing we meet the Canadian Pacific Railway and will have a direct through line to the great North-Western prairies." All those lines of railway that are being pushed up from Toronto, aided by Provincial subsidies, would be vitalised—any one of them could go into the money markets of the world and obtain all the money they required, provided you enable them to say, "The Government of Canada are constructing a line from Nipissing to the North-West and the moment we reach that point of junction at Nipissing we will command the traffic of the Great North-West of the Dominion." I say, whether you regard this subject from one stand-point or another, it is impossible for the people of this country to take any view but one. What shall we say to the people of Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick? There is not an intelligent man in those Provinces who is not ready to bear his full share of the burden imposed upon us in order to secure the great Canadian highway to the Pacific; there is not a man in Ontario or Quebec who has the spirit of patriotism in his breast and an intelligent head on his shoulders, who is not fully prepared to bear the expense that is required to build the Pacific Railway, because he knows that the increased prosperity of the country would, by the work, abundantly repay him. But, what are we to say to the people when the Government send their representatives back with the information that instead of the three millions of additional taxation, which it is admitted, were levied, not to make up past deficits, but to meet future expenditures, being expended on the construction of a great national highway for Canada, they are to be expended on a local road to Georgian Bay, to which access can be had more easily by means of roads already constructed by private enterprise. What are you to say to the capitalists of the Grand Trunk who have invested millions in opening up the trade and commerce of Canada when they see that the natural and legitimate traffic they are entitled to is to be swept away by the Government of this country using the public money to enter into competition with them? The hon., the First Minister says that the Northern Colonization Railway is twenty miles longer than the Canada Central, but that is denied by the engineer, who has undertaken to prove that, if you take into consideration the grades and locomotive power required, it is a shorter route than the Canada Central. Let that be as it may, the people of Quebec had a right to expect that the Government, before entering into a contract with the Canada Central, would have made an examination of both lines in order to determine, on the authority of the engineers, which would best promote the prosperity of this country. I do trust, deeply as the Government are committed to this work, that they will reconsider their policy on this question—a question of vital importance to Canada and to its progress and prosperity. We have already, by private means, tapped the waters of Lake Huron at Sarnia, Goderich, Kincardine and Southampton, and the waters of the Georgian Bay at Owen Sound, Collingwood and Midland City. My hon. friend will ask me what policy I have to oppose to this. I repeat, the policy of using the existing lines of communication with these waters—which are better lines than he will have after expending eight millions—to convey the plant, material and men required for the construction of the railway to Nipegon on the borders of Lake Superior. I would there put a strong party to work east toward Nipissing and another strong party to work west to Red River. I would put another strong party at Red River—utilizing the means the First Minister has referred to—to work eastwardly from Red River to meet the party coming from Nipegon. In that way at an early day we would have railway communication established with the North-West and at an expence of only half a million in money (valuing the lands at only one dollar an acre) more than it is now proposed to throw away, upon a line for the accomplishment of a purpose which has already been better accomplished by private means—not only thrown away but used in such a way as to cause every man to turn away in disgust from attempting to build a Canadian Pacific Railway. When the people find that ten millions of their money have been spent, and not one mile of the Pacific Railway proper constructed, it would be impossible to induce them to grapple with that work in the spirit with which it must be grappled if it is to be carried out. As I have already said, the claim that will arise under Mr. FOSTER'S contract will, in my judgment, largely exceed the amount of the contract. In support of that statement, if the Committee will permit me, I will read an extract from Mr. LEGGE'S report. He says:—"To do so (that is to "make a survey and a comparison of the "Northern Colonization Railway and the "Canada Central) will be but the act of "wise men, as we may be well assured "no capitalist will furnish the large bal- "ance of money required to complete the "subsidized section without those bonds "are guaranteed by the Government, "more especially as for years to come "there will not be a paying a traffic pass- "ing over the road for more than six "months in each year. The Government "will, therefore, to all intents and pur- "poses be at the entire expense of con- "struction." That is the opinion of a very able engineer who has given his attention to the subject, and who tells the Government that this contract, as far as achieving even the object you have in view is concerned, is only a piece of waste paper. The hon. the First Minister says that the Pembina branch will be used for the purpose of conveying rails. With reference to that, as the contract is already let, I will only say that if the object was to transport rails for the purpose of assisting in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway it would not have been necessary to build seventy miles of railway from Pembina to Fort Garry, when the hon. gentleman himself admits that the Americans are unable to bring their lines within sixty miles of Pembina. But it is well-known that the Red River affords splendid means for the transport of rails; all that would be necessary would be to put the rails in a scow 500 miles up the Red River, where there is railway communication, and the stream itself would carry them down at the rate of three miles an hour without any expenditure whatever. In any case they would have to be transported in that way as far as Pembina because the American railway is not extended to that point. However I do not intend to discuss this question, because the contract has been let and part of the road has been graded, and the House is committed to the work. Nor do I intend to detain the committee with any comments upon the statements of the First Minister respecting the purchase of two millions and a half dollars worth of rails. I think the committee will agree with me that this purchase was rather premature; that considering the enormous price which iron went up to not long ago, and considering also the fact that before those rails are required the price of iron may be reduced—the Government has not made so good a bargain as they would lead us to suppose, although I will be willing to allow them every latitude in a case of this kind. But that is an accomplished fact, and I shall say nothing more about it. I have no doubt the Government were acting with the most sincere desire for the public good, and I am always ready to give them credit when I can for good intentions. My hon. friend stated that what he wanted was speedy ingress from Lake Superior. If such is the case he will adopt the course I have proposed, instead of going to Thunder Bay, where, I have no doubt, there is great attraction for my hon. friend. I will qualify that expression, which might be thought an insinuation, and say simply the pressure of friends interested in Thunder Bay.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No pressure whatever.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—We know that large Ontario interests are deeply concerned at Thunder Bay, and I was afraid my hon. friend, being human, might possibly be subject to those friendly influences and arguments of an urgent character that they would advance. That was all that I intended to convey. But if he wants speedy ingress from Lake Superior; if he wants to prevent that which he would himself regret—namely, our being dependent on American railways, I would say—carry on the work simultaneously from Nipegon westward, and from the Red River eastward. Then instead of wasting these ten millions of the people's money, add one poor half million to it, in addition to the land, and at an early day you will have a through national Pacific railway, extending from the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence—and I trust at an early day from Louisburg in Cape Breton—to the shores of the Pacific. And, I say, sir, that after my hon. friend has pledged himself—as he states he has, and as I approve of his having done—to expend two millions per annum in the construction of the railway west of the Rocky Mountains, there is no excuse for his having left this end of the line as he has done; upon it, sir, depends the success of the line. Upon its construction depends the success with which we shall be able to apply the means at our command of as rapidly as possible, inducing the people from the over-populated countries of Europe to fill up our North-West with a thriving, sober and hardy population, who will not only help us to bear the taxation which the construction of this work may entail, but give the Pacific Railway something to do. My hon. friend made one statement at which I was truly gratified—that all these appropriations were merely preliminary. When my hon. friend is cogitating on the magnificent scheme of completing this railway through from end to end, and carrying out the great project which the country desires to see carried out successfully—the magnificent emigration scheme of which it is not only a part but the essence—I am safe to say that the longer he cogitates and the more profoundly he ponders, the more clearly will he see the greatness and the practicability of the scheme presented to this country by his predecessors. And I assure my hon. friend, if he wishes to make this railway successful, he must fall back upon the formation of a great company, and draw the capitalists of Europe into the association; inducing them thus to identify themselves so closely with the future prosperity of Canada that every man who owns a pound's worth of stock in our national railway shall feel bound to constitute himself a Canadian Emigration Agent. I regret having occupied so much of the time of the committee this evening, but I trust the importance of the subject will be my justification; but I cannot take my seat without making one more last despairing appeal to the First Minister to reconsider his policy. He stands to-day, by the confidence and suffrages of his fellow-countrymen in a high and exalted position, and regarding him, as I do, as eminently qualified to fulfil the duties of the department over which he presides—a department, viewed in connection with its bearing upon the present and future of Canada, by far the most important in the public service—I tell him that if he will reconsider this question, and, instead of frittering away the resources of the country and taxing the people for that which would be provided by private enterprise ; if he will grapple in earnest with this subject, he will earn for himself a name and a reputation which will justify the people of this country for having placed him in the high and responsible position he occupies. Coming, as he did, to the head of affairs at a peculiar crisis, when his predecessors, by the adverse vote of this House, were prevented from carrying into effect the great scheme they had propounded, he has had an opportunity to distinguish himself, of which he may justly be proud. He has only to have confidence in the value of our resources ; he has only to have faith in the ability of Canada to accomplish this great work ; he has only to take the subject up in a broad and statesmanlike spirit, regardless of private enterprises and personal interests, and he will hand down his name to his children and to all posterity as a man who, being entrusted with the greatest power which can be conferred by the people of Canada, used it in such a manner as eminently to promote the progress and prosperity of his country.

Mr. MASSON said Mr. Chairman—It is not my intention to discuss this question at any length, especially after the eloquent address of my hon. friend the member for Cumberland, but some expressions fell from the Minister of Public Works which I am desirous shall not pass unchallenged. He has stated that parties from the Province of Quebec interested in the Northern Colonization Railway had an interview with him during the recess, and that these parties returned home satisfied with the results of the meeting. Sir, I was one of that delegation, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that far from leaving Ottawa satisfied the greater number of the delegation left with sentiments of deep disappointment and dissatisfaction. What did the delegation ask of the hon. gentleman? First, that the terminus of the Pacific Railway should remain as it had been fixed by the "Act relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway," an Act which received the assent of Parliament, and was concurred in by the people—that the terminus should remain as it was arranged by himself, when, coming forward for the first time as a Minister of the Crown, he addressed the electors of Sarnia, and explained to them the policy by which he was prepared to be guided in the future. Sir, we asked the hon. gentleman then, that the terminus should remain at the south-east of Lake Nipissing. The hon. gentleman cannot now say that he gave satisfaction in regard to this point. The second thing we asked was that the lines subsidized should pass by the Matawan and keep to the north side of the Ottawa. We were then told that our desires would not be acceded to, and I now say that since it is not intended that the line shall pass along the north shore those delegates cannot be satisfied. The third point upon which we insisted—and we did insist upon this point—was that since the engineer of the Northern Colonization Railway, a gentleman second to none in Canada in ability and engineering talent, gave it as his opinion that the road by the North Shore of the Ottawa was the best road for all parties, and the shortest and most direct line between French River in the west and the nearest seaport in the east—that is to say Montreal. The Minister of Public Works should leave the question open until such instrumental surveys had been made as would enable him to come down to this House and ask us to decide upon the route which it was really in the interest of the country to follow. The Minister of Public Works stated in the present debate, that there is nothing more suicidal than to decide upon a line of railway, unless we have proper data on which to base our decision. Under these circumstances the hon. Minister cannot wisely decide that the line shall not pass by the north shore of the Ottawa, and that it shall pass through the northern section of the Province of Ontario, having no such data to justify him in arriving at such a determination. This therefore is another point upon which we did not get satisfaction. The fourth request we made of him was that he could grant us what was fair, and not locate the terminus of the subsidized line at Renfrew, where it was alleged the Northern Colonization Company could not with any advantage make its connection, but should locate it at Pembroke ; and at the second meeting held the Minister of Public Works distinctly refused to promise any such thing. If to be refused at every point, Mr. Chairman, if to be denied every act of justice which we demanded, is calculated to give satisfaction, then I say we were satisfied ! The delegation that waited upon the hon. gentleman was composed exclusively of gentlemen from the Province of Quebec. If he says we were satisfied, I suppose he also holds that the Province of Quebec was satisfied. Now, sir, I have in my hands resolutions passed in the Legislature of that Province which were unanimously assented to. What did these resolutions ask? They are the best refutation to what I take to be the opinion of the hon. Minister. They read as follows :—

"Considering that the Province of Quebec will be called to pay a considerable proportion of the amount required to construct the Pacific Railway, and to subsidize a line which will connect its terminus to the railroads now in existence or in course of construction, whilst it seems that no portion of those works will be built on its territory; that, consquently the Province of Quebec might expect that in the localization of the Pacific terminus as well as in the survey of a line connecting this terminus with the railways existing or being constructed, its just rights ought to be acknowledged as long as it will not interfere with the general interests of the Dominion. Considering that, according to the reports of eminent men, upon the nature and configuration of the ground, there would result as much for the branch of the Pacific at the east of the Georgian Bay, as also for the line to be subsidized by the Government, a survey which would follow the Matawan, and which would present the most economical route, and the easiest and most rapid for the transmission of the vast commerce of the West and the Pacific; that it be resolved that the Province of Quebec prays HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL to be pleased to order a careful examination of the ground, and of the divers intended routes before the adoption of any of them has been determined upon; and, that in case the exploration would prove that a route preferable to that of the Matawan exists at the south of the Ottawa River, the line to be subsidized by the Government be brought to Pembroke and not to Renfrew, where a junction with the system of railway of Quebec is impossible, on account of the enormous expenses which it would impose; That the line which is to connect the Pacific with the other railways should be sufficiently under the control of the Federal Government to insure full and equal justice to all the railway companies which would desire to connect themselves with the Pacific." And yet, sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that the Province of Quebec is satisfied with what he offers. You must not suppose that the demands made in the resolutions proceed from selfish motives. They are based on the fact, as stated in the resolutions, that the Province will bear its fair share in the expense of constructing the railway. The members of this House, when the Pacific Railway Act was passed, were actuated by a desire to see this immense enterprise so carried on as to result in the advancement of this whole Dominion, and not of the Province of Ontario or Quebec exclusively. We knew that by acquiring the North-West territory we were bound to throw into it a numerous population similar to ourselves, who would implant in that country our principles and ideas—our love of British institutions. We were all desirous of filling that country up because we knew that in encouraging emigration to it we would be creating a power—creating a nation—whose wealth and prosperity would add to our own, in so far as we were the channel by which the produce of the North-West would come to the seaboard, and we should in turn send to that country the manufactured articles we produced. We were determined upon this course from the very outset. Some parties in Ontario were advocating a different road. The Province of Quebec asked that Matawan should be the terminus. We are entitled to insist upon the terminus being placed there if the only consideration to be taken into account was to obtain the shortest and best route to connect the Pacific coast with the nearest seaports on the Atlantic shore. Mattawan was the proper point to be selected; however, as I have said, some parties in the Province of Ontario requested that the point fixed should be a little further west, and a compromise was come to by which they and the Province of Quebec accepted the south east corner of Lake Nipissing as the proper point for the terminus. We knew that we were conceding to Ontario that which they had no right to expect, but we also understood that in this country we should not be exclusive or selfish, and that although the Province of Ontario had no right to have the change made, for the sake of good feeling between the two Provinces, we yielded—and we yielded gracefully. We did so because we knew that although we were building a certain number of miles of railway exclusively for Ontario, so as to bring the trade towards their great commercial centre, the city of Toronto, we had the means of retaining for ourselves the through traffic of the North-West. We knew that we could tap the railway with a junction at Lake Nipissing. I am in a position to state that that was the policy of one of Canada's greatest statesmen. Sir GEO. CARTIER's policy was to let the terminus be fixed at the south east of Lake Nipissing, but the Province of Quebec could then, by the aid of its local Legislature, continue its Provincial line on the north shore of the Ottawa till it formed a junction with the Pacific Railroad, by Mattawan, north of Lake Nipissing. The opinion of that distinguished statesman was that the trade of the country must not go by the south of Lake Superior to favor the Americans; that the road should be constructed on the north shore of Lake Superior and that Canada should have communication with the North-West through Canadian territory. When that policy was decided upon, it was necessary to induce the Northern Colonization Railroad Company to push on its road on the north shore of the Ottawa, so far as the topography of the country would allow it. The Company understood its mission and determined to do it. The plan which was in the mind of Sir GEO. CARTIER, and the plan which the majority from Quebec then accepted, was completely feasible, and so far feasible that if the Minister of Inland Revenue will only refer to Sir HUGH ALLAN's letter of 9th July, 1872, he will see that he offered, if the contract was granted to him, to build a branch line from Hull, on the north shore of the Ottawa, as far as the topography of the country would allow him, in order to join the Pacific Railway at a point north of Lake Nipissing. This was an acquired right to the Province of Quebec, and in contending for it we were not acting in a sectional spirit. This Dominion can only prosper if all the different Provinces have a fair share in the expenditure which is necessary to conduct the affairs of the country. The Province of Quebec, having an acquired right, now asks how it is that by a change in the policy of this Government we are never to have a through traffic from our great North-West through the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I wonder if Montreal is in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MASSON—I ask the hon. member for Chateauguay if the Province of Quebec is in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—There are a good many more of the inhabitants of Quebec Province in Montreal than in Terrebonne.

Mr. MASSON—The position I am taking is one that will be taken not by Terrebonne alone, but by all the constituencies on the north shore, and perhaps by the county represented by the hon. member himself. The whole Province of Quebec, through the Local Legislature, has entered its solemn protest against the policy of the Government, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman does not join hands with me instead of opposing the interests of his Province.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There is nothing like strong language.

Mr. MASSON—I merely state the fact. Has not the Government received a petition from the Local Legislature?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We have received none.

Mr. MASSON—Does not the hon. gentlemen know that there is such a petition.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I do not.

Mr. MASSON—I am sorry the hon. gentleman does not follow public events better. Since we have been deprived of what we are entitled to, I ask now whether we should not insist on having the crumbs that fall from the Government table. The hon. Minister of Public Works says the route by the Mattawan is some twenty miles longer than the route adopted. The hon. gentleman has probably looked at the map and measuring with a compass the comparative distance, has decided that the Ottawa route is so much longer. He has no survey. We have the report of an eminent engineer, who after making a minute survey and inquiry on the subject states that on account of the difference in the height of land, the Quebec route is practically twenty miles shorter than than the line adopted by the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is better to nail such statements at the moment.

Mr. LEGGE admits that he never saw the country the line runs through, and knew no report of any engineer and these statements are based on the elevations of Sir WILLIAM LOGAN. They show gross ignorance of the whole matter. Why Mr. LEGGE himself admitted in the room when the delegation called on me, that the route we have adopted is 13 miles shorter than the Northern Colonization route. It is true he claimed that the latter line had less elevation, but I challenged him at the time to prove his assertion.

Mr. MASSON—The hon. gentleman knows no more on the subject than Mr. LEGGE does. Mr. LEGGE quoted the statements ofengineers of the highest standing, engineers whose ability no one will dispute.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Who are they ?

Mr. MASSON—Mr. SHANLY and Sir WILLIAM LOGAN.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — Mr. SHANLY was never there.

Mr. MASSON—Was Sir WILLIAM LOGAN there ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—He never surveyed it to ascertain the elevation. We have the report of our own engineer, who says it furnishes the easiest grades.

Mr. MASSON—The hon. gentleman accepts the report of an engineer who was caught in the smoke, and did not go within several miles of some parts of the route, and besides, made only a cursory exploration of it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—If the hon. gentleman wishes to malign the engineer, and state what is not true, I must defend the officer of my Department.

Mr. MASSON—I will endeavor to be as guarded in my language as the hon. gentleman is violent. It is asserted that the line by the Mattawan is shorter, and there is no doubt it would cost less to construct it. The line is located to Mattawan and ready to be built and Mr. LEGGE says it can be built for $30,000 per mile and $1,000,000 could be made on the contract to French River. He says that the line from Pembroke or Renfrew cannot be built for less than $40,000. I ask any hon. gentleman who has seen the contract laid upon the table, if it is not proposed to pay in land and money at least $50,000 per mile for the construction of this road. So much for this part of the Government policy. Now I wish to draw the attention of the House to the statement that the Premier has made that the sum of $1,500,000 or $2,000,000 is to be spent in British Columbia for the purpose of building a Pacific Railway. That may be all very well for the people of British Columbia, but the taxpayers of the Eastern Provinces, though they are quite willing to construct the road from ocean to ocean, as soon as possible, do not care to see so much money expended on Vancouver's Island and for the purpose of enabling the people of the Pacific coast merely to climb to the top of the Rocky Mountains. It will be of no advantage to the Dominion, and not even to British Columbia itself, unless there is provided at the same time communication across the plains to the eastern side of the continent. We, from Quebec, were of the opinion when we voted that famous Pacific Railway Bill —and I do not regret that we did so, unless the action of this Government should give us reason to regret it—that by giving a great many advantages to Ontario by building some four or five hundred miles in that Province, we were at the same time opening a channel for the trade of the North-West to flow through the Province of Quebec. We did not for a single moment begrudge the advantages that Ontario gained by that, and I do not now. We knew that the construction of that railway would conduce greatly to the wealth and prosperity of the northern part of Ontario, and we did not object to that for a moment, but I think I may safely say that the members from Quebec would not have voted for the Pacific Railway Bill if they had thought that the plan which was so opposed by Sir GEORGE CARTIER and which was almost the cause of the fall of this Government, would have become the policy of the present Administration.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I regret that the hon. gentleman should have occupied the time of the committee for an hour to make a purely sectional appeal. It is the height of audacity for my hon. friend to rise in his place in this House and assume to speak for the whole Province of Quebec. What right has he to speak for the Province of Quebec ? In what division has he had a majority, or even a respectable minority of the representatives of Quebec at his back? He is in a position to speak for Terrebonne and the people to the north of Montreal, no doubt, but for him to assume to speak for the people of the Province of Quebec is, I repeat it, the height of audacity.

Mr. MASSON—Is that Parliamentary?

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—I think it is Parliamentary. The Province of Quebec has a direct interest in having the best route adopted from tide water at Montreal to, in the first instance, the navigable waters of Georgian Bay, and the strongest defence from a Quebec point of view of the Government policy, is that this line will be the shortest between Montreal and Georgian Bay, and pass over the best grades and through the best country between those two points. Now, sir, I ask hon. members of this House whether the Province of Quebec is in a position to insist that this line of railway shall run on one side or other of the Ottawa River—because one side of the river to the north-west here is in the Province of Quebec, and the other side in the Province of Ontario—against the interests of the whole Dominion, including the Province of Quebec. I ask, sir, whether the hon. member for Terrebonne has any right in the name of the Province of Quebec to assert that this road must, conte que conte, be built on the Quebec side of the river. That is all his proposition amounts to when subjected to analysis. As to the connection with the North Shore or Northern Colonization Road; they will connect here. If it is a better route on the north shore of the river from Ottawa to Montreal than the proposed line on the south shore, connecting with the Grand Trunk at Veandreul or Coteau Landing, the Northern Colonization Road will obtain the traffic; it is purely a question of the comparative cost of conveying passengers and freight over those two lines. But the great advantage the metropolitan port of Montreal will possess will be this:—that it will be made the terminus at tide water of a grand arterial line of railways running by the shortest route and with the easiest grades to the navigable waters of Georgian Bay. That is the great merit of the scheme of the hon. Minister of Public Works. Sir, I do not charge the hon. member for Terrebonne with improperly assuming to speak in the name of all the people of the Province of Quebec without reason. I had occasion very recently in two of the divisions of the City of Montreal to fight electoral contests on this ground. I said, almost in the very words I am now using, that the advantage of the policy of the Government lay in proceeding with this portion of the Pacific Railway so that at all events, whether the Pacific Railway itself were to be constructed in the near or in the far future, we in Montreal, we in the Province of Quebec, will secure at the earliest possible moment the benefit of a great arterial inland line of railway from tide water to the upper lakes. And I would like to ask the hon. member for Terrebonne, and every hon. member from the Province of Quebec, whether that is not an object that we as Provincials—if we are to deal with the qustion as Provincials, though I would not approve that or any other question being carried from a Provincial stand-point—may seek to secure, and by securing it confer the greatest possible advantage upon the people of our country and upon our Province.

Mr. MASSON—What was the result of your speech at the election for Montreal West.

Hon Mr. HOLTON—What the result was there, the hon. gentleman knows full well—a victory for the Government. There were elements in that contest which I will not impart into this debate which the hon. gentleman understood perfectly well. But Montreal Centre which one year ago returned a follower of the hon. knight for Kingston by an overwhelming majority of some four hundred votes returned a supporter of the present Government and of its railway policy by a very considerable majority as the result of the discussions that we had on this subject. But the hon. member for Terrebonne has referred to resolutions passed by the moribund Legislature of Quebec, the members of which have not seen their constituents for four years. The hon. member has quoted the opinions of that moribund body against the opinions of hon. members elected by the constituencies of the Province of Quebec to deal specifically with this subject, and all of whom came from their constituents only twelve months ago. I say that the resolutions of the moribund Legislature of Quebec are not worth the paper on which they are printed, and they are not entitled to the slightest possible consideration at our hands.

Mr. MASSON—Although unanimous.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—That the next Legislature of Quebec would be entitled to express an opinion on the railway policy, as representing the opinion of the people,—if it should step out of its own Province to give that opinion—because it is outside of its Province, I freely admit. But, Sir, what were the circumstances under which those resolutions were passed? The hon. gentleman did not tell us anything about that. He spoke of the unanimity that prevailed there; but that unanimity was only apparent, not real. The honorable gentleman knew that full well. If he tells us that the representatives of the southern counties, the counties that returned to this House the hon. members for Bagot, Chateauguay, Lepraire and others, and which were not directly interested, but interested only in having the best possible line selected, voted for that which has been demonstrated to be the more advantageous of the two schemes, did so from conviction—then I say the hon. gentleman makes good my position that the resolutions of the Quebec Legislature possess no value whatever under the circumstances in which they were passed. But I do protest, and I rise only for the purpose of protesting, against the sectionalism which it is sought to introduce into this discussion, and to protest against the hon. member for Terrebonne assuming to speak on behalf of the people of the Province of Quebec. He has no such right; he has achieved no such position in the House, or in the country, or in his own Province, respectable as his position is, that would entitle him to speak in the name of his Province on this or any other question.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION and Mr. McKAY WRIGHT rose together, and the latter gave way.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said:—Sir, I insist on speaking now because the hon. member for Terrebonne has been pleased to make several references to the opinions held by the people of the Province of Quebec; I intend to answer only that portion of his remarks, leaving the hon. Minister of Public Works to deal with the main questions, viz., the selection of the route and the policy of the Government on that subject. The hon. member for Terrebonne assumed that the whole Province of Quebec has adopted a policy which is against that advocated by the Government of the day, and urges that the Government have not consulted the wishes of the people. Sir, I know what have been the opinions held during the last three or four years by the public press, and I shall quote, with the permission of the House, some articles from the leading organs of the Opposition press on the question of the Northern Colonization Railway, &c. I find in La Minerve, a French paper published in Montreal, which is an authority on railway matters, this article. After saying that the means of communication between Montreal and Ontario were insufficient La Minerve says, in French, as follows:—

"C'est là une des raisons et peut-être la principale raison pour laquelle nous avons toujours vu favorablement le projet du chemin de Colonization du Nord, qui sera sans doute dans une partie de son parcours un vrai chemin de colonization..... A Ottawa cette compagnie correspondra avec le chemin du Canada Central qui s'étendra l'été prochain jusqu'à Sand Point, et Montréal aura ainsi une ligne ferrée non interrompue de 216 milles de longueur dans la direction de l'Ouest. C'est une des considérations que les directeurs du chemin de colonisation font valoir dans la communication qu'ils ont adressée au Conseil de Ville, et qui y a été présentée Mercredi soir..... L'horizon que déroulent devant nous ces quelques phrases est immense, et cependant elles ne contiennent rien qui ne soit possible et même facilement réalisable, si Montréal comprend bien ses intérêts et si ses citoyens veulent sincèrement s'unir pour assurer ces magnifiques résultats. Montréal terminus du chemin de fer du Pacifique, Montréal marché et entrepôt du commerce de l'Ouest, et ajoutant ces deux titres à ses conditions actuelles de succès et de prospérité, voilà ce que nous révèle en quelques mots la lettre des directeurs du chemin de Colonisation. Le premier pas à faire pour réaliser ces projets, c'est la construction du chemin de Colonisation du Nord, et il nous semble qu'il n'y a plus de raison pour retarder d'avantage l'exécution de cettre entreprise."

Mr. MASSON—When was that article written?

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—In 1872.

Mr. MASSON—What date?

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—On 26th January.

Mr. MASSON—Before the Pacific Railway policy was decided upon?

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—It was when the city of Montreal was asked to vote one million of dollars in favor of the Northern Colonization Railway, and the argument adduced by the press of that city was that the grant would place Montreal in connection with Ottawa and with western points by means of the Canada Central Line. La Minerve, on 30th Jan., 1872, says:—

"Cette voie ferrée (le Chemin de Colonisation) n'est que le commencement d'une grande route internationale qui mettra Montréal en correspondance non-interrompue avec le Lac Nipissing, le Sault Ste. Marie et celui du Pacifique Occidental à Duluth..... Rien ne détruira le réseau des chemins de fer dont Montréal est actuellement le centre ; et ce ne sont ni les articles du Globe ni la jalousie des habitants de Toronto qui empêcheront une voie ferrée du Pacifique, par Duluth, Sault Ste. Marie, Nipissing, Ottawa et Montréal d'être presque aussi droite qu'une ligne à vol d'oiseau, et de former avec l'Angleterre le chemin le plus court que tout autre, par au moins 400 ou 500 milles."

Whatever charges may have taken place in the electorate of the Canada Central Company, the road as a road has not changed; the directors or stockholders may have changed, but that cannot affect the Government or Parliament of Canada in dealing with it. The hon. member for Terrebonne, speaking at a dinner given at St. Jerome in his county on 17th February, 1872, is represented to have said :—

"La Législature Fédérale a eu peu à faire en ce qui regarde l'entreprise actuelle du Chemin du Nord. Mais elle a donné la vie aux deux compagnies du Canada Central et du Chemin de Colonisation du Nord, en passant l'acte qui a assuré leur amalgation. Il était dans l'intérêt du pays que les deux compagnies se réunissent, etc."

Mr. MASSON—Will you translate that?

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION read a translation of the quotation.

Mr. MASSON—I know the hon. gentleman does not wish to be unfair towards me. He would, however, have acted more wisely had he, before reading the quotation, have asked me if the report was correct. That report cannot be correct, for among other things, it makes me say that the Northern Colonization and Canada Central Company amalgamated, and it is well known they never amalgamated.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—They had power to amalgamate.

Mr. MASSON—I never made the statements contained in the report.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—On 17th February, of the same year, La Minerve contained speeches delivered by Mr. MASSON, Mr. CHAPLEAU, and Sir HUGH ALLAN at that dinner given at St. Jean. Sir HUGH ALLAN, who was desirous of carrying the election of Sir GEORGE CARTIER, said in addressing the electors of Montreal East on 9th August 1872 :—

"Le terminus sera à ou auprès du Lac Nipissingue, et des négotiations sont entamées dans le but de construire un embranchement de là jusqu'à Hull, d'où il se soudera au chemin de fer de Colonisation du Nord, faisant ainsi de la partie Est de Montréal le terminus virtuel du chemin de fer du Pacifique. Votre représentant Sir GEO. E. CARTIER s'accorde avec nous sur tous ces points, etc."

That was on the election day when Sir HUGH ALLAN publicly appeared in favor of Sir GEORGE CARTIER, and told the people of Montreal that Sir GEORGE had decided in favor of the Northern Colonization Railway. The Montreal Gazette, in its issue of the 17th February, 1872, reports Sir GEORGE CARTIER to have spoken as follows :—

"Since, he had taken the pains to inform himself thoroughly on the whole question, and he had come to the conclusion that without the Northern Colonization Railway, connecting with the Canada Central, and by it with the Canada Pacific at Lake Nipissing, a road to the Pacific would be an injury to Montreal rather than otherwise."

It will perhaps have been noticed that as soon as it was rumoured that the subsidy was to be given to the Canada Central Railway Company the Montreal Gazette charged the Government with betraying the interests of the Province of Quebec in that matter, but what did that paper state on the same day that Sir HUGH ALLAN's speech appeared? Let me read the following extract from its editorial columns of that day :

"We take it that after this evidence on the part of so many shrewd business men of their anxiety to secure, alike for the interest of Montreal, and as an investment for their own surplus capital, railway connection with St. Jerome, there can be no hesitation on the part of the council in submitting to the rate-payers the million dollar by-law to secure the construction of the Northern Colonization Railroad to Ottawa, there connecting with the Canada Central, and ultimately with the Canada as well as with the Northern Pacific Railways."

Such was the opinion of the Montreal Gazette of that date. But there is another paper published at Montreal, called the Nouveau Monde which is said to be the organ of the hon. member for Hochelaga ; and it is well-known that it reflects the opinions of certain other individuals in the Province of Quebec. That paper says in its issue of the 12th February 1872 :—

"Nous prions ceux qui veulent rester sérieux et désirent sincèrement le chemin de fer d'Ottawa et du Pacifique, de bien remarquer que la nouvelle compagnie (celle de STARNES, BRYDGES, &c.,) se montre vraiment si libérale en promesses que leur excès même le trahit. Tout faire ainsi pour nous et tout faire à ses propres frais ne peut être en effet qu'une puérile intrigue montée dans l'occasion pour faire manqaer le vote du million de Montréal et avec lui toute l'entreprise du Grand Central d'Ottawa..... Si c'est en isolant Montréal d'Ottawa et du Pacifique par deux ou trois petits chemins de traverse que le Grand Tronc croit se rendre populaire, nous l'avertissons qu'il se trompe."

The same paper on the 16th February, 1872, gives the following report of the speech of my hon. friend for Terrebonne, delivered at a banquet given at St. Jerome. The hon. gentleman is reported in that paper to have spoken as follows :—

"Que le Parlement Fédéral avait eu peu à faire dans cette question, et que cependant ce peu était beaucoup. Il a passé l'acte amalgamant l'entreprise du chemin de Colonisation avec celle du Canada Central, malgré l'opposition obstinée des ministres locaux d'Ontario. L'hon. M. ARBOTT peut témoigner des efforts qu'il fit alors en faveur de l'entreprise qui intéresse si fort tout le Nord en général et St. Jérôme en particulier."

The same paper also reports Sir HUGH ALLAN to have said on that occasion :—

"Qu'il a offert au Gouvernement de construire le chemin projeté depuis le Pacifique jusqu'au Lac Nipissing, et il n'a pas de doute qu'il sera bientôt terminé. A cette époque, Montréal sera certainment rattaché au Lac Nipissing par le chemin de Colonisasion et celui du Canada Central .....C'est alors que le Canada retirera tous les avantages de sa position, etc."

The Hon. Mr. OUIMET, who was then Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec, was also present and spoken.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON—Why did he cease to be Premier of the Ministry?

Hon. Mr. GEOTFRION—It is better to confine myself to the question before the House. The report of Mr. OUIMET'S speech in the Nouveau Monde is precisely similar to that contained in the Minerve, which I have already alluded to. Mr. LEGGE, the engineer of the Northern Colonization Railway is reported by the same paper to have said :—

"Des négociations se poursuivaient en ce temps avec la Compagnie du Canada Central pour former une jonction à Hawkesbury, mais le Gouvernement d'Ontario ayant refusé d'octroyer les 12,000 âcres de terre par mille sur lesquels la Compagnie du Canada Central comptait, le projet échoua. La politique éclairée du Gouvernement de Québec qui permettait de continuer le chemin de colonisation jusqu'à Ottawa permit aux compagnies de s'entendre et d'opérer leur jonction dans cette ville. Ainsi Montréal sera mis en rapport avec la vallée de l'Ottawa, le lac Huron, et finalement relié au chemin du Northern Pacific."

Mr. MASSON—You are resting your case upon the faults of your predecessors.

Hon. Mr. GEQFFRION—No! I am showing that those who complain of the course which the Government have taken are acting directly at variance with the line of policy which they previously contended was the proper line to pursue. The same paper from which I have been quoting in an aaticle on the subject says :—

"Un chemin à lisses de bois de Montréal à St. Jérôme était toute leur ambition (aux promoteurs du chemin), mais le projet s'est graduellement developpé jusqu'à la hauteur d'une ligne de voie ferrée de Montréal à Ottawa, pour se relier au Canada Central et à la route projetée du Pacifique."

Later on the same paper referring to the proposition of matter company says :—

" Ils ne demandent que $500,000, mais ils ne veulent pas construire une grande partie des travaux requis pour amener le commerce à Montréal et assurer le bon fonctionnement de la ligne. Ainsi, ils ne s'engagent pas à construire un pont sur l'Outaouais, à Hull, pour mettre le chemin de colonisation en connexion directe avec le Canada Central....."

Let me refer now to another paper published in Montreal, L'Opinion Publique. In that paper the custom is for the writers of articles to sign their names to them, and I find in its issue of the 22nd February, 1872, an article signed "J. A. MOUSSEAU." I do not know whether that name represents the same person as the hon. member for Bagot, but I have reason to believe that it is. After quoting the speeches of Sir HUGH ALLAN, Mr. MASSON, and other distinguished members of that party the articles goes on to say :—

" Cependant ils refusent les offres brillantes de M. BRYDGES ! Pourquoi ? Parcequ'ils voient clairement que ces offres cachent un piége et que le résultat des efforts tentés par la nouvelle companie, si elle réussissait, serait de tuer le Canada Central, d'enlever au Nord de l'Ottawa, au Bas-Canada, les immenses avantages qu'ils retireront du chemin. &c."

Such are the opinions of the leading men and of the press of the Conservative party of the Province of Quebec. There is another way of ascertaining the opinions of the Province of Quebec, at least so far as the city of Montreal is concerned. That city voted a million dollars towards the Northern Colonization railway, but so great was the desire that it should connect with the Canada Central, that it was stipulated in the by-laws that $50,000 should be reserved for bridging the Ottawa river, and making the connection between the two lines. If it would not take too much time, I could refer to numerous articles in the press of Montreal, and to speeches of leading men in that city, favoring the extension of the Northern Colonization Railway to Ottawa, and then bridging the Ottawa River and connecting with the Canada Central. What reason had the hon. gentlemen opposite given for their present change of opinion ? None whatever. Now, either the course they advocated then was right or it was wrong. If it was right then, it was right now. When I see this sudden change not alone in the conduct pursued, but in the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I am led almost to the conclusion that that press was not very greatly slandered when it was insisted that it was under the control of Sir HUGH ALLAN ; because so long as Sir HUGH ALLAN had a controlling voice in the Canada Central Railway they were loud in their advocacy of making it one of the links of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I contend that in the interests of the whole Dominion—the Province of Quebec included — the course pursued by the Government is the only course that could be pursued, and it is the course which was advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by their press as I have abundantly shown—I have no intention at this late hour to go into the merits of the proposal of the Government, more especially as it has been very fully and thoroughly explained by the First Minister, but I thought it was my duty to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary change of tone on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs.

Mr. MASSON—From the tone and temper of the speech of the hon. gentleman it is evident that this question has become a personal one. I therefore, claim the indulgence of the committee for a few moments in order to make some explanations. When the Bill for the Pacific Railway was brought before the House an opinion prevailed that the Northern Colonization Railway should continue the arrangements into which they had entered before there was any question of a Pacific Railway. Sir GEORGE CARTIER was then most strenuously opposed to the Northern Colonization Railway being connected with the Canada Central in view of the fact that the Pacific Railway was to be built and that its terminus was to be placed at or near Lake Nipissing. Sir GEORGE came to me and asked me whether it would be advantageous to form another company to go by the North Shore for the purpose of forcing the Northern Colonization Company to bring their road by the north shore to Ottawa. He pressed me to become a director of that railway because certain parties who were opposing the North Shore route favored the Canada Central, and desired that the Canada Pacific should go south of Lake Nipissing. Thereupon I immediately saw the Rev. Mr. LABELLE who was in Ottawa at the time, and who was completely in accord with myself on this subject. I am authorized by him to read a telegram which he sent to Sir HUGH ALLAN, showing that when it was known there was to be a Pacific Railway the position we took was that Sir GEORGE CARTIER's plan must be carried out, and that the Northern Colonization Railway must pass along the north shore of the Ottawa. That was in the session of 1872.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—It was not during the elections of 1872.

Mr. MASSON—I am not responsible for what Sir HUGH ALLAN said to the electors during the electoral campaign of 1872. I wish only to defend my own position. As I have already said, I saw Mr. LABELLE, and he said that the road must pass on the north shore of the Ottawa. Accordingly he sent the following telegram to Sir HUGH ALLAN in which I cordially concur :—

"Charter asked for railway from Ottawa to junction with Pacific Railway by North Shore of Ottawa ; if it meets your approval would you join."

Sir HUGH ALLAN immediately answered :—

"I am in favor of the shortest line from Ottawa to the east terminus of the Pacific road. If that goes north of the Ottawa, I would favor such line, but my opinion was that it should cross the Ottawa at Portage du Fort."

Not satisfied with that Mr. LABELLE again telegraphed to Sir HUGH as follows:—

"Received telegram—CARTIER would seem to favor a line wholly by North Shore of Ottawa, to junction with Pacific Railway. Would you like one or two of our friends being on the Board of Direction of the new company."

That was the line of conduct we proceeded on in dealing with this question. As soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway was decided upon, Sir GEORGE CARTIER—a friend of Lower Canada if there ever was one—though he has been much slandered, told me distinctly that some parties wished to bring the Canadian Pacific Railway south of Lake Nipissing in order to satisfy the wishes of some Americans ; but he said it must not be done and that the road must go north of the Ottawa. When that stand was taken, the Northern Colonization Railway Company decided to ask powers to go north of the Ottawa ; and Sir HUGH ALLAN being pressed by Father LABELLE and myself and some others, offered to build a railway from Hull, opposite Ottawa, along the north shore of the Ottawa, as far as the topography of the country would allow it, as to form a junction with the Pacific Railway north of Lake Nipissing. That is the reason why I complained that the old plan of the Government had not been decided upon, because while the Province of Ontario would have benefited by that large stretch of railway through its territory, the Province of Quebec would have received the great trade of the North-West, or, at least, would have received a fair share of it, Now, Sir, I leave it to any gentleman, in this House, to say whether my conduct has been that of an enemy to the Province of Quebec and the whole Dominion or not, and whether it has not been the conduct of an honest man.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac)—Mr. CHAIRMAN :—I gave way a little ago to the Minister of Inland Revenue, being very anxious to hear what he had to say upon this extremly important subject. And what did he have to say? Nothing, sir, but the old tu quoque argument. Ever since the fatal day when the late Government went down, in the face of an adverse majority, we have always had our utterances, when upon the other side of the House, quoted to us. I hope there will be an end of that style of argument, and that a policy will be inaugurated from the Treasury benches which will not need for its defence the misdeeds of the gentlemen who lately occupied them. I suppose there is no county in the Province of Quebec which has a deeper interest in the decision of the route of the Pacific Railway than has the county I have the honor to represent. I can say with truth, I think, even in contradiction to an established authority in this House—the hon. member for Chauteauguay—that the public feeling of the Province of Quebec is largely and strongly in favor of the junction being made with the Northern Colonization Railway, provided it be a better line, all things considered, than any proposed. The Northern Colonization Railway is very near to the heart of every inhabitant of the Province of Quebec—of every one who desires to redeem her name and fame, and to remove from her the stigma of want of energy and enterprise in the prosecution of public works and the development of her natural resources. I believe that in this respect the people of the Province of Quebec are thoroughly in earnest and that they wish well to the Northern Colonization Railway. A short time ago it represented but 25 miles of railway, extending from Montreal to the village of St. Jerome; now it aspires to form a connecting link between the Pacific Ocean on the west and the tide-water on the east, and to assist in carrying the products of the North-West to the markets of the East and of Europe—products of which the First Minister spoke so eloquently. I do not propose to discuss this question at any great length, for which I have no doubt the committee will be thankful; but I propose to show very briefly some good reasons why, in my opinion, the Georgian Bay Branch should be constructed from the mouth of the French River to the Mattawan, and I believe it is capable of demonstration that the line by the north shore is the shorter and the better. Perhaps I may be allowed to refer to the question of this being our national route. The Province of Quebec has endeavored to do all in its power to put the Northern Colonization Railway upon a fair basis by the assistance of municipalities and of the Provincial Government. There came a time when the Dominion Government had to step in and do something for that road. I do not think there is any desire on the part of the Dominion Government of the present day to destroy the enterprise which has taken so deep and serious a hold upon the hearts and interests of the people of Quebec. I believe they have acted as fairly as as they could, without undue favoritism. It appears to me, however, that they propose to assist us in our laudable work by handing over to the Canada Central Railway the whole of the national line of the Province of Quebec; and they propose to destroy the trade of our great commercial centre. Just take the position of affairs as they stand to-day: You have from the city of Ottawa four lines of railway, either constructed or projected. You have the Canada Central, the Northern Colonization, the Coteau Landing, and the St. Lawrence and Ottawa, and by the proposal of the Government you hand over the control of them all to a private company. I see in the scheme a proposition to give running powers over the subsidized portion of the Canada Central to all connecting companies, but the subsidized portion only extends to the village of Douglas, and the fact that a considerable portion of the road, from Douglas to Ottawa, is built by private enterprise, over which running powers cannot be given, would make the concession of those powers over the subsidized portion of no practical value. It has been demonstrated by the reports of engineers that it is impossible to connect the Northern Colonization Railway with the Georgian Bay branch line, except at some point beyond Pembroke. They wish us to join the Canada Central at Ottawa. We, as representing the interests of the Northern Colonization Railway, assert that it is impossible to make a connection at any point short of Pembroke, unless we do it at the city of Ottawa, and that would practically give the control of the Northern Colonization into the hands of the Canada Central. For, although the Government undertake to give us running powers over the subsidized portions of this road, they cannot interfere with the seventy miles intervening, which have been built by private enterprise. I was rather pleased to hear the First Minister say that it was not altogether decided that the village of Douglas should be the exact terminus, but unfortunately any point likely to be fixed upon will certainly be so near it that our position will in no way be changed. To join the Canada Central at Ottawa is much less than we aspired to do; we were aiming at larger things. However, we must accept the inevitable, and do the best we can. I agree thoroughly with the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland with regard to the general question of the Pacific Railway. The Georgian Bay portion is not the Pacific Railway proper, but merely a branch of it. Were it the Pacific Railway proper, it would have to be considered from an entirely different point of view. Speaking in the interest of my constituents, who are deeply concerned in the prosecution of this work, I would echo the appeal addressed to the First Minister by the hon. member for Cumberland, and earnestly ask him, if this matter has not been inevitably and finally decided, that he should re-consider it, or at any rate not decide until an instrumental examination has been made, upon which it is possible to determine the merits of the rival routes, which are now competing for a share of the traffic which will pass over this route.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—Mr. Chairman, —There is no doubt that there was at one time in Montreal a party who thought they were the whole of the Province of Quebec—a party who desired to ignore the lower sections of the Province, and rule them out from having any voice or share in the matter. Neither is there any doubt that the party referred to were at one time in favor of the Central Road being made the connecting link with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Everything goes to prove that this was the fact. It is also true that they have changed their front. Now they quote Sir GEORGE CARTIER'S opinion upon the subject, but these opinions are private matters, and were never publicly expressed. This change of front took place when Sir HUGH ALLAN and Mr. FOSTER quarrelled. Sir HUGH ALLAN and Mr. ABBOTT were both directors of the Canada Central as well as of the Northern Colonization, when that quarrel took place, and it appears that so far as the former road was concerned, Mr. FOSTER was more powerful than Sir HUGH ALLAN. We know the reason of the quarrel, and it is needless to bring it before the House, for we have nothing to do with it. These are matters of history. What I desire is that we should have the most direct line from one end of the road to the other, and upon that principle alone should the choice be made. I have had some conversation with gentlemen who have had a good deal to do with the matter, and they have unanimously insisted that the shortest route to Montreal and Quebec—the route which at the same time would be in the interest of the whole Dominion—was through Portage du Fort, and that the end of the subsidized line should be some ten miles west of that point. This would place all connecting companies upon the same footing, the most direct line, of course, having the advantage. No one can look at the map without it strikes him that this would be the sensible arrangement, and Douglas is much too far from Portage du Fort to permit of all connecting lines competing under equal terms. If that is the case, I think Portage du Fort is the best crossing place. Lower Canada has voted a large amount of money for the construction of a line on the north shore, and we want no injustice. I want all the companies to be placed on the same footing at their junction with the line subsidized by the Government. To that point every line should be allowed to come on equal terms, so that cars from Montreal and Quebec shall pass over it on the same terms and conditions as those of the Canada Central.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—That is the position in which they will be placed.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—Well, in that case I am satisfied. What we have to consider is whether the interests of Lower Canada are served by this policy. I think they are, and that it gives fair competition to all the lines of railroad. Looking at the map, I believe that a point seven or ten lines this side of Pembroke is the proper point for the terminus.

Mr. BUNSTER — We have heard enough about Ontario and Quebec ; I now want to say something about British Columbia. I have referred on former occasions in the House to the beauty and salubrity of our climate. The House will bear with me if I return to the subject again for a moment, for I look upon it as being one of the chief attractions presented by our rising and thriving Province. I am quite safe in asserting that our climate is unequalled, not only in the Dominion of Canada, but on the whole continent of America, and we have only been waiting for the Government to commence and build the Canadian Pacific Railway, when it will give such an increase to our population that the country will fast be settled up ; our new fertile lands will be utilized, and many happy homes will be made. Where the buffalo, the elk, the deer, and the grizzly are now the sole occupants, cities and towns will take their place and hotels will be opened, enlarged and improved—although I am bound to say that even at present they afford as good accommodation as those I have met with in Ottawa. We have only to gain a few advantages of that nature in order to entice a large portion of the floating holiday-making, pleasure-enjoying population of the United States to come to our Province and make it their summer resort. I referred, also, to our natural resources, and as they affect very largely the question of whether the road would be a paying concern or otherwise, I ought not to pass from them without a word or two of comment. Hon. members of this House have raised the cry that the Canadian Pacific Railway is going to be an enormous expense to the country. I say, and I make bold to assert, that the hon. gentlemen who have treated us to dissertations upon the increase it will cause to the country and the taxation of the people, have been reckoning without their host. You have not the slightest idea of the magnitude of the resources which this road will be the means of developing. Had it no other advantage it has this very great one, that by giving a much shorter and quicker route across the continent than any existing or projected line, or any other possible route, it secures for us the entire control of the coming traffic between Europe and the great south-eastern portion of the continent of Asia. The harbor of Esquimault happens to be at the very spot where vessels leaving San Francisco for India and China have to approach in order to catch the trade winds. This is a point in our favor which it is impossible to over-estimate, considering the extent and importance of the Asiatic trade, and considering the advantage of a much shorter route across the continent, which would be presented to those who now send their goods by San Francisco. That man is neither a good statesman, nor a true patriot, who does not look forward with hope to the future of our national railroad and our great West. Why, Sir, it was but the other year that it was prophesied that the American Pacific Slope would never be practically peopled. What are the facts? It has not only a population of hundreds of thousands, but is drawing within its bosom the great emigration from Europe in a proportion more than twice as great as any other country in the world. Twenty-eight years ago, when W. B. OGDEN proposed to build a railroad from Chicago to the Pacific Ocean, he was laughed at as a hair-brained lunatic, and yet all the world knows that at the present time Chicago and the Pacific are in direct communication, and yet hon. gentlemen in this House call themselves statesmen, and croak about the impossibility of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. I tell this honorable House that they must and will build the road, and they both must and will build it soon too. There is no use talking about spending a million or two millions on it every year; no such sum expended would be consonant with the greatness of the enterprise, or the magnitude of the results which would be brought about by its completion. You speak of encouraging immigration into this country, and you spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in trying to induce the surplus population of Europe to come to our shores. That is all very well it its way, but I tell this House that the true way to encourage immigration is at once to commence, and prosecute with vigor the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. How is it that we, with our millions of acres of land lying idle and waiting for the hand of the husbandman to cultivate, have but four millions of people, while the great Republic to the south of us numbers at least forty millions. Why, sir, such a thing could never be but for mismanagement and want of enterprise. Is our land less productive? Has nature bestowed upon us a less healthy or more undersirable climate? Are our agricultural, manufacturing, or lumbering resources more limited? Will any patriotic or truth-loving Canadian say they are? On the contrary, I hold that in all respects we have advantages in excess of those of the United States, and yet how small and slow is our progress as compared to theirs, I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that to a very great extent, at any rate, their extraordinary success is due to their excellent railway system. They are not afraid to build a railway, whether they think it will pay or not, provided they are satisfied it will open up their country, develop its resources, and draw to its shores a large share of the immigration which yearly flows from Great Britain and other European countries. Their statesmen see in the building of a railway a tendency to bind the people of one state more closely to the people of another and thus it becomes a national spirit. Such will be the effect in the Provinces of the Dominion. They see in a railway that which, if it does not directly pay, is a source of benefit to the common wealth, inasmuch as it encourages agriculture, gives an impetus to local manufactures, and produces increased trade at the Custom House. If hon. gentlemen who are so cautious and prudent, who think that the building of this road will ruin the country, will give only, like liberal statesment, look at what the results are under similar circumstances at their very doors, they cannot fail to be convinced that the very opposite will be the effect, that it will build up the country, create states where there are now but deserts, give birth to a teeming population on praries whose sole inhabitants are the buffalo, the antelope and the grizzly, and all for the paltry sum of a few million dollars. Sir, it would be a foolish thing for the people of Canada were they so far to neglect their own interest as to throw cold water upon this great project, as the hon. member for South Bruce has tried to do in his speech, which I am happy to hear, did not meet with the approval of the people of Ontario. It certainly did receive and justly so, too, the severest condemation from the people of the outlying Provinces of the Dominion. It would be difficult to understand why the merchants of this country refuse to take the Chinese and East India trade into their own hands, or why they should persist in procuring their own goods through foreign sources, and relying for their supplies upon the continuance of amicable relations with the United States, when such a splendid opportunity is offered for them to have not only their own trade in their own hands, but of commanding and controlling the whole Asiatic import and export business. There has been a great deal said about the road becoming a burden upon the country. I deny that it ever will be a burden to the country, for the very moment it is open for traffic it will give an impetus to every branch of trade in this country such as no one has yet the most remote conception of. You will probably be able to induce the 500,000 Canadians that are now in the United States to return to their native soil; and they, in themselves, could and would have built the Canadian Pacific Railway. This indeed would be something for the statesmen of the day to feel proud of, and if they will only show themselves equal to the work of inducing their countrymen to return to Canada, they will be well rewarded for their enterprise and patriotism. You will have an unprecedented influx of settlers. You will have trade to the Custom House, and trade at the Land Office; and whatever extra demand may be made upon the Public Exchequer in order to pay interest upon the loans required, for the building of the road will in this way be repaid more than double. But suppose it was not doubled; that it was simply repaid, surely any statesman, any true patriot who has the good and future prosperity of his country deeply at heart, would not hesitate for a moment to undertake the work and its accompanying expenditures, if only it makes our Dominion great, powerful and prosperous. But it is asked, "Where are we going to get the requisite amount of money?" and some gentlemen do not hesitate to say that we cannot get it all. Sir, there never was a greater mistake made by any set of public men than to suppose the money will not be forthcoming, and plenty of it too, if we only go after it in earnest. Money is always to be had in the British Market on fair security, and it only requires that gentlemen should go over there and represent the advantages which England would have in commanding the coming trade of the East—an advantage she has spent many a million of money and many a valuable life to maintain in the past—an advantage which they will only be too glad to have the opportunity of maintaining and retaining in the future, and you will have as much money as you can use—not at 6 per cent as the Premier spoke of last year, but at 3 and 4 per cent. It is really extraordinary the revolution that steam has made and is continuing to make in the dimensions of our commerce and the mode in which we conducted it. No country in the world offers a greater field for its revolutionizing power than Canada, and none promises a more plentiful return to the people who invest their capital and their energy in its application. We have the coal and the iron in extraordinary quantities and of excellent quality, waiting for a people to bring it into use; we have a climate that will produce a hardy, enduring race of men; we have a harbor unequalled in the world an inland navigation which is of itself a mine of wealth to the country; but we are a scattered people, with a country at present in need of being united by some great trans-continental link, and in order to unite our people and make our advantages available, we want this road proceeded with at once and built within the shortest possible space of time. Do our statesmen desire to see this a great and a growing country? Then Sir, the sooner they begin this road the better.

Mr. COCKBURN — Mr. Chairman: I desire to offer a few remarks upon the great question now before the committee, it being a question in which I in common with every fellow Canadian, naturally take a deep interest. I shall not attempt to review the whole of this great and momentous national question, but will confine my remarks chiefly to the Georgian Bay Branch, a section of the country with which I am conversant from the fact that the greater portion of the road passes through the rear section of the constituency that I have the honor to represent. With respect to this portion of our great national scheme, I take exception to the sentiment which prevails in some quarters as to the importance of a line terminating on the Georgian Bay. The construction of a line to Georgian Bay will, I am sure secure to the Dominion the most gratifying results. I must also, in my humble opinion, differ from the hon. Premier in his assertion that the Government have selected the best point for a terminus in Georgian Bay. I think that it would have been much better to have selected Parry Sound, where there is a good harbor, with the settlement organized, roads and other facilities for railway construction. The hon. Premier has admitted that the line could have been built to Parry Sound, but thought it would only serve the purposes of local traffic. I fail to perceive wherein the terminus at Parry Sound would not have served the purposes of through traffic as well or better than at French River, where a harbor has to be made; especially as the large majority of navigators do not consider the French River a safe harbor. I find that the soundings on the chart only indicate 12 feet of water, which will probably be found too shallow, whereas there is a good depth of water in the Parry Sound channel. Mr. BELL says with respect to the Parry Sound harbor: —"I found the channel wide and well marked naturally, and of easy navigation only one more mark being required and this on a rock which is already covered by 15 feet of water." A large number of people understood the expediency of going to French River and the Premier's course will occasion disappointment to a great number of people. Mr. Chairman, there is another grevious disappointment in connection with this matter. I refer to the connection of the Ontario system of railways with the Georgian Bay Branch. The people of my constituency, as well as those of the surrounding constituencies, inferred from the language of the hon. the Premier's address to the electors of Lambton, that aid would be given for the purpose of making this connection. I will read the paragraph:—"This will "involve the construction of a short line "of railway from the mouth of French "River, on Georgian Bay, to the south-"east shore of Lake Nipissing, and a grant "in aid of an extension to that point of "the existing and projected lines in Quebec "and Ontario." I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that little wonder need be felt that such an impression would be gathered from the language of the address. I regret, Sir, that if the Premier did not intend to give this aid, that he was not more explicit in his language; were it not for this, the people of Western Ontario would not expect this aid. They are not sectional in their feelings. While disappointment, I am sure, will be felt in many quarters, I believe that we have the ability through the Local Legislature of Ontario to make the connection, although up to this time we have not a mile of road completed in the free grant districts. So much, Mr. Chairman, for what may be termed the more local section, and I must support the national scheme, apart from the disappointments to which I have referred. I think the Government scheme a magnificent one, a scheme which will produce great results.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—At this late hour I will only make a very few observations upon the important question under discussion. I think that it behoves us all, on whichever side of the House we are, to extend to the Government that has to deal with this enormous question the most generous consideration. We find the country involved in very considerable difficulties with reference to the engagements which were formerly entered into. We find a Government in power which was not responsible personally for these engagements, but which fell heir to the performance of them politically. We find that Government obliged at once to state frankly and fairly that in its opinion it was impossible that the country could fulfil literally its engagements, and obliged to attempt the course of obtaining a relaxation of those engagements, so that it might not be said, on the one hand, that faith had been broken by Canada, or, on the other, that Canada was ruined in the attempt to keep faithfully and literally her engagements. For my part, I feel that many things which we might have gladly seen undone or unattempted may require to be done or attempted in order that we might make the best of a bad bargain which was not made by us, but by which we have got to some extent to abide. The general policy of the country upon the subject of the Pacific Railway was spread before this country anterior to the late general election, and practically and fairly stated. In some of the minor details of that policy the hon. member for Cumberland has indicated more or less of change, but the broad features of that policy were, as I have said, plainly stated to this country anterior to the late general election, the verdict of the country was taken upon it, and the result was a decided acceptance of it. It is not reversable by us. We have no mandate to reverse it. Upon the most enlarged consideration of the rights of members of Parliament, I cannot conceive that we could have the right at all to listen to the appeal of the hon. member for Cumberland, and to enter into a consideration whether that policy upon which the country's, opinion was asked and taken, and which opinion we were sent here to enforce, should be altogether reversed. I do not consider it would be wise for an instant to consider any such proposition. I do not believe that any other policy in its general effects than that which was so proposed and so accepted is at all feasible. I believe that the exertions which are being made and which are proposed to be made according to this modified scheme are such as will tax to the very utmost the resources of this country. I believe that the proposals that are made with reference to construction in the North-West—not speaking of British Columbia for the moment—are such as are fully calculated to develop that country as rapidly as we can hope to develop it. You cannot hope to pour immigration into a country beyond a certain rate. You must look to the experience of the Western States in recent times when railroads were being developed most rapidly, and with reference to those states nearest to our North Western territories. You will observe that even with their marvellous progress, they made no such extraordinary progress as the hon. member for Cumberland vaguely depicted to us as likely to take place in the North-West. I hope, Sir, that we shall see a greater degree of progress and settlement in that country than has been exhibited in the States at any recent period. I would aim at surpassing the expedition with which their territory has been settled, but in assuming that we are able to do more than they have been able to do, it will still be found, I maintain that the scheme proposed by the Government is amply sufficient to give remunerative employment to those settlers who may go into the North-West, and if we find that immigration is in advance of the means of employment, it is very easy to hasten the progress of the railway and to put still more under construction than is proposed at the present time. The proposition of the hon. gentleman, therefore, is, I say, entirely out of the question. It is not for us to discuss, even a reversal of the general policy of the country, endorsed as it was by the people, and being, as I believe, the true policy in the interests of the country in the circumstances in which we are placed. I quite admit that it was a general belief on the part of members with reference to one detail of this policy to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, that Nipegon would be taken as the Lake Superior terminus, not that the Government committed themselves, as I recollect the assertions made upon the point. As I recollect the discussions, it was left to be decided upon by subsequent surveys, but there was certainly in my own mind, and, I believe, in the minds of others, an impression that it was more likely that Nipegon would be taken as the Lake Superior terminus. Of course, I do not know, and therefore I do not attempt to answer the hon. gentleman's observations on that point. The First Minister will, no doubt, give the House the information which has led to the final conclusion to make Thunder Bay the terminus. With reference to the Georgian Bay branch, that was one of the specific points upon which the opinion of the country was taken, and therefore is especially subject to the general observation that I made as to the policy of the Government. The hon. member for Cumberland submitted certain calculations to the House, with reference to the cost of the Georgian Bay Branch, and its extension, which certainly were a little alarming, but we all know my hon. friend's mastery of the art of piling up large columns of figures, and I do not think that he has been unequal to his former efforts in that direction upon this occasion. We have found him putting a value of his own upon the land subsidy. We have found him exaggerating other items to be taken into account, and we have found him thus making a total which I do not think the House will agree is a correct one in that matter. As I understand the figures the cost of building the Georgian Bay Branch, a distance of 85 miles, is as follows : Subsidy, $10,000 per mile—$850,000 ; Guarantee of 4 per cent. interest on $7,500 for 20 years, which I am told, capitalised, is equivalent to $4,000 in cash per mile.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—A little less.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—That we make $340,900, giving $1,190,000 as the total value of the cash to be expended by the country in the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. With reference to the 20,000 acres of land subsidy, the hon. member for Cumberland calculates it at $2 an acre. I do not believe the House will accept that calculation. I am quite sure if the hon. gentleman proposed that a negotiation be entered into with the contractor for the release of that land, he would find him quite willing to get rid of it at a much less rate than he has valued the land at. It is an entirely absurd calculation to say that these 1,700,000 acres are worth $2 an acre to this country. Even valuing them at $1 would be in my judgement an excessive valuation. But even valuing them at $1 an acre you would then have $2,890,000 as cash and land which the Georgian Bay branch would cost. Then I understand that the Canada Central Railway is to receive a subsidy of from 110 to 120 miles. I assume the medium, 115 miles, and the subsidy to that road would therefore amount to $1,380,000, thus making a total of $4,270,000 in cash and land, of which $2,570,000 is in cash for the Georgian Bay branch and the subsidy to the Canada Central, which will complete the construction of about 200 miles of railway on the direct route from the waters of Lake Huron to the Atlantic sea-board. Of course sectional interests crop out in this matter. My hon. friend from Terrebone and other hon. gentlemen are pointing out that Lower Canada is greatly aggrieved because a line has been adopted which is said to be, and which, upon the information before us I believe to be—although I do not profess to be an engineer—a direct line from the waters of Lake Huron to tide-water. Hon. gentlemen opposite object to that course : they say that some further advantage should be given to the Province of Quebec—that the road ought to be run in another direction, which would enable the traffic to pass over and practically facilitate the construction of another railway on the other side of the Ottawa, which would pass through a greater portion of the territory of the Province. On the other hand, I notice by the Toronto papers that there has been a meeting of the council of that city, at which resolutions were unanimously passed denouncing the Government for granting aid to the Canada Central, and I am informed that a mass meeting of the citizens has been called to discuss the same question to-night. It is quite clear that the representatives of that corporation are just as much aggrieved, in their point of view, as is the hon. membet for Terrebonne speaking from his point of view, by the action of the Government. Well, it is an old criticism under such circumstances, that when you find both parties complaining, something not very far from justice may be presumed to have been done, and that neither of them has been specially favored. I do not know much about this question of engineering and surveying. I presume from the observations of the First Minister, who pointed out that the policy of the Government was the same as it was found to be during the elections, that every exertion will be made to secure the best route in all respects, the shortest, the easiest grades, and the best country through which to pass. I also presume, from his references to the Georgian Bay branch, that it also answers all these requirements. I presume, when the debate arises on the question of affirming this proposed contract, that we shall then or previously be placed in the full possession of details which will satisfy us that proper preliminary steps have been taken by the Government, and that there is a just foundation for the assertion that in this case, as well as with reference to the rest of the line, all due precautions have been taken to secure the very best route.

As far as things go I favor the adoption of the present route, but I admit that it is to be decided not by me or others like myself upon cursory information that we are able to obtain, but by the reports and decisions of engineers after a full examination. I am of opinion that the assistance that has been rendered, it is true in a direct line from the Atlantic sea-board to the North-West, has been munificent, and that the legitimate aspirations of Quebec have been fully met. But, had it been otherwise, I should have been prepared as an elector of Ontario to sustain the Local Government in granting certain lands of that Province in aid of so much of the Pacific Railway as runs through its limits, but under the present arrangement I am not prepared to approve of such a course. I believe that the true course for my Province to pursue would be to reserve certain lands for the purpose of making that connection which Quebec is to obtain out of the funds of the Dominion by reason of this subsidy to the Canada Central. It was upon hearing from general rumor what the policy of the Government was that I put upon the paper some time ago an inquiry of the First Minister with reference to communications in that direction. With reference to what the hon. member for Cumberland has observed as to the improvidence of this contract and the haste with which it was entered into, I cannot help being struck by the remarkable inconsistency of the hon. gentleman's argument. He dealt with it in the first instance as if it was an extravagant contract but he afterwards told us that the contract was taken at such a rate as would render it impossible of fulfillment, and that large demands would be made upon the public purse by the contractor in consequence of the line not having been cross-sectioned, and in consequence of fuller information not having been obtained. And the hon. gentleman stated that the experience of the Intercolonial Railway would be repeated and the line would cost more money than was originally stipulated to be paid. Well, I was greatly relieved by the later observations of the hon. member for Cumberland because they satisfied me that the slight allusion he had made in the first instance to its being an improvident and extravagant contract could not be correct. It is not an extravagant contract if it has been made for an amount less than the road could be built for. At any rate we have the assurance of the hon. member that the Government has made a very good bargain—one of which the complaint he makes is that it is too good—so good that he does not expect that the contractor will be able to implement it. The hon. gentleman adverted to the Pembina branch, and he complained of the Government proceeding to a certain extent with the preparations for the completion of that branch by letting a portion of the grading of the line upon the ground that it was not necessary for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. Well it did surprise me that hon. gentlemen should oppose the Pembina branch, having regard to the policy of the late Government with respect to the Pacific Railway; and here I may say, with respect to that branch, that I am not advocating my own views in supporting its present construction, because the late Government proposed to carry it out, and no gentleman on our side of the House objected to that portion of the policy of the Government. I do not recollect that one dissenting voice, when the proposals of the late Government for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway were before Parliament, was raised against the proposal that a Pembina branch should be constructed. It was agreed to by us all—hon. gentleman opposite proposed it, and we thought the proposal a wise one—if we were going to construct a Pacific Railway at all. We acquiesced in their view, and that portion of their scheme passed unanimously. And yet, when we went to the country the other day, and it was announced as part of the policy of the Government to carry out that portion of the policy of the late Government which we had assented to in opposition, and to which the faith of the country had been in a measure pledged—when we proposed, I say, to carry out that policy with only this modification, that we said we could not do it as fast as they had engaged to do it, and that we would be obliged to take more time than they had promised, and that we could not implement their views to the full in that matter, we know what an outcry was raised throughout Ontario, and how the Government were charged with playing into the hands of the Northern Pacific Railway because they proposed to build the Pembina Branch. Our fault was that coming into the Government we had agreed to carry out the policy which we had assented to in opposition and which our opponents were responsible for, and which they had placed upon the statute books; and because we announced our intention of carrying out that policy we were villified from one end of the country to the other as unpatriotic and as incurring a useless expenditure of public money. Following up the same line of attack, though not with the same violence as during the election, the hon. gentleman to-night has assailed the Government for undertaking the construction of this Pembina Branch. What did Parliament do last session? Did not Parliament agree that the Pembina Branch should be built? Was it not thoroughly understood that progress was to be made with that work as rapidly as possible. Was any opposition expressed by any gentleman opposite to this course?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Was there any vote recorded against it? Is the hon. gentleman's vote to be found upon our journals giving the lie to his own statute passed in 1872? The policy of the late Government, as developed in the statute book, was to build that branch.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No. The policy was to allow the company that was going to build the main line to construct that branch.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE — What was the policy of the Government? Let the hon. gentleman turn to the famous, let me say the notorious, contract which was cancelled by his Government shortly before it fell, and he will find that the policy of the Government was to have the Pembina Branch finished and put in operation by the first of December last. The policy was to develop the North-West by means of that branch, and the intention was to use it as a means of access to the North-West territories.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—It was not to be built by the Government.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE but it was to be built with public funds, and for the purpose of the present argument it makes no difference whether it was to be built by the Government or by any private company aided by a grant of public money. It was to be built with public money, and that is what is being done now.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER. No—

Hon. Mr. BLAKE. It is being built now under a contract.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—under the scheme of the late Government it was to be built by a private company, aided by the Government, and not as a Government work.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I appeal to the candor of the hon. gentleman's own supporters to say if that was not the argument used early in the discussion of the subject. The hon. gentleman alleges that the construction of the Pembina Branch was unnecessary and uncalled for. He did not say it ought to be built in one way or another, but the hon. member said it ought not to be built at all, and now he tries to creep out of a small hole by saying that it should be built in one way and not in another. Now, Sir, I say I sustained in Opposition the policy of the late Government for the construction of the Pembina branch. I sustained it when in power, and I sustain it now as a private member of this House. I am aware that caution is requisite, and having regard to the circumstances, I heartily endorse the conduct of the Government in proceeding so far as they did proceed last season in grading that piece of the line which will certainly be constructed, and is sure to go into operation. I heartily endorse their conduct, having regard to the pledges made, the difficulties the country was involved in at the time, and the importance of the public works being prosecuted in the Dominion. Then we have the question of a road from Esquimault to Nanaimo. As to that, I do not observe that the hon. gentleman said much upon it. I suppose he could not complain of the construction of that branch.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—I do not complain of it.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Upon that subject, at any rate, even his mouth is shut, because the late Government had, by executive action, determined, as far as they could determine for the people of this country, that the terminus of the Pacific Railway should be at Esquimault, and that we should build the road, not merely from Esquimault to Nanaimio, but further on, and to cross the Narrows to the mainland at I don't know what cost. Therefore, the hon. Premier occupies, with reference to his opponents, an impregnable position, while he proposes to this House to do anything with reference to the construction of that piece of the line. I always, for myself, dissented from the view that the improvident and reckless promise made on behalf of this country of building a line on Vancouver Island.

Mr. DECOSMOS—No, no!

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I contend to the contrary. The hon. gentleman says it should be built, but others think it would be in the interest of the country that the arrangement made to construct a road to Esquimault should be cancelled, and a a new arrangement made. The Government has rightly, from its accession to power taken the view that that arrangement was in excess of the terms of Union, and that the country is not bound to do more than to construct a line to the Pacific Ocean. Anything beyond that was beyond the terms of the bargain. I am here called upon to advert to what the policy of the Government has been with reference to the relaxation of terms, and I wish to point out, in reference to this, observations of my own in support of it, and statements made in the blue book laid before us. On page 26, in the first minute of Council sent to the Colonial Secretary, this statement is made :—"The propositions made by Mr. "EDGAR involved an immediate heavy ex- "penditure in British Columbia not con- "templated by the terms of Union, namely, "the construction of a railway on Van- "couver's Island, from the Port of Esqui- "mault to Nanaimo, as compensation to the "most populous part of the Province for "the requirement of a longer time for com- "pleting the line on the mainland."

Mr. DE COSMOS—That is bosh.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It may be bosh, but it is a melancholy fact. This proposition was made, and ultimately, by the arrangements which have been made, and I understand it to have been acceded to, that the construction of the piece from Esquimault to Nanaimo should be proceded with, not as a necessary portion of the Pacific Railway, but as compensation for not completing the line on the mainland.

Mr. DE COSMOS—Would the hon. gentleman point to any part of the propositions made by Mr. EDGAR to Mr. WALKEM, in which the word compensation appears?

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I do not know anything about that.

Mr. DE COSMOS—Well, keep within the record.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I am keeping within the record. I am keeping within the record of the Minute in Council and also within the record of the decision of Lord CARNARVON. I am keeping within the record when I show that the Government of British Columbia agreed to be bound by the decision of Lord CARNARVON. I am keeping therefore, within, the record when I say that the Government of British Colnmbia, as far as it can bind the people of that Province, agreed to accept an extension of the railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo as compensation or part compensation for the delay in the time of construction. In the instructions to Mr. EDGAR, this passage occurs :—

"You will take special care not to admit "in any way that we are bound to build "the railway to Esquimault or any other

"place on the Island; and while you do "not at all threaten not to build there, to "let them understand that this is wholly "and purely a concession, and that its "construction must be contingent on a "reasonable course being pursued regard-"ing other parts of the scheme."

Mr. DE COSMOS—Will the hon. gentleman point out where the word "compensation" comes in in those instructions? I do not wish the impression to go abroad that compensation was offered to British Columbia by Mr. EDGAR when such was not the case. The First Minister has alluded to his own private and confidential instructions to Mr. EDGAR, but they were not put before the Government of British Columbia. I wish the hon. gentleman to state distinctly what were the propositions that Mr. EDGAR did make to the Government of British Columbia, and let him show whether the word "compensation" was used in them at all.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—I have already pointed out that that is entirely immaterial, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman might deny that proposals distinctly indicating that view, were assented to, and formed the basis of the decision of Lord CARNARVON, which they had agreed to accept. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have stated in public on one occasion, and also in this House, my own opinion that the proposals which were made by the Government through Mr. EDGAR were of an extremely liberal character, and were not such as ought to be materially enlarged by the people of this country. It seems to me that I am fortified at any rate in that opinion by the language which I find in the Minute of Council from which I have been reading, on page 27:—"The "public feeling of the whole Dominion has "been expressed so strongly against the "fatal extravagance involved in the terms "agreed to by the late Government, that "no Government could live that would "attempt or rather pretend to attempt "their literal fulfilment. Public opinion "would not go beyond the proposal made "through Mr. EDGAR to the Government." That Minute of Council was transmitted to Lord CARNARVON and he made his counter-suggestions or stated his views, which were very considerably in excess, in some particulars, of those which had been submitted by the Government of the Dominion. In some of these particulars those views were afterwards modified. To them, therefore, it becomes entirely unnecessary to allude. Others of them were adhered to by Lord CARNARVON, and it is to those views and to the language of the subsequent despatch that I wish to direct the attention of the House. With reference to the proposal of Lord CARNARVON, that the expenditure of $1,500,000 should be increased to $2,000,000 the Minute in Council of September, 1874, states:—

"In regard to the second proposal, the committee recommend that Lord CARNARVON be informed (if it be found impossible to obtain a settlement of the question by the acceptance of the former offer) that the Government will consent that, after the completion of the survey, the average annual minimum expenditure on the mainland shall be two millions. There is every reason to believe now that a majority of the people of Columbia would accept the propositions previously made. Judging from a petition sent from the mainland, signed by 644 names (a copy of which petition is enclosed), there is almost an entire unanimity there in favor of these proposals, and assurances were given very lately by gentlemen of the highest position on the Island that the course of the Local Government would not meet general approval there. An application was made by one prominent gentleman, an ex-member of Parliament, to the Government here, to know if the proposals made would still be adhered to, he pledging himself to secure their acceptance by the bulk of the people. It is therefore earnestly hoped that no change will be considered necessary, as it will be difficult to induce the country to accept any further concessions."

Then turning to the other condition, the Minute in Council proceeds:—

"The fourth condition involves another "precise engagement to have the whole of "the railway communication finished in "1890. There are the strongest possible "objections to again adopting a precise "time for the completion of the lines."

Then the Minute in Council proceeds to say:—

"There can be no doubt that it would be an extremely difficult task to obtain the sanction of the Canadian Parliament to any specific bargain as to time, considering the consequences which have already resulted from the unwise adoption of a limited period in the terms of Union for the completion of so vast an undertaking; the extent of which must necessarily be very imperfectly understood by people at a distance. The committee advise that Lord CARNARVON be informed that, while in no case could the Government undertake the completion of the whole line in the time mentioned, an extreme unwillingness exists to another limitation of time; but if it be found absolutely necessary to secure a present settlement of the controversy by further concessions, a pledge may be given that the portion west of Lake Superior will be completed so as to afford connection by rail with existing lines of railway through a portion of the United States and by Canadian waters during the season of navigation by the year 1890 as suggested."

At page 40 the same Minute in Council says:—"It only remains to say that "the Government, in making the new pro- "posals to British Columbia, were actua- "ated by an anxious desire to put an end "to all controversy, and to do what is "fair and just under very extraordinary "circumstances, and that these proposals "embraced the most liberal terms that "public opinion would justify them in "offering." The Minute in Council also points out clearly to Lord CARNARVON, with reference to the complaint that nothing was being done by the Dominion Government towards commencing or pushing on the railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo, that:—"The Dominion has no engage- "ment to build such a railway, and there- "fore there can be no just complaint "that it is not commenced. The con- "struction of such a railway was offered "only as compensation for delay in ful- "filing the engagement to build a railway "to the 'Pacific seaboard.'" Now, sir, I maintain that the expressions in these despatches, with reference to the state of public opinion and to the difficulty, if not impossibility, of inducing Parliament and the country to extend further concessions, truly and correctly made. I maintain that the difficulties in which the country may be involved by these extra concessions are very serious. Having regard to the very favourable financial engagements which the First Minister was able to make, having regard to the large sums that, upon very favnrable terms he was able to borrow without trenching on the reserve of the Imperial guarantee, and assuming a concurrence of favorable circumstances for a period of years yet to come, assuming a reasonable share of prosperity—reasonable at any rate, if it had not been enjoying a very extraordinary share of prosperity for some years past—assuming a continuance, I say, of that prosperity, it is possible that this country may be able to comply with these conditions. But, for my own part, I repeat my regret that the terms proposed should have been acceeded to. I repeat my regret that we should have agreed to a larger minimum of expenditure than $1,500,000, which was more than British Columbia had herself asked for in the first instance. I repeat my regret that the agreement made contained a new time limitation when almost all the circumstances which in the judgment of hon. gentlemen with whom it was my happiness to act, rendered it imprudent to attempt to fix such time limitation; these circumstances being the impossibility of knowing within what time we could construct this railway, and at what cost, while the surveys were in their then condition. I said almost all, because I admit, of course, that some, I will say considerable, progress has been made in the work of surveying, and, therefore, it was nearer possible to come to some sort of conclusion, but how little possible to come to any reasonable conclusion, is to be demonstrated from the fact that even the 45 miles from Thunder Bay to Lake Shebandowan. as to which things have progressed so far that a contract is about to be let for the grading, and my hon. friend was unable to give even an approximate estimate of what the cost of the road would be, and was only able to tell us what would be the cost of the grading and superstructure. How much more impossible to form any estimate of what would be the cost of a road about which there is very little accurate information. Look at this country! The hon. member for Vancouver has referred to an observation I made with reference to the character of British Columbia as a country for railway construction. I think the speech of the First Minister to-night has vindicated the position I then took. What is the tract of country which the hon. Minister told us was most advanced as to survey? It is that part of the route which goes from Yellow Head Pass down a certain distance, thence by the north branch of the Fraser, and so to Bute Inlet. The distance from Yellow Head Pass to Bute Inlet, in an air line, is about 255 miles. Now, what is the distance by the route which the First Minister has spoken of as a favorable route and which, very possibly, I may say, probably, may be selected. It is no less than 500 miles, so that in order to get over a country, which is 255 miles across, you have to build a railway of 500 miles. In view of that fact I say I am justified in calling British Columbia with reference to railway construction an inhospitible country. But it is not merely to justify myself that I make that observation. It is to call the attention of the committee to the important fact that it is even now presumed to be possible, if not probable, that we may have to double the air line mileage in order to accomplish the connection between Yellow Head Pass and the sea board of the Pacific; and to say that an enterprise which involves difficulties so great as that is one with reference to which we ought to be very cautious in making pledges. It is quite true there is another route very much shorter, projected—a route which goes by the valley of the Fraser, but it involves difficulties of construction as the First Minister has stated. It involves works of an expensive character which may make it more costly than the building of five hundred miles of the other route. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, for my own part I regret that the Government has felt in necessary to yield to the extent to which they did yield to the request of Lord CARNARVON. I desire to speak with every respect of that nobleman in his personal and in his political position. But I must say that I believe that the people, the Parliament, and the Government of this country are better able to appreciate the circumstances under which we stand, better able to appreciate the obligations which my hon. friend proposes us to enter into. I say that at this time of day we are unfit for our position here if we are not prepared temperately and respectfully, yet firmly to assert that proposition. And I think my hon. friend would not be prepared to accept the dictum of any man however respectable or able, with the partial information which he must possess, as to all the complicated conditions with which this problem is surrounded. It is not the Colonial Secretary, it is not the Imperial Government that has to raise the money to build this work. It is upon Canadian credit, by Canadian enterprise, and at Canadian cost, and Canadian risk that this work is to be accomplished; and it is therefore by the free voice and decision of the people of Canada that the terms, in my judgment, upon which that work shall be constructed are to be fixed. I believe these views meet the acceptance of my hon. friend, who has taken the whole responsibility of recommending these terms to the House and to the country. I do not deny that the difficulties arising out of the imprudent bargain made with British Columbia are such as justify the Government in asking, what I believe they will receive at our hands, the greatest consideration and forbearance with reference to the settlement of this question. But I do say that if we accept the arrangement which the Government propose to us, we accept it because we believe it best in the interest of this country to do so—not because Lord CARNARVON said so. There is one observation of my hon. friend which I heard with some regret. I had put a question upon the paper with reference to this arrangement, which my hon. friend answered in anticipation, accompanying his answer with some explanations. We all recollect the attitude that the people of British Columbia assumed when the proposal was made for a modification of "the terms" of Union. The people and the Legislature took alarm, and I believe the Legislature declared that no alteration of these terms should be made without the people themselves having an opportunity of pronouncing upon an alteration by the usual constitutional mode. I do not object to that demand being made. I do say that the people of British Columbia might fairly have called upon the Government of that Province not to assent to any alteration of "the terms" without the concurrence of their representatives in Parliament assembled. It appears to me that the people of Canada ought also to be called upon, through their representatives in Parliament assembled, to deal with the settlement that had been made by the Government, either in the way of affirming or disaffirming of the course pursued. This is the view which I think the despatch indicates was taken by the Government at one time. In one of the despatches of our Government, to which I have already referred, the Privy Council point out that it would be extremely difficult to induce Parliament to consent to any further concession. Well, that further concession has been made. We are told that Parliament has not to be asked whether it will consent to it or not—that it is to be treated as a final concession made without the assent of Parliament. I think that that decision is to be regretted. My hon. friend has been offered already the support of the hon. member for Cumberland and his friends in support of these proposals. Of course it could not be refused. They were modifications of an improvident bargain which the late Government had made, and which were necessary in order that that bargain might be carried out; and therefore the hon. member for Cumberland could not do otherwise than offer his cordial support to the Government in reference to these proposals. Nor do I doubt that the majority of this House are prepared to assent to them also. At the same time my own opinion is that they are imprudently liberal, but the view which I wish to place more pointedly before the House is that whether liberal or otherwise, the opinion of Parliament ought to be asked and taken upon the question whether they are to be obligatary upon this country. I think that it would be the more prudent course, not only in respect of our own rights, but with regard to the rights of the smaller Provinces. We are dealing with the Province which, next to Manitoba, is the smallest in the Dominion. We are dealing with the Province in respect to which our obligations have not been implemented. We are arranging for the alteration of the terms, and I think if we were disposed, as I suppose a majority of the House is disposed, to agree that these terms should be so altered, the people of British Columbia would be better satisfied if the new arrangement rested upon statutory enactment rather than upon simple executive action as now proposed. Therefore, whether we look at the interests of the Canadian people alone, or at the spirit in which these proposals are to be accepted by the people of British Columbia, I venture respectfully to represent to the First Minister that the more prudent course would have been to give us an opportunity of pronouncing upon these proposals.

M. CIMON—Je me lève pour relever quelques paroles malheureuses, prononcées par l'hon. député de Chateauguay. Quoique qu'ils puisse sembler audacieux qu'un jeune membre comme moi s'attaque à un ancien député comme le député de Chateauguay, je manquerais à mon devoir en ne relevant pas les paroles injurieuses qu'il a prononcées à l'égard de la Législature de Québec. Ces paroles, M. le Président, l'hon. député de Chateauguay les regrettera tout le temps de sa vie. Il a osé dire que cette Législature était une " Législature moribonde, avilie, déshonorée, et que l'adresse qu'elle a unanimement adoptée au sujet du terminus du chemin du Pacifique ne valait pas le papier sur lequel elle était écrite, et était indigne d'être considéré. Ces paroles sont d'autant plus malheureuses qu'il n'y a pas encore deux ans, le député de Chauteauguay faisait partie de la Législature qu'il a si gravement insultée. Est-ce donc, que, dans l'opinion de l'hon. membre, il résumait toute la sagesse, toute l'honorabilité, toute la capacité qu'il y avait dans cette Législature, et que maintenant qu'il en est sorti, il ne reste plus rien de ces bonnes qualités ? L'hon. député de Chateauguay n'a excepté aucun membre de la législature de Québec. Il a enveloppé ses propres amis dans la même condamnation, et les a par conséquent traités eux-mêmes de moribonds, d'avilis, (tarnished). Ainsi, suivant le député de Chateauguay, M. JOLY, que le parti du député de Chateauguay élève sur un piédestal, serait lui-même un moribond, déshonoré (tarnished).

L'hon. M. HOLTON—Si l'hon. député de Chicoutimi veut me le permettre, je lui dirai que l'expression moribonde, si elle a la même signification en anglais qu'en français. . . . . .

L'hon. M. CAUCHON—Oui, c'est la même chose.

L'hon. M. HOLTON—Cette expression veut dire à la veille de mourir, de s'éteindre, à raison de ce que son terme est expiré. J'ai appliqué cette expression à la législature, politiquement, et non pas aux membres qui la composent individuellement. J'aurais bien du regret que M. JOLY ou tout autre membre de la législature de Québec fussent à l'article de la mort—ou fussent des moribonds, comme el dit le député de Charlevoix, qui devrait mieux savoir que de m'imputer l'intention d'être personel et injurieux.

M. CIMON—Je savais bien qu'étant un jeune membre de cette Chambre, je serais traité sévèrement par l'hon. député de Chateauguay, mais je n'en maintiens pas moins ce que j'ai dit, car je respecte et j'admire la législature de Québec, qui, loin de mériter d'être traitée avec mépris, a mérité, par ses actes et ses travaux, la reconnaissance du pays. C'est cette législature qui va donner à la Province de Québec, le chemin de fer du Lac St. Jean, de la Baie des Chaleurs, de Kennebec, de Sherbrook, le St. Francis International, et qui a voté $30,000 pour construire sur l'Ottawa un pont destiné à relier le chemin de fer de Colonisation au chemin du Pacifique ; c'est cette législature qui, entre autres actes patriotiques, a passé une mesure très favorable au repatriement de nos compatriotes aux Etats-Unis. Cependant c'est cette même législature que le député de Chateauguay a traitée avec tant de sévérité quand il l'a qualifiée de moribonde, avilie, déshonorée, (tarnished), et dont il a dit que ses demandes au sujet du Pacifique ne valaient pas le papier sur lequel elles étaient écrites. Ah ! je comprends, quand je vois Québec traité avec autant de mépris, pourquoi l'amnistie demandée par cette même législature s'est changée en bannissement pour RIEL et LÉPINE. Une autre parole déplorable que je dois aussi relever, a échappé à l'hon. député de Chateauguay. Je croyais l'hon. membre un modèle de sagesse, qui ne parlait jamais de sa Province que pour la rehausser dans l'esprit public. Les hons. membres de la droite rient, et cependant si je ne m'étais levé pour relever l'outrage fait à la Province de Québec, pas un d'eux n'aurait eu le courage de la faire respecter, notre législature locale. Cette législature doit mériter, comme tout autre législature locale, le respect du Parlement Central. Qu'arriverait-il si chacun dans cette Chambre insultait, qui Ontario, qui le Nouveau Brunswick, qui la Nouvelle Ecosse, et ainsi de suite ? Si nous ne nous respectons pas les législatures des diverses Provinces, la constitution ne pourra fonctionner ; car le premier devoir que commande la constitution, c'est de respecter les représentants élus et si on ne les respecte pas, on jette du mépris sur la constitution même.

Je reproche de plus au député de Chateauguay d'avoir accusé le député de Terrebonne d'être sectionnel et audacieux parcequ'il a eu le courage de revendiquer les droits de la Province de Québec. Qu'a dit le député de Terrebonne ? N'a-t-il pas fait que demander la plus simple justice, en disant : Nous avons des droits acquis à ce que le terminus du Pacifique soit mis à tel endroit que toutes les Provinces puissent en bénéficier. Nous voulons que la Province de Québec, qui contribue largement aux frais de construction de ce chemin dont pas un pouce ne se fera chez elle, puisse avantageusement atteindre ce terminus. Certes, si l'hon. député de Chateauguay eut écouté le député de Terrebonne, il ne l'aurait pas accusé d'être sectionnel. Mais est-ce qu'il doit être défendu à la Province de Québec de réclamer ses droits et de faire valoir ses intérêts ? Toutes les autres Provinces le font constamment. Tous les jours, nous entendons les membres de la Nouvelle Ecosse, du Nouveau Brunswick, d'Ontario, dire que leur Province est maltraitée, et demander justice, et nous, de la Province de Québec, nous leur rendons justice. Mais si un membre de Québec réclame justice pour sa Province, on lui dit qu'il est sectionnel. Il appartient aux membres de l'Opposition de faire valoir les droits de Québec. On n'a pas encore vu un seul membre ministériel de la Province de Québec le faire. C'est un fait remarquable et sur lequel j'attire l'attention de la Chambre et du pays. En résumé, M. le Président, je dis qu'il n'appartenait pas au député de Chateauguay, ni à personne d'insulter la législature de Québec, non plus que d'accuser le député de Terrebonne d'être sectionnel, lorsque, au nom de l'intérêt général, il venait tout simplement de faire valoir les droits et les intérêts de la Province de Québec. M. le President, j'ai peut-être eu tort, en ma qualité de jeune membre, de porter la parole comme je l'ai fait, mais j'aurais cru manquer à mon devoir en ne protestant par contre la double injure faite à la législature et à la Province de Québec par le discours de l'hon. député de Chateauguay.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON assured his hon. friend that he had applied the term "moribund" to the Quebec Legislature, and not to any individual member or members of it, He (Mr. HOLTON) would be pained to the last degree, to hear that his friend Mr. JOLY was moribund.

M. MOUSSEAU—M. le Président, la question en elle-même, la construction du chemin du Pacifique est déjà réglée depuis longtemps. Plusieurs votes l'ont consacrée et nos statuts en contiennent la solution. Son importance n'a jamais fait de doute et sa construction est considérée comme une nécessité absolue. Il ne s'agit maintenant que des détails, détails importants, si l'on veut, puisqu'il s'agit de la dépense de $6,290,000. Sur cette somme il doit être pris celle de $500,000 pour la construction de l'embranchement de la Baie Georgienne. Nous avons pu voir dans la presse les détails d'un contrat pour la construction de la ligne de la Baie Georgienne au lac Nipissingue et au fort Douglas. Le député de Cumberland a démontré que cette voie coûterait $6,290,000 et le député de South Bruce n'a pu réussir à entamer ce calcul. Le seul point sur lequel il a jeté du doute, c'est celui de la valeur des terres. Ceux-là qui sont familiers avec la valeur de telles terres sur le marché anglais et aux Etats-Unis savent tous quelle augmentation considérable se produit sur le prix de ces terres, du moment qu'elles sont ainsi livrées à la colonization et à mesure que les établissements se font. J'ai par devers moi une longue liste de ces exemples, et puis prouver que l'augmentation est de cent à mille pour cent. Le prix des terres, dans la plupart de ces cas est de $3 à $13. Quand, donc, l'hon. député de Cumberland a évalué les terres en question à $2 l'acre en moyenne, il était bien au-dessous de la valeur réelle, si l'on en juge par ce qui est arrivé aux Etats-Unis. Quant à la Province de Québec, que le député de Chateauguay dédaigne tant, il faut observer que non-seulement on nous a fait perdre les avantages que nous avions d'après les arrangements de 1872, mais on a de plus ajouté des lignes qui auront l'effet de priver Québec de ses droits acquis. La Province de Québec n'a pourtant exprimé que des prétentions modestes ; elle n'a pas réclamé des avantages indus ; elle n'a demandé et ne demande encore que ce qu'il y a de plus naturel au monde. Nous demandons qu'on examine nos renseignements, nos tracés, afin de juger de la justesse de nos prétentions, que le chemin pour se rendre à Douglas devrait prendre la route du Nord de l'Ottawa en passant par le Matawan. Le premier ministre, d'ordinaire si franc dans ses exposés, n'a pas tenu compte des faits certifiés par M. LEGGE et le député de Terrebonne. MM. SHANLEY et CLARK ont aussi fait des exploration avec les instruments requis, dans le Matawan, lorsqu'il s'est agi d'y faire un canal. Sir WILLIAM LOGAN a aussi exploré ces régions, et leur rapport a été loin d'être défavorable à cette partie du pays. Dans tous les cas, le premier ministre lui-même a été forcé d'admettre que ses renseignements sont insuffisants. Pourquoi donc précipiter la confection du chemin avant de s'être assuré par les moyens convenables des avantages que pourraient présenter la route la plus favorable à la Province de Québec ? C'est ce que la législature de la Province de Québec a représenté dans les résolutions qu'elle a adoptées et qu'il me fait peine de lire, après surtout que le député de Chateauguay a déclaré qu'elles n'en valent pas la peine.

" Considérant, que la Province de Québec sera appelée à payer une proportion considérable du montant requis pour construire le chemin du Pacific et pour subventioner la ligne qui reliera son terminus aux voies ferrées maintenant existantes ou en construction, sans qu'aucune partie de ces travaux ne paraisse devoir être faite sur son territoire ;

" Qu'en conséquence la Province de Québec doit s'attendre à ce que dans la localisation du terminus du Pacifique aussi bien que dans le tracé d'une ligne reliant ce terminus aux lignes ferrées existantes ou en construction, ses justes droits soient reconnus autant qu'ils ne porteront pas atteinte à l'intérêt général de la puissance ;

" Considérant, que d'après les rapports d'hommes éminents sur la nature et la configuration du terrain, il résulterait que tant pour la branche du Pacific à l'Est de la Baie Georgienne, pour la ligne à être subventionnée par le Gouvernement un tracé qui suivrait le Matawan, présenterait la route la plus économique, la plus facile et la plus prompte pour l'écoulement du vaste commerce de l'Ouest et du Pacific ;

" Qu'il soit résolu que la Province de Québec prie SON EXCELLENCE le GOUVERNEUR GÉNÉRAL de bien vouloir ordonner une exploration minutieuse du terrain et des différentes voies proposées avant que de se décider sur l'adoption d'aucune d'elle ;

" Et que dsns le cas où l'exploration prouverait qu'une ligne préférable à celle de la Matawan existe au sud de la rivière Ottawa, la ligne a être subventionnée par le Gouvernement soit amenée à Pembroke et non à Renfrew, ou une jonction avec le système de voie ferrée de la Province de Québec est impossible, vu les dépenses énormes qu'elle entraînerait ;

" Que la ligne devant relier le Pacifique avec les autres voies ferrées, soient suffisamment sous le contrôle du Gouvernement Fédéral, pour assurer pleine et égale justice, à toutes les compagnies de chemin de fer qui désireraient se mettre en communcation avec le Pacific ;

" Que le LIEUTENANT-GOUVERNEUR de la Province de Québec, soit respectueusement prié de transmettre ces résolutions à SON EXCELLENCE le GOUVERNEUR GÉNÉRAL.

On voit, M. le Président, par les résolutions que je viens de lire, que la législature de Québec, que l'on accuse d'être impotente et sans capacité, pose la question de la manière la plus humble et la plus modeste, en même temps que la plus juste et la plus rationnelle, quoiqu'en ait dit l'hon. député de Chateauguay, qui a bien mérité la sévère leçon que lui a donnée le député de Charlevoix pour se poser ainsi en Jupiter Tonnant et appliquer l'épithète de moribond à la législature de Québec, qu'il a non-seulement taxée de nullité mais en même temps d'être avilie et déshonorée. On est encore en droit de dire avec vérité, malgré les insultes du député de Chateauguay, que la législature de Québec, par sa dignité, l'indépendence et le caractère élevé de ses membres, sa conduite honorable et l'importance qu'elle a eue dans ce Parlement, a bien mérité du pays. M. le Président, il me fait peine d'avoir à m'occuper maintenant de la réponse si peu satisfaisante que l'hon. Ministre du Revenu de l'Intérieur a faite aux objections de mon honorable ami le député de Terrebonne, dont il n'a aucunement attaqué les arguments. Il s'est borné à dire que nous avions demandé en 1872, précisément ce que le Gouvernement fait aujourd'hui. Ce qui revient à dire que l'entreprise étant à faire, nous n'avions pas le droit, sous des circonstances différentes, de promouvoir par des moyens meilleurs, les intérêts de notre province et du pays en général. Je ne trouve ni convenable ni patriotique cette manière de raisonner sur les grandes questions, et je regrette que l'hon. ministre ait cru y avoir recours et se soit servi dans ce but de citations tronquées. Les fais historiques, retracés avec bonne foi, remettront les choses dans leur lumière exacte et tel qu'il convient pour la Chambre d'un grand pays. Si on n'entendait que le Premier Ministre, on ne comprendrait pas les vues de ceux qui dès 1870 et 1872 entreprenaient, sur l'avis et l'expérience présumée, de M. HULBURT de sillonner le pays de chemin à lisses en bois. Le chemin de Colonisation du Nord était alors à l'état d'embrion ; on croyait faire un chemin à lisses de bois et à jaugeage étroit pour le transport du bois de corde à Montréal. C'était aussi le moment où le chemin Gosford était entrepris—on sait quel grâce à la sévérité de notre climat, ce premier essai a avorté. Lorsque le Gouvernement de Québec se décida à venir en aide aux chemins de fer de la province, la face des choses changea et le petit chemin de St. Jérôme devint le grand chemin de Colonisation qui devait être relié au Pacifique et compter parmi les plus importantes voies ferrées de la Province. Le chemin de Colonisation du Nord fut donc entrepris, pendant que celui de Gosford échouait. En 1871, l'annexion de la Colombie à la puissance consacra le projet de la confection du chemin du Pacifique, comme condition de cette annexion, et en 1871-2 il fut question d'amalgamer le chemin de fer de Colonisation et le Canada Central comme moyens de relier les deux lignes à la grande voie du Pacifique, et d'assurer à la Province de Québec tous les avantages en dérivant. La politique des octrois du Gouvernement de Québec aux chemins de fer, inaugurée en 1873, ne fut appliquée qu'en 1874 ; et comme on n'avait pas encore en Janvier 1872 passé la statut qui devait assurer la construction du Pacifique, il ne pouvait être question alors de relier le chemin de fer de Colonisation avec celui du Pacifique. Plus tard le Canada Central et le chemin de Colonisation s'étant brouillés, leur projet de connexion avec le Pacifique fut abandonné. L'octroi de Québec fut efficace puisque le chemin est en grande partie construit. Il a été question de le relier avec le Pacifique, et c'est ce qui aurait dû être fait ; mais lorsque l'on vit qu'on aurait l'aide de Québec on résolut unanimement de faire la connexion et pour cela on fit en 1874 des explorations pour faire pousser le chemin jusqu'à la rivière Creuse et plus loin, si possible, jusqu'au lac Nispissingue. On avait cru découvrir que c'était la ligne la plus courte ; mais le premier ministre prétend aujourd'hui que tel n'est pas le cas. Le Gouvernement de Québec accordait suffisamment pour faire la connexion avec le chemin du Pacifique, sans l'aide fédéral ni l'amalgame avec le Canada Central. Eh bien ! M. le Président, en face des désirs de la Province de Québec, lesquels sont on ne peut plus justes et raisonnables, on doit décider 1o. de dédaigner ses représentations et l'état des choses réel dans une question comportant la dépense de sept ou huit millions de piastres. 2o. qu'on ne peut rien faire parce que nous-mêmes en 1872, dans le temps où le chemin de colonisation n'avait pas d'aide, où la politique du gouvernement de Québec n'était pas encore de sillonner le pays de chemins de fer, nous n'avions pas prévu tous les changements qui sont arrivés depuis. Est-ce pour de telles raisons, M. le Président, que l'on doit repousser les représentations de la législature de Québec, mépriser cette législature même et passer outre aveuglement? Non, et j'espère que l'item proposé ne rencontrera pas, sous ces circonstances, le concours qu'il devrait avoir, seulement après un rejet justement motivé des propositions de la province de Québec.

En résumé, la Province de Québec dit : je prétends avoir des droits ; voici mes titres. Au moins, ne me condamnez pas sans les examiner. Néanmoins, le premier ministre et son gouvernement veulent nous condamner sans nous entendre. J'ose encore espérer que cette injustice ne sera pas commise contre la Province de Québec.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) gave notice that he would on concurrence move an amendment.

A brief discussion ensued as to whether the debate should be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he wished the vote to be passed to-night, and promised that the same liberty of discussion would be allowed on concurrence as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that as the new terms to British Columbia had been accepted, he would not oppose them, but there were certain features in connection with the Government scheme to which he objected.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have no scheme to present to the House. I am simply asking a vote of money to carry out the law of the land.

Mr. THOMPSON hoped the law of the land would be carried out in a satisfactory manner. He objected to a system of mixed land and water communication, and desired to see a continuous line of railway stretching across the whole continent. It was to be hoped that the money which was now being voted would be used to prosecute the work with the greatest energy, for he believed that every dollar spent on the road would add to the prosperity of the country. He denied that the petition of certain parties on the main-land, referred to in the Minute of Council, indicated any willingness on the part of the people to accept the terms proposed by Mr. EDGAR, and he challenged the hon. member for South Bruce, who had referred to that petition, to point out a single clause in it which would bear out the view that the signers of it were willing to accept those terms. The statement made in that same Minute of Council that there was every reason to believe that a majority of the people of British Columbia accepted the proposals of Mr. EDGAR was entirely incorrect, as he knew from his own personal knowledge. Another statement contained in the Minute of Council was equally incorrect, viz. : that assurances had been given to the Government by a gentleman of high position, an ex-member of the Legislature, that the proposals were favorably received by the people, and he would guarantee that the people would accept them. He (Mr. THOMPSON) thought he knew who the gentleman referred to was ; but he knew this much that in British Columbia there was no man who could presume to act the part of dictator. However, he might add that the people of British Columbia were willing to accept any measure that would relieve the Government from their embarrassment. Before he sat down he wished to ask the Minister of Public Works whether it was the intention of the Government to construct the telegraph line and put it in working order before the line of railway was located. This was a point of some importance, because if the telegraph line were constructed where it was supposed the road would go, and subsequently the line were changed, another telegraph line would have to be built.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was intended to build the telegraph line along the railroad.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was quite evident that a good many members wished to continue the discussion, and as the hour was late, he hoped the First Minister would agree to an adjournment of the debate. In his opinion, the vote which the committee were called upon to pass involved not only matters of new policy, but also a question of illegal expenditure. There was no law upon the statute book whatever, with reference to contracts for a Canadian line of telegraph. The law provided that the Government might contract for the building of telegraph lines after the location of the line of railway.

But there was a contract already let in British Columbia for one hundred miles of telegraph, although the line of railway was not yet located. Then he held that the contract for the Thunder Bay branch of the railway was not provided for by law. Therefore, he hoped, in view of these important considerations, that the Government would agree to an adjournment of the debate, as it was impossible that these questions could otherwise be properly dealt with.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE repeated his promise of allowing the utmost freedom of discussion on concurrence, but said it was important that the supply should be advanced a stage to-night. As to the remarks of the hon. gentleman that the Government were asking an illegal vote, that was merely the hon. gentleman's opinion. The Government were quite satisfied they were acting in a legal manner.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) asked if the eastern terminus of the Georgian Bay branch was definitely settled at Douglas, or whether Pembroke was still in a position to expect that it might become the terminus.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I cannot tell the precise point, but it is somewhere between Douglas and Pembroke. The words used in the contract, I believe, are that the terminus shall be in the vicinity of Douglas, but the precise point, I think, is not yet determined.

Mr. BUNSTER said the people of British Columbia did not wish for anything that would be unjust to the rest of the Dominion. They had, perhaps, more enlarged views on this subject than other residents of Canada. They wished to have the railroad prosecuted vigorously, becaused they believed the Dominion as a whole would benefit by it. He invited Parliament to hold its next session at Victoria where they would be treated hospitably and have their ideas enlarged. The same propositions, in effect, which he offered last year to Parliament and for which he received but five votes, were now submitted by the Government, and he felt that he had every reason to be satisfied with the course he had pursued on that occasion. He was proceeding to discuss the question at more length when at the suggestion of several members, he agreed to yield the floor, and allow the item to be passed on the understanding that the fullest liberty of discussion would be allowed on concurrence.

The item was then passed, and the committee rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned at 2 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 8th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

PETITION OF J. B. FRASER & CO.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved that the petition of J. B. FRASER & Co., be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts, and that the petitioners be heard by themselves, their counsel, agents and witnesses upon their petition.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said there was a notice of this motion upon the Order Paper, and it should take its turn.

Mr. DOMVILLE said this was the first convenient moment since the presentation of the petition for making this motion, and as it was a case of urgency, he hoped the motion would be allowed to be put now.

Mr. SPEAKER—The question of urgency might have been raised on Friday when the petition was received.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD observed that the committee were sitting from to-day, and if the House was willing that the petitioners should be heard by counsel, it was important that permission should be granted without delay.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said his hon. friend would remember that there was another order specially fixed for to-day, and it would not be fair to allow it to stand over in order that the House might take up this motion out of its order, especially as it was a motion which would give rise to a long debate. He therefore objected to the consideration of this motion now.

The motion was ruled out of order.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT introduced Bill respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. WOOD asked if the Bill was confined to the Civil Service at Ottawa, or did it apply to the outside service also.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the Bill was intended to deal with the Civil Service at headquarters only. Officers of the outside service would be dealt with departmentally. A considerable number of increases of salaries had been made in the outside service already, particularly in the Customs Department. He would not say that all the cases had been fully considered, but they were being considered, and each case would be dealt with upon its merits by the department.

Bill read a first time.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

The following Private and Local Bills, passed through Committee of the Whole, were read a third time and passed :—

Mr. MOSS—To change the name of the Imperial Building, Savings and Investment Company to that of the Imperial Loan and Investment Company.

Mr. CAMERON (South Ontario)—To amend the Act incorporating the London and Canada Bank, and change the name to "The Bank of the United Provinces."

Mr. BABY—To incorporate the Industrial Life Insurance Company.

Mr. FRECHETTE—To incorporate La Banque St. Jean Baptiste.

THE LEPINE COMMUTATION.

Mr. SPEAKER read a message from HIS EXCELLENCY transmitting copies of further correspondence which has taken place with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, relating to the commutation of the sentence of death passed on AMBROISE LEPINE for the murder of THOMAS SCOTT at Fort Garry.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps or proceedings, in so far as regards the privileges of this House, against such witnesses as are reported by the Election Judges or Election Courts as having been guilty of corrupt practices, or otherwise, at the elections held for the present Parliament ; and if so, when, and in what manner?

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER—I have to inform the hon. gentleman that the election law of 1874 provides that suits against such offences ought to be taken within twelve months. I believe that the twelve months have now expired in most cases, but I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to several clauses of the Election Act providing specially for the punishment of those cases by the judges when trying the elections. I believe that if these provisions had been complied with they were quite sufficient to meet the case mentiontioned by the hon. gentleman. I refer him to the clauses giving the Judge the power during the trial to summon to appear before him any elector or officer who has been proved or against whom evidence has been given of having committed any offence under the Act, the power to try him summarily. If this had been complied with, it would have been sufficient.

Mr. CASGRAIN—There is one part of the question which the hon. gentleman has not answered ; I mean in so far as the privileges of this House are concerned.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER—The House has divested itself of all control in such cases, leaving it to the Judges to deal with them.

PENSIONS TO VETERANS.

Mr. STEPHENSON inquired as to the modus operandi necessary to enable veterans entitled to pensions for military services rendered, to obtain such pensions from the Canadian Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The mere mode of obtaining the pensions will, of course, be contained in the regulations to be adopted and published in the Gazette as soon as the money is at the disposal of the Government.

ALLOWANCES TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. GREENWAY asked whether, in view of the recent great reductions in postage rates, it is the intention of the Government to increase the allowances to postmasters?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—It is not the intention to increase the salaries of postmasters ; but the amount to be paid to them will not be less than now in consequence of the reduction on newspaper postage.

ORDNANCE LANDS AT FREDERICTON.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked whether the Government have sold any portion of the Ordnance Lands in Fredericton fronting on the river in the centre of the city to Messrs BURPEE & TEMPLE or other parties. If so, what quantity of land; also price paid or to be paid for same and terms?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government have not sold any of these lands. Application was made by the railway company owning the line from the junction to the city for a portion of those lands. Lieut.-Colonel MONSELL, Deputy Adjutant General, was requested to value these lands. He valued the portion applied for at $6,000. Subsequent information led the Government to believe that the lands were worth more, and no sale was carried out. If sold now, it will be by public auction.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. PALMER asked whether it is the intention of the Government to take any and what measures to secure to Canada at as early a day as possible the amount of compensation to which she is entitled by the 22nd Article of the Treaty of Washington?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government have already taken the necessary steps to have an arbitration brought on as speedily as possible.

NEW BRUNSWICK SCHOOL LAW.

Mr. COSTIGAN said that, before placing in the hands of Mr. SPEAKER the motion which he intended to move in reference to the New Brunswick School Law, and on which he would ask the House to vote, he desired to offer some remarks to explain why he expected hon. members would vote in favor of the proposition which he would submit. He believed if he was justified in 1872 in moving a resolution on this subject, and raising a discussion thereon, there was greater reason for action at the present time; if he believed he had a right to claim the sympathy and assistance of the Dominion Parliament at that time on this question, hon. members must admit that the necessity for their aid existed to a greater extent to-day. At the risk of being thought somewhat tedious, he felt called upon to thoroughly discuss the question, because he felt he would not be discharging his duty if he did not repeat any important matters that had occurred in previous debates for the information of hon. members who were absent during previous discussions. In order that the House might thoroughly understand the position which the minority of the people of New Brunswick occupied he called attention to the fact that for many years previous to 1858 they enjoyed to all intents and purposes a system of separate denominational schools. In 1858 when the question came up for legislation and the new law was to be framed; the different sentiments of the people were laid before the Legislature by petition. Upwards of one hundred petitions were submitted, of which five sixths asked that the privelege enjoyed by the Catholic population of maintaining separate schools might be respected in any future legislation. A few petitions were placed before the Legislature asking that no principle of Sectarian Education should be recognized, while other gentlemen, including some clergymen, prayed that no public grant of money should be given to any school in New Brunswick in which the Bible was not read daily. The Act of 1858—in the only section that applied to this case—was one which related to the duties of teachers. The section is as follows:—

"Every teacher shall take diligent care, and exert his best endeavors to impress on the minds of the children committed to his care, the principles of Christianity, morality and justice, and a sacred regard to truth and honesty, love of their country, loyalty, humanity and a universal benevolence, sobriety, industry and frugality, chastity, moderation and temperance, order and cleanliness, and all other virtues which are the ornaments of human society; but, no pupil shall be required to read or study in or from any religious book, or join in any act of devotion objected to by his parents or guardians; and the Board of Education shall, by regulation, secure to all children whose parents or guardians do not object to it, the reading of the Bible in parish schools—and the Bible, when read in parish schools by Roman Catholic children shall, if required by their parents or guardians, be the Douay version, without note or comment."

It was true that hon. members might arrive at different conclusions as to the true meaning of this section. The hon. member for South Bruce in his speech in 1872 seemed to be forcibly struck by the wording of this Act, for he said:—

"He had considered from time to time since the early discussion of the subject the very difficult question of the proper interpretation of the Act with reference to the state of the law existing in New Brunswick on the subject of schools, and he was quite free to confess that, upon that subject, his opinion had fluctuated, and any opinion he might then give would be given with much doubt and reservation. There was much to support in the argument put forth by the Minister of Justice in his Minute of Council. It was a conclusion at which the hon. gentleman might well have arrived, and might possibly be a correct one; but he would point out a few circumstances in connection with the Act which would lead to a different conclusion. He quoted from the British North America and School Acts of New Brunswick, and endeavored to show that, although the system of denominational schools was not actually established by law, still denominational teaching in the public schools was practically acknowledged, and deeply regretted the course pursued by the Legislature of New Brunswick in inserting in the new school Act a clause providing that every school under that Act shall be non-sectarian. That clause must have been inserted for a purpose and with an object. He understood that there were large sections of New Brunswick where the people were exclusively Roman Catholics, and the elasticity of the old law allowed those communities to conduct their schools according to their own views. The change in the law, as it operated upon the Roman Catholics was a harsh change and was not necessary to satisfy the scruples of Protestants."

A perusal of the amendments showed that there was one point clear, that religious instruction was provided for under the law of 1858. If no religious instruction was intended to be given in the schools, why should protection to the minority of all denominations, of the Baptist and Methodist minorities, as well as the Catholic minority, have been embodied in the Act. It was a law framed to meet the wishes of a mixed population, and it protected the minorities by providing that the children of the parents who constituted either a Catholic or Protestant minority should not be compelled to read from or study any book to which their parents took objection. The law was the result of the agitation through New Brunswick. Although a certain portion of the people urged the adoption of an unsectarian system on the Legislature, the majority were in favor of continuing the mixed system which recognized denominational teaching under the old law, and the petitions which were sent in exercised such an influence on the Legislature that they respected the rights that existed previous to 1858, and when the Legislature enacted the law of 1858 it continued the system which had existed for many years in New Brunswick. It was clear, therefore, to his mind, that the denominational system of New Brunswick existed not only up to 1858 but was continued by the Act of 1858 to 1871. In 1871 a law was passed which deprived the minority of the rights which they possessed under former laws. It was not to be wondered at that such a change took place. Many of the hon. gentlemen who conducted the Government of New Brunswick prior to Confederation were after that Act sent to represent the people in this Parliament. While they were at the head of affairs in New Brunswick no such law as that of 1871 could have passed, because those were men of ability, men of long experience, and had due regard for the interests of their country, and were, moreover, men who would not use a question of this sort to make of it political capital for themselves. After confederation, the places of these men were filled for the most part by young men of little experience, and who were unfortunately unable to retain power in their hands in any other way than by exciting the worst feelings of the people of New Brunswick by agitating this question and making political capital out of it, thus destroying the harmony which had existed previously. He repeated that the law of 1871 was passed amidst the strong remonstrances of the people of that Province. After it became law, and before the time for advising its disallowance had expired, petitions were sent from New Brunswick to the Dominion Government asking them to secure its disallowance. Hon. members of this House would remember that no answer to these petitions was given until within a few days before the meeting of Parliament in 1872. During that session of Parliament the question was brought before this House by himself. He moved a resolution setting forth that it was the duty of the Government of the day to disallow the School Act of 1871. He, of course, believed that it was competent for this House to vote in favor of that resolutton, and if it had been carried. and the law had been disallowed, the Local Legislature would have been compelled to change their policy with regard to denominational matters. It would be remembered that when that motion was first brought up the Government of the day seemed to think that it would have embarrassed them seriously, and that it was only brought forward in order to secure discussion and an expression of opinion from the House. It, however, soon became evident that there was a strong feeling of sympathy in the House in favor of the minority in New Brunswick—in fact hon. members from Ontario and Quebec could not well help feeling such sympathy because the minority of New Brunswick only asked for the same rights and privileges which had been granted to the minority in those two Provinces. He did not desire to throw any blame upon the late Government, or upon the present Government, or indeed upon any individual member of this House. He would do his best to deal with this matter independently of any political feeling or bias, and if it became necessary for him in the interests of the people affected by this resolution to repeat facts that might be displeasing to hon. members, he hoped they would not accuse him of doing so with with any intention of giving offence. When the Government of the day became aware that there was a strong sympathy in the House in favor of the disallowance of the School Act of 1871, an amendment was proposed by an hon. member—Mr. CHAUVEAU— to the effect that an interpretation should be given to the Constitution in the sense which was believed to be intended at the time of Confederation, securing to the Catholics of New Brunswick those rights and privileges which they then enjoyed. At that time the period during which the Act could have been disallowed had not expired although it had nearly so, and when the Government of the day led him and his friends who were interested in the question to believe that they offered this amendment as a kind of compromise, he certainly for one was disposed to accept it if it could be carried. However, he found afterwards that the Government for some reason or other had abandoned that ground, and sought some other means for defeating his motion, for that was the real truth of the matter; and therefore another amendment was proposed by the hon. member for Stanstead. As soon as he found that the CHAUVEAU amendment was abandoned by the Government, and not likely to be carried, he fell back upon his original motion, and was determined to vote for it if he should vote alone. However, the amendment of of the member for Stanstead was carried. That amendment showed the amount of sympathy that existed in this House at that time in favor of something being done to remove the difficulties under which the minority in New Brunswick were laboring. It had been argued since, that that amendment showed that the House did not wish to interfere, but merely suggested a remedy to the New Brunswick Legislature. At that time he and several other members stated that it would be useless to adopt the motion of the hon. member for Stanstead, because there was no reason to suppose it would be carried out, and he did not believe in the consistency of those who supported it. Because if the proposition was correct that this House could not, out of regard for the rights of the Local Legislature, advise the disallowance of the Act, nor ask for an amendment of the Constitution in order that the Act might be amended, then it was clear that the House should not have passed the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead, because it was virtually a vote of censure upon the New Brunswick Legislature. He voted against that amendment, and in favor of the amendment of Mr. DORION, which was most in accord with his own motion. The amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead was carried, but it produced no results, there was one feature of the operation of the school Act which it might be well to mention. There were some districts in New Brunswick that formerly opposed the law that now favored it, and for this reason: Under the law a tax of 30 cents. per head of the whole population for a county fund was levied by the simple operation of the law without the people having any voice in the matter. The result was that in districts where the Catholics were in a majority and consequently only a few schools were established under the law, the county tax was sufficient to support those schools without any district tax. Therefore in such districts many Protestants who were formerly opposed to the law had became converts to it from the fact that they had their schools supported without any district tax, the minority being obliged to pay the 30 cents. a head county tax although they did not use the schools. In 1873 another attempt was made in this House to have the question settled. He then moved a resolution praying that the Acts passed in amendment to the Act of 1871 be disallowed That resolution was carried by a large majority. The Acts to which that resolution related amended the law of 1871, by giving the Educational Board greater powers than they had before, and by legalizing certain assessments which had been declared illegal by the Supreme Court of the Province. A large majority of this House, as he had already stated, voted for his resolution in 1873, and it was that fact which encouraged him to ask the support of the House to the proposition he was about to submit to it. At that time the House was asked to advise the disallowance of an Act of the New Brunswick Legislature, which they had a right under the constitution to pass, except so far as regarded the doubts that had been raised by hon. members on both sides of this House. But so strong was the desire of this majority of this House to have this question settled that they voted in favor of disallowing that Act. Now, he took it that there was no difference between the disallowonce of the amendment, and that of the original Act. If this House had a right to advise the disallowance of the amendment, surely they had a right to advise the disallowance of the original Act. The House in 1873 affirmed the principle that they had a right to advise the disallowance of an amendment to the School Act, and therefore they could certainly have no objection to the proposition he was now about to make, that an address be presented to HER MAJESTY praying that the constitution may be so amended as to secure the rights for the minority of New Brunswick, that the minority of Ontario and Quebec enjoy. It was not a violation of the constitution that he asked; it was not after all any great change in the constitution, because he believed there were few hon. members who would argue that by the Act of 1871 the minority of New Brunswick had not been deprived of rights and privileges that they enjoyed by virtue of the law prior to confederation. Therefore, he thought the proposition he was now going to make ought to be more acceptable to the House than the proposition he had formerly made in favor of the disallowance of a local Act. There was another consideration which he thought would have great weight with some members, particularly the hon. member of Quebec Centre. That hon. member would agree with him that the proposition he was now making was the only means of securing a remedy to the minority of New Brunswick, that was now within the reach of this Parliament. In 1873, the majority of this House agreed to his resolution asking that the Act amending the the School Act be disallowed, but the Government of the day refused to carry out the expressed wishes of the House. It would be remembered that a good deal of excitement arose when this became known, and he was prepared to take further means through the House as far as he could to compel the Government to carry out the wishes of the House. It had been assigned that a great mistake was made at that time, that the minority of New Brunswick lost the best opportunity that might ever occur of settling the matter. Some hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Quebec Centre, thought that if the late Government had been defeated on that question, any succeeding Government would have been obliged to settle this question. Suppose for argument's sake that that position was correct. Suppose that the Government had been defeated and that the hon. gentlemen now forming the Government had come into power under these circumstances, they would, according to the argument of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, have been obliged to find some settlement of this question. Well, there was then no other way in which this question could be settled, the time for disallowance having expired, except by the very proposition which he was now submitting to the House. If it was right then, it must be right under the present circumstances. The mere fact that it became part of the Government policy did not effect its constitutionality. If the Government had a right under any circumstances to ask for an amendment to the constitution any individual member of the House had an equal right to make the same proposition. This question had given rise to ill-feeling and a great deal of excitement and disorder in New Brunswick, which must be regretted by the people of that Province. Every hon. gentleman in this House would agree with him that if possible an end should be put to those troubles. While they continued, the peace of this Dominion could not be said to be complete. The Catholics of New Brunswick only asked for the same rights that the minorities in Ontario and Quebec have, and they felt it was unjust to refuse their request. They felt also that this Parliament had the power to remedy the inconveniences of which they complained. The only question was whether this House would believe that there was a necessity for asking for an amendment to the Constitution. The amendment to the Constitution with reference to better terms to Nova Scotia was, however, a much greater change than this would be, yet he expected the hon. gentlemen from that Province would be amongst the strongest opponents of the resolution before the House. When Nova Scotia came into the Confederation, her people were dissatisfied with the financial arrangement, and they sought at the hands of this House better terms. The Act of Confederation declared that out of the revenues of this country, each Province was to receive a certain fixed sum. Some hon. gentleman might say it was only fixed so far as declaring the minimum amount which each Province should receive, but one dollar additional could not have been appropriated for the benefit of Nova Scotia without taking it from the pockets of the other Provinces. The argument used for this change of the Constitution was that it was in the interests of the country. It was urged that the union of the Provinces was not a bargain where one should get the better of the others. In accordance with these principles and arguments, this Parliament did increase the subsidy to Nova Scotia, in spite of the opposition of members from other Provinces, and particularly of Ontario. That was not the only alteration of the Constitution. It had been changed with regard to the great principle of representation by population. If there was any principle upon which this House, as a body, should agree, it was this, and it must be a strong reason that should influence it to change the Constitution in this respect. He did not say that there was not good reason for that change. He believed the Constitution was not a cast-iron one which could never be altered. He did not believe the country was bound to suffer any inconvenience that might arise from it which could be remedied. If a case could only be made out that the interests of this country demanded an amendment of the constitution, he was satisfied that this House would make that change. This, he thought, would disarm in a great measure those who were disposed to oppose this motion on that ground. But, hon. gentlemen might say that while they sympathised with the minority in New Brunswick, they could not over-ride the rights of that Province. He would like to be satisfied as to the consistency of hon. gentlemen who took that view. A few nights ago this House was asked to vote for a proposition to alter the Constitution of the Senate. The Confederation Act guaranteed the smaller Provinces a certain representation larger than they possibly could get if represented according to population. Here was a right that the smaller Provinces must regard as equally important with the question of education. A motion was made to remove that safeguard from the constitution. In the vote which took place on it, the Province of New Brunswick voted unanimously against the change, yet it did not stay the action of this House. The House did not say "until we have the consent of that Province to the amendment we can proceed no further." Hon. gentlemen who favored the amendment contended that it was in the interests of the country, and did not allow the opposition of New Brunswick to influence them. In the face of the fact that the constitution had already been changed to suit the interests or feelings of a majority in this House, the only question now to be considered was whether the proposed change was necessary. If it were held by a majority in this House to be unnecessary, he could understand why they should vote down his resolution. He hoped to see it supported by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and he would be very much surprised if the Government of the day should take any strong ground against it. He did not expect them to use their influence in support of the motion; all he wished was that the House might be allowed to pass freely and independently upon it. It was time that this question should be settled. Some newspapers spoke of it as a little matter, but he thought the views of over 90,000 people, who formed over one-third of the whole population of New Brunswick, ought to have some weight in this Legislature on a question affecting their religious rights and privileges. This House would be studying the best interests of that Province by adopting this resolution. If the change were made, he predicted that before three years the people of New Brunswick would acknowledge they owed a debt of gratitude to the Dominion Parliament for having relieved them of this vexed question. The great majority of the people did not desire to see this state of things continued. They had no desire to persecute or ill-treat the minority in the Province. That was not the true characteristic of the people. It was only when aroused and led on by political leaders for political purposes, when their worst passions were excited, that they became illiberal. They were just as liberal in their views as the people of Ontario or New Brunswick. The trouble arose from the fact that the people who held power in the Local Legislature maintained their positions solely because they had produced this state of excitement in the Province. The press had condemned that Government long ago, and given as their only reason for supporting, what they recognize as a corrupt administration, their determination to maintain this free-school system. All sorts of reports and arguments had been circulated to keep the people from viewing this question in a calm dispassionate manner. In 1871, hon. members from New Brunswick assured this House that if any wrong were done the minority in that Province by the school Act, the local authorities would so amend it as to do justice to all classes. The same assurances had been given time andagain, but the Act remained unchanged. If hon. members representing New Brunswick in this House—the hon. Minister of Marine, the hon. Minister of Customs, and those who followed them — had followed the proper course, he was firmly convinced this question would have been settled before now. He made no charge against them for not having made it a part of their policy to have it settled. They were not responsible for the passage of the Act; still, if they had used their influence against it, the minority in the Province would not now be suffering this great injustice. Every means had been exhausted to secure justice for the Catholic minority. They had appealed to the Local Legislature, they had tested the constitutionality of the law, they had renewed their petitions from time to time in the Local Legislature without success. Even last session the leader of the Government stated that although an amendment would be made to the law to make it more acceptable to the people, it would not be changed to meet the wishes of the Catholic minority. The Catholics of New Brunswick had nothing to expect from that Legislature, so long at least as the men who governed the Province to-day remained in power, and they were resorting now to what he believed to be the only means by which they might expect redress. He did feel, and he would continue to feel whatever the result of this vote, that if an amendment of the constitution were asked by different persons and under different circumstances, the request would be complied with. He had experience enough in politics to know that votes were as a rule more powerful than principles. He did not mean this as a reflection upon the present Government, for he knew that it applied with equal force to the late Administration. He believed if fifteen of his colleagues from New Brunswick united with him in asking for this change, no matter which party had been in power, it would have been granted them. It was difficult perhaps for a Government to accept and give force to the views of a minority, no matter how just those views might be, if the result were, as it would be in this case, to make themselves five times as many political enemies as it would make them friends. He had carefully avoided making any allusion to the occurrences at Caraquet, because he thought no good could accrue from a discussion of the subject. He hoped that other hon. members would adopt the same course. This case was before the courts, where the whole truth would be elicited, but all that could properly be said of it in the meantime was that it was a great pity it had happened. The Catholics in New Brunswick occupied a very unpleasant position—a position inferior to that they occupied in any other Province of the Dominion. A law was imposed upon them, and because it was based upon what were called broad principles—principles which ignored religious differences and conscientious convictions they were expected to lean to it without protest. In the matter of administering oaths, regard was paid to the conscientious scruples of the Quakers. They were not obliged to take an oath; they were simply permitted to go into court and give their affirmation; neither were they compelled to perform military service. A large sum of money had recently been voted for the purpose of inducing to come into this country a class of emigrants, who, it was well-known would take no part in the defence of the country if that were even necessary. This all went to prove that the House recognized the policy of dealing with those different religious scruples and convictions and of respecting them. Indeed, to recognize the existence of religious differences and to act upon that recognition was the true means of avoiding the complications to which they sometimes led. The very attempt to crush out such differences had the effect of creating a feeling of injustice, oppression, and tyrannical dealing, and of provoking resistance. He called the attention of the House to the remarks of the editor of the St. John Globe, a gentleman who knew both sides of the subject well, and would, he believed, be disposed to do justice to both parties to the controversy. The remarks which were made in connection with the occurrences at Caraquet, were as follows :—

"If the Catholic people had set themselves against all education ; if they were avowedly determined to remain in ignorance ; if they did not make as many personal sacrifices as Protestants in the interests of education, there would have been some justifiable reason for the way in which it has been sought to compel them to the adoption of the law. But the truth is that before this law was enacted at all, their educational institutions were of the very best kind, and were doing excellent work. They had in the city of St. John the best common schools in existence, they had superior schools of a high class, and in other parts of the Province they had educational establishments which were a credit to themselves and reflected honor upon the Province. Further, the class of young men going out from all of these schools were good, honest and industrious citizens, capable and intelligent. So that the Catholic objection to this law—be it reasonable or unreasonable—is not an objection to education itself, and therefore ought to have been met in a better spirit than it has been."

Even the St. John Globe, which had formerly been opposed to a change in the Constitution, had now come to admit that it was necessary for this Parliament to interfere—that the feelings of the majority should not be consulted to such an extreme length. He (Mr. COSTIGAN) regretted very much that the minority of New Brunswick relied upon his unaided efforts to bring this matter before the House. He expected at one time, when the Liberal party came into power, that the question, should it be necessary to bring it up again, would be satisfactorily solved. Such at least were the promises and professions of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and such the expectations of the Catholic population of this country. They had, at the last election, supported the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite on the principle that they were supporting a party and a Government disposed to do them justice. He (Mr. COSTIGAN) believed that the Liberal party in Ontario succeeded in gaining many constituencies where the Catholic vote was of considerable weight, as a direct result of the vote on the New Brunswick school question in 1872 ; and, on the other hand, the Conservative candidates, in many constituencies in Quebec, were defeated, not because they did not vote properly, but because they supported a Government which had opposed his (Mr. COSTIGAN'S) motion in 1872. There could therefore be no doubt that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government were expected to pursue, upon the Treasury Benches and behind them, that liberal policy which they had advocated upon the Opposition side of the House, and he hoped that the majority of them would support him upon this occasion. He concluded by moving the following resolutions :—

"That an humble address be presented to HER MAJESTY, representing that it is essential to the peace and prosperity of the Dominion of Canada that the several religions therein prevailing should be followed in perfect harmony by those professing them, in accord with each other ; and that every law passed by this Parliament, or by the Local Legislatures, disregarding the rights and usages tolerated by any one of such religions, is of a nature to destroy that harmony. That the Local Legislature of New Brunswick, in 1871, adopted a law respecting common schools, forbidding the imparting of any religious education to pupils ; and that that prohibition is opposed to the sentiments of the entire population of the Dominion in general, and to the religious convictions of the Roman Catholic population in particular ; that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick cannot conscientiously send their children to schools established under such law, and are nevertheless compelled, like the remainder of the population, to pay taxes to be devoted to the maintenance of such schools ; that the said law is unjust, and contrary to the spirit of the the Constitution, and causes much uneasiness among the Roman Catholic population disseminated throughout the whole Dominion of Canada, and that such a state of affairs, if continued, is likely to prove the cause of disastrous results to all the Confederated Provinces ; and praying that HER MAJESTY will be pleased to cause an Act to be passed amending 'The British North American Act,' by providing that the Roman Catholic inhabitants of New Brunswick, who are in a minority in that Province, shall have the same rights, privileges and advantages with respect to separate or dissential schools, and the same exemptions from taxation for the support of public or common schools as are now respectively enjoyed and possessed by the Roman Catholic minority of Ontario, and the Protestant minority of Quebec."

Mr. APPLEBY said he had hoped that the New Brunswick School Law had been before Parliament for the last time. Considering the popular and judicial decisions thereon, affirming both the wisdom and constitutionality of the Act, we had every reason to believe that the subject would not again be introduced, and that the time of this House would not be taken up with the consideration of a question that could not possibly come within the scope of its legislative powers, and for other reasons which he need not specify, he had hoped the subject would not again be introduced here. The hon. member must know that he would gain nothing by the course he was pursuing ; his attempt to destroy the constitution of this country would meet with disaster in this House, and he regretted that the hon. member should have been led to adopt a course, the only result of which would be to engender bad feelings which were more easily aroused than allayed. However, as the hon. member had resolved to proceed with his motion, he must not be offended at the remarks of himself and other members. He called the attention of the House to the wording of that remarkable resolution. In the first section they were brought face to face with the old doctrine of union of Church and State, that old doctrine which, if he read correctly the signs of the times, was doomed to destruction in the old world, and which he had hoped would not gain a firm foot-hold in the new. The spirit of dis-establishment was abroad in the old country, and he regretted that Mr. GLADSTONE, the first statesman of the day, had not remained in power sufficiently long to dis-establish every ecclesiastical establishment in the British Isles. Now, while that spirit was abroad in the Old Country, there appeared to be an attempt made here not only to set up a Church supported by the State, but to set up a Church above the State. That Church dared to tell them that Parliament was not omnipotent, but that its legislation should be with the permission of the Church. If the resolutions now before the House did not mean that they meant nothing. If these resolutions were adopted the Court of Appeal, which was about to be established, would be fully engaged in inquiring into the doctrines and dogmas of the various denominations throughout the country. He submitted to hon. members of this House, irrespective of creed and nationality, whether they were prepared to say that Parliament must not legislate in a certain direction, unless it has obtained the consent of some church or denomination. To the statements contained in the second paragraph of the resolution, he gave a full contradiction. The Legislature of New Brunswick have passed a law forbidding the imparting of any religious instruction to scholars. The Act provided that all schools shall be non-sectarian. He submitted that sectarianism and religion were not synonymous terms, and the experience of Protestants—he did not refer to the church to which the hon. member belongs—had been that where there was sectarianism, there religion did not prevail to any very great extent. The spirit of the School Act of 1871 did not discourage, but rather encouraged religious education. The fault of the law was that it was not sectarian. It certainly prohibited the teachings of the Roman Catholic or any other Church from being introduced into the schools, and this the hon. member for Victoria, said was opposed to the sentiments of the people of the whole Dominion. This course was in accordance with the sentiments of the people of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and British Columbia, all of which Provinces had unsectarian schools. Furthermore, it was in accordance with the public sentiment of Ontario, and in strict accord with the views of the people of the Dominion, and also in accord with that broader public sentiment which controlled and directed the energies of the more enlightened nations. He denied the next proposition of the hon. member for Victoria—that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick cannot conscientiously send their childrens to schools established under that law. He was informed that the hon. member who championed that cause, had since 1871 sent his own children to a common school; if he had been misinformed, let the hon. gentleman now correct the statement.

Mr. COSTIGAN said he would fully answer the hon. member when he had an opportunity of doing so without interrupting him. He would answer the hon. member when he could do justice to himself as well as to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. APPLEBY said he had been told that the hon. member took advantage of the common schools, and he did not deny it. The hon. gentleman himself had enjoyed the advantage of a very liberal education, and he might now direct his efforts into a better channel than that of agitating the New Brunswick School question. In the County of Victoria, represented by the hon. gentleman the population numbered 11,641, out of which, among those over 21 years, there were 2,201 who cannot read and 2,476 who cannot write, and he should devote his attention to providing his constituency with additional schools. In marked contrast with Victoria, was Queen's County, which with a population of 13,847, only furnished 359 persons over 21 years who cannot read; and in the County of St. John, out of a population of 52,121, there were only 2,410 who cannot read, or about an equal number with those similarly deficient in education in Victoria.

The next clause of the hon. gentleman's resolution was as follows:—

"That the said law is unjust, and con-"trary to the spirit of the Constitution, and "causes much uneasiness among the Roman "Catholic population disseminated through-"out the whole Dominion of of Canada, "and that such a state of affairs, if continued, "is likely to prove the cause of disastrous "results to all the Confederated Provinces."

Not having heard his hon. friend, he did not know what these "disastrous results" were, and would therefore pass over that clause. He came now to the fifth and last clause, which was as follows:

"And praying that HER MAJESTY will be "pleased to cause an Act to be pass-"ed amending 'The British North Ameri-"ca Act,' by providing that the Roman "Catholic inhabitants of New Brunswick, "who are in a minority in that Province, "shall have the same rights, privileges and "advantages with respect to separate or "dissential schools, and the same exemp-"tions from taxation for the support of "public or common schools as are now re-"spectively enjoyed and possessed by the "Roman Catholic minority of Ontario, and "the Protestant minority of Quebec."

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. APPLEBY resumed the debate. He said he did not propose to enter into the merits or demerits of the New Brunswick school law; to do so, would he considered, be impertinent. This Parliament as a Parliament had no right to know anything about the school law of New Brunswick. But he might be permitted to say a few words thereto. He would not insult the intelligence of the House by an argument in favour of free schools—schools for the masses—neither would he attempt an argument to prove that in order to have schools for the masses the State must grant assistance towards their maintenance. Without State assistance the children of the wealthy few would get education, and the children of the masses would remain ignorant. Therefore as the State was required to give assistance towards the maintenance of common schools, it was obvious that all denominations must be treated by it in the same manner, or in other words that the schools must be non-sectarian. Upon this principle the school law of New Brunswick was founded. It had been stated that this law was against the conscientious scruples of the Roman Catholics. He took the liberty of doubting that. In his opinion although he did not wish to say anything harshly—some of the leaders of the Roman Catholics—some of their clergy—were the cause of a great deal of the agitation on this question. Out of 1,100 school teachers in the common schools at New-Brunswick, there were no less than 250 Roman Catholics, and there were upwards of 6,000 Roman Catholic children attending the common schools. He offered this statement as an argument against the assertion that the school law was unpopular among the Roman Catholics. When the House rose at 6 o'clock he was reading the fifth and last paragraph of the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria. He regarded this statement as a most extraordinary one, and how any lover of constitutional rights, and how any lover of liberty and justice could support this resolution, was beyond his comprehension. The mere statement of the proposition itself was its own condemnation. He (Mr. Appleby) might as well attempt to prove that justice was lovely and injustice abominable; that truth was fair and falsehood the opposite as to attempt to prove that this part of the resolution was worthy of condemnation. However, as the hon. gentleman had invited discussion upon it, he would humbly approach it. In the first place it interfered with the constitution of the country. By the British North America Act the question of education was relegated to the several Legislatures. This resolution was directly opposed to that part of the constitution. It was a violation of a solemn agreement. It sought to disturb a great national compact to which the faith of this whole country was pledged. It meant disunion—it meant the destruction of this young empire; it meant revolution, and it might mean something worse. If we were prepared to break up the Constitution in this particular, what would become of the guarantees under the Constitution? What would become of the separate schools of Ontario? What would become of the civil code of Quebec? What might become of the French language in this House, and in the legislation of this country? What would become of the representation of British Columbia? What would become of all our guaranteed rights, if we were to sanction the principle embodied in this resolution? In his argument thus far he had been endeavoring to establish that the passage of this resolution would inflict a serious blow upon the Constitution. But he rested his case upon higher and different grounds. He did not consider that our Local Legislatures derived their rights and powers from the Constitution of the country. It was not disputed that the question of education was delegated to the Local Legislatures. Now, what was the status of the Local Legislatures at the time of Confederation? With the permission of the House, he would read an extract from MILLS' Colonial Constitution, page 32 :—

"The Assemblies have, with concurrence of the Governor and Council, absolute legislative powers, subject to the Crown's power of disallowance. * * When a Legislature, with a representative element has been established, the Imperial right to tax and legislate ceases."

He would lay down this principle that the Local Legislatures of this country, on all subjects which came within their exclusive power, had equally with the Parliament of Canada the quality of omnipotence. Further, he would say that the Local Legislatures forming this Confederation, on subjects within the scope of their power, had equally with this Parliament and with the Imperial Parliament the quality of omnipotence. But, he was told, the Crown had the power of disallowance. So had the Crown the power of veto, which, however, had not been exercised in one hundred years. If the QUEEN of England were to-day unlawfully and arbitrarily to exercise that power, it would be a violation of the constitution of Great Britain; so that any disallowance of the Acts of colonial legislatures other than those interfering with Imperial rights, was a violation of the constitution. Out of a total number of 9,626 statutes passed in the American dependencies, including the British Antilles, between the years 1823, and 1853, there were only 185 disallowed. He asked any hon. gentleman present if ever, in the history of Old Canada since responsible Government was recognized, the Imperial authorities had presumed, on a matter entirely within the control of the Legislature to inquire into the propriety of passing such a law. They merely looked at the Act to see if it interfered with Imperial rights, and if it did not, it immediately received their sanction. Coming into confederation had not, in that respect changed the status and powers of the Local Legislatures. The GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council had the same right of disallowance which formerly the British Crown had, and if he presumed to exercise that right arbitrarily, it would certainly be transgressing the British Constitution. The Local Legislatures did not derive their powers and rights from the Parliament of Canada, and if he had read the British Constitution correctly, and he thought he had, the Legislature of New Brunswick did not derive her rights from any Imperial power, but from the law of nature, that great law "which hath its seat in the bosom of God," and all Acts of Parliament were simply recognitions and affirmations of this great law. Never since the 13th century in England had there been an attempt to strike down a Legislature, a whole people, as was contemplated by the resolution now before the House. And who pressed it upon Parliament? It was in the interests of an ecclesiastical establishment, which drew its inspiration from a foreign power, which, to say the least, was not abreast of the civilization of the day. He was told that the resolution would meet with some support in this House; that some gentlemen would vote for it for the sake of party. Was it possible that for the sake of party the dearest interests of humanity were to be bartered and traded for? He hoped the House would pardon a young member for saying that the atmosphere of the Capital was more highly charged with party than with patriotism. Were the rights of the constitution to be violated and destroyed in such a summary manner? The resolution meant, 1st—in all Legislatures the rights of the church must be consulted; and 2nd, this Parliament at any time it sees fit, for any purpose, and under any circumstances, might ask that the constitution be changed, and that every right of one of the Legislatures of this Dominion be destroyed.

Mr. GORDON said this was a matter which had received his serious consideration. The constituency which he represented was one-fifth Catholic and four-fifths Protestant, and, therefore, fairly represented, in proportion, the minority and majority of the Province. He could, therefore, view the question impartially. There was much in the speech of the hon. member for Carleton, with which he could not agree. From the alleged ignorance of the people of Victoria county, he (Mr. GORDON) drew the conclusion that the tenderness of conscience of the Roman Catholic population prevented them from taking advantage of the common schools. He regretted exceedingly, as a Protestant, that they could not view this educational question as he did, but seeing that it was a matter of conscience, so far as they were concerned, it would be wrong to force them into a position which they could not conscientiously accept. So far as his own constituency (North Ontario) was concerned—and he had yet to learn that the experience of any other county in Ontario differed from it—the Separate Schools' Act had had no bad effect. It had given every satisfaction. The same result would follow its adoption in New Brunswick. In the meantime they were in a position to be tyrannized over. In North Ontario, which he represented, there were only two Separate Schools. It was found that the Roman Catholics did not avail themselves of the Act, owing to the expense attendant upon it. He hoped the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria would carry. He believed it would meet with the warm approval—he said it without hesitation—not only of the Roman Catholics of Ontario, but of the great majority of the Protestants of that Province. He thought it was not their disposition to tyrannize over any minority, neither did they wish to interfere with the majority in New Brunswick. The minority that he had the honor to represent felt very keenly on this subject. They sympathized with their brethren in distress in the Lower Provinces, and he believed he would be speaking that which was contrary not only to the wishes of the minority, but also to the wishes of the majority if he did not express himself in favor of the resolution. He would vote for the amendment to the amendment as against the amendment, and for the motion as against the amendment.

Mr. DEVLIN said he would be wanting in duty to the one million and a half of Roman Catholics in this Dominion if he were to remain silent while 96,000 of them were knocking at the door of this House asking for common justice. He spoke on behalf of 96,000 Catholics who asked the privilege of educating their children according to the dictates of their conscience. It was not in the power of this House to impose any law upon the Catholics of New Brunswick which would exempt them from the exercise of that right—of the obligation to educate their children so that they might learn to know the Almighty God—to love and reverence him. If he were called upon to address this House on behalf of the Protestant majority seeking justice at its hands on a matter of this kind, he would raise his voice louder on their behalf, and insist with all the power and strength he could bring to bear on this subject for that justice which he claimed for the Catholic minority of New Brunswick. He did not know what course the Government intended to purtion. That hon. gentleman took this position. "I wish to see my Catholic fellow-citizens enjoy the same liberty I enjoy;" and he cited Ontario and Quebec as examples of the justice of the law that obtained there, and he asked that the same justice which was meted out to these Provinces be meted out to the Catholics of New Brunswick, and that they be placed on a footing of equality, with the rest of HER MAJESTY'S subjects, they asked no more and he (Mr. DEVLIN) could tell the House sue, but having followed the Reform party for 20 years of his life, in all its trials and difficulties, he had every faith in their liberality and their determination to render impartial justice to all classes and creeds and denominations in this country. The Catholics would resent any legislation which interfered with the observance of the high duties which as Catholics they were required to discharge, and it would be resented not only by them but also by the high and lofty and generous-minded parties who, thank God, were always found to stand by their Catholic brother in the hour of difficulty. He did, therefore, expect as an humble member of the Liberal party that the Government which he and his friends were supporting would recognize the justice of the demand made by the hon. member for Victoria, and would show by their acts that they were Reformers not only in name but in practice, and that wherever they found a law operating unjustly towards any class of HER MAJESTY'S subjects they would with their powerful influence come to their relief, and place them upon an equality with all other classes. He hoped the day had not arrived when the Catholics of this country were to be BISMARCKED. We wanted no BISMARCK in New Brunswick or in this House. We desired to live in harmony, upon terms of equality, doing for each other all we could do to promote the general welfare and prosperity. Objection was taken to this resolution on the ground that it was a violation of the Constitution, and that if it was granted, other Provinces might be seeking remedies for abuses in the same way. But what after all was the Constitution? It was only a piece of human machinery, and when it was found not to work smoothly, when it was found that one part bore unjustly upon a certain class of HER MAJESTY'S subjects, was it not the duty of this House to amend it so as to make it work smoothly. But there was a constitution far above that constitution. There was a higher and holier constitution—a constitution made by the hand of God—and that was the constitution that a Catholic felt it to be his bounden duty first of all to pay his allegiance to. As he stated at the outset that constitution imposed upon Catholic parent the duty of educating his children, and no law could exempt him from that obligation. He saw upon the Notice Paper an amendment to be proposed by the hon member for South Bruce offering that the passage of the resolution now before the House would be a dangerous interference with the constitution. He did trust that that hon. gentleman who stood so deservedly high in the estimation of his Catholic fellow-countrymen, and to whom they looked in the hour of difficulty expecting to find in him a friend and protector, would not throw his great influence in this House against the reasonable demand of ninety-six thousand human souls who appeal to this House from New Brunswick. If he did so it would infuse into the heart of every Catholic in this country a feeling of alarm, a feeling of regret that one standing so deservedly high in the estimation not only of the Protestants, but the Catholics of the Dominion should avail himself of the majority he and the Government could command to reject the humble application made for an act of common justice. He did not desire to follow up this subject further. It was well understood, and he supposed hon. members of the House had all made up their minds to the course they intended to pursue in this matter. The hon. member for Carleton had characterized the speech of the hon. member for Victoria as revolutionary. However, there was not much in the speech of the hon. member for Carleton requiring an answer, and therefore he would pass it over; and as an humble member of this House tender his heartfelt thanks to the hon. member for North Ontario who a Protestant, took a large and liberal view of this whole ques- that if this was refused the Catholics of this country would continue to agitate this question, they would continue to fight every Parliament and every Government that might be brought into existence, and no Government would find place cr rest till justice was done in this matter.

Mr. PICKARD said that although he was opposed to the resolution, he must say that the hon. member for Victoria had introduced in a calm manner and without any excitement. He was not here to represent Catholics or Protestants, but to act and speak for the interests of the whole Dominion irrespective of creed or religion. The hon. member for Montreal Centre had threatened the Government. Were the Government to pause because any religious body—in this instance it happened to be the Roman Catholic—threatened them? They had better go down altogether than pause. He had never, by any act of his, treated anybody with injustice, nor was the School Law of New Brunswick unjust. It threw open the door of every common school to every child, whether Methodist, Presbyterian, Catholic, or whether he belonged to his (Mr. PICKARD's) church, the universal church of the world. The schools were free to every child, and if parents wanted to teach their children religious truth let them do it at home by the mother's knee. To say that a child thus taught was in danger of losing its religious principles when it went out into the world and mixed with others of a different religion, was equivalent to admitting that such a religion was useless. In 1871, when this law was passed, there were 44,872 children attending the public schools, and in 1874 the number had increased to 60,467, showing that obviously a number of Catholic children must be attending the schools, notwithstanding all that had been said about the law being obnoxious to Catholics. Aside from this fact, he knew that the Catholics in the country districts did send their children to the common schools. In 1872, the hon. member for Victoria was willing to sacrifice the interests of the Catholic children of the country, provided he could only get sectarian schools for those in the cities and towns; where as in his (Mr. PICARD's) judgment if any one's interests should be regarded it should be those of the hard-working men of the forest. Within the last three weeks a resolution had been carried in the New Brunswick Legislature, by a vote of 31 to 5, expressing gratification at the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the School Act. These 31 members represented all parts of the Province, and their decision was entitled to the respectful consideration of this House in dealing with this question

Mr. WRIGHT (Ottawa) said he was sure every one regretted the necessity which existed for bringing this matter before the House. This was a very difficult problem, and on a satisfactory solution of it depended much of the future peace and prosperity of this Dominion. The hon. member for Victoria deserved the thanks of the House for the calm, moderate and logical manner in which he placed his case before it; from first to last in the agitation of this question, the hon. gentleman had proceeded in the same temper, and he deserved the congratulations of both sides of the House. The proposition he had placed before the House deserved the most careful consideration. We had but recently commenced a great political experiment. So far in the main we have been sailing in the flood-tide of success, and we have all the elements within our borders for building up a great nationality. But that nationality must be founded deep in the love, reverence and esteem of the people. It should not be founded upon in justice, but upon the eternal principles of right. This was one reason why he would vote for the resolution. He would not argue the constitutional question; it had already been very fully discussed in this House, moreover it had been dealt with by the highest judicial authority in the empire, who had rendered its decision. If that decision was correct, then while the Confederation Act protected the right of the minority in Quebec and Ontario, the rights of the minority in New Brunswick had been shamefully neglected in the framing of that Act. As had been already pointed out, they enjoyed certain rights and privileges up to the time of Confederation, which were taken away from them by the Confederation Act; they would be told that the constitutional difficulty was the real difficulty and the circumstances that we could not by any possibility violate the constitution. But this was not the first time the constitution had been violated,—it had already suffered much violation. When the House voted "better terms" to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, did it not violate the Constitution, and when the motion was adopted by the House the other night to change the mode of constituting a co-ordinate body with themselves, what was that but an attempt to violate the constitution? If ever an attempt was made to destroy the constitution, a determined and decided attempt was surely made the other night. How did the hon. member for Bothwell, who introduced the resolution, criticize the hon. body to which it referred. He told this House that the Senate was an asylum for political prostitutes—that was said boldly and openly in this House. For his part he (Mr. WRIGHT) declared that such an attack upon the hon. the Senate certainly meant an attempted violation of the constitution. He appealed to them especially as representing a county in which there was a large majority of Catholics to adopt the resolution before them. From the liberal Catholics of his constituency he had always received an independent support, and they even supported him against one of their own religion, trusting in his honor that in the hour of their extremity he would do his best to obtain for them justice. From the first he always endeavored to sustain the member for Victoria, and on one occassion he had voted want of confidence in the Government, lead by the hon. member for Kingston, which he (Mr. WRIGHT) had usually supported. He was then told that the course he had pursued would cause him to lose the Protestant support in the county, but he was proud to say that the Protestants thanked him for the action he had taken in supporting so liberal a measure. He especially appealed to his friends representing a Protestant minority in Lower Canada to support the resolution before the House. If ever the time should arrive when the Protestant minority of Quebec were not treated with liberality, to whom should they appeal but to the high Court of Parliament, and that appeal would not be made in vain. Every legal means had been tried, the appeal had been taken to the British Privy Council, which had decided against the Catholic minority. In the hour of their desolation and despair they come to this House asking their fellow-countrymen to grant them justice, and under those circumstances, endorsing as he did every word in the resolution, he felt satisfied that at all events on the part of the Protestant majority in this House the appeal would not be made in vain.

Mr. POWER said that Parliament ought to take some action towards giving relief to the Catholics of New Brunswick, who, it was well known, were cruelly treated in their school matters by the Government of that Province. It would be an act of charity on the part of this House to do this, when we knew that some of the Bishop's effects, the Priest's few necessaries, and the poor man's furniture had been seized and publicly sold to pay a tax which they conscientiously believed to be unjust, and one which they should not be required to pay. Let him give hon. members some idea of the spirit which influenced the Government of New Brunswick in this crusade. We had in the Province of Nova Scotia the same gentleman for Superintendent of Education as he who now fills that position in New Brunswick. Previous to 1867, and when a Conservative Government ruled in Nova Scotia, this Superintendent, being a protege of that Government, made no trouble; nothing was then heard of the necessity for Christian Brothers or Sisters of Charity undergoing a public examination; not a word about the necessity for their putting off their plain and humble distinguishing garb. But no sooner did a Reform Government come into power, by the sweeping result of the elections of that year, than this same superintendent looked on those teachers with different eyes. He then saw that they ought, and should be examined, although he had frequently said in his periodical report and address to the commissioners of schools, that the Christian Brothers, and Sisters of Charity were the only schools in the city into which he could introduce a stranger with any degree of pleasure or satisfaction. It was very generally believed that his object in adopting this course was to make trouble between the Local Government and the Catholics. Be this as it may, his conduct was considered so much out of the way that he was dismissed. He was, however, received after being out of office for some time, with open arms by the New Brunswick Government, and they found him as they believed they would, a willing assistant for their coercive purposes. Was it to the credit of that Government to employ a man who had been dismissed by the Government of the adjoining Province for his mischievous tendencies? And was it not evidence that they contemplated harsh measures towards their Catholic fellow subjects. It may be urged that we ought not to object to send our children to the common schools, and that our objection is to having them associate with those of different religions. This, most certainly, is not the fact. We have no more objection to have our children associate with those of a different denomination, than we have to come here and vote with you for or against any measure that we may believe to be for the benefit or injury of our common country. We believe in the necessity of a religious education, and object to send our children to common schools, for the reason that no religious instruction is given in them. It may be said, and it has been said, that the parents and pastors are the proper persons to impart religious instruction. Supposing it to be so, the parents of children who would frequent common schools, being mostly working men, would feel more disposed for rest, after their day of severe toil, than to give the desirable instruction, even if they were capable of doing so, and a large number of parents are incapable of giving instruction of any kind, while others are careless in such matters. Depend upon it that children restricted to such chances of being religiously instructed will be but very poorly instructed. As to the pastor, even if he can manage to steal a half hour or so from his other arduous Sunday duties, for the purpose of giving religious instruction, it may have some effect, but certainly not so much effect as if half an hour each day at the school was devoted to that purpose. It may be asked, how it is that no complaints are heard from Nova Scotia, where the School Law is pretty much the same as it is in New Brunswick. It is because bigotry is not in the ascendant there; because we have a Local Government that is tolerant; because we have a Legislative body which represent constituencies that, with one or two exceptions, are intelligent and liberal in the true sense of the word, and would not allow their representatives even if disposed to do so, to persecute any body of Christians for conscience sake; and finally because we have a Superintendent of Education who administers the duties of his office in a truly Christian spirit. These are some of the reasons why hon. members do not hear the same cries for protection from the weaker party in Nova Scotia that you do from New Brunswick. With reference to the amendment which had been given notice of by the hon. member for South Bruce, that hon. gentleman, in one of the ablest and most logical speeches ever delivered in this House, proved conclusively that the Catholics of New Brunswick had a fair right to their separate schools; for "as they were in operation and had been, recognized by the Government of that Province previous to the passage of the Confederation Act, and that, although no special provision was made for them in that Act. As all rights and privileges enjoyed by minorities were reserved to them, no other conclusion could be drawn than that the Catholic minority of New Brunswick had a right to separate schools." It has been urged that the Privy Council in England decided against the plaintiffs in this case. But that circumstance does not weaken its equity. If the Catholic minority of New Brunswick were entitled to have their own schools at the time the hon. member for South Bruce gave that as his opinion, (and he was in as good, if not better position to form a correct opinion, as those who considered the question three or four thousand miles away), then they are entitled to have them now. The conduct of the New Brunswick Government has not altered in any way. The Catholics were then treated with severity; they are treated with equal, if not greater severity now; and it is not the Irish portion of the population alone that are thus treated, but the French and Scotch as well; all are treated alike in the disreputable crusade. It has been objected that, as this is a matter which is within the jurisdiction of the Local Government of New Brunswick, any interference in it would involve an alteration of the constitution. Well, even if it should do so, ought that consideration deter hon. members from doing what they believe to be right? They change the constitution in the United States as circumstances render necessary. The motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, the other night, touching the organization of the Senate, and which this House affirmed, involves a change in the Constitution. Changes will have to be made as circumstances require; and can any circumstances arise, by which an amendment of the Constitution would, or could be more justifiable than that which would relieve from oppression a large number of your fellow subjects. The Catholics of New Brunswick now support their own schools, and at the same time are obliged to pay their full share of the tax for the support of other schools, though securing no benefit whatever from them. Is not this hard; and can you blame them for feeling sore in consequence? If it was considered desirable and necessary to provide for the protection of the Catholic minority of Ontario, and the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec, in the Act of Union, was it not equally necessary that the minority of New Brunswick should have been protected. But as they had no friend at hand when that Act was framed, their claims were omitted, and in view of the deplorable results which have followed that omission, even to the shedding of blood, this House would be fully justified in interposing its authority between the oppressed minority of New Brunswick, and their oppressors. The natural boundaries of school districts in the Counties of Halifax and Antigonish divided Catholics and Protestants in such a way as to give to each denomination control of its own schools, with a full share of the general fund for support. It might be supposed that no one would wish to disturb this harmonious state of things, and yet there are some who would do so, among whom are some Ministers of religion, not many happily. Well, those are not the principles inculcated by our Divine Saviour, whose precepts it should be the aim of all to follow. Would any member of this House, wish to see the Menonites for the encouragement of whose immigration the House the other night appropriated $100,000, and whose religious tenets are said to be very peculiar, forced to yield up any one of those tenets. Nay; if the attempt were to be made, hon. members would interfere to prevent it. And are the Catholics of the Dominion to receive, less consideration; and if they have conscientious scrupules in matters connected with the education of their children, the House ought not remain inactive spectators, whilst they are being treated as they are in New Brunswick. In conclusion, he asked the House to act in accordance with the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would wish that they should do unto you," and extend its protection to the Catholic minority of New Brunswick.

Hon. MALCOLM CAMERON said he felt peculiar difficulty in dealing with this question because while all his past history, his feelings and his convictions were, in favor of the object sought to be accomplished by the mover of the resolution, he could not see his way clear to vote for it.

He was one of those who voted for separate schools at their first inception. Hon. members knew that he was driven from Lambton because he supported separate schools, and he did so because he believed no people could prosper and no Government could be satisfactorily carried on where there was even a small majority who felt in their consciences, that they were being trampled upon. He warned his hon. friends from New Brunswick that though they might succeed to-night in voting down the resolution yet feelings of disappointment and sorrow would follow. There never were stronger prejudices created in any country than those aroused in Upper Canada against separate schools. If the people of New Brunswick would examine the past history of Canada they would find that the agitation on this question in Upper Canada resulted in the division of families and churches, and he was gratified to know that hon. members had come to agree with his views that in order to carry out successfully the Government of a country it was necessary to concede certain points when they did not interfere with the consciences and wishes of the majority of the people. He would not sustain the resolution because it asked that the Imperial Parliament should step in and deal with this question, this interfering with the management of the affairs of a Province of this Dominion. He warned hon. gentlemen who, for party or other purposes, on this occasion sought to override the local constitutionals that they were sowing the wind to reap the whirlwind, and their destruction would be caused by that very storm which they were now raising. We had a right to ask the Imperial Government to alter the Federal Constitution, but not alter the Local Constitutions. But who altered the constitution in respect to the Senate as it was originally drawn. Hon. members talked about the Senate as if they were about to touch the Ark of God—that the Senate was a grand institution although its organization was decided upon in a day without the consent of the people. He labored twenty years to get the Senate made a respectable body by making its members elective, and nine-tenths of the people felt that we should return to that system. He did not think that we could have a better system than that of an elective Senate with a long term of office. In the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Vittoria, there was a direct request that the British North America Act should be amended, and the Imperial Parliament was called upon to interfere in the local affairs of that Province. He could not vote for that proposition because he would not submit to it himself, nor would the people of Ontario submit to it. If such a proposition was submitted to the people of Ontario, we should hear much more than at present about Downing street rule three thousand miles away. The people would not submit to the Constitution being altered by any authority except their own. He would submit to the Constitution as it is, and would support any course adopted or taken by Parliament to bring about a change in New Brunswick; but he would not ask the Imperial Government to legislate regarding the local affairs of any Province of this Dominion.

Mr. DEVLIN—Is it not true that the Imperial Parliament has not legislated already on this very question for Ontario and Quebec? (Cries of "No, No!"). You will find the rights of the minority have been guaranted by the Imperial act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Montreal) said that the House should remember that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick, prior to Confederation, enjoyed the right of having separate schools for children whose parents held the Catholic faith. After the Province had entered into Confederation those Roman Catholics were deprived of that privilege. At a later period the Roman Catholic minority appealed to Parliament to remove the injustice under which they considered they suffered. Let the House consider the facts, and let hon. members place themselves in imagination in the position of the New Brunswick Roman Catholics, and feel as they did on the subject of religious education; it would be a little difficult for some Protestants to do so, but they could accomplish it with a little effort. Well, Roman Catholics felt that unless religious instruction was given in the day schools, their children were being brought up in imminent peril of eternal perdition. They did not have Sunday schools connected with all the churches, as was the case with Protestants, but the children obtained their religious education during the week from teachers in whom the priests had confidence. Assuming that the schools in

New Brunswick were in the common sense of the term common schools, and managed as prudently, and possessing all the safe-guards which any lover of justice could wish, what confidence could the Roman Catholics, holding those views, have that no teacher of those schools would influence the minds of the pupils in regard to religious matters. Might not the minds of the pupils also be influenced by the text-books or possible companions met with at the schools. Again, the absence of religious teaching was the main point to which Catholics decidedly objected. Now, he appealed to any member of this House if it was possible for any Catholic or Protestant teacher to give this teaching in such a way that he would not impart into it some sectarian element that would be dangerous in the view of some of the different branches of the Christian Church. It had been said that if this resolution was carried it would encourage the Imperial Parliament to interfere with our politics and our constitution; but there was no danger from that source from the fact that the Imperial Parliament would never undertake to change our constitution without the request of this House. This House would always have to initiate any change. He was glad that so little of the proverbial odium theologicum, so little of sectional feeling had been imparted into this debate, and he was also glad that it had not drifted, as at one time he feared it would into a mere discussion as to whether non-sectarian schools were better than separate schools. They were not discussing that question upon this occasion. What the House was called upon to consider was whether the minority of the Province of New Brunswick should not possess the same privileges which the minority in the Province of Ontario and the minority in the Province of Quebec now enjoyed,—privileges which the Catholics of New Brunswick possessed before Confederation, and which they desired should be restored to them. If hon. gentlemen were determined to do what was right, if they wished to base their action upon reason and conscience, they would concede the point asked for in Mr. BABY'S amendment and Mr. COSTIGAN'S motion.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) agreed with the hon. member for Montreal West that the absence of religious acrimony was a very desirable feature of the discussion, and the sentiment contrasted very strangely with some of the remarks of the hon. member for North Ontario. The member for Victoria admitted in his speech that the people of New Brunswick were as enlightened, as intelligent, as willing to do justice to all their fellow-citizens as any people in the Dominion of Canada, and he (Mr. BURPEE) desired that hon. gentlemen less informed on the subject, should not be so forward to express their opinions, and not so ready to conjure up their obnoxious pictures of the state of things in that Province. He thanked the hon. member for Victoria for the justice he had done his fellow-citizens of the Province of New Brunswick, and he assured him that the sentiment would be appreciated. The question before the House was not whether it was best to have separate schools, or whether it was best to have free schools. That, he thought, admitted of no doubt. He did not think this was the place to discuss it. It was exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature to pass upon the question, and as a humble member from the Province of New Brunswick, he most earnestly protested against this Parliament interfering with matters not pertinent to their jurisdiction. He would not say that such interference would be impertinent to the Legislature of New Brunswick, but he would say that the attempt to interfere was very bad policy, and had an entirely opposite effect from that intended by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution. If there was any one thing more than another which had hindered the people of that Province from arriving at a solution of this difficulty; it was the extreme views urged upon them. First, this Legislature interfered when it had no right, and then there were gentlemen from an adjoining Province imprudently interfering with what was beyond their concern. This naturally excited opposition in the minds of the majority of the people of New Brunswick, and prevented them from viewing the matter as dispassionately as they otherwise would have done. If the leaders of the Roman Catholics in New Brunswick, and the exponents of their views in this House, and in the Province of Quebec, had been more moderate in their tone, a solution of the question might have been arrived at ere this time. The House of Commons was not the place to discuss the merits and demerits of the School Law; but he was bound to say that the description of the operations of that act by some hon. members was entirely incorrect. It was not the tyrannical law that it was represented to be by some hon. members. There was no such persecution under it as they represented. Under that law there were at present 1,100 teachers, out of whom 250 were Roman Catholics. If this law were as Godless—if it were as oppressive to the Roman Catholics of the Province as some hon. gentlemen said it was, why did those Roman Catholic teachers assist in carrying out what was against the conscience of their church? Was there no restraining power in that church that could prevent these teachers from exercising their functions under the law and encouraging what was called a persecuting spirit? Again, as has been said by an hon, gentleman already, out of about 50,000 children attending the common schools of the Province, 6,000 were Roman Catholics. Since this was the case he submitted that it constitnted another argument against the assertions of those gentlemen who stated that this law was this fact that prevented them from meeting the Roman Catholics in a liberal spirit. So far as he was himself concerned be felt rather indifferent as to what the vote of the House upon this question might be. The majority of the people of New Brunswick stood behind a bulwark impregnable to this House. They stood behind the bulwark of the British North America Act which could not be disturbed except with the consent of the Local Government. The sooner the Province of Quebec left the Province of New Brunswick alone to do its legitimate business without interference, the sooner and the more satisfactorily would this question be decided. He repeated he awaited the verdict of this house with comparative indifference.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) said he had followed the lead of the hon. member for Victoria on a former occasion, and would gladly do so now. He was pleased to see his fellow Protestants from Quebec coming forward to do justice to the minority in New Brunswick. He was somewhat surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Sunbury, that for certain reasons the Legislature of New Brunswick had not met the reasonable wishes of the Roman Catholics of the Province. He did not think the proposition the hon. member deduced therefrom justified the conduct of the Protestant majority of New Brunswick. He (Mr. WRIGHT) approached this subject not for political reasons, but as one of a small minority of Quebec, who, being allowed to educate their children in their own way, were willing to extend the same right to the minority of another Province. He was no advocate of separate schools. He believed that in this new country we should not have secular education. The rising generation should be taught to forget their differences of creed and nationality, but he knew that the same reasons which prevented the formation of a legislative union instead of the existing one, would stand in the way of non-sectarian schools. The Roman Catholics believed that religious education should go hand in hand with secular education. He might choose to say this was prejudice, but it was prejudice so deeply rooted that it should be allowed to have its way. So long as our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects took part with us in the great secular was tyrannical and unjust and a persecution. Both of the hon. members for Montreal had stated that the constitution had been violated by the New Brunswick "Better Terms." He was surprised to hear such statements. He would like to know in what way the constitution had been violated in that respect. For his own part he failed to see it, and humbly offered the opinion that it was not the case. He would observe that this debate should be conducted with moderation. If there was one thing more than another that he would deprecate in this House it was a religious discussion. He protested, however, against the hon. member for Montreal Centre threatening this House that the country would be kept in continual turmoil until this question was settled. It was an attempt to coerce this Legislature in reference to matters over which they had no jurisdiction, and he protested against it as disrespectful and unnecessary. It might be that the law in New Brunswick had not been administered with the same moderation as is had been in Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Halifax had so represented it. He

(Mr. BURPEE) regretted the fact. He was sorry, for the laws it was true were almost similar. Perhaps both parties were to blame that they worked unsatisfactorily in New Brunswick. His own opinion was that the minority was most to blame. Perhaps the law was too rigorously carried out, and perhaps some of its provisions were open to objection. Yet when an offer was made to repeal it by regulation, the Roman Catholics refused to accept the concession, and insisted that the case should be met by an Act of the Assembly. If the Province had consented to this legislation they would have been virtually permitting the jurisdiction to pass out of their own hands into the hands of the Federal Legislation. They had by the constitution no power to amend, and no power to repeal. That section of the constitution he considered a very objectionable one, and the majority of the people in Nova Scotia looked upon it with very great suspicion. They believed it was inserted in the Act after it went to London, and he believed, clandestinely. They therefore very wisely concluded not to be coerced by the minority into making laws that would denude them of their constitutional rights. It work of this Dominion, so long as they were as loyal and worthy members of this community as the Protestants they were bound to be respected even in their prejudices. The effects of their system of education could be seen in the men they sent to this Parliament. He asked whether Quebec had not sent as able men as the representatives from any other part of the Dominion? He hoped that the Protestants of Quebec would unanimously support the resolution.

Mr. GOUDGE felt it his duty to give expression to what he believed to be the popular sentiment of Nova Scotia. Without entering on the merits of the question of separate schools, which was not the subject before the House, he would deal with the constitutional point. The 93rd Section of the British North America Act declared, "In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education." If this House should pass the resolution before it, he felt satisfied the first blow would be struck at the integrity of this Confederation. It was not yet eight years since it was established. The mortar used in the construction of it had hardly become dry, and yet those who assisted in building it were beginning to pull the very foundation stone from beneath it. One of the subjects left to the exclusive control of the Local Legislature under the British North America Act, was education. Their powers were abridged in this respect, that the Provinces in which separate schools were established could not change that system after Confederation, but with that exception they were given exclusive jurisdiction in matters of education. After the decision of the law officers of the Crown in England, he was surprised that hon. gentlemen had the hardihood to come before this Parliament and ask it to interfere with the rights of any one of the Provinces. The hon. member for Victoria, for whom he entered very high respect, had introduced into this House something which might produce consequences he did not anticipate. While the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick might feel this Act bear somewhat hardly upon them, it should be remembered that the object of the Lower Provinces was to establish a free school system that would place all on an equal footing without respect to creed or denomination, in order that they might as far as possible remove the ill-feeling engendered by the former modes of education. The feeling of the people of Nova Scotia was that any attempt made to break down the present school system of New Brunswick was but the entering wedge to destroy their own system of education. That system was working well. In the town in which he lived the children of all denominations met together and no difficulty resulted from it. If this House should decide that it could not and would not interfere with a question coming within the Province of a Local Legislature, they would find that an understanding would be arrived at by the several parties in New Brunswick that would allay the discontent which now existed. If, on the other hand, this resolution should pass, there would be an agitation for a repeal of the union, The feeling that was engendered in Nova Scotia by the manner in which the Province was brought into this union, still, to a certain extent existed. The iron had entered into the souls of the people to such an extent that they had not to this day forgotten it, and if this House should over-ride the constitution as proposed, it would at last have the effect of separating them from the union.

Mr. MILLS agreed with some of the statements made by the hon. member who had introduced this motion. He agreed with the hon. gentleman that the Nova Scotia subsidy did alter, to some extent, the terms and conditions of union. He agreed with the hon. member that the appropriation of revenues of this Dominion to any one Province except as authorized by the Confederation Act was an expenditure for the benefit of that one Province at the expense of the others, and so far as this was done, the compact entered into had been departed from. He agreed, too, with the statement that the principle of representation by population had been violated by the terms and conditions upon which British Columbia and Manitoba were admitted into this Confederation. The hon. member for Kingston assented to that proposition! He (Mr. MILLS) was glad of it, because the late Government had contended that the principle of representation by population referred to the four Provinces which originally formed the Confederation and to no others. The 146th section of the British North America Act showed that the terms were intended to apply to all the Provinces, as well as to the four original members of the Confederation. Under its provisions no terms or conditions could be granted to any Province unless they were consistent with this Act, and the constitution was, therefore, violated by the terms granted to British Columbia and Manitoba, but that was no justification for persisting in that course. He did not admit that the resolution which he (Mr. MILLS) had submitted to this House in reference to the Senate, and in which this House concurred, proposed any alteration of the Confederation Act which could be regarded as an interference with the rights of the Provinces. There was no reason why the provisions of the British North America Act, defining the rights of the Local Legislature should not have formed a separate Act. There would then have been no confusion as to the provisions which affected the Federal Parliament and those which affected the Local Legislature. The proposed change in the mode of constituting the Senate did not limit the authority of the Provinces, or alter the representation of the several Provinces any more than if he had proposed an extension of the franchise or a change in the duration of this Parliament to two years. Such changes would not be considered a violation of the rights of the Provinces, but what the hon. gentleman proposed was quite a different matter. It was a proposition to this House to ask for an amendment of the constitution affecting, not its own powers, but the powers of the Legislature of New Brunswick so that that Province might not be able to do that which it now rightly or wrongly thought in the interest of the public it should do. If he (Mr. MILLS) were in the Legislature of New Brunswick, he would agree with the hon. gentleman. It was unfortunate that the minority in that Province should be placed in the position in which they were. Although he believed in secular education, yet if he found a minority believing in denominational education he would be disposed to give them what they desired. Denominational education was better than none at all. The statement made to-day showed that while the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick formed one-third of the population, only one-ninth of the 50,000 children attending the schools belonged to that creed. That was a very unsatisfactory condition of things, and ought to have great force with the people of New Brunswick. The question should be agitated at the hustings when the parties were seeking election to the Local Legislature. That would be the legitimate course, but when this House was asked to amend the Constitution of New Brunswick in order that something could be accomplished which the majority of the people of New Brunswick were not disposed to do, he thought too much was asked. The hon. member for Victoria said the people of New Brunswick were not fit to legislate, and because they were not, he asked this House to deprive them of the power which they, themselves, were anxious to retain. That would be a very serious violation of the federal compact, and he (Mr. MILLS) did not see where it would end. If Parliament could amend the Constitution of one Province without the approval of its legislature, there was no security whatever for the continuance of the present system, because, he apprehended, any Government might be in straitened circumstances, its existence might depend upon a few votes, and an influential member who might be dissatisfied with what was being done in his own Province might make an amendment to the Constitution the price of his support. In Quebec there were peculiarities in the law relating to property and civil rights. Would the members from that Province be satisfied if this Parliament were to say it was inconvenient that Quebec should have such laws, and should proceed to legislate them away? Would Quebec be satisfied if that were done? There was no question of conscience involved in such a course, there was no serious agitation on the question in Quebec, and yet the Province would be very unwilling to surrender its rights in that respect. She would feel that she had no security for any of her local rights if these were taken away from her without her consent. What right could Quebec put forward for the maintenance of these peculiar provisions that New Brunswick could not for hers. The British North America Act favors the Catholic population. It provides that any Province having separate schools before confederation should have them for all time, and also that any Province not having them at the time of the union, but conceding them at any future time shall concede them as a right which can never be taken away. Did any one believe that Parliamentary Government could be carried on for many years in New Brunswick and the Catholic population fail to carry their point? And if they should once succeed in securing what they desired, they would possess those rights and privileges for all time. All they required to do was to exercise patience and forbearance until the proper time, and their triumph would come. CHARLES LAMB, on one occasion, said "it is an expensive business to burn down your house to cook your dinner," and he (Mr. MILLS) thought it was a serious business to destroy the local independence of one Province, which would destroy the independence of all, in order to carry out some measure that was thought to be just and fair. The hon. member for Victoria would see from the despatches from the other side of the Atlantic that, even if he carried his resolution the Imperial Government would not consent, without the sanction, of New Brunswick, to take away any of the rights of legislation which she possessed. He did not see what the hon. gentleman had to gain by bringing forward his motion here. As a matter of constitutional right we had no power to legislate upon this subject. The line which separated the powers of the Local Legislatures from those of the Parliament of Canada, was as distinct as if it was a geographical boundary marked out by the surveyor; and when the hon. gentleman came here and asked them to change the Constitution of New Brunswick, he was asking them to exercise the right of the stronger against the weaker party, he was asking them to do towards New Brunswick what he said the people of New Brunswick had done towards the Catholic population of that Province. Now, if the gentlemen who were favorable to this proposition persisted in it, he (Mr. MILLS) could tell them where, in his opinion, it would end. It would end by resuscitating the agitation and discussion upon the question of sectarian schools throughout the whole Dominion; it would end by a demand for the transfer of the subject of education from the Local Legislatures to the Parliament of Canada; it would end by a demand to take away from the Province of Quebec those rights of nationality which he was as anxious as any one they should retain. The line between those parts of the constitution which this House might fairly ask the Imperial Parliament to alter and those which the Local Legislatures might ask for amendment, so far as they could not amend themselves, was perfectly clear. What affected our own powers of legislation, excepting those principles of representation by population which the Constitution established, rested with the Parliament of Canada; what affected the functions, and powers, and authority of the Local Legislatures, rested with them. Where the Constitution itself put them we had better in this instance allow them to remain.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) said he rose for the purpose of explaining the vote he was about to give. His political creed had always been Provincial Sovereignty. He had given a good deal of study to the history of the United States during the last 30 or 40 years, and that had led him to the belief that the only safety for the perpetuation of the institutions of the United States was State Sovereignty. When Confederation was thought of in this country he held, and defended the doctrine in Upper Canada, that the Provinces should be jealous of their rights, and should never allow the Dominion Parliament to legislate in any matter for the Province that the Province could do for themselves. The result now before the House struck a blow at the very root of that doctrine. To his mind there was no religious question involved in it. He had no objection to the Catholics of New Brunswick, or of any other Province, having separate schools if they chose, but he would vote against the resolution on the principle of the independance of the Provinces to which he had just adverted.

Mr. SINCLAIR said the question was a very serious one and deserved careful consideration. The member for Halifax had told us to "do to others as we wished others to do to us." We could not go astray in following that golden rule, and he would like to ask the people from the other Provinces how they would like their Provinces to be dealt with by this House as it was proposed New Brunswick should be dealt with. It was not merely that such a course would be interfering with a matter which belonged to the Provinces, but it would be dealing with a matter which was expressly excluded by our Constitution from the control of the Dominion Parliament. In spite of that a motion was now brought forward to compel New Brunswick to grant the liberty of establishing schools. The feeling was bad enough in New Brunswick already, and the discussion of this question here would only make it worse. Hon. members would find that if they did not allow New Brunswick the privileges she enjoyed on coming into the Union, it would soon be found that she was not going to remain in the Union. It would be better to leave this question to be settled by the people of New Brunswick. Was it doing to others what we would that others should do to us, to take away from New Brunswick those rights which, on entering Confederation, she believed were forever guaranteed to her. They had very much the same question raised in Prince Edward Island, and he knew how the feeling would be there if the Dominion Parliament undertook to interfere with the legislation of that Island on this subject. It had been stated in the course of this debate that for this Parliament to deal with this question would be one of the means of building up our nationality. On the contrary, he believed that nothing would be more likely to break up the Confederation than just such action as was proposed. In his judgement this Parliament had no right even to discuss this question, and its discussion even so far would be productive of great injury to the minority in New Brunswick. It would show to the majority there that there was a feeling in this House not to abide by the compact that had been solemnly entered into by the Provinces and that some of the members were anxious to break it up. The result of this would be to still further excite the ill-feeling that unfortunately prevailed in New Brunswick. Reference had been made to the resolution of the member for Bothwell respecting the Senate, but the two cases were clearly distinct. This Parliament undoubtedly had a right to deal with its own constitution, but it had no right to interfere with the exclusive rights of the Local Legislatures.

Mr. CURRIER said that whether this question ought to be discussed in this House or not, it was now before them and they would have to vote upon it one way or the other. For his own part he would vote for the resolution for the reason that he would not be so bigoted as to say that he would not grant to the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick the same privileges and laws that the Protestant minority in Quebec and the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario, enjoyed.

Mr. PALMER said that as a member from New Brunswick, he could not allow the resolution to go to the vote without expressing his views upon it. He admitted that this House had already affirmed the principle of interference with the Constitution, which afforded a sufficient reason for his hon. friend from Victoria bringing forward this resolution, although he (Mr. PALMER) did his best at the time to prevent the House affirming such a principle. He still held the opinion that the House was wrong in taking that action. It was a misfortune for both sides in New Brunswick, because it could not be denied that this question had been turned into one of hostility. It was almost a pity that the question could not be dealt with by this House, because after the expression of the sentiments of patriotism and liberty which he had heard in the House to-day, this House would doubtless deal with such a question in a fair and proper spirit. He held strongly to the opinion that this was not a tribunal where this question could be properly discussed, and the Imperial authorities, he noticed from the despatches, had even gone beyond this view. In the despatch from the Colonial Secretary to the GOVERNOR GENERAL on the subject of legislation, with reference to schools, the Colonial Secretary states, "This is a matter in which you must act on your own individual discretion — in which you cannot be guided by the advice of your responsible Ministers." So sacredly did the British Government regard Provincial rights that they laid down the doctrine that the Governor in the exercise of the vetoing power was not to be guided even by the advice of his responsible Ministers. That was a doctrine that he (Mr. PALMER) was hardly prepared to subscribe to. He had believed that the Governor General stood in the same position in reference to the vetoing power as the QUEEN had stood before Confederation, and he never supposed that the responsible advisers of the QUEEN were not answerable for the action of the QUEEN in vetoing the act of a Provincial Legislature. He wished to appeal to the fair consideration of the House whether or not it would be to the best interests of this Dominion to allow the Federal Parliament to interfere with the powers of the Local Legislatures as found in the Act of Confederation. Was this the proper forum for the discussion of such a subject as the one brought before the House to-night, or was the subject entirely within the control of the Local Legislatures? That was a grave question. The member for Bothwell, when he had a hobby to ride had a peculiar way of getting out of a constitutional difficulty. The hon. member held that the Federal Legislature was competent to deal with matters connected with its own constitution, but not with the powers, of the several Legislatures. On the contrary, his (Mr. PALMER'S) contention was that where each Province was supreme in its own jurisdiction before Confederation, by the Act of Confederation gave up certain of its powers to the Dominion Parliament, but they gave them up under certain well defined conditions. For instance, they gave them up to be dealt with by a nominative Senate, and by a House of Commons elected in the manner the Confederation Act pointed out. But if his hon. friend from Bothwell was right, what was there to hinder this Parliament from saying that the House of Commons should be nominated instead of elected. He held, therefore, that even with regard to that part of the constitution, this Parliament had no right to seek the alteration of the constitution without the consent of the Local Legislatures who were the parties to the original compact. The hon. member for Montreal Centre had appealed with a great deal of eloquence and force for justice to the Roman Catholic of New Brunswick. He (Mr. PALMER) would be prepared to discuss that question at the proper time and on a proper occasion, but this was not a proper form for such a discussion. The hon. member had asked if the constitution was so sacred that it could not be touched. No, it was not; but it was so sacred that it could not be touched except by the same power that created it. If his hon. friend would advocate the removal from the Local Legislature to this Parliament of the subject of education by the same mode that our present constitution was created, he (Mr. PALMER) was not prepared to say that he would not support him, but when he asked this Parliament to apply to the Imperial Parliament for a change in the constitution on a subject unquestionably within the powers of Local Legislatures, he must differ from him. It was true the hon. member for Montreal Centre held that the majority in the Province acted wrongly, but who was to decide that, and were not the rights of the majority to be considered? For his part, when the subject came before the proper forum, he would be prepared to deal fairly by the minority, for it was in the interest of both the majority and the minority that this question should be settled. But when you throw into the scale against the Catholics of New Brunswick, in addition to the fact of their minority, the fact that they asked to take away from the majority of the Province what the Constitution had clearly given them, did not his hon. friends see that they put an immense power into the hands of persons who seek to oppress the Catholics. They would say, here is the minority going to the Dominion Parliament and asking to take away from us the rights secured to us by the Constitution, when they might as well go to the United States, so far as any power was concerned. Any one could see what an immense power such a course placed in the hands of those who wished to deprive the Roman Catholics of the Province of the rights they demanded. For the same reason it was to be regretted that this discussion had been brought up here at all, because it would create an impression in his Province, that there was a desire on the part of many members to override the Local Legislature. No matter whether the Local Legislature had acted rightly or wrongly, this Parliament had no right to interfere. This House might as well deplore the state of education in Spain, and discuss some means for improving it, because they had as much power in the one case as in the other to deal with the subject. The hon. member for Montreal Centre had spoken of a higher law, but on a question as to the respective rights of the Federal and the Local Legislatures there was no higher law than the Confederation Act. Supposing the question of education was to be dealt with by this Parliament, New Brunswick would still take the same position, for in the recent local elections out of forty-one members only four were in favor of a repeal of the School Act. If the question were admitted to this Parliament, there would be no improvement in the result. Instead of men of broad and moderate views being sent to represent the people in Parliament, men would be elected who would be imbued with strong prejudices on both sides. He commended the hon. member for Victoria for the dispassionate yet able manner in which he had discussed the question, but he (Mr. PALMER) declared that any one who introduces this subject in the Dominion elections in New Brunswick was acting the part of a demagogue, knowing as they all must know, that this Parliament had no right to interfere. He strongly approved of the resolution of which notice was given by the hon. member for South Bruce, and expressed his willingness to second it. He was glad that the hon. gentleman had came forward with such a resolution, for it appeared to him at the beginning that he (Mr. BLAKE) entirely concurred with the view of the Catholics and the hon. member for Victoria. He thought it would be somewhat difficult for the hon. member for South Bruce, however, to reconcile his views as expressed in that resolution with the views he had expressed and the vote he gave in 1872.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said his views on the subject were not changed.

Mr. PALMER said he apprehended that it was the duty of every member of this House to treat the question in such a way as to allay the feeling that existed on the subject. Whatever came within the power of this Parliament, it became them to treat calmly and dispassionately. The harmony of this Dominion, and the future working of the constitution depended on the strict observance of the powers conferred on each legislative body. Any attempt to go further must surely result in a collision. Supposing that these grievances did exist, and the Imperial authorities attempted to repeal the law, he held that New Brunswick not having exceeded the power conferred on her by the constitution, was entirely relieved from the terms upon which she entered this Confederation. Everything depended upon the agreement under which Confederation was entered into. It was a great misfortune that there was no mode under the constitution by which it could be amended. All that was required to a change in the constitution was the consent of the power that made it. But nothing short of that would avail. The bargain might be a bad one, but if so all that could be said was that it was a misfortune for the Dominion. While, however, he took this ground, with reference to the law, he felt his mouth was closed. With the Catholic minority it was a matter of conscience that they should have religious instruction imparted along with secular education. On the other hand, it was a matter of conscience with Protestants that no part of their money should be expended for the indoctrination of religious dogmas hostile to their own views. It was therefore impossible to make any law on the subject of education, by which one party or the other would not consider their consciences violated. He wished that they had remained, in New Brunswick, as they were previous to 1858, up to which time they had no school law at all, and no difficulty about their education. Since then the spirit of religious fanaticism had been abroad, and a state of things existed which was to be deplored, and which every man who had the interests of his country at heart would like to see allayed. Take what action the House might, either one party or the other would feel deeply aggrieved. However much the school system of New Brunswick might be opposed to the ideas of the Roman Catholics, it could not be said of it that any particular religious education was authorized by it. The principle upon which it was founded was a very fair one in theory, but in practice according to the peculiar views of the Roman Catholics, it might not be fair. In point of law at least the majority of the people in New Brunswick were right. Their views had been upheld by the Privy Council when appealed to, and this Parliament could neither alter the law nor amend it. He regretted this, because he believed if it were in the power of this Parliament to deal with the subject, a satisfactory settlement would soon be arrived at. He denied that better terms had been granted to New Brunswick as one hon. gentleman stated. What was granted to her was mere compensation for means of local revenue taken away in consequence of the Washington Treaty. He did not consider it necessary upon this occasion to set forth his personal views with reference to the law itself; nor was it necessary for him to state what course he would have thought it just to pursue had the question been within the jurisdiction of Parliament. There was no doubt however that it was beyond the jurisdiction of this House, and that point being settled, he refused to enter into further discussion.

Mr. DYMOND said there was no reasonable prospect that a vote could be come to upon this question to-night. He therefore moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ORTON said they had heard a great deal of talk on the constitutional question, notably from the hon. member for Bothwell, but his expressions of opinion sounded rather strangely in view of his action of but a few days ago. Nevertheless the constitutional question was well worthy the consideration of the House. When a great public wrong existed, and when a deep feeling of indignation prevailed regarding it, even our constitution might be approached with a view to its amendment. We could at least petition HER MAJESTY with reference to questions of that character. There had been attacks on our Constitution latterly, but there had been no public clamor for them, and no grievance had been felt which they proposed to remove. With regard to the separate school question, it had been fully discussed and he thought that in Ontario and Quebec we had came to the conclusion that separate schools were for the public good. It was not in the interests of the public that the country should have a renewal of the former struggles on this question. It would be a sorry day for Canada when the demon of religious strife was again raised and for that reason Parliament should adopt the motion of the hon. member for Victoria with a view to the settlement of the New Brunswick school difficulty. Both from a patriotic and a Christian point of view it was desirable that this question which agitated the evil passions of men should be disposed of.

The motion for adjournment was carried.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the House.

The House adjourned at 11.20.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 9th March, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P.M.

NEW BRUNSWICK SCHOOL QUESTION.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE desired to call attention to what occurred at the close of the debate yesterday. When he made the suggestion he did last night, he was under the impression that the result of the adjournment of the debate would be that the motion of the hon. member for Victoria would take its place high up on the orders. He had since been informed that that result only took place when the adjournment of the debate was caused by the adjournment of the House. He would therefore move, in the absence of the hon. member for Victoria, that the said motion stand first upon the public orders for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was scarcely any necessity for this motion, as there was an understanding that the question would be taken up immediately after private Bills.

Mr. MASSON hoped the motion would be made because, if it was not, any member might object to taking up the question out of its order.

Motion carried.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time :—

Mr. BABY—To authorize F. X. GALARNEAU to build a bridge over the Assomption river at the Portage.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON—To further amend the Act respecting controverted elections.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—To compel persons delivering merchantable liquids in casks to mark on such casks the capacity thereof.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT — To amend the Act respecting Life Insurance Office.

IMMIGRATION DUTY.

Hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved that the House do resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to-morrow, to consider the following resolutions :—

1. That it will conduce to the promotion of immigration to Canada in view of combinations or unions of owners of lines of steam vessels, to fix uniform rates of emigrant passages, by creating monopoly between ports in Europe and ports in Canada and the Northern United States, to authorize the GOVERNOR GENERAL by Order in Council, published by proclamation in the Canada Gazette, to collect in certain cases a duty from the master of every ship arriving at any port in Canada from any port in Europe with passengers or emigrants therefor.

2. Such duty not to exceed two dollars for every passenger or emigrant above the age of one year to be landed in Canada.

3. Such duty only to be collected at such times as shall be specified by proclamation.

4. That "the Immigration Act of 1872" should be amended in the sense of the foregoing resolutions.

The motion was carried.

THE SEAMEN'S ACT.

Hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved for Committee of the Whole for to-morrow, to consider the expediency of extending provisions similar, as nearly as circumstances permit, to those of "the Seamen's Act, 1873," to vessels employed in navigating the inland waters of Canada. —Carried.

THE INSPECTION OF GAS.

Bill to amend the Act, 36 Vic., Cap. 48, relating to the inspection of gas, was read a third time and passed.

THE JUDICIARY.

The report of the Committee of the Whole on resolutions on the subject of the salaries of the County Court Judges of Nova Scotia, was received and concurred in.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

The report of the Committee of the Whole on certain proposed resolutions for the purpose of amending the Act, 31 Vic., Cap 16, for the regulation of the Postal Service, was concurred in, and the resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 11.

Bill to amend the Act for the regulation of the Postal Service, was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole with the resolution on the same subject, Mr. JETTE in the chair.

The first eighteen sections were passed without discussion.

On clause No. 19 which read as follows :—

"The Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, that any person, firm, partnership or company, in Canada or elsewhere, is engaged in conducting any scheme or device for obtaining remittances through the Post Office, by means of false or fraudulent pretences, representations of promises of any kind, may forbid the payment by any postmaster to any such person, firm, partnership or company, of any postal money order drawn in his or their favor, and may provide for the return of the sum named in any such order, to the remitter thereof, and may, upon such like evidence forbid the delivery to such person, firm, partnership or company, of any registered or other letter, which he believes to be addressed to or for him or them, through or by reason of any such fraudulent scheme or device, and may cause any such letter to be returned to the sender thereof, marked with the word 'Fraud,' as the reason of non-delivery to its address. Provided, that no postmaster or other person not authorized by the Postmaster General shall open any such letters."

Mr. BOWELL asked how it was proposed to carry out this provision. It seemed to him that it conferred extraordinary powers on the Postmaster General. It gave him power, on what might seem to him satisfactory evidence, to prevent the delivery of any letter containing a remittance obtained on fraudulent representation. Suppose a wholesale merchant had, through some of his agents, taken orders in the country by misrepresenting facts, and the purchaser should find on receiving them, and after the value of them was remitted, that he had been cheated—suppose in a case of this kind the purchaser telegraphed to the city where the goods were purchased, to have the letter containing the money detained, what would be the result? The wholesale merchant might have thirty letters from the same place on the same day. Was he to have all these detained and opened? If this were not the means by which the object of this clause was to be carried out, how could it be accomplished?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said this was an extreme view to take of this clause. Several applications had lately been made to the department to detain letters containing remittances for certain parties, especially in the United States, and also addressed to a firm in Montreal, on the ground that the money was obtained by fraud. To such an extent had frauds of this kind been carried in the United States, that a stringent law was passed in Congress to prevent them, and this clause was almost a transcript of it. He was satisfied that whoever might occupy the position of Postmaster General, the power conferred on him by this clause would be exercised with discretion.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked what evidence the Postmaster General proposed to require before taking the very serious step of opening a letter sent from the Post Office Department?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—It is determined that when application is made to the Department that there must be undoubted evidence brought before me before any attempt will be made to detain and open a letter. There must be clear evidence that fraud has been practised before a letter can be opened.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—Is that to be sworn testimony, or the mere statement of some parties that they believe such a thing to be the case?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—There can be no doubt that they must make it clear to the department, by affidavit or otherwise, that it is a clear case of fraud, before the department will take action.

Mr. BOWELL said most of these applications must necessarily be made by telegraph, so that it would be seen he did not take an extreme view of this clause after all. The moment a telegram was received by the department to detain a money letter, all letters from the same place to the same address must be stopped until it is ascertained it is clearly of a fraudulent character.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—No letter will be opened until such time as there is clear proof that there is fraud in the transaction.

Mr. BOWELL—I have no doubt the clause is inserted in the Bill with the very best intention; but suppose ten letters were sent from the city of Ottawa to the city of Toronto to the same address, and one of those letters contains a certain amount of money, which has been obtained by fraud—suppose the department receives information that such letters have been sent—how is it possible to ascertain which of these letters should be detained and opened? The Postmaster General must of necessity detain the whole ten and open them.

Mr. YOUNG understood that the clause was not intended to apply to special letters particularly. The idea, he thought, was to meet the case of certain persons who came over here generally from the other side of the line and advertised some false or fraudulent vocation, and by that means obtained large remittances by mail from different sections of the country for what was really a fraud. Under this clause when satisfactory evidence was adduced to prove that those persons were engaged in a fraudulent business, which they generally made known by advertisements, the Postmaster General would have the power to interfere with letters containing remittances to them. When those persons were engaged in a fraudulent business it would not matter much how many of their letters were opened, because the sooner they were detected in their improper acts the better. As regards the case of special letters, there might be a certain amount of difficulty, but it was not likely to arise.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON understood the principle object sought to be attained was to suppress enterprises of the nature of lotteries and gift enterprises, which had flooded Canada in common with the States of the Union. At one time there was an establishment in Montreal, for the purpose of conducting an enterprise of that kind which, within a short period, received about $50,000 in Post Office Orders and bank remittances. The words used in the clause were found in the United States Post Office Act, but they were placed in connection with certain words which showed to what they applied, viz., lotteries, gift and other enterprises, &c., and when the words were so placed, no difficulty arose. As the clause was drawn the Post Office Department would be called upon to try questions between merchant and customer, and merchant and merchant, which was never contemplated. The whole difficulty would be obviated by amending the clause by adding the words appearing in that connection in the United States Act.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON asked if it was desirable that the Post Office Department should exercise any supervision whatever over the contents of the mails. He did not think they ought to exercise such control. He would therefore be very glad if the hon. Postmaster General would omit that clause from the Bill. He did not think it was capable of being amended in any way that would render it desirable to have it embodied in the law of the land.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD —Referring to the clause which gave the Postmaster General authority to stop letters passing through the mails on satisfactory evidence being given to him that persons were engaged in conducting any scheme for obtaining remittances through the Post Office by means of false or fraudulent pretensions—said that it might be reasonable to give such power to the Postmaster General himself. He would possess the confidence of the House and the country. At the same time it was quite impossible that he could exercise personal supervision in all parts of the Dominion. Suppose a scheme of a fraudulent character were being carried on on the Pacific coast, and letters containing money were passing from Victoria, B. C. to San Francisco. The Postmaster General could not act himself, and would have to delegate the power to the local postmasters, because it was quite apparent that the whole machinery connected with the mail between those two points could not be stopped in order that the letters might be forwarded to Ottawa. The acknowledged rule was that the Postmaster General could only delegate his authority to his deputy, but the Act would be inoperative unless the Postmaster General should be able to delegate his powers to a great number of officials, and those powers were not such as ought to be vested in others. The evidence of fraud might be satisfactory to the Postmaster General, and yet prove fallacious, and a great loss might occur owing to letters being stopped while passing through the mails, and there is no provision under which the sender could obtain any remedy. He quite understood the object which the Postmaster General had in introducing this clause into the Bill, yet he conceived it would be infinitely better that a few persons should suffer than that the public should lose confidence in the mails being safely carried. Hon. members would recollect the case of Sir JAMES GRAHAM, Postmaster General in England, who opened certain letters connected with the MAZZINI affair. The matter was inquired into by a select committee, who, however, refused to report against the action that had been taken. In the course of the evidence he believed it was proved that there were direct incentives in the correspondence to assassination. The correspondence was further connected with secret conspiracies on the continent. Yet Sir JAMES GRAHAM, although he was acting under the authority of law, never overcame the feeling which arose on account of that proceeding, and confidence in the Post Office was much weakened; and not until the most solemn assurances were given by the Government that no such case would again occur was confidence renewed in the department. He believed that never since that day had a letter been opened in its passage through the British mails. For these reasons he believed it would be infinitely better that this clause should be dropped out of the Bill rather than the public confidence should be weakened in the Post Office.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE observed that there were undoubtedly a great many difficulties connected with the granting of these additional powers to the Postmaster General, end therefore he would be inclined to advise his hon. friend to leave this section out.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said that, as far as he was concerned, he would be very glad to leave it out, as it would cause a great deal of trouble and expense to the Department. However, he had received communications from all parts of the country, asking for some protection of this kind against fraudulent schemes.

The section was struck out.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) moved, in amendment to section 22, that the postage on newspapers be as follows :— Weeklies, five cents per annum ; semi-weeklies, 10 cents ; tri-weeklies, 15 cents ; and dailies, 30 cents, and that such rates be paid at the office of delivery.

Amendment ruled out of order.

Mr. BOWELL asked, with reference to Section 36, that the words "or town" be inserted after the word "city," so as to give the Postmaster General power to extend free delivery of letters to cities if he thought proper.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said there were so many towns in the Dominion with a population of from 2,000 upwards, that if this change was made, the department would be flooded with applications which could not be granted. In the United States, free delivery was restricted to cities of 20,000 inhabitants, but he went further, and extended it to cities some of which had only from 12,000 to 15,000 of a population.

Mr. BOWELL said he did not propose to make it imperative on the Postmaster General to establish free delivery in towns, but only to give him the power to do so if he thought advisable. If the system produced a revenue in the cities, as the Postmaster General expected, he (Mr. BOWELL) thought it would be just as likely to produce a revenue in the large towns.

Mr. YOUNG expressed the opinion that the system of free delivery of letters was extended by the Postmaster General quite as far as was prudent. It was doubtful whether it would pay in the smaller cities ; and if power was given to the Postmaster General to extend it to towns, almost every town would be applying for free delivery, and pressure would be brought upon the Government which in many cases it would be almost impossible to resist.

Mr. BOWELL said he would have no objection to restrict the system to towns of a certain population.

Section carried.

Mr. BOWELL asked with reference to Section 51, what was the reason for the change proposed. Under the present law the Postmaster General was obliged to advertise for mail contracts in one or more of the newspapers published in the county where the contract is to be performed ; but now it was proposed to give him power to advertise in any newspaper he pleased. This change seemed to be for only one purpose, and that was to give the Postmaster General a little patronage.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said the object of the proposed change was to give the Postmaster General power to advertise in the paper having the largest circulation in the district, where the work was to be performed.

Mr. BOWELL said that object could better be accomplished under the present law. Under the proposed change the Postmaster General could advertise in Toronto for a contract for carrying the mails between Cornwall and Alexandria.

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said that this clause had been inserted at the request of the Deputy Postmaster General, who had found from his long experience that it was necessary.

Mr. YOUNG observed that it was a mere question of form. The practice of the department had always been to direct in what papers letters should be advertised, and in reality the Postmaster General was not asking any more power now than he had hitherto wielded.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that no person objected to the Government of the day, preferring to give their patronage to newspapers supporting them, if they could do so consistently with the public interest —but that was not the point now under consideration. Under the present law the Government were compelled to consult the public interests by publishing advertisements for mail contracts in the nearest newspaper to the place where the contract had to be performed. It was now proposed to sweep away that restriction, and to give the Postmaster General power to advertise in any newspaper in the Dominion. Such a change was not necessary to accomplish the object that the Postmaster General stated he had in view.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there were several advantages in the public interest to be derived from the proposed amendment. For instance, if the department wanted to advertise for a contract for carrying the mails on Lake Superior they would be required under the present law to advertise in a small sheet, seven by nine inches, published at Sault Ste. Marie, there being no other paper published nearer to the district than Owen Sound. On repeated occasions he had sent advertisements to the Toronto Mail simply because it was necessary in the public interest that some important advertisements should go to papers having a considerable circulation, and that they might reach a class that could not be reached otherwise; and this amendment was simply intended to give the department power in exceptional cases to advertise where the department would be best served; no doubt as a general rule the paper nearest to the locality would get the advertisement, but there might be advertisements which required to be inserted in papers having a larger circulation.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the present law did not restrict the Postmaster General in that respect. If he wished to advertise in other papers he could do so.

Section carried.

On the 91st. section which fixed the date when the Act should come into force at the 1st. of May next,

Mr. BOWELL said he understand the Postmaster General to say during a former discussion that the Act would not go into force till the 1st. of August. As in most instances newspapers had already made their contracts with subscribers for the year it would cause great inconvenience if the Bill was to go into operation on the 1st. of May.

The Section was amended so as to make the Act come in force on the 1st. of October next.

The Sections of the Bill having been adopted, the Committee rose and reported the Bill with amendments. Report to be received to-morrow.

BANKS AND BANKING.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill to amend the Act therein mentioned on Banks and Banking; Mr. YOUNG in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the following amendment:—

1. Sec. 40 of Cap. 5 passed in the 34th. year of H. M's. reign shall be amended by the addition of the words following:—

"Nor shall the Bank, directly or indirectly, purchase or deal in any share or shares of the Capital Stock of the Bank, except where it is necessary to realize upon any such share or shares held by the Bank, as security for any pre-existing and matured debt.—Carried.

Mr. PLUMB moved that the word "matured" be struck out of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it could not be done.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said under the general law introduced under Sir FRANCIS HINCKS in 1871, the lien was limited to matured paper. There would be a manifest impropriety in allowing banks to interfere with their shareholders in selling their shares, because the shareholders' names were endorsed on their paper. It would be very impolitic. It was found under the old system that it frequently wrought hardship and annoyance to shareholders, and therefore the Banking Committee determined to limit the lien to matured paper.

Mr. PLUMB said he did not wish to interfere with the transfer of stock. He only had reference to cases of insolvency where it might be necessary for a bank to protect itself.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the Act afforded sufficient protection to the banks. He thought the amendment was a good one.

The Bill was reported with amendments, (which were concurred in) read a third time and passed.

VDMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE NORTH WEST TERRITORIES.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved the second reading of the Bill "to amend an Act respecting the administration of justice and for the establishment of a police force in the North-West Territories."—Carried.

The House went into Committee—Mr. CASGRAIN in the chair—and reported the Bill.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill "to amend the Acts respecting the Public Debt and the raising of loans authorized by Parliament." —Carried.

The House went into Committee—Mr. OLIVER in the chair—and reported the Bill.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

DOMINION NOTES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the House into committee to consider the following Resolutions :—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act for the Issue of Dominion Notes by enacting that the Receiver General shall hold in specie the excess above $12,000,000.

2. Resolved, That the Receiver General shall hold 50 per cent of the amount between $9,000,000 and $12,000,000 in specie.

The committee—Mr. WILKES in the chair—considered the resolutions, which were read a first and second time and reported.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of the Bill "to amend the Act regulating the issue of Dominion Notes."—Carried.

The House went into Committee—Mr. PLUMB in the chair—and reported.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1872.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved the second reading of the Bill "to amend 'The Immigration Act of 1872.'" He explained that the late Minister of Immigration concluded an arrangement with the Allan, Temperley and Anchor Steamship Companies' under which, on certain conditions, the capitation tax was abolished. In order that the Government might be protected against a combination of steamship lines, the Bill proposed to give them the power of re-imposing the capitation tax, if it should become necessary.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD failed to understand how the Bill would protect the Government.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said he understood that this combination included all the chief steamship companies from Baltimore northward and including Canada. This arrangement was general and applied to all. The object of imposing this tax was to protect the Government from this combination.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER did not distinctly understand how it would strengthen the hands of the Government. He saw several very great objections to the re-imposition of this capitation tax. Canada was now bidding for immigration and one of the strongest reasons urged by our agents why emigrants should go to Canada instead of the United States was that there was no capitation tax in the Dominion while there was in the neighboring country. By re-imposing this tax it increased the cost of introducing immigrants into this country. The tax did not come out of the pockets of the steamship owners, but fell on the emigrants.

The Bill was read a second time.

At six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

INSPECTOR OF INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The House went into Committee to consider certain proposed resolutions providing for the appointment of an Inspector of Insurance Companies and the scale of fees to be charged under Bill 67.—Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) in the chair. The Committee rose and reported the resolutions which were read a second time.

The Bill No. 67, to consolidate and amend the several Acts respecting Insurance, in so far as regards Fire and Inland Marine business was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

APPOINTMENT OF HARBOR MASTERS.

The House went into Committee to consider certain proposed resolutions for the purpose of amending the Act 37, Victoria, Cap. 34, providing for the appointment of harbor masters at certain ports. — Mr. FORBES in the chair.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he did see the necessity for the proposed increase of fees, and he thought there was already sufficient burden on shipping.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said several officers had sent in their resignations on account found necessary therefore to increase them.

When the Bill came up for a second reading he proposed to make some amendments.

The committee rose and reported the resolutions, which were read a second time.

Hon. Mr. SMITH introduced a Bill based on the resolutions.—Read the first time.

SALARIES OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER introduced a Bill to provide for the salaries of County Court Judges in Nova Scotia and for other purposes.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS' FUND.

The House went into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions to amend Act, 31 Vic., Cap. 64, respecting the treatment and relief of sick and distressed mariners; Mr. KIRKPATRICK in the chair.

Hon. Mr. SMITH explained that the Act provided that ship-owners instead of paying twice to this fund should pay three times each year. The present fund was insufficient to meet the expenditure. Last year the amount received was $41,500; the amount expended, $66,443. The Government did not consider this a fair charge on the revenue, and therefore increased the fees.

Mr. FORBES wished to know the reason for imposing this charge three times a year instead of twice. Would it not be better to increase the present amount and collect it twice in the year?

Hon. Mr. SMITH said by adopting this mode the tax was placed mainly upon large ship-owners—steamships for instance. If the amount were increased and the collections made only twice in the year, the tax would fall on sailing vessels, which were not so well able to meet it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL protested against this legislation which had a tendency to increase the charges on shipping. He was quite surprised to find this fund falling behind. His recollection of it was that it about met the expenditure. Our tonnage could not afford to sustain any heavier charges than at present, if it was to compete successfully with the shipping of other countries. The Government should continue the policy which the late Admnisitration inaugurated and which built up the shipping interest of Canada. Instead of increasing the charges on shipping the late Government had diminished them. While he would not oppose the resolution, he would look into the matter and hold himself free to oppose the Bill when it came before the House.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) reminded the hon. member for Northumberland that the policy of the late Government was not on all occasions to dimish the charges on shipping. In this very fund and in the appointment of harbor masters they had increased the tax on ship-owners.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said his sympathies were entirely with the shipping interest, but it was not the only interest in this Dominion. He saw no reason why it should not sustain this fund. That it was necessary would be seen from the fact that during the last three years the expenditure had increased very considerably over the receipts. In 1872 the receipts were $34,911; expenditures, $38,947. In 1873 receipts, $37,136; expenditures, $41,016. In 1874, receipts, $41,500; expenditures, $66,443. It would be seen that the expenditure was going on progressively, and he did not think this House would say this fund should be maintained out of the revenue of the country. If it was to be sustained at all, it was evident that the fees must be increased.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said this was a proof that the fund was not properly managed by the present Government. The hon. Minister of Marine had explained that by collecting the revenue three times a year instead of twice it would bear less heavily on sailing ships than on steamers. The hon. gentleman owned sailings vessels but did not own steamers, and it would, no doubt, suit him very well. But he (Mr. MITCHELL) owned steamers, and would prefer to see these fees collected twice in the year. He could not understand how there was such a deficit in the fund. During the seven years while he managed it, the receipts exceed the expenditures every year except the last, when there was a slight deficit, but he did not ask to have the charge increased to meet that deficiency. The hon. Minister of Marine ought to give some explanation to this House why the expenditures had so largely increased.

Hon. Mr. SMITH called attention to the fact that sailing vessels did not average more than two visits to a port yearly.

With respect to the increased expenditure for the relief of sick mariners, that was a matter for which he could not be held responsible, because there had been an additional number of patients. If the hon. member for Northumberland could satisfy the House that no necessity existed for additional taxation, it would not be imposed.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER concurred in the remark that the hon. Minister of Marine was not responsible for an increase in the number of invalids; but his statistics proved that the increase was exceptional, and being exceptional, did not warrant the severe remedial measures proposed. If it were true, as the hon. Minister had declared, that the shipping interests should not be protected more than any other interest, why did the Province of Canada when it had the greatest difficulty in making the receipts meet the expenditure, resolve that everything which entered into the construction of fitting up ships should be entered free of duty, while other goods were charged from 20 to 25 per cent. duty. The policy of the late Government was that of fostering and protecting our shipping interests. but the present Administration reversed that policy, and had imposed a large amount of taxation on shipping. and, in accordance with that policy the Government must go a step further and charge ships with all dues necessary for the maintenance of the light-house service. If ever there was a time when the Government should have avoided entering upon this policy it was at the present time, because the shipping trade was depressed, and the changed value of freights all over the world rendered ship-owners less able to bear the increased charges. The ad-do tion by the United States of a policy similar to that entered upon by the present Government had resulted in American shipping being almost driven from the seas, and the Senate and Congress in order to revive their shipping trade had been engaged upon and arranging business and other schemes for the encouragement of the shipping interest. In view of the leading position which Canada occupies in the carrying trade of the world, it behooved the Government to carefully consider what means could be adopted to promote and foster our shipping interests —a policy which had been followed during many years—rather than to seek to re-impose duties which had long since been removed.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said he was prepared to answer the observations of his hon. friend when the Bill came up for the second reading, which was a more fitting time. He might say, however, that so far from this measure injuring the shipping interest it would be a benefit to it.

Mr. FORBES observed that American fishermen sick or distressed were thrown upon our shores, and we were bound to take care of them. He thought, therefore, American shipping should be made to contribute their share.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said sailors paid taxes for this purpose, and we were obliged to take care of sick and distressed seamen left upon our shores no matter where they came from.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the proper time for discussing all the details of this measure was when the House was in committee, for the very object of going into committee was that there might be the fullest discussion and interchange of opinion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said even the increased fees proposed could not meet the expenditure of maintenance, which last year was $66,000 while the revenue was only $41,000. In addition to this large sums were voted yearly for the building of hospitals for sick and distressed seamen.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated that for the three years under the late Government the expenditure was only $31,000 and for two years the expenditure was very little over the revenue. Within the last year the expenditure had gone up to $66,000. Some explanation should be given for this increased expenditure.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said he was not responsible for the increase, as the law provided for the maintenance of these mariners. If his hon. friend desired it, he could give him a detailed statement of all the expenditure, or he could see it in his office.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions which were read a second time.

THE INTERPRETATION ACT.

The Bill to amend "The Interpretation Act" as respects the printing and distribution of the Statutes, and the territorial application of Acts amending previous Acts, was read a second time. The House went into Committee on the Bill (Mr. FLESHER in the chair), and reported it with certain amendments, which were read a first and second time.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Bill to amend the Act providing for the organization of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, was read a second time. The House went into Committee on the Bill, (Mr. BIGGAR in the chair). The Bill was reported without amendment, read a third time and passed.

SUPERVISOR OF CULLER'S OFFICE.

The House went into Commmittee on the Whole on certain resolutions relative to the Supervisor of Culler's office ; Mr. PICKARD in the chair.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) asked for explanations as to the nature of this measure. Last year a special committee was appointed to consider this question, but their report was not adopted for the reason that the matter was one which should be left in the hands of the Government. He wished to know what was their intention.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said the object of the measure was to organize the office on the same principle as the Excise, to be a part of the Inland Revenue Department. At present it was known the cullers were organized something like the pilots. They were put on a rotation list, and parties requiring their services were obliged to take the first on the list. Under the proposed system the office would be organized on the same principle as the Excise Department.

Mr. CARON asked if the charges on timber would be increased by this question.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION replied that the Government did not intend to increase the charges. On the contrary they expected to be able to diminish them, because the number of cullers would be reduced, and those who were retained would be paid stated salaries as other officers of the department.

Mr. CARON asked if the Government intend to superanuate or provide for cullers who have been for a number of years in the service, or whether the number was to be diminished without any provision being made for those who had been in the service.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said the Bill about to be introduced would supply the information asked for.

The resolution was reported and concurred in, and a Bill based on it was introduced and read a first time.

SUPPLY.

Item 128, for the construction of light-houses, was concurred in.

On item 69, for construction of snow sheds, rolling stock, offices, &c., on the Intercolonial railway, $915,000,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked under what authority Mr. BRYDGES had purchased a quantity of steel rails for the Intercolonial railway, and after having done so, consented to take a quantity of damaged rails at £1 less. He (Mr. MITCHELL) was informed on good authority that on the arrival of these rails, on being thrown off the cars, about one-half or one-third of them broke. He admitted that this occurred under the late Administration, but he wished to know whether there was any authority for it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said notice should have been given of this inquiry. He knew nothing whatever of the circumstance.

Mr. WOOD was surprised at the statement that steel rails would break when thrown from a car. Where did the hon. gentleman get his information ? He (Mr. WOOD) was satisfied that no rails imported into this country would break from merely being thrown from a car.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he had been a personal witness to the fact of steel rails breaking. The Premier would only have to make inquiries in New Brunswick to learn that seven or eight rails broke every day on the Government railroad. Many of the rails were short in length, and on inquiring the cause of this he was informed that they were for sidings and curves.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member could move for any information he wanted. These loose statements concerning what had occurred under the hon. gentleman's own administration were to say the least extraordinary. He (Mr.

MACKENZIE) could hardly conceive it possible that a fair narration of the circumstances had been given. All that he knew was that the late Government had called for tenders for 40,000 tons of steel rails and that they were delivered. That was before the present Government came into power, and he knew nothing further on the subject. The hon. member should put a motion on the paper if he wanted information.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he would do so, but, as it was late in the session, he hoped the information would be furnished without the motion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I will furnish every possible information that the hon. gentleman wants.

The item was concurred in.

Item 70 was concurred in without discussion.

On item 71, for increased accommodation, Intercolonial Railway, at St. John, N. B., $200,000,

Mr. DOMVILLE wished to know if it was intended to purchase the wharf at deep water which the Premier had examined personally and of which he had expressed anything but a favorable opinion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not in a position to reply to the question at present. He had a telegram from the Mayor of St. John to say that a communication was on its way from that city. He would find some opportunity of making the House aware of its contents as soon as possible.

The item was concurred in.

Item 73 was concurred in without discussion.

On item 74, St. Lawrence Canals, $1,000,000,

Mr. LANTHIER asked if the Government had arrived at any decision in the selection of the side of the river on which the canal at Beauharnois was to be located, or if the Premier would wait until Mr. PAGE made his report, before coming to any conclusion.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had not decided as to whether the existing canal should be enlarged, or a new one should be built on the north shore. As the hon. gentleman knew, he (Mr. MACKENZIE) was always an advocate of the latter plan, but as it would cost something like $1,000,000 more to build the new canal than to improve the old one, the Government would have to consider the question very carefully before coming to a decision.

Mr. LANTHIER—Have the Government prepared any estimate of the cost of constructing the canal on the north shore?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Yes, but it is still a matter of departmental confidential statements.

Item concurred in.

On the item of $2,000,000 for Welland Canal,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, in reply to Mr. MCCALLUM, said the entire estimated expenditure for deepening the navigation to 14 feet at Port Colborne harbor was about $300,000, and for deepening and enlarging the canal, from the junction up to Lake Erie, to obtain the same depth of water, would probably cost two millions. In reply to the hon. member for Monck, who was particularly interested in obtaining information as to the probability of using Port Maitland as the terminus on Lake Erie, he might state that the distance was ten miles further to Port Maitland than to Port Colborne, and every one knew that a heavy expenditure would be incurred by those ten miles of additional canal navigation. Besides the cost of deepening and enlarging the channel, from the junction to Port Maitland, so as to enable vessels drawing 12 feet to reach the harbor, would be considerably over twice that which would be required to reach Port Colborne from the junction, or, in other words, a little over four millions. To deepen the harbor at Port Maitland would cost about $100,000, and to obtain 14 feet of water in the canal would cost three quarters of a million additional; or, altogether, about five millions, toobtain a depth of 14 feet from the junction to Port Maitland, including the harbor. In other words, it would cost two millions more to obtain the accommodation at Port Maitland than it would cost to obtain it at Port Colborne. He understood and quite appreciated the necessity of obtaining 14 feet of water at the earliest practicable moment, but after careful consideration of the whole question he had come to the conclusion that it would be wise to obtain 12 feet with the Lake Erie water introduced in the meantime: afterwards as the necessities of commerce seemed fairly to demand it we could gradually proceed with the work of additional deepening until we obtained 14 feet. The further expenditure for that purpose would not be a very serious one. There was just another point that he might refer to, which was this. The canal was carried over the River Welland by a stone aqueduct, and to obtain even 12 feet of water necessitated that a small portion of the crown of the arch of this aqueduct should be removed and the work strengthened with iron. To obtain 14 feet of water would necessitate an entirely new structure. Every argument pointed to the necessity of deepening the navigation to 12 feet now, and to the attainment, at a future date, of that object which many engaged in the shipping interest had in view—namely, a 14 foot navigation all over the canal. In the meantime he had no doubt the canal when deepened to 12 feet would meet the demands of trade as they existed.

Mr. McCALLUM disputed the accuracy of the hon. First Minister's statement in respect to the difference between the expenditure necessary to obtain similar results at Port Colborne and Port Maitland. It had been found impossible to remove the rocks in Port Colborne harbor, and it was now proposed to construct a breakwater to the eastward of Port Colborne, in order to form an outside harbor, where vessels could obtain shelter in storms, but when $200,000 had been expended on that work the harbor would not afford the proposed shelter. The hon. First Minister had forgotten to inform the House that the distance was nine miles shorter from east to west to Port Maitland than to Port Colborne. The Americans were deepening the harbors of Buffalo, Toledo, Chicago, Milwaukee and the St. Clair Flats, and also the Erie Canal, and if we wish to compete with them we must enlarge the Welland Canal to fourteen feet; and it could be done now for fifty per cent. less cost than it could be five years hence.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the country had already expended eight and a half millions on the Welland Canal, and were now spending about eight millions more on it, and it was highly important to consider whether this large expenditure was sufficent to obtain the object we desired; namely, to attract the carrying trade of the west down the St. Lawrence. The Welland Canal was now being enlarged for the third time. At first it was only large enough for vessels drawing eight and a half feet of water, which was sufficient for the vessels then navigating the upper lakes. Subsequently these vessels were increased in size, because the larger the vessels the cheaper the freight, and in 1855 it became necessary to increase the depth of the Welland Canal. Subsequently it was increased to ten and a half feet, and now we were going to spend the enormous sum of eight millions to increase it to twelve feet. Still it was evident that this would not be sufficient to accomodate the larger vessels now navigating the upper lakes, and so long as we had to use smaller vessels on our route Buffalo would have the advantage of us, for as, he said before, the larger the vessel the cheaper the freight. The Americans had deepened the St. Clair Flats and the Ste. Marie canal to fourteen feet, but it was believed that was the outside limit they could reach, and therefore if we enlarged the Welland Canal to fourteen feet, we would be in a position to compete with them for the future. Surely in making the large expenditure we were making to secure the western trade we should not stop just before coming within the reach of it, but should go a little further and secure it. He was very much surprised at the statement of the First Minister that it would cost an additional five millions to deepen the Welland Canal to fourteen feet. The Premier acknowledged virtually that this would have to be done in the future, and surely it would cost less to do it now when the work was going on. It had been stated that the harbors of Lake Ontario were not large enough to justify the deepening of the Welland Canal to fourteen feet. From that statement he dissented, for we had harbors on Lake Ontario sufficiently deep.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Where were they?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—Kingston.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We have had to incur an expenditure of $36,000 to get 10 or 12 feet there.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said there was forty feet of water in some parts of Kingston harbor, and all that was needed was a protection at those parts. There were only three shoals in the harbor and work was now in progress upon these shoals and at an expenditure of $10,000 vessels could pass over them drawing 13 feet.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. gentleman has not examined the estimates.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he had looked at the charts of the harbor. He found there was plenty of water for vessels drawing 14 feet, and that it was necessary it should be of that depth, because the large vessels could lighten or discharge at Kingston, and if they wished to call at other ports for return freights they would not then probably be drawing such a depth of water. However, he found in an appendix to the Canal Commissioners' report a statement of the depth the harbors of Lake Ontario were capable of being made, which was as follows: Kingston, 14 feet; Port Hope, 14 feet; Newcastle, 14 feet; Port Darlington, 14 feet; Toronto, west entrance, 14 feet; Hamilton, 14 feet; Niagara, 20 feet. Therefore it was clear that if it was desirable to deepen the Welland Canal to fourteen feet it need be no objection that the harbors of Lake Ontario could not afford sufficient accommodation. If we could once get the trade of the West into Lake Ontario, there was no doubt it would go down the St. Lawrence and make Montreal a still greater city than it was. With respect to the necessity of deepening the Welland Canal to fourteen feet he begged to quote the opinion of one of our most distinguished engineers, Mr. WALTER SHANLY, as stated in a letter written by that gentleman in August last. He said:

"The object of the Welland Canal is or "should be to do away with, so to speak, the "barrier dividing Lake Ontario from the lake "above, by making the canal of such ample "proportions as will pass, with the least inter- "ruption possible, the largest vessels employed "in the carrying of grain and flour. Chicago "harbor, formerly adapted to vessels of ten "feet draught only, has been improved to "fourteen feet of depth, and with any less "water on its lock sills the Welland Canal will "not properly accomplish the object indicated "above."

He would also, with the permission of the House, cite the opinions of various Boards of Trade which had given attention to the subject. A committee of the Oswego Board of Trade reported as follows:—

"This route now draws more heavily year by year upon the business both of Buffalo and Oswego, and has proved by the experience of the last two years, that grain destined to Liverpool, can be carried cheaper by that, than by any other route, and this too with the disadvantage of being obliged to use vessels carrying 18,000 bushels through the Welland Canal, against those carrying from 30,000 to 50,000 by the way of Buffalo.

"How greatly this advantage will be increased when the enlargement of the Welland Canal is completed, will be readily understood. Unless our Government, adopting the wise policy of our provincial neighbors, shall make corresponding improvemente in our routes of transportation, we shall see our foreign grain export finding its way to market over foreign territory, and in foreign bottoms, enriching our commercial rivals at our expense."

This statement should make us consider well whether the expenditure we were now making was sufficient to attain the object we desired. The Dominion Board of Trade in a recent report used this language:—

"The Executive Council are decidedly of opinion, that uniformity of dimensions in the Welland, St. Lawrence and Lachine Canals, is of paramount importance—that the depth of water (especially in the Welland Canal) should be equal to passing the largest vessels navigating Lake Michigan."

The answers to the inquiry of the Canal Commission as to what extent the Welland Canal should be deepened, were to the same effect. The Toronto Board of Trade replied that it should be deepened to 14 feet; the Montreal Corn Exchange that it should be made of a depth to admit the largest vessels used on the upper lakes; the Oswego Board of Trade 14 feet; the Windsor Board of Trade 14 feet; Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, 15 feet; Stratford Board of Trade, to admit the largest vessels used on the upper lakes; Chicago Board of Trade 14 feet; and Detroit Board 15 to 16 feet. F. S. HALCOMB replied: "The "Americans are adopting 14 feet as the "standard over St. Clair Flats and in "Sault Ste. Marie canal. This would "seem to indicate what policy we should "pursue to control the Western Trade." And Mr. PAGE in his report of 1872 stated:—"No stronger proof of a full belief in these statements can be found than in the arguments of the President of the Erie Canal who constantly affirmed that the western trade should by no means be permitted to descend into Lake Ontario if it were possible to avoid it. They concluded with a rare foresight that once on that level it would be likely to find its way through the St. Lawrence to the seaboard, and therefore urged that no pains or expense should be spared to establish a line of navigation direct from Lake Erie to the Hudson River." The western trade was what was wanted, and if it could be secured by a moderate expenditure he thought the present was the best time to make an effort in that direction. If the canal was enlarged to a capacity of 14 feet just now, as had been well put by the hon. member for Monck, it would be a saving of 50 per cent as compared with the expenditure which would be incurred by the enlargement a few years hence. Procrastination, he hoped, would not be one of the faults of the present Administration, and he trusted the Minister of Public Works would grapple with this subject and deal with it in a broad and liberal spirit. In order to take the sense of the House on the subject, he moved that the following words be added to the resolution :—"And that this House, deeming the enlargement of the Welland Canal, so as to pass vessels drawing 14 feet of water, to be of national importance, and calculated to greatly enhance the benefits to be derived by the country from its public works, desires to record its opinion that this enlargement should be made, provided the same can be executed at a reasonable cost."

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the resolution was out of order.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK desired to call attention to the fact that the resolution did not propose to appropriate any part of the public revenue to any purpose not recommended by the message from the GOVERNOR GENERAL. He reminded the House that the other day a resolution was proposed by his hon. friend from Chateauguay and carried, declaring in effect that assistance should be given to enable Canadians to return to Canada, and that motion was not ruled out of order.

Rt. Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the motion of his hon. friend was not in order, and he advised him to let it stand as a notice of motion. He could then move it in the form of a special resolution to the effect that it was the opinion of the House that the best interests of the country would be served by the enlargement of the canal to a capacity of 14 feet.

Mr. NORRIS said this question was one of national importance—indeed one of the most important that could possibly engage the attention of the House. He feared if we did not take steps soon to lay the foundations of such a canal as he felt certain the trade of this country would require in the course of time that we should be sorry for it. He believed that no hon. member had a better or more practical idea of what was required than the Minister of Public Works, and he would ask the hon. gentleman to look back to the last 25 or 30 years and consider what our trade was then as compared with what it is now. He (Mr. NORRIS) was convinced that the time would come when we would require to increase the capacity of our artificial channels to the ocean if we intended that the means of communicating with the ocean should be through our territory; and there was every reason to believe that our shipping trade would increase in the future in the same ratio that it had done for the last twenty-five or thirty years. He had placed in the hands of every hon. member, within the last few days, a carefully prepared report by the Engineer of Public Works Department, a gentleman of whose professional skill it was unnecessary to speak, and in whose judgment he was certain every one had the most unbounded confidence. That gentlemen had given in that report a better idea of what we would be likely to require than any other report that he (Mr. NORRIS) had seen on the subject. The report stated:—

"This extensive undertaking was at the time considered by many as chimerical, with the means then at command; nevertheless, the perseverance of its promoters, and those favorable to it, eventually succeeded in overcoming all opposition, so that the works of the first Erie Canal were commenced in 1817, and the line opened throughout in 1825. The predictions of the most sanguine advocates of the scheme were, immediately on the completion of the works, found to be more than realized. An extensive, productive, and healthy region was opened for settlement at a time when many of the cities, towns and lands in Europe were becoming over-crowded, so that a tide of immigration, without a parallel in history, flowed rapidly into this new country. This vast territory, which, with in the past half century was a wilderness, now raises an annual grain crop of a thousand millions of bushels, besides yielding such quantities of other agricultural products as supply the wants of its own people, (numbering nearly one third the population of the United States), is now pressing to be relieved of an enormous tonnage of surplus food. Still the line of settlement is yet a long way from the western boundary of the fertile region, and it is stated on good authority that even in that part of it which furnishes the principle supply, there are not yet more than one-fifth of the available lands under cultivation. The extensive and equally valuable possessions in Manitoba and the West, which now form part of the Dominion of Canada, when they are sufficiently developed, as they will undoubtedly be ere long, together with those above mentioned, render it extremely difficult to conceive how adequate means can be provided for the cheap transport of the masses of vegetable and animal food that must find their way to Eastern markets and European countries."

There were two great channels to the sea, and it was a question by which of them the produce of the North-West was to be transported. As Mr. PAGE remarked further on in his report, that trade must go either by the St. Lawrence or Mississippi. He showed conclusively that unless we made an attempt to take that produce through our own channels, unless we laid the foundation of our canals so that we could meet the increasing demands of traffic, the trade would immediately go by the Mississippi. It would be evident to this House when they considered that for the last week petitions had been poured in upon it—petitions which he was sorry to say could not be received—praying that this canal might be made of the dimensions advocated by the hon. member for Frontenac, that the country was really agitated on the question. These petitions came from men who knew the present requirements of trade, and were likely to possess the best possible idea of its future progress, and they appeared to be unanimous that twelve feet of water would very soon be quite insufficient. He hoped that the Minister of Public Works would at least lay the foundations of the canal in such a manner that if in future it were found necessary to deepen it to fourteen feet the work could be executed at a comparatively small expenditure. There were means of constructing a canal on the twelve feet principle, which would facilitate its enlargement. If the country was not in a position at present to furnish the means for deepening the canal to fourteen feet, it would be advisable at least to do everything which would tend to reduce the cost of making that depth in the future. Sometimes we could form a better opinion of the value of a work of this kind when we examined the views held by other parties in relation to it; and he would, therefore, quote a passage from the report of the Chicago Board of Trade on the subject of cheap transportation, in which the Welland Canal was referred to in the following terms:—"In the Western States but little interest is taken in the question of the ratification or rejection of the proposition; it fails to secure to our people any advantages of moment in the question of transportation, not already in process of being carried forward by the Dominion Government without reference to its provisions. Had the treaty required, on the part of the Dominion Government, a speedy enlargement of the Welland Canal to fourteen feet depth of water and corresponding area of locks, the West could have well afforded to grant all the concessions called for by other provisions of the proposed compact. Without this feature, but few seem to care as to its fate. In Canada, a violent opposition has been developed to it, and even in England able statesmen are arrayed against it. It seems altogether probable that the opposition of some, and the indifference of others, will finally result in its entire rejection. It is to be hoped, however, that in any case the Dominion Government will see it so much to the interest of their people to enlarge the Welland Canal to the requirements of the trade of the lakes, that irrespective of treaty stipulations the work will be pressed to a speedy conclusion. With a depth of only twelve feet, as proposed under the present system of enlargement, the work, owing to the enlarged class of vessels now in use on the upper lakes, will stand in practically the same relations to the trade as the old canal has for the past ten years—navigable only for vessels that are obliged to compete for a business at a decided disadvantage." These were plain words, and showed what value the trade of Chicago placed upon fourteen feet instead of twelve feet of water in the Welland Canal. The hon. member for Frontenac had shown very plainly what the Americans were doing to keep the trade within their own border, and had pretty clearly indicated what it was our duty to do in order to retain our fair share of the trade. Calculations had been made by gentlemen who understood these matters, that vessels of the same size could carry through locks of fourteen feet of water 16,000 bushels more than they could carry through locks of twelve feet. For example, a vessel carrying 70,000 bushels of grain could pass through locks fourteen feet deep without breaking bulk, whereas it would be necessary to reduce the cargo to forty or fifty thousand bushels if the canal were only twelve feet deep, which was a reduction of 20 per cent., which would make a very great difference in a year's transactions of a single steamer. He was sure that if the Minister of Public Works would take all these matters into consideration, he would see that it was in the interests of the country that our artificial channels should be constructed so as to carry the largest vessels that could navigate the upper lakes.

Mr. PLUMB said that, although not a practical man, the fact that his constituency was in the vicinity of this great work made him take considerable interest in the question before the House. If we desired to control the trade of the upper lakes, we must provide canal accommodation adequate to its requirements. If the canal were of 14 feet capacity, it would permit the largest vessels navigating the upper lakes to pass without breaking bulk, and would virtually give us control of that traffic. In the meantime we were struggling to do that, and if our efforts were to be effective, some means such as those suggested must be taken, not only to enlarge the Welland Canal, but to increase the capacity of the St. Lawrence Canals. For the present, however, he thought we ought to be content with some proposition for constructing the locks in such a way as to make the expense of enlarging them at a future time to greater capacity, if that were found necessary, as small as possible. This view of the matter was strongly pressed upon Parliament by the Board of Trade and by commercial men generally, and the proper time to prepare for the contingency was when the canals were in course of being built. The lake trade had been growing very rapidly, and the tendency at the same time was to increase the tonnage of the schooners navigating the Lakes. There was an immense competition for this trade on the part of railways, and he also conceived that the Mississippi route was a rival not to be despised, either by the railways or the Welland and St. Lawrence canals. Seeing that such a large amount of money was going to be spent upon the work, he thought it was deserving of consideration whether this additional sum could not be also expended with great advantage, and he ventured to join his hon. friends from Lincoln and Monck in the policy they advocated.

Mr. WOOD said it was refreshing to notice the interest taken in the Welland Canal by the hon. member for Frontenac while the canal at his door was neglected. If the Welland canal could be enlarged as suggested at a moderate expense, he (Mr. WOOD) would have no objection to it, but he contended that unless the St. Lawrence canals were deepened to the same standard the expenditure would be of no advantage to this country. Indeed, there were many who believed that to deepen the Welland canal to 14 feet would simply be doing that which would build up the trade of Oswego as much as it would that of Kingston. He held that the Government were not pushing the improvement of the St. Lawrence canals as rapidly as they ought to. It was of importance to Ontario that they should be made of the greatest possible depth at the earliest moment. The Minister of Public Works said that not more than 12 feet of water could be obtained in these canals and he (Mr. WOOD) believed that statement was correct. He would be glad, however, to accept that improvement if it could be had soon. At present more goods could be carried through the Welland Canal than through the St. Lawrence Canal.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—No, no !

Mr. WOOD said that even at the present time vessels from the West had to lighten in order to pass through the canals to Montreal. It was the interest of Ontario that those vessels should not have to break bulk at Kingston, and that vessels could pass right through from Lake Ontario and return without in either case breaking bulk. The hon. member for Frontenac had quoted the recommendations of various Boards of Trade all over the country, but forgot the Hamilton Board of Trade which recommended a uniform depth of 12 feet of water for the canals. The people of Kingston and Montreal were opposed to the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals because they wanted to have vessels break bulk at these two points.

Mr. McGREGOR heartily agreed with the remarks of hon. gentlemen who had advocated the widening and deepening of Welland Canal. It must be remembered that the trade of the country was growing rapidly. There were now 681 vessels on the lakes drawing from twelve to fourteen feet. The difference between twelve and fourteen was about one-fourth of the cost —that was to say, the saving was about one-fourth. When it paid to carry grain from Chicago to Kingston at eight cents it could be carried in vessels drawing fourteen feet of water, for six cents with the same profit. He was anxious to press upon the Government the necessity of lowering the lock bottoms so that the canal could be built at any time. It was not really necessary there should be fourteen feet the coming season, or even the season following, but the canal should be used for all purposes about the year 1878, when the work should be completed. With fourteen feet, the greater part of the carrying trade would be taken from Buffalo and placed at Kingston. Hoping the lock bottoms would be deepened to fourteen feet, he left the matter in the hands of the Government.

Mr. McCALLUM contended that if we could divert the trade from Buffalo to Oswego, it would pay six per cent on the outlay on the Welland Canal. A vessel carrying 16,000 bushels from Chicago or Milwaukee could afford to lighter the grain from Kingston to Montreal. That was the opinion of practical ship-owners. As to harbors with Kingston and Port Dalhousie having fifteen or sixteen feet of water, no more were needed.

The item was concurred in.

On item 76, for St. Anne's Lock, $200,000,

Mr. ROCHESTER asked if the contract was going on and when the Government expected the work would be finished.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The contract is to be completed by the 1st September, 1875.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he desired information on this subject, because the trade of this section wished to have some idea when the work would be completed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the sum of $36,900 had been expended up to Dec. 31st; the contract was $103,000.

The item was concurred in.

On item 77, Carillon and Chute a Blondeau, $450,000.

Mr. ROCHESTER asked for information as to the progress of this work.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was all under contract on the lower locks; the masonry had just been commenced; the retaining wall was pretty well on; the foundation of the dam was well laid; the expenditure, up to the 31st December, was $126,000; the amount of the contract was about $570,000. The work was a very difficult one, and it was hard to say whether the contractors would be able to keep the terms of their contract. It was not likely they would be. The work was to be finished by the 1st December next, according to contract; the locks might be finished then, but he did not think the canal would be completed.

The item was concurred in.

Item 78 was concurred in without discussion.

On item 79, for Rideau Canal, $8,000,

Mr. ROCHESTER asked what this appropriation was for.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—For repairs that may be required during the season.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he had been looking for a grant to assist in building a bridge over the canal at Wellington Village, North Gower. Petitions had been sent to the Government for some years past to try and get this bridge. Though the revenue of the canal did not cover working expenses it could hardly be called a bad investment. When the Imperial Government handed over the canal to Canada they also gave some valuable Ordnance lands. He thought the Government ought to construct this bridge. The dam near the village had raised the water several feet and drowned lands in that vicinity. Large quantities of grain were shipped from that country, and there was no way to get it out except by scows. Late in the fall this was attended with great danger, and lives were frequently lost in crossing the river. He hoped the Government would see their way clear to building this bridge.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no obligation resting on the Dominion Government to build at that place; and when the Government expended over $50,000 to obtain a revenue of $9,000, that was a sufficient reason why they should not expend there any money which they were not bound to expend. The Government had not the slightest intention of building a bridge at Wellington Village. If the County Council or local authorities resolved to build a bridge at that place and application was made for appropportion of the expenditure such as the Government would be justified in submitting as a vote to the House as a fair proposition, they would consider the question; but no such proposition had yet been made to the Government, and they had no inclination to take the initiative.

The item was concurred in.

Items 80, 81, 82, 84, 85, 86, and 87, were concurred in without discussion.

On item 88, $370,000 for public buildings, Ontario,

Mr. PATERSON asked on what principle the Government proceeded in locating the public buildings. If population was the test, the Government had erected buildings in towns which had far less population than many places which were entirely devoid of them. If the amount of revenue derived was the guide, towns were ignored which contributed a much larger revenue than other towns which had public buildings, such as Custom Houses and Post Offices.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought the question a pertinent one. He himself raised the question when in Opposition upon the occasion of a vote being asked to build Custom Houses at Three Rivers, Chatham and Pictou. At Pictou the Custom House collections were one-half, at Chatham much less than one-half, and at Three Rivers one-twelfth of the amount collected at Brantford. New Custom Houses had been built, or were in course of construction, at those ports. The only principle which could guide a Government in erecting public buildings was the necessity for them, and, although a town might not have a very large population, it might have a large Custom House business. An example of this was found in the case of Windsor, which required four times the accommodation necessary for Brantford. At Pictou there was a very considerable shipping trade that required more accommodation than an inland town. It was his intention during the recess to consider some general plan under which the Government would be bound to proceed in relation to the erection of buildings for the public service. It might possibly be desirable in places that had a population of from 7,000 to 10,000 to have a building containing accommodation for the customs, excise and postal services; or it might be desirable simply to make arrangements with private individuals to get a building erected which would accommodate those branches of the public service; in all cases, looking chiefly to the public interests and not to mere local benefit, as the acting principle in the case. The country had obtained a conglomerate building at Chatham, at a cost of from $10,000 or $12,000, and some thousands of dollars were expended upon it afterwards; but they now found that the business could be transacted at an annual saving of from $500 or $600 by not entering the building. It was a serious question with the Government whether they would occupy the building or dispose of it to the highest bidder. He could, therefore, only say that the Government would consider some general plan upon which votes for such purposes would be asked for in future.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said that the building erected at Chatham, Miramichi, for the purpose of a Custom House and Post Office, at an expense of $10,000 was eminently suited for the objects for which it was designed, and was worth every dollar expended upon it and was moreover admirably suited to the conveniences of the people engaged in trade and commerce. The place used for a Custom House was a disgrace to the Government, and the Post Office was accommodated in a paltry little store, although Chatham was the second largest importing town in New Brunswick.

The item was concurred in; as were also items 90 to 100 inclusive.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER wished to remind the Minister of Public Works of the report of an engineer sent to examine Advocate harbor, and he hoped the hon. gentleman would see his way clear to placing a sum in the supplementary estimates for that harbor.

Items 101 to 103 were concurred in.

On item 104, dredge vessels, $44,000 in reply to Hon. Mr. TUPPER,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the new dredge on the Clyde had been ready for some six weeks, but it was thought advisable not to bring it across the Atlantic in the winter. It was expected it would leave in the course of a week or ten days. The other dredges owned by the Government were :—The "Evans," the dredge on the St. John river, the dredge at Prince Edward Island, the "Canada" at present at Bathurst, and the dredge on the river here.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL hoped the Government would countermand the order for the dredge to leave the Clyde in ten days, as he considered it would not be safe for it to leave before the 8th or 10th of April.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The dredge will leave under the direction and advice of the people on the other side, who, perhaps, know more about that matter than either the hon. gentleman or myself.

The item was concurred in ; also items 105 to 108 inclusive, and items 154 to 156 inclusive.

On item 168, salaries and expenses of the Council for the North-West territories, $33,800, Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked for explanations of the large increase.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he hoped to introduce, to-morrow or next day, the bill promised in the Governor General's Speech, to provide for the government of the North-West Territories. That Bill would provide for a Lieut. Governor to reside within these territories, and also for three stipendiary magistrates, who would have the power of County Judges. The increase in this vote was to provide for the salaries of those officials, and other expenses connected with the government of those territories.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked that the item be allowed to stand over till the Bill was introduced.—Agreed to.

Item 179 was concurred in, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 10th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time :—

Mr. JETTE—To change the name of the Montreal Permanent Building Society to that of the Montreal Saving and Loan Company, and to extend the powers thereof.

Mr. BUELL—Respecting the Canada Central Railway Co.

CHATHAM BRANCH RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether it is the intention of the Government to consider the advisability of taking over the Chatham Branch Railway, or working the same in connection with the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said application was made by a Company either to work that road or assist in finishing it, and take it over for $40,000. The Government declined to entertain either proposition as they did not deem it to be in the public interest to be burdened by a work of that kind. He might add that there were some lines connected with the main line which the Government might think it advisable to assist to this extent ; that rails that were too much damaged for the main line might do for branch lines for a time ; and the Government might consider the propriety,—and had done so in fact—of allowing such lines to use the old rails, as they were replaced by steel rails, so long as they would serve their purpose, the rails to be returned when they could serve no other purpose than that of old iron. It was possible the line referred to by the hon. gentleman might be aided in that way.

SALARIES OF SAGUENAY AND GASPE JUDGES.

M. CIMON demande si (considérant que les juges de la cour supérieure pour les districts de Saguenay et Gaspé reçoivent un salaire moins élevé que celui des juges de la même cour nommés pour les autres districts, et que les raisons de différence de ces salaires n'existent plus), c'est l'intention du Gouvernement de considérer cette question, et d'accorder aux juges de Saguenay «et Gaspé le même salaire que celui donné aux juges des autres districts ruraux de Québec ?

L'hon. M. FOURNIER—Ce n'est pas l'intention du Gouvernement de changer pendant cette session, les salaires des juges mentionnés dans la question.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT LIVERPOOL.

Mr. FORBES asked whether the Government intend establishing a Marine Hospital at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, during the present Summer; and if not, when?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD—That matter is under consideration.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES AT GUELPH.

Mr. STIRTON asked whether in view of the large amount of revenue collected by the several Government officers in the town of Guelph, it is the intention of the Government to take the necessary steps to procure the construction of a suitable building for the accommodation of said officers?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I stated, last night, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Brant, that the Government considered the proper course to pursue in relation to such subjects is to endeavor to fix upon a general policy for obtaining buildings either by rental or building in places where the revenue is of such proportions as to seem to justify it, and before the meeting of Parliament next session, the Government will be prepared with some general scheme which will meet the object my hon. friend has in view.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEGRAPH LINES,

Mr. DECOSMOS moved that the Western Union Telegraph Company be informed that the Government expect that in return for the subsidy granted to the Company, greater regularity should exist in the transmission of messages between Victoria and San Francisco than has hitherto existed; and that better provision be made to secure secrecy in the transmission of despatches through their office in Victoria. That the attention of the Government be also directed to the importance of making better provision for the regular transmission of despatches with greater secrecy than now obtains over the Government telegraph line between Victoria and Barkerville. He said this motion was made with a view to drawing the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the desirability of bringing under the notice of the Western Union Telegraph Company the fact that the Government expected greater regularity should be observed in the transmission of despatches between San Francisco and Victoria. There had been a very great deal of complaint in British Columbia, and particularly in Victoria, the commercial centre of that Province, about these delays in the transmission of despatches. Days and sometimes weeks transpired when no message could be sent between those two points. Regular communication on this line was very necessary not only in the interest of the commercial community, but also of the Dominion and British Columbia Governments. The line was often down notwithstanding the fact that the Company drew a subsidy of $4,000 a year from the Government. This subsidy was granted on the condition that they would keep up the communication. The office at Victoria was yielding to the Company about $1,000 per month, and this with the subsidy would make about $16,000 a year for keeping the line up between Victoria and Swinomish. There were complaints also, that there was no secrecy observed as to the contents of messages transmitted. Since this notice was put on the paper, he believed an attempt had been made to secure greater secrecy by the Company, removing their office from where it was formerly, to another place. He also directed the attention of the Government to complaints of a similar nature with regard to the line between Victoria and Barkerville. He did not wish to ask the Government to go to any extraordinary expense in keeping up this line, but he thought greater regularity might be secured in the transmission of messages between those points. He had been informed by a gentleman from the interior that messages had leaked out somewhere, and requested to bring this matter under the notice of the Government with a view to remedying it. He did not care whether the motion was carried or not. His object was merely to draw the attention of the Government to the matter.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he had called the attention of the superintendent to the complaints with regard to the Barkerville line. He replied that these complaints were erroneous, and if any case could be shown where a violation of confidence had occurred, the operator would be discharged. As to the delays, he (Mr. THOMPSON) could testify to the fact. He did not know who was responsible for them unless it was the superintendent, who did not keep a sufficient force on the line, which passed through a timbered country and was liable to be obstructed frequently. He hoped the Government would have the line kept in better repair.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I am much obliged to my hon. friend from Victoria for calling my attention to this matter. I was not aware, from not knowing the localities, of certain circumstances that he has stated, nor can the Government have any local knowledge of the circumstances referred to but I will avail myself of the information that both of the hon. gentlemen have given as to this matter and do whatever lies in my power to remedy the complaints that my hon. friend has seen fit to make in relation to this matter. I would suggest to him to withdraw his resolution and I promise to give my attention to the matter.

The resolution was withdrawn.

SURVEYS OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. BLAIN moved for returns of reports of surveys of the St. Lawrence River, and the probable estimates of improving the navigation of the river to twelve feet of water and also of fourteen feet of water. He said he had the honor last year of moving a resolution embracing to some extent the matter that was covered by the present resolution; it extended to one branch of the chain of internal navigation, while the present motion was confined to another branch extending between Montreal and Lake Ontario. Last year he had endeavored to draw the attention of the House to the different channels, and the slopes down which surplus produce would be likely to find its way to the seaboard, and he then expressed an opinion that we were not likely to have any very great competition from the western slope; but he had since learnt that the people of the western slope of this continent were now carrying to the Liverpool market their grain, and he found that a competition was springing up in various directions that he did not at that time apprehend. Still he felt disposed to adhere to the proposition he then stated that the line of communication along the lakes and down the St. Lawrence, was the only natural highway from the interior of this continent to the seaboard. Last year he adduced reasons why the freight carried by that channel was likely to increase, and he also submitted that we were able to carry freight down the lakes and the river at one-fifth of the cost of transporting it by land. He further pointed out at that time that the trade had formerly increased, and was every day increasing; and he was prepared to say that while the tonnage of the lakes was at that period 12,000,000, now he believed it would amount to 15,000,000. In order to supply the Liverpool market, it was necessary to transport 250,000,000 bushels of grain; and to supply the markets of the Eastern States 200,000,000 were required. It will therefore be apparent to every one that whenever the line of transportation may be between the grain-producing countries and the markets of the East there the freight must pass; and the proposition would not be disputed that wherever freight could be carried the cheapest, there most decidedly would be the line of transportation. I think it is well to consider, when we are treating a subject of this magnitude, whether it is likely that the tendency of trade will continue as it is at present. He had no hesitation in saying that it would not only continue, but that it would vastly increase. The tendency of people of the present age is to flock to cities. About seventy years ago the comparative population in the United States living in cities and in the country was as one to eleven, whereas now it is as 1 to 5; and it thus became evident that the great question to be solved is the question of cheap transportation. Unless we are able to obtain that, the existing order of society must be very materially interfered with. He felt that it would be well for the Government of this country when laying the foundations of this young Dominion to lay them upon a basis that would last, and in that connection he would mention that it was a striking fact in history that all nations who have come down from antiquity have been those who have improved their inland navigation. In laying the foundation of this country it was well to look at its probable future, as well as to the circumstances of the present time, and he maintained that it was the duty of the Government in dealing with this question to bear that fact in mind, and to lay them as broad as it was possible to make them. He differed, however, from some members of the House in reference to the expenditure necessary to accomplish these objects. He held that if it be possible to so enlarge the navigation of the St. Lawrence in order that vessels might pass from Lake Ontario down to the Gulf ports, it was the duty of the Government to enlarge the channels of navigation so as to permit of the requisite class of vessels passing through. It became necessary, therefore, to consider what vessels were best suited to those ports. And so far as he could understand the best class for the present trade—though it was not the best for an increased trade—was the class of vessels drawing between fourteen and fifteen feet of water. The question, then, was whether the Government should under the circumstances re-consider the policy which they seem to have adopted, and enlarge those channels and so enable us to pass from Lake Ontario down to salt water a class of vessels that would suit all the purposes of the trade of this country. carrying our products to the lower ports and bringing back coal for the people of the upper Provinces. This question of coal supply was an important one for their consideration. Wood as fuel was fast disappearing, and we must resort to coal. If the United States were to cut off our supply of coal what would be the consequences? We would have to pay $18.50 per ton to bring it by rail from the coal mines at Pictou Landing, and lay it on the wharves at Toronto, and it would therefore be quite impossible to obtain under these circumstances. Looking at all the circumstances it became our duty to consider whether we would be able to open up these channels so as to secure a trade that would benefit all sections of the Dominion. It must also be borne in mind that we have a country in the North-West that must be settled, and be desired to shew that our vessels would be able to carry grain from a point 452 miles west of Lake Superior, within the boundary of Manitoba to the Liverpool market at a saving of 50 cents a bushel. Before proceeding further with this branch of the subject he might remark that he had heard objections raised that the ports on the lakes would not give 14 feet of water. That statement be denied. At the time the Canal Commission sat, circulars were distributed over the country addressed to our leading men in which questions were put as to the capacity of the various harbors on the lakes, and this was the information obtained :—

Port Hope had 15 feet of water, and Kingston, Newcastle, Darlington, Toronto, and Hamilton, 14 feet, and Oswego, 18 feet.

Going up still further to lake Erie we find the harbors with the following depths of water :—Port Colborne, Maitland, Stanley, Buffalo, Erie, and St. Clair Flats, fourteen feet. On lake Michigan, Chicago, Milwaukee, and Sault had 14 feet. On Lake Superior the harbors contained any depth of water that might be required. There were no doubt some small ports that had less than 14 feet of water, but looking at the list he had enumerated to the House, no man could truthfully say that the ports on the lakes could not be made available to the depth of 14 or 15 feet of water. He asked a question bearing on this subject the other day of the Government and in answering it the Prime Minister stated that it would cost such a large sum of money to increase the capacity of these channels of communication that he (the hon. Minister), would not be justified in making the expenditure. He held in his hand the report of the Chief Engineer of Public Works that had since that time been printed, and he was prepared to state that there was no substantial difficulty in obtaining 20 feet of water in the St. Lawrence, and there was no single reach in all the canals along that line of communication that would not require to be deepened in order to obtain 12 feet of water. It was a simple question whether or not the workmen should go to an additional depth of a few feet or not. If the estimated cost on the Welland Canal were deduced, it would be found that the entire expenditure necessary to obtain a twelve foot chanel would be $5,000,000, and when hon. members remembered the immense sums of money invested in the various chanels of communication from the West to the East, the item appeared insignificant in the extreme. $150,000,000 were invested in the Grand Trunk, $240,000,000 in the

New York Central, $219,000,000 in the Erie Railway; the total amount of money invested by the United Stated in chanels of communication of this description amount to $450,000,000. By making the small expenditure of five millions we would be able to open up a highway that could never be subjected to monopoly, and controlled by discriminating tariffs. In his judgment, it would be the most short-sighted policy ever adopted if it was possible for the Government to give the country this 15 feet chanel of communication through the St. Lawrence, and they refused to give it. He invited the House to look at the bearings of this question. Let hon. members look at the trade which would flow from the vast grain-growing countries of the West, if we enlarge our canals and improve our line of water communication. He asked the attention of the House to the fact that the United States in 1872 sent to market 220 millions and had a surplus that never reached the market, but which might have reached it of 280 millions. He also asked the House to compare the countries that competed in the Liverpool market with our country. In Russia he estimated the value of the land at $85 an acre, which at 8 per cent. and allowing twelve bushels to the acre would give a rental of 57 cents per bushel per acre. The labor which was chiefly by hand, which was required to produce a bushel of wheat he valued at 79 cents, making the productive price of grain in Russia about $1.36 per bushel. The transportation charges to the sea coast he put at 25 cents, and thence to Liverpool, including transhipment, 20 cents, making in all $1.81 as the price at which Russia could lay down wheat at Liverpool. Now the people of England were able to raise a bushel of grain for about $1.70, so that the farmer there had an advantage of 10 cents a bushel. Turning next to the Valley of the Mississippi, he found that in the well-settled portions land could be bought for about $40 per acre, and taking the interest at 10 per cent and calculating 14 bushels to the acre the rental per bushel per acre would be about 28 cents, labor which was chiefly by machinery, he estimated at 47 cents per bushel, making the productive price 75 cents per bushel. It was established by a Congressional report that the cost of transportation to New York was 55 cents; the charges at New York for insurance, storage, transfer expenses and commission were 25 cents; and the transportation to Liverpool 26 cents; making altogether $1.85 per bushel as the price at which wheat from the Mississippi Valley could be laid down at Liverpool. Now, take our own North-West. Starting from a point 450 miles west of Lake Superior, he estimated the freight, according to the highest rates of the New York Central, at 15 mills per ton per mile, or $6.75 for the 450 miles to Thunder Bay. From Thunder Bay to Montreal, by lake and river, 885 miles, at 3 mills per ton per mile, $2,655; by canal, 103 miles, at 6 mills per ton per mile, 618 mills; and from Montreal to Liverpool, 3,029 miles, at 2 mills per ton per mile, $6,058; making the total freight from a point 450 miles west of Lake Superior to Liverpool, $16,058 per ton, or 48 cents per bushel. Taking land in the North-West worth $6 per acre, and allowing 10 per cent interest, the rental per bushel per acre would be five cents; labor, chiefly by machinery, required to produce a bushel, 50 cents; and freight, as he had just established, 48 cents; making a total of $1.03, or a difference in favor of the North-West of 78 cents as compared with Russia and the Mississippi Valley. However, that there might be no controversy over this calculation, he would take 50 cents a bushel as the balance of advantage in our favor. Last year there was purchased in the Liverpool market of imported wheat something like 85 million bushels, and 50 cents a bushel saved upon that would make no less than $42,500,000. He had taken great care to ascertain the correctness of these figures, and he had not reached this conclusion without the most careful examination. In view of these facts no one could doubt the importance of our deepening our canals so that we could command the advantages he had pointed out. We were now entering upon the work of deepening our canals, and it was of the utmost consequence that we did not, after all our expenditure, fall short of accomplishing the end we had in view. A little more expenditure now might save us a much larger amount a few years hence. But it was not only desirable to deepen our canals on account of the trade with England, but in order to afford better means of communication between the Upper and the Maritime Provinces, so that the West could supply the East with the products of the soil, and receive in return coal and manufactured articles. No country ever became great that had not the elements of national existence within itself; and with increased facilities for inter-Provincial communication our national existence was secured. He had not intended to detain the House so long, but this was a subject to which he had directed a good deal of attention and on which he felt deeply, and he hoped the Minister of Public Works would, now that we were entering upon the work of canal enlargement, consider the suggestions he had thrown out as to the propriety of making the canals of a greater depth than was now proposed.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) did not see how the deepening of the St. Lawrence Canal would increase the coal trade with the Lower Provinces, unless something was done to check the importation of coal into Ontario from the United States. Nova Scotia depended to a large extent on her coal for her prosperity, but the tax of 75 cents per ton imposed by the United States upon all coal exported to that country, had a depressing effect on the trade. The distance between Nova Scotia and Ontario was so very great that unless some discriminating duty was placed on coals imported into Canada from the United States, Nova Scotia vessels would not find it profitable to come to Ontario. With such a duty, however, as that imposed by the United States Government, vessels could carry coal from Nova Scotia to Ontario and take back return freights. In this way the public would be more than remunerated for the increased price they would have to pay for coal.

Mr. NORRIS said this matter had been so thoroughly discussed that it was unnecessary to say anything further on the subject. He was satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Premier, who was a practical man, and would do what was best in the interests of the country.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) did not rise for the purpose of disturbing the policy of the Government, but still he did not see that any harm would be done by a few remarks relative to the proper size of the canals. It had always occurred to him that the vast extent of the lakes and the magnificence of the St. Lawrence dictated the proper size for the connecting links of navigation. The time was not far distant when larger vessels would be required for the carrying trade. If a sum of $10,000,000 more were expended upon the present large sized canal system, it would secure for all time the carrying trade of the great West to the St. Lawrence. He believed $20,000,000 would be well spent in this direction, and he believed the Government would be backed by the whole country if their policy were to give us large canals to the upper lakes.

Mr. McCALLUM was willing to vote for a tax on coals, though he used large quantities of them himself, if a tax were put on wheat, flour, and grain imported into the Dominion. On a former occasion he voted for such an arrangement, and he would do so again.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no objection to the adoption of the motion except this — there were no such papers to bring down. The House was in possession of all the information that could be given upon the subject. He quite appreciated the arguments that had been used in favor of having a 14 feet navigation. The question they had to decide was whether it was better in the meantime, at a comparatively early day to get a 12 feet navigation, which might be enlarged at a future day to a 14 feet navigation. The hon. member for York quite under-estimated the difficulties of obtaining a 14 feet depth of channel in the St. Lawrence river. The hon. gentleman said they were trifling. On the contrary they were immense. A very large portion of the river would have to be deepened two or three feet in order to obtain fourteen feet. As it is, a little over $1,500,000 must be expended to obtain a 12 feet navigation, and to extend it to 14 feet, many miles of the river, where it was all rocks at the bottom would have to be deepened.

Mr. BLAIN said the report stated that twenty feet could be obtained without difficulty.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was, then, the greater necessity why he should state the difficulty which existed in obtaining a fourteen feet navigation. Besides, it must be remembered there was a serious difference of opinion among gentlemen engaged in the forwarding trade as to the advisability of taking large vessels below the Port of Kingston at all. A very large number engaged in the business believed it was to their advantage to shift the cargo into smaller vessels at Kingston and carry it down to Montreal or Quebec, there to be trans-shipped to sea-going ships. He knew that owners of sailing vessels who had sent them to the ocean more as an experiment than as a matter of business, after doing so for several years, abandoned it because it did not pay. That it would pay with larger canals, there could be no doubt, but whether it would ever pay to send vessels from the extreme end of the upper lakes, drawing fourteen feet of water, across the Atlantic, and to South America was a question yet to be determined. Personally, he did not believe it would pay unless with a class of propellers, somewhat similar to those used in navigating the waters of the Lower Danube and trading with Great Britain. Those propellers were about one thousand tons burden, and he believed they carried on a very prosperous trade, but except in passing the Bay of Biscay, they did not encounter any serious difficulties of navigation. Our vessels would have to encounter the whole Atlantic ocean, and at times when the weather would be very rough. He knew it was a problem yet whether that business would ever succeed. It would certainly pay to carry a cargo of say 60,000 bushels through the Welland Canal, elevate it at Kingston and carry it in smaller vessels to tide-water, there transhipping it to sea-going vessels. The cost of elevating the grain would be about two or two and a quarter cents per bushel. In the meantime, all he could say as to the policy of the Government was this—they were proceeding to obtain at as early a day as possible a twelve foot navigation, and if it should be found desirable or profitable on further consideration to obtain a greater depth, there was nothing in what they were doing at present that would much increase the cost of doing so at a future day.

Mr. YOUNG said it would ultimately be found advisable to deepen the Welland Canal to fourteen feet. His reason for thinking so was that it would be absolutely necessary if we were going to make the St. Lawrence what nature intended it should be—the great highway for transporting the products of the West to the Atlantic Ocean—that a larger class of vessels should be able to navigate it—that vessels plying between Chicago, Milwaukee, and Buffalo, should be able to come down through the Welland Canal, and eastward by the St. Lawrence and its canals, instead of being compelled as at present to pass through the Erie Canal. Suppose that the proposition to give 12 feet of water on the St. Lawrence were carried into effect to-morrow, he still held that Buffalo and the Erie route would have the preference, for the simple reason that the price per ton for transporting freight by water depended entirely upon the capacity of the vessels available for the service. He felt pleased to hear from the Minister of Public Works that the proposed deepening to a capacity of 12 feet would not prevent an ultimate deepening to 14 feet—a course which, he repeated, would be absolutely necessary in the course of a very short time. He had heard a great deal about increasing our St. Lawrence traffic, and of directing through it a much larger proportion of the trade of the West. That such an increase would take place with the proper facilities even in regard to trade destined to Europe, he felt in no doubt, but he was also convinced that we would never direct any great proportion of the produce of the West through the St. Lawrence until we had made a connection in the Eastern States, so that we might get our share of that volume that passed from the Western to the Eastern States. As compared to that trade, the amount that passed through the St. Lawrence to Europe was a mere driblet. The Eastern States were supplied with bread-stuffs almost entirely from the West: and some of them did not produce enough in a whole year to feed their population for more than a month. The great bulk of this trade passed not by the St. Lawrence, but by the Erie Canal and other routes, and we could not get that trade till we had water communication with the Eastern States. The statistics to his hand only dated down to 1872. In that year the traffic through the Erie Canal amounted to 3,647,000 tons while that through the St Lawrence only amounted to 681,000, or not one fifth of the traffic of the Erie Canal. This was the case simply because we could not direct through our waters that portion of the Western trade destined for Montreal and for Europe; He was convinced that if we wished to get our share of this traffic it would be necessary to have water communication to some point in the Eastern States, and therefore if we intended to perfect our St. Lawrence and Ottawa canal systems, it would be absolutely necessary to construct a canal from the St. Lawrence river to Lake Champlain. Till then our St. Lawrence and Ottawa routes would be quite incomplete, whereas if that connection was made the traffic through our channels would be trebled. He would not enter into the question of cost, but would simply state that Mr. WALTER SHANLEY had estimated it at fourteen and a half millions for ten feet of water upon the mitre sills. We had a report on the subject from Mr. SHANLEY, and Mr. MACALPINE in which they stated that this route would shorten the distance between the western lake ports and New York by six days time, and reduce the freight by twenty cents a ton, which would be quite sufficient to turn the trade through this channel. At present when we were only receiving about 15 per cent of the western traffic the revenue of our canals was but a very small sum over the cost of maintenance. If we could get even half of that traffic the revenue would be sufficient to pay a reasonable interest on the capital invested, and we would see ten vessels on the St. Lawrence and our lakes where to-day we only see one.

Mr. PLUMB said he had had some considerable correspondence with the professional gentlemen named by his hon. friend from Waterloo, and he knew something too about the carrying trade from Lake Champlain down the Hudson. The Champlain canal was four feet deep and forty feet of top width, and both it and that portion of the Hudson River below Albany would have to be deepened before vessels passing through the Caughnawaga Canal could go to New York. The policy of the State of New York was not to create and not even to encourage any route which would compete with the Erie Canal. He was quite aware that during the late negotiations at Washington a proposition was made that the United States should use their influence with the State of New York to destroy its revenue paying canal, but the Governor of the State had, in his message to the Legislature, put his foot down upon any such proposition, and declared in the clearest terms that the policy of the State would be to enlarge, deepen, and in every way possible improve the Erie Canal, in order to command the trade through the centre of the country and protect it against any rival route. It was therefore quite unlikely, indeed quite impossible, that the people of New York State would ever enlarge the Champlain Canal in order to destroy the main artery of the State trade, and the work which yielded them a revenue. Every one acquainted with the navigation of the Hudson River knew that for the first twelve or fifteen miles between Troy and Albany, vessels drawing very little water frequently ran aground and remained for two or three hours. He could not see, under the circumstances, that the proposition of the hon. member for Waterloo, in support of the Caughnawaga Canal, was at all pertinent to the motion before the Chair. He was surprised at the arguments made use of by the Minister of Public Works in regard to the transhipment of freight. The fact was that the simple transportation of freight by vessels cost but a trifle, and the great proportion of the expense was incurred in loading and unloading. To increase the labour connected with that branch of the trade by rendering lightening and reloading necessary would be very greatly to increase the cost of transportation, and he trusted that whatever improvements would be made in the navigation of the canals and water courses, every effort would be made to reduce rather than increase labour and expense of this character.

Mr. BLAIN, in closing the debate, expressed gratification at finding that the Minister of Public Works was likely to take the matter into consideration. His own apprehension was that the policy of the Government had been settled, and that they had determined upon a maximum of 12 feet of water. He pointed out that the tendency had been upon all occasions to cheapen the cost of transportation in proportion to the increase in the size of vessels, and it had been shown by experience that each increase in the capacity of the Welland Canal was a lowering of freight rates by one-half. About one-sixth of the vessels navigating the Upper Lakes could not pass through the Welland Canal, and he showed on a vessel of 500 tons passing through the Welland Canal, the daily expense would be $125; that upon a vessel carrying 2,000 tons, or 1,500 more would only be $175 per day, thus giving for $50 extra, an additional 1,500 tons. He contended that the day when barges could be used in connection with navigation was past. He combatted the idea that it was necessary that grain should be shifted during transportation over our Canadian waters, any more than in course of transportation over the sea. It was only when navigating the Erie Canal or the Mississippi that this was necessary, because upon these waters it got heated. The First Minister had slightly misapprehended his (Mr. BLAIN's) proposition. He had not in view that a vessel navigating a channel having fifteen feet of water should cross the Atlantic, when our channels were as they would be some day, increased to twenty feet; crossing the Atlantic would be quite practicable with vessels navigating the inland waters. The fifteen feet capacity, however, would give us the next most desirable thing—an unbroken line of communication between the lakes and the sea, ovêr which large vessels might sail without breaking bulk. In reply to the statements of the hon. member for South Waterloo, he contended that the Erie Canal was now navigated to the utmost extent of its capacity. He referred to the proposal before the Massachusetts Legislature to build a double track air line through the Hoosac Tunnel, terminating at the eastern end of Lake Erie, for the purpose of competing for the trade between the West and New York. What he had in contemplation was that we should catch the trade for Liverpool, which would have to be trans-shipped at Montreal. The First Minister appeared to be in possession of some information on the subject of the comparative cost of a channel of twelve, and one of fourteen feet, which he (Mr. BLAIN) did not possess, and which he hoped would be laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is quite impossible. There is no such information in my possession.

Mr. BLAIN said there were surveys made, and it would simply be necessary to make calculations from them in order to give the House an approximation of the whole cost. He considered that under the circumstances he thought it would be useless to pass the address.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) thought the House owed much to the hon. member who had introduced the motion for the valuable statistics given and for the very fair argument based upon them. At the same time, however, the people of the Dominion generally were willing to acknowledge the claims of another line of water communication between the Western grain producing region and the seaboard. The public would admit that the members representing the Ottawa valley had shown their patriotism in not objecting to the action of the Government with respect to deepening the St. Lawrence Canals, but after the appropriations made for that and other works in which the country was engaged had been expended, the attention of the Government might be asked to the desirability of improving the water communication of the Ottawa. He hoped that the same consideration which the people of the Ottawa district had exhibited towards the St. Lawrence Canal improvements, would be shown by the people of the Dominion towards any scheme for the improvement of the Ottawa, provided it could be shown that such improvement would be in the interests of the country. As the report of Messrs. SHANLY and CLARKE on the Ottawa canal was out of print, the Government might very properly cause a re-issue of the pamphlet.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the first reading of the Bill respecting copyright (from the Senate.)—Carried.

COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PLUMB moved "That an address be presented to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL praying that he will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House all the correspondence, despatches and papers connected with the negotiations with the Government of the United States for a Treaty of Commercial Reciprocity." He said that in 1846, when matters had settled down in Canada after the disturbances here and on the frontier, an address was adopted by the House of Assembly directing the attention of the Government to the question of trade with the United States, and in pursuance thereof the Colonial Secretary communicated with the United States Government at Washington, and opened a correspondence with Lord ELGIN, then GOVERNOR GENERAL. Negotiations were entered upon, which, however, dragged along for several years without culminating in any results. The correspondence conducted during those four or five years had in view a treaty covering the natural productions of the two countries; nothing, however, was determined upon, for the Government at Washington was in the hands of a party which had always been the party of protection, and did not favor commercial treaties. In 1854 Lord ELGIN went to Washington and was cordially received by the American Government, although it was difficult to direct the attention of that Government to the question, because it was one that did not interest Americans generally, and trade with Canada had not assumed its present proportions. The facts he had submitted to the House showed that eight years elapsed after negotiations were first opened before a treaty—that of 1854—was arranged. That treaty was very simple in its provisions, embracing only the natural productions of both countries, and it was to remain in force for ten years with a notice of one year afterwards. During the continuance of that treaty, or rather up to 1861, the party in the United States which had always been to a considerable extent a free trade party, held power. In 1861, by the withdrawal of a large proportion of the Representatives in Congress of free-trade doctrines, the Protectionists and Democratic party entered into power, and immediately on their accession to office, which was about the time of the breaking out of the Civil war, the Morrell tariff, which was a strong protectionist tariff, was passed. So soon as it went into operation the condition of affairs with Canada became entirely anomalous, and the attention of the people of the United States was directed to the fact that Canada, under the Reciprocity Treaty, occupied a different position towards the United States from that occupied by any other country. Other circumstances, perhaps, tended to create irritation, and it became certain that before the ten years had expired that the Americans sought to terminate the treaty, which proved to be the case, and it was terminated. The hon. Mr. GALT, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and ex-Lieutenant Governor HOWLAND, proceeded to Washington and returned with the report that they were able to make a treaty for one year. The report of these gentlemen created great excitement, and strong objections were made to the terms which they proposed. The hon. gentleman who had been lately employed by the present Government in negotiating another treaty, was at that time a member of the Administration. After the discussion which arose in June, 1865, in the Legislative Assembly, that hon. gentleman resigned his position in the Ministry, and gave, as his reason for resigning, that he differed with the Government on the question of reciprocity. Mr. PLUMB then read Mr. BROWN'S statement of his reasons for resigning, and proceeded to state that the arrangement proposed by the Commissioners fell through. It was well-known to hon. members that all the predictions of disaster which were made, after the American treaty was withdrawn, proved to be incorrect by the general prosperity which marked the succeeding period. Manufactures sprung up throughout the country, cities increased in population, commerce was developed, the revenues and the banking capital likewise increased, and there was every sign of material prosperity, sufficient to show that it was not the treaty with the United States upon which Canada depended for her prosperity. The gentlemen who were entrusted with the task of consolidating the Dominion carried forward their work; and they had a difficult task to perform, for the gentleman who had resigned his position in the Government, and who was one of the most powerful men in the Dominion on account of his influence in the Press, went into opposition. The record of their success would however, be one of which every Canadian would be proud when party prejudice and differences have died away, and men would take a dispassionate review of the events of those years. Subsequently every man of enlightened views expressed a hope that a commercial treaty would be again arranged between Canada and the United States, and supposed that it will come in good time with the changed condition of affairs in the United States. The House was aware there was a change of Government in the Dominion last year, and following that change negotiations were entered upon for the renewal of the Reciprocity treaty. Every one was surprised that this step should have been taken without any previous intimation having been given to the country. Personally, he was surprised at the step being taken, for he knew well that it was a moribund Government to whom the Canadian commissioner was applying for a renewal of the treaty. Any one who had watched the progress of events in the Republic would know that the reign of the dominant party of to-day was fast drawing to a close, and that the party which would succeed to power was that party whose principles were those of free trade. Mr. BROWN went to Washington, and hon. members knew the result of his mission. In July, the result of his negotiations was made known to the world; but at the same time we in Canada were warned not to discuss the subject because it would interfere with the negotiations. The Americans told our commissioner that they had no proposition to offer for a renewal of the treaty; but if Canada had any proposition to make they would be considered. Our commissioner promised to include certain classes of manufactures under the treaty; still the Americans said they had no proposition to make. Then came the proposition of the sliding scale, but that did not secure the approval of the United States Government; and our commissioner at length proposed to surrender our valuable fisheries which hon. members, now constituting the Government, thought so valuable when the Washington Treaty was under discussion. All this was done to conciliate the Americans. It was said that the sliding scale could have been withdrawn, but it was the proposition of our own commissioner, and would remain to embarrass future negotiations. It was important to know whether the treaty was in a state of suspended animation, or whether it was really dead, because so long as that point was in doubt the trade and industries of this country would not advance as they otherwise would. The Caughnawaga Canal scheme was, he contended, a highly objectionable feature of the treaty, especially as no guarantee was given by the United States that Canadians should have the use of the Champlain Canal and the Hudson River. In Ontario at least, this whole question was regarded as a very serious one, and so long as there was an uncertainty as to the ultimate fate of the treaty so long would our commercial and manufacturing interests be in a measure paralyzed, for permanency in our trade relations was the basis of their success. We should not allow the offer which this treaty contained to remain open, but we should make it clearly understood that we repudiate it, so that if any future negotiations were entered into we would not be hampered by it. It was to test the feelings of the House upon that point that he had brought up this motion, and he hoped the Minister of Public Works would give some explanations upon it. He had heard that an attempt would be made to revive this treaty; that the Canadian negotiator would not be content with one failure because complete failure would greatly damage his political influence in the country. He (Mr. PLUMB) did not wish to discuss the treaty from the manufacturers' point of view, but this he would say that no one should attempt to pass any measure which would effect all the interests of the country without consulting the manufacturing interests, and this he held the Canadian Commissioner had not done. On the contrary, the views of manufacturers were spurned, and the result was none of the great manufacturers of the country approved of the treaty.

It being six o'clock, the SPEAKER left the chair.

THE NEW BRUNSWICK SCHOOL ACT.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. COSTIGAN, for an address to HER MAJESTY, on the subject of the law respecting common schools adopted by the Local Legislature of New Brunswick in 1871, and praying for the passing of an Act making certain amendments to the "British North America Act, 1867." He said the question before the chair is one that has created a great deal of interest not only amongst members of this House, but perhaps in all parts of Canada. It is one which involves, if the motion of the hon. member should be carried, most serious consequences to the future of this country. Now, I, myself, felt the greatest possible inclination from the first part of this controversy to aid the Catholics of New Brunswick so far as was possible for me to do so, as a member of this House, and so far as was consistent with the obligations which I owe to the country as a member of Parliament, and not as a member of the Government. On a former occasion I objected to the legislation of the Province of New Brunswick in so far as it seemed to drive matters to an extreme without waiting for any judicial decision upon the point at issue, and I voted on one occasion in this House to ask the Government to disallow acts of that Legislature which legalized assessments made under an Act which was itself at the time subject to judicial revision. I took occasion at that time to say if the decision of the Supreme Court to which the matter would be referred should be to the effect that the legislation was within the competence of that Legislature, that then I should advocate submission to the law and a resort to that peaceful agitation, which in all free countries produces ultimately, sooner or later, the desired result in the case of all who have particular hardships to be remedied. That decision has been rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Law Officers of the Crown at the time that subject was up for discussion formerly had given it as their opinion that it was competent for the Legislature of New Brunswick to pass that Act; but that was not a judicial decision, and I was not bound and felt no inclination to pay the same deference to the opinion of the Law Officers who are simply legal gentlemen—no doubt of high standing, but still not acting under the same auspices as a Judge would be acting on the Bench. I felt all the more inclined to take the course I did because reading the 93rd Section of the Constitutional Act, I believed the Roman Catholics in that Province were entitled not merely to the rights they possessed at the time of the passage of the British North America Act, but that they were entitled also to the privileges that they at that moment enjoyed. It has been interpreted otherwise by the highest authority to which an appeal could be had, and that notwithstanding it is an incontestible fact that the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick did enjoy, up to a comparatively recent period, the right of having separate schools. This was tacitly acknowledged for several years after Confederation took place, which I think no one can deny constituted the existence of a privilege; and I think it would have been wise to have avoided the agitation that has since arisen, by allowing this privilege to continue. It was remarked by the hon. member who introduced this subject to the House—and I am bound to say that no one could have done it in more temperate language or a more judicious manner—that wherever a people labored under the impression that they had a serious grievance, it should be dealt with whether it might be logically construed into being a grievance or not. Logic, sometimes, has very little to do with political action, and we are compelled to acknowledge sometimes a certain principle in one part of the Empire that we cannot logically, for a time, enforce in another. Need I refer, for instance, to the State Church in Ireland. Everybody at last came to acknowledge what had long been asserted by Irishmen. I mean by this term those peculiarly and nationally Irish—that the existance of a State Church resorted to by a small minority, but paid for by the large majority, was an anomaly that ought not to be permitted to exist, and if it was wrong to impose a State Church upon the majority in Ireland, the same reasoning would lead you to say it was clearly wrong to impose a State Church upon the minority in England or Scotland. But the grievance was manifestly greater in Ireland simply because the great majority of the Irish people were Catholics, while in England and Scotland the great majority, although dissenting from the Established Church, were practically of the same religion. Thus they were all Protestants although diverging on certain points of doctrine. In this particular instance I may say I believe in the secular system—I believe in free schools in the non-denominational system, and if I could persuade my fellow-countrymen in Ontario or Quebec or any other Province to adopt that principle, it is the one I would give preference to above all others, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that in all the Provinces there is a very considerable number of people—in the Province of Quebec indeed a large majority—who believe that the dogmas of religion should be taught in the public schools—that it has an intimate relationship with the morality of the people—that it is essential to their welfare as a people, that the doctrines of their church should be taught and religious principles, according to their theory of religious principles, be instilled into the minds of their children at school. For many years after I held a seat in the Parliament of Canada I waged war against the principle of separate schools. I hoped to be able—young and inexperienced in politics as I then was—to establish a system to which all would ultimately yield their assent. Sir, it was found to be impracticable in operation and impossible in political contingencies; and consequently when the Confederation Act was passed in 1867, or rather when the Quebec resolutions were adopted in 1864-'65, which embodied the principle should be the law of the land, the Confederation took place under the compact then entered upon. I heartly assented to that proposition, and supported it by speech and vote in the Confederation debate. And, Sir, the same ground which led me on that occason to give loyal assistance to the Confederation project, embracing as it did a scheme of having separate schools for Catholics in Ontario, and Protestants in Quebec, caused me to feel bound to extend at all events my sympathy, if I could not give my active assistance to those in other Provinces who believed they were laboring under the same disbility and suffering from the same grievance that the Catholics of Ontario complained of for many years. Under these circumstances, Sir, I have taken the action that I have taken prior to this date. But, Sir, there is a higher principle still which we have to adhere to, and that is to preserve in their integrity the principles of the constitution under which we live. If any personal act of mine, if anything I could do, would assist to relieve those who believe they are living under a grievance in the Province of New Brunswick, that act would be gladly undertaken and zealously performed; but I have no right—this House has no right—to interfere with the legislation of a Province when that legislation is secured by an Imperial compact to which all the parties submitted in the Act of Confederation. So soon as the majority of the people of New Brunswick, so soon as the Legislature of New Brunswick shall see fit to make such arrangements as will remove the cause of discontent, I am quite satisfied that Province will find it to its advantage to do so. It is unfortunate that in any Province of the Confederated Dominion there should be any cause for complaint when precisely the same privileges are enjoyed in the large and most prosperous Provinces. And, while I feel bound, Sir, to move an amendment to the hon. gentleman's motion, which will place on record my views of the federal compact and the obligations that rest upon us in connection with it, I shall, at the same time, gladly accord my support to any course which in the opinion of Parliament—if it corresponds with my own opinion—will tend in any way to further the object that the minority in New Brunswick have in view, that is to obtain the same privileges and rights they enjoyed at the time of entering the Union, and which they supposed they were entitled to under the compact. Sir, I have no intention to discuss this matter further, because I conceive that it is quite sufficient to make the remarks I have offered, to indicate my own personal feelings, and to indicate the course that I propose to take. I have merely to say this, whatever may be our religious proclivities or feelings, whatever may be the feelings that actuate us in relation to local grievances, it is not well that we should endanger the safety of any one of the Provinces in relation to matters provided for in the British North America Act, which is our written constitution. Sir, it must be apparent to every one that it we were to attempt violently to lay lands upon that compact for the purpose or aiding a minority in New Brunswick who have a grievance, no matter, however, just that grievance may be—and from my point of view of think it is one they have a right to complain of—however, much we might entertain that feeling we have no right to do anything that will violate our obligation to defend the constitution under which we live. I may point this out to hon. gentlemen in this House and to the country that ; if it were competent for this House directly or indirectly to set aside the constitution as regards one of the smaller Provinces, it would be equally competent for this House to set it aside as regards the privileges which the Catholics enjoy at this moment in Ontario. It is not desirable that we should make the way open for such purpose, and it is not desirable that anything should be done which would excite religious discussions and promote religious animosities.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON — Irreligious animosities !

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The hon. gentleman says " irreligious animosities !" I will say animosities about religious subjects. I, therefore, propose to move in amendment :—That all the words after "that" in the original resolution be omitted and the following substituted :—"In the opinion of this House, legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, encroaching on any powers reserved to any one of the Provinces by the British North America Act, would be an infraction of the Provincial Constitution, and that it would be inexpedient and fraught with danger to the antonomy of each of the Provinces for this House to invite such legislation." On referring to the 93rd section of the British North America Act, it will be seen that the second sub-section states that "all the powers, privileges and duties at the Union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the Separate Schools and School Trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec." The section further says :— "Wherein any Province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by Law at the Union or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the Province, an appeal shall lie to the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council requisite from any act or decision of any Provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education. In case any such Provincial law as from time to time seems to the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council or any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper Provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section and of any decision of the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council under this section." If we were to proceed under that section we would proceed to enact a school law for New Brunswick here, but the very fact that the hon. member for Victoria moved an address to the Imperial Parliament inviting this legislation, shows that he admits we have no power under the Constitution to proceed with this matter. I have no desire to protract the discussion because I believe I have said in very few words all that is absolutely necessary under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said he hsd listened with very great attention to the hon. Premier, and not only with attention, but with pleasure. The liberality of the principles which he had expressed was such as would be satisfactory to the people of the whole country. The hon. Premier had his own opinions upon the question of separate schools, but as a true statesman he respected the opinions and the principles of others, and that was the only way Government could be carried on in a country like ours, composed of different and sometimes conflicting elements. He (Mr. CAUCHON) agreed with the Premier that it was exceedingly dangerous to violate the compact entered into by the several Provinces by the Act of Confederation. He was not one of the framers of our Constitution, but it would be admitted he had done his utmost by pen and speech to carry it out faithfully and successfully. He believed that there had been great want of foresight in the framing of that Constitution, because, while it secured separate schools to the minority in Ontario and Quebec, it placed the Catholics of New Brunswick upon a different footing. That was a great misfortune. If the Catholics of New Brunswick had believed they would not be placed upon the same footing as the minority in Upper and Lower Canada by the Act of Confederation they would not have agreed to Confederation, nor would the Catholics of Lower Canada, and therefore this question would have had to be settled then, while the Constitution was being framed. But at the invitation of leading men in Quebec, Confederation was accepted and now we should not violate the Constitution we had accepted even to redress a wrong which should have been foreseen and guarded against by the framers of the Constitution. Unfortunately since then legislation had been enacted in New Brunswick which had aroused such a feeling as, if not allayed, might be dangerous to the Confederation. He took the ground that we should stand by the Constitution, but at the same time that it was the duty of every lover of this country to so work the Constitution that no class of the people would be oppressed under it. If we wished to keep the Confederation together and promote harmony in all its parts we must yield one to the other. He did not ask any one to sacrifice important principles, but we shall all respect the principles of each other and do nothing that would be regarded as an act of oppression to any portion of the people. It was only by such means that we could have harmony within the Confederation. For these reasons though he approved of the motion of the Premier as far as it went, he thought it was not complete.

Mr. BABY—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said he was prepared in this instance to stand by the framers of the constitution—the men who were the leaders of hon. gentlemen who were now crying "hear, hear!" If any one was to blame for the difficulty in which we were now placed it was those men who framed the constitution. Why did they not place in it those safeguards which would have prevented all this trouble? If there was a duty to perform in this matter it was they who should have performed it. If the constitution was bad it was they who made it so, and yet the hon. gentlemen who supported these men and approved of their course now cried sneeringly "hear hear!" to the proposition that we should do by harmonious means what they should have done by means of the constitution. They should be ashamed of themselves or else be ashamed of their leaders for doing that which they supported them in doing. But he was not going so far as that. He would simply say that we were in a difficult position, and we should deal with this question not with the desire to make political capital out of it, but in a calm, deliberate spirit, with a disposition to concede something for the sake of harmony, to go half way to meet the difficulty. He hoped the vote we would give to-night would be a strong and telling vote—a vote which would have an effect not only in the Province of New Brunswick, but which would convince England and convince HER MAJESTY that there were some people in one corner of this Confederation that were suffering, and that while we had no power to interfere by any legislation of ours, and that would induce HER MAJESTY to use her great influence to remedy the great evil complained of. We had no power without violating the Constitution to do anything more than use what moral force we could command to bring about an amicable settlement of this difficult question, and every lover of his country, every lover of the Constitution, would join with him in endeavoring to have it settled in that way. As representatives here of the whole Confederation the stronger the vote in that direction the better for the object we had in view. If the whole House would vote for the motion he intended to propose the more certain would be the result. And that result would be what it was in Upper Canada. He remembered the struggle they had over the separate school question, but although four-fifths of the people of Ontario were Protestants, there were now no complaints of the separate school system. However, he was not going to discuss that point. All he wanted was to promote harmony and good feeling among the people, and to do this without breaking the Constitution. He, therefore, begged leave to move in amendment to the motion of the Premier, seconded by Hon. Mr. BLAKE, that the following words be added :—

"That on the 29th May, 1872, the House of "Commons adopted the following resolution : "'This House regrets that the School Act "'recently passed in New Brunswick is unsatis- "'factory to a portion of the inhabitants of that "'Province, and hopes that it may be so modi- "'fied during next session of the Legislature of "'New Brunswick as to remove any just grounds "'of dissatisfaction that now exists.' That this "House regrets that the hope expressed in the "said resolution has not been realized. And "that an humble address be presented to HER "MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY THE QUEEN, "embodying this resolution and praying that "HER MAJESTY will be graciously pleased to "use her influence with the Legislature of New "Brunswick to procure such a modification of "the said Act as shall remove such grounds of "discontent."

The resolution he had referred to was passed by a vote of 117 to 42, and that resolution he proposed should still be adhered to. The basis of his resolution was the same as that which the House had adopted, and those who voted for the former resolution should, if they wished to be consistent, vote for this resolution, unless they had changed their minds and were ready to say that the Catholics of New Brunswick should not have schools which they could conscientiously support. He proposed to repeat the expression of regret that we had pronounced before, and as that had proved insufficient, to go further and ask HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY to use her influence in the same direction ; and everyone who wished to have this question settled without uselessly breaking up the constitution should support him in that course.

Mr. COSTIGAN said before a vote was taken on this amendment, which he presumed contained very important principles, he felt obliged to ask for an adjournment of the debate (cries of No ! No !). He hoped his request would not be refused until he had stated his reasons. The House was well aware that before the discussion on this question commenced, his motion had been on the paper for several days. This was not done on this occasion. He, for one, had no opportunity of knowing what the amendment was. He had heard it imperfectly read, and he thought it was due to those who were favorable to his motion, that they should be given an opportunity to realize to the fullest extent the consequences growing out of this new motion. The Government had asked for an adjournment of the debate on Monday night, though the motion was on the notice paper, for a long time, and though the House seemed prepared to vote. He was satisfied that if the vote had been taken at that time, there would have been a majority in favor of his motion. Since they had been obliged so ask for an adjournment of the debate, it was unfair to refuse him an adjournment now. There was one objection which he had to this amendment, and it was one of the reasons on which he based his claim for delay. Up to this time the House had not affirmed the principle that it could not take the course suggested in his motion. If he understood the reading of this amendment, it clearly laid down the principle that the Catholics of New Brunswick would be debarred for ever from coming to this House again to have their case considered. He quite appreciated the political advantages to be derived from such a course. He could well understand the inconvenience which this question might cause to some hon. members in this House, but he would regret if any hon. member who had heretofore expressed himself favorable to his proposition should hasten to bind himself by adopting this amendment which would preclude him from giving that justice to the minority of New Brunswick to which they were entitled. The object of the hon. member for Quebec was to reaffirm the principal affirmed in 1872, and which was followed by failure. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there could be no difficulty in understanding the amendment, and there was no reason why this debate should be adjourned. The Government did not ask for the adjournment last Monday night. An hon. gentleman made the motion and the debate was adjourned accordingly. The whole night was set apart for the consideration of this question, and the House might as well finish it at once.

Mr. MASSON said the original motion, with the amendment of the hon. member for South Bruce, and the amendment of the hon. member for Joliette, had been placed on the journals, so that all could see them and understand what they were asked to vote upon. That was an open and honest way to deal with the question.

For two days the Government had been concocting motions, and now one of them was sprung on the House, of which even the hon. member for Victoria had been kept in the dark. It was a ruse to prevent the hon. member for Joliette from moving his motion. The adjournment of the debate on Monday night was on the motion of the hon. member for North York, but when it was resumed this evening it was not by that hon. gentleman, but by the Premier, whose statement that the Government had nothing to do with it would hardly be credited. The hon. member for Victoria had taken such a stand in this House that he was entitled to have done for him what he had done for the Government.

A division was then taken on the motion for adjournment, which was defeated on the following division:—

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) entered the House too late to vote. He stated that he had travelled ninety miles to record his vote on this question, and if he had been in the Chamber in time he would have voted with the yeas.

Mr. MASSON said the hon. member for South Bruce was really a very powerful man. He could not move his own resolution, but succeeded in getting some one else to move it for him. He (Mr. MASSON) was sure that those hon. members whose eloquent voices had been heard in this House only the other night in favor of the Catholics of New Brunswick —he referred to the members for Montreal

West, and Centre—would record their votes against this amendment, which was no other than that of the hon. member for South Bruce accompanied by a little soothing draught to make it more palatable. It was difficult to discuss this very important amendment. The House had hardly been afforded the necessary time to look into it, and to compare it with the other motions which had been submitted. the hon. member for Quebec Centre had contended that the House must respect the constitution. There was not a member in this Parliament who respected the constitution more than he (Mr. MASSON) did, as would be seen by the vote he recorded on the proposition to change the constitution of the Senate. There were no serious grounds for that change, but in the present instance there were reasons which necessitated some amendment to the constitution. He remembered when the CHAUVEAU amendment was before the House three years ago, the hon. member for Quebec Centre, who was then very favorable to the Administration (it was very extraordinary, but the hon. gentleman was always in favor of the Administration of the day) was entirely in favor of changing the constitution, and of an appeal to HER MAJESTY to do justice to the Catholics of New Brunswick. The hon. member on that occasion voted for a resolution almost exactly the same as that which the member for Victoria had submitted to the House, and further in his correspondence to his own paper, the Journal de Quebec on the 25th May, he read as follows:—"In my last letter I spoke of the COSTIGAN motion and the consequences that would follow, but all danger is now past. It is Mr. CHAUVEAU who has cut the Gordian knot of the resolution. He has by that means caused all the perils of the case to disappear. In fact his proposition which will be accepted by the Government, will also be accepted by Mr. COSTIGAN, who is it appears, himself, far more satisfied with it than with the motion, which would have brought on a Ministerial crisis. This amendment comes to the assistance of the Provinces who had separate schools before the Union, whether those schools were established by law or not; but an Imperial Act would be more just and more far-seeing (prèvoyant) if it gave to the minorities of the Provinces distinctly the right to separate schools." This was the same hon. gentleman who now told the House that there was danger in asking the Imperial Government to alter the Constitution, because he happened at this moment to support the Government, as he did on the former occasion the late Administration. Every member of this House must have heard with deep regret the expression which fell from the Minister of Public Works, when he threatened the Catholics of Ontario. The minority in that Province had nothing to fear from the adoption of this resolution or the disallowance of the unjust law of the Province of New Brunswick. He had no fear that the majorities of Ontario and Quebec would ever deal unjustly with the minorities in those Provinces, but if they should, he hoped such legislation would be thrown to the wind by this Parliament. The hon. member for Quebec Centre found fault with those who framed the Confederation Act, or rather threw the responsibility of the deficiency in this Act, which permitted such legislation as the New Brunswick School Act, on the framers of the Constitution. Well, when the British North America Act was under discussion in 1866, an amendment could have been introduced to remedy this defect if the previous question had not been moved, shutting out all amendments. Among the hon. gentlemen who voted for the previous question was the hon. member for Quebec Centre, who, therefore, must share the responsibility for the existence of this defect in the Constitution. The amendment before the House was a proposition to exercise moral suasion, and was similar to the COLBEY amendment of 1872. Among the members who voted for that "chicken broth" motion three years ago were Messrs. FOURNIER, GEOFFRION, and HOLTON. If these hon. gentlemen did not think at that time they should vote for a suasion motion, how could they vote for this amendment especially after they had seen the result of the moral suasion plan? Though he voted against that motion himself, he admitted there were reasons for supporting it at that time. They had assurances from the representatives of New Brunswick in this Parliament that the Legislature of that Province would do justice to the Catholic population. Three years had passed and nothing was done by the local authorities and there was now good reason for opposing this suasion motion. Three years ago Mr. DORION moved a vote of want of confidence in the Government for not disallowing that Act, and every one of the members of the present Cabinet, from Quebec, voted for that motion. Yet the hon. member for Quebec Centre, in the face of that vote, charged the Opposition with making political capital out of this question. In 1872 the Liberal Press of Quebec could not say enough in favor of Conservatives from that Province who opposed the late Government in the cause of the Catholics of New Brunswick. They were quite enthusiastic, and contended that Mr. MASSON and Mr. BELLEROSE should not be opposed in their elections. They almost erected triumphal arches for him (Mr. MASSON) for his course on that occasion. When Sir GEORGE CARTIER died and a successor was looked for to supply his place in the Cabinet the Liberal Press of Quebec in discussing the question said: "Mr. MASSON cannot be expected to accept the position while the New Brunswick School Act remains in force and the North-West question is settled." Why was not the same principle applied to the hon. gentlemen from Quebec who now occupied seats on the Treasury Benches? He did not find fault with them, but it was unbecoming for the hon. member for Quebec Centre, under the circumstances, to charge the Opposition with being actuated by political feeling in the course they pursued. It was evident that the two amendments were so arranged as to go together. As matters stood, the Opposition could not vote for a motion which declared that the Constitution should not be changed even when the minority in New Brunswick were deprived of their rights.

Mr. BOWELL desired to offer a few remarks in explanation of the vote he was about to give. He intended to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec Centre and for this reason: because he (Mr. BOWELL) was opposed to the passage of any resolution by the House which would interfere in any way directly or indirectly with the legislation of the Province of New Brunswick or any other Province upon any question, and, if he understood the motion aright it was similar in character to that which was proposed by the hon. member for Stanstead, two or three years ago, which asked the interference of the Imperial Government. If the motion proposed by the hon. First Minister, which raised a fair and square issue, had been put to the House without any milk-and-water amendment, he would have had great pleasure in voting for it.

Mr. DEVLIN said that it was the right and proper course for him to adopt under the circumstances in which he found himself placed, to offer some explanations as to the vote he was about to record. When the question was before the House on Monday evening last he stated briefly his opinion thereon. He endeavoured to express his sympathy with the Catholics of New Brunswick who, he believed, were oppressed by the present position of the School Law; and he then stated that he was prepared to vote for the resolution offered by the hon. member for Victoria. At that time the Government had not enunciated any policy upon the subject and hon. members were ignorant of the course they intended to pursue; in fact it was only to-night that the House had become aware of the course they would pursue, as set forth in the amendments submitted to the House. He still held the opinion he enunciated on Monday evening last. He did not believe that the constitution of which so much had been said was so inviolable that it could not be interfered with; on the contrary he held that when a great grievance arose for which the constitution provided no remedy, it was within the jurisdiction of this House, and that it was a matter that ought to be fairly considered by it, to have such changes made in the constitution as would enable either the Local Legislature or the Dominion Parliament to redress the grievances complained of, provided always that it was a grievance that could be reasonably admitted. Entertaining that opinion, he nevertheless held that the amendment proposed met the case better than the resolution moved by the member for Victoria. He did not rise in his place to advocate that measure on behalf of the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick from any political point of view. He looked upon the question as one of vast importance from which political exigencies ought to be eliminated, and he approached the question as one affecting the liberties of 96,000 Catholics. He did not rise to make a speech which might make him popular at some coming election and throw away the opportunity which the liberality of the House presents for the redress of the grievance under which his co-religionists in New Brunswick were suffering. After listening to the discussions which had taken place he thought that hon. members who were not Catholics had shown a warm and generous sympathy for the sufferings of the New Brunswick Catholics, and he felt he would be wanting in his duty if he did not reciprocate the kindly feeling which had been evinced, and meet the friends who were prepared to support them half way; and he was prepared to do that as he believed were the overwhelming majority of his co-religionists in that House. When he spoke of the minority in New Brunswick, he might also speak of the minority in the House. The Catholic members formed a small minority and constituted as the House at present was, they had to trust largely to the liberality and Christianity of their Protestant fellow-members to obtain justice when they required it. Upon the resolution was to be founded an address to HER MAJESTY the QUEEN, praying that she use her powerful influence with the Legislature and Government of New Brunswick to relieve the Catholics from the difficulty in which they were placed. We know as a matter of fact that QUEEN VICTORIA had been often appealed to use her influence to avert war and difficulty between foreign nations, and her interposition had on more than one occasion been successful; and who could doubt for a moment that, when HER MAJESTY was called upon to settle a difficulty, not between two foreign nations but between her own subjects, she would take a lively interest in settling that difficulty in a manner which would restore peace and harmony in the Province of New Brunswick, in whose welfare we were all so much interested. He believed the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Quebec Centre would fully meet the exigencies of the case. But if it should appear that the Legislature of New Brunswick turned a deaf ear not only to the expression of opinion which would go forth from this House, but to the intervention of HER MAJESTY, then he apprehended that it would be for the Roman Catholic minority to appeal once more to the justice and liberality of the House to interfere more actively for the relief of the Catholics of New Brunswick. He believed there was not a loyal man in the Dominion who would not feel outraged if the Legislature of New Brunswick was to refuse the friendly intervention of HER MAJESTY, and there was no member of the House who would hesitate to have recourse to the strongest measures that could be employed under the constitution to obtain the relief of the Roman Catholics. He desired the House to remember that the RIEL question and the New Brunswick school question were legacies received by the present Government from the late Government, and he thanked the First Minister for the position taken by Government upon this school question.

Mr. COLBY said the amendment was in substance the one he proposed in 1872, and which he believed at that time was an appropriate expression of the sentiments of the House as maifested in the discussion at that period. It was evident then, when this question was for the first time brought before Parliament, that some kindly feeling towards the minority in New Brunswick existed, as he was happy to find existed now. It was at that time supposed that an expression of this House given in the way in which it was embodied in the resolution would accomplish the result aimed at, and members who at that time voted for the resolution did so, having good reason to believe, from the expressions made use of by the representatives of New Brunswick in this House, and by prominent men from that Province who were in the city, to hope that a moderate, temperate and kind expression of sentiment would be properly received by the Legislature of New Brunswick, and that this unhappy condition of affairs would be terminated. He thought the expression conveyed in the resolution adopted at that time was a happy one. But since that time circumstances had much changed, and an expression of opinion which would have been appropriate then, might be exceedingly inappropriate now. It was at that time a new question: it had not been been discussed by the people; it had not been submitted to the highest tribunal of the empire, it was a question which had not been voted upon by the electors at the polls, and it was one on which instructions had not been given to representatives in this House. But three years had elapsed since that time, and the New Brunswick school question had been discussed throughout the length and breadth of the land, in every hamlet and every household. There were settled convictions on this great question now. There were many men in this Dominion who believed in the constitutional prerogative of the Legislature of New Brunswick to deal with this question, and who were jealous of any attempt to interfere with that prerogative. There were others who believed that the Catholic minority did actually enjoy certain rights anterior, and for many years subsequent to Confederation, of which they had been deprived by the action of the Legislature, and who desired that the necessary legislation should be accomplished which would restore to them the rights and privileges which they so enjoyed. There were two parties in this House and two parties in the country who entertained honest but different convictions on this important subject. When the motion of the member for Victoria was submitted to the House, followed by the amendments proposed, he hoped the question would be finally settled so that it might cease to be a subject of irritation, controversy and agitation in the Dominion. There was a time when the question could be approached and decided so satisfactorily, so far as the House could decide it, as at the present time. We were not, fortunately, in a period of political excitement. There were no elections at hand which would change the views and actions of hon. members, and if ever a disinterested expression of the House could be given it was at this time. Those hon. members who had, in effect, prevented a full and decided expression of the sentiments of the House, had taken upon themselves a grave responsibility. If it were found that the question were again brought before Parliament two or three years hence, when the country was agitated by other excitements; if the question were brought up in the heat of a general election, and prove a cause of annoyance to hon. members in their constituencies, the responsibility would rest on those hon. gentlemen who had prevented the final settlement of the question at this time. If the House affirmed the amendment, he ventured to say, however satisfactory it might be to hon. members, however much it might relieve them from a temporary difficulty, the result would satisfy no party outside of the House. The Protestants of New Brunswick would not be pleased if this House ventured for a second time to express an opinion which they had previously considered a piece of impertinence. The Catholics of New Brunswick would not be pleased by being tampered with and played with in this way. The Protestants of the Dominion who believed the subject should be definitely settled by a strong Government, would not be pleased by the solution proposed. It might relieve members from the present difficulty, but it would return with tenfold power at some future period.

Mr. BARTHE admitted that the amendment of the hon. Premier was submitted with all the strong reasoning which characterised his speeches, but it contained an abstract principle which, under the present circumstances, he (Mr. BARTHE) could not approve. The amendment submitted by the hon. member for Quebec Centre was not practical, and it was desirable that a settlement of the question should be arrived at. There were various sources of discontent in the Dominion. He admitted that the question of amnesty had been settled to his satisfaction, and he hoped to the satisfaction of the whole country, and he thought that if the Opposition, including the members for Terrebonne and Bagot, had been in office, they would not have disposed of this question in a more satisfactory manner than that in which it had been settled. The feeling of the people of the Province of Quebec was that the clemency of the Crown should have been exercised more fully in the case. They felt, however, that the Government upon that occasion did their duty. The question now before the House was equally important with that, if not the more important of the two. The Catholics of New Brunswick, indeed the Catholics of the whole of Canada, were dissatisfied with the state of things in that Province. The system existing there he did not hesitate to call an unjust and a most unfair one, against reason and against conscience, and he maintained that no one could properly lay claim to liberality and support it. What would the minority of the Province of Quebec have said had the majority there refused to give them their just rights? If those rights had been refused, and an appeal to this House had been found necessary, he felt quite sure that it would not have been refused, but that Roman Catholics and Protestants would have voted together to concede the same rights to them as were asked by his (Mr. BARTHE's) co-religionists in New Brunswick. He did not see why they should not give to the minority of New Brunswick the same liberal concessions that had been given so liberally to the minority of Quebec. If discontent were sown, we would reap anarchy; and if that unfortunate result did not arise today, it may come perhaps another day. Some time past, there was in Quebec a party who, for commercial reasons sought for annexation to the United States. They were dissatisfied with their commercial position, and hoped to better it by the change. But dissatisfaction arising from religious causes was much more intense than when it arose from commercial feelings; and if we wished to have peace and prosperity in this Dominion, to have the whole people working together for the good of their common country, we must give satisfaction to every one; for we lived in a country of the greatest liberty, as was always the case under the great and glorious flag of Great Britain. He hoped the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec would be lost, because it was not practical, and that the motion of the hon. member for Victoria would be carried. If, however, the amendment was carried, and went to England, he hoped the people of New Brunswick would repair the breach before any action could be taken from across the Atlantic, give way to the desire of this House, and render justice to the oppressed minority. If the hon. members who represented that Province in this House acted otherwise, they would incur a very great responsibility. He (Mr. BARTHE) had been in this House before, and he gave a liberal support to the Government which was in power at the time, but upon this particular question, when he found their policy was one of which he did not approve, he did not hesitate to vote against them. He had also given a liberal support to the present Government, but he had promised to his constituents to do the utmost justice to the Catholics of New Brunswick, and for that reason and for the reasons he had already given, he would vote against the motion of the hon. member for Quebec, and according to the observations he had made.

L'hon. Mr. FOURNIER:—Je n'ai pas l'intention d'entrer dans les détails de cette question, qui est déjà décidée dans l'esprit de la grande majorité des membres de cette Chambre; et si l'hon. député de Terrebonne n'eut pas fait allusion au vote que j'ai donné antérieurement sur cette question, dans le même sens que lui, je n'aurais pas pris la parole ce soir. On ne peut me faire le reproche d'inconsistance. Le parti libéral auquel j'appartiens a toujours été en faveur des écoles séparées et peut réclamer le mérite de les avoir fait établir dans Ontario, dans l'intérêt des catholiques de cette Province. Les conservateurs ne peuvent réclamer un mérite qui appartient aux libéraux, qui n'ont cessé de combattre pour les écoles séparées qu'après en avoir obtenu l'établissement. Or, M. l'ORATEUR, nos convictions sont aujourd'hui ce qu'elles ont toujours été, et nous faisons aujourd'hui tout ce qui est possible et pratique en faveur du principe des écoles séparées, et pour réussir à le faire triompher au Nouveau-Brunswick. Si le parti libéral eut fait la Confédération. il aurait pourvu à la protection de la minorité catholique du Nouveau-Brunswick, et on n'aurait pas aujourd'hui à chercher les moyens de faire rendre justice à cette minorité. Aujourd'hui, il faut compter avec les difficultés de la situation, qui nous ont été léguées par le dernier Gouvernement. Nous avons déjà réussi à régler une de ces difficultés et nous réussirons, je l'espère, à régler celle-ci également. Aujourd'hui l'on nous propose, M. l'ORATEUR de changer la Constitution sans la participation du Nouveau-Brunswick. Quelle a été la conduite du parti libéral jusqu'à présent à propos de cette question? Chaque fois qu'elle s'est présentée, il a courageusement et noblement défendu la cause de la minorité catholique du Nouveau-Brunswick, mais en même temps il s'est opposé à l'amendement de la Constitution comme moyen de régler cette question. L'organe actuel même du parti adverse, a fait notre éloge pour la ligne de conduite que nous avions suivie. J'agis donc aujourd'hui conformément à mes principes. Lorsque le député de Victoria demanda le désaveu mes amis et moi nous le soutînmes et nos votes lui obtinrent la majorité. On sait que l'hon M. GRAY fit une motion à peu près dans le même sens que celle de l'on. PREMIER pour sauvegarder l'indépendance des provinces.

A cette motion l'hon. M. CHAUVEAU proposa un sous-amendement demandant à faire modifier l'Acte Constitutionnel par un acte déclaratoire reconnaissant les droits de la minorité catholique sur cette question.

Eh bien ! M. l'ORATEUR, quelle a été la position prise par le parti libéral sur la motion de M. CHAUVEAU. Cette motion ne demandait pas un changement mais plutôt un acte déclaratoire de ce qui était supposé exister. Et cependant nous avons voté contre cette motion parcequ'elle comportait une admission du principe que l'on pouvait amender la Constitution. Pour ma part, je ne suis pas plus disposé à voter aujourd'hui dans ce sens, que je ne l'étais alors. La motion du député de Stanstead devait être écartée suivant moi, pour arriver à supporter la motion du désaveu, qui fut dans une autre session, emportée par la majorité des membres de cette Chambre, comme on le sait, et remplaça celle de l'hon. M. CHAUVEAU. Et si cette victoire remportée plus tard n'a pas eu de suite, c'est parceque l'action du pârti libéral fut gênée, par des instructions venues, disait-on, des autorités religieuses Ce fut un sacrifice de dignité et d'intérêt de ne pas proposer alors un vote de non-confiance. qui était la conséquence inévitable du premier succès. C'est pour cette raison que j'ai voté contre la motion COLBY. Le parti libéral offrit de soutenir le Gouvernement d'alors comme un seul homme, sur la question du désaveu, s'il voulait adopter cette ligne de conduite. La chute du Gouvernement d'alors aurait certainement amené le règlement de la question.

M. MASSON :—Comment l'auriez-vous réglée ?

M. FOURNIER :—La nouvelle administration aurait naturellement recommandé le désaveu, et si elle ne l'eut fait, elle eût été défaite et remplacée par une autre qui, en obéissance à la volonté de la majorité de la Chambre, aurait été obligée de désavouer la loi des écoles du Nouveau-Brunswick. Eh bien ! M. l'ORATEUR, si la question n'a pas été réglée, c'est la faute de ceux qui n'ont pas voulu accepter les conséquences du vote de la Chambre sur le désaveu. Maintenant les délais sont passés et le plus haut tribunal s'est prononcé et a déclaré la loi constitutionnelle. De plus le Gouvernement Impérial a déclaré que les droits des Provinces ne pouvaient être modifiés ou la Constitution changée en ce qui les regarde que de leur consentement. Que reste-t-il donc à faire ? L'article de la Constitution est formel, et les moyens semblent difficiles à trouver. L'hon. député de Richelieu trouve que le moyen suggéré par l'amendement du député de Québec Centre n'est pas pratique. A-t-il lui-même un moyen plus pratique de régler la question ? Le député de Terrebonne a-t-il quelque chose de pratique à proposer, lui qui repousse toute solution autre qu'un amendement impossible à la constitution ?

M. MASSON :—Je serais prêt à proposer un moyen pratique et efficace de régler la question, si j'étais à la place de l'hon. ministre. Je dirai avec Lord RUSSELL que j'agirai quand j'en serai requis.

L'hon. Mr. FOURNIER :—Je suis prêt à céder ma place à l'hon. député de Terrebonne s'il a une solution pratique à nous offrir ; mais il doit savoir que pas plus ma place que celle du premier ministre de l'empire ne lui suffirait pour faire accepter par le Gouvernement Impérial l'idée de règler cette question par un amendement à la constitution. Il serait certain d'être rencontré par un refus formel, car c'est la politique bien arrêtée de l'Angleterre et signifiée au Gouvernement de la Puissance d'Ontario demandant d'amender les clauses de l'acte constitutionel concernant les conditions financières, de ne faire aucun amendement au pacte fédéral sans le consentement des Provinces intéressées. Maintenant le plus haut tribuual de l'empire et le Gouvernement Impérial ont décidé que la question était de la seule compétence de la législature du Nouveau Brunswick toute demande d'amendment serait certainement refusé. Les hons. membres ne font peut-être pas assez attention que le Gouvernement Impérial a formellement prononcé sur ce sujet, comme on peut s'en convaincre en référant à la dépêche adressée à Sir JOHN YOUNG par Lord GRANVILLE :—

de priver le Parlement du Canada d'aucun pouvoir que cette Acte lui confère."

Eh bien ! M. l'ORATEUR, cela doit suffire pour montrer l'inconstitutionnalité de la proposition du député de Victoria. Le député de Terrebonne serait-il non-seulement à ma place, mais serait-il même premier ministre anglais qu'il ne pourrait régler la question par les moyens qu'il indique. Cependant, la question n'est pas insoluble. Il y a un dernier moyen de la régler, c'est par la conciliation, l'exercice de l'influence de cette honorable Chambre, l'invitation gracieuse à SA MAJESTÉ d'user de son influence auprès de la législature du Nouveau-Brunswick pour faire consentir la majorité à rendre justice à la minorité catholique. Je crois à la puissance de l'opinion publique et je crois aussi à la puissance de la raison. Nous avons déjà réussi, aux moyens de ces deux forces, à règler une difficulté importante. Lorsque notre adresse sera mise au pied du trône et que la gracieuse intervention de SA MAJESTÉ aura lieu, il n'y a pas de doute que le calme, la paix et la justice se rétabliront dans le Nouveau-Brunswick. Le moyen suggéré par le député de Victoria est impossible. Il ne reste virtuellement que celui que nous proposons. Un mal si considérable ne peut-être sans remède. Le député de Richelieu a fait allusion à des évènements politiques qui ont laissé un profond souvenir. L'hon. membre a rappelé que pour des raisons commerciales, un certain nombre de citoyens avaient demandé l'annexion. Je lui ferai d'abord remarquer que si l'hon. député espère avoir les écoles séparées en s'annexant aux Etats-Unis, il sera deçu, car les écoles communes existent par la loi dans tous les Etats-Unis. Si l'hon. député à voulu faire une menace, il a eu gravement tort, et au nom des Catholiques de la Puissance je protesterais contre cette façon de menacer de se séparer et de se soulever contre l'autorité, parce que la demande faite par le député de Costigan ne peut-être accueillie favorablement par la majorité de cette Chambre. Une pareille pratique ne peut manquer d'avoir les plus mauvais résultats, surtout pour les intérêts Catholiques si souvent en jeu dans cette puissance.

M. BARTHE explique qu'il n'a pas voulu faire une menace, mais qu'il s'est servi de ce fait comme d'un argument pour montrer le danger pour l'unité et la paix de cette puissance, de laisser exister de telles causes de mécontentement.

L'hon. M. FOURNIER conclut en insistant que les amendements proposés sont le seul moyen pratique et efficace, en même temps que constitutionnel, de règler la question du Nouveau-Brunswick pour le grand avantage, sous les circonstances, des catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick.

M. BABY : — Suivant franchement l'exemple de l'hon. député de South Bruce, j'avais fait mettre sur les ordres du jour un avis de motion comportant mes vues sur la question actuellement devant la Chambre. Je voulais faire connaître au pays, ma manière de voir, mes sentiments, mes opinions. Je ne voulais pas laisser ignorer au public ma manière de voir. Les hons. membres de l'autre côté n'ont pas voulu suivre le député de South Bruce. Ils ont cru devoir tirer le rideau et nous laisser voir leur manière d'agir qu'à un moment donné. Nous avons été pris par surprise. Nous leur avons demandé un sursis pour pouvoir considérer la situation et examiner les amendements proposés. Ce n'était certes pas une demande si exorbitante ou si injuste. Cependant ils ont cru qu'ils ne devaient pas nous accorder ce sursis, quoique la question soit une des plus importantes et des plus intéressantes qui puisse nous être soumise. Nous avons donc, M. l'ORATEUR, à faire face à la position qui nous est faite. On nous dit : Il est inconstitutionnel de vouloir toucher au contrat sacré ; vous ne pouvez porter atteinte à la constitution sans le consentement des parties à ce contrat ; si vous voulez le changer faites intervenir les intéressées. Certes, j'aime à entendre dire cela très gravement, lorsque, à diverses époques, on a amendé et changé la constitution sans demander le bon vouloir des Provinces intéressées. Et non-seulement le Gouvernement d'ici, mais le Gouvernement Impérial a changé la constitution sans demander le consentement du peuple de ce pays ou de ce Parlement. Il n'y a pas deux ans, pour en citer un exemple, le Gouvernement Impérial a décidé, sans consulter ce Parlement, que les limites des Provinces pouvaient être changées de façon à pouvoir former d'autres Provinces à même celles déjà existantes. C'est ainsi que notre autonomie, nos droits et nos intérêts les plus chers sont exposés sans que nous ayons été con-sultés. On peut scinder la Province de Québec en deux ou trois Provinces. L'avons-nous demandé ? Non. A-t-on entendu les protestations ministérielles contre cette atteinte portée à nos droits ; a-t-on entendu à cette occasion les protestations ministérielles que nous entendons aujourd'hui ? Les a-t-on entendu dire que nos droits étaient en danger ? Oh non ! Et cependant si nous étions divisés, nous ne serions plus rien. Donc, quand on nous dit que nous ne pouvons en cette circonstance toucher à la constitution je réponds que l'on nous fait une grande injustice, contre laquelle nous devons protester de toutes nos forces, car si, sans nous consulter on a changé la constitution pour nous scinder et nous diviser, on ne peut nous contester le droit de la changer dans l'intérêt des Catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick, auxquels ont fait une si criante injustice.

L'Hon. M. FOURNIER explique que le changemennt auquel réfère l'hon. député de Joliette ne peut avoir lieu que du consentement des Provinces concernées, ou s'applique au cas de nouvelles Provinces que l'ont voudrait former.

M. BABY soutient que ce changement s'applique aussi aux Provinces actuelles et continue en disant : Nous avons le droit de dire qu'on nous a fait une immense injustice en passant un tel Acte. Maintenant, quant à la brûlante question qui nous occupe, je ne veux pas, à ce sujet, en appeler aux sentiments religieux ni aux passions. Je dis seulement à ceux dont le fair play existe partout où flotte le drapeau anglais, de faire pour nous ce qu'ils demanderaient que nous fissions s'ils étaient à notre place. Ils s'opposeraient par tous les moyens constitutionnels à une pareille injustice. Ou sait qu'il répugne absolument à la conscience des Catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick d'accepter la loi des écoles communes. Par cette loi, on dit que les enfants n'appartiennent pas à leurs parents pour les fins d'éducation, mais qu'ils appartiennent à l'Etat. Eh bien, pour les Catholiques, c'est le droit du père et de la mère de ne laisser inculquer à leurs enfants que les sentiments et les enseignements religieux de leur foi, ce qui en fait des citoyens remplis de cette loyauté et de ces vertus qui ont conservé le peuple Canadien dans son autonomie, sa religion, et sa fidélité. C'est contre notre conscience, c'est contre la conscience des Catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick d'envoyer leurs enfants à des écoles d'où tout enseignement religieux est banni, ou là où on ne donne pas l'enseignement religieux catholique convenable. Une telle chose est contre nos sentiments. Ne nous forcez pas plus longtemps à faire une chose qui répugne tant à notre conscience, car vous nous ferez l'injustice la plus grande et la plus criante. Je ne veux pas jeter l'injure aux Protestants du Nouveau-Brunswick, ni blesser les sentiments de leurs chefs en quoi que ce soit ; je veux au contraire tout simplement en appeler à leur esprit de justice et de modération. Donnez à nos co-religionnaires ce que les vôtres ont dans Québec et Ontario, c'est tout ce que nous exigeons : justice égale pour tous. Je suis surpris que le député de Québec Centre vienne nous parler des fautes commises par les auteurs de la Confédération. Autrefois l'hon. membre a été contre la Confédération. Plus tard il devint favorable à ce projet, et dans un temps il a écrit un pamphlet dans le sens de la Confédération, et dans un autre temps il a écrit un pamphlet contre la Confédération. Quand l'Acte de Confédération a été soumis à la discussion, qu'a-t-il dit ? Il a dit que nous n'avions rien à craindre, et qu'il avait d'autant plus de confiance en cette partie de la Constitution qu'elle venait des hommes qui étaient alors au pouvoir.

M. BABY lit alors quelques extraits en langue anglaise et continue :

De sorte que l'on peut voir que l'hon. membre approuvait ce qui avait été fait.

L'hon. M. CAUCHON :—Je n'ai pas dit le contraire. Seulement j'ai dit que s'il y avait du mal, c'était votre faute.

M. BABY :—Eh bien ! vous avez dit qu'il y avait du mal et que nous étions appelés à le réparer ; nous aussi, nous trouvons qu'il y a du mal, mais nous voulons y apporter le remède véritable, nous voulons nous adresser à l'Angleterre pour lui demander un acte qui redresse l'injustice faite à la minorité du Nouveau Brunswick. L'hon. membre oublie que j'ai voté non-confiance avec ses amis et avec les conservateurs du Bas-Canada qu'on appelle aussi tories. L'hon. député de Québec Centre devrait se rappeler que lui et ses amis ont voté avec les conservateurs, qui ont voté par conscience, dans l'intérêt public et contre leurs propres chefs. Je ne pense pas que l'hon. député songeait à ce fait lorsque, au commencement de cette séance il nous accusait de faire du " capital politique" de la question. Telle n'est pas notre intention, tel n'est pas notre but. Je crois aussi que l'hon député de Richelieu n'a pas voulu faire de menaces ; je ne l'en crois pas capable ; mais nous agiterons la question tant que nous n'aurons pas obtenu pleine et entière justice pour nos co-religionnaires. L'hon. ministre de la justice a dit qu'il était consistant avec lui même et le parti libéral, en votant pour les amendements aux résolutions du député de Victoria. Je crois bien qu'il est consistant avec lui-même et comme libéral puisqu'en 1856, le parti libéral proposa les écoles communes que personne ne demandait. Le parti de l'hon. député de la Justice s'est alors prononcé pour le système protestant dont se plaignent les Catholiques du Nouveau Brunswick.

L'hon. M. FOURNIER :—Ai-je jamais voté pour les écoles communes ?

M. BABY :—Oh ! non, et je serais fâché de mettre qui que ce soit sous cette impression. Mais le parti de l'hon ministre l'a fait.

M. BOURASSA :—Le parti libéral n'a jamais voté pour les écoles communes.

M. BABY :—Je suis content de l'apprendre. Mais si le parti libéral n'a pas voté individuellement pour les écoles communes, il dait admettre qu'il l'a fait par ses chefs, MM. DORION et PAPIN.

L'hon. M. GEOFFRION :— Puisque l'hon. député de Joliette tient le parti libéral responsable des actes de ses chefs, il doit admettre que le parti conservateur est responsable du vote que son chef, feu Sir GEORGE E. CARTIER, a donné contre les écoles séparées du Nouveau-Brunswick.

M. BABY :—Il n'y a pas d'analogie entre les deux cas. Au reste nous n'avons pas suivi notre chef dans cette occasion ; nous avons même voté contre lui, tandis que les libéraux, eux, ont suivi leur chef, M. DORION, qui avait voté pour les écoles mixtes.

M. BOURASSA :—M. DORION n'a jamais voté pour les écoles mixtes.

M. BABY insiste et dit que M. DORION a voté pour les écoles communes, et que si M. DORION n'était pas le chef du parti libéral, il marchait à sa tête dans tous les cas. Toujours est-il, continue l'orateur, que nous, nous avons abandonné nos chefs quand ils ont mal fait, et nous avons voté avec l'opposition d'alors. J'espère que les députés de Napierville, de St. Jean et plusieurs autres voteront avec nous, j'en ai pleine confiance. Les hons. ministres de la Justice et de l'Intérieur votaient contre la motion COLBY en 1872, qui comporte le même sens que celle de l'hon. membre de Québec Centre, en disant que ce n'était pas le moyen de porter remède, mais qu'il fallait un remède direct. Aujourd'hui ils ne sont pas consistants avec eux-mêmes, ils doivent l'avouer. Ils nous disent, au contraire, que tout est fini, que les vaisseaux sont brûlés, qu'il faut en prendre notre parti et renoncer à obtenir la passation d'un acte de justice ; et qu'il faut accepter ce qu'on nous offre. Mais que nous offre-t-on ? Une adresse priant SA MAJESTÉ de vouloir bien employer son influence auprès de la majorité du Nouveau Brunswick pour les faire renoncer à leurs prétentions. C'est un leurre et cette proposition équivaut à rien du tout. Si encore vous demandiez qu'un acte soit passé, que quelque chose de tangible fût fait, à la bonne heure, je comprendrais votre raison d'agir ; mais ce que vous proposez, je le répète, n'est qu'un leurre. Nous voulions nous réunir à vous, mais pendant les deux jours qui se sont écoulés, depuis l'ajournement du débat, on a ourdi ces propositions et c'est le député de Québec Centre qui a été chargé de nous présenter le plât. Eh bien, ce met, nous ne voulons pas l'accepter, nous voulons quelque chose de tangible, qui soit un remède réel. Nous sommes conséquents avec nous-mêmes. M. le Ministre de la Justice à prononcé le mot "désaveu." Eh bien ! le ministre actuel pouvait fort bien désavouer l'amendement à la loi de 1871 s'il l'avait jugé à propos. Il avait jusqu'au mois de septembre dernier pour le faire.

Voix à droite :—C'est faux !

M. BABY :—Je ne connais pas les raisons qui ont pu empêcher le ministère de ne pas désavouer cette loi. Il avait sans doute de bonnes raisons, et c'était être consistant avec le parti libéral que de ne pas désavouer la loi !

L'Hon. M. FOURNIER :—Le délai pour le désaveu de la loi de 1873 n'était pas expiré, mais la question de constitutionnalité ayant été référée au comité judiciaire du Conseil Privé, il n'était plus au pouvoir du Gouvernement d'intervenir dans cette affafre.

M. MASSON dit que le délai pour désavouer l'amendement de 1873, n'expirait qu'en septembre 1874, mais qu'il ne reproche pas au Gouvernement de ne l'avoir pas désavoué.

L'Hon. M. FOURNIER :—J'ai déjà expliqué qu'à raison de l'appel au Conseil Privé le Gouvernement se trouvait désaisi de la question et que c'est pour cela que le Gouvernement n'a pas pris en considération la question du désaveu de l'amendement de 1873.

M. BABY :—Eh bien, M. l'ORATEUR, on pouvait désavouer cette loi, on ne l'a pas fait, c'est l'affaire du Gouvernement. Mais j'ai droit de reprocher au Gouvernement de ne pas soutenir la demande d'un amendement qui aurait un effet sensible, sérieux et efficace. L'hon. Ministre de la Justice se rejette sur ce qui a été fait en 1872 et invoque la sagesse de la prudence. Quel a été l'effet, M. l'ORATEUR, de la résolution qui fut adoptée pour exercer une influence morale sur la Législature du Nouveau-Brunswick ? S'il y a une différence, c'est que la situation est pire qu'auparavant et que la majorité est encore moins disposée à rendre justice qu'elle ne l'était il y a trois ans. La proposition qui nous est faite ne fera qu'aigrir les esprits, sans aucun bénéfice quelconque pour les intéressés. L'an prochain la question reviendra plus brûlante que jamais, soyez en assuré M. l'ORATEUR. J'avais l'espoir d'une entente, d'une solution qui aurait réuni tous nos suffrages. On a craint de recevoir nos suggestions ; on n'a pas voulu nous donner un quart d'heure de répit. Eh bien ! nous ne pouvons nous démentir et abandonner la position que nous avons prise. Le député de Terrebonne a plus d'expérience que moi et je sais que sa manière de voir à cet égard a toujours été marquée au coin de la logique et du patriotisme. Quant à moi, le côté ministériel le sait, je n'ai donné qu'un seul vote sur la question depuis mon entrée au Parlement et ce seul vote a été donné contre ceux que j'avais toujours soutenus. Vous ne pouvez donc me faire le reproche de faire du capital politique, puisque, au sacrifice des hommes, de mes chefs, j'ai été fidèle à mes principes religieux et politiques. M. l'ORATEUR, nous devons prendre la position ferme et tranchée que nous indique le député de Victoria, au lieu de prendre la route indirecte qui ne mène à rien, ou le chemin des écoliers (pour me servir d'une expression bien connue) que nous trace le Gouvernement. Le député de Montréal Centre a pris une singulière position. Après avoir trouvé magnifiques les résolutions du député de Victoria et avoir mis au service de la bonne cause son éloquence, il est venu nous dire qu'il ne pouvait plus soutenir ces résolutions depuis que le Cabinet avait fait connaître une politique différente. Mais si plus tard, ajoute l'hon. membre, vous avez encore besoin de moi, (l'hon. membre de Montréal Centre), alors je serai avec vous de nouveau. En d'autres termes M. l'ORATEUR : pour le moment je laisse les Catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick à eux-mêmes pour ne pas nuire au Cabinet. Les prémisses de l'amendement du premier ministre condamnent la position prise en dernier lieu par l'hon. député de Montréal Centre ; car il est dit au commencement de cet amendement qu'on ne peut toucher à la constitution. Et quand " plus tard," on viendra demander justice pour les Catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick, on nous montrera les journaux de la Chambre pour nous prouver que nous ne pouvons rien faire pour les Catholiques du Nouveau-Brunswick, cela étant contraire à la constitution ! Il ne sera plus temps plus tard ! Si je signale cette position anormale du député de Montréal Centre, c'est afin de donner à penser aux hons. membres de cette Chambre qui pourraient se laisser tromper par la brillante manière de raisonner de ce député. M. l'ORATEUR, en résumé j'insiste sur ce point que la proposition du député de Québec Centre n'atteindra pas l'objet qu'elle a en vue. Je m'excuse d'avoir parlé plus longtemps que je n'aurais dû, et d'avoir peut-être été trop loin dans l'attaque ; ma bonne foi et ma franchise seront mon excuse. Je remercie la Chambre de m'avoir écouté avec tant de bienveillance.

M. BECHARD :—C'est la troisième fois, je crois, que se pose devant cette Chambre la question des écoles du Nouveau-Brunswick. Que cette question soit d'une importance extraordinaire, c'est ce que personne n'ose se dissimuler. La gravité des intérêts qu'elle comporte, les difficultés qui entravent son règlement, en font pour cette Chambre un problème redoutable et difficile à résoudre. La lutte qui se fait au Nouveau-Brunswick au sujet de cette question, dure depnis quatre ans, et ne cesse d'y créer une profonde agitation, qui, revêtant un caractère religieux et national, soulève les passions les plus violentes. Après les événements regrettables qui ont eu lieu à Caraquet, il faut chercher les moyens de mettre un terme à l'agitation et faire disparaître un danger qui compromet la paix de tout le pays. Quand on considère le système politique de 1867, on s'aperçoit qu'il n'a pas été aussi bien organisé et équilibré qu'il aurait dû l'être. La nouvelle constitution n'a pas pourvu suffisamment à la liberté des croyances et au respect des droits acquis. Ce sont autant d'éléments de discorde et de mécontentement dont les pères de la constitution sont responsables. C'est mon humble opinion, M. l'ORATEUR, que dans un pays peuplé d'origines différentes, il n'y a qu'un moyen d'organiser la Gouvernement pour donner satisfaction à chacune de ces origines, ainsi qu'à toutes les croyances. Il faudrait trouver une base assez large, assez forte et assez élastique en même temps pour donner protection à toutes les croyances chrétiennes. Il faut à tous des droits égaux et une justice égale. La Province de Québec, grâce au caractère doux, pacifique et libéral du peuple Canadien-Français, a vu disparaître toute animosité et toute dissention, et il n'y a pas d'endroit sur ce vaste globle ou l'ordre et la paix règnent plus largement. Ontario a été pendant plusieurs années en proie, aux luttes et aux difficultés qui sévissent aujourd'hui au Nouveau-Brunswick. Cependant, à la fin, le bon sens pratique qui distingue la population d'Ontario a triomphé des préjugés et du fanatisme et a reconnu les droits de la minorité. Depuis ce moment les dissentions ont cessé, tout s'est calmé et la paix et l'harmonie son maîtresses de la situation. Pourquoi les résultats obtenus dans les grandes Provinces ne pourraient ils être obtenus dans la petite Province du Nouveau-Brunswick, si on lui appliquait le même système ? Lorsque ce système y prédominait, la paix et l'ordre y règnaient ; ce n'est que depuis que ce système a été rappelé que les dissentions, les désordres, les violences s'y sont introduits. C'est en vain qu'on nous dira que le système d'écoles communes n'offre aucun inconvénient aux catholiques. Il n'est pas nécessaire pour moi de définir la doctrine catholique à ce sujet. Si un tel système convient aux protestants, il ne convient pas aux catholiques. Que les protestants instruisent leurs enfants comme ils l'entendent, mais qu'ils ne cherchent pas à imposer et qu'ils n'imposent pas leurs vues aux catholiques qui, sur ce point, diffèrent avec eux du tout au tout. Je ferai observer à l'hon. député de Carleton, qu'en notre qualité de catholiques nous sommes tenus de faire donner une éducation catholique à nos enfants. C'est pourquoi nous repoussons tout système d'éducation ou un enseignement religieux différent est donné, ou qui est complètement dépourvu de toute notion religieuse. L'hon. député que je viens de nommer a accusé le député de Victoria de professer des doctrines révolutionnaires, parce qu'il demande un amendement à la constitution. Les doctrines révolutionnaires sont vraiment celles qui ont été produites en Europe par le système d'éducation proné par nos adversaires et qui produite le mépris de l'autorité, de la famille et de Dieu même. Que l'hon. préopinant visite les Etats-Unis et il verra que le vice s'y affiche effrontément, le meurtre y est à l'ordre du jour ; les crimes de toutes espèces y abondent et la corruption s'y développe d'une manière effrayante et gagne toutes les classes de la société. D'où cela provient-il, sinon d'un système d'éducation matérialiste, sans religion et sans Dieu.

L'hon. membre pour Carleton s'est écrié dans son exaltation temporaire que la proposition du député de Victoria nous ramenait à l'union de l'Eglise et de l'Etat rt à la suprématie de l'Eglise sur l'Etat. Je me permettrai de dire que l'Eglise ne eéclame pas de suprématie dans les questions politiques, mais que sa voix doit être écoutée dans toutes les questions qui la concernent, et comme l'a dit un des orateurs les plus distingués : " l'Eglise n'est pas une école d'oppression et d'injustice.

L'Eglise, sortie de la liberté, a procuré la liberté au monde, non à titre de privilége mais de droit certain. Et dans tous les temps, au milieu des plus grands obstacles comme au jour de ses plus beaux triomphes, l'Eglise s'opposant d'un côté au despotisme farouche, de l'autre au dévergondage populacier, a donné au monde la vraie liberté et l'ordre social. C'est ce qu'elle a fait en France, en Italie, en Allemagne, partout. C'est ce qu'elle fait aujourd'hui en demandant pour la minorité Catholique du Nouveau Brunswick la liberté accordée à la minorité protestante du Bas-Canada, ou à la minorité catholique d'Ontario. M. l'ORATEUR, la Chambre sait que je ne prends pas souvent la parole. Mais l'intérêt religieux de 1,500,000 âmes m'indique clairement l'attitude que je dois prendre sur cette question. Cette attitude sera peut-être exploitée contre moi. On la fera voir sous un jour différent de la réalité, et l'on cherchera peut-être à la représenter injustement à mes constituants. Je désire donc expliquer le vote que je vais donner. On a dit que les écoles communes étaient une création libérale. Je veux le nier, car rien n'est plus contraire au libéralisme que la compulsion des écoles communes. Je respecte les opinions différentes des miennes et je crois qu'en cela aussi je me montre vraiment libéral. Car ma profession de foi est celle-ci : En politique je suis libéral, et en religion, je suis catholique. Je prétends qu'il n'y a pas d'incompatibilité entre le libéralisme politique et la foi catholique. Et quand je dis que je suis libéral, on me connait assez pour ne me pas confondre avec les prétendus libéraux de l'école radicale de l'Europe ; et ce que je dis de moi, je crois pouvoir le dire de tous les libéraux Canadiens-Français qui sont membre de cette Chambre. Maintenant, je dois dire à l'hon. député de Victoria qu'il a perdu un terrain immense depuis 1872. Alors il était dans une position formidable, et il est bien regrettable qu'après lui avoir mis la victoire dans ses mains, il n'ait pas voulu en profiter. Et quant aux résolutions qu'il propose aujourd'hui, j'y ai été favorable tant qu'un moyen plus facile, plus efficace, en même temps que plus modéré et plus conciliant n'a pas été trouvé pour arriver au même but. Je crois que nous aurions tort de repousser les amendements qui nous sont proposés, car il est de bonne tactique d'épuiser les moyens de conciliation et de persuasion. Je n'ai aucun doute qu'une telle demande est autant de nature à faire obtenir l'objet que nous avons en vue que topt autre moyen plus violent et plus risqué. Je crois même que notre demande sera mieux accueillie en Angleterre sous cette forme que sous toute autre. Mais ce moyen réussira-t-il ? C'est ce que je ne puis dire, je n'en sais rien. Mais il semble qu'il devrait se recommander à la gracieuse considération de notre souveraine. Au reste, si ce moyen ne réussit pas, je m'engage pour ma part, à ne pas être arrêté par le vote que je donne ce soir pour travailler ultérieurement à l'objet que nous cherchons tous. Si la question n'est pas réglée de cette manière, j'entends conserver ma parfaite liberté de revenir à l'assaut, et de voter à l'aaenir comme par le passé, de la manière dont ma conscience le dictera.

Mr. COSTIGAN said he was under obligation to the hon. member for Iberville, for having given him the opportunity of making a statement with reference to the accusation that had been made against him that he had not taken advantage of the Liberal vote in this House in 1873, asking for disallowance. The facts of the case were these, and the hon. member for Montreal East could bear him out. On that occasion he went into Room 11 with some gentlemen who were friends of the party now in power. There was no supporter of the then Government present except myself. He stated to them that the Government of the day, having refused to proceed further with the matter, he felt he was in a very delicate position ; but as he did not wish to be exposed to the taunt of having dropped this question in order to save the Government, he stated to these gentlemen that he was perfectly willing to go on, and he left it to them to say whether he should go on with it. A motion of want of confidence in the Government of the day was prepared ; and notwithstanding telegrams had been received ; notwithstanding it was thought advisable not to proceed any further, he was prepared to move that motion unless those gentlemen would take the responsibility of saying he should not do so. While he was on his feet he would say a few words with respect to the amendments. He must say that he regretted an adjournment of the debate had not been agreed to, because it might have led to an arrangement which would have been accepted without a division. There was one feature of this school question to which he had never yet alluded in the House, but which he must allude to to-night. In all the discussions which had taken place on this question hon. gentlemen had given him credit for avoiding any expressions offensive to those who differed from him in religion or in national views. He had one very great reason for speaking thus of the Protestants. When the School Act of 1871 was passed through the Legislature of New Brunswick, the Catholics were aided by the liberal Protestants to whom they owed a debt of gratitude. He was obliged to admit that it was through the truckling cupidity of some of the Catholics themselves that this Act was in existence at all. It had always been so. When they had ever failed to maintain their rights, the failure could be traced to the want of truth and principle of some of the Catholics themselves. When the member for Montreal Centre was introduced in this House he (Mr. COSTIGAN) expected to find in him a protector and advocate of their rights, and views when the member for Montreal Center had so changed his views. No Protestant member could be condemned for declining to support his (Mr. COSTIGAN'S) motion when the member for Montreal Center, after warmly supporting it, had announced his intention to vote against it this evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Montreal West) The hon. gentleman is attributing to me an intention to vote in a certain way. I have not spoken on the subject to-night. I hold the same views I expressed last Monday and will vote in the way I then indicated.

Mr. COSTIGAN was glad to hear it. However, this did not alter the force of his argument, which was that when the member who was supposed to represent the views of the Montreal Catholics took such a course, the liberal Protestants could not be blamed if they abandoned the cause. The amendment of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, if accepted, would be added to the Premier's. If the amendment should then be adopted the Government and their supporters would go further than any political party in this House ever attempted to go. It was true Mr. GREY, formerly member for St. John, laid down the same proposition, but the House did not adopt it He hoped the House would not do so now. Putting aside this question, he asked hon. members if some question might not arise at some future day with which this House might wish to deal. Would it be wise to thus bind their hands so as to render them powerless in such matters for all time. The Government had determined upon settling this question forever, and they were doing so by driving the Catholics of New Brunswick from the only court where they could look for justice. It had been maintained by some hon. members that the adoption of this resolution would be a violation of the compact entered into by the Provinces. That compact was the Quebec resolutions, which guaranteed separate schools, and the amendment proposed was not to the resolutions, but to the British North America Act which was founded on them. The hon. member for Carleton asked whether he (Mr. COSTIGAN) had not taken advantage of the common schools of New Brunswick for his children. In his country the Catholics were in a small majority, though in the district in which he when the hon. gentleman raised his voice in loud tones last Monday night, and told the Government what the consequences would be if they attempted to crush out the motion before the House, he thought that the hon. member could be trusted. It was true, too much confidence should not be placed in those who waxed too warm in such matters. They soon cooled again. The Premier was one of those who avoided extremes, and always maintained the one tone. One reason why an adjournment should be granted, was to prevent the hon. member for Montreal Centre from rushing into a position which he must hereafter regret. The course of that hon. gentleman to-night was a complete reversal of the policy he had laid down last Monday night, and what was his excuse for the change? The real foundation of his explanation was, that unfortunately at that time he did not know what the intentions of the Government were. Was that the way in which hon. members of this House should arrive at a conclusion as to how they should frame their policy? There was as much evidence in the hon. member's speech of Monday night that he spoke his true sentiments on that occasion, as there was in his speech of this evening. Therefore, the principle was hardly a sound one that hon. gentlemen must first ascertain the views of the Government and then form their own opinions, or if, unfortunately, they should be so rash as to announce their own individual views, on learning the views of the Government, they must swallow their own. That was not sound doctrine. When he (Mr. COSTIGAN) gave notice of his motion this session, some of his friends said it was a forlorn hope, and that the only effect of it would be to create ill feelings. His answer was that if he thought it would have any such result he would withdraw it, but he had too much confidence in the liberality of the Protestant members to believe that such would be its effect. The speech of the hon. member for North Ontario and the support of other Protestant members representing largely Protestant constituencies convinced him that his confidence was not misplaced. He did not change his views when he heard the hon. member for Montreal West declare his intention to support the Government motion. The hon. gentleman could not be blamed for changing his lived they were about half of the population. They had carried on the discussions on this question without quarreling or any great unpleasantness, and for three years he had been able to prevent the Act coming into operation in his country. However, ultimately the school law was forced upon them, and their separate school went down. What was his position then? He believed in separate schools, and he had children he wished to be educated. He sent his son to a Catholic institution at a distance, and one daughter to a convent, but he did not feel that his means would justify his sending all his family abroad; and having a school established under the law within easy reach, and which was presided over by a gentleman of high character, he thought it was better to send the rest of his children there than have them go without education. Of the two evils he choose this course, and he felt he did right, and he would do the same thing again under the same circumstances. But that could not be taken as an approval by him of the school law. He wished to ask the supporters of the Government what would be the result supposing the means now proposed should fail to produce the desired result. For his part he had very little faith in it. He believed HER MAJESTY'S advisers would regard this step as a desire on the part of this House to shirk a difficult question, and would therefore take no action in the matter. If he could have an opportunity of voting for the amendment of which the hon. member for Joliette had given notice he would do so. In the meantime he would vote against both amendments before the House. The course proposed might do for the present, but it would not he believed effect a permanent settlement. He held that the Government should have taken up this question as they did with the North-West question. With reference to this latter question, although he favored a complete amnesty he voted for the Government proposition, because he felt the Government had come half way; and he was sorry the Government had not taken a similar stand with reference to this question as there was as much necessity for doing something to promote peace and harmony in New Brunswick as there was in the North-West.

Mr. DEVLIN desired to offer an explanation in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria, who had made a most unjustifiable and unwarrantable attack upon him. That hon. gentleman knew the deep interest he had taken in the question before the House. He knew that he (Mr. DEVLIN) left Montreal under the most embarrassing circumstances, on receiving a telegram from the hon. member for Victoria to come up to take part in this discussion. That hon. gentleman had also been in communication with the members for Richmond, Halifax, Antigonish, Kings and Prince Edward Island. He would state to the House, in order to show how uncalled for this attack was, for he did not know the hon. member's motives, that the Irish Catholic members had met repeatedly to endeavor to arrive at a solution of this matter so as to be in agreement with the majority of the House, and record a vote which would really conduce to the interests of Catholics in New Brunswick. The member for Victoria was invited to join in the discussion and did so, and he was therefore entirely in the confidence of every Irish Catholic member. He desired to state to the House that he had the authority and advice of His Lordship the Bishop of New Brunswick for the course he had taken, and he regarded His Lordship as a higher authority than the member for Victoria, much as he respected the great ability he had displayed in the cause of Catholic education. He did not think, therefore, he was fairly open to the charge of inconsistency which the hon. gentleman had thought proper to hurl against him so recklessly when he simply declared in the House to-night that he would support a measure which he conceived, after discussion of the whole case, to be best calculated to attain the object which every honest-minded man would desire to see accomplished. He would state further, and he appealed to hon. gentlemen whose constituencies he had named, to correct him if he were in error, that it was expected that the hon. member for Victoria would withdraw his resolution, and that this was the understanding arrived at. But without a word of explanation the hon. member moved the adjournment of the debate, not deigning to inquire of a single one of his friends with whom he had been in consultation, and who were as much supporters of the Catholic interests as himself, as to the action he should take; but he did consult with the members of the opposition. If he were sincere in his desire to obtain the co-operation of his Irish Catholic fellow-countrymen was it not his duty to have come to him (Mr. DEVLIN), and say an adjournment on this question would be useful, and we will be able to discuss the matter further; but the hon. member did not do so. His experience was very limited in the House, but he was determined to do his duty honestly and conscientiously; and he appealed to the hon. gentlemen who occupied the Treasury Benches if it were not true that he refused to let them know how he would vote on this question before he entered the House that day. In order to obtain the best possible information on the subject he consulted those who were the most deeply interested in the spiritual welfare of the Catholics in New Brunswick, communicating with the Right Rev. Prelate of that Province, who had intimated to him (Mr. DEVLIN) that his opinion was that the resolution of the member for Victoria would fail to accomplish the object which they had in view, and therefore it was better to accept the next best alternative, namely: the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, in which he (Mr. DEVLIN) had confidence, and which he believed would lead to a happy solution of the painful question at present agitating his co-religionists in New Brunswick.

Mr. FLYNN could not give a silent vote on this question, more especially as he felt that he came within the scope of the remarks offered by the hon. member for Victoria. When that hon. member placed his motion on the notice paper he consulted the Catholic members from the Maritime Provinces. He (Mr. FLYNN) frankly stated that the most embarrassing position he found himself placed in was with regard to the constitutional difficulty, but he felt, after hearing the representation made that the Catholic minority of New Brunswick were laboring under serious grievances, that if any measures could be adopted to remedy those grievances it was his duty as a Catholic to give them his support. He, therefore, said that if no other alternative presented, he would vote for the motion of the hon. member for Victoria. That hon. member had said that if he failed it was from want of integrity among his own people; he presumed the hon. member meant the Catholic representatives in this House, for that was the only meaning that could be attached to his words. He (Mr. FLYNN) distinctly disavowed that sentiment. There was no want of integrity on his part, and he had the interests of the Catholics of New Brunswick as much at heart as the hon. member, even though he represented a constituency in that Province. Nor could he permit the allusion to pass unnoticed, that the hon. member for Montreal Centre was the only gentleman who had aided to defend the Catholic rights and interests. He (Mr. FLYNN) always felt it his duty as a humble representative of a constituency in Nova Scotia whenever he found those rights assailed, to defend them. The hon. member for Victoria had also applied the word hypocrisy towards some hon. members who had worked with him; and in all his intercourse with the hon. member for Victoria, he (Mr. FLYNN) was actuated by the most sincere and pure motives.

Mr. COSTIGAN denied that he had used the word hypocrisy in reference to any hon. member.

Mr. FLYNN said the hon. member used the word, but if it was intended to be applied in the sense indicated the explanation would be accepted. From the first, he gave the hon. member for Victoria credit for his efforts in seeking to remove the wrongs under which the Catholics of New Brunswick were laboring, and thought those acts were above party spirit. He felt that the hon. member was honest in his convictions; but to-night he felt that the hon. member was otherwise, and that he moved the adjournment of the debate to harrass the Government and the hon. members who were acting with them. The hon. member, although representing a constituency in New Brunswick, where the grievance existed, must admit that both Catholics and Protestants were willing to do all within their power to remedy the grievance. But suppose the motion of the hon. member passed and was sent to Downing street, what was the result? The result would be worse than a nulity. The Government were, however, willing to support the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, asking HER MAJESTY, the QUEEN, to use her influence to remove the grievances complained of by the Catholics of New Brunswick. The hon. member for Victoria would have acted in a better spirit and more in the interests of those he desired to serve if he had accepted that amendment. Believing that it afforded the only practical solution of the difficulty he (MR. FLYNN) gave it his cordial support. Undoubtedly the hon. member for Victoria had manifested a warm interest in all efforts made to improve the position of the New Brunswick Catholics, nevertheless he must not arrogate to himself the credit of being the only earnest Catholic member in Nova Scotia. He (Mr. FLYNN) had always acted in their behalf, and whenever their interests were in jeopardy he had exhibited as much zeal in their cause as that hon. member, but he would never ask Parliament to do what was unreasonable and impracticable.

M. POULIOT :—Je dois dire que les amendements proposés me paraissent beaucoup plus efficaces que la motion du député de Victoria. Il y a certainement un changement pour le mieux dans le Nouveau-Brunswick, puisque le député pour la Chambre Locale du comté représenté par le député de Victoria, a été ré-élu, malgré qu'il eut voté contre la loi des écoles. Mais en votant pour l'amendement, je n'entends pas me lier, si ce moyen ne réussit pas, à ne rien faire de plus en faveur de mes co-réligionnaires du Nouveau-Brunswick. Au contraire, je ferai toujours pour eux et sous toutes circonstances, ce qui sera en mon pouvoir. M. l'ORATEUR, j'étais présent à l'enfantement de la Confédération. Il a été long, pénible, difficile. On sait ce qui s'est passé, par exemple, pour le Nouveau-Brunswick ; quel prix il a fallu donner à cet enfant gâté, qui a toujours été depuis l'enfant gâté de la Confédération, auquel on n'a cessé de prodiguer les cadeaux et tous les soins. Eh bien, on peut lui faire sentir qu'il est grand enfant maintenant, qu'il peut se soutenir seul, s'il veut se montrer trop revêche aux conseils de ses parents, et trop peu sensible au bon sens et à la justice. Je voterai pour l'adresse à SA MAJESTÉ afin d'obtenir justice, et si ce moyen ne réussit pas, nous tâcherons d'en trouver un autre.

Mr COSTIGAN said he would not repeat what had taken place in the committee room or in coversation between the hon. member for Montreal Centre and other friends whom he had consulted. He must set himself right, however, on one point, and it was to state that he never agreed, or allowed any member of this House, or any one outside of it to suppose, for a single moment, that it was his intention to withdraw his motion. He was not in the secrets of the Government and was therefore ignorant as to what amendment would be proposed. He, therefore, could not know whether it would prove a solution of the difficulty. He thought it unfortunate that the name of a high church dignitary had been drawn into the discussion, especially as he had been cited as an authority. He questioned whether the hon. member for Montreal Centre had permission or was authorised to adopt the course he had taken ; he had yet to learn that any hon. member could rise in his place and announce that any particular course in opposition to his motion was authorised and sanctioned by the high authority named. He thought it his duty to deny that such was the case.

Hon. J. A. SMITH said he thought it his duty, as a representative of New Brunswick, to offer a few observations upon this very important occasion. Personally he had no desire to discuss the merits or demerits of the New Brunswick School Law. He did not intend, nor was it his province, to discuss or defend any legislation on the part of the New Brunswick Legislature. That was the business of those who discharged the functions of making or amending the laws relating to that Province. Nor was it the business of this House to discuss the propriety or otherwise of laws passed by a Local Legislature, which were clearly within the constitutional jurisdiction of that body. There was no question that the New Brunswick Legislature had a perfect right to pass the School Law. It had been so decided by the highest court of this Empire, and having been so decided, this Parliament had no more right to deal with it than had the Legislature of New Brunswick to deal with questions appertaining exclusively to this Parliament. He had been much gratified and pleased at the tone of the speech of his hon. friend who had moved the original resolution before the House. It wa characterized by prudence, good taste, and moderation. He (Mr. SMITH) could also bear testimony to the extreme moderation which had been characteristic of the hon. member when, for many years, they had been associated in the Parliament of New Brunswick. But while admitting all this, he could not help regretting extremely that one of the representatives of his own Province, one of his own colleagues, should feel called upon to ask this Parliament to strike down with ruthless hand one of the bulwarks of the Constitution of our Dominion, and deprive the people of the rights which were accorded them under it. If an hon. gentleman from anywhere outside of the Province had attempted such a thing, he could understand it. The power of regulating her own educational laws was one secured to New Brunswick by the compact of Confederation, it was one she possessed fully and completely before; and yet his hon. friend, in the name of religion, in the name of those whom he asserted to be persecuted, proposed that this House should do that which would be ignoring all Provincial rights. Did not the Constitution reserve rights for all the people—rights for the Catholics as well as rights for the Protestants? Why, then, did his hon. friend talk of the rights of the Catholics and ignore those of the Protestants? If the motion of his hon. friend were carried, and if it rectified what his hon. friend believed to be a wrong in New Brunswick, would it not open the way to greater wrongs than that it righted? he would set a precedent which was just as dangerous to the existing rights and liberties of Roman Catholics throughout the Dominion as it was to those of the Protestants of New Brunswick. On behalf of the 200,000 Protestants of New Brunswick, he entered his humble protest against the proposed interference with their rights. He was proud to say that he looked around this House and saw many of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen who admitted the justice of sustaining the rights and privileges of the Province of New Brunswick, who fully appreciated the danger of destroying the integrity of the Constitution, and who had independence enough to declare their sentiments before this House. He was himself no bigot, and had never been. He had the fullest sympathy with the Catholics. The hon. member for Terrebonne expressed himself in favor of sectarian schools; he (Mr. SMITH) had no hesitation in saying that he was not in favor of them. What would his hon. friend say if the rights secured to the Catholics of Ontario under the Constitution were proposed to be interfered with? He would certainly resist any such attempt, and he could tell his hon. friend that in that respect they would both be found voting together to support the Constitution, although in regard to separate schools their convictions were entirely opposite. He could tell his hon, friend that, while entertaining the very greatest respect for him, he thought the policy he was pursuing a dangerous one. Suppose, as an example, that his his hon. friend's policy in regard to the criminals of the North-West had prevailed, the result would have been that RIEL would to-day have been wandering an outcast upon the face of the earth, instead of being merely deprived of his rights for five years. He stated on behalf of the Protestants of New Brunswick and on behalf of some of the Catholics too, that they claimed the preservation of the Constitution in its integrity. They were a proud and spirited people, and would stand by their rights. They felt that the Province of Ontario was great and powerful, and being powerful they felt the utmost assurance that she (Ontario) would permit no injustice to be done to them. The proposition of his hon. friend to ask the Imperial Parliament to pass a School Law for New Brunswick was absolutely preposterous, and no result could come of it. The Legislature of New Brunswick was just now looking to this Parliament, having the utmost confidence that their rights would be respected.

The members were then (at 11-20) called in. The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was carried on the following division :—

Mr. MASSON regretted that the name of the venerated Bishop of St. John should have been dragged into this debate to influence the vote of members of this House. He might say he did not believe the hon. gentleman who had done so was authorized to say what he did state. The hon. member had entirely misunderstood the Bishop of St. John, and if he (Mr. MASSON) had wished to be as indiscreet as the hon. member, he might make a statement which would place the matter in an entirely different light.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD hoped Mr. SPEAKER would place on record his reasons for ruling the amendment offered by the hon. member for Joliette out of order.

A division was then taken on the Premier's amendment as amended, with the following result :—

Mr. BABY moved in amendment that all the words after "that" in the said amendment be struck out, and the following substituted:—"That this House regrets that the position of the Roman Catholic minority in the Province of New Brunswick, with regard to their educational rights, is such as to cause uneasiness to a large portion of HER MAJESTY'S subjects in the Dominion; that this House is of opinion that any legislation which will restore harmony among persons professing different religions, and remove any feeling of uneasiness now existing among any portion of HER MAJESTY'S subjects is greatly to be desired; that by resolutions passed by the House of Commons on the 30th May, 1872, it was regretted that the School Act recently passed in New Brunswick was unsatisfactory to a portion of the inhabitants of that Province and hoped that it would be so modified as to remove any just ground of discontent; that this House re-affirms the spirit of said resolutions and regrets that the priviliges enjoyed at the time of the Union, by the Roman Catholics of New Brunswick, in respect of religious education in the Common Schools were not secured to them by the British North America Act; that therefore an humble Address be presented to HER MAJESTY the QUEEN embodying these resolutions and praying that she may be pleased to take such steps as will lead to the legislation necessary to secure to the Roman Catholic minority of New Brunswick the same rights, privileges and advantages with respect to schools and the same exemption from taxation for the support of public or common schools as are now respectively enjoyed and possessed by the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario and the Protestant minority in Quebec."

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the House having ordered that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec should be part of the motion, it was not competent to move another motion striking out those words.

The question then being on the main motion as amended, the House divided, when it was carried on the following division:—

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON moved that a select committee be appointed composed of Messrs. BLAKE, JETTE, FLYNN, JONES, GILLMOR, LANGLOIS, and the mover to draft an address to HER MAJESTY founded on the said resolution.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved in amendment: "That the said committee be authorized in drafting the address to include the following: That this House reserves its right to seek by an address to HER MAJESTY, an amendment to the British North America Act, should the present address prove insufficient to bring about an amendment to the New Brunswick School Law, satisfactory to the minority of that Province."

Mr. SPEAKER ruled the amendment out of order, on the ground that the address could only be based upon the resolution adopted by the House.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON, from the committee, reported an address based upon the resolution, which was adopted and engrossed.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON moved that an address be presented to HIS EXCELLENCY requesting him to transmit the address to HER MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY, to be laid at the foot of the throne.—Carried.

The House then adjourned at 2.45 A. M.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 11th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JETTE introduced a Bill establishing new dispositions for the organization and administration of Building Societies in the Province of Quebec.

GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTIONS.

Hon Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved for a Committee of the Whole, for to-morrow, to consider certain resolutions, to increase the salaries of the Civil Service of Canada, as provided in the "Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada."

Hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved for a Committee of the Whole, for to-morrow to consider the expediency of transferring the powers and authorities of the Trinity House of Quebec to the Quebec Harbor Commissioners, with the property of the said Trinity House, except the Decayed Pilot Fund, which shall be transferred to the Corporation of Pilots, for and below the harbor of Quebec; and of amending the Constitution of the corporation of the said Harbor Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the House shall meet for the remainder of the session on Saturdays at three o'clock, and that the measures of the Government shall have precedence on the Orders of the Day.—Carried.

REPORTING OF MR. PLUMB'S SPEECH.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD said he desired before the Orders of the Day were called to direct the attention of the First Minister, and also the chairman of the Printing Committee, to a matter connected with the reporting of the debates. Yesterday the hon. member for Niagara spoke for an hour, and his speech was replete with argument and exceedingly interesting to those who followed him; and it was observed that the reporters did not take down a single word—did not use their pencils during the whole time he was speaking. It was not to be borne that the official reporters should be the judges of what addresses should be reported or not.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Of course, the hon. gentleman does not attribute any responsibility to me in this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—No.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had been too busy to read the reports and could not say who was well or who was ill reported. He thought it inexpedient that the Government of the day should have any control over the reporting of the debates. It was a matter for the House to deal with, and the House had referred it to the Printing Committee. The chairman of that committee had called upon him to-day with reference to making arrangements for next session; and he (Mr. MACKENZIE) had stated that the question would have to be brought before the House so that they could order such arrangements as they thought best. It was important that such measures should be taken as would secure a perfectly faithful and impartial report of what was said on both sides of the House; and he regretted exceedingly if the hon. member for Niagara had not had justice done him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed that it was inexpedient that the Government should interfere with the reporting of the debates, and he had not alluded to the hon. gentleman in his capacity of leader of the Government. He trusted that the Chairman of the Printing Committee would see that every hon. member got fair play in the reports, and that there would be no necessity of referring to this matter again.

Mr. DYMOND, in the absence of the Chairman of the committee, to whom the report of the debates had been referred, and as a member of that committee, said the committee did not conceive it to be their duty to assume any responsibility with regard to the taking of the reports. The editor was of course responsible to the committee, and through the committee to the House, for the due discharge of his duties, but the committee could not be expected to give instructions as to what speeches should be reported at length and what should be condensed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD agreed that the Committee could not be held responsible with respect to the exact length of the speeches, but somebody must be responsible, and it was specially important to the minority that their speeches should be faithfully reported. Of course some discretion must be left to the editor, but it was one thing to condense a speech and another thing for the reporters to lay down their pencils and refuse to report a single word.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that no doubt this conversation would direct the attention of the committee and of the editor to this matter. For his part he hoped the speech of the hon. member for Niagara last night would be faithfully reported.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) explained that the editor was responsible for a fair and impartial report of the debates, and he had been informed that such a report of the speech of the hon. member for Niagara had been taken.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON called attention to the fact that the hon. member for Niagara had not offered any motion, and he doubted very much whether any faithful report of the proceedings of the House could be made unless the subject matter under discussion was made to appear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was customary for members in introducing a subject to make a speech and conclude with a motion, and the mere fact that six o'clock came while the hon. gentleman was speaking, and before he had handed in his motion, could certainly not require him to repeat his speech in order that it might be reported. With regard to the statement of the chairman of the Printing Committee that the speech of the hon. member for Niagara was reported he could only say it must have been done from memory or imagination for certainly the reporters did not take it down at the time.

Mr. DYMOND observed that the hon. gentleman had referred to the importance of the minority being reported. He thought it would be admitted that in proportion to their numbers they had taken up a very large space in the reports of the debates. As to the statement that the reporters had taken no notes of the speech of the hon. member for Niagara, those who were acquainted with the business of reporting knew how few notes it took to make up a long report.

LACHINE CANAL—ENLARGEMENT.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved an address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for copies of all correspondence, letters or telegrams between the Government and the proprietors of land in the vicinity of the proposed enlargement of the Lachine Canal from 1st March, 1874, to the 1st March, 1875; also, all orders given to engineers as to information to be given to such proprietors and all requests for information made to the Government or engineers, and all reports made to the Department of Public Works between above dates, relating to the right of way requisite for enlargement of Lachine Canal. He said in making this motion he deemed it almost unnecessary to state that he was not actuated at all by any personal motive. In the reports spread through the newspaper press, the names of certain public men mentioned in connection with these lands and insinuations made, which, if untrue, should be put down, and their falsehood exposed at the earliest possible moment. The characters of our public men did not belong to one side of the House or the other, but to the whole country, and it was desirable for these reasons that the papers should be brought down, and the House should have some authentic and official statement of what had taken place. It was for this reason he felt it his duty to make this motion.

Mr. JETTE thanked the hon. member for Frontenac for putting this motion on the notice paper, and also for moving it to-day, in order to better suit his (Mr. JETTE'S) convenience. He believed as the hon. member did that the good reputation of our public men was the measure of their usefulness, and this would be his excuse for feeling so sensitive with regard to the charges made against him. When this matter was first brought before this House, he deemed it his duty to give a distinct denial to the charges made against him, especially as regards that which appeared in the French papers of Quebec. That charge was that in this purchase of property in Montreal, he had used his influence to become acquainted with some of the designs of the Government as to the enlargement of the Lachine Canal, and so to secure for himself and his associates a good speculation. This he denied; and this denial he was ready to repeat to-day. He believed it was his privilege and duty to put the entire case before the House in order that no imputation might go before the public without meeting with such a correction as he could offer. This property was purchased about the month of April, 1874. In September he decided to sell it as soon as possible at auction, and as it was perfectly well known by the public in general that the Lachine Canal was to be enlarged, or that some works were to be executed in order to construct a new canal at this point, he believed it was his duty to inform the Government of the proposed sale, in order that they should take such proceedings as they deemed advisable to expropriate our property if necessary, and so protect the public interests. The following was a copy of the letter he then addressed to the Minister of Public Works, for the reading of which he had obtained that hon. gentleman's permission :—

"MONTREAL, 17th September, 1874.

Hon. ALEX. MACKENZIE, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa.

SIR,—The undersigned proprietors of a tract of land, one mile long, on the Lachine Canal, near Montreal, are desirous of securing from the Government the privilege of establishing on their said property one or two basins, and also one or two water powers. The water powers, they understand, could probably not be granted, except in the event of the widening of the canal, but the undersigned would like to secure them, even under such a condition ; and on such terms as the Government would deem reasonable. This property runs from the Grand Trunk Railway bridge up to the Cote St. Paul road, and the Cote St. Paul lock is just opposite part of it, so that it affords the very best opportunity for the establishment of such water powers, as also does the little River St. Pierre, which runs in rear of said property, and might serve for the discharge of the waters to be used. We enclose for reference a plan of the above mentioned property. We beg leave also to mention that our intention is to sell at auction a considerable portion of this property in lots, as soon as possible, probably in a few days, and as we are informed that the Government will require a strip of this land for the widening of the Canal, it might be found more convenient, if the widening is to take place, te expropriate one proprietor only, instead of having to deal with one or two hundred owners. As this sale would, therefore, increase and multiply considerably the costs and trouble of expropriation, we thought it only just to draw the Government's attention to this fact in order to give it full opportunity of avoiding such increase in costs, and of taking such action that might be found proper under the circumstances."

"We have the honor to be,
Sir,
(Signed,) R. LAFLAMME,
J. L. CASSIDY,
L. A. JETTE."

This was the only letter addressed by the proprietors of the land to the Government. In answer to it they received the following, dated the 7th October, only three days before the sale, which was advertised for the 10th of the same month :—

"OTTAWA, Oct. 7, 1874.

SIR,—Referring to that part of your letter of the 17th ult., signed conjointly by yourself and others, offering to sell to the Government a strip of land for the use of the proposed new line of Lachine Canal between the Grand Trunk Railway Bridge and the Cote St. Paul Road, I am directed to inform you that the Chief Engineer, to whom the matter was referred, reports that a space of at least from 225 to 250 feet in width will be required for the new canal at the place above mentioned. I take this opportunity to say in regard to the other subject matters referred to in your letter that they are still under consideration.

I have the honor to be,
Sir,
Your ob't. servant,
(Signed), F. BRAUN, Secretary."

L. A. JETTE, Esq.,
&c., &c., &c.,
Montreal,

He might remark that the expression with regard to the sale of the land was not correct. As would be seen by his letter there was no offer to sell any property to the Government. He knew this land could not properly be bought at private sale—that it would have to be expropriated, and they only pointed out to the Government the way in which they thought the property could be secured. Before addressing this letter to the Government, and before receiving the answer to it, the proprietors of the land had offered at private sale some of the lots indicated on the plan of the property. Some of them had been sold—a very few, because they reserved the greater part for sale by auction, and brought the very price obtained for them at the public auction, that was to say, before they gave notice to the purchasers that they had received such public information from the Government. The sales made were exactly at the same price that was obtained after the information was given. He might state for instance that Mr. FURNISS purchased a lot for $6,000. This sale was not made at the auction, but at least fifteen days before it. When this sale took place the public of Montreal, and he supposed the public in general, was taken a little by surprise by the great success that they had. But those who knew something of the immense rise in property at Montreal during the past few years would realize the fact. He would take the liberty to mention to the House that a year before—in July, 1873—he bought another property in Montreal, at the east instead of the west end of the city, at Hochelaga, and paid for it $110,000. Two months after—in September, 1873—he sold half that property for $210,000, thus realizing twice the purchase money by the sale of only half the property. Now, in this speculation of the Lachine Canal the success was exactly the same. Six months before he paid for the property $210,000, and sold a little more than half of it for about $500,000. The public would therefore not be surprised at the success of this second speculation, as it was not better than the first one. In the opinion of every one in Montreal, this property on the Lachine Canal was in a much better situation, as property was more valuable at the west end than at the east end of the city. The accusations that had been brought against him as he had stated were resumed in the Ottawa Citizen. The first statement was that on the 17th of April the property was purchased ; the second, that on the 18th of April the report was made by the Minister of Public Works foreshadowing the probability that some of these lands would be required by the Government. On these two points he did not believe that any evidence of the sincerity of his dealings with the Government need be offered. If the hon. gentleman who moved for these papers was not satisfied with his explanation, he might move for a committee to investigate the matter, and he (Mr. JETTE) would show that there was no foundation whatever for this accusation. The other charge was this :—That he gave afterwards public notice in the Montreal Herald of information that he had from the Government, and that this raised the price of the property to a fearful amount. The fact was that before receiving this answer from the Minister of Public Works to his letter he had published the conditions of the sale, and advertised the sale according to the information they had at the time. Having received no answer at that time they could not have informed the public as to what had been decided upon. But as soon as ever the information was received from the Government that a strip of land would be required, it was stated in the conditions of sale, which were as follows :—The proprietors of the land would not keep for themselves, but would keep for the purchasers the chance of any advantage to be derived by the expropriation. In the meantime in order to keep faith with the Government, and not to multiply the cost of expropriation, he stipulated that although the purchasers would be entitled to any indemnity the Government should offer for the lots expropriated, we would remain proprietors of the land expropriated for the purpose of passing the title to the Government. The whole amount paid was to be for the benefit of the purchasers. The conditions were as follows :—

"10. The property is commuted.

"20. The land sold on the canal is bounded in front by a strip of ground from about 225 to 250 feet deep measured from the actual line of the Government Property, such reserve being made for the widening of the Lachine Canal. The precise depth of this reserve shall be determined by the vendors or by the Government before the passing of the deeds. Up to the date of expropriation the purchasers shall have the right of communication with the canal through this reserve. Nevertheless if the purchasers should prefer buying these lots in their full depth, they can do so, on giving their option at the time of the adjudication ; however, even in such case, the vendors shall remain proprietors for the purpose of expropriation, in this sense that all proceedings for such purpose shall be made against them alone, but the indemnity granted shall be for the benefit of such purchasers."

He believed the proprietors dealt fairly with the purchasers, who obtained the fullest information in the possession of the proprietors. There was no secret in regard to the matter. The public advertisements stated that the proprietors had received certain information which was afforded, and the purchasers ran the chance of appropriation taking place. The fourth charge contained in the newspaper article was that a public sale of the land in question had taken place, but no purchasers had registered their deeds. The gentleman who had written the article was evidently not well informed of the facts because if he remembered rightly four or five purchasers had registered their deeds, among whom was Mr. VICTOR HUDON, a well known merchant at Montreal, and a Conservative, whose purchase amounted to $163,000, and who had passed his deed and made the first payment according to the terms of the sale. The last accusation was that the prices asked by the proprietors for their lands was afterwards arranged according to the auction sale tariff. He entirely denied that charge. There never was an application made by the Government to sell the land ; he knew from the position he occupied that he would not be justified to sell at private sale any portion of it to the Government; and he knew perfectly well there was a public law on the statute book which required that when in such cases land was required by the Government it must be expropriated; and he relied upon this alone. In that very paper would be found the testimony of a man who could not be accused of partiality in his (Mr. JETTE'S) favor, because he, having purchased lots to an extent he did not immediately realize when he became a purchaser, decided afterwards to make every effort to get out of the bargain if it was possible. That gentleman had afterwards instituted an action against him (Mr. JETTE) and his associates to have the sale cancelled, and that gentleman alleged exactly what he (Mr. JETTE) had stated, that there was no understanding between the proprietors and the Government, and it was on this very ground he asked for the sale to be cancelled. The allegations of the plaintiff were these:—

"That before the said auction sale, or since, the said Defendants never arranged, directly or indirectly, with the Government of Canada, concerning the enlargement of the Lachine Canal, on the side of the said property, and through the said reserve, as aforesaid, or otherwise.

"That in fact, said Government has not yet adopted any plan concerning the enlargement of said Canal, and has not decided as to the enlargement of said Canal, or the construction of a new canal at a distance from the actual one

"That the said reserve was not made with a view of providing for the widening of the said Canal, the said Defendants having no understanding whatever with the said Government for the purposes aforesaid, or any purpose whatever connected with the said Canal, or its enlargement."

This was the best answer that could be given by the best witness, because he was the witness most interested against him (Mr. JETTE.)

Mr. KIRKPATRICK was satisfied the House would be gratified by the full and frank statement made by the hon. member for Montreal East. He wished, however, the hon. member, and the House, to understand that he made no charge against the hon. member. He had never seen the paper referred to, and did not know that such charges had been published. He observed by the report of Mr. PAGE that the owners of the lands had put them up to a very high price. He assured the House that it was not with a view to making charges against the hon. member that he brought forward this motion, and if the papers were brought down they would show no doubt that the hon. member was justified in what he had done.

The motion was carried.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

The House again went into Committee on the Bill to amend the Act for the regulation of the Postal Service: Mr. JETTE in the chair.

The 91st clause was amended by adding the following:—"Except only in so far as they relate to the rates of postage on newspapers and periodicals sent to the United States as to which they shall come into force on the first May now next.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL stated that he did not intend to move the adoption of free postage on newspapers, of which he had given notice, because, although he was satisfied that such a scheme would be in accordance with the general sentiment of the House, it would be useless to move an amendment to that effect when the Government had announced that they would oppose it.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved the reception of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the resolutions to amend the Act 31 Vict., Cap. 64, respecting the treatment and relief of sick and distressed mariners.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he hoped the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries would alter the resolutions so as to place steamers on the same footing as sailing vessels.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—They are.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Not exactly. The tax was required to be paid three times a year, and the hon. gentleman had stated that sailing vessels landed only about twice a year, therefore only paid twice a year, while steamers landed much oftener.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said steamers landed on our shores a much larger number of sick and distressed mariners than did sailing vessels.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL remarked that his impression was quite the contrary.

The resolutions were then concurred in.

Hon. Mr. SMITH introduced a Bill to amend the Act 31 Vict., Cap. 64, respecting the treatment and relief of sick and distressed mariners.

THE IMMIGRATION ACT.

The House went into Committee to consider certain proposed Resolution to authorize the collection of duty in certain cases, from the masters of ships carrying passengers or emigrants from any port in Europe to any port in Canada:—Mr. WHITE in the chair.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions which were read a first and second time and concurred in.

The House went into Committee on the Bill to amend the Immigration Act of 1872:—Mr. WHITE in the chair.

The Committee reported the Bill without amendment and it was read a third time and passed.

PENITENTIARIES.

The House went into Committee to consider certain proposed Resolutions respecting the salaries proposed to be paid to the officers mentioned in Bill respecting Penitentiaries, and the inspection thereof:—Mr. De St. GEORGES in the chair.

The Committee reported the Resolutions, which were read a first and second time and concurred in.

The Bill respecting Penitentiaries, and the inspection thereof, was read a second time, and the House went into Committee on it:—Mr. De St. GEORGES in the chair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he noticed that one inspector was to be appointed under this Bill instead of three as at present. He wished to know if this inspector would be required to perform the same duties as the three now did.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said the Bill did not include British Columbia or Manitoba. The duties which the inspector would have to perform were not so extensive as at present, as the building and repairs of penitentiaries would now be under the Department of Public Works. There were now only four penitentiaries, and there would soon be only three, as it was proposed to have only one penitentiary for New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island. The inspector would only be obliged to make the inspections yearly, unless directed by the Minister of Justice to make other visits of inspection.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the only opinion he had expressed on the matter was when the Penitentiary Bill was under discussion in the House, when he stated it was to a certain degree experimental. While he quite understood that no individual interest should stand in the way of the public policy of the Government, he hoped they would show some consideration to the gentlemen who would be deprived of their offices by this measure.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government found very great disorder was occurring through duties being assigned to the inspectors and which they were not competent to perform. On one occasion he found to his dismay they had assumed the right to purchase some $3,000 worth of lumber and articles of that kind, the great bulk of which was useless and was now piled up at the institution in Montreal. Other matters of that kind had occurred not intentionally, but because the inspectors were not competent for such duties, and it became quite evident to the Government that firmer hands must deal with these matters. It would be in the memory of Ontario members at least that while there were four inspectors in old Canada they inspected all the jails, penitentiaries and other public institutions. After the Confederation Act was passed the Province of Ontario, under the economical but wise arrangement of the leader of the Government, SANDFIELD MACDONALD, decided to have only one inspector and any one who had seen that gentleman's reports could see to what state of efficiency they had been brought under his control. The economy in provisioning all jails, and in the management of lunatic asylums, and supervision over all institutions receiving aid from the Government showed that he was able to exercise very efficient supervision over the 50 or 60 institutions in the Province, and they were really in very much better order than Dominion institutions with their three inspectors. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) never had any doubt that one thoroughly efficient officer would do the duties much better than three. As to the matter mentioned by the hon. member of showing consideration to those who by the operation of this Act would be deprived of situations, the Government would be bound to consider what would have to be done in such a case, having regard of course to the public interest.

The clause was passed.

On the 36th clause relating to convict labor,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if the Government had any policy as to letting out convict labor by contract. The present authorities disapproved very generally of this system.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had not decided upon any policy. Some tenders had been received up to a recent time, but had not been accepted for the reason that the Government were to consider, when the House rose, what was to be done in this matter. A great deal had been said on the care exercised by the contractors. The system worked well at the Central Prison at Toronto, but was liable to interruption from the failure of contractors or some cause in the business that might interrupt the whole work of the prison. In that respect perhaps it would be better if the Government were to adapt prison labor to such works as they could. The whole subject was to be reviewed by the Government after the session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD was glad to hear the statement of his hon. friend. He believed the prison labor could be made profitable under proper surveillance if the right contractors could be found; but no amount of supervision could prevent some contractors from interfering with the moral improvement of the prisoners by giving them tobacco and spirits as a bribe to greater exertions in working. While it was important that the prisoners should be made to sustain themselves, it was still more important that they should be reformed if possible.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had an idea, which was not yet clearly defined, of employing the labor of convicts in carrying on the public works of the country. It was quite possible they might be able to manufacture the greater portion of the rolling stock required on the great railroads about to be constructed. That was one reason why he desired to locate the prisons in the Lower Provinces on some convenient place on the Intercolonial Railway; but nothing had yet been decided upon by the Government.

The section was carried.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill. Report was received.

MR. PLUMB'S SPEECH.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said before recess he desired to call attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston regarding the report of Mr. PLUMB'S speech. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) had always found reporters eminently fair where they were not directed by some parties in the interests of particular newspapers. There was an esprit de corps amongst all reporters that dictated fair reports, and hon. members must often have felt greatly indebted to the reporters for improving their speeches. In this particular speech it so happened that the reporters had taken a verbatim report of every part of Mr. PLUMB'S speech. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) could not conceive how it came to be stated that there was no report of it taken. The editor of the Hansard had sent him a copy of the report, and if the hon. member for Niagara could see the manuscript, he would no doubt find that his speech had been accurately reported. No time should be lost in correcting the erroneous impression that the reporters had been unfair towards Mr. PLUMB. It would, he was sure, be as gratifying to the hon. member from Kingston as it was to himself to learn that there was no ground for complaint against the reporters.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said he had received a letter from the editor of the Hansard stating that a full report had been taken of Mr. PLUMB'S speech. He (Sir JOHN) had nothing more to say, but he might explain that his attention had been called, while the debate was going on, to the fact that the reporters at the table had not even pencils in their hands. The fact was noticed by at least twenty gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House. He was surprised to learn that a full report had been taken, though no mortal hand was employed in the work at the table, during the whole hour the hon. gentleman was speaking.

Mr. MILLS mentioned the fact that only one reporter took notes at a time, though there were generally two or three seated at the table. The hon. member for Kingston should not have made a complaint until the Hansard of that evening was published, when it would be seen whether there was ground for it.

At six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved the House into Committee to consider the following resolutions :—

1. That it is expedient so to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships as to make it apply to ships over eighty tons register, and to ships going to sea on a voyage to any port or place out of Canada.

2. That it is expedient to make provision for the examination of masters and mates of inland and coasting ships, as regards ships of over eighty tons register, and voyages commenced after the first day of April, 1876.

The House went into Committee:—Mr GIBSON in the chair.

Hon. Mr. SMITH, in reply to Mr. WOOD, said that the Bill would apply to steamships as well as sailing vessels.

The Committee having reported the resolution,

Hon. Mr. SMITH introduced a Bill founded thereon, intituled : " An Act to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships."

The Bill was read the first time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

On motion of Hon. Mr. FOURNIER, a Bill intituled " An Act for the more speedy trial before police and stipendiary magistrates, in the Province of Ontario, of persons charged with felonies or misdemeanors," (from the Senate) was read the second time.

The Bill then went through Committee, was read the third time and passed.

CENTRAL PRISON, ONTARIO.

On motion of Hon. Mr. FOURNIER, the Bill to make further provisions respecting the Central Prison for Ontario was read a second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole:—Mr. DYMOND in the chair.

The Committee reported the Bill, and it was read a third time and passed.

SPEEDY TRIALS.

On motion of Hon. Mr. FOURNIER, the Bill for the more speedy trial before police and stipendiary magistrates, in the Province of Ontario, of persons charged with felonies or misdemeanors was read a second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole :—Mr. TROW in the chair.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill, which was read a third time and passed.

COPYRIGHTS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the second reading of the Bill from the Senate, respecting copyrights. He said it was known that the Royal assent was refused to the Bill passed two years ago, on account of representations made by authors and publishers in England. During the recess he had interviews with some delegates representing English authors and publishers, and with several English authors, and he had received a draft bill from the Imperial Government which contained their views respecting this very complicated matter. The Bill now before the House was one that he thought embodied very nearly all that had been seriously demanded by authors and publishers ; while it afforded a fair scope for Canadian publishers, providing as it did for the publication of works if within a certain time the authors did not take out a copyright or commence publication. He believed this Bill was acceptable to Canadian publishers, and it might fairly be presumed that it would receive the Royal sanction for which, of course, it would be reserved.

Mr. DYMOND said he felt obliged to dissent from the hon. Premier with respect to the merits of this Bill. In his judgment it would be better to have the law as it stood at present. He did not propose to delay the progress of the Bill at this stage, but he asked that time be given after the second reading for its further consideration. Before its final passage he would like to have an opportunity of offering a few remarks upon it.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON thought it would be better if his hon. friend wished to dissent from this Bill, for him to make his remarks now. The subject of copyright had engaged the attention of our Legislatures for the past quarter of a century, but unfortunately no Bill that has passed has ever received the Royal assent. He believed that the present measure was one that would be likely to receive the Royal assent, and that it was satisfactory to authors and publishers on both sides of the Atlantic. However, if the hon. member for North York knew of any difficulties in the way of its being accepted in England, he thought he should state them now.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said that it was almost too much to ask any member of the House to be prepared to make a lengthened speech after the labors of the last forty-eight hours. It would, perhaps, be better to defer the second reading of this measure ; but if that was not done he thought that no further stage should be taken to-night and that another opportunity should be given for a full discussion.

Mr. DYMOND said he had only received the Bill after it finally passed the Senate this afternoon. It not merely opened the question of copyright, but also the right of the people of Canada to manage their own affairs. While he would be glad to see a measure passed that would be acceptable to authors and publishers in England, he felt that his first duty was to this country, and while he did not hope to effect any change in the Bill, he wished to have an opportunity of placing his views on record in order to further the discussion which he had the honor of raising in this House a year ago. To his mind it was very doubtful whether this Bill would receive the Royal assent.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE observed that perhaps upon the whole it would be desirable, as was proposed to have a discussion on that Bill, that it should take place on the second reading. For his part he not only had no objection to a discussion, but rather invited one, and as it would be preferable to have it on the second reading, he begged leave to withdraw his motion.

Motion withdrawn.

BAIE VERTE CANAL.

On the order for the further consideration of resolution 83 in the estimates—Baie Verte Canal, $1,000,000,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had considered the discussion which took place on this resolution a few evenings ago, and he had promised that when it came up for concurrence, he would state what the Government proposed to do in relation to it. There was a manifest, and he was bound to say not unreasonable, hostility to the Government taking a vote of one million dollars for a work, the exact cost of which, and the extent to which they might be able to proceed this year, they were not able to state. He proposed now to reduce this amount to a mere nominal sum sufficient to enable them to proceed to make such further surveys as might be necessary to get the most complete information. They proposed to invite tenders and have an estimate prepared from them when the House met again, showing the cost of the work. They also proposed to take such steps as would secure as accurate information as possible of the value of the work in a commercial sense, so that they might be able to meet the House with some statistical information showing the real value of this work to the country at large. He was not insensible to the fact, or what might be supposed to be a fact, that local consideration might have had some influence, both with those opposed to and in favor of the scheme. He was not able himself from any information he had at hand to form any judgment as to what the real value of the work would be to Canada ; but the Government would use all the means in their power to be able to present to the House next session an intelligent estimate of the commercial value of this work, its cost, and the means they thought should be taken when that was ascertained in order to complete the work or otherwise. He, therefore, moved that this item be not concurred in, but that it be reduced from $1,000,000 to $20,000.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he could not state that he was very much surprised at the announcement which had just been made by the Minister of Public Works, but he did think that the Government occupied a position that was very far from enviable in relation to this question. The First Minister knew that this great work was brought under the consideration of Parliament in connection with the whole canal policy, as proposed by the Canal Commission which was composed of the ablest engineers and the first commercial men in the country. That policy was submitted to the House as a whole, and was accepted by the House as a whole. Was the House in that sincere or insincere? Did the First Minister intend at that time to assent apparently to this important work in order to secure the construction of works in which he himself took a more immediate interest? Did the House intend after they had accepted the policy of the Canal Commissioners as a whole, and after the country was irrevocably committed to that portion of the policy in which the hon. gentleman was more particularly interested, to take such a course as that now proposed? The late Government acting in good faith in this matter obtained the necessary information with regard to this work, and were on the very eve of asking for tenders, when at the instance of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and gentlemen associated with him from New Brunswick, the Government consented to allow a dispute about the route to be submitted to a disinterested engineer and finally to the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department. He did not envy the position of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on this question. That gentleman stood immediately and personally responsible for thus trifling with one of the great public works of this country. At his earnest appeal the late Government postponed asking for tenders, and placing the work under contract before Parliament met. Did the hon. gentleman delay the work then simply for the purpose of burking it altogether? The present Government when they came into power declared that their policy was, as it was of that of the late Government, to carry out the whole policy of the Canal Commissioners, which had been endorsed by Parliament. Not only that, but a sum of money was placed in the estimates for this work, and it was announced that tenders would be asked for. The hon. gentleman having adopted a policy calculated to invite the hostility of every interested section of the country, still found it was all insufficient to enable him with any prospect of success to have this work defeated by his own friends. The hon. member for South Bruce then came to the front with a statement the most immoral, politically, that had ever been made in this House, and objected to the Premier carrying out the policy which he had announced to the House, and suggested the propriety of spending the money required for this work in some other way. The policy of the Government as announced in the first instance, was to invite tenders so as to ascertain the cost of the work, and whether that cost would be such as would warrant them in proceeding with it, but the hon. member for South Bruce was not willing to trust the Government of the day with such power, and accordingly indicated to them that they must change that policy. Not only did he do that, but he actually invited the Government to consider whether they could not discover some local or sectional objects upon which this money might be expended rather than on the Baie Verte Canal. What would be thought in Ontario if it was proposed to this House that instead of spending the money required for the enlargement of the Welland Canal it should be spent for sectional objects, and by this means secure the defeat of that project? Yet, the proposition of the hon. member for South Bruce was precisely similar. A more corrupt and immoral proposition was never proposed to Parliament. He was astonished that the First Minister of the Crown did not feel more what he owed to the high position he occupied, that he should recede from it and allow any gentleman, however important, able or influential, to dictate to the Treasury Benches of this country what the public policy should be. It was humiliating to see any Government driven to the position in which the hon. member for South Bruce had placed them. He left the responsibility of it to the Minister of Marine, and the Minister of Customs, but for whose interposition this great work, so vitally important to a large portion of New Brunswick, and so important to the trade and commerce of the country from one end to the other, would at this moment have been half constructed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government accepted the responsibility. He never yet heard, in all the audacious speeches the hon. gentleman made, anything more audacious than the one to which the House had just listened. The hon. member presumed to lecture the Government on political morality and the maintenance of proper dignity. The hon. member had asserted it was a farce to bring down these estimates year after year. Who commenced it? The hon. gentleman without the report of an engineer, without the report of a single expert, without a particle of knowledge on the subject, in his gross ignorance placed a sum in the estimates to construct a work of which he knew nothing. What course did the hon. gentleman propose to justify himself by now? The Canal Commissioners reported on it, as a whole, favorably. And who were these Canal Commissioners? The first was Mr. CALVIN of Kingston. Did the hon. gentleman call him one of the first engineers of the country? What did Mr. CALVIN know of engineering? What did GEORGE LAIDLAW know of it? They had one respectable man on the commission, and he guided the other commissioners very much like the individual described by the poet BURNS as conducting a squad of very disreputable looking persons to a very disreputable place. Yet these were the persons who were to guide the whole policy of this country. Because Mr. CALVIN said something about the canals, that was authority for anything and everything to be done by the hon. gentleman. A more reckless administrator of public affairs, and one more dangerous to be entrusted with the expenditure of public money was never in office than the hon. member, and every one must be as reckless as himself or be condemned in that wild, passionate and turbulent manner which characterized him. But, the hon. gentleman said, Boards of Trade had approved of it. Well, what were they but mere bands of local politicians associated together to ride some pet hobby, and he (Mr. MACKENZIE) told the Boards of Trade he did not pay the least respect to any of their recommendations on engineering matters. If the hon. gentleman thought he (Mr. MACKENZIE) was to be guided in his policy by the speeches of men of this kind, merely because they were members of Boards of Trade, he entirely misunderstood his character. The hon. gentleman was pleased to say that he (Mr. MACKENZIE) had given notice publicly that tenders would be invited some time in the month of January for this work, and that it was done for the purpose of deluding and deceiving the public. He threw back the taunt. He never did and never would deceive the public on any matter whatever. Where he made promises he endeavored to keep them, and he made none that he did not believe to be in the public interest. With reference to his statement that there was not information in the department to warrant the Government to undertake the work, the hon. gentleman should accept it or apply somewhere else for information.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said an engineer had been employed four years on the work.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had only been a year and a half employed by the present Government.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he was willing to let the engineer say whether there was not information enough in the Department already to commence the work.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE invited the hon. member to bring the engineer to the bar of the House and prove it, and promised every possible facility, by sub-committee or otherwise, to make good his assertion. It was time there should be an end to these reckless denunciations of public men and members of this House, because they chose to express their deliberate opinions. When he (Mr. MACKENZIE) made a statement to the House as head of a department, he did so knowing that he was correct, and the engineers of the department would bear out every word he said. He expected early in January to have been able before the House rose to have obtained tenders and submitted them with the most explicit information regarding the work. He found, however, that the department, so far as this work was concerned, was in a state of utter confusion; nothing had been done in regard to the matter, except to place a sum in the estimates in order to deceive the people of Cumberland and of New Brunswick about election time. And yet the hon. member chose to rise in his place and make a passionate appeal to his following in order to make an attack upon the Government. He would say nothing about the reproaches cast against other hon. members, and when he held out, as he had to-night, the impression, with a view to form that impression on the public mind, that this project was opposed by Ontario members, it was necessary to call attention to the fact that no Ontario member said a word about the matter the other night. The discussion was entirely left, and in his opinion properly left, altogether to the members for the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—There was the hon. member for South Bruce.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for South Bruce, as he understood, did not engage in the discussion further than to indicate that, if the Government were not prepared to give explicit information, they ought not to ask that large vote for money for a speculative purpose, and speculative it must be held to be to some extent until the Government was able to place before the House explicit information regarding it. He was prepared then, as he was prepared now, to state that if the House was willing to clothe the Government with authority—which he hoped they would use properly—to receive tenders, and if the tenders did not exceed a certain amount that might be deemed reasonable, the Government would proceed with the work. The manifest feeling of the House was that the work would cost more than it was worth in a commercial sense, and until the Government proved it would be different—as he presumed they would be able to do if the statements of the hon. member for Cumberland were correct—they would merely take a sufficient sum to obtain tenders and obtain the fullest information to present to the House at its opening next session. No Government was bound, either to stand or fall, upon a sum in the estimates, and they were bound to yield to the views of the House as the hon. members now in Opposition had yielded, even to striking sums out of the estimates. He did not wait for an adverse vote. He believed when an expression of public opinion was obtained in the House, it was the duty of the Government to yield thereto. And the work would not be much delayed, for it had been found impossible for the able Engineer to get the plans advanced, as they hoped to be able to do a few months ago. He had nothing further to add than to repudiate with all possible scorn the imputation which the hon. member had cast upon him.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he was glad to have learned from the First Minister the course which the Government proposed to take on this occasion, and thought that the observations of the hon. member for Cumberland, in reference to that course, were much to be deprecated. If there was one thing above another to be desired of a Government, and particularly with a Government possessing such a numerous following as this Government does in this House, it was that they should be, as they had shown themselves to be on this occasion, amenable to a general expression of the feeling of the House, and willing to do that which, upon full consideration and upon full debate, would be adjudged most desirable in the public interest. That they should be taunted by hon. members opposite, who were in a minority, who could not compel obedience to their views, was certainly a most short-sighted and ill-judged policy. He had no doubt those taunts would have no such effect as possibly the hon. gentleman designed. He had no doubt whatever that the leader of the Government and his colleagues would be prepared in future, as they had been on this occasion to give fair and full consideration to suggestions which might be made in this House by independent members, either their friends or foes, and which might be considered to be in the public interest. He made no such statement as that imputed to him by the hon. member for Cumberland to-night, he said nothing about permitting or not permitting the vote to pass. After the statement made by the hon. First Minister he (Mr. BLAKE) ventured to suggest that in accordance with the principle which he had advocated for many years that the House should have the fullest information before it prior to its clothing the Government with authority to mature its judgment and enter upon the work. He did not presume to form a judgment on the subject, for the hon. First Minister had stated that it was not ripe for solution, and upon that statement it appeared to him (Mr. BLAKE) that the proper course to pursue was to take a vote for such an amount as was necessary to complete the necessary inquiries. Did the hon. member for Cumberland dispute that this was sound Parliamentary doctrine?

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he did not dispute it; but he maintained what he had previously asserted "that this doctrine was entirely at variance with that enunciated by the hon. First Minister."

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member did not deny that this was sound Parliamentary doctrine. Did the hon. member for Cumberland suppose that he alone had the right to state any views in opposition to the Administration of the day. The difference between the conduct of the hon. member and himself was this, that while the hon. gentleman opposed many questions he was generally wrong, while his (Mr. BLAKE'S) suggestion appeared to be correct. The observations he (Mr. BLAKE) made during the late debate were made towards its close. The hon. member sought to make it appear, although the canal would skirt the County of Cumberland, that he was not affected by it: but all the members from Nova Scotia who spoke adversely to this work did not do so from considerations of public interest, but from base, sordid and sectional motives. Let the hon. member take his words and apply them to himself, and let him tell that hon. member that no man who proposed that $6,800,000 or $800,000 of the public money of this country should be spent on works adjoining his own constituency had a right to complain because the Government declared that they would take pains to ascertain the value of that work before they entered upon it. The hon. gentleman was good enough to use expressions towards him (Mr. BLAKE). He would not complain of the unparliamentary language used, because they were accustomed to it from the hon. member. The hon. gentleman had said, for example, that he (Mr. BLAKE) was immoral and corrupt.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER—No, no!

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman had asserted that he (Mr. BLAKE) used immoral and corrupt arguments and any such man must be himself immoral and corrupt. The hon. gentlemna might take that to himself, too. What did the hon. member say further? He said that coming from the Province of Ontario, he (Mr. BLAKE) did not declare himself in favor of the Baie Verte Canal for the reason that it was impossible, owing to the statement of the Premier, to say definitely that any private member could come to a conclusion on that scheme on which the Government itself did not consider it had sufficient information to come to a decision. What he (Mr. BLAKE) said then was that in his opinion the same expenditure, provided the canal scheme was proved to be impracticable, should be made on objects of public national importance in the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said there were plenty of such objects. He thought the Maritime Provinces were entitled to assistance for any object of public national importance, entirely irrespective of the bargain to vote down the Baie Verte Canal. He remembered that when the hon. member for Cumberland was in the late Government, and any question was asked respecting expenditures in the Maritime Provinces, he indicated that those questions showed a feeling of opposition on the part of Ontario members to those expenditures. If the Baie Verte Canal project should be proved to be impracticable, he was prepared to agree to a similar sum being expended on public works of national importance in the Maritime Provinces; but he was not prepared with respect to the Baie Verte Canal—though it did pass through the County of Cumberland—to support its construction until it was demonstrated that the work was one to be built in the interests of the people of Canada.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said he did not understand from the speech of the hon. member for Cumberland that he at all objected to the advice given by the hon. member for South Bruce to the Ministry. That hon. gentleman from his place in Parliament had a right to do so if he thought the Ministry were wrong, and it was his duty to do so. What the hon. member for Cumberland did say was that that advice was offered to the Administration at the time they were propounding another and a different policy; that at the very time when the Government were coming down after due deliberation and after eighteen months' possession of office, having every opportunity to consider the value of this canal, as well as all other canals and public works connected with the country—the hon. member for South Bruce had only to rise late in the debate and express his opinion that they were taking a reckless course, for the Government to at once adopt the suggestion—listen to the frown from above—hear the thunder roar, and submit to his dictation. It was apparent that the hon. member for South Bruce possessed influence—every one knew that he possessed it, and it was indeed agreeably obvious to some gentlemen in the House—the large proportion of the supporters of the Government—but it was disagreeably obvious to the First Minister. It was more glaringly obvious in this House. Here was the fixed policy of the Government enunciated in the most solemn manner by a speech from the Throne, sums of money for the purpose being twice included in the estimates, and yet after a few words from the hon. member for South Bruce, away goes the speech of the GOVERNOR GENERAL and the items in the estimates, and the First Minister forthwith reduces the item of $1,000,000 down to $20,000 which was clearly to be the first and last expenditure on this unfortunate Baie Verte Canal project. The hon. member for Cumberland was only anxious to secure the construction of this great national work, which was so regarded even by the hon. member for South Bruce, and it was the hon. member's duty to be so in the interest of his constituency. The hon. member for Cumberland could not be charged with having used unparliamentary language, because he had not charged the hon. member for South Bruce with personal corruption or personal immorality, for he thought that the argument of the hon. member for South Bruce led in that direction. Even in the British Parliament, hon. members would not hesitate to use such language in regard to arguments. He (Sir JOHN MACDONALD) had heard the speech of the hon. the First Minister, with much regret. The hon. the First Minister had charged the hon. member for Cumberland with having placed in the estimates, for political purposes, amounts for the construction of the Baie Verte Canal, and with having been a reckless administrator. It was well known that the Baie Verte Canal was a question which interested Nova Scotia and New Brunswick before Confederation, repeated surveys having been made. When the late Government prepared a canal extension scheme, they did not come before Parliament in the reckless manner adopted by the present Government; but they appointed a Canal Commission composed of engineers and commercial men which included Colonel GZOWSKI, Sir HUGH ALLAN, Mr. CALVIN and Mr. GEORGE LAIDLAW. The hon. gentleman said there was but one decent man in the whole lot. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not remember that Mr. SAMUEL KEEFER was Secretary to the Commission, and that he was employed to work up the whole subject and make a report. He (Sir JOHN) thought there was no one in this House or out of it who would disparage the position and standing of Mr. KEEFER, who was an engineer of first-rate standing and eminence.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Why was he dismissed? Why was he removed from the Department of Public Works, under the right hon. gentleman's administration?

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said it was because he did not agree with Mr. KILLALY—because there were two powers in the Department which would not work together.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Mr. KILLALY was not there at that time.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the commission, at any rate, made an admirable report, and upon the main features of it the First Minister was now carrying out his policy with regard to all the canals except the Baie Verte. After Mr. BAILLAIRGE had been engaged on the work some years, Mr. KEEFER and Mr. GZOWSKI went over the ground, and Mr. KEEFER made a report which the Government accepted. A sum was put in the estimates to meet the cost of construction, and the work would have been proceeded with at once, but at the urgent request of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it was postponed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE inquired whether, before the Right hon. member for Kingston left office, Mr PAGE was not instructed to make another report.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the Government had been induced to ask for a second report on account of the pressure brought to bear upon them by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said the pressure amounted to this—that the hon. member for Cumberland was having the terminus fixed in his own county, instead of the county of Westmoreland.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the hon. member for Cumberland was then and continued to be anxious for the welfare of the whole Dominion, and of the Maritime Provinces, and for this reason it would have been justifiable had he contended for having the terminus where he thought it best in the interest of the country. He (Sir JOHN) exceedingly regretted that the First Minister had used language with regard to the member for Cumberland which was not exactly Parliamentary—that he considered it not beneath the dignity of his position to describe the hon. member as a reckless administrator, and that he had put a sum in the estimates ostensibly for the construction of this work, but really for the purpose of influencing two elections. The statement of the hon. member for Cumberland, that the work would have been under contract and making progress at this moment had the late Administration remained in power. His hon. friend the First Minister made another statement which was anything but Parliamentary—a statement which he felt sure was made in the heat of the discussion, and for which the hon. gentleman would himself feel sorry. He said that the member for Cumberland got up in his passionate style, in order to please a contemptible following, and made use of certain language and certain arguments. The hon. the First Minister had no right to be surprised at the inference drawn by the member for Cumberland, that the member for South Bruce was so strong in the estimation and affections of the House and had such an influence on public opinion, that although the Government asked a vote of a million dollars for this work, it required but an expression of his (Mr. BLAKE'S) opinion in order to convince them that they should confine themselves to a survey. The relations of the Premier and the hon. member for South Bruce reminded him of two characters in SHAKESPEARE'S plays, the one of whom said to the other—"Thou shalt be king, and I shall be viceroy over thee." His hon. friend the First Minister was the king; he sat upon the throne; but the hon. member for South Bruce was viceroy over him. In Japan they used to have two kings—the Tycoon and the Mikado. The Mikado was the heavenly King, and the Tycoon was the earthly king. The Mikado had all the honor; he was given the first place, and received the homage and worship of his subjects; but the Tycoon had all the power. Which was the Mikado and which the Tycoon—the Premier or the hon. member for South Bruce—he left to the House to decide. The Baie Verte Canal was not to be constructed after all. But they had the assurance of the Tycoon, if they only gave up the Baie Verte Canal, whatever the Mikado might have said, there would be money got somewhere to spend among all the constituencies of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to make up for it. He agreed with the Ministry that this was a work of national importance, and that it ought to be, and must be finished, unless the powers above were too strong for them. He could only say, in conclusion, that he hoped his hon. friend would increase the vote to a little over $20,000.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was not conscious of having used any language that was not Parliamentary and if he did make use of any expression that could have given pain or offence to any one, he assured his hon. friend that it was very foreign to his intention. So far as the remarks of the hon. member affected the question before the House, he had simply to say that as a member of the late Government, he (Sir JOHN MACDONALD) must be aware that it was impossible they could have been prepared to place the work under contract. They had a walk over the ground by Mr. KEEFER and an estimate was made by him of the probable cost which every other engineer pronounced absurd and ridiculous. The engineers of the department agreed in this opinion no estimates could have been made until plans were prepared, and that would take months. Notwithstanding that the engineers had been unable to accomplish this—notwithstanding that he (Mr. MACKENZIE) had so far found it impossible, the hon. member asked the House to believe that if he and his Government had remained in office the canal would have been in progress of construction.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said he understood at the time that plans had been prepared, and was assured by the hon. the Minister of Public Works and by Mr. KEEFER that within a few weeks the working plans would be prepared, and the canal would be put up for contract. He repeated that tenders were about to be invited when the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries sent an urgent telegram asking a postponement, and it was then arranged that the matter should be submitted to Mr. PAGE'S consideration.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said that his hon. friend from Cumberland knew very well that he (Mr. SMITH) requested that the terminus of the canal should be changed, because it was located at a place where it would be utterly useless.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the terminus was located where recommended by Mr. BAILLAIRGE who had spent several years of labor in connection with the work upon the sole ground that it would save the expenditure of millions of money. He asserted that he had never used the slightest influence either with the Canal Commission or with the engineer, or anybody connected with the Board of Trade to have the terminus located in the County of Cumberland; and all independent authorities had came to the conclusion that the interests of the country would be best served by having it there. He did not see that he, because he happened to be member for Cumberland, should have offered any objection to the arrangement.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE pointed out that the hon. member for Cumberland spoke of Mr. KEEFER as if he were the engineer in charge. When he (Mr. MACKENZIE) took charge of the department, Mr. KEEFER was not connected with the work at all. Indeed, whatever Mr. KEEFER had done had ere then been undone, Mr. PAGE having then been commissioned to make a new report. That report was not completed until a few months ago, and it would have been impossible to place the work under contract before this spring, so that nothing had been lost in any case and nothing would be lost now because he did not anticipate being able until a considerable time after the House would rise, to obtain any tenders for the work or make any actual progress in it. As to his opinion of the Boards of Trade, he need not add anything. In some places they were mere political clubs, and in some places they did not possess commercial intelligence. One Board of Trade, a little over a year ago, thought fit to blackball every one who belonged to the political party to which he belonged. This necessitated the retirement from it of every person who was connected with that party. That Board of Trade proceeded immediately to discuss political questions and denounce the Government, and its opinions were paraded over the country as of great value. He declined to be guided by Boards of Trade so long as he had any common sense left. He would accept the opinions of commercial men everywhere, but he would be not be tied to the opinions of any Board of Trade in matter of this kind.

Mr. WOOD hoped the hon. gentleman would except the Board of Trade of Hamilton.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he excepted many, but objected to having their opinions thrust upon him on engineering questions as an authority he was bound to obey with regard to this estimate, all that the Government required was what was necessary to take the preliminary steps to have this canal properly built, and to obtain other information of a commercial nature, as well as tenders for the work to place before the House at its next session. He need not assure hon. gentlemen that he had been on this question influenced by no feeling which could not be characterized as a national sentiment. He had no purpose to serve, and no object to gain except that of promoting the public welfare.

Mr. PALMER said reports of every possible description had been sent in, and the Government must by this time be in possession of all the information necessary to proceed with the work. The Government must know by this time where the canal should be built, if it was to be built at all. There must be something more in the course pursued by the Government than a desire for further information. He held it was a sign of weakness and vacillation in the last degree in this Government that they should have mentioned this project in the Speech from the Throne. When would this delay end? After all the information that the Government had obtained—after all their promises to commence, the work, they were now merely calling for tenders to ascertain what the cost of construction would be. He regretted this course. They would never get information of this kind from practical men and it would be much better for the Government to obtain it in some other way. There was a feeling among the people in the part of the country from which he came that the Government were not disposed to keep good faith with them and they would regret this action of the Government and consider it a sham. The expression of the hon. member for South Bruce that he would approve of expending this amount in some other way in the Lower Provinces, and not on the Baie Verte Canal was merely thrown out to influence the votes of members. He was sorry to believe at last that this work was to be virtually abandoned. He would vote against the amendment of the hon. Premier.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK congratulated the Government on the decision at which they had arrived in this matter. He thought they had done the right thing in adhering to the principle that money ought not to be voted by this House for works of doubtful practical utility. There could be no doubt that the Baie Verte Canal partook of that character judging from the diverse statements made by the two engineers who had examined the project. He denounced the principal laid down by the hon. member for South Bruce that money voted for a particular purpose should under certain circumstances be expended on others. The principle was bad and should not be countenanced.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) said during the discussion a few nights ago it was pretty generally understood that the amount in the estimates should not be expended till the Government obtained such information as would justify them in coming to the conclusion that it was an enterprise which they could properly undertake. For his part he hoped the Government would place no larger sum in the estimates than would be necessary to enable them to arrive at such a conclusion. He was surprised at the remarks of the hon member for Cumberland to the effect that there was an understanding between the Government and members from Nova Scotia, that if they would assist in killing off the Baie Verte Canal scheme they would receive grants of money to be spent in their constituencies. The hon. member must know that the same members from Nova Scotia, who were opposed to the Baie Verte Canal scheme, were opposed to it during the time of the late Government, and, therefore, their present opposition to it could not arise from any motive such as was attributed to them.

Mr. DOMVILLE said that last year the Government had placed a sum of $500,000 in the estimates for this work, and he then asked the Premier if it was intended to spend that money. The Premier replied that he had but newly entered his department and it could hardly be expected that he could be in a position to form any definite judgment upon the question, and he (Mr. DOMVILLE) was disposed at that time to think that there was some justice in the remark of the hon. gentleman. But what was he to believe now when, after having placed $1,000,000 in the estimates, and having by advertisement announced that tenders would be called for, the proposition was made that there should be no expenditure upon the work at all, this next year, further than was necessary to procure more information. In the first instance they promised in the Speech from the Throne that the work would be proceeded with; then $500,000 was placed in the estimates; then it was announced that tenders would be called for; then $1,000,000 was placed in the estimates; and now, when nearly all the rest of the estimates were passed, the Government came down and said they would only ask for a vote of $20,000. What were the people of New Brunswick to think of such a course as that? Would they not be justified in saying that the Government of the day had been deceiving them, and that the hopes they had held out of building this canal were entirely delusive. He would not have felt called upon to say one word on this subject, had he not seen that the majority from New Brunswick who supported the Government remaining silent upon this important subject. He did not apply this remark to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because as his constituency was specially interested in this work, it might be said that he had a personal interest in the matter if he advocated the prosecution of the project. The people of New Brunswick were strongly in favor of this canal, not only because it would be a benefit to them, but because it would promote trade with the Upper Provinces, and he did not think that they would be willing to accept as an equivalent, certain grants of money for other purposes. Especially, he did not think they would be satisfied if this money were spent in railways under the supervision of men who had been most concerned with their railways hitherto.

Mr. GILLMOR said the hon. member for Kings had asked what the people of New Brunswick would think of the proposal of the Government. He (Mr. GILLMOR) did not like the hon. gentleman to profess to speak for all the people of

New Brunswick, but for himself he approved of the Government obtaining ample information about this work before rushing into a large expenditure. The late Government were seven years in power, but they had done very little towards this work. They had left as a legacy to the present Government a number of unfinished projects, and unsettled questions, and he believed the people of New Brunswick were willing to give the Government a reasonable time to complete these projects. The policy of the late Government seemed to be to start a great many projects, and accomplish none. With regard to the Baie Verte Canal, he was inclined to think that many of those who had spoken on the subject underrated its commercial value, at the same time he believed the Government were justified in taking ample time to satisfy themselves as to the value of the work from a commercial point of view and as to its cost. This country had experience enough of undertaking expensive works that were non-productive. The policy of the Opposition seemed to be to create discussion in the Dominion and to make the Maritime Provinces feel that their interests were neglected, but he did not believe they would succeed in that unpatriotic course. It had been stated that the Premier was influenced by the hon. member for South Bruce. He (Mr. GILMOUR) believed that the Premier had a mind of his own, and would perform what he promised. The Premier was taking a wise course in deciding to obtain the fullest information before entering upon the large expenditure necessary to construct the Baie Verte Canal. He did not say this because he was opposed to that canal; on the contrary, he would be glad to see it constructed; but the Government were right in proceeding with caution. He was very much surprised at the position taken by members from Nova Scotia on this question. He did not wish to charge them with being influenced by sectional feelings, but he was bound to say that it looked very much like it. He would like to see the Maritime Provinces more united so that if ever it became necessary for them to resist injustice on the part of the larger Provinces, they would be in a position to do so effectively. The Opposition were not half so anxious about this work when they were in power as they profess to be now. They were like the Irishman who was always willing to give away milk after his cows went dry. When they were powerless they would have the people believe they would do wonders for them if they only had the chance, though when they had the power they did very little. He thought the people would prefer to try the present Government a good while longer before they called the Opposition back to power. He was reminded of the story of a man who had been a hard drinker, but who had reformed. He took sick and had one spasm and the doctor told him that if he did not take a little liquor he would have another spasm, and the third one would finish him. "Well," said the sick man, "I have had one spasm and will run the risk of having another before I will take drink again." He believed the people had enough of the late Government and would run the risk of having two spasms of the present Government before they tried them again.

Mr. PLUMB thought if the members of the Government wished to have ample time to build the Canal, the House ought to have ample time to discuss the question. At the proposed rate of expenditure, $20,000 per annum, it would take three hundred years to complete the work, and that would be time enough for the old proverb to be realized—"Make haste slowly." He desired to say one word with regard to the Premier's expression of opinion with regard to Boards of Trade. The public were indebted to the gentlemen constituting the Boards of Trade, for the manner in which they discussed commercial questions, and it was not seemly for members of this House, especially those who were not commercial men, to sneer at their opinions. It so happened, however, that Boards of Trade in their discussions had recently run counter to the views of hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House. He expressed himself in accord with the views of hon. gentlemen who condemned the practice of keeping in the estimates a large sum for the construction of the Baie Verte Canal if it was understood that the amount was not to be expended for that but for other purposes, because it was just offering a bait for political support. Such action was entirely unworthy the statesmanship of a gentleman who aspired to lead this House.

The amendment was carried on a division.

PRIVATE BILL.

A Bill from the Senate, providing for the amalgamation of the Niagara and District Bank with the Imperial Bank, was read a first time.

The House adjourned at 10.40 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 12th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, (East Elgin), introduced a Bill to authorize the Canada Southern Railway Company to acquire the Erie and Niagara Railway, and for other purposes.

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. ROSS, (Middlesex), said the House was aware that in the early part of the session it was resolved that the management of the reporting of the debates should be entrusted for this session to the Joint Committee on Printing. That committee appointed a sub-committee to take charge of the work, and that sub-committee felt that their responsibility ceased this session, as the order of reference only applied to this session. It seemed to be generally desired that the official reports should continue, and he would therefore move, that a Select Committee consisting of Messrs. CAUCHON, TUPPER, DYMOND, BOWELL and the mover be appointed to make all necessary arrangements concerning the publication of the debates next session, and report to the House with all convenient speed.—Carried.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill respecting the Intercolonial Railway. He said the object of the Bill was to place under one Act the administration of that railway. At present the portion of that road built by the Nova Scotia Government was administered under the Act of the Legislature of that Province; the portion built by New Brunswick under a New Brunswick Act, and the Intercolonial Railway proper under the Dominion Act. This Bill was to place under one Act the whole of the railway system of the Lower Provinces.

Bill read a first time.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill to amend and consolidate the laws respecting the North-West Territories. As he intimated on a former occasion the Government decided some time ago to establish an entirely independent Government in those territories. To a certain extent it would have been advisable, before such an Act was passed, if it could be done, to have the boundary of Manitoba rectified, but that was a matter which it was difficult to deal with at the present moment. He thought it would be advisable as soon as the boundary between the Province of Ontario and the North-West Territories was established, that that boundary should become the boundary of the Province od Manitoba. At present the 96th degree off longitude was the eastern boundary of that Province, and the contention of the Ontario Government was that they owned the territory to the centre of the Lake of the Woods, and to a line running directly north from Lake Itaska, in Minnesota, to the head waters of the Mississippi. It was known from the returns laid before Parliament that the Government of the Dominion, and the Ontario Government, had decided upon an arbitration to define this boundary; and the Dominion Government had nominated ex-Lieutenant Governor WILMOT, of New Brunswick, while the Ontario Government had nominated Chief Justice RICHARDS. These gentlemen were to choose a third arbitrator, and both parties to the arrangement were to abide by the decision arrived at. The hon. member for Kingston, when leader of the Government, made a proposal to the Ontario Government two years ago, to have this matter referred to the Privy Council for settlement. While there was no particular objection to that course, it was thought advisable by the present Government that it should be settled in the way he had explained. Until that settlement had been reached, which he hoped it would be in a short time, as each side had prepared its case, and the two arbitrators would shortly have a meeting, it was difficult to define the boundaries of Manitoba in the east. The present Bill would be applicable to the territory of the Dominion east of Manitoba as well as to that to the west and north. He might mention that application had been made on behalf of the Government of Manitoba for an enlargement of their territory. They proposed, in fact, to have it made something like nine or ten times larger than it was at present. But there were other proposals of that Government in connection with this matter which rendered necessary the postponement of action for the present until a conference can be had with the Local Government. It was proposed by this Bill to have a Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West territories who would be assisted by a Council. That Council would consist of five members appointed by the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council; three stipendiary magistrates or judges, to be appointed in a similar manner who would be members of the Council ex-officio—and two others, perhaps the principal Indian Agent and some other person whose place of residence and occupation made it convenient for them to perform the duties that would be required of them. The first section of this Bill simply provided that the territories formerly known as "Ruperts Land, and the North-West territories," should continue to be styled and known as the North-West territories, and that there shall be a Lieutenant Governor appointed who shall hold office during the pleasure of the GOVERNOR GENERAL and receive instructions in the same way as Lieutenant Governors in the Provinces. The third section provides for the establishment of the Council, and the fourth that the seat of Government may from time to time be changed by the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council. In the meantime the seat of Local Government for the territories shall be established at Fort Pelly, that being a convenient place to reach the Sascatchewan River and Fort Ellis, and other parts of the territories, and not beyond reach of the telegraph system about being established. The Government last season constructed buildings there for the North-West police force, sufficient to accommodate two hundred men, a commandant house, an hospital and other buildings; and these buildings could accommodate the officers connected with the North West Government without any serious expense. Last year there was expended on these buildings something like $30,000. By section five it was proposed to pay the Lieut. Governor a salary not exceeding $7,000, and each Stipendary Magistrate or Judge a salary not exceeding $3,000, and the other two members of the Council a salary not exceeding $1,000; and to the Clerk of the Council who shall act as Secretary to the Lieut. Governor a salary not exceeding $1,800. Sections six seven and eight simply provide for the consolidation of the laws and ordnances now in force in those territories, and the ninth section that no ordnance shall be passed by the Governor in Council or the Lieut. Governor inconsistant with any Act of the Dominion Parliament. This section restricts the jurisdiction of the Council practically to that now enjoyed by the Lieut. Governor of Manitoba acting as Governor of the North-West Territories, and his Council. The next few sections provide for popular Government so far as it could be established under the circumstances of the country. The eleventh section provides that so soon as the Lieut. Governor is satisfied by such proof as he may require that any portion of the territory not exceeding an area of one thousand square miles contains a population of not less than one thousand inhabitants such district may be erected into an electoral district which shall be entitled to elect a member of the Council or as it may be of the Legislative Assembly. The sub-sections provide the machinery for holding the elections. The fifth sub-section provides that as soon as the Lieut. Governor is satisfied that any electoral district contains a population of two thousand, exclusive of aliens and unenfranchised Indians, he shall issue a writ for the election of a second member. The sixth sub-section provides that when the number of elective members amounts to twenty-one the council hereinbefore appointed shall cease and be determined, and the members so elected shall be constituted and designated as the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territory, and the powers by this Act vested in the council shall thenceforth be vested and exercisable by such Legislative Assembly. One of the sub-sections provides that every bona fide resident and householder who shall have been in the district for twelve months may vote, and any person entitled to vote shall be eligible for election.

Sections twelve to thirty inclusive contain provisions for the holding of real estate, and the administration of estates, the law that prevails in Ontario with regard to property being introduced. Sections 36 to 44 inclusive make provisions for wills and their registration; and from 45 to 50 provisions regarding married women defining their rights as to property. Section 54 provides that the Governor may appoint a registrar of deeds in and for the North-West Territories and the remuneration to be paid. Section 52 provides for the appointment of a Sheriff who shall reside in the territory; and the Lieutenant Governor is authorized by the 53d section to have local disposition of the police force in and for the North-West Territories established under the Act respecting the administration of justice in those territories. For the administration of justice the Lieutenant Governor is authorized by section 54 to appoint Justices of the Peace; and the Governor in Council may, by ordinances, subject to the provisions of this Act, set apart any portion of said territories as and for a judicial district, and may from time to time alter the limits and extent of any such district. Section 56 provides that a court or courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction, shall be held in said territories in every judicial district, and at such periods and places as the Lieutenant Governor may from time to time alter. Section 56 provides authority for the appointment of a stipendary magistrate, and magistrates within the territories. Section 59, and following sections, provide the jurisdiction of each stipendary magistrate, and the mode of holding the courts for the trial of criminal offences. Section 68, and following sections, provide for the administration of justice in civil cases. Section 71, and the sub-sections one to six inclusive, contain provisions for excluding all intoxicating liquors, prohibiting their introduction and their sale in the territories. This would give the Dominion a fair opportunity to commence with a clean slate in this enormous territory, and test practically the operation of a prohibitory liquor law where there has been no law on that or any other subject before. If we were able to accomplish prohibition in that territory it would enable us the better to accomplish the object that so many were petitioning for as regards the whole Dominion. He might say in connection with this part of the Bill that the officers of the police force now in the territory have very stringent instructions about the destruction of intoxicating liquors, and Col. MCLEOD, the officer in command at Belly river, at the flank of the Rocky Mountains, had seized a large quantity of liquor, and on one occasion knocked in the head of forty-four barrels of whiskey. The exclusion of intoxicating liquor had already been very beneficial, so far at least as regards the condition of the Indian tribes, and we had reason to believe that it had given the utmost satisfaction. The police force would also act as revenue officers, assisting the prevention of smuggling. They collected some $1,000 or $5,000 of duties levied upon merchandize, in the legitimate course of trade, in the months of December and January, the duties previous to that time not having been levied. The other sections of the Act, 72, 73 and 74, simply provided for the repeal of the various Acts now in force and in order to avoid all confusion, a schedule was given of the Acts now in force, and which would be repealed by the enactment of this law.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON asked if the place of residence of the Lieut. Governor was fixed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had at Fort Pelly all the buildings necessary to fulfill all the conditions of a Governor's residence.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said this was a Bill of so great importance that every hon. member of this House would feel it his duty to consider it fully, and it might occupy a good deal of time. However, they must address themselves to the task. With reference to the proposed settlement of the boundary lines, he was sorry to learn that the suggestions of the late Government were not carried out, and that the matter was not referred to the judicial committee of the Privy Council for an authoritative decision. He would like to know whether it was the duty of these arbitrators (who would be acceptable, he was satisfied, to the country as they were to himself) to decide where the line is to run, or simply to decide upon a line which they would recommend to be adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE replied that the exact instructions had not yet been communicated to the Arbitrator for the Dominion, but he might say he felt that the Arbitrators should be left to define where the line should be, though not strictly according to the interpretation of the law, if there should be any doubt on that score.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD asked whether concessions were to be made by Manitoba or by the Dominion. According to one contention the head of Lake Superior belongs to the North-West; according to the other contention (and he thought that would be supported by the hon. member for Bothwell) the Province of Ontario runs to the Lake of the Woods or perhaps further.

Mr. MILLS—Very much further.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD contended that this question should be settled. The Dominion had purchased the whole of the North-West, and it belonged to Canada, and therefore the whole Dominion should know exactly what their property was, how far it extended, and what was the boundary of their farm in the first place. That being once ascertained it might be well, at all events it would be expedient, that wherever the line was to be fixed according to this arbitration, there should be a boundary defined as the legal boundary between the North-West and Manitoba. He hoped the award of the arbitrators, whatever it might be, would not be final, but would be subject to the ratification of the Government and be submitted to Parliament. He wished to know whether the award was to be the unanimous decision of the arbitrators or of a majority of them.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The award of two will be considered sufficient to settle the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD pressed strongly upon the Government that the arbitrators should be asked to find, first, where the western boundary line of Ontario was by law, and second, the eastern boundary of Manitoba. Then they might also be authorized to report a conventional line, other than the line they might say was the legal boundary, as being a convenient one considering all the circumstances of the case. With regard to the appointment of Lieutenant Governor, the hon. gentleman should show some necessity for it, since the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba was paid, in addition to his salary, a sum for governing the North-West Territory as well. That was to say, he had two commissions; one as Lieut. Governor of Manitaba, with a regular Ministry, and the other as Lieutenant Governor of the North-West, which might be considered in the light of a colony. The hon. gentleman should be prepared to show in the second reading that there was a necessity for appointing an additional Governor just now. Manitoba was a very small Province in itself, with a very small population, and if one Lieutenant Governor was sufficient for the Government of Ontario, surely one ought to be enough for Manitoba and the North-West for some time to come at all events. All the country lying west of Lake Superior and east of Manitoba was considered part of the North-West, and could not be governed as well from Fort Pelly as from Fort Garry. He approved of the provision relating to Stipendiary Magistrates, but thought there was no necessity for the clause introducing the popular element. It seemed to him that the Government should not clog themselves with such a provision. At the right time they could pass an Act introducing the popular element into the Government of the North-West.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the North-West Council was in existence, and could be increased to 21 members. Though several vacancies had occurred in it, the Government made no appointments. Every one of those gentlemen was styled honorable until honorables became very plentiful in in Manitoba. The Government found them a little Parliament acting for the North-West, though they resided in the Province, and some of them were never in the territories. The Government had repeated demands from them during the last year for large sums of money. They made a requisition once for $10,000, and actually cost the country during the last part of the year $3,000. It was evident that the council would cost the country as much as a Government in the territory, without being as efficient. In some places within the territories there is already a very considerable population. At Fort Albert there are 500 people other than Indians who have settled there, and that population would soon be increased to three or four times the number. There is a very considerable settlement where the North-West Police was stationed, on the Belly River, on the flank of the Rocky Mountains, and as this district is one of the finest portions of the territory, it would be rapidly settled. It seemed to be exceedingly desirable, at the earliest point of time, that there should be a firm Government established within the territories and that the Governor should reside several hundred miles west of the present point of authority,in order to exercise a proper influence for the maintenance of peace, or overlooking Indian affairs,and generally helping the Government to establish law and order throughout the territories. The Government had ascertained, from the most authentic source, that within the last eighteen months there were very nearly 150 murders committed in the North-West territories, and no person had been brought to trial. No doubt those were mostly slain in Indian fights with traders from Missouri and Montana, of a most reckless character, who introduced the vilest passions of human nature into the territories and slaughtered the poor people with their improved fire-arms and dealing death and destruction by their vile intoxicating liquors. It seemed very clear that there was an absolute necessity for the establishment of a firm Government within the boundaries of the territories, and that provisions should be made for a popular Government, for the establishment of schools and of some municipal system which would enable the people to mantain roads, bridges, and other local works. That connot be done under the old laws, for although they were suitable for a short period of time, it was now evident that the country required an improved system. The Government were, therefore, quite justified in submitting this measure to Parliament, and no doubt whenever the Bill went into operation it would immensely promote the settlement of the country, for nothing was so essential to the settlement of the country as the maintenance of law and order within its bounds.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL thought it was very desirable that the commissioners should be appointed as proposed. The Government having decided that they would not follow the course suggested by the late Government of having the Privy Council decide what were the local rights of the Dominion of Canada, but would refer the matter to the arbitrament of two commissioners, it was equally desirable that they should not only decide where it was desirable to define the boundaries of Ontario, but also to decide what were the legal and proper boundaries between Ontario and the North-West territories. The late Government had always recognized that the western boundary line of Ontario was two miles east of Fort William. During the existence of the Ontario Government, of which the hon. First Minister was a member, they claimed and exercised jurisdiction over a district west of Fort William. As a representative of one of the smaller Provinces, he feared that Ontario possesses at the present time too much power, and that the great power which it exercised might act to the injury of the smaller Provinces, which had equal rights with Ontario in the North-West territory. In place of extending the boundaries of Manitoba westward, it might be desirable to extend them eastward and northward toward Ontario, so as to give the Province of Manitoba water communication with the great lakes. He suggested to the Government the desirability when giving instructions to the commissioners of having them clearly defined, and the conclusion arrived at by the commissioners should not be final, but subject to the approval of the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member for Northumberland had referred to the pre-eminent power of Ontario in this House, and was apprehensive that the results of that arbitration would be affected by that power. The hon. gentleman knew the character and reputation of the public men of his own Province better than he (Mr. BLAKE) could tell him; but such an insinuation had never been cast on a public man as cast by the hon. member on the Ex-Governor WILMOT of his own Province, who was one of the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he did not intend to cast any imputation on the character of the commissioners. He had confidence in both Judge RICHARDS and Judge WILMOT, but he knew the pre-eminent power which a great power like Ontario exercised over men's minds.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Has the hon. gentleman been swayed?

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Very often.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he had no doubt whatever, that the arbitrators would discharge their duty to the best of their ability. Under the Imperial Act it was only by the joint legislative action of the Provinces affected, and of the Dominion that the boundaries, whatever they were, could be altered ; therefore it was only an authoritative exposition of the law itself that would be obtained, and anything else would be merely suggestive. The task which the Ministry had set for itself was the most important it was possible to conceive. To found primary institutions under which we hope to see hundreds of thousands, and the more sanguine among us think millions of men and families settled and flourishing, was one of the noblest undertakings that could be entered upon by any legislative body, and it was no small indication of the power and true position of this Dominion that Parliament should be engaged to-day in that important task. He agreed with the hon. member for Kingston that the task was one that required time, consideration and deliberation, and they must take care that no false steps were made in such a work. He did not agree with that right hon. gentleman that the Government ought to repeal his errors. The right hon. gentleman had tried the institutions for the North-West territories which he now asked the House to frame. and for the same reason as he had given to-day—that it would be better for the Dominion Government to keep matters in their own hands and decide what was best for the future. He (Mr. BLAKE) believed that it was essential to our obtaining a large immigration to the North-West that we should tell the people beforehand what those rights were to be in the country in which we invited them to settle. It was interesting to the people to know that at the very earliest moment there was a sufficient aggregate of population within a reasonable distance, that aggregation would have a voice in the self-government of the territories, and he believed the Dominion Government was wise, (although the measure might be brought down very late this session and it might be found impossible to give it due consideration) in determining in advance of settlement what the character of the institutions of the country should be in which we invite people to settle. He did not agree with the policy of asking people to settle in that western country, and tell them that a paternal Government would look after them, and would give them such institutions as the Government thought suitable. We had better let the people know their fate politically and otherwise before they settled there. The task to be discharged now, or at some future time, was one of considerable importance. And amongst the difficulties was the determining of what the range of power of the Council would be in the first place, assuming that its character would be that of a mixed nominative and elective council, as he understood it would be of the First Minister ; the Council at a subsequent period assuming the position of a Legislative Assembly when the population was sufficient to entitle it to assume that position. He did not hear from the hon. First Minister any distinct enunciation of the powers committed to the Council and afterwards to the Assembly. Looking over the Bill hastily it seemed that the powers were too general, that the powers were those of the British North American Act with respect to peace, order and good government.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Too wide.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It gave the Council all the powers practically enjoyed by this Parliament and the Local Legislatures together; and it would be proper to restrict and define their powers in all matters connected with Municipal Government, and provision should be made at the earliest possible moment for municipal institutions, local taxation and improvements. He regarded it as essential under the circumstances of the country, and in view of the deliberation during the last few days that a general principle should be laid down in the Bill with respect to public instruction. He did believe that we ought not to introduce into that territory the heart burnings and difficulties with which certain other portions of this Dominion and other countries had been afflicted. It seemed to him, having regard to the fact that, as far as we could expect at present, the general character of that population would be somewhat analogous to the population of Ontario, that there should be some provision in the constitution by which they should have conferred upon them the same rights and privileges in regard to religious instruction as those possessed by the people of the Province of Ontario. The principles of local self-government and the settling of the question of public instruction seemed to him ought to be the cardinal principles of the measure.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the words "Governor-in-Council" in the 8th clause of the Bill meant not the Lieutenant Governor but the GOVERNOR GENERAL. Practically the legislation of the territory would be in the hands of the Government here at Ottawa. The Lieutenant Governor in Council would have power to make only such laws and ordinances as the Bill provided for, and it would be for Parliament, when the population had increased sufficiently, to confer upon them more extensive powers than it was proposed to give them under the present measure. As to the subject of public instruction, it did not in the first place attract his attention, but when he came to the subject of local taxation he was reminded of it. Not having had time before to insert a clause on the subject. he proposed to do so when the Bill was in committee. The clause provided that the Lieutenant Governor, by and with the consent of his Council or Assembly, as the case might be, should pass all necessary ordinances in respect of education, but it would be specially pro vided that the majority of the rate-payers might establish such schools and impose such necessary assessment as they might think fit; and that the minority of the rate-payers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, might establish separate schools; and such rate-payers would be liable only to such educational assessments as they might impose upon themselves. This, he hoped would meet the objection offered by the hon. member for South Bruce. There might be some amendments found necessary in the Bill, but he thought it would be found generally speaking to meet the requirements of the country. However, the Government would be very glad to avail themselves as far as possible of such suggestions as might be made to them.

Mr. D. A. SMITH thought the provisions of the Bill before the House were on the whole calculated to do good service in the North-West if honestly and properly carried out. A very great deal depended upon the administration of the law and upon the character of those who were appointed to carry it out. In this respect they had suffered much in Manitoba. It was well known that sufficient care had not been taken in that respect. He did not say this as a reproach to the right hon. member for Kingston, who, he believed, had under the circumstances done the best he could. At the time there was very little knowledge of the country in Canada, and perhaps even now there was not as much as could be desired. He believed the right hon. gentleman sent to the country those whom he thought best fitted to perform the duties. Much had been done within the past year towards introducing law and good order in that country by sending out an efficient body of police. He said this with the greater pleasure because in the first instance he was afraid they were not very efficient, and so much had been said to the discredit of the force in the early part of the season that they were received with a little distrust; but he had in his possession a letter from a person who had been out just where Major MCLEOD was, and which stated that officer was doing his duty excellently. He had cleared the country of the whiskey traders, and it was now peace and quiet where last year it was dangerous for any one to be. He (Mr. SMITH) thought this spoke a great deal for the efficiency of the Mounted Police, and was a strong commentary upon what had already been done for the Government of the country. The means for preserving the peace were formerly quite insufficient. He thought the provisions of the Bill now brought in were calculated to serve the purpose for which the measure was intended for many years to come. At present the Council of the North-West was probably not just exactly such a body as it ought to be. They were under the very great disadvantage of being far removed from such portions of the territory as were at all settled. The principal settlements were 500 or 600 miles from Manitoba, which was quite equal to 3,000 or 4,000 miles in this eastern country, because the means of communication were very bad. He felt that under the circumstances of that country it would be a great benefit to have a Governor and Council within the territory. He did not doubt that the Council would be an efficient one, or at any rate he hoped that it would be, since so much depended upon the character of those appointed to it. He thought it was a wise provision not to at once extend legislative powers to the new territory. In the chief settlement, Prince Albert, there were not at present more than 500 inhabitants, but when they increased to 1,000 or more, and the other settlements had increased in the same ratio, he thought it would be right to give them local legislative powers. His objection to the North-West Council as at present constituted was that many of its members knew nothing more of the country than gentlemen on the floor of this House who had simply heard of the North-West as they had of other far distant countries. However, there were at least six of them who knew it intimately, but it would be a most invidious thing for these gentlemen to get up and tell their fellow-councillors that they knew nothing at all about it. It would be admitted that very frequently those who were the least acquainted with a subject were the most ready to give advice. He thought on the whole it was very much better that they should have the Council proposed in this Bill, and that those who formed the new Council should have an intimate local knowledge of the country, and be connected with its interests. The right hon. member for Kingston seemed to think that it would be an objection to have the Council at Fort Pelly, having in view the interests of the country eastward of Fort Garry. He was himself of opinion that the interests of that country for some time would be of such small importance that the location of the Council would not be a matter of such great consequence. With regard to the disputed boundary between Manitoba and Ontario, the people there would be very glad to find that a port on Lake Superior belonged to them by right, but he hoped that whether it did or not the people of Ontario would give it to them as a matter of grace. The point brought up by the hon. member for South Ontario was an important one, and he was glad to find that the First Minister intended to introduce a provision in Committee, dealing with the subject. He had not noticed from the explanations given that there was any intention to give a representative to the North-West at Ottawa. Without some such provision he did not see how the North-West could have a voice in the legislation of this Dominion, and he strongly contended that there should be at least one member to represent its interests here. It would give a great deal of satisfaction in this country, and he thought it would be at least a matter of justice to the North-West. He hoped stringent measures would be taken to prevent the introduction of goods without payment of duty, as such practice was injurious to the honest merchants who paid the duties. At present the revenue laws were evaded by bringing in goods by way of British Columbia.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that those who were acquainted with the North-West Territory would agree with him that it was a most difficult matter to establish a proper and efficient system of Government there. He was very much pleased with the general features of the Bill. He dissented from the view of the hon. member for Kingston that the Lieut. Governor of Manitoba could efficiently administer the Government of the territories. That system had proved a failure, and though he was a member of the council he must frankly admit that it was impossible for them under the circumstances to efficiently carry out the laws in the territory. He believed with the member for South Bruce that we must have a strong Government in that territory. There was a moral power in the cocked hat of a Governor, and in the coat of a policeman. Large powers should be given to the proposed new council. It was not advisable in his opinion to give representative institutions to that territory just now. However, he would discuss the details of the measure at a future stage, and he hoped the Government would receive in a kindly spirit the suggestions of those who were familar with the condition and wants of that country. With regard to the mounted police, he must say that under its present able commander it had proved a very efficient force. He regretted that the Government decided upon Fort Pelly as the seat of Government for the North-West, as in his opinion it possessed no recommendation except the fact that it would have telegraph communication. However, as there was a provision in the Bill for a change in the seat of Government, if it was deemed advisable he would raise no objection on that head.

Mr. MILLS said there were several important features in this Bill which would require special attention. One was that relating to the powers given to the Lieut. Governor in Council. The Premier spoke of their having power to establish schools, build roads and bridges and do other works of a municipal character. It was extremely doubtful whether the Governor in Council could have any of these powers. It was proposed to furnish the money for these objects out of the Dominion Treasury then it might be done, but the Crown itself had no power to impose taxes upon any portion of the community, and of course could not delegate to any Lieut. Governor in Council powers which it did not itself possess. It could not authorize a Governor in Council to establish a municipal system and provide for the taxation of the people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—It can be done by statute.

Mr. MILLS—That is another matter. If it was intended, therefore, that these things should be done, it seemed to him provision must be made in the Bill for their being done by Parliament. There was another matter it seemed to him ought not to be disregarded ; and that was the terms and conditions under which these people would ultimately be formed into a Province. It would be better that the people who settle that territory should know beforehand the terms and conditions under which they would become an organized part of the Dominion. He saw no objection, when the population became sufficiently large, to allowing that territory to be represented in the Dominion Parliament before it was organized into a Province. By and by we would be called upon, when Provinces came to be organized in that territory, to state what liabilities the Dominion should assume, and what revenues should be given to the Local Government, and it seemed to him it was just as well that this should be done at the beginning so that there would be no room for dispute or difficulty in the future. If some definite plan was adopted, the people would become accustomed to it, and no embarrassment or trouble would arise when it came to be carried into effect. Those who observed the American territorial system of government would notice that from the time the first government was organized under the ordinance enacted by Congress in 1787, till the establishment of the last territorial government, there was scarcely any difference in the plan of government, and they had never found it necessary to depart from the general principle laid down in the ordinance of 1787. It seemed to him we ought not to refuse to profit by the experience of others under similar circumstances to our own. In order to accomplish the object he had suggested, the Government should know what moneys they had expended on public buildings and works in these territories, which might afterwards become the property of the Local Government, and in that case it would only be fair that when the time came for the admission of the territory into the Union, the money so expended could be charged to it as a public debt. He saw no difficulty in this being done, but thought it should be embraced in the fundamental law. The hon. member for Northumberland had stated that Manitoba should have a sea-port town and its boundary ought to be extended to the shores of Lake Superior. If the hon. gentleman would look into the question, he would find Ontario had something to say on that matter, and he had no hesitation in saying—seeing that it was to be decided on judicial principles—he did not think it was competent for the Dominion Government to decide it otherwise than was proposed. Under the Quebec Act of 1774, the western limit of what now remained to us as the old Province of Quebec was fixed at the forks of the Saskatchewan, and the head waters of the Mississippi. By an Order in Council that was adopted in 1791, it was declared that the western limit of the western portion of Quebec, erected into Upper Canada, shall extend to what is known as the western limit of Canada under the French. That, he apprehended, would extend to the Rocky Mountains. That country was taken possession of by the French. They established forts at several points in the Red River territory and the most western fort was at the forks of the Saskatchewan. They had appointed Captain LA CORNE to govern the territory under a license from Quebec. The whole country was occupied by the French Government as part of Canada, and was made by the Order in Council of 1791, part of the present Province of Ontario. The late Government had organized the Province of Manitoba within those limits but he apprehended if a judicial decision should be sought from this arbitration instead of extending the boundary of Manitoba to the shores of Lake Superior, this Parliament would be called upon to compensate Ontario for a very considerable portion they had acquired from that Province.

The Bill was read a first time.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that the clerk read the resolutions regarding the Northern Railway Company adopted last session.—Carried.

The resolutions were accordingly read.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked leave to introduce a Bill to re-arrange the capital of the Northern Railway Company of Canada, to enable the said Company to change the gauge and to amalgamate the Northern Extension Co., and for other purposes. He said the object of the Government was to give effect to the resolution of last session, and make this financial arrangement with the Company, but at the representation of the Company, the Government had agreed to have a Bill introduced incorporating these several objects. Practically the Northern Extension and the North Grey Railroads were part of the Northern Railway system. They had what might be called a permanent agreement, and therefore a complete amalgamation of these Companies with the Northern Railway was a mere matter of course, and though the provisions relating to the amalgamation had no place in this measure, he agreed to allow it to be considered in connection with it. The several clauses of the Bill simply provided for the manner in which the Government were to receive the sum stipulated in the resolutions and made a priority for their own bonds in addition to the £100,000 sterling. In regard to the shareholders who were practically shut out by the Acts now in force, he had a great many representations from the holders of ordinary shares in reference to their position. They were extremely anxious to be placed in a position to organize the Company themselves. To some extent an opportunity had been afforded them to see what they could do. The attempt was an utter failure, and one of the clauses now provide that it should be left to the Company—that was, practically, the bond-holders who controlled the Company—to commute the shares so as to extinguish them at a certain time. He had not thought it desirable that the interest held by the city of Toronto and the county of Simcoe should be considered at all, but rather were contributions of $200,000 each to this railway. They were treated simply as bonuses, though the Bill provided they might still retain a part of the direction of the road. The Bill provided also for the appointment of a Government director, who should control the financial expenditure until the full amount mentioned in the resolutions should be paid.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the Premier had combined with a public measure provisions which were essentially features of a private Bill. The clause referring to the amalgamation of the companies should have been introduced as a private Bill. In fact, all the features of the measure, except those relating to the Government debt, were subject matters of private legislation, and private legislation must be proceeded with in a regular manner. What did this Bill propose? There were private shareholders in this road, a considerable number of them, and also the city of Toronto with its £50,000 stock, and the county of Simcoe with £50,000 more. It was proposed that individual shareholders should be commuted on certain terms, but the shares of the city of Toronto and the county of Simcoe were to be considered as bonuses. He thought Toronto and Simcoe had a right to be heard on that matter, and this part of the measure be introduced as a private Bill in the regular manner and dealt with as such. He would discuss the question of the amalgamation of the companies at a future stage of the Bill, if Mr. SPEAKER should rule that it was in order to combine with a measure for the remission of a public debt provisions which were essentially features of a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was prepared to eliminate these features from the Bill. They were introduced by the law clerk in conjunction with the committee of the shareholders who were here, and the solicitor for the company. The hon. member for Muskoka had a Bill relating to the Northern Railway and those provisions should have been in his Bill. It could be done yet if the notice covered it. As to the provisions in this measure with regard to private shareholders, they were introduced with the consent of the shareholders' committee, and he understood that all parties were quite agreed on the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER said the provisions of the Bill which were of a private nature should be dealt with as a private Bill.

The Bill was withdrawn.

PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On concurrence in item No. 72, $6,250,000, for the Pacific Railway, Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked for further explanations from the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought that the Governement or any private member submitting a proposition would have the right of reply.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that after his speech the other night, which was unanswered and unanswerable, he had hoped that the Premier, having had some time to reconsider this important question, might have been enabled to make such a statement as would not compel him to continue his opposition to the present Government policy.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thought he had made a very exhaustive statement in proposing the vote, and if the hon. member would indicate what would satisfy him, he would be willing to make further remarks. He had said all that he had thought necessary under the circumstances, and all he now proposed to do was simply to notice two or three remarks upon which the hon. member for Cumberland had laid much stress. First, as the personal honor of every member of this House ought to be their first care, he would say a few words in relation to the expressions made use of by the hon. member in connection with some other matters which appeared in the principal organ of the members of the Opposition (The Mail). The hon. member for Cumberland said in the course of his speech that he did not mean to insinuate that he (Mr. MACKENZIE) had brought the railway to Thunder Bay for reasons personal to himself, although his first words indicated even that charge; but the hon. member had charged him with listening to the advice of interested friends. He took this opportunity to declare to the House, and to the hon. member, that he was never advised by any friends—he had no friends' interests to serve, and there were no friends' interests served that he knew of; and if the hon. gentleman knew a single fact to justify his expression, he asked the hon. gentleman now to state it, and he would make a reply.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the hon., the First Minister, had put the matter in a very pointed manner. He (Mr. TUPPER) had never charged the hon. gentleman with having done anything to promote his own interest in the steps he had taken; but he had stated, and he repeated, that there was so large a difference between the policy propounded to the House by the hon. gentleman last year, and the policy he now proposed—that he feared the hon. the First Minister had listened to the advice of parties who felt a deep interest in diverging the Pacific Railway from Nipegon to Thunder Bay. It was well-known that there were a large number of persons in Toronto who possessed great influence, and who were deeply interested in the development of the mineral lands and other resources of Thunder Bay. Those who had had any experience in the administration of the public affairs of this country knew that when there were great interests at stake, men of great influence generally found some means of bringing that influence to bear as strongly as possible on those who had the control of affairs. He would be very sorry to allow the hon. the First Minister or any member of the House to suppose that he insinuated anything more than that the First Minister had been induced to make a most unfortunate change in the policy proposed by him last session, and in that he was supported by the member for South Bruce, who distinctly stated to the House that he was led to believe that the policy would be different.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE regretted that the hon. member for Cumberland could not be more explicit, as he had insinuated a charge which was utterly without foundation. He would state to the House again, that he (Mr. MACKENZIE) did not know a single friend of his, either political or personal, who had derived any benefit from having the road at the Lake Superior end located at Thunder Bay. He was not either induced, influenced or approached by any person in any place, except by the inhabitants of Prince Arthur Landing, who pressed him, as it was natural they should do, to have the road brought to that place; but it was not carried there.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER accepted fully the statement made by the hon. the First Minister.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would read to the House the following statement which was published in the Mail the other day:—

"He (Mr. MACKENZIE) tells us his purchases were in the public interest, that he took advantage of a low market, and that if he had waited to a later date the country would in all probability have had to pay higher prices. This may all be as the First Minister states. The prices which he paid seem reasonable, But if there is any force in the contention upon which he and his party have heretofore so strongly insisted, the question of price is of small consequence in comparison with the question of principle * * *. What right had he then to make the purchase? None whatever. With the taint of oil-well scandals and silver 'rings' yet about his skirts, the Premier has surely not yielded to the temptation of enriching another relative by allowing him to purchase these rails for the Government."

He noticed that article because he wished to dispose of the whole matter once for all. The allusion here was one of the repeated insinuations made in that paper lately, that he had something to do with the noted oil-well swindle known as the Prince Company in Petrolia. All he had to do with it was this—that he sent a telegram which cost him $50 to Sir JOHN ROSE warning him that the concern was a swindle, and asking him to put his friends on their guard, which he did, and he referred the Mail and all others who were circulating such stories to Sir JOHN ROSE or the banking firm with which he was connected, for proof of the fact, that he saved his own friend Sir JOHN ROSE—for he had always been a personal friend—and saved all with whom he came in contact on the Stock Exchange from losing heavily by that concern, which he was now accused of being connected with. In regard to the statement as to a relative of his having been employed to purchase rails, he desired to state to the House that no relative of his had been employed for any purpose good, bad, or indifferent in connection with any Government work, or anything approaching a Government work. Since he had been in charge of the Public Works Department he had never even opened a tender; all tenders were opened by the principal officer of the Department. He never looked upon them in any way whatever until a report was made to him as to which was the lowest, and the lowest was invariably accepted as soon as the contractor furnished security; and when the contractor was not able to do so the officer of the Department passed in regular gradation down through the tenders until one was reached and the contract closed. He hoped he would not again be attacked directly or indirectly in connection with that matter, but whenever any member supposed that there was the slightest ground for imputation on the conduct of himself or of any of his colleagues let them at once ask for a committee of the House, and they could have their own committee. Of course he quite admitted that the hon. member for Cumberland did not make any personal charge, but the hon. member would also admit that it was necessary to refer to expressions used by him in reference to this matter. Before leaving that point he would tell the hon. member and the House that the only person whose advice he had acted on was Mr. SANDFORD FLEMING as Chief Engineer, and he would give the reasons why he adhered to that advice. The hon. member stated in his speech the other evening that the distance from Red River to Lake Nipegon was 416 miles. It was quite true that the distance to the upper end of Lake Ellen was 416 miles; but the distance to Red Rock, to which the road would have to go, was 426 miles, and the distance from Koninistiguia River to Red River was only 377 miles. If the road were built to Nipegon it would have to be a railroad all the way from Red River, there being no stretches of water in the intervals which could be used for transport purposes. By constructing a line from Fort William to Lake Shebandowan we at once obtain possession of a navigable route; no doubt it was a long circuit, but it was a navigable route in the summer season, by constructing 45 miles of railway to Lake Shebandowan, in a direct line from this point, and passing Sturgeon Falls at the east end of Rainy Lake, we make nearly a direct line from the Falls to Rat Portage. So we are on a line with respect to which we can construct a railroad all the way, if we like; or we can connect with the line that would pass Lake Nipegon 70 miles from Fort William. The object the Government had in view in adopting their scheme on the advice of the Chief Engineer, was to obtain the most favorable port on Lake Superior. Now, whether Nipegon Bay or Thunder Bay was the most favorable was no doubt a matter of opinion ; but there could be no question of this fact that the mouth of the Koninistiguia River was the only place where we would be enabled to use the navigation of Lake Shebandowan, Rainy Lake, and Lake of the Woods. If we proceeded to build from Lake Nipegon we would have 426 miles of road to build before we could use a single yard of it for through traffic—the entire road must be constructed. By adopting the other line we could use 45 miles at the Lake Superior end and 100 miles at the other end, that was from Rat Portage west to Red River, and have during the summer a navigable route all the rest of the distance by slightly improving the portages and building a lock at Fort St. Francis. The object which the Government and the House had in view last year when this project was tolerably well explained, was to get into that western country as soon as possible, and further to construct lengths of railway that would enable us to attain that object in the first place. He had, therefore, no reason to believe he would differ from him in opinion now, but would approve the policy the Government had adopted. The Government had no intention of building the road for Nipissing or Nipegon, or Thunder Bay, as the case might be, for some years to come. That would depend entirely upon what might be developed in the future. He did not think it was necessary for him to say more on that point, unless some members might choose to ask him some question. The hon. member for Cumberland had alluded to his position being supported by the hon. member for South Bruce. He asked that hon. member to state if such was the fact.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he did not hear the observation of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said his statement was sustained by the speech of the hon. member for South Bruce, in which he stated that the policy of making a connection at Thunder Bay was a change of policy from that indicated by the hon. Premier last year.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he did not mean to make that statement, nor did he think he did make it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was satisfied that the hon. member for South Bruce would never back up the hon. member for Cumberland in his views. So far as constructing a line of railway from east to west, he said now, as he said last year, that the route from Nipegon was the shortest from east to west. If we were to diverge from the head of Black Bay, across the ridge that separates it from Thunder Bay, and pass along to Fort William, the line would be from 30 to 40 miles longer than if it should pass direct from Nipissing, past Nipegon and straight on to the crossing of the Winnipeg River at Rat Portage. He never denied that, and he did not deny it now. But he said, if we had commeneed at Lake Nipegon we would have to build 426 miles before we could use one mile, while by beginning at Fort William and building 145 miles we would bring the territory within three or four days travel of the waters of Lake Superior. He believed hon. gentlemen opposite contemplated, when their project was brought down, not going to Nipegon at all. He proposed to carry the line north of that point, and construct a branch 120 miles long to Thunder Bay. When the hon. member for Cumberland charged him, as he had charged him, with making the expenditure on the road from Koninistiguia River to Lake Shebandowan as one altogether outside of the Pacific Railway scheme, he said that for which he had no reason or justification. With respect to the branch line from French River east for a distance of 85 miles, it was expressly provided for by the Act of last session, and the Government were simply carrying out the law of the land in relation to that matter. With respect to the comments made by the hon. member for Cumberland, and of the Opposition Press as to the tenders for the construction of the line to the mouth of French River, he had only to say that tenders were advertised for in the usual way, during a period of from six to eight weeks. The tenders were opened by the officers of the department as usual, were disposed of in the usual way, an Order in Council directing the acceptance of the lowest tender put in was passed as usual, and he thought there was nothing of which hon. members could complain, or of which the public outside could complain, unless it were that the price of the work was higher than they expected. He quite agreed in that view, and the tenders were higher than he had anticipated. As to the calculation made by the hon. member for Cumberlond in which he endeavored to show that eight millions were proposed to be spent by the Government on works which were not in connection with the Pacific road, he had merely to say that he had heard so much during the present and the previous session from the honourable gentleman who dealt in millions as boys would with toys, that he paid very little attention to his finanacial calculations. Not only did the hon. gentleman deal with millions as a boy would with toys, but he heaped them up without the slightest regard to the correctness of the premises upon which he based his conclusions. He should have called the amount twenty millions at once which could be done by counting $5 instead of $2 as the price per acre. But the hon. gentleman knew that the Government were endeavouring to get settlers induced to come into the country by giving away the lands for nothing, or selling them at 50 cents an acre; and yet he (Mr. TUPPER), for the sake of creating a false impression in the House and the country, valued them at $2 an acre. However, the hon. gentleman was so much accustomed to make use of hyperbolic language, that his statements had but little effect. When the hon. gentleman began to deal in figures, people began to make allowances for him; as an hon. member had just suggested, such speeches were figurative. The hon. member for Cumberland further stated that the Government had no authority to purchase steel rails. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) believed they had. The tenders would be laid before the House, and it would be competent for them to pass whatever opinion upon them they liked, He believed the Government acted in the best interest of the country. The hon. member for Cumberland said the rails were bought in a falling market. He could not have looked at the prices prevailing when that statement was made. A week after the transaction was closed, a gentleman telegraphed to him (Mr. MACKENZIE) from Montreal that $100,000 could be made by the bargain, and he had since been put in possession of a statement of prices from which it appeared that the market was struck at the best possible time. That an excellent bargain was made there could be no doubt. He directed attention, for proof of this, to the purchases made by the Governement of which the hon. gentleman was a member before they went out of office, at the rate of from £15 to £17 sterling per ton. The Government believed the price to be the lowest possible. Mr. DARLING and Mr. WORKMAN of Montreal, and other gentlemen who were authorities on the subject strongly advised the course taken, and the chief engineer was equally decided that to purchase rails at the time would greatly facilitate the construction of the work. It must be remembered that the works in the Lake Superior region and in the Red River and British Columbia districts were located where access was exceedingly difficult, and unless everything were got ready as soon as possible, we could not expect to make much progress for two or three years. He was himself of opinion, and the Government were of opinion, and the engineer was of opinion, that by having a supply of rails at the Koninistiguia River and other convenient points, the work could be advanced by a whole year. If the hon. gentleman thought the Government had done wrong in this he (Mr. MACKENZIE) had simply to say that the Government were amenable to Parliament. The hon. gentleman knew the course open to him, and the Government were prepared to stand by the result.

Mr. RYAN said this was a subject of the very first importance to Parliament. Every Canadian was deeply interested in the success of the enterprise, for it was the first great national work our Dominion had undertaken, the successful accomplishment of which would not merely be a national advantage, but a great national honor. But deeply interested as we all were in the success of the project, there was no portion of the Dominion had a deeper interest in it than the Province of Manitoba. In the other Provinces men looked upon the scheme as a manifestation of the business energy and patriotism of the Dominion; but to the people of Manitoba it was a necessary part of their existence as a portion of this Confederation. The eastern Provinces had the Atlantic Ocean ; the Pacific ocean washed the shore of British Columbia ; the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec had the magnificent St. Lawrence in summer, and the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railways in the winter ; Manitoba alone was isolated. North of them they had the snow and ice bound Hudson's Bay, east of them the almost trackless territory of Lake Superior and Red River, west of them the great Lone Land : and on the south they were met by the protective policy of the United States, which was almost as impervious to trade as the deserts with which upon other sides they were surrounded. There were few in Manitoba to-day who could have been induced to go there unless the Dominion Government had promised to build the Pacific Railway, and in nineteen cases out of twenty they had invested their means and settled down, not where in the meantime it would have been absolutely most profitable, but where they were led to believe the line of the Canada Pacific Railway would pass. This they had been led to do by maps professing to give an outline of the route, published by the Dominion Government, and furnished by the Dominion Lands Office at Winnipeg. The information thus afforded, it might be stated, constituted no obligation upon the Government, but it exercised a considerable influence upon settlers in the investment of their money. It was, therefore, with universal regret that the people of Manitoba learned the unalterable intention of the Government was to cross Lake Manitoba at the Narrows instead of passing to the south of the Lake, as was originally intended. It was urged upon them that the line south of the lake would traverse the best country for settlement—a country, indeed, partially settled already —the country having the best climate, the country having the most productive land ; but all these arguments, and other arguments equally strong, were met by the statement that the proposed route was thirty miles the shorter. Since the policy of the Government in that respect had been endorsed by gentlemen upon the Opposition side of the House, since the hon. member for Cumberland had declared that a saving of distance was a first consideration in regard to the Pacific Railway, he supposed the people of Manitoba had nothing left them but to bow to the policy of the nation—a policy which inflicted a great loss upon their little Province, but appeared to be a great gain to the whole Dominion. He did not rise for the purpose of discussing which was the best route ; he simply rose to call the attention of the Government and the House to the fact that by crossing Lake Manitoba at the Narrows, even with the Pembina Branch, the whole country south of the Lake would be left absolutely without railway communication. Without a railway it was impossible to open up a prairie country. Illinois, and other Western States of the American Union, which to-day were blossoming like gardens, were uncultivated and unreclaimed until they were traversed by the iron road. The railroad was the natural road of the prairies, and the experience of the West had proven that the locomotive was in nearly all cases the pioneer of settlement, If the road must cross the Lake at the rapids, and if it did not traverse the country to the south, he thought, since the work was proposed to be accomplished by private enterprise, that the Government should at least extend some assistance. To those who might raise the objection that this was a Provincial work, and should be assisted, if assisted at all, by the Government of the Province, he had to reply that the forests and uncultivated land, which were the sources from which railways ought to be built, were the property of the Dominion Government ; and the Dominion Government was therefore the proper authority to do all that was necessary towards opening up the lands of the Province, and to assist in projects of this nature. There seemed to be in the House considerable difference of opinion as to which portions of the railway should be constructed first, and which were most required for the opening up of the country. So far as the portion of the road west of the Rocky Mountains was concerned, he had nothing to say regarding it. Its construction was regulated by an agreement made between the Dominion and the Province of British Columbia. But if Canada was ever to become a great nation, if we were to be really and truly independent, if we were to stand ready and able to defend her liberty, if it were attacked on the Southern side, by the strong arms and stout hearts of her sons, rather than by the good graces of Uncle Sam; then it was out upon the plains of the North-West that our destiny had to be solved. To open up that vast country, to pour into it a thrifty population drawn from the over-crowded cities and towns of Europe, ought to be the aim of all Canadian statesmen and the purpose of those in whose hands was the building of the Pacific Railway. This was not to be done by frittering away the resources of the country in building portions of the road which it would be unnecessary to build for ten years, and which would be constructed by private enterprise when required. Nature had furnished us with an admirable chain of water communication, unrivalled in the geography of the world, which, during the open season, at least, would always be able to compete successfully for the traffic of the country. In opening up the North-West, we should utilize this chain of lakes as much as possible.

It being six o'clock, the House took recess, Mr. RYAN still having the floor.

AFTER RECESS.

The following private Bills were read a third time and passed :—

Mr. BOWELL—To incorporate the Intelligencer Printing and Publishing Company.

Mr. CURRIER—To incorporate the Lower Ottawa Boom Company.

The following Bills were read a second time :—

Mr. JETTE—To incorporate the Canada Land Investment Guarantee Company.

Mr. JETTE—Act further to amend the Act 14 and 15 Victoria, Chap. 36, incorporating The Canada Guarantee Company.

Mr. BLAIN — To incorporate the Dominion Railways Equipment Company.

Mr. BABY — To amend the Act 37 and 38 Victoria, Chap. 115, relating to the Intercolonial Express Company.

Mr. BUELL — Act respecting the Canada Central Railway Company.

Mr. PLUMB — To provide for the amalgamation of the Niagara District Bank with the Imperial Bank of Canada (from the Senate).

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. RYAN resumed his speech. He said he was speaking, when the House rose for recess, of the manner in which the Canada Pacific Railroad was being constructed. The Government had agreed to subsidise the Canada Central Railroad and the Georgian Bay Branch, to the extent of about four and a half or five millions of dollars, at a very moderate calculation. It seemed to him, under the present circumstances, that this expenditure was wholly inadvisable. The Georgian Bay Branch and the extension of the Canada Central, even though they be considered by the House as portions of the railroad, would not be required for the next eight or ten years, and the policy of the Government in this respect, was not sound. Already there were rumours of deputations from the West, and, he very much feared, before the end of the matter was reached, the Government would have to subsidise more Ontario railroads, whereas if they had left the road as it was, this portion would have been built by private enterprise when the time arrived for constructing it. Manitoba had been for the last three years crying out for railroad communication with the east. To that Province it was a matter of life or death, and when these facts were considered, the Government would find it extremely difficult to justify so large an expenditure as the item under consideration. They also proposed to build a branch of 45 miles from Fort William to Shebandowan and to expend $390,000 in improving the chain of lakes which constitute the Dawson Route. He thought this large expenditure was very ill-advised. Supposing this route was completed what would it amount to? It was half land and half water, an amphibious route which would be wholly inadequate to meet the requirements of the North-West. The first freight for exportation from the North-West would be grain, and he was inclined to believe that there would be plenty of it long before the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches seemed to expect it. Supposing the road were completed to-morrow, and Manitoba had a million bushels of grain to export, would it pay to send it to Lake Superior by such a route on which it would be necessary to break bulk and transhipment several time? Nothing but an all rail route would suit that Province, and it must be built at the earliest possible day. During the discussion in committee the other day, there was something said as to the advisability of building the Pembina Branch. Now, his opinion was that the building of this branch under the present circumstances was a necessity, not caused by the requirements of the country, but by the shilly shallying, dilatory policy which the Government had shown in dealing with the building of the Pacific Railroad. Had the Government—he did not refer to this Government particularly, but to both Governments—lent all their energies to the building of a road from the shore of Lake Ellen to Red River, this Pembina Branch would not be required. It was not good policy for this country to send freight over American lines any longer than they could help. As a colonization road it would be of very little use, running as it did for 82 miles almost parallel with the Red River. If there was a river in the North that was really navigable, it was precisely that portion of the Red River with which the Pembina branch would eventually come in competition. Although it was late in the day now, he was satisfied if the Government would give as an alternative to the people of the North-West this Pembina branch and the half-rail and half-water between Fort William and Fort Garry, on the one hand, and an all rail route from Fort Garry to Lake Ellen on the other, the unanimous opinion of the people of the North-West would be in favor of the latter. He had heard a great deal of the magnificent stretches of water communication in the North-West. He had been very nearly three years in that country, and during that time it was his good fortune to converse weekly—almost daily—with traders and others who traversed the great West and it was their impression that these magnificent stretches of water communication existed for the most part in the imagination of Canadian orators. We had in reality only one magnificent stretch of water communication available, the St. Lawrence, and for the purposes of this work it would terminate at Thunder Bay on Lake Ellen. The rivers of the North-West were like the rivers of all other prairie countries. They were shallow, meandering and full of sand bars which were continually shifting. The Government would spend less in building a railroad along their banks than would be required to keep them navigable, and, after all, they would come to the conclusion that the only means of settling and developing the country was the railroad. Of all the railroads which were now being built, or in contemplation, the only one which would form a part of the Pacific railroad was the section from Rat Portage to Red River. If the money asked for the construction of the two sections between Lake Superior and Red River, and for the Pembina branch had been expended in building the main line of the Pacific Railroad, it would leave only 184 miles to be constructed between Fort Garry and Lake Ellen, and the subsidy to the Georgian Bay branch and the Canada Central Railroad would go a great way towards the construction of that 184 miles. It had been urged by the hon. member for South Bruce that as the Government had appealed to the country on their policy, and been sustained by an overwhelming majority, it would not be fair to change it now. His (Mr. RYAN'S) impression was that the verdict of the people at the last general election, was not on the Pacific railroad but on the Pacific scandal. If the Government were to go to the country to-morrow, and place their present policy of building the Pacific Railroad, before the electors, he (Mr. RYAN) was satisfied the people's verdict would be entirely different from that which they rendered on that occasion.

Mr. IRVING said he thought the manner in which the hon. gentleman from Marquette had disparaged the expenditure which the Government was making for the benefit of Manitoba would hardly be approved of by the people of that Province. If he understood the hon. gentleman correctly he was prepared to give up the Pembina branch and confine his Province to the one road from Red River to Lake Superior, which by reason of its geographical position must be inaccessible for six or seven months in the year. That was not the sentiment of the people of Manitoba. They desired if possible an all rail route through our own territory, but awaiting that they were anxious for the Pembina branch at once. He was satisfied on that point from the inquiries he had made during a short stay in that Province. Every patriot desired that as soon as possible we should have the means of reaching the North-West through our own territory, because it was well known that every immigrant that went through the States on the way to Manitoba had his ears filled with stories adverse to our country. He therefore held that under the circumstances of the case the Government were right in utilizing the Dawson Road till Manitoba had became sufficiently developed to furnish a traffic that would justify the building of a railway from Thunder Bay to Red River. The hon. member for Marquette had stated that wheat could not be exported from Manitoba by the means the Government proposed to provide at a remunerative price. There were two answers to that statement. In the first place it would be eight or ten years or more before Manitoba would grow wheat enough to serve the population going in there. At the present time the Red River was crowded with craft bringing wheat from the United States into Manitoba. When that country produced a surplus of wheat over home consumption it would be time enough to speak of an all rail route to Lake Superior. In the second place Manitoba was not so far from Lake Superior, when this all rail route was completed, as many of the present grain-growing States were from Chicago. His hon. friend went out of his way to cast a reflection on the Dawson Road. He believed the hon. gentleman had never been over that road, but all those who had been over it and were acquainted with it, would admit that after the expenditure the Government proposed to make on it, it would be a good summer road—one that would suffice for several years, and which would save the expense of building an all rail road. When his hon. friend spoke of shifting sands and sand bars he took it that he spoke of the Saskatchewan and other rivers far west, of which he (Mr. IRVING) believed his hon. friend knew nothing. With reference to the water communication on the Dawson route, the water was unusually deep, and the locks and portages were trifling. Under these circumstances he approved of the proposal of the Government to utilize in the meantime that water communication.

Mr. RYAN desired to say a few words in reply. If he misrepresented the sentiments of his Province, as the hon. member for Hamilton had charged him of doing, he was amenable to his constituents; and he would like to know to whom the member for Hamilton was responsible if he chose in the interest of the Government or any other interest to make such statements as those he had just made. He differed from the view of the hon. gentleman that Manitoba would have no wheat to export for eight or ten years. On the contrary he believed if Providence blessed them with good harvests, in two years they would have large quantities of wheat to export. Respecting the remarks of the hon. gentleman with reference to the Dawson road, he (Mr. RYAN) reminded the hon. gentleman that he had not spoken of the Dawson road. He spoke of the proposed Government road, and if he had not been over it he did not think his hon. friend had either, and if the work was not pushed any faster than it had been he was afraid he never would go over it. With regard to the shifting sands in the rivers of Manitoba, he had stated his sources of information. He had spoken to trappers, who had been over the country for years; and he was satisfied his information was correct.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he would endeavor to draw the attention of the House, and through the House the country, to some points that the country ought to understand. With relation to the Pacific Railway as regards the Province of British Columbia he was free to accept the situation. He was unwilling to use any influence which he might possess to raise any factious opposition to the decision rendered by the arbitrator, Lord CARNARVON. In saying this, however, he merely confined himself to British Columbia. When the contract for the Georgian Bay branch and the subsidy to the Canada Central came up for discussion he might have something more to say. He congratulated the First Minister on his lucid exposition of the affairs of the Pacific Railway, and said that when he spoke of the line taking the route by way of Bute Inlet he but echoed the judgment of the people of British Columbia, and all who wished to see a national highway across this continent. Having said that he would refer to some other matters—matters which had engaged the attention of the British public, and which had been distorted by the party press of this country. He regarded the course of the Government in dealing with British Columbia with respect to the Pacific Railway as a great political blunder; and he would prove it. The people of British Columbia exacted from this Government nothing but what the Dominion could fairly discharge without imposing additional burdens upon the people. They were as loyal and patriotic a portion of the people of the Dominion as could be found anywhere, and all that they asked was that the railway should be commenced, and commenced at once. If the financial ability of this Dominion was not sufficient to build the road in seven years, they would be perfectly willing to allow fifty or seventy years. Now, what do we find? We find that the party now in power had over and over again denounced the construction of the railway, and these men who were bold enough as statesmen, working in the interest of the consolidation of this country, to undertake it. But when they came into power they said to themselves "We have said that the Pacific Railway is wrong, but now we have to prove it is wrong." According to the member for South Bruce it was a mad bargain, and according to the First Minister, as stated in one of his despatches, it was an act of insanity; but such would not be the verdict of posterity. When that party came into power they sent an agent to British Columbia when they ought to have sent surveyors to locate the line and navvies to build it. It was stated that the Government of British Columbia refused to treat with Mr. EDGAR because he had no credentials. He (Mr. DECOSMOS) was not here as an exponent of the British Columbia Government, but he knew they treated the Dominion agent with all due respect so far as his written authority entitled him to. That agent, over and over again, went to a certain gentleman in British Columbia to get his credentials from the First Minister in order that he might negotiate for a relaxation of the terms of union. To that statement he defied contradiction, and if necessary he could give the gentleman's name. The Local Government then asked the Dominion Government if they would endorse the action of Mr. EDGAR, and the answer they got was that the proposal was withdrawn. If there had not been so much hot temper shown in this matter—so much desire to override a small Province—so much of the feeling exhibited by the member for South Bruce in his famous Aurora speech—if there had been less of that feeling of insolence which dictated the withdrawal af the proposal of Mr. EDGAR,—and if there had been more of that feeling of magnanimity which recognized the fact that British Columbia was a young country and expected assistance in her youth which she would return ten thousand fold—there would have been much less trouble over this whole matter. In an Order in Council of the Government of this Dominion it is said that the smaller Provinces should pay great respect to the opinion of the larger Provinces. In other words the larger Provinces were to govern the country. If the First Minister after having committed the first blunder in the case of British Columbia had said that Mr. EDGAR was his authorized agent, he believed that instead of an appeal to England, the difficulty with that Province would have been easily settled. He would say more—and he was assured of this fact by the members of the British Columbia Government—that they were not afraid to go to the country, but were willing to appeal to the people on any proposition they might have agreed to with the Dominion about the railway. What the Government, however, required to know was whether the agent of the Federal Government who was sent to that Province was authorized to make terms, and binding terms. He would now refer to some of the utterances of the hon. member for South Bruce. While he admired that hon. gentleman's eloquence on some occasions, he had to differ with him as a collater of facts; his logic was often wrong, simply because it was based on false premises. The hon. gentleman then quoted from a speech made by the hon. member for South Bruce in the course of which he said it would have been in the interest of this Dominion if the arrangement which had been made that Esquimault should be the terminus of the Pacific Railway, had been cancelled by the new arrangement entered into. What was the history of this whole question? When the delegates from British Columbia in 1870 returned home they carried with them simply the condition that the railway would be built from the eastern seaboard to the Pacific. No sooner had they returned than public opinion expressed itself in condemnation of the mission from the terms of Union of any provision that the chief port of British Columbia should be the terminus of the railway. Subsequently the predecessor of the hon. First Minister, the Hon. Mr. LANGEVIN, visited British Columbia. That gentleman took a steamer and visited portions of the coast as well as the interior. The result was that one or two places were determined upon as suitable for the terminus, Alverni or Esquimault, or both. In 1871 the British Columbia members were chosen for the Dominion Parliament. Shortly after they arrived in Ottawa, Sir GEORGE CARTIER introduced his Canadian Pacific Railway Bill. After the Opposition members, some of whom were now members of the Government, had aired their eloquence regarding the eastern terminus of the railway, he (Mr. DECOSMOS) rose in his place and stated that they desired the terminus on the Pacific coast to be determined upon. Mr. LANGEVIN on that occasion stated on behalf of the Government that they had decided to make Esquimault the terminus of the railway. That might not have been stated in any Act, but common sense was often found outside of an Act of Parliament. Lord LISGAR, in a despatch, had stated that the route of the Pacific Railway could only be settled after Confederation, and after explorations and surveys ordered by the Dominion Parliament in which British Columbia would be represented, and he directed the attention of the House to this fact that it was stated on the floor of the House that Esquimault should be the terminus of the railway. He read a copy of a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council, dated the 7th June, 1873, which stated that a Committee of the Council having had before them the memorandum of the 29th May last of the Chief Engineer of the Canada Pacific Railway, and the Minute of Council dated the 30th of May—they recommend to HIS EXCELLENCY that Esquimault on Vancouver Island should be fixed as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway —and that a line of railway should be built between the harbor of Esquimault and the Seymour Narrows on the same Island. The despatch of Lord LISGAR stated that the road would be settled upon after deliberation and survey. Who could be a better judge than the chief engineer of that railway who was the paid officer of the Government and who the First Minister had just stated to the House was the only person he had consulted. He denied the statement of the hon. member for South Bruce that it would have been well if the arrangement that Esquimault should be the terminus had been cancelled, and he was able to do so after spending 20 years on the Island. There was only one port he was sorry to say south of British Columbia until one got to Santiago, on the Mexican border, with the exception of San Francisco. When you pass the north-west point of Washington territory on the Pacific coast you have only one good available harbor within Canada, and that was Esquimault, which was the only port trans-Pacific steamships might approach at all seasons of the year, and at any hour of the day. If any other point had been decided upon it would have been unfair to that port. The hon. member for South Bruce had quoted from the report of the committee of the Privy Council dated 8th July, 1874, the following statement:—

"The propositions made by Mr. EDGAR involved an immediate heavy expenditure in British Columbia not contemplated by the terms of Union, namely the construction of a railway on Vancouver's Island, from the Port of Esquimault to Nanaimo, as compensation to the most populous part of the Province for the requirement of a longer time for completing the line on the mainland. The proposals also embraced an obligation to construct a road or trail and telegraph line across the continent at once, and an expenditure of not less than a million and a half within the Province annually on the railway works on the mainland, irrespective of the amounts which might be spent east of the Rocky Mountains, being a half more than the entire sum British Columbia demanded in the first instance as the annual expenditure on the whole road."

Now, perhaps, the hon. gentleman, who was in the cold shades of Opposition when the treaty was made with British Columbia, knew more about the country than any one who voted for the treaty, he (Mr. BLAKE) voting against it. But he (Mr. DECOSMOS) knew this, that when the British Columbia delegates returned from Ottawa they mentioned Alverni and Esquimault as among the probable ports for the Pacific terminus. He defied the hon. member for South Bruce to find either in the proposition of Mr. EDGAR or in that of Lord CARNARVON, any statement to show that the railway on Vancouver Island was to be built as compensation for the delay in the construction of the Pacific Railway, and if it could be shown there was he would be glad to admit his error. He would quote what Lord CARNARVON said about compensation. It will be found in his despatch of the 16th August. The words are as follows :—

"The offer made by the Dominion Government to spend a minimum amount of $1,500,000 annually on the railway within British Columbia, as soon as the surveys and waggon road are completed, appears to me to be hardly as definite as the large interests involved on both sides seem to require. I think that some short and fixed time should be assigned within which the surveys should be completed; failing which some compensation should become due to British Columbia for the delay."

If the hon. member for South Bruce would turn to the despatch of Lord CARNARVON, he would see that there was no word of compensation with respect to Esquimault and Nanaimo. What Lord CARNARVON did say was :—

"I think that some short and fixed time should be assigned within which the surveys should be completed ; failing which some compensation should become due to British Columbia for the delay. Looking, further, to all the delays which have taken place, and which may yet perhaps occur ; looking also to the public expectations that have been held out of the completion of the railway, if not within the original period of ten years, fixed by the terms of Union, at all events within fourteen years from 1871, I cannot but think that the annual minimum expenditure of $1,500,000 offered by the Dominion Government for the construction of the railway in the Province, is hardly adequate. In order to make the proposal not only fair but as I know is the wish of your Ministers, liberal, I would suggest for their consideration whether the amount should not be fixed at a higher rate, say, for instance, at $2,000,000 a year."

If the compensation came in at all, it came in here. Hence the remarks of the hon. member with regard to compensation were altogether out of place. The question of the railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo was settled in this House, it was settled by the decision of the Government, it was settled by Order in Council, it was settled by the engineer in charge in British Columbia driving his stakes and marking his lines. The hon. gentleman tried to show that in building this portion of the railway, the Government were giving something away to British Columbia ; but he contended that it would be a portion of the Grand Trunk Line across the Continent and not a branch at all. Then he came to the Government. The hon. member for South Bruce was found quoting from the confidential instructions of the First Minister to Mr. EDGAR. And what did they find in these instructions ? They found, in the first place, that one Government had agreed with the people of British Columbia to do one thing, and the next Government taking a course which in his judgment, and in the judgment of this Dominion, was most indefensible. And the hon. gentleman quoted the most indefensible clause of these confidential instructions which was as follows :—

"You will take special care not to admit in any way that we are bound to build the railway to Esquimault or any other place on the Island ; and while you do not at all threaten not to build there, to let them understand that this is wholly and purely a concession, and that its construction must be contingent on a reasonable course being pursued regarding other parts of the scheme."

Just imagine the First Minister of the Crown—the chief of the Executive of Canada, who was supposed to be the guardian of the rights of all the Provinces, putting into a confidential document an instruction not to threaten. He regarded this whole utterance as one worthy of a man who would willingly break an agreement solemnly entered into by the Dominion of Canada with the people of British Columbia. He called attention to the whole history of the transactions up to that point, and they all went to show that the Government of Canada had agreed that Esquimault should be the terminus of the Pacific Railway ; yet the Premier would have them believe that it was wholly and purely a concession ; and that its construction should be contingent on a reasonable course being pursued regarding other parts of the scheme. If that was not bargain and sale, he did not know what it was. Mr. EDGAR in his report did the people of British Columbia justice in one thing, for he said of them that their keen intelligence and zeal in public affairs suggested the parallel in the history of some of the minor states of ancient Greece or Italy. He (Mr. DE COSMOS) candidly confessed that he believed Mr. EDGAR had indulged in a considerable flight of fancy, but it was perfectly true that the people of British Columbia knew their own business. The Order in Council said that the public feeling of the whole Dominion had been very strongly expressed against the fatal extravagance of the terms agreed to by the late Dominion Government. He would call the attention of the House to the extravagance. There were two well known parties who desired to build the Pacific Railway—one represented by Senator MACPHERSON, and the other by Sir HUGH ALLAN, one of which succeeded in getting hold of the charter. He (Mr. DECOSMOS) took a copy of that charter to San Francisco, and showed it to several capitalists and railway men there, and they assured him that for $30,000,000 and 30,000,000 acres of land without any guarantee, they would be able to build the railway and pocket $50,000,000 to boot. In reply to Mr. EDGAR'S statement that the majority of the people of British Columbia were in favor of the proposal of the Government, he had simply to say that when he returned to British Columbia about the end of September, he found the universal feeling of the people to be that they could have no confidence in any terms offered unless made with the sanction of the Imperial Government. The late Government broke the terms they agreed to, and the present Government wished to relax or repudiate them and to tyranize generally over the people. The hon. member for South Bruce was reported to have spoken at Aurora, had quoted from an Order in Council a certain portion of which he represented to be "If it he found absolutely necessary to secure a settlement." If the hon. gentleman made the quotation correctly. and was correctly reported, it would be noticed that it differed slightly from the despatch sent to the Imperial Government, for in that despatch, the word "present" was inserted before "settlement." The presumption therefore was that when the Order in Council came to be transmitted to the Imperial authorities, the Government found they had made a blunder and did the best they could to correct it. The hon. gentleman had also said that the construction of the road from Esquimalt to Nanaimo was compensation for the delay in commencing the road. There was no foundation for saying anything of the kind. The hon. Finance Minister in his Budget Speech referring to the loan negotiated by him, said "morover, it would "have placed us at a certain disadvantage "with the Imperial Government and "British Columbia if we had asked for an "Imperial guarantee whilst there was any "dispute between ourselves and that Pro-"vince as to the construction of the Pacific "Railway. For all these reasons I ad-"vised my colleagues, and they accepted "the suggestion, that we should negotiate "the loan on our own individual credit." The British Government knew that Canada had violated the compact with British Columbia, and the Finance Minister dare not ask for a loan on the Imperial guarantee while this Government failed to keep their agreement with the Province. The Finance Minister had admitted that the loan money was borrowed at sixteen shillings more on the hundred pounds than the loan negotiated by Mr. TILLEY, involving an annual loss of $160,000 for thirty years, or $4,800,000. This was the amount that the Dominion had lost by the simple blunder of daring to break terms that ought to have been observed. The Vancouver Island section, 160 miles long, could have been built for $30,000 per mile, so that the country had lost the amount necessary for completing a line from Esquimalt to Seymour Narrows through trying to relax the terms with British Columbia. The hon. member for South Bruce had endeavored to create a feeling of dissatisfaction throughout the country. Why did not the hon. gentleman express his opinions by resolution in this House instead of creating irritation among the people? The hon. gentleman had mentioned as something extraordinary that an additional engine would be required at one place on the line to haul trains up an ascent. The hon. gentleman evidently knew little or nothing of railroading or he would be aware that on some of the Western lines in the United States, two or three engines were required on some grades. Either the hon. gentleman knew nothing of railroading or he wished to delude the people into a belief that the road should not be built. It was stated in one Minute of Council that the proposal to build the Pacific Railway within ten years was adopted by this Parliament by a majority of only ten, whereas on reference to the journals of the House he found the majority was fifteen. In the same Minute of Council it was stated that the terms agreed to were "directory rather than mandatory," but the fact was they were mandatory. In order that the House might understand the subterfuges resorted to by the Government he would call attention to the manner in which the negotiations had been carried on. In the Minute of Council of the 8th of July there appeared this passage :—

"The British Columbia Government had also "complained that the commencement of the "works of constructions had not been made "within the time provided. Sir JOHN A. MAC-"DONALD, however, giving an informal opinion "that the terms as to commencement were "sufficiently and substantially kept by the "active prosecution of the surveys."

In a subsequent despatch, however, they completely contradict this statement, as follows :—

"When the present Government assumed "office, they found that the British Columbia "Government had protested against the non-com-"mencement of works of construction on the "railway on or before the 20th day of July, "1873, as agreed to in the eleventh section of "the Order in Council relating to the Union. "They also found that the means taken by the "late Dominion Government for proceeding with "the works of construction had totally failed, "althought the works preliminary to an actual "commencement had been prosecuted with all "possible despatch."

In the former despatch the Government of British Columbia were denounced although at that time they had a large majority in the Legislature, and were popular among the people. With reference to another statement in one of the despatches he had the authority of Governor TRUTCH for saying that he never gave his assent to nothing more or less than the terms agreed upon between the Province and the Dominion. He would next call attention to a subject which would in all probability excite some little notice. In the Minute of Council of the 23rd July appeared the following statement :—

"It must be remembered that British Columbia earnestly petitioned the Dominion Government to modify the terms of Union in its own favor in relation to the construction of the graving dock. The Dominion Government cordially assented to provide the money for the construction of the work, instead of abiding by the agreement to guarantee merely the Provincial bonds for ten years, as provided by the terms of Union. This at once shows the liberality of the Dominion Government, and their willingness to consider and meet exceptional circumstances wherever they existed. And this manifestation of liberality on the part of this Government, they conceive should have been reciprocated in other matters by the Provincial Government."

The extent of the liberality shown by the Dominion Government in this matter might be learnt from the fact that the graving dock would cost $500,000, and all the money that the Dominion Government proposed to give towards it was $250,000. But that was not all. While the late Government agreed to give $250,000 to aid in the construction of that dock, and the present Government agreed to carry out that arrangement. He was sorry for the sake of the credit and honor of this country to have to say that the present Prime Minister had repudiated that agreement. And, yet, he had the audacity to state in this despatch to the Imperial Government that the Dominion Government had agreed to provide the money for the construction of that work, and took credit for their liberality. One of the amusing portions of this despatch was as follows :—

"There is every reason to believe now that a majority of the people of Columbia would accept the propositions previously made. Judging from a petition sent from the mainland, signed by 644 names (a copy of which petition is enclosed), there is almost an entire unanimity there in favor of these proposals, and assurances were given very lately by gentlemen of the highest position on the Island that the course of the Local Government would not meet general approval there."

That statement he knew personally to be untrue and it was merely made for the purpose of attaing an object. The despatch continued :—

"An application was made by one prominent gentlemen, an ex-member of Parliament, to the Government here, to know if the proposals made would still be adhered to, he pledging himself to secure their acceptance by the bulk of the people."

He was amused when he read that statement. The gentleman alluded to come to British Columbia, and thought he could carry everything before him, but he soon found that he dared not make any public attempt to do what he had promised the First Minister to do. There was another matter out of which a great deal of capital had been made by the Government and their organs. He had been told that originally British Columbia only asked for a waggon road. Now, what did that mean? British Columbia spent $1,000,000 to construct 500 miles of road through the interior of the Province. That would be equivalent to about $20,000 a mile. Supposing the cost was only half that amount, a waggon road across the continent would cost about one-third of the total cost of the construction of railroad. When therefore the British Columbia delegates came to Ottawa and explained the cost of constructing a waggon road across the continent, it was quite natural that the able and practical men forming the late Government should say that if this road was going to cost so much, it would be far better to undertake the construction of a railway at once; and the result was that they agreed to construct the railway. When the difference between the cost of a waggon road and that of a railway was considered, it would be admitted that the Government acted wisely in agreeing to build a railway at once. The difference between the cost of a waggon road and that of a railway across the continent—for he believed a railway could be constructed from Edmonton to Red River, including rolling stock, for from $15,000 to $16,000 a mile—was not very large. There was another point to which he would call the attention of the House. Probably the hon. First Minister would explain how it was that only one of the petitions from British Columbia appeared in the blue book. The petition in favor of the Government scheme was published along with the despatches, but those that were opposed to it were left out. Having made these explanations, he would not detain the House at any length. He had only to say that he regretted the action of the Government towards British Columbia, in seeking a relaxation of the terms of the union, as a huge political blunder. All that this Government need have done was simply to have gone to work and tried its best to carry out the compact; and the people of British Columbia would have been perfectly satisfied. But the Government had irritated the people of British Columbia by the proposal to change a solemn compact, and had alienated their affections to a very great extent. The people of British Columbia were supporters of good principles and measures rather than of men, and if they believed a measure to be wrong they would vote against it. So far as the new terms of union were concerned, he had nothing further to say; but with regard to the graving dock, he called upon the Government to carry out their obligations or submit to the consequences. He had no doubt that the Government with their large majority would not be afraid of the consequences, but he would tell them that the people of this country made and unmade Governments, and that they would not be likely to sustain a Government very long whose First Minister repudiated a deliberate contract which he had entered into with the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said the House had heard the question discussed from a Manitaba stand point, and from a point of view taken by the members from the Pacific coast; but he would consider it from a different stand point. He would not refer to the terms demanded by British Columbia when it entered Confederation, nor to the very immoderate demands made at that time compared with the very liberal concessions made to her before the Treaty was completed; nor would he call the attention of the House to the very extraordinary obligations which were assumed a short time ago in reference to the construction of the Pacific Railway, obligations which the late Government found itself unable to begin and carry on, and which the present Government, sustained by Lord CARNARVON, had admitted they were unable to carry out. But he wished to view this question from another stand point altogether. He was willing to admit that the people of Ontario together with the other Provinces of the Dominion were interested in the Pacific Railway as a national enterprise. He agreed with those who had already said that it was necessary, if we wished to unite all the Provinces of the Dominion and bring them within easy access of each other, that a railway be built connecting the older and Eastern Provinces with those lying in the Far West. All that he admitted; and yet this House should also consider whether or not the Dominion, in its infancy was able to carry out the obligations at that time undertaken. He agreed that this was not a commercial undertaking by any means, and yet it had a commercial aspect. When we look at the Province of British Columbia and consider the small share it contributes to the revenues of this Dominion, he thought that we should find the representatives of that Province, to say the least of it, a little more moderate, if not a little more modest in the demands they were making on the Exchequer of this Dominion. But let hon. members look at this matter—he did not wish to be sectional, but to put in a fair light before the House. If we look at the revenues of the Province of British Columbia what do we find? That Province, lying on the Western side of this Dominion and occupying a very important position so far as this Dominion was concerned—notwithstanding the degree to which it was magnified in this House—contributed to the national revenue the sum of $360,000, or one seventieth of the whole revenue of the Dominion. We found further that when we took from the revenue of that Province the subsidies which we granted from the Exchequer of the Dominion, we only obtain $100,000 — over and above what British Columbia receives, and this amount would not pay the interest on the construction of 50 miles of the Pacific Railway which the people of the Pacific Provinces were so persistent in desiring the immediate completion of. Were he a citizen of British Columbia, he thought he would not be so immoderate and so persistent in asking the House to undertake such heavy obligations and to push forward the construction of the Pacific Railway to such an early completion. There was still another aspect of this question, and it was this: that a large portion of the Pacific Railway —and that the most expensive portion— would, when constructed, be to British Columbia, to all intents and purposes, a local road. We were to build a line from Esquimault northward to the Narrows, extending over a great part of the Island of Vancouver, a distance of 160 miles. It would not be necessary for the carrying out of the literal rendering of the Pacific Railway Act that the railway should be extended to Esquimault. That was not denied by the member for Victoria, The design of the Act was to connect the railway systems of Ontario and Quebec with the tide waters of the Pacific Ocean, which would be done by reaching Bute Inlet without extending the Railway to Esquimault. So the additional 160 miles was for all purposes a local road. The House had already heard from the member for Victoria of the liberality of the British Columbia Government in constructing 500 miles of waggon road at an expense of $1,000,000.

Mr. DECOSMOS denied having spoken of the liberality of the Government in constructing five hundred miles of road at a cost of one million dollars. What he stated was that before the Union we had constructed five hundred miles of road at a cost of one million dollars, or $20,000 a mile. He said nothing about the liberality of the British Columbian Government. The people accepted the necessity of their position and cut roads through the country which would be an imperishable monument of the energy of the people who were now traduced by some hon. members on both sides of the House.

Mr. ROSS said he would, therefore, call the work of constructing the waggon roads at a cost of $1,000,000 as an "imperishable monument of the enterprise of the people." During the last five or six years Ontario had constructed, or had in course of construction, railroads that would involve an expenditure to the municipalities and taxes to the people to the extent of $18,000,000. What he desired to show was this: British Columbia had no reason to complain when the Dominion unnecessarily constructed 160 miles of railway which in effect was a local road, whereas the people of Ontario had to construct their local roads with their own local funds and resources. There was another view of the question which the people of British Columbia did not look at, viz: that the construction of the Pacific Railway would always be a burden on the resources of this country. Mr. SANDFORD FLEMING, the chief engineer, had estimated that the running expenses of the road would amount to about $8,000,000 annually, and if its construction cost $100,000,000, the interest on that sum must be added to the running expenses in order to obtain the annual outlay. These facts proved that unless the circumstances of the country changed, the railway would be an unproductive work. He might appeal to the patriotism of the people of British Columbia and ask if it was fair on their part to exact the full pound of flesh when the road would be a burden on the country for many years to come.

Mr. DECOSMOS said British Columbia had not got one quarter or one half pound of flesh.

Mr. ROSS regretted that their balances were so much out of order. It was estimated that before the road would pay its running expenses, it would be necessary to throw a population of three millions people into the country. There was no reasonable hope that the population would be so largely increased for many years to come. The population of British Columbia had not increased very rapidly during the last few years, and taking into account the development of the vast prairies of the west, there was no reason to anticipate that the population of the Pacific Province would be very large within the next fifteen or twenty years. In looking over the increase in population in the States in the Union lying west of Illinois, he found that during the last twenty years their population had increased three-fold, from two millions to six millions. Granting a similar increase of population along the fertile valleys of the Saskatchewan and the district lying west of the Rocky Mountains we had no reasonable expectation that there would be a population at the western terminus of the Pacific Railway that would by any means afford the necessary traffic to make the road a paying enterprise. The trade of British Columbia, at the present time, did not afford the slightest hope that it would furnish sufficient traffic to defray the running expenses. He noted by the export tables of the Province that its whole export and import trade, last year, only amounted to $4,000,000, and we had here very slender hope that the produce of the far West would supply sufficient trade to make the road a profitable enterprise. If a comparison was made between the land through which the Union Pacific and the Canadian Pacific ran, the difference between the two enterprises would be apparent. The country through which the Union Pacific ran contained between three and four millions of people, the State of California alone having a population of half a million, or fifty times the white population of British Columbia. The real and personal property represented by the States bordering the Union Pacific amounted to $2,000,000,000. California alone produced about 16,000,000 bushels of grain annually and there was, therefore, a large amount of trade which at once supplied freight to the Union Pacific Road, thus putting it at once on a paying basis. The earnings last year were $17,000,000, a large proportion of which was from local freight. Sixty-five per cent. of the earnings of the Union Pacific was from that source. Where was the local freight to come from on our railroad? What was there in British Columbia that they wished to send to the Eastern Provinces? What were the productions of that country? If the whole of their imports and exports amounting to an aggregate of $4,000,000 were to pass over the road, there would be no encouragement to hope that this road would for a long time pay running expenses. This was what he wished to urge on the Provinces lying to the west—that they should not ask this Dominion to assume unreasonable burdens for building this railroad. It was not just to the interests of this Dominion that we should so heavily tax ourselves for one enterprise, and leave all others undeveloped. When the Western Provinces considered this fact, they would forbear to urge with such persistency their claims to the construction at an early day of the Pacific Railroad. As a Canadian he was as anxious as any one to see the resources of the country developed, but he did not wish to see burdens assumed that might depress the trade of this Dominion for many years to come.

Mr. BORRON quite approved of the course pursued by the Government in relation to this great undertaking. In expressing such approval, he was aware that he placed himself in opposition to the hon. member for Cumberland, who disapproved of everything the Government had done or proposed to do. That hon. gentleman had stated as his policy, that strong parties should be placed at four points on the line between Nipissing and Red River, to construct a line between those points. The Intercolonial was 488 miles long, and divided into 25 sections, yet it was not completed in less time than seven years. From Nipissing to Nipegon was a distance of 557 miles, and two strong parties working on it would construct it in about one hundred years. The line recommended by the engineers, would pass 150 or 160 miles in the interior, and would be difficult of access. For 360 miles it would pass over the height of land where it would be exposed to the violent storms from Hudson's Bay. We had seen something of the effects of snow storms in obstructing, in well-settled parts of the Dominion, and the difficulty of keeping such a line as the one proposed, would render it useless during the winter season. Some of the engineers had stated that the snow on the height of land was not so deep as on the lower levels in the vicinity of the lake. He had lived in the country for twenty years, and had opportunities for going inland himself and meeting the Indians who were in the habit of going back for furs. Within one or two miles of the lake shore the snow was very deep. The winds on the lake deposited the snow on the shore, and the consequence was that in the immediate vicinity of the lake the snow was very deep for two or three miles inland. So far as his information went, the snow if not deeper was certainly as deep on the height of land as on the lower levels a short distance back from the lake. The route over the height of land passed through a country that certainly would not be settled while there was an acre of land to be obtained in parts of the country with less inclement climate and more fertile soil. If this line was intended for any purpose it was to give uninterrupted communication with the North-West at all seasons of the year, but if it was liable to be snowed up and traffic suspended during the winter months, it would be practically useless. Owing to the intense cold on the height of land, the snow was very dry and the violent storms from Hudson's Bay carried it in clouds across the country filling all hollows with a dead level of snow. It would be useless to try to keep it open with snow-ploughs, and there was no population along the line to aid in removing the obstructions to traffic. A line had been surveyed for one hundred miles and explored the remainder of the way, running some thirty miles north of Sault Ste. Marie, which he thought would be found practicable and capable of extension westward. It was in a direct line from the mouth of French River to Fort Garry. The former point was in latitude 46½; thirty miles north of that would be the 47th parallel. Continuing westward from Sault Ste. Marie, keeping about 25 miles from the shore of the lake, would give a route passing through a country abounding in minerals, two-thirds of which was fit for settlement and which was accessable from the lake. This route had been recommended by Sir HUGH ALLAN in one of his speeches as the best and most practicable for the railroad. He highly approved of the course taken by the Minister of Public Works. That hon. gentleman had expressed no opinion as to the propriety of taking the line by way of Nipissing; that matter would have to depend upon the surveys to be made. Referring to the policy enunciated by the member for Cumberland of putting on two strong parties one at Nipegon and one at Red River, and having them work towards each other, he pointed out that by such a plan, judging by the progress made with the Intercolonial railway, it would take 75 years to complete the road from Nipegon to Red River, a distance of 416 miles. Moreover, under such a plan the road could be of very little service until it was completed. The hon. member for Cumberland had stated that he was prepared to prove that Nipegon harbor as an outlet for the traffic of the North-West was at least equal if not superior to Thunder Bay. In contradiction of that statement he would read two or three affidavits he had received from reliable parties who were thoroughly familiar with what they testified to. MICHAEL COLAN, of Thunder Bay, testified that he had lived at Fort William for 75 years, and he had never known Nipegon Bay open sooner than fifteen days after Thunder Bay was open, and he had often found it closed on the first day of June. It also froze up about a month earlier than Thunder Bay. He had started repeatedly from Thunder Bay after it was open and proceeded to Nipegon Bay, found it still closed with ice, returned to Thunder Bay and then returned to Nipegon and found it still frozen up. He (Mr. BORRON) read several affidavits to the same effect, and said his own knowledge and observation bore out this testimony. The reason that Thunder Bay was open sooner in the spring was that the entrance was wide and the swell of the lake broke up the ice, while Nipegon Bay was land-locked, and the ice remained in it till it was rotten and honey-combed. He proceeded to say that the route from Red River to Thunder Bay was thirty miles shorter than to Nipegon, and he therefore held that Thunder Bay was the proper outlet to Lake Superior of the traffic of the North-West. Even if the Government elected to make a railroad from Nipegon to Red River, it would be entirely inoperative. It would pass through a country that had no resources to develop either in minerals, in timber, or in soil fit for agricultural purposes; nothing in fact, so far as was known. The other route, although sterile in many parts, possesses greater advantages than that. The valley of the Koninistiguia was a good agricultural district, and the Saskatchewan gave promise of being very productive of minerals. Excellent specimens of gold, silver, lead and copper had been found in it, and the opening up of it by this railway would be advantageous to the development of these resources. It was contended that this line passed over the country at a lower elevation than any other possible road from Lake Superior to the Red River. It was also in a lower altitude; it would be less liable to be obstructed by snow, and the country through which it would pass would generally be better fitted for settlement. He had endeavored to show that the line running from Nipegon over the high lands would take an enormous time to construct; that it would pass through an exceedingly unhospitable country, and that it would be utterly useless and unproductive when it was built. If it passed through the district of Algoma, it passed through a country that had agricultural, mineral and lumber resources to develop—a district that would provide at no distant day happy homes for a population not less than that of Nova Scotia. The Minister of Public Works in his interesting speech hinted at the possibility of bringing forward a scheme of colonization in conjunction with that of building the road. He did not know of any district that afforded a finer chance of carrying out such an experiment than Algoma. It was even superior to Manitoba. They had no grasshoppers; they had abundance of fuel, and they were nearly a thousand miles nearer the market. They had also the finest fresh water navigation in the world to take their produce to the market. He concluded by thanking the House for the attention they had paid to his remarks.

Mr. ROSCOE said he rose for the purpose of correcting some statements made by the hon. member for Middlesex. The hon. gentleman had furnished the House with a grim picture of British Columbia cutting the flesh out of the Dominion, and he appealed to the people of that Province and their representatives not to go on making unreasonable demands of the Dominion. He (Mr. ROSCOE) denied that they made unreasonable demands: All that they demanded was that the Dominion should carry out the terms and build the railway in the best way they could. Indeed the hon. gentleman made use of such arguments as it was hardly necessary to condescend to answer. He talked about the present population and trade of the country as if they really would be any indication of the trade of the railway. The hon. gentleman appeared not to know that railways in this country were built not to accommodate trade but to make it. A gentleman writing to the papers of British Columbia had been endeavoring to prove that the Eastern trade over the Canada Pacific Railway would be sufficient to pay the cost of construction. Of course this estimate was exaggerated, just as exaggerated as the statement of the hon. member for Middlesex; and he presumed that, as was usual in such cases, the truth lay between the two statements. There was little doubt that the trade would not be sufficiently large at first to make the road pay, but that would soon be changed. The hon. gentleman spoke of the small revenue of British Columbia. There was some truth in his statement, for the reason that they had but a small population; but he (Mr. ROSCOE) thought it would be a wise course for the Dominion to increase the revenue by increasing the population. For himself he hoped and believed that there would soon be millions of people in that Province. He desired to make a few remarks on what had been said by the hon. member for South Bruce when the House was in Committee. He protested against the tone adopted by that hon. gentleman with regard to the Provine of British Columbia whenever he had occasion to speak of it either in the House, or outside. He did not know what the hon. gentleman's reason might be for so doing unless it were because the late Government had made terms of union with British Columbia which the hon. member considered extravagant. The hon. member depreciated the Province probably because he knew nothing about it. He (Mr. ROSCOE) submitted to him that British Columbia was a part of the Dominion, and that its unbounded resources were the resources of Canada. The hon. gentleman was himself a Canadian, and he (Mr. ROSCOE) hoped that when next the hon. gentleman mentioned British Columbia, he would attempt to do it justice. The hon. gentleman ventured to reprove the Government because they did not take legislative action with regard to the arrangement arrived at for carrying out the compromise. He (Mr. ROSCOE) believed that the Government acted wisely in that respect. The hon. gentleman contended that the people of British Columbia, having demanded the right to say what they would expect, this House should also have had its right to a say on the subject. It so happened, however, that with the people of British Columbia it was a question of accepting less than it was agreed to give them, while on the other hand it was a question with the Dominion of giving less than they had agreed to give. Again, the hon. gentleman made some remarks about Lord CARNARVON, stating that he had the utmost respect for that nobleman personally, and that he had great respect for his opinion; but the hon. member hardly carried out his promise, for he stated in another portion of his speech that he did not place much weight upon Lord CARNARVON'S decision, because the Imperial Government had incurred no expense in the matter, and on matter how the decision was given it did not affect their pockets. He (Mr. ROSCOE) hoped that when a Judge decided against a client of the hon. gentleman, he did not refuse to place confidence in the decision because the Judge had no pecuniary interest in the matter. The hon. gentleman further said that the Government accepted this compromise with regard to the terms, not because Lord CARNARVON said so, but because it was the best course to take. He (Mr. ROSCOE) was aware that the arrangement was practically the same as that offered by the Government before. He was always opposed to the appeal to the QUEEN, because he believed the Province could get as much without it, and still preserve the good feeling with the Dominion. He ventured, however, to point out to the hon. gentleman that Lord CARNARVON had full power in the matter, and if the Dominion Government had insisted on what might be considered a repudiation of terms, or refused to accept what he (Lord CARNARVON) thought a fair compromise, he might have used his power as Colonial Secretary to pass an Imperial Act dissolving the connection between British Columbia and the Dominion. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might say that it did not matter much whether this was done or not. On that subject he would not at present enter into a discussion.

Mr. SMITH (Selkirk) said his hon. friend from Marquette had very properly pointed out that it had been matter of great disappointment to the people of Manitoba that the railway, instead of passing through the centre of the Province, was to go a considerable distance to the north, touching it only at one point. The Minister of Public Works gave as a reason for this that there would be a saving of thirty miles. That certainly was a very great consideration from a Dominion point of view. The principle was maintained throughout the whole line, and they could hardly look for an exception in favor of the Province of Manitoba, no matter how much they might regret the fact. Reference had been made to the interview which the deputation from Manitoba had had with the Minister of Public Works, and to the fact that but little hope was held out of a change of route. However, as they could not have this, he was glad to find an indication of willingness on the part of the Government to assist the people of Manitoba in building another line south of Lake Manitoba, running westward and southward—such assistance to be in the shape of grants of land. He earnestly trusted that this indication would be more than borne out by the facts, and that such assistance would be given as would give the people means of access to the best portions of the country, as well as of sending their produce out of it.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER desired to know the points between which it was likely that road would run.

Mr. SMITH said he had in view a road running from Fort Garry westward towards the south branch of the Saskatchewan for a distance of from 100 to 110 miles within the Province of Manitoba. It might extend, however, for six or seven hundred miles further to that portion of the country known as Bow River. That route would be south of the arid country stretching to a considerable extent through the British possessions of the North-West. It had been said that the desire was to bring this road too far south to meet the requirements of the great body of the people of the Province, he believed, however, that this was not the fact, and that the requirements of the greatest number would be duly considered before the Government would be asked for any assistance.

Hon Mr. TUPPER—Did my hon. friend say that he had obtained a promise from the Government that they would aid the road.

Mr. SMITH explained that he did not say there had been a promise but an indication which he trusted would be put into practice. The hon. member for Hamilton spoke of that charming road known as the Dawson Route. His (Mr. SMITH'S) opinion of it differed very much from that of the hon. gentleman, and he could not speak of it in the same glowing terms. It was perhaps all very well so long as they had nothing better, and for the last year or two had served a very good purpose in causing a reduction of the charges made by American companies for the transport of passengers and freight. He certainly agreed with the hon. member, however, in believing that the people of Manitoba were most anxious to have at the earliest possible moment railway communication between Pembina and Fort Garry. They certainly desired, and hoped sometime to see an all-rail route constructed from one ocean to the other, but they were glad to have connection with Pembina in the meantime. Something had been said of the magnificent water courses of the North-West, and statements had been made that they were a myth not having yet been found out by those who had travelled over the country. His own impression was that there were some stretches of water there that might properly be called magnificent. Lake Winnipeg was certainly no inconsiderable stretch of itself, and from that, with a very little barrier, an entrance was made into the Saskacthewan. From that point there were three hundred miles of uninterrupted water communication. At the end of those three hundred miles it was necessary to transport freight for four miles by land, and having again reached the Saskacthewan you could go for nine hundred or one thousand miles into the interior within seventy or eighty miles of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. DECOSMOS—For how long?

Hon. Mr. SMITH said last year a steamer built on the Saskatchewan proceeded up the river some six hundred miles to Carleton, and from that point would have had no difficulty whatever in going to Rocky Mountain House. This was something which should not be despised. At the same time he did not think because we had this water communication we should negect our railroads.

Mr. JONES (Leeds)—What is the draft of the steamer you speak of?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Some two and a half or three feet. The steamer is about 150 feet in length with 30 feet of beam, and capable of carrying a very considerable cargo.

Mr. DECOSMOS—How long is it possible to navigate the Saskatchewan with such steamers?

Hon. Mr. SMITH said the navigation might safely be commenced in June and continued until some time in September. He had descended the river some 500 miles in July and August, and there was then plenty of water for a boat drawing four or five feet of water.

Mr. JONES (Leeds)—Was not that steamer wrecked?

Hon. Mr. SMITH said unfortunately a steamer had been wrecked, but not this one. Though he had great respect for scientific men, he was bound to say if the Hudson's Bay Company had been guided by the reports of engineers they never would have dared to launch a steamer on the Saskatchewan. Practical men reported that the river was navigable, and he took the responsibility of building a steamer at a cost of fifty or sixty thousand dollars. That steamer was wrecked, but it was not owing to the difficulties of navigation directly. The vessel, through some misunderstanding between the captain and the officers, fell on the rocks in the rapids, and the wood being soft and the cargo heavy, was lost. Undeterred by this, another vessel was built. With regard to the Pembina branch he regretted to say that the line in Minnesota, from Glyndon to Pembina was at a stand still. The Legislature of Minnesota had adjourned without doing anything. It would be a great misfortune not only to Manitoba, but also to the whole Dominion of the North-West were it left for any length of time without railroad communication. With reference to the advantages of Thunder Bay and Nipegon Bay as harbors, the case was substantially this: While Nipegon Bay was a very good harbor, and might be approached and entered with safety throughout the season, the duration of open navigation was shorter to some extent than in Thunder Bay. The latter bay was not a good harbor and would require a great expenditure to improve it, but then the mouth of the Koninistiguia river formed an excellent harbor, where vessels were secure in every respect against storms. In respect to fogs, he had found them as bad in one place as in the other. The people of Manitoba hoped in the first place to have rail, and water communication, but hoped that in consequence of that not one day would be allowed to pass before complete rail communication was established between Lake Superior and Winnipeg.

Mr. BUNSTER said it was really astonishing to hear the remarks of the hon. gentlemen from Hamilton and Middlesex. If British Columbia had ever asked for better terms there might have been some justification for them, but she merely asked the Dominion Government to proceed with the construction of the railroad according to the agreement entered into between Canada and that Province. What he wanted in this House was men of ability like WM. B. OGDEN. When that gentleman projected a railroad across the continent he was regarded as a lunatic; but the road was built from Omaha to San Francisco in three years and sixteen days, at a time when a civil war was raging in the United States. He (Mr. BUNSTER) proposed to discuss a railroad project, not a steamboat road open only five months in the year. Such a road would pay. We should follow the example set us by our neighbors since we have advantages they did not possess. Our pass through the Rocky Mountains was 4,000 feet lower than theirs; we had less snow to contend with, and our road would pass through a fertile country and not a barren region such as theirs. The hon. member for Middlesex had asserted that there were three millions of people to give employment to the Union Pacific Railway. He (Mr. BUNSTER) contended that there were only 600,000, and an important part of the traffic which was building up that line came from British Columbia. When the people of Canada came to know more of the Province on the Pacific, they would learn to appreciate it better. No one Minister had gone to British Columbia, but agents had been sent there to report upon it just as they wanted to have it represented. Would-be statesmen of Canada had thrown cold water on the grand scheme of a trans-continental railway, which was originated in British Columbia by a gentleman who was now no more. In the United States it was different. Every one was favorable to such great enterprises, and there were now no less than three Pacific railroads projected besides the existing line. Yet there were gentlemen in this House who advocated a half railroad, half water and ice road, which just amounted to no road at all. He did not consider that was fulfilling the contract with British Columbia. The people of that Province were not exacting. If the Dominion would only go to work in good faith and earnest to build the road, they would be satisfied. What guarantee had they that the terms would not be broken again? When confidence was once lost it was hard to regain it. The people of British Columbia were laboring under a disadvantage. Numbers of farmers had gone there and purchased land on the understanding that the Canadian Government was going to build the railroad. There they were with plenty of stock and plenty of produce, but no purchasers for them and no means of getting them to a market. Taking into consideration all the advantages in favor of our road, he was satisfied that if it were constructed we would soon induce not only the 500,000 Canadians who were in the United States to return to their native land, but as many Americans to come with them and settle in the Dominion. He objected to the policy of the late Government in having sent Mr. EDGAR over to the Pacific coast to create ill feelings, and on his return prepared a report which was objectionable in the extreme. The expense incurred by Mr. EDGAR'S visit to British Columbia would have gone towards defraying the cost of building the road. The amount placed in the estimates for expenditure on the road was absurdly small, instead of $6,000,000 there should have been $16,000,000. The First Minister stated that the Government would carry out the railway according to the Act; he (Mr. BUNSTER) would be glad if such proved to be the fact. But he did not consider one and a half million dollars annually was sufficient; the Province ought to have obtained $3,000,000 annually. The Government was very ready to declare that they would complete the road as speedily as possible; but there had not been a survey made of it yet, and there was no appearance of the terms of union being fulfilled. Besides the Government might have had a much larger staff of engineers at work than were employed at the present time. It would be a very easy matter for the Government, in future, to excuse their delay by stating that the surveys were not completed. The conduct of the people showed a marked contrast to that of the Dominion Government. The Province had always kept faith with the Dominion. If British Columbia desired to leave the Dominion it could have had a road built through and round the Province. If asked for proof of that, he would remind the House that the American people paid $7,000,000 for Alaska, and made a good bargain at that, for they leased the fisheries for $2,000,000 per annum. British Columbia was surely worth ten times as much as Alaska. The Americans would give fifty times as much in order to shut out the Dominion from the opportunity of becoming a nation on the Pacific Coast. Hence the Province had been shut out from obtaining a railroad owing to the allegiance of its people to the British flag.

Mr. OLIVER was surprised at the cool statement made by the junior member for Victoria that no unreasonable demand had ever been made by British Columbia upon the Dominion. It appeared to him that they had heard a sufficient number of demands made to-night, which were unreasonable. The Dominion Government sent their agent to British Columbia to obtain a relaxation of the terms, and the Government offered to expend one and a half millions annually in the Province in the construction of the Pacific Railway. Yet that offer was refused by the people, and the demand was made for two millions, which they had obtained under the present agreement. We knew the population of British Columbia was not more than 10,000 whites, and that under the present arrangement $200 per head of that population would be spent therefor the next 15 years on the construction of the railway. If Ontario made the same demand for expenditure on public works it would amount to over $320,000,000 annually. The House heard a few days ago another cool proposition from the hon. member from British Columbia, namely: that that Province was not expensive enough to the Dominion. A further proposition had been made, namely: that the Dominion Government did not own the Crown lands in the Province; only twenty miles along the proposed railway, for which it paid $100,000 annually; and the cool proposition was made that some other provisions should be made for the Indians of that country, at the expense of the Dominion, out of this land for which they paid this enormous rent. If any more unreasonable demand could be made on this Dominion than had been made by British Columbia he was at a loss to know what it could be. The hon. member for Selkirk had stated that he had reason to believe that another road would be introduced in Manitoba. It appeared that the people of British Columbia were not satisfied with the arrangements made with it, and now the House was informed that there was a semblance of dissatisfaction in Manitoba, notwithstanding the fact that the road passed through that Province, the dissatisfaction arising, owing to the fact that the Government would not diverge from the straight line and lengthen it about thirty miles in order to accommodate the residents of Winnipeg. There was something more wanted by the hon. member. Although the branch from Pembina to Winnipeg and the Pacific Railway proper were to be built for the accommodation of that town, the hon. member appeared to suppose that there were indications that the Province would be assisted to build another railway south of Lake Manitoba, for a distance of six or seven hundred miles, 120 of which would be within the Province. He was free to admit that if there was any Province in the Dominion that ought to be assisted in building local railways it certainly was Manitoba for this reason, that the Dominion owned the lands in the Province, and the Local Government had not any resources from which to assist local roads. However, he thought that the members representing Manitoba and British Columbia ought to be well satisfied with the policy of the Government as enunciated by the Premier. Great stress had been laid on the fact that the Pacific Railway was not a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. He had always understood the policy of the Government to be this at the present time—the water stretches that lay between Georgian Bay and the foot of the Rocky Mountains were to be utilized until the country could build the whole road. He believed there was no part of the present scheme which could not be utilized in subsequent years as part of the general scheme. A statement had been made by the member for Victoria, (B. C.) that $6,000,000 was not a sufficient vote to be taken for one year ; and the hon. gentleman complained that ten times that sum had not been placed in the estimates, showing that in this respect the demands of the British Columbians were unreasonable and extravagant. Not only were Manitoba and British Columbia dissatisfied, but a portion of the Province of Quebec was also dissatisfied. The dissatisfaction arose out of the fact of the subsidy having been granted to one road instead of another. If there was one portion of the Dominion more than another going to be benefitted commercially by this railway, it was the Province of Quebec. Another party was opposed to the building of the Georgian bay branch altogether, and the hon member for Cumberland in his speech the other night attempted to prove that there was an unnecessary expenditure upon this work between the Ottawa Valley and the Georgian Bay of between four and five millions of dollars. The same hon. member, however, had no hesitation in asking the House to vote seven or eight million dollars for the construction of another, believed by residents in the same section of the country to be quite unnecessary. The representatives of the Ottawa Valley in past years had endeavored to have a back-bone driven through the back portion of the Province of Ontario. This railway would be the back-bone so much desired, and would materially assist in developing the country, which he was informed was well fitted for settlement, and comprised valuable timber lands. This was the only expenditure connected with the Pacific Railway that would at all benefit Ontario, or in any way open up its unpeopled territory for settlement, and surely, hon. members who had the Intercolonial Railway built at an expenditure of twenty millions, and hon. members who were now asking for the expenditure of millions on the Pacific Railway, ought not to grudge Ontario the Georgian Bay Branch, which would pass through the rear of the Province. One word with respect to the allusion made to the dissatisfaction in his own Province. He might say that the dissatisfaction extended from British Columbia to Quebec, and this fact indicated that the Government policy would in the end be acceptable to the whole people, because it was evident that the Government had not desired to favor specially any particular section of the country. At the present time there were deputations in the city from various parts of Ontario. He had read with much interest the discussions that had taken place when those delegates were appointed, and he noticed that the chief objection was that an Ontario connecting link had not been subsidized the same as the Canada Central. Supposing the Government agreed to do that, could it be supposed for a moment that these delegates could agree as to what road should receive the subsidy. He regretted that it was not within the power of the Government to subsidize an Ontario line, but after all in the long run it would be found it would be cheaper for Ontario to build the connecting link itself, because the subsidizing of various lines would only cause more expenditure, five-ninths of which was paid by the people of Ontario. He denied that the question of the Pacific Railway policy had not been before the constituents of Ontario at the last election, but held that their policy was discussed at all election meetings, and the elections resulted in returning to this House a large majority of members favorable to the Government railway policy.

Mr. MONTEITH said the terms of union with British Columbia he understood to be that the Pacific Railway should be commenced at a certain time and completed within ten years, and such agreement having been made, Canada was bound to keep faith with the British Columbia people. He had watched closely the acts of the late and present Governments. The policy of the late Government was to construct a line by which direct communication would be obtained with the Pacific, and they proposed to subsidize a company with $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres. A company was formed to undertake that work, and attempted to float its bonds in the English market, which it would have succeeded in doing but for the denunciations of the Opposition Press. The present Government proposed a different scheme, which included the Georgian Bay Branch, which would be closed during 5½ months in the year. They proposed to build a short link of the railway from Thunder Bay to Lake Shebandowan, a distance of 45 miles. Then there was to be another stretch of water, and other railway and water stretches were to be utilized. The proper principle he held upon which the railway should be constructed was that communication should be had with the Pacific by means of a through line. On looking at the history of the Pacific Railway, he held that the late Government had done more than the present Government was going to attempt to do in the direction of constructing the Pacific Railway.

Mr, SCHULTZ desired to make some observations in regard to that portion of the national work between Fort Garry and Thunder Bay. The announcement made by the Premier in respect to the policy of the Government on the whole line, and particularly on that branch, pointed to the necessity of its early construction, as one of the most important points to be secured was to obtain a speedy means of ingress from Lake Superior. It was felt exceedingly difficult to obtain a large share of immigration when immigrants had to pass round by the United States. If it could be shown to him that the policy of the Government, enunciated by the Premier in respect to the Fort Garry and Thunder Bay Branch would fulfil the requirements of the Province of Manitoba and the country, then he would be one of the most hearty supporters of the Government, but it seemed to him that so far from meeting the requirements, it no more fulfilled them than did the Dawson Route fulfil the objects sought to be obtained. What did the Government propose to do? They proposed simply to construct a railway parallel with the portion of the route where there was now a good waggon road. No doubt the announcement of this policy would be sent forth through the country in the belief that in carrying it out, the Government were accomplishing a great work towards opening up the North-West, and it would be carefully kept out of view the number of portages that intervened. He believed that the building of these portions of the road between the water stretches would answer no good purpose towards opening up the North-West, as the American route would be preferred. Moreover, the country between Shebandowan and Rat Portage was not sufficiently well known to enable us to decide whether the connecting link could be built or not. It would have been more honest if the Premier had frankly confessed at once the difficulties in the way. In the matter of the Pembina Branch he must entirely disagree with the policy of the Premier. It was a fallacy to suppose that because the American road was extended only to within 65 miles of Pembina that therefore rails and rolling stock could not be sent in for the Pembina branch. The Red River was navigable from the junction with the railway, and such goods could be brought in more cheaply by the river than by rail. Moreover, the American line was being extended, and if the Premier had promised to go on with the Pembina branch as soon as the American line reached Pembina he (Mr. SCHULTZ) would have more confidence in the whole railway scheme of the Government. He entirely dissented from the view that the stretches of water between Lake Superior and Red River could be utilized to any extent. The only stretches of water that could be used were Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba, and these unfortunately ran north and south. With regard to the Saskatchewan, it was fitly described by the member for Marquette as one of shifting sand bars and low water. It was said that a Hudson Bay Co's boat had navigated that river, but it only went up on a trial trip after the fall rains in September, and drawing perhaps only about eighteen or twenty inches of water. That proved nothing as to the river being navigable. He believed that river except for flat boats was practically useless for commercial purposes. He would repeat that the failure to go on at once with the Pembina branch would be a serious injury to Manitoba, and there was no just cause for the delay. He could say nothing more except to correct a false impression some members had taken from the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette. That hon. gentleman stated he believed that the people of Manitoba would rather have a through rail line through our own territory than a mixed water and rail communication to Lake Superior as well as the Pembina branch. He entirely agreed with that statement. They had patriotism enough to desire a through line of railway over our own territory so that immigrants on their way to Manitoba would not be enticed to stay in the United States as many of them were.

Mr. D. A. SMITH stated that for many years it had been the custom of the Hudson Bay Company to navigate the Saskatchewan River with boats carrying from ten to twelve tons, coming down from Edmonton one thousand miles and returning with the same freightage. He had already mentioned that he came down that river in a boat last summer, and though it was in July the water was at least four feet higher than it was in September on the occasion referred to by the hon. member for Lisgar. So that he was mistaken when he said that trip took place when the river was high, for it was when the river was comparatively low. In the remarks he had made he did not wish it to be understood that he was wedded to the scheme of a mixed land and water system of communication. He was glad to have that system in the meantime, but he did not wish it to hinder the progress of a through rail line.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether the hon. gentleman considered that his having gone down the Saskatchewan in July last a proof that the river was navigable.

Mr. D. A SMITH said he came down all the way on the river, there being no portages.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER asked that the debate be adjourned, as it was evident a number of members still wished to speak on this very important question, which might be made the first order for to-morrow, and with the understanding that it would be disposed of before six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he desired to close the debate to-night, but he was willing to leave the question of adjournment in the hands of the House.

After a brief discussion on that point the debate was adjourned, on the understanding that the subject would be taken up as the first order to-morrow, and disposed of before six o'clock.

THE PETERSON DIVORCE BILL.

Mr. MACLENNAN moved the first reading of a Bill, from the Senate, for the relief of HENRY WILLIAM PETERSON.

Mr. STIRTON said it would be taking an unfair advantage of this measure to deal with it in such a summary manner. The proper course would be not to oppose it on the first reading, and to take the vote on the second reading. At this hour in the morning (2 o'clock) it would be most unfair to take a vote.

Mr. SPEAKER said the rule of the House was that there must be no debate on the first reading of a Bill.

A division was then taken, and the motion for a first reading was carried on the following vote:—

Mr. MACLENNAN moved that the Bill be referred to a Special Committee—Carried on a division.

The House adjourned at 2:20 A. M.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 13th March, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill respecting the lien of the Government on the Northern Railway of Canada.

The Bill was read a first time.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) resumed the adjourned debate on the motion to concur in the report of the Committee of Supply. He said he regarded the Pacific Railway as the most important project ever brought before the people of Canada since Confederation. Certainly this Dominion could only expect to be great by carrying out, in good faith, the obligations entered into with the different Provinces in the Union. It was necessary that we should use all our exertions to bring the Pacific Province into commercial as well as political union with the rest of the Dominion. This would not be accomplished by the policy of the Government. A half-rail and half-water route would not satisfy the people of this country. The other day Mr. WOOD, the member for South Victoria, in the Ontario Legislature, remarked that the people only desired the Government to commence the railroad at Lake Nipissing; the people of Ontario had the wealth and energy to reach that point and Quebec could do likewise. He (Mr. WHITE) was glad to have this opinion from a Reformer and he believed it was the opinion of a great majority of the people of Ontario. They would prefer to see this contract with Mr. FOSTER cancelled and the money appropriated for it expended in constructing a line to connect the great lakes with Manitoba. The House had heard the remark of the hon. member for Marquette that the people of Manitoba were unanimously in favor of an all-rail route between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg in preference to the Pembina Branch and the two sections of railroad along the Dawson Route. There could be no doubt that the money expended on the construction of a railroad across the continent would be well invested, and he hoped the Premier would cancel the contract with Mr. FOSTER and apply the sum to the construction of a road from Georgian Bay to Winnipeg.

Mr. McCALLUM said that it had been argued during the debate that the House should pass the Pacific Railway item because the Government policy had been ratified by the people at the last election. The fallacy of this argument was proved by the fact that the policy of the Government was not known at that time beyond what was indicated in the speech of the hon. the First Minister at Sarnia. It was held that for the prosperity of Canada we must have a railway through our own territory from the Pacific which should be the back-bone of the Dominion. It would be a singular back-bone, however, when it diverged from a straight course in order to reach Georgian Bay, and when the route was alternately rail and water. If the railway could not be constructed in a more satisfactory manner, it would be well for the Dominion to at once tell the people of British Columbia and Manitoba that the Dominion could not afford to build it. Before the Government expended so large an amount of money in constructing a useless railway to Georgian Bay, it would be better to cut the painter and let those Provinces drift away from the Dominion. Not many years ago we had trouble in the North-West, and Canada became alarmed because a few half-breeds had risen in arms. On that occasion they were able to defy the Canadian Government for six months, and supposing a similar outbreak again took place how could we send troops into the country in winter, over a water and rail route which would be useless during five or six months of the year. In regard to the Georgian Bay branch, he desired to ask the Government what traffic they could bring over the road. He contended that when grain was placed on board of a vessel at Fort William it should be brought right down to Montreal, for grain would scarcely be remunerative if transported by rail. While this was the case it was necessary to have the Pacific Railway through our own territory to meet emergencies should they arise in the West. A railway should be built from Nipegon or Fort William right on to Fort Garry, and so soon as practicable a line should be commenced at Nipegon carrying it eastward. Several hon. members had complained of what they termed the unreasonable demands made by British Columbia, but the House should remember that we had not looked at the exports and imports collected in that Province, but to the fact that the Dominion had entered into a solemn compact with the people of the Pacific Province, to build a railway so soon as praticable and that promise ought to be fulfilled. As regarded the cry raised that the country would be impoverished if we constructed the road, the House would remember that the Minister of Finance collected last year three millions of additional taxation, which it was contended by the hon. member for Cumberland was unnecessary, and the people did not feel that additional taxation. With the wealthy and fertile lands of the North-West at our disposal, we ought to proceed at once with the construction of the direct all rail line. The question of the Georgian Bay branch was never before the people at the last election for the question, then was, "Pure party and Pacific Scandal," and upon that only was a verdict of the people obtained.

Mr. BORDEN said the question had been discussed from a British Columbia point of view, from an Ontario and Quebec point of view, and from a Manitoba point of view, and it seemed to him that the Provinces which were getting all the concessions, all the expenditure and all the advantages, if there were any, had the most complaints to make. He refered to British Columbia and Manitoba. Ontario and Quebec were largely interested in this road, from the fact that the line which is to connect the eastern end of the Canada Pacific Railway with the Atlantic, is to traverse and open up many miles of the interior of the former Province, and from the fact that the Atlantic terminus of the road is to be at the great commercial centre of Quebec—the City of Montreal. It was true that these two Provinces had another consideration in the matter, and that was the paying by far the largest part of the cost. Still, as he had already said, they have a direct interest in the construction of the road, from the fact that a large subsidy will be spent by the Dominion Government in the territory of the one, and from the fact that the other will possess the great eastern terminus of the road. There was one other point of view from which this undertaking had not been viewed, and that was the Maritime—the point of view of the Provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. These Provinces composed a very considerable portion of the population of the Dominion, a very considerable portion of the trade of the Dominion, they paid a very considerable portion of the taxes of the Dominion, and they would be called upon to pay a very considerable portion of the cost of this railway. On the other hand he maintained that they did not in the slightest degree participate in the direct advantages of the proposed expenditure, and the indirect advantages were so very remote and imaginary that he did not think they could be fairly considered. Hence, he contended that no portion of the Dominion would contribute so far beyond and out of proportion to the benefits to themselves, which could be fairly claimed to result from this expenditure, as the Maritime Provinces. The hon. member for Marquette found fault with the Government because they would not deviate from a straight line in the construction of this road to accommodate a few hundred families in his Province, and argued that those people would be disappointed. But where he had a few hundreds of disappointed people because this road did not take a deviating course, he could tell him of thousands who were bitterly disappointed that it should ever be built at all. That hon. gentleman thought it an outrageous thing that the shortening of the road thirty miles should be used as an argument. He had come to the conclusion that the smaller the Province the larger were the ideas of its representatives. It was easy, however, to be lavish with what does not belong to ourselves. If there was any one thing commendable more than another in the scheme of the Government, it was this thirty-mile abbreviation, and if this country were not pledged to this insane project he should like to advocate, not the reduction of its length by thirty miles, but by its whole distance, and he was quite ready to plead guilty to the charge of holding contracted views, if it was contracted not to desire to expend millions for an imaginary population—if it was contracted not to wish to construct a road down the inhospitable slopes of the Rocky Mountains, which involved the building of five hundred miles in order to gain a distance of two hundred and fifty, every mile of it at a frightful expenditure in overcoming engineering difficulties. This country has had some sad experiences already in railway construction—in its Grand Trunk and Intercolonial; and he appealed to hon. members, and to the country to say whether those experiences seemed to justify any such undertaking. The United States was often quoted on account of its Pacific Railway; but what had been their course? They first opened up their Western country, established great cities, and then with a population of forty millions accomplished with the greatest difficulty what we were attempting to do with a population of less than four. But he (Mr. BORDEN) would be told that this work was a foregone conclusion—that the country was pledged to it. Well, he supposed this was the fact, and it was a most melancholy one. But the present Government were in no way responsible for this insane project—it was one of the unenviable legacies of the late Government. The present Government had succeeded in getting somewhat better terms. He could only regret that they were not in honor, able to repudiate the whole bargain. He could but regret, too, that the Colonial Secretary of the British Government should be so ready to hold this country to a bad bargain, which meant almost certain financial ruin to us, and which to Great Britain was only the realization of a pet fancy to connect the British Provinces of the Atlantic with the Pacific at their expense. As regards the scheme proposed by the hon. Premier, he was bound to say, in view of the fact already stated that we were pledged as a nation to the work, and in view of the fact that the gentleman leading the Opposition in this particular was largely instrumental in entangling this country in their difficulty, and in view of the fact that he believed the hon. Minister of Works is competent and conscientious in the discharge of his duties, and in view of the fact that he believed the Government of this country was in safer hands then it ever was before,—in view of these facts he (Mr. BORDEN) should support the scheme proposed by the Government, believing as he did that, coming from such a source, the opposition of the hon. member for Cumberland was prompted by the desired to offer obstruction for party purposes.

Mr. PATTERSON said he had noticed the Government had been very strongly attacked, and perhaps there was an impression in the minds of some that the opinion of the House was adverse to the vote of concurrence in this item of six and a quarter millions asked by the Premier. Very few of the supporters of the Government had taken part in this discussion, as they had with their usual generosity given most of the time belonging to them to the Opposition; recognizing the talent they brought to bear on the discussion. In this question of the expenditure of six and a quarter millions for the construction of a part of this great national undertaking was involved the whole scheme of the Government in reference to the construction of this railway. Their whole policy had been attacked. The points made against them were rather difficult to be seen, as there was a conflict of testimony by those opposing it; and there did not seem to be concert of action on the part of those opposing the Government. Opposition was taken from a Manitoba point of view, from a British Columbia point of view, from a Maritime Province point of view, and strangest of all he found some gentlemen opposing it from an Ontario point of view. Professing to speak for Ontario they had said Ontario's interests had been ignored; and that the Minister of Public Works, a distinguished representative of one of the most important Ontario constituencies, had been recreant to the trust imposed in him so far as his own Province was concerned. He (Mr. PATTERSON) failed to see where Ontario interests had been sacrificed. Were they to be told that a subsidy for the construction of 180 miles of road through Ontario was opposed to Ontario's interests? The construction of that road would develop a country not now settled, but which would be settled, and the scheme could not be adverse to the interests of Ontario. Another hon. gentleman asked where was the traffic for the road? "Some ice from Georgian Bay to the ice houses in Quebec," was his answer. In the same breath he told us that the railroad must precede settlement, and thus develop and stimulate trade and commerce for itself. He held that these arguments were altogether conflicting; and that the Opposition must either abandon one or the other. The first item in this vote of six and a quarter millions was a million for the construction of a telegraph line and roadway. There was no objection to that item—the opponents of the Government and its supporters united in supporting it, and some said we should have even more roadway than was proposed. The next item was two millions for steel rails, and there was no member, except the hon. member for Cumberland, who held that the Minister of Public Works had not done a good work when he secured that bargain for the country. Had not the Premier conclusively shown that it was one of the best bargains ever made. The item of two and a quarter millions was on account of construction of the road on Vancouver's Island; and this was necessary in order to carry out the arrangements made by the Minister of Public Works, by which he had, while keeping faith with British Columbia, as he was bound to do, saved the country from the bankruptcy that would have followed the rash construction of this road. The House must not forget that we were not at perfect liberty to determine whether we would make that expenditure or not. They had to keep faith with British Columbia; and he believed the Premier would keep faith with that Province, as he would keep faith in all the agreements he might enter into. At the same time it must not be forgotten that while we were a growing and prosperous people, with strong nerves and undaunted hearts, nothing would do more to cripple us than to undertake an outlay the resources of the country would not warrant. He supposed that this grant of $2,250,000 towards the construction of that road would not be taken exception to. The appropriation of $500,000 for the Georgian Bay Branch had been attacked. He would not disguise the fact that when he first looked at the Government scheme he was not as favorably impressed with it as he was at present. He thought that an undue advantage was being given to the sister Province of Quebec, and that the proposed road would tend to divert the traffic of the North-West from the western cities of Ontario to the great commercial metropolis of Quebec. He ventured to say that after the explanations of the Premier a different view of the question would be taken in the Province of Ontario, and the fact would be recognized that the rights of no province had been sacrificed, and the interests of no province in particular had been taken into account. Looking at it from an Ontario point of view, he saw a railroad was to be constructed for two hundred miles through a portion of his Province which had never been opened up before, and which was fit for settlement. Viewing it in that light, he heartily approved of this portion of the Government policy. Then the appropriation of $500,000 for works of navigation had been strongly attacked. It was contended that a half rail and half water route would never succeed, and that we must have an all-rail route at once. The hon. member for Monk, who had settled in this country many years ago and accumulated wealth there, proclaimed that there was no use in utilizing our magnificent stretches of water communication. How did the hon. gentleman reach the place he now represented? Was it not by the magnificent stretches of water communication? The North West could be settled as Ontario was before railroads were built, by utilizing the magnificent stretches of water communication as proposed in the Government scheme. The water was there and cost us nothing, and we should use it for the present. When the necessities of trade demand it, we could do as Ontario had done, supplement the water communication with railroads. To the Government policy he accorded his hearty approval. He rejoiced that we had an administration that did not ask Parliament to give them powers to do this work, but in all they undertook recognized the rights of the people's representatives, and had given such evidence of their honesty and sincerity. He regretted that the Minister of Public Works, in his remarks concerning the Boards of Trade, had not been more explicit. The hon. gentleman had said nothing disrespectful of them, but he was misunderstood by some members. The Premier recognized the talent and commercial ability of Boards of Trade, but denied that they were in a position to arrive at as correct conclusions with regard to the construction of public works, as the Government, who possessed the accurate information supplied by engineers.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said if any evidence were required that his position was sustained by arguments which were unanswerable, he had only to turn to the speeches of the hon. member for South Bruce and the hon. Premier to find it. These hon. gentlemen in discussing a question of the greatest gravity and importance had adopted the tone of special pleaders, instead of meeting the arguments he had presented. The hon. member for South Bruce had dwelt at great length upon the point that his (Mr. TUPPER's) position with regard to the Pembina Branch was inconsistent, and defended the policy of the Government on that ground. So far from opposing the policy of the Government with regard to the Pembina Branch, he (Mr. TUPPER) had distinctly stated that he would offer no opposition to it, since a portion of the road was graded, and it was no longer a subject for discussion in this House. But supposing he had opposed the Pembina Branch, would the arguments and statements of the hon. member for South Bruce have been in point? The policy of the late Government was to construct a railroad from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific, and it would have been unfair to the company that was bringing a large amount of capital into this country to prevent them from connecting with the American lines. But that policy was widely different from that of the present administration, which was to construct the Pembina Branch as a Government work. The policy of the present Government was to utilize the water stretches of this country, and did not involve the construction by Government money, and the ownership and operation by the Government of seventy miles of railway alongside of seventy miles of the most magnificent water communication in the country. He did not assail the Government for this, and he merely drew attention to the fact to show how the hon. member for South Bruce instead of grappling with his arguments had set up men of straw to knock them down. His (Mr. TUPPER'S) position was this, that the Government instead of carrying out the policy of their predecessors and grappling with this great work with all possible energy, proposed to expend $10,500,000 of the public money outside, above and beyond anything that was required for the construction of that great work. That was the question he addressed to the House and the position he occupied. The arguments he had adduced to the House were unanswered, not because there were not hon. members of ability on the Ministerial side of the House, but because the arguments themselves were unanswerable. The hon. First Minister adopted the course of avoiding the main issue and taking up the question of rails. He had not opposed the First Minister's policy in regard to the purchase of rails. He declared that he was prepared to give the most generous construction to any act of the Government in dealing with a question of such magnitude, and asserted that they had doubtless acted as they supposed in the public interest. But it was a grave act for the Government to incur a debt of two millions and a-half for any purpose and come to Parliament six months afterwards and ask it to meet the bill. That was undoubtedly a great power to assume; he did not say there were not occasions when such power ought to be exercised, and he did not say that this was not one of those occasions. But the hon. First Minister had brought forward the question of rail purchase as one upon which he (Mr. TUPPER) had attacked the Government. What he did state was that although rails had been purchased at an exceedingly low price there was no reason why they might not be still lower. The fact was that iron is now at a much higher price than a few years ago; that it had been falling in price was abundantly evident; that the competition had become so keen in the manufacture of Bessemer steel rails between England, Belgium, and the continent that there was nothing to indicate that the price would not still further decline. But the interest of the money was alone a serious item. Computing interest at 5 per cent. on $2,500,000 for two years, the result was a sum of $250,000 which must be added to the cost of rails, and then it appeared to be very doubtful whether the Government had saved any money to the country. Two years would elapse before a rail would be required except for the purpose mentioned by the First Minister, that of construction, which would be a very improper purpose for which to put the rails, because when rails had been used for such a purpose they would be found very unsuitable and unfit for the operations of the road when constructed. The hon First Minister and the hon. member for South Bruce also took the ground that this question was not legitimately before the House, because the member for South Bruce stated that it had been provided for and settled at the last session of Parliament, and the Premier stated that this expenditure had been provided for by law. Suppose that the law passed last year provided for making that contract and giving subsidies for the line, was Parliament not in a different position to-day? If there was anything in the arguments of the hon. gentleman they proved too much, because if they proved that hon. members might not discuss and examine the policy and contract agreed to, that proved that the Premier was using a mere senseless form in placing the contract on the table, and inviting deliberation on it by Parliament. He would put it to the hon. member for South Bruce and the Premier whether this Parliament stood to-day in the position in which it stood when the legislation was put on the statute book last session. The House had heard that the Government during recess had bound the country to a time bargain to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Pacific coast to the shores of Lake Superior. The late Government were charged with having committed a monstrous folly in making a bargain with British Columbia for the construction of the Pacific Railway within ten years. The bargain was made between our own people and the people of a Province who by their loyal and patriotic course had given the best evidence that they would not complain if they saw that the Dominion Government in good faith was making all exertions possible to carry out the bargain. Suppose the work had occupied fifteen years instead of ten, there would not have been a dissentient voice raised provided the Government proceeded as rapidly as possible with the work. But the present Government had made an additional compact with the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain, providing that within fifteen years the railway would be built from the Pacific to Lake Superior. And for this, if for no other reason, the question occupied a different stand point. He denied that the late Government had ever agreed to put their hands in the public treasury and build a road from Esquimault to Nanaimo, but they required the company to secure the contract for the construction of the Pacific road proper to carry out that line at their own cost. The leader of the present Government had stated in his letter of instructions to Mr. EDGAR, the agent sent to British Columbia, and reiterated the statement in a Minute of Council to Lord CARNARVON, that the Government of Canada were under no obligation to build a mile of railway on Vancouver Island. And yet the Government had pledged the country to the construction of a road from Esquimault to Nanaimo at a cost of three and a half millions. Supposing the First Minister carried out the policy already submitted to the House, the terminus of the road might be fixed at Bute Inlet, at all events the location of the terminus could only be decided after survey. If that should prove to be the case, it would involve the construction of 150 miles of railway at a cost of $8,000,000.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he never recognized any obligation to carry the line beyond the head of Bute Inlet. Even if they adopted that route the Government were not bound to do more than reach salt water. No doubt the grades in the valley of the Frazer were the best, and the route was the shortest, and if the works of construction were not too serious, that would be the best route to take; but he apprehended that the works of construction would be exceedingly difficult.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said that if the Government only carried the line to Bute Inlet they would leave a gap of 160 miles between that point and Bute Inlet. He was surprised at the Government bemoaning the inheritance left them by the late administration, which included the Pacific Railway scheme, because the members of the party worked night and day to obtain power.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—The hon. gentleman resigned, left his place vacant, and it had to be filled.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said the late Government did not resign until they found that they could not longer conduct public affairs with advantage. He expressed his confidence that the Opposition would aid the Government to accomplish the great national work undertaken by their predecessors; and deprecated any factious criticism regarding the position of British Columbia, which was now an integral part of the Dominion. There was not a word in the law that justified the contract or the subsidy, and he quoted from the Pacific Railway Act of 1874 to show that the authorized terminus was fixed at a point near Lake Nipissing, contending that to subsidize any other route than that indicated in the act was defying the law and the expressed intention of Parliament. The Minute of Council showed that the Government had entered into a contract with Mr. FOSTER to build a subsidized line from Burnt Lake to Douglas, and it so happens that Burnt Lake is 35 miles from the point authorized by Parliament as the eastern terminus. Not only, therefore, had the Government acted without the authority of the law, but they had acted in the teeth of the statute passed last session. This was no mere legal quibble —no irrelevant controversy, for it involved a waste of $1,400,000. The hon. member for South Bruce had charged him with exaggerating figures; but he called the attention of that hon. gentleman to the fact that there was no exaggeration in the statement that Burnt River was 35 miles from the terminus authorized by Parliament. With regard to his other figures he had the authority of the best information open to any member of this House—the contracts themselves. He made his calculation on 122 miles. His hon. friend from South Bruce made his calculation on 115 miles. The contract stated the distance to be about 120 miles, and it was surely less of an exaggeration to deviate from the statement of the contract two miles than seven. He valued the land at $2 an acre, but the First Minister said they were giving it away. If the land was as valuable for agricultural purposes as the Premier represented it—and he believed that it was, and that there was no finer country on the face of the earth—why should it be given away? The simple reason was that the Government did not provide a direct and easy means of communication with the North-West. Nothing would justify the Government in incurring the expense they had incurred unless those lands were worth $2 an acre. On twenty-six lines of railway stretching across the Western prairies the land grants sold at from $13.25 to $3.17 per acre. The Northern Pacific sold their lands at a minimum price of $4 and a maximum price of $10 per acre. So that it was evident that his figures were rather under than over what he was justified in stating. This contract bound Canada to pay for twenty-five years $300 per mile per annum amounting to $637,500 and making the large sum of $6,327,500 that is to be paid under this contract. The hon. member for South Bruce had calculated the amount at $4,270,000, and giving him the benefit of the reduction, and assuming that he was right, he would ask him if he was prepared to throw away from four to five millions without accomplishing any object. His (Hon. Mr. TUPPER's) argument was relatively just as strong in relation to the amount of expenditure involved according to the hon. member for South Bruce's own calculations as according to his (Mr. TUPPER's) own. Why was there not greater utilization of the water stretches to get to Lake Superior? No hon. gentleman opposite had dared to grapple with this phase of the question. They might secure this communication without an expenditure of one dollar of public money, for private capital and private enterprise had tapped all these waters and furnished all the facilities required for getting east. According to the hon. member for North Oxford the First Minister had been besieged by delegations from Ontario against this scheme. They said if you are going to spend the public money of Canada in this way you should divide it up among the railway companies, for we want some of it. From their standpoint their opposition was a very strong one. They have expended private capital to accomplish what this expenditure of ten and a half millions was designed to accomplish, and they had a right to say not that this deep wrong should be increased and made greater, but that the public money should be expended in carrying out this great undertaking to some neutral point to be fixed by Parliament, which could be reached by private capital and private enterprise. The hon. member for Algoma had with an amount of candor that did him credit, but for which the Government would not thank him, had let some light upon the matter. Discussing the question naturally from an Algoma standpoint he had in the course of his interesting speech last night said that at an early day a road would be made to Sault Ste. Marie to connect with an extension of the Northern Pacific from Duluth. If that were not the case what did this expenditure mean? It would leave us at the feet of the Northern Pacific for the next fifty years, and make our great artery of commerce dependent on a rival road. When Sir HUGH ALLAN had entered into negotiations with American capitalists with this end in view the then Government of Canada had refused to sanction his plans; and it was owing to the patriotic stand that we were where we were to-day. The Globe, in the course of its comments on Sir HUGH ALLAN'S plans, had said :—

"A very cursory examination of the country to be traversed by the American road from the head waters of Lake Superior will show how fallacious all such arrangements are, and how not only the line through British territory may be carried through from strictly commercial considerations, but must be, if British authority is to be maintained on this continent, and our new Dominion made practically as well as in theory a great fact. Apart from all other considerations, the very fact that the line under consideration is through American territory would be a fatal objection to its being made the Grand Trunk line for the Canadian North-West. Those who had the command of it would in a very few years command the country. All the intercourse, both social and commercial, of the people of the North-West region would be directly with and through a foreign people, and what might at any moment become a hostile country. By a mere stroke of his pen a foreign ruler might lay an embargo upon the whole intercourse of that part of Canada with what lies to the east. The bonding system, as we have lately had hinted at in connection with a region nearer hand, might be stopped capriciously, and on very short notice; the tide of emigration might be turned away from our border, to a certain extent at any rate, while everything would conduce to make the absorption of the whole territory by the States a mere question of time, and of time very shortest at the longest. The connection of all that region with the more eastern parts of the Dominion would be merely nominal, and when the pear would be ripe, it would naturally fall, as from the first had been desired, into the lap of our very astute and enterprising cousins over the way .....

The proposed route for that undertaking is, on an average, four hundred miles north of that now being made from Duluth, and instead of being, as a large part of both American lines must be, through an irreclaimable desert it runs through a country which in fertility and climate, will compare favorably with any part of the North American continent.

"When this has been stated, nothing else is necessary. Any person of ordinary intelligence can see at a glance that a railway which never, throughout its whole course, comes within a hundred miles of the border lines of a country can do very little to develop the resources of that country. It is better than nothing, but that is all that can be said in its behalf. The immediate territory through which it runs would be benefitted chiefly and in the first place, and all beyond only incidentally, and after the lapse of many years.

"Instead of the fact that the 'North Pacific' is under construction being an argument for allowing the Canadian project to lie in the meanwhile in abeyance, it affords the strongest reason possible for its being pushed through without delay. Politically, it is a manifest and pressing necessity, while commercially it is as evidently of the very highest importance for Canada. In this way alone can this country have any chance for her fair share in the lucrative trade with the North-West which will assuredly spring up, and in the varied traffic with the Pacific world which to a great extent will pass through Canadian territory, if once what will be the shortest and easiest route from ocean to ocean is in working order.

"Our neighbors know the value of the prize involved, and are making gigantic efforts to secure it exclusively for themselves. Our rulers will be traitors to their country and to British connection if they lose a single season in making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through our own territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a question not merely of convenience but of national existence. It must be pushed through at whatever expense. We believe it can be so pushed through, not only without being a burden pecuniarily to Canada, but with an absolute profit in every point of view. Without such a line a great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be a great, a glorious and inevitable reality."

Turning from this statement held up by the great organ of the party when Sir HUGH ALLAN proposed to enter into an agreement with the American capitalists to subordinate the commerce of this country to rival lines, in the speech of the Hon. First Minister, on this subject, he said:—

"It is felt that it is extremely difficult for us to pour a large population into that country, when the expense of transportation to Fort William, westward, is so great; and it is deemed advisable that we should not be driven, for any length of time, to pour a tide of emigration through any portion of the United States, in order to reach our own territory."

What would the House and the people think of the policy of the Government, with the light that had been thrown upon it by the hon. member for Algoma? After all this expenditure on a land and water route between Lake Superior and Fort Garry, did anyone suppose that an emigrant on a steamer on Lake Superior would travel by it when he could run down to Duluth and travel by an all-rail route to the very heart of Manitoba, as he could do after the completion of the Minnesota line to Pembina, and the construction of the Pembina Branch. Looking at it from that point of view, it appeared to him that if the object of the Government was not—and he did not for a moment intimate that such was their object—to hand us over bond slaves to our neighbors, and to fetter the commerce of Canada for the next fifty years, then it was an act of insanity. The hon. members for Marquette and Selkirk had shown that it was impossible for the Parliament of Canada to commit a greater folly than to appropriate this large sum to be expended outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway, instead of grappling with the great work itself. The hon. member for Algoma had asserted that it would take one hundred years to build the section north of the lakes. Did the hon. member forget that the Premier had laid upon the table a contract for constructing the 200 miles of railroad from Douglas to Georgian Bay within two and one-half years from the present time? The hon. gentlemen would believe, in view of this fact, that if the energies of the Government were rightly directed, and directed with equal vigor to the construction of a great national highway, it could be accomplished in a comparatively short period. He (Mr. TUPPER) would not assume that the policy of the Government was not founded on the purest patriotism, but if it were carried out the intelligent people of this country, from end to end, would believe that the Premier was not a free man; they would believe that the interests of Canada were subordinated to those of the Northern Pacific Railway, and that under these arrangements he was carrying out a policy which, while fatal to Canada, was eminently successful to that Company. The item in the estimates was between six and seven million dollars. He (Mr. TUPPER) was ready to put twice that amount in the hands of the Premier for the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway, but not for the purpose of rendering it impossible for us to have a through railroad on Canadian territory. He therefore moved that the said resolution be amended by adding the following words: "That in view of the engagement entered into during the past year between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government and British Columbia, to build a railroad without delay from Nanaimo to Esquimault on Vancouver Island, and to expend not less than $2,000,000 per annum in British Columbia on the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and to complete the construction of the line from the Pacific Ocean to the shore of Lake Superior in fifteen years, this House is of opinion that no time should be lost in beginning the eastern portion of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and constructing it as rapidly as is consistent with a due regard to economy, from the point fixed by Parliament at or near to the south of Lake Nipissing, westward to Lake Nipegon and thence to Red River, commencing at Lake Nipegon and working eastward and westward, and that the Government should employ the available funds of the Dominion in the first place for the completion of that great national work—a continuous railway on Canadian territory by the shortest route from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean."

A division was taken on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

Mr. MASSON said when he addressed the House a few days ago he remarked that he was opposed to the policy of the Government in regard to the location of the Pacific Railway, and was in favor of the plan of the late Government on that subject. The House had now decided to build the Georgian Bay branch, but he trusted that rights which had already been acquired would be respected. He therefore moved in amendment:—That this resolution be not now concurred in, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House no contract shall be entered into with any company for the construction of the Georgian Bay branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, nor any subsidy granted for the construction of the railway from the Eastern terminus of said Pacific Railroad to Douglas or near Douglas until a thorough and complete instrumental survey shall have been made of the route proposed and the route by the Matawan, to ascertain which would be the shorter and more economical of construction.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE called attention to the fact that the contract for the construction of this branch had been laid upon the table and was subject to the ratification of the House. He thought it would be better to pass upon it by direct resolution and it seemed to him that his hon. friend should not proceed with the motion of this point.

Mr. MASSON said it was competent for any member to move that an amount be struck out of the estimates, which would be the effect of his amendment.

Hon Mr. HOLTON admitted that the motion might be in order, but seeing that the effect of it, if carried, would be to strike the whole grant for the Pacific Railroad from the estimates; and the hon. member and his friends had been calling very loudly for the construction of that road at the earliest possible moment, he thought it would be the better course to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MASSON consented to withdraw the motion in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON desired it to be understood that the hon. member reserved his motion until the contract was before the House ; otherwise he (Mr. HOLTON) would object to its withdrawal.

The amendment was withdrawn and the item concurred in on a division.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved that this House do ratify the Order in Council granting a subsidy to the Canada Central Railway under authority of the Act providing for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, 37 Vict., Cap. 14, which order is to the following effect :—

"The Committee of Council have had under consideration the application of the Canada Central Railway Company for the subsidy proposed to be granted to Railway Companies under the terms of the Act, 37th Vic., cap. 14, entitled 'An Act to provide for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway,' and they advise that a subsidy of $12,000 per mile be granted to the said Company, to aid in constructing their line from the vicinity of the village of Douglas westward to the eastern end of the Branch Railway, proposed to be built from Georgian Bay by the Government, being about one hundred and twenty miles, upon and subject to the following conditions, namely :—

"1st. That the road shall be built upon a line to be approved by the Minister of Public Works, but which may be defined generally as ascending the valley of the Bonnechere from the vicinity of the village Douglas via Golden Lake and Round Lake, thence by as direct a line as may be found to Burnt Lake, and thence to the proposed terminus of the Government Railway, at about the 85th mile from Georgian Bay.

"2nd. That the Company shall within one month from the ratification of this Order of Council by the House of Commons, satisfy the Minister of Public Works that they have entered into a bona fide contract or contracts for the building of the Railway, and have provided sufficient means with the Government bonus to secure the completion of the line on or before the first day of January, 1877, and also that the Company shall, from the date of such contracts, make continuously such progress as will justify the hope of the completion of the line within the time mentioned.

"3rd. That the Company shall enter into an agreement to grant running powers on terms to be approved by the Governor in Council to the Northern Colonization Railway Company. The Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company from the point of intersection of their respective lines, provided such point of intersection is on the subsidized line or within five miles of the same, and also to such other Companies as may have the termini of their systems on or towards Lake Huron, and may be designated or approved by the Governor in Council as entitled to such running powers, provided that the terms of such running powers may be mutually agreed upon by the Canada Central Railway Company and the other Companies named, and in the event of a disagreement, the conditions shall be settled by arbitration, one arbitrator to be selected by each Company, and one by the Governor in Council.

"4th. The Government or lessees of the Government line from Georgian Bay to the western terminus of the subsidized line, or any future owners of said line, shall possess running powers on said railway on similar terms to the Companies designated.

"5th. That payment of the subsidy shall only be made on the completion of the railway in sections of not less than twenty miles, each payment to be made on the certificate of an Engineer, to be appointed by the Government, that a section or sections has or have been completed; payment may, however, be made of an amount equal to the subsidy on twenty miles, on work extended over a larger distance, which in value will be equivalent to not less than twenty-five miles of finished roadway; payment will also be made on rails delivered at any point of the line to be constructed, to the extent of seventy-five per cent. of the value thereof, such rails to become the property of the Government until they are laid on the road for use.

"The grant to be operative only after the ratification of this Order in Council by resolution of the House of Commons.

Certified.

W. A. HIMSWORTH,
Clerk, Privy Council."

Mr. MASSON moved the amendment he had just withdrawn.

A Bill incorporating the Western Insurance Company, and a Bill to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Car Manufacturing Company (from the Senate) were read a first time.

The House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 15th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time:—

Hon. Mr. HOLTON (for Mr. JETTE)—To change the name of the Mutual Insurance Company of Canada to the Dominion Life Insurance Company, and to amend its Acts of Incorporation.

Mr. CARON—To authorize the St. Lawrence Navigation Company (steam) to change its corporate name to that of the St. Lawrence Steam Navigation Company, and to confer on it certain powers.

Mr. CARON—To incorporate the Quebec and Lake Huron Direct Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—To amend an Act respecting the appropriation of certain Dominion Lands in Manitoba. He explained that the object of this Bill was merely to correct a verbal error.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—To further amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act. He explained that the objects of the Bill were, in the first place, to amend the second section of the Act by inserting thirty in place of forty. It appeared an injustice that in certain cases men who had served for thirty years should be debarred that privilege. It was also provided that in case it appeared necessary to superannuate a party whose services should not have been entirely satisfactory, the Governor in Council may in such cases grant a superannuation allowance less than that to which he would otherwise have been entitled. This provision did not give the Government any more power than at present.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD entirely approved of the last section of the Bill. He thought it would have a good effect, enabling the Government to show their sense of the demerits of a public servant.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—To provide for the salaries of County Court Judges in Nova Scotia and for other purposes.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER presented report of Select Committee on Insolvency Bill.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said—Mr. SPEAKER: before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to bring before the attention of the House a question of privilege. Three or four hon. members of the House, including a member of the Government, have been accused of malpractices by a leading paper in the Dominion, viz., the organ of the hon. member opposite, the Toronto Mail, which, if true, would deprive us of our seats in this House. I beg to state the case without any circumlocution, and to give it a flat denial. The article is not a lengthy one, and I am sorry to have to read it to the House, in order to convey a correct opinion of what the charge is. With the consent of the House, therefore, I will read the article referred to, which appeared in the Toronto Mail of the 8th March, and is headed "Burpeeism." It is as follows:

"Reference was made in our Ottawa despatch a few days ago to the annulling of a sale which had been made by the Dominion Government to a railway company in New Brunswick of a parcel of land in the heart of the city of Fredericton. The transaction, so far as the facts are known, was a most scandalous one. It is extraordinary that this sale could ever have been made. Of course the Minister of Customs, Mr. ISAAC BURPEE, has his influence in the Cabinet, and there are in the House, supporting the Ministry of which he is a member, Mr. ISAAC BURPEE, his uncle, Mr. PICKARD and Mr. APPLEBY, relatives in other degrees. What they might demand of the Government would be demanded with a strong voice; the more so as a director of the company to which the sale was made, the Fredericton Branch Railway Company, is Mr. E. R. BURPEE, a brother of the Minister of Customs. The combination was certainly a strong one.

"Well, some four or five months ago, the combination asked that this piece of land, five acres, should be sold to them, and they offered for it the sum of $6,000. The sale was effected; the money, we believe, paid over. The sale was made despite the protest of the Fredericton City Council which, we are credibly informed, has been ready to give for it, for park purposes, no less an amount than $100,000. Indeed, we are assured that in the recent interviews between the First Minister and the civic representative of Fredericton, Mr. MACKENZIE was given to understand that this amount would be paid for the land rather than that it should be so shamefully sacrificed. The result was the cancelling of the sale, as already announced in our columns.

"We have heard much of late of the Tanneries 'swap.' There can be no doubt that in that transaction the Government of Quebec was shamefully swindled. But, bad th ough it was, it was not one-tenth part as bad as this sale to the BURPEE connection of a block of land worth $100,000, for the paltry sum of $6,000. Mr. MACKENZIE will, no doubt, take credit now for having blocked the swindle. Whatever credit may be due to him for this circumstance is more than discounted by the fact that he ever permitted the sale to be effected, and that he only stepped between the rascally combination and the public to avoid the obloquy which he saw was coming upon himself. He must have been very remiss in his duty—to speak with excessive moderation—to have allowed the Treasury to be so shamefully cheated; and it is but a poor thing for a Minister to do under the pressure of fear what his better judgment and virtuous promptings had not dictated. We believe Mr. BURPEE says he was not present in Council when the sale was made. That would be a poor excuse in any case; but we should like Mr. BURPEE to state if the Order in Council was not signed by himself in the absence of the Minister to whom that duty would have fallen had he been present. Of course it is not very material whether he was or not. The onus of the transaction, disgraceful in the extreme, must primarily rest upon him.

"It seems to us Parliament ought to insist upon probing this matter to the bottom, even though Mr. MACKENZIE has sought to escape enquiry by a sacrifice of his colleague. If report speak truly, New Brunswick is pretty much governed with a view to the financial advantage of a particular family with large connections. Bit by bit we get at the reasons for these rumours. We see that Mr. PALMER has a notice on the paper in reference to the matter, and doubtless he will throw further light upon it, dark and shameful as it is."

The charge of the Mail is that the Minister of Customs, his uncle (referring to myself), Mr. PICKARD and Mr. APPLEBY, relatives in various degrees, formed a combination for the purpose of influencing the Government in favor of selling certain Ordnance lands in New Brunswick despite the protests of the City Council of Fredericton to the Fredericton Branch Railroad Company, of which E. R. BURPEE, a brother of the Minister of Customs, is a director, for the sum of $6,000, which they say is worth $100,000. It is also stated that the sale was made to the BURPEE connection, that the transaction was a shameful swindle—ten times as bad as the "Tanneries Swap" transaction of Quebec, and that thereby the Treasury has been shamefully cheated. The Headquarters article reads in effect—"That the Minister of Customs urged the passing of an Order in Council for the sale of certain Ordnance lands to the Fredericton Railroad Co. That the said Company issued bonds amounting to $90,000 or $100,000, and that the Minister of Customs is largely interested in those bonds. That securing the said land for $6,000, alleged to be worth $30,000, is in his own interest, as it would enhance the value of the bonds. That the Minister of Customs is closely connected with E. R. BURPEE in railroad enterprises, and that the sale was made in the interests of a company in which the BURPEE family was interested." There is not now, nor has there ever been, any combination or understanding between the Minister of Customs, Mr. PICKARD, Mr. APPLEBY and myself, nor between any of these gentlemen and myself for the purpose of influencing this Government or any other Government to sell certain Ordnance lands in New Brunswick to the Fredericton Railroad Company, and that I never had any conversation whatever with any of these gentlemen in reference to the sale of the said lands. I never sought to influence the Government or any member of it in reference to the said sale. I never had any conversation or communication directly or indirectly, with any member of the Government, or with any member of the House, in reference to the said sale until within a few days ago. Certainly not until attention had been called to it by communications in papers, and then only with reference to the falsity of the reports. I was never solicited by E. R. BURPEE, or any other person, either directly or indirectly, to interfere or use any influence with the Government or any member of it, or with any member of this House, to induce the said sale. I have not now, nor have I ever had any interest, directly or indirectly, in the said railroad, or in any of its bonds or securities, and all the charges in the said article in reference to myself are false and slanderous. It is stated that Mr. PALMER is about to move in the matter, and I trust that he, or the member for Kings, will take a committee and investigate the matter thoroughly. I invite investigation of the most rigid nature. I shall be most happy to go before a committee and be examined myself. I court inquiry, and if I or any of the parties referred to are guilty of any complicity with fraud, I know full well that their disinterestedness and zeal in the public interest will not leave a stone unturned to ferret it out. I would appeal to the First Minister and the whole Government individually to bear testimony in reference to any influence I have sought to exert in favor of the sale of the Ordnance land or any of the projects named by me, or of which I am accused.

Mr. PICKARD said he had no interest in what the Government had done, and had never been consulted at all in the matter referred to. The sale of Ordnance lands was all written upon paper, and if the House wanted an investigation all they had to do was to appoint a committee and have it investigated, and then they would know whether there was a swindle—another Pacific Scandal or not. He would never have taken any notice of the attack had not the hon. member for Sunbury referred to it, and mentioned one of the PICKARDS as being attacked. He saw on the notice paper a question by Mr. DOMVILLE, "whether any, and what sum was paid by the Fredericton Branch Railroad, or by TEMPLE and BURPEE, or either of them, or by any other parties, as payment or deposit for the purchase of certain ordnance lands at Fredericton, N. B." There were two firms in the iron business in St. John, N. B.—one was DOMVILLE and the other was BURPEE, and it appeared that one was trying to injure the other. He held in his hand the receipt from the Receiver General for the amount of money that was paid for the land; and he also held a letter from the department where he applied for a portion of the land, stating that the land was sold. He was not ashamed to say that he had an interest in every railroad in the Dominion, but he had it in common with every man; and there was no act of his in connection with any railroad or public work that he was not willing to have investigated by any committee the House might appoint. He was quite willing to go before any committee and abide by the result of its investigation.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE said he had heard there had been an article in certain newspapers with reference to the sale of ordnance lands at Fredericton, but he had never read it, and had never heard it read until he had now heard it from the hon. member for Sunbury. He did not now rise for the purpose of making a speech, but just to give a flat denial to the charge. He wished to state most emphatically that he had never sought to influence either directly or indirectly any member from New Brunswick or any of the parties alluded to, or any member of the Government of this Dominion or any member of this House, with reference to the matter mentioned in the article read by the hon. member for Sunbury. He denied most emphatically that he had used any influence in the matter or named the price or value of the land. The President of the railroad company first asked to lease the land and afterwards the Government thought the land should not be leased but sold. Applications were made for the land, and parties here from Fredericton were asked to value it. The highest price fixed was $6,000, some were lower, but the Government were not satisfied and referred the matter to their officer at Fredericton. He reported the value of the land at $6,000 also. He desired to state most emphatically that he never had any interest in the matter or with any of the persons named. He also gave a flat denial to the charge that he had any interest either in bonds or stock or securities whatever of the Fredericton Branch Railway, and the statements of a local paper in that connection were utterly false from beginning to end. He would not have taken any notice of the article because he looked upon it as a malicious and insulting article, and the parties who had inspired it had gone so far from common sense and reason that they had defeated their own object. He also desired to give a flat denial to the charge that he had forced or influenced any members of the Council to pass the Order. He wished on the floor of this House to give a flat denial to the charges of the Mail and the Headquarters, so far as he was concerned in this transaction, and his interest had been entirely the good of the Dominion.

Mr. PICKARD contended that the Ordnance lands should have been given free to the railway.

Mr. APPLEBY thought it was unnecessary to notice all the slanders brought against public men, but as this matter had been brought up by the hon. member for Sunbury, and his (Mr. APPLEBY'S) name was mentioned in connection with it, it was necessary that he should make some reference to it. It was true he was a distant relation of the Minister of Customs, but he was not to be blamed for that, nor was the Minister of Customs. So far as the article referred to himself he might say that he did not even know that the Company wanted the land. He had had no conversation on the subject with any one until he saw this charge made in the Mail. Neither was he interested in the business with the BURPEES.

Mr. PALMER was extremely sorry that his hon. friend from Sunbury should have brought his (Mr. PALMER'S) name up in connection with this matter. With reference to the paper, which is stated to be his organ, he might say that he had no more control over the articles which appeared in its columns than the hon. gentleman himself. He (Mr. PALMER) had nothing to do with any of the charges, and in fact knew nothing of the transaction, except in so far as the Mayor of Fredericton had mentioned it to him. That gentleman had applied to him (Mr. PALMER) stating not at all what the hon. member for Sunbury had stated in this House, but simply that Mr. E. H. BURPEE, being one of the principal owners of the Fredericton Branch Railway, and Mr. TEMPLE, the President of the Com^{y} pany, had purchased from the Dominion of Canada land worth $30,000 for $6,000, and that an Order in Council had been passed for the transfer of the land. He said that he (the Mayor) did not know whether the Government could cancel the Order in Council or not, and he called on him (Mr. PALMER) to have the matter thoroughly investigated in the House of Commons in case it was not cancelled. Afterwards he (Mr. PALMER) understood that the Order was cancelled, and he had nothing more to do with it. He had not the slightest feeling in the matter, nor had he any desire to cast obloquy on any member of this House. He had not read this article at all, and he had only to say that it was wrong in so far as it stated that he (Mr. PALMER) placed any notice on the paper or said he would.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) said if he had made any reflection on the hon. member for St. John he did not intend it. He only stated that the Tribune was called his organ, which was a simple fact stated every day in St. John. With reference to the visit of the Mayor of Fredericton, he had simply to say that he was credibly informed that Mr. E. H. BURPEE was in the United States at the time the negotiations were going on, and had nothing whatever to do with the transaction.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said he was sure the House would receive this statement, and it would be only necessary to move to have the papers brought down, when there was no doubt they would show that the charges were without foundation.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said they could be brought down without a motion at all. He could entirely corroborate what the hon. gentleman behind him had said, as none of them had applied to the Government, directly or indirectly, nor were they interested in any way in the matter.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

Bill to incorporate the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company, was read a third time and passed.

The following Bills were read a second time:—

To incorporate the Metropolitan Insurance Company of Canada.

To incorporate the North Western Manufacturing Company.

To grant further powers to the Montreal, Chambly and Sorel Co. to change its name.

To authorize François-Xavier Galarneau and others to build a bridge over L'Assomption River, in the Parish of L'Assomption.

To amend the Act incorporating the Western Assurance Co., and other Acts affecting the same, and to extend the powers of the said Company, (from the Senate.)

To amend the Act incorporating the Canada Car and Manufacturing Company.

NIAGARA INTERNATIONAL AND SUSPENSION BRIDGES.

Mr. MOSS moved the second reading of the Bill to legalize and confirm certain agreements made between the Niagara Falls International Bridge Company, the Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company and the Great Western Railway Company. He said he was requested by the Great Western Company to introduce this Bill. He pointed out to the representation that certain additions would, in his judgment, be necessary to be made to this Bill in order to do justice to certain parties interested in the Canada Southern or Erie and Niagara Railways. The Great Western Company was willing that such additions should be made. He (Mr. Moss) thought it desirable that these additions should be made, and if they were not he would not proceed with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked if these additions would interfere with the right conceded to the Canada Southern Railway.

Mr. MOSS said they would not. He would not have anything further to do with this Bill, if those rights which the Railway Committee of the Privy Council thought proper to grant to the Canada Southern Railway, were not secured to them.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there could be no objection to the Bill going into Committee, but with the distinct understanding that no legislation contained therein should set aside any rights conceded by law.

The Bill was read a second time.

MIRAMICHI VALLEY RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether the Government would be prepared to consider favorably a proposition for granting aid from the Treasury of the Dominion to the project for a "Miramichi Valley Railway," as this road would greatly shorten the distance between Montreal and the nearest summer port to Europe, and also as likely to form an important feeder to the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government had no application at all from this Company, in reference to the matter, nor are we possessed of such information as would justify us in saying anything either for or against the project at the present moment.

LITTLE GLACE BAY.

Mr. McDONALD, (Cape Breton) asked whether the Government would entertain any proposition for the sale of the Harbor of Little Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, for the same reasons as they have purchased the Breakwater at Cow Bay, and if not, whether the Government would grant a subsidy to extend that Harbor and make it a Harbor of Refuge for vessels drawing over seventeen feet of water?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—In the first place we cannot entertain any proposition for the sale of the harbor as we do not own it. In the second place no application has been made for a subsidy to extend that harbor, and make it a harbor of refuge, except the question put by the hon. member, and we are not in possession of any precise information about it, but such information as we have leads to the belief that it is not necessary for that purpose.

THE PLIMSOLL BILL.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether any and what correspondence has taken place between the Government of Canada and HER MAJESTY'S Government in reference to the measure about to be introduced into the British Parliament, by the last named Government, in relation to British Merchant Shipping; also whether a remonstrance has been made to the British Government against any legislation of the British Parliament affecting Canadian Shipping in the direction indicated by Mr. PLIMSOLL, or otherwise seriously affecting our shipping without the approval of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—There is no such correspondence. The Government are now considering the propriety of making some remonstrance against the legislation referred to. If the hon. gentleman has any suggestion to make as to his experience in the matter I will be glad to receive it.

THE PROCEEDINGS AGAINST MR. HUOT.

Mr. TASCHEREAU asked whether the Government had taken civil proceedings against P. G. HUOT, late Postmaster for the City of Quebec, and against his sureties for the amount of his defalcations; and if so, to what point such proceedings have reached, and what hope the Government has of reimbursing itself;

2nd. If any grounds for criminal proceedings against the said P. G. HUOT exists, and when it is the intention of the Government to commence such proceedings?

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER—The Government has ordered civil proceedings to be taken against Mr. HUOT, and against his sureties. The action is now pending and has been delayed for some time, in consequence of exceptions which were taken as to the mode of proceeding. In regard to the second part of the question, it was decided by my predecessor that there was room also for criminal proceedings against Mr. HUOT, but none were taken because at the time Mr. HUOT was very sick, and not expected to live long. Nothing has been done in that respect since.

HARBOR AU BOUCHE.

Mr. McISAAC asked whether it is the intention of the Government to have Harbor au Bouche dredged next summer; and if so, how early in the season shall the work be commenced?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—We hoped to have been able to get some dredging done in that harbor as the dredge returned from the Harbor of Chezettecook, but when it will be done I am unable to say. The hon. gentleman knows this harbor is so very near the Gut of Canso that it is not so important as some other harbors, but we will reach it as soon as possible.

LEVIS CUSTOM HOUSE.

Mr. FRECHETTE asked whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a Custom House within the limits of the town of Levis.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—The matter is under consideration of the Government, and has not yet been decided.

TERMS OF UNION WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DE COSMOS asked whether the Government intend to carry out the agreement made by the Dominion Government with the Government of British Columbia, namely, the agreement made by the Hon. Mr. TILLEY, Minister of Finance, on behalf of the Dominion Government, with Mr. De COSMOS on behalf of the Government of British Columbia, to grant, in aid of the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimalt, the sum of £50,000 sterling to British Columbia in lieu of the guarantee of interest in section twelve of the Terms of Union with that Province, and which agreement was subsequently agreed to and confirmed by the Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, Premier and Minister of Public Works, on behalf of the Dominion Government; and if the Government do not intend to carry out the said agreement what are their reasons for refusing to carry it out?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I object to form of this question. It contains an the argument and statements intended to convey a particular impression. If the question is put in a proper way upon the paper I will answer it. I have simply to say at present that the Government will carry out all agreements ever made either by themselves or by their predecessors.

PORT DARLINGTON HARBOR.

Mr. BURK moved an address for copies of the engineer's reports and all papers connected with the survey of Port Darlington Harbor.—Carried.

HARBORS AND BREAKWATERS OF PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND.

Mr. YEO moved an address for the report of the engineer in charge of the harbors and breakwaters in Prince Edward's Island.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no objection to the motion but a similar motion had been made in the Senate.

The motion was dropped.

LIQUOR LICENSES IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved an address to HIS EXCELLENCY, the GOVERNOR GENERAL, praying him to cause to be laid before this House, a return of all decisions made since the 1st of January, 1875, by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, with reference to the jurisdiction of the Local Government or Municipal authorities in that Province in granting or withholding licenses for the sale, or regulating the sale, of spirituous liquors. He said he called the attention of the Government to this matter because some two or three counties in the Province had refused to grant licenses, and the Supreme Court had decided that they had no power to do so. He made this motion in order that some action might be taken in this House before the close of the session to prevent confusion, if not litigation.

PILOTAGE.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved an "Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for all correspondence with Boards of Trade or other parties, Minutes of Council, reports and papers, in relation to the effect of an Act entitled 'An Act respecting Pilotage,' having reference to the effect upon Trade and Navigation of the said Law, as effects collisions and the responsibility of pilots and owners of vessels in such cases,"—Carried.

SUBSIDY TO THE QUEBEC AND GULF PORTS COMPANY.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved an "Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for all papers and correspondence, advertisements for Tenders, if any, with terms of renewal or extension of subsidy to Quebec and Gulf Ports Company for service between St. Lawrence and Pictou, showing for what special service that renewal of subsidy was given, also whether any other parties or companies intimated a desire to compete for the service."—Carried.

MOST DIRECT ROUTE BETWEEN CANADA AND EUROPE.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE moved "That the Report presented to this Honorable House, towards the close of the last Session, by the committee appointed to inquire into the best and most direct route between Canada and Europe, be referred to the Committee on Printing, together with the answers received since the presentation of the Report."—Carried.

CHATHAM BRANCH RAILWAY,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved an "Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for copies of all correspondence, memoranda, propositions, Reports to Council and Minutes of Council in relation to aiding the Chatham Branch Railway, or in connection therewith."—Carried.

SECTION SIXTEEN OF INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved an "Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for a statement in detail of the several amounts paid out by the Government for work actually performed on Section Sixteen of the Intercolonial Railway, from the time the work was taken out of the hands of the Contractor until the present time, with the names of the parties to whom sums were paid and the particular duties performed therefor;

Also, a statement in detail of any other sums (if any) which have been paid by the Government in relation to said section, from the time the said section was taken out of the contractor's hands up to the present time, stating in detail the grounds for paying the same, and whether the amounts so paid (if any) were sanctioned by the contractor before payment, and if not, what steps were taken by the Government to ascertain the correctness of such payments;

Also, any report of the officer in charge of said work, or others, in relation to the completion and condition of said section when completed;

Also for a statement in detail of all quantities of work performed in rock cutting on Section 16 of the Intercolonial Railway since the section was taken out of the lands of the contractors;

Also copies of all Orders in Council, copies of the Reports of the Commissioners, of Mr. C. J. BRYDGES, Mr. COLLINGWOOD SCHREIVER or other parties connected with the completion of such work, also in regard to taking possession of the buildings of the contractors.—Carried.

LUMBER EXPORTATION FROM CHICOUTIMI AND SAGUENAY.

Mr. TREMBLAY moved an "Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for a statement showing the number of pieces of square timber, spars, masts, deals and boards exported, from the month of April, 1874, up to this date, from the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay; the said statement to specify the kinds of timber, the quantity of each kind, the places where the timber was shipped, the names of the proprietors and of the agents of the establishments where the timber was exported."—Carried.

MONTREAL HARBOR DUES.

Mr. WILKES moved "An Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for copies of instructions given to Collectors of Customs in Ontario to collect Montreal Harbor Dues, on all freight landed at the Port of Montreal; also, a statement of the rate of dues so levied, and the principle on which they are computed."—Carried.

THE KITSON LINE.

Mr. WILKES moved "an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for copies of all Orders in Council or other authority granted to certain American Steamboat proprietors, known as the 'Kitson Line,' to trade on the Red River in the Province of Manitoba—said Company being reputed to discriminate in its rates of freight against merchandize from the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and to have a practical monopoly of the Trade of the Red River."—Carried

THE WASHINGTON TREATY.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved "an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for a copy of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and that of the United States, and between any person in British Columbia and the Dominion Government, respecting the right of entering fish-oils and fish of British Columbia, duty free, in the United States, under the twenty-first article of the Treaty of Washington, dated May 8, 1851."—Carried.

THE CASE OF ALEX. YOULL.

Mr. GALBRAITH moved for a Select Committee to investigate the causes of certain alleged losses said to be sustained by ALEXANDER YOULL, of the Township of Ramsay, as prayed for in his petition to Parliament, said committee to have power to send for persons and papers.—Carried.

INSTRUCTIONS TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. BERTRAM moved an address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for a copy of instructions issued to Postmasters in cities, towns and villages by the Postmaster General, under authority of Sec. 42 of 31 Vict., with reference to dutiable goods brought into the Dominion through the Post Office.—Carried INTER-PROVINCIAL TRADE.

Mr. FLEMING moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for Returns showing the quantity and value of Salt, Coal, Coke, Wheat, Corn and other grains; Wheat and Rye Flour and Meal, exported from and imported into the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, from the 7th April, 1870, to the 1st April, 1871, with the amount of Duties collected on these articles at each port of entry.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government could only give the aggregate returns from each port. They could not give any Provincial exports and imports. They could merely give foreign exports and imports in a general way.

The motion was carried.

THE NEW BRUNSWICK SCHOOL ACT.

Mr. TREMBLAY propose une Adresse demandant copie de toute dépêche transmise par le Gouvernement Impérial, depuis le 7 nov. 1873, au sujet de référence au Conseil Privé de SA MAJESTÉ de la question des écoles séparées dans la Province du Nouveau-Brunswick, avec copie du jugement rendu dans cette affaire par l'hon. Conseil Privé de SA MAJESTÉ.—Portée.

APPOINTMENT OF J. A. HAMEL, ESQ.

Mr. CIMON propose qu'une humble adresse soit présentée à SON EXCELLENCE le GOUVERNEUR-GÉNÉRAL, priant SON EXCELLENCE de mettre devant cette Chambre:

"1. Tous les documents concernant la nomination de J. A. HAMEL, écuier, de la Malbaie, médecin, pour aller vacciner les sauvages sur la côte nord du fleuve St. Laurent pour les années 1868 et 1869, avec les instructions à lui données, et les rapports produits par lui pendant ces deux années à ce sujet;"

"2. Un état montrant le nombre des sauvages vaccinés par le dit J. A. HAMEL, pendant ces deux années ainsi que les comptes produits par le dit J. A. HAMEL et le montant des sommes d'argent à lui payée par le Gouvernement pour services rendus pendant ces deux années à ce sujet;"

"3. Toutes les correspondances envoyées au Gouvernement pendant les dites deux années de 1868 et 1869 par le Rév. Père ARNAULT et autres au sujet du dit J. A. HAMEL."—Portée.

MONTREAL REGISTRY DIVISION.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL praying him to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the Bill passed in the last Session of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, intituled "An Act to divide in three parts the Registry Division of Montreal."—Carried.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACT OF 1874.

Mr. PERRY moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for correspondence which may have taken place between the Government and the Local Government of Prince Edward Island with respect to the Land Purchase Act 1874.—Carried.

QUEBEC GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. ROBITAILLE moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for copies of all papers, documents, letters and correspondence, having reference to the selection of the site for the construction of a Graving Dock in the Port of Quebec.—Carried.

ORDNANCE LANDS AT FREDERICTON.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENE-RAL for all papers, correspondence, telegrams or Orders in Council connected with the sale of certain Ordnance Lands at Fredericton N. B., to the Fredericton Branch Railroad Company, or to TEMPLE and BURPEE, or other parties, and all papers, correspondence, telegrams and Orders in Council connected with the cancelling of said sale; also the memorial from the Corporation of Fredericton, N. B., praying for the sale to be cancelled.—Carried.

THE PLIMSOLL MOVEMENT.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for all papers, despatches, Minutes of Council and correspondence had with HER MAJESTY'S Government in relation to the legislation which was under the consideration of the Imperial Parliament in relation to British Merchant shipping from 1871 to the end of 1874, in connection with the so-called PLIMSOLL movement; also in connection with the proposed Legislative measure in relation to merchant shipping at present proposed by HER MAJESTY'S Government; also, all papers, Minutes of Council and despatches had between the Government of Canada and HER MAJESTY'S Government, protesting against any Legislation being had by the Imperial Parliament which would affect Canadian shipping.—Carried.

GRAVING DOCK AT ESQUIMAULT.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL, praying that he may be pleased to lay before this House at the earliest moment possible, copies of all correspondence with the Government of British Columbia or with any person on behalf of that Government respecting the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimault; also, copies of any Order in Council on the same subject; and also copies of the correspondence with enclosures between the Secretary of State and Mr. DECOSMOS in 1874, respecting the said Graving Dock; also a copy of the resolution submitted to the House by the Government during the last Session of Parliament respecting the said Dock; also a copy of the first Bill submitted to Parliament last Session, to carry out the object of the said Resolution, and also a copy of the Act of last Session providing for aid in construction of said Dock, in lieu of the guarantee of interest in section twelve of the Terms of Union with British Columbia.—Carried.

PICTOU HARBOR.

Mr. KILLAM moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for copies of all correspondence between the Government or the Intercolonial Railway Commissioners and any other person on the subject of a scow or barge loaded with stone for the Intercolonial Railway, and sunk near the mouth of Pictou Harbor; also copy of receipt for money paid, if any, for the said barge; also statement of any claims upon the Government for damages to any vessel by striking upon the said barge.—Carried.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. CASEY moved for a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—That the present system of nomination to situations in the Civil Service is not the most convenient, nor the one best calculated to obtain efficient Public Officers; That it would be expedient to substitute for it, as far as the exigencies of the Service will allow, a system of open competitive examinations as a means of obtaining entrance into the Public Service. He said he need not say much about the importance of this question. It would be admitted by all that the question of the efficiency or the inefficiency of the Civil Service was one that touched the most vital interests of the country. They were all aware the Civil Service was the means by which all the acts of the Government were carried out; that it was the right arm of the Government; and that without it the Government would be as useless as the brain without an arm to carry out its commands, or as the locomotive without the machinery to drive. No matter how excellent might be the Government of the day, or how wise its administrative acts, it might be spoiled by the faults of the Civil Service. He laid down in his motion two general propositions:—first that the system of a nominated Civil Service is not the best one, and, second, that the method of open competitive examinations is a better one. He would endeavor to give some reasons why the present system was not the best one under all circumstances. The most evident fact against the present system was that if it offered no guarantees for the efficiency of these appointed. It did not follow that no efficient men were appointed, but while efficient and inefficient appointments had been made, the Civil Service on the whole was not by any means as efficient as it could be made. The reasons theoretically why this method of nomination allow inefficient men to be appointed was that the appointment made nominally by the Governor in Council on the advice of the responsible head of the department, but nobody supposed that the head of the department had taken the time and trouble necessary to investigate the qualifications of every candidate for office as it would be utterly inconsistent with the discharge of his duties to do so. He must take the advice of the deputy head of the department or some of his subordinates. But here were the same difficulties, as the deputy head of the department could not inquire into the fitness of every candidate throughout the country, and must either make a hasty appointment or be guided by the advice of others. Practically the Government was generally guided by the advice of its supporters. The Government was not supposed to know what was desirable in every employee in every department; and the member could not always know the qualifications of the man whom he might recommend for appointment to the Customs of the Post Office, for he would not have time and facilities for obtaining the required information, and might make his recommendations in the dark, or was under strong temptations to do so. He has to consider, not merely the fitness of the person to be appointed, but what effict the recommendation would have upon his prospects in the next election. He was not merely bound to do so, but presure was brought to bear upon him, not merely by influential supporters, but he was liable to be approached with inducements by an influential opponent to make a particular recommendation without having any particular knowledge of the person to be recommended. In other cases where he did not know the member, he must get advice and information from candidates' friends, and be led by incorrect information to make a wrong recommendation. The country can by no means feel satisfied or be sure that every appointment is made in the best interests of the country. And that every candidate appointed on these recommendations was the fittest possible man for the place occupied. It was not by any means a mere theoretical deduction from these arguments that inefficient men did get into the departments. Not to speak of the public service of this country which was generally very highly thought of. He would quote from the report of the English Commissioners, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE and Sir CHAS. TREVELYON appointed in 1863 to investigate and report upon the efficiency of the English Civil Service :—

"It would be natural to expect that such a profession would attract into its ranks the ablest and the most ambitious of the youth of the country, that the keenest emulation would prevail among those who had entered it; and that such as were endowed with superior qualifications would rapidly rise to distinction and eminence. Such, however, is by no means the case. Admission into the Civil Service is indeed eagerly sought after, but it is for the unambitious, and the indolent or incapable, that it is chiefly desired. Those whose abilities do not warrant an expectation that they will succeed in the open profession where they must encounter the competition of their contemporaries, and those whom indolence of temperament or physical infirmities unfit for active exertions, are placed in the Civil Service, where they may obtain an honorable livelihood with little labor, and with no risk; where their success depends upon their simply avoiding any flagrant misconduct, and attending with moderate regularity to routine duties; and in which they are secured against the ordinary consequences of old age, or failing health by an arrangement which provides them with the means of supporting themselves after they have become incapacitated. It may be noticed in particular that the comparative lightness of the work, and the certainty of provision in case of retirement owing to bodily incapacity, furnish strong inducements to the parents and friends of sickly youths to obtain for them employment in the service of the Government; and the extent to which the public are consequently burdened, first with the salaries of officers who are obliged to absent themselves from their duties on account of ill-health, and afterwards with their pensions when they retire on the same plea, would hardly be credited by those who have not had opportunities of observing the operation of the system." This was pretty strong language, but it was the language used by these responsible English Commissioners. The present system of nomination left the door open to inefficiency and inflicted a direct loss upon the public service. There were further evils arising from that system of appointment, and not the least was the discouragement of good industrious officials, who saw appointments made over them from political considerations, and thus the energy and time and activity they had devoted to their work was thrown away. Another discouragement to the able and industrious was that as promotions were made by seniority, those who were in unimportant positions could work up quietly and to the highest ranks, and indeed to become advisers to Ministers, and thus upon their advice might rest the whole business of the department. The possibility of loss from the course is increased by the difficulty of dismissal, for the Government would find it difficult, lest it might displease prominent supporters. Apart from that, the nomination system was very apt to lead to the establishment of what was sometimes called a bureaucracy, or a sort of family compact among the civil servants. Where appointments were not given for political reasons they were very often given to the relations or friends of old and efficient public servants, with the idea that in this way the efficient officers were rewarded for their good conduct. While it was proper to reward good conduct, it should not be done to the injury of the public service, and the fact that men had relatives who were efficient public officers was no guarantee of their own efficiency. The establishment of such a system of bureaucracy would lead to the extension of red-tapeism. Official traditions would become more fixed and indissoluble than the laws, and the intentions of Ministers and Acts of Parliament might be frustrated by the traditions of office. It was no degradation to our present Civil Service to hint that some of these causes may have an effect on its members. Perhaps, taking the Civil Service as a whole, a body of men of the same age and experience might be found in other walks of life who would get through rather more business than the Civil Servants of this country. There was an impression abroad through the country, that there were more men employed in the Civil Service than were absolutely necessary to do the work, if they were as efficient as were the employees of business firms. He did not know how far this impression was correct, because no official report on the Civil Service had been published. A very considerable time was occupied to transact comparatively small matters of routine business in the departments; whether that arose from the clerks being over-worked or the work being over-clerked, he would not say. That impression, being abroad, and the fact that in order to obtain entrance to the public service influence must be had with some supporters of the Government or with the Government themselves, had certainly tended to degrade the service in the estimation of the public. Young men of unusual independence and ability were consequently discouraged from attempting to obtain admission into the public service, and the Civil Service became a refuge for men who did not possess sufficient energy to carve out a career for themselves. The loss occasioned thereby to the service was very great. Besides having a bad effect on the service itself, the prevailing system had also a bad effect on the country at large,—on the Ministers, who exercised the patronage, and on members of Parliament who, in a small degree, assist Ministers in distributing patronage. It was possible to use this patronage as a means of influencing members by the Ministry of the day. Besides, a member might have so much patronage in his county, that the influence thus obtained was quite sufficient to carry the county; thereby a strong temptation was offered to members to support the Government, and obtain the patronage. If a member was already a supporter of the Government he might feel very unwilling to displease them in reference to any particular vote or measure lest he should have some difficulty in getting his next recommendation adopted. Besides this possibility, he did not say probality under existing circumstances—of corrupt influences being exercised, there was a temptation to the Government to create patronage which they might dispense for political objects for the purpose of assisting their friends. This was not altogether a theoretical evil. Hon. members had seen patronage exercised by the Government of the day to assist their political friends. On a late occasion when a certain Government was supposed to be approaching the end of its existence there was a remarkable increase in the distribution of patronage. From a report presented to the House he found that between Oct. 22, 1873, and Nov. 7, between the time the House met and one or two days after the Government acknowledged themselves defeated, 147 appointments were made at annual salaries amounting in the aggregate to $65,000. Of those appointments a considerable number were made after Nov. 5, the day on which the Government resigned, and some of them, it was afterwards found, were made to places which had no existence,—to superintendentships of light-houses and similar positions when the light-house to which the party was appointed was not built. Whether that sudden and extensive distribution of patronage was caused by a desire to reward friends who had supported the Government, he did not know. It had, however, a suspicious look, and it was not a state of affairs that was creditable either to the Civil Service or to the Government. There was a temptation to create patronage for political purposes, and the Civil Service thus organized would ultimately become a political engine. It was quite possible for Civil Servants to perform certain duties to conciliate friends or oppose the wishes of opponents; it was quite possible for those employees to interfere at Parliamentary elections and influence some of the electors in the locality in which they resided. That, too, was not a theoretical evil, for complaints had already been made in Parliament of the interference of public servants at elections. There was a further danger to be apprehended on a change of a Government occurring. Those officials who had received prominent positions at the hands of the Government in power could not be expected to feel very cordial towards new comers. If they were honest men they would no doubt endeavor to serve the Government faithfully, but it was not always possible for men who do not feel in accord with their employers to serve them as if they respected them, or that men employed in important offices should feel cordially disposed towards the Ministers; and under existing circumstances it was possible for an out-going Government to fill up the public departments with their own friends and thwart a new Government in carrying out their measures. The natural conclusion arrived at by some people was that the public service should be changed with the change of Government. That principal had been carried to its logical conclusion in the United States. When the Civil Service of that country was as small as ours is, that system of changing the officers with the change of parties was not, however, in force. It was originally put in operation in the first year of General JACKSON'S administration, when he dismissed about 2,000 Civil Servants and replaced them with his own nominees. It might be urged that we are not in danger of such a system being adopted here, but the experience of the United States showed that we were in the same danger. When our Civil Service attains the same proportions as that of the United States in General JACKSON'S time there will be strong temptation for the party coming into power to sweep away the servants in the department, and to replace them with their own friends who would work cordially with them and give them great influence throughout the country. It showed that this danger was not altogether imaginary in Canada. He read a short extract from an influential Montreal newspaper La Minerve of the 30th July 1873. The writer, after justifying the formation of electton funds, proceeded to argue that since, under our system, public employes owed their positions to party influence, they might fairly be asked to contribute a part of their salary towards keeping their party in power. This was one of the most peculiarities in the American system, and its advocasy showed that there was a real danged of the introduction of that system amongst us.

It being six o'clock the SPEAKER left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. CASEY resumed his speech. He said he need hardly say anything against the introduction of the American system into this country. It was found that it tended to concentrate power in the hands of the Federal Government. In Canada the lines between the Dominion and Local Governments were not so clearly drawn as they should be, and the Federal Government might, through their officials, exercise an undue influence on the Local Governments. In fact, there had been complaints in this direction already. The system led to an unequal distribution of patronage by the Government. It was only exercised in favor of supporters of the Government. It was impossible that every constituency could be represented by a Ministerialist, and it followed that certain sections of the country could have no share of the patronage. This was not a fair system. Every young man who was found fit for the service should be allowed a fair chance to enter it. It was unfair to the smaller Provinces because they were not only liable to obtain less than the share of patronage to which their population entitled them, but also to miss it altogether if all their representatives should be opposed to the Government. Under the competitive system the smaller Provinces would obtain as large a share as they were entitled to by the intelligence, ability and energy of their young men. He might quote the experience of the Civil Service Commissioners of England. Ireland was a comparatively small part of the British Empire, yet under the system of competitive examinations Ireland carried off a large per centage of the patronage in the departments—seventy per cent. in one of them. This was not wholly due to the superior intelligence of Irishmen, but partially, perhaps, to the fact that there were fewer avenues of occupation open for them in Ireland. It showed, however, that a small portion of a country had as fair a chance to share in the Government patronage as a large one. He had occupied the House at considerable length, showing the evil of the present system, and he would now touch on the remedy as set forth in a report submitted to the English House of Commons in 1854. After touching on the existing evils he proceeded to say:—"The general principle, then, which we advocate, is, that the public service should be carried on by the admission into its lower ranks of a carefully selected body of young men, who should be employed from the first upon work suited to their capacities and their education, and should be made constantly to feel that their promotion and future prospects depend entirely on the industry and ability with which they discharge their duties, that with average abilities and reasonable application they may look forward confidently to a certain provision for their lives; that with superior powers they may rationally hope to attain to the highest prizes in the service, while if they prove decidedly incompetent, or incurably indolent, they must expect to be removed from it. The first step towards carrying this principle into effect should be the establishment of a proper system of examination before appointment, which should be followed, as at present, by a short period of probation. We are of opinion that this examination should be in all cases a competing literary examination. This ought not to exclude careful previous inquiry into the age, health, and moral fitness of the candidates. Where character and bodily activity are chiefly required, more comparatively will depend upon the testimony of those to whom the candidate is well known; but the selection from among the candidates who have satisfied these preliminary inquiries should still be made by a competing examination. This may be so conducted as to test the intelligence, as well as the mere attainments of the candidates. We see no other mode by which (in the case of inferior no less than of superior officers) the double object can be obtained of selecting the fittest person, and of avoiding the evils of patronage." That was exactly the conclusion to which he wished to lead the House. The Government of the day were not prepared to adopt fully the system recommended, but they appointed in that year Civil Service Commissioners, and it was provided by Order in Council that no one should receive an appointment who did not obtain a certificate of qualification from these commissioners. In nearly all cases all that was required was that a candidate should pass an examination showing that he had ordinary intelligence and attainments. For a few departments the commissioners were allowed to institute limited competitive examinations, that is to say, a person possessing patronage was allowed to nominate two or three candidates for a vacancy, and the question of who should receive the appointment, was decided by competition among these nominees. This system continued for many years, though strongly objected to in the House. In 1850, 1856, 1862, and 1863 debates were held on this subject, and motions carried in favor of open competition, as opposed to the system then in force. The limited system left the evils of the nomination system exactly as before, while a limited competition it was held retained the evils of the old system while relieving the Government of the responsibility under which they were previously supposed to rest. After 16 years' trial, in June, 1870, the Government were finally induced to take a further step in advance, and throw open nearly all the departments to competitive examinations. The examination was not, however, guarded from the introduction of improper practices. By the preliminary examination all who wished to compete had to pass an examination in the ordinary rules of arithmetic and geography and such common branches, and those only who succeeded in passing the preliminary examination were allowed to compete. They had, also, to produce satisfactory certificates as to morals, age and fitness for the duties which they would be required to discharge. The examinations were very varied, and took in a very wide range indeed. Owing to this fact the system had led to an unfortunate abuse. The examiners in counting by the marks, allowed marks to be made for a moderate efficiency on several subjects than thorough efficiency in one or two. This led to a system of cramming by which the candidates acquired scraps of information on all the subjects that were likely to be put on the paper, thereby obtaining a smattering instead of thorough knowledge in the branches in which they were likely to be examined. This was the main objection to the system. The examiners were not quite right in putting these varied questions on the paper, but should have attached more importance to proficiency in some special subjects than a smattering of knowledge on all. However, this is easily remedied. The United States also adopted the system in 1872, and since then a great many appointments have been made under it. It was somewhat different from the English system inasmuch as the central appointing power was allowed to choose among those reported fit for positions, while in Great Britain candidates coming out at the head of the list were allowed absolute choice among the vacancies. The question as to efficiency being secured by this system has been debated very considerably. It was urged that many were crammed, and, moreover, that although men were secured who were intellectually fitted for the work, it was difficult to obtain men who were physically fitted for it. This was an unfounded accusation. There was nothing in the Civil Service of this country demanding extraordinary physical powers, except, perhaps, in surveying. But even if physical qualifications were demanded, the fitness of the candidates in this respect could be easily tested. There was no reason why the educated men should be weaker than ignorant, when in fact experience went to show the opposite. Professor FAWCETT in the House of Commons quoted from the report of a doctor who had examined 500 appointments for the East India Service, showing that 292 were possessed of high physical qualifications, 152 only medium and 52 merely strong enough to pass the examination. Out of the 500 only four were rejected. He comes to the conclusion that physical strength is the rule among those intellectually fitted to pass the examinations, and the experience of universities supported this statement. In fact it required as much physical strength to pass through a course of education as any other ordeal. Then as to character. The commissioners should be held directly responsible for the moral character of the man recommended, and those who recommended them to the commissioners would be held responsible, for their recommendations would be placed on fyle and if their recommendations should turn out badly they would be held up to ridicule and blame. Professor FAWCETT had quoted a distinguished Cambridge professor who said that "no test of morals was so nearly perfect as the intellectual one." There would be no attempt to deny that the institution of such a scheme would raise the character of the service. If the entrance to the service were dependent upon competitive examination, upon a certain moral and intellectual talent it would be felt to be a recommendation, and would place the Civil Service pretty much upon the same footing as the open professions now were. It was considered something to be rather proud of for a young man to succeed in entering a legal or medical profession, entrance to which depended upon passing a certain examination, and moral character. If the system were in force it would have to be followed by the abolition of political influence and after entering the service promotion would have to depend upon a man's application to his duties. He thought it would not be amiss to require an examination in some cases in regard to the duties of the particular service for which he might enter. He considered the examinations would be a stimulus to education throughout the country, and would thereby be of vast benefit to the country, even to those who did not intend entering the Civil Service. It was evident the new system would abolish the evils dependent upon the exercise of political patronage and would be a relief to the Government and a relief to the members of this House. No Government could have no interest in creating new offices when they could not fill them with their own supporters; and no member of the House would have any interest in approaching the Government to obtain nominations for his friends, or even to obtain entrance to these examinations when he knew their success depended entirely upon their own ability. It would also be much easier to maintain discipline in the service itself as a man could be easily dismissed should his qualifications not turn out what they were supposed. In this connection he would note an English Order in Council of 1870, that appointments should be made only for six months in the first instance, and unless a satisfactory report were made by the commissioners as to character and attainments the appointment was made null and void, and the appointment fell to the ground even if the commissioners failed to make a report at the end of the six months. It was rather unfortunate that this provision was afterwards cancelled, as it was considered to be perhaps too strict. The commissioners in their report for 1872, expressed great regret at the abolition of this provision as it would have afforded a thorough test as to the character of the employees, and would have furnished correct material as to the merits of the examination test. If introduced into this country, he thought some such provisions should be attached to it. The present system was unfair to constituencies represented by members of the Opposition, and unfair to the smaller Provinces, and must finally lead to the adoption of the corrupt and generally condemned American system. He thought the question was of sufficient importance to justify him in bringing it before the House.

Mr. PALMER was glad the matter had been brought before the House, not so much from a desire to discuss its general principles as to draw the attention of the House and the country to certain prominent evils in the working of the present system. Whether the suggestion of the hon. member for Elgin was adopted or not, he thought that the head officers in the different departments should be taken from men who had been trained in the department; that those who occupied lower places should be advanced to the more prominent positions as vacancies occurred, and that they should not have placed over them persons who were brought into the department for political or other reasons. In his own constituency there had been instances of flagrant wrong in the public services. It was exceedingly hard that young men who had served the Government and the country well could not receive the promotion they deserved, while others were placed over them for political reasons. Those evils he was satisfied were greater and more frequent the more distant they were from the centre of Government. They operated very much against the smaller, or rather the more distant Provinces because there, faithful and long service was not seen by the head of the department who must discriminate between the faithful and the negligent servant in the public service. He hoped to see rectified another principle that had been ignored. In the different Provinces public servants were doing exactly the same amount of work in the different departments, but were paid differently, and that too often was regulated by the size of the Province. The circumstances of Manitoba were somewhat different, but with reference to the old Provinces—Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island—here the cost of living and the state of society was about the same. He could see no earthly reason why public servants of every description doing the same amount of service, and the same service should be paid the same amount of salary. He was not going to detain the House now to point out—as he could point out—a great inequality in the salaries of those officers, and he knew a great many officers who felt themselves much aggrieved by this state of things.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he was sure they were all very much indebted to the hon. member for East Elgin for bringing the subject forward now for the first time discussed in the House, and for the information he has gathered from various sources. He quite admitted the validity of many of the arguments for the system he proposed to adopt. At the same time, while it bore many advantages, it was desirable that there should be some little time for hon. members and the public to become familiar with the system. He had made inquiries as to the working of the system in England, and from the answers it appeared that some maintained that it had worked admirably, but others stated it had been subject to very serious fluctuations of opinion as to its advantage one way or another. It was admitted that many passed an excellent examination and possessed an excellent education who otherwise were not very well qualified to fill public places; and that some who would not succeed in passing a very good examination upon the subjects that were made the test questions of efficiency, would, nevertheless, have made very good officers. There could be no exception to the hon. gentleman's arguments that it would relieve members and Ministers from a very serious responsibility, and a very heavy imcumbrance upon their time. There was nothing more painful than to be obliged to receive applications for office when there were so many more applications than offices, thus making it exceedingly disagreeable. Very often, in the keen competition of political allies pressing appoint ments there was a strong temptation to travel beyond the rule prescribed for getting the best men for the position that was vacant. There could be no doubt if the system advocated by the hon. gentleman were in force in this country it would be a very great relief to public men on both sides. The hon. gentleman had referred to the unfairness experienced by young men who were candidates in constituencies represented by hon. gentlemen in opposition to the Government of the day. It was quite true, and he had no doubt his hon. friend had experienced it for many long years. Still, so far as he was concerned, there was a law of compensation. There was no question that a Government long in power had filled places on the Civil Service with people of one political way of thinking, and that it made at least some inconvenience when a change of Government occurred. That our own Civil Service had suffered seriously from such causes, in the highest branches, he was not prepared to say. He thought this was a subject worthy of consideration, and he thought it would be brought up in time, with the view of some positive action, but in the meantime he thought it would be premature for the hon. gentleman to ask the House for a committee, as the question was now discussed for the first time. He trusted his hon. friend would not press the matter any further at the present moment.

Mr. CASEY accepted the suggestion, and said he would withdraw the motion, and bring it up next session, when he might be prepared to submit for consideration some detailed scheme to bring the system into actual adoption.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW.

Mr. ROSS, in rising to move the motion of which he had given notice, said that when he had the pleasure of addressing the House last session he called attention to the petitions presented from year to year—to the numerical strength of those petitions—the responsibility and influential position of many of those who appended their signatures to them—and argued from these facts that the moral and social force represented by those petitions demanded at the hands of the House some consideration— whether the intrinsic merits of the question to which the attention of the House was called, deserved that attention or not. He also endeavored to show that the ground taken by those petitioners was a true and legitimate one; that the charges which they made against the liquor traffic were real and not imaginary. He endeavored to prove, by statistics gathered with very considerable care from different sources that, as the petitioners alleged, the liquor traffic was responsible for a large proportion of the crime committed in this Dominion. He showed that while the population of Ontario increased one and a half per cent. per annum, crime increased in that Province at the rate of five per cent. per annum. He also showed that while in the United Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, population increased at the rate of one per cent., crime increased eight and three-quarter per cent.; and that while the increase of crime in these two Provinces was eight and three-quarter per cent. per annum, by a strange coincidence the increase in the sale of intoxicating liquors was eight and one-half per cent. He also showed that the largest proportion of that increase came from amongst the temperate classes; that according to the reports of the Inspectors of Prisons and Asylums in Ontario the increase in commitments to our jails from among the temperate classes was only seven per cent., while among the intemperate classes it was thirty-three and one-third per cent., and among the drunks and disorderly forty-one and one-half per cent. These facts justifies him in the assertion that the charges made against the liquor traffic were real and not imaginary as he had already stated. But when he came to consider the remedies suggested by the petitioners, he felt obliged to ask the House to go further, and as chairman of the committee of last session to whom the petitions in favor of prohibition were referred he stated that it "would be expedient to take such steps as would, put the House in possession of full information as to the operation and results of the Prohibitory Liquor Laws in those States of the American Union where they are or have been enforced with a view to show their probable working and effect if introduced into Canada." The House very kindly assented to this demand, and accordingly during the recess a commission was appointed by the Government, That commission consisted of two gentlemen—the one a barrister, of large experience and good position at the bar, a man in whose report the country could have the fullest confidence. The other commissioner was a Minister of very good position who had interested himself in the temperance movement in this and the Old Country, and whose impartiality could not be doubted. These commissioners were instructed to "visit the States of the neighboring Union in which prohibitory laws are or have been enforced, and to make inquiries as to the success of such a law and report thereon as well as in reference to other essential facts connected with the subject." The commissioners set out on their mission on the 25th August, and in the prosecution of their inquiries visited the following States: Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont, Michigan and Ohio. They came in contact and obtained interviews with Governors, ex-Governors, Secretaries of State, Clergymen, Officers of the Army, Senators, Members of Congress, Judges of the Supreme, Superior and Police Courts, District Attorneys, Jailers, and others, and in the report which they have presented, which is a very able document they have not given this House their own opinions or their own convictions in regard to the success or failure of prohibition, but they have given evidence collected from statements taken down verbatim of men of good standing in the United States —of men whose social and official positions give us the utmost confidence in their opinions on this very important subject. What then does the report of this commission prove? In the first place he would say that this commission fully sustains the position he had the honor of taking in regard to the liquor traffic last session, which was this—that where the license system is contrasted with the working of the Prohibitory Liquor Law, it is invariably shown that the liquor traffic and crime if not identical are quite inseparable from each other. It has been found invariably that the effect of the license system as contrasted with the operations of a Prohibitory Liquor Law is disastrous to the moral and social condition of society. He might state that the opportunities of the commision for testing these comparisons were exceedingly favorable. In the first place they were able to contrast the license system in Maine as compared with the prohibitory system. The statistics in regard to Maine embodied in the report contrasts the operation of the license system in that State with the operation of the prohibitory system immediately on prohibition being enacted. He begged to give a few statements from the commisioners' reports: The number of commitments to the County Gaol of Cumberland County, Maine, was, from June 1, 1850, to March 20, 1851, nine months previous to the enactment of the prohibitory law, 279, while from June 1, 1851, to March 20, 1852, nine months subsequent to the enactment of the prohibitory law, the number was 63, deducting liquor sellers committed under the law. There were in the County Gaol on March 20, 1851, before the passage of the Maine Law, 25, while at the same period in 1852, after the passage of the law, there were only 4 prisoners. Here was a statement of the commitments to the Portland Almshouse under both systems: In June, July and August, 1850, the number was 25, while in the corresponding months of 1851 the number was 8, showing that under the prohibitory law the number of commitments was only one-third of those occurring under a license system. To give a bird's-eye view of the whole situation he would cite the following statistics—that the average commitments in Maine was under the license system 60½, while under the prohibitory system it amounted to only 38½. He would now pass to other States where prohibitory laws had been in operation and see how they compared with Maine. The Prohibitory law was enacted in Massachusetts in 1854, but a reaction of public sentiment setting in, it was repealed in November, 1867. But shortly afterwards the Prohibitory Liquor Law was again re-enacted. The chaplain of the State regrets—"that he is compelled to say that the prison has never been so full as it is at the present time, or rather, so full through the year; and he feels that there is no hope of any diminution of numbers while rum shops are found at every corner, and in many of our streets at every other house." The chaplain went on further to show that commitments to the State Prison during eight months of 1867 under prohibition was 65, while during eight months in 1868 under the license system the number was 136. Governor CLAFLIN in his address to the Legislature in January, 1869, says:—

"The increase of drunkenness and crime during the last six months as compared with the same period in 1867 is very marked and decisive as to the operation of the law. The State prison, jails, and houses of correction, are being rapidly filled, and will soon require enlarged accommodation if the commitments continue to increase as they have since the present law went into force."

The Chief of the Police of the city of Boston stated that the number of commitments during the last quarter of 1867 when the prohibitory law was in force amounted to 4,147. During the last quarter of 1868, when the license system was in force, when the prohibitory law had been repealed, commitments were 13,213, or an increase of 300 per cent. A statement of the number of commitments to all the jails of the State gives the following result:—In 1867, under prohibition, 5,770; in 1870, under license, 7,850. He might also give figures that would show that in all the States—in Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island—in every case where the prohibitory law had been repealed, there was a rapid increase in the number of commitments to the jails, and the police officers and wardens found their labors very much increased by an enlarged criminal calendar. While his (Mr. Ross') position on that question was fully sustained, the object of the commission was not to show that crime and the drink traffic were closely allied, but to find out whether the remedy he was about to propose, and to which many people were now anxiously looking, would be effectual and satisfactory—that is to say, whether a prohibitory law of such a character as that proposed, had been so successful as would justify the House in placing upon the statute book of this Dominion a law similar in its provisions to that which had produced such beneficial results in the neighbouring states of the Union. It appeared from the report of the commission that only in one single instance had a prohibitory law worked unsatisfactory, and even in that instance it was doubtful whether the law itself was at fault. In Michigan there was a prohibitory law on the statute book, but it had never been put into operation. But the evidence of all those interviewed by the commissioners—and the evidence was gathered from the most authentic sources—proved beyond question that prohibitory laws in the United States, where tried, had been productive of so much good, and had met with such success, as to justify this House in passing a measure for at least a trial of the law in this Dominion. He was aware that in some cases certain fluctuations in public opinion seemed to give currency to the idea that prohibitory laws had been a failure. In Maine where the law had met with general success, it was in 1856 repealed. But what followed? The damaging effect upon the morals of that State, which resulted from the license system, so excited public indignation against that system, that the Legislature immediately submitted the law again to the popular vote, and the consequence was that the prohibitory liquor law was re-enacted by a vote of 28,000 against 5,000; and ever since a prohibitory law has continued on the statute book of the State of Maine. We need not wonder that these fluctuations in public opinion should sometimes occur. Prohibitory laws strike at the social customs of society, and there are large pecuniary interests at stake. The customs of society are such that when they are attacked by the strong arm of the law; those whose interest it is to perpetuate the license system sometimes combine and overcome those whe are battling for the improvement of society. In the United States the great difficulty lay in the fact that all the executive officers—magistrates constables and others—were elected, and the consequence was that these officers, depending on the popular vote were apt to pander to popular prejudices. In our case, happily, this difficulty does not exist. Notwithstanding these fluctuations in public opinion, what is the result in the United States? The Governor of the State of Maine reports:—"The present law where it is enforced, is, so far as I can judge, as effective in the suppression of the traffic as are other criminal laws against the crimes they are intended to prevent. In the majority of our counties the law appears to be well executed with very favorable results." He (Mr. Ross) was aware that there were people in this House who claimed that the Maine law was a failure and that any one could go into the hotels of that State and indulge in intoxicating liquors to their heart's content. Against such statement, they had this evidence of Governor PELHAM that that law had been very successful. In 1870, Governor CHAMBERLAIN, of the same State said:—"The laws against intoxicating liquors are as well executed and obeyed as the laws against profanity, unchastity and murder." Would the argument used against prohibition be used against the laws against profanity, unchastity or murder? All such laws must be tested by what they can accomplish. Hon. GEORGE G. STACY, (Secretary of State said:—"I have known the city of Augusta fifteen years; there were then open bars, but now not one, and the law has been a success, though of course selling is not entirely suppressed. The effect of the law has been to largely reduce crime, especially that class of crime such as gambling, fighting, &c. It is a rare sight to see a drunken man in the streets." And the Honorable WOODBURY DAVIS reports:—"Notwithstanding the unfaithfulness or timidity of temperance men, the difficulties of enforcing the law, the inadequacy of its penalties, and the effect of the war in retarding its execution, I am convinced by what I have seen, that it has accomplished an incalculable amount of good. Of our four hundred cities and towns, making the estimates below what I believe the facts would justify, I am satisfied that in more than one hundred the law prevents any sale of liquor whatever for a beverage." He asked the House to place the evidence of such men as these, men who occupied high positions in Maine, against the reports clandestinely circulated in regard to the drinking usages which are said to exist in that State. In Massachussetts, Governor TALBOT says:—"The law has now accomplished all that its friends hoped it would. In country places it has been enforced, and with great effect; in large places, though not rigidly enforced, it has exercised considerable influence and kept the evil in check; and it is an immense check in large cities, for it prevents the legal recognition and makes the traffic disreputable. I think public opinion is steadily advancing in favor of prohibition. I believe the liquor law is enforced over three-fourths of the State; it is partially enforced everywhere, and with good effect in the former districts, and exercises considerable restraint in the latter." He had several more extracts which he would not weary the House with reading, but the sum of all this evidence went to show that although there were occasional violations of the law although there was secret traffic in some of the large cities, perhaps in all of them, although the law was not carried out to the letter, yet the effect of it had been largely to diminish crime and to justify us in trying the experiment in the Dominion of Canada. He was told by those who were opposed to prohibition that a well regulated license system would be more beneficial than a prohibitory liquor law. Every one knew the result of the license system in Canada. The object was to repress the evils of intemperance, all the restrictive enactments on our statute books were placed there with this design and what had been the result. We were bound to admit that the crime was on the increase—that our jails were filled with victims of the liquor traffic and that the system had resulted in failure. When this House was asked to pass a prohibitory liquor law it was asked to adopt a system which had proved more successful than the license system had ever been found to be—a system that decreased crime 50 per cent and in some places 75 per cent. where it had been tried. The House was asked to exchange a certainty for an uncertainty and proof of the benefits of the prohibitory system was shown by the duty on spirits and fermented liquors payable by the people of the various States in the neighbouring Union. There was evidence in the statistics of the United States Internal Revenue Department for the years 1873-4—that in Connecticut the amount of duty per head was 62 cents, in Indiana $2.70, in Kentucky $3.89, in New York, which might be taken as an average $1.42. This is a statement of duty paid by cities in which the license system prevailed. In contrast with this we find the duty paid by Maine was 8 cents per head, in Vermont 5 cents per head. Would any one say with such facts as these before them that the prohibitory liquor law was a failure. If there were no other evidence than this he would be justified in saying that it was not—that it not only reduced crime to a great extent but the traffic and use of intoxicating liquors, thus contributing to the aggregate wealth of the various States. He asked the House to consider the alternative which was being forced upon it by the petitions presented here from time to time. This House must either go on continuing the present license system or turn to some other quarter for the remedy of the evils so constantly complained of. It was objected that the loss of revenue would be so great that we could not adopt the prohibitory system. He did not believe that the revenue of Canada depended upon the capacity of our people to consume intoxicating liquors. He believed it to be dependent upon the industry, thrift and frugality of the people. If by any system the industry and productiveness of the people of this country were destroyed the only true source of revenue upon which the Finance Minister could depend for his annual revenue would be attacked. But was there any danger of loss of revenue from this source. A few years ago a deputation of liquor sellers waited upon Mr. GLADSTONE when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer and remonstrated against temperance men passing a permissive Bill. They said this loss of revenue would never do. What did W. E. GLADSTONE say? He said "you may talk about the revenue and about the traffic and usages of society as you please, but give me 30 millions of sober people in England and I am not afraid for the revenue of the Public Works in the British Empire." What did Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE say in his Budget speech last year? he said :—

"If the reduction of the revenue from spirits be due to a material and considerable change in the habits of the people and to increasing habits of temperance and abstinence from the use of ardent spirits, I venture to say that the amount of wealth such a change would bring to the nation would utterly throw into the shade the amount of revenue that is now derived from the spirit duty, and we should not only see with satisfaction a diminution of the revenue from such a course but we should find in various ways that the exchequer would not suffer from the losses which it might suffer in that direction."

Here we had the statements of two English financiers that though a temporary disarrangement of the revenue might result from prohibition, in the end the increase in the thrift and wealth of the people would compensate for the loss; and he would say now to the hon. Minister of Finance, and those who oppose a Prohibitory Liquor Law, that he had not only the consciousness that there would be an enlarged revenue from increased industry, but the assurance, of the very best authorities that the loss to the revenue would not be felt. We had evidence from the Maine Liquor Law that the result was beneficial in that State. In Portland, where it was only partially enforced, there was a diminution of crime. Did we fear a reduction of crime from the enforcement of the law in this country? General DYER, of Bangor, said it was the best law they ever had—that it materially improved the moral and social condition of the people, as it reduced crime and poverty. Would the reduction of crime and poverty be anything to fear in this country? Mayor BLAKE, of Bangor, said it had driven the liquor trade into the lowest quarters, and into the hands of the most disreputable classes. Would such a result be dreaded in Canada? He (Mr. Ross) for one took the ground that inasmuch as this evidence went to show that the passage of a prohibitory law had a most beneficial effect upon the social and moral condition of society, there was nothing to fear from its adoption in Canada; that all the best interests of the country would be materially benefitted thereby, whatever the loss might be to the finances of the country it would be a thousand-fold compensated for by increased industrial productions and the elevated moral status, which this country would enjoy under the new and better system. It might be objected that this system was an innovation, but so far as the Dominion was concerned the principle had long been recognized. We had prohibitory laws applied to Indians. That was individual prohibition. The sale of liquors was prohibited between seven o'clock on Saturday night and six o'clock on Monday morning. That was prohibition as to time. The First Minister, in his Bill for organizing a Government in the North-West Territory, had introduced this principle. There was prohibition as to place. When a prohibitory law was asked for in this House it was merely proposed to extend to the civilized and settled parts of this Dominion, the system which the First Minister was about to apply to the new colony in the North West. What would be beneficial there ought surely to be beneficial here. And now in summing up the whole matter, he would ask the House to consider this question carefully. He had shown that there was a very extensive and increasing demand in this country for a prohibitory liquor law, and petitions from time to time presented to this House amply sustained this position. He had shown there was a necessity for some remedy for the evils of intemperance. He had shown that the license system did not afford that protection to society which we had a right to expect. He had shown that it did not prevent the increase of crime; and on the other hand that prohibition had not been a failure where it had been tried. It was our bounden duty manfully to consider the situation, and fearlessly to meet the exigencies of the case, not shrinking from the difficulties connected with it,—which he admitted were very great—or from the opposition which might be expected to a law of this kind—or from the obstacles in the nature of vested rights—but to grapple with them, as a Government of a free country like this should grapple with a matter of such vital importance affecting the industrial and social interest of the whole country. We had already during this session grappled with many difficulties—the Amnesty Question, New Brunswick School Law, and others. We had grappled with difficulties at the inception of Confederation. It was the privilege, and should be the pride, of our Governments to grapple with difficulties whenever they occur; and he hoped that this House would patiently and calmly, as was their wont, look at the surrounding circumstances of this question—the evils that are being inflicted upon the country, and ask themselves whether the time had not even now come when we should provide such a remedy as was suggested, and place on the statute book of this country a law, which should represent the moral sense of this Dominion, so far as legislation could do so, regarding the evils of intemperance. This was a question which rose above party, and was closely identified with every interest in the Dominion. He hoped hon. members on both sides of the House would be equal to the exigencies of the occasion, and be prepared to adopt these resolutions. He might warn them that if they were not prepared now, the time would come when they must be prepared. We were already on the advancing tidal wave of a fast growing public opinion. The people were begining to realize the magnitude of the evils of intemperance, and this House should be in a position to meet the wishes of the country by providing a solution of the difficulty. The amendments to his resolutions which he would propose, if the House affirmed the principle of prohibition by going into Committee, would meet the present exigency of the question, and would, he trusted, command the approbation of the House, as he had no doubt they would command the hearty approval of all right thinking men in the country.

Mr. BUNSTER said it really snrprised him to see such a baby resolution brought into this House, when we had the highest authority not only in this House but outside of it, that such a thing was in the first place unconstitutional. He would like to give some information as to what HER MAJESTY said in the Speech from the Throne in the Parliament of England. He quoted from the Saturday Review:—"Against a diminishing trade there is to be set an excellent harvest, and in one way or other there has been a steady increase in the consumption of all the necessaries of life, and of 'articles which contribute to the revenue,'"—as beer, spirits and tobacco are styled in a pleasing paraphrase, suited to Royal lips. That was what was said of beer and spirits. He would much rather see the hon. member for West Middlesex take a bold, manly stand and ask this House to pass a prohibitory law at once, so that the House would know what they were voting for. The hon. gentleman came with a half measure and asked for the opinion of this House, instead of meeting the question fairly as he (Mr. BUNSTER) did when he asked the House to open the saloon of this House. The hon. gentleman said nothing about Canada; it was all about the United States. He (Mr. BUNSTER) claimed that Canadians knew how to legislate for themselves as well as the people of Maine. The hon. gentleman was careful not to say what the Governor of Massachusetts stated on this subject—that crime was on the increase ever since the passage of the prohibitory liquor law. Michigan had passed a prohibition act, and it was a dead letter. The people would not have it. The hon. Premier had drawn a comparison between the people of the settled Provinces and the savages of the North-West, which was not at all complimentary to the former. The hon. gentleman would treat civilized men like Indians, and keep liquor from them. Now he (Mr. BUNSTER) was of opinion that intelligent Indians should be allowed to drink at public bars and pay for their liquor like white men. The Premier had been good enough to say that if prohibition succeeded with the Indians he would try it on the whites. If that day should come he would, as a British subject, go to some country where he could get his natural beverage. The hon. gentleman did not seem to give a moment's consideration to the fact that this Act would be unconstitutional. He (Mr. BUNSTER) had been informed by high legal authorities that the prohibition laws of Maine and Massachusetts had never been carried to Washington, and that if they had been they would have been pronounced unconstitutional. If such a law were brought before the Supreme Court of any of our Provinces it would not be allowed. Did the hon. member for Middlesex make any allowance for vested rights? Did he come forward in an honest, manly way and state that he would be prepared to move that every person engaged in the trade should be indemnified for the loss this Act would entail on him. The hon. gentleman would do as an officer in the North-West had done—knock 44 barrels of liquor on the head. He (Mr. BUNSTER) looked upon 44 barrels of liquor as being just as valuable as 44 barrels of flour, and if the officer who destroyed that liquor were treated in a proper way he would be prosecuted. The hon. gentleman spoke of the license system as a great check on intemperance. It was nothing of the kind. It was simply a mode of contributing to the revenues of the different municipalities. He would like to test the sincerity of these temperance men. Would any of them refuse to sell grain to a brewery if they could get a cent more per bushel for it? The dollar was what they were looking after. He was astonished that the hon. member for Middlesex should take up the time of the House with this discussion when they had the statement of the Finance Minister that the revenue would not be sufficient without this source. How much more would it take to compensate those who were engaged in the trade? In view of these facts and the large enterprises in which we were about to engage, we could not do without the revenue from the liquor traffic. He challenged any temperance man, or any pretended temperance man, to come straight before the House and see what support he would get from the people of Canada. There was a great difference between temperance and intemperance. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE never said he was in favor of a prohibitory liquor law. The British people would never consent to it. They were too much in favor of the national British beverage. Every Englishman liked his glass of ale and was none the worse for it. The hon. member for Middlesex said nothing in favor of liquor. He did not mention the fact that our Saviour changed water into wine. The hon. member had presented only one side of the subject to the House. If he (Mr. BUNSTER) had time enough, he would make the hon. gentleman shrink through the key-hole of this Chamber, but he would content himself with leaving this question to be dealt with by the sensible men of this House as it deserved.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Montreal) said the hon. member for West Middlesex wished this House to commit itself to the principle that not only the manufacture but the sale of all spirituous liquors should be prevented. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) objected to this decidedly. His belief was that prohibition was a quack remedy for the greatest evil that existed in this world. When he said it was a quack remedy he had no desire to be disrespectful to his prohibition friends. This was an age of quack remedies. We found good and otherwise decent people flying to quack remedies of all kinds. Everybody could recall to his own mind how good people would go to quack doctors as regards diseases of their bodies. We have quack religions of all kinds, and, in finance, the hon. Finance Minister of this House would say there were not wanting charlatans in that science. It seemed to him (Mr. MACKENZIE) that this attempt to prohibit the sale of liquor was like Mrs. Partington's attempt to keep back the ocean with a broom. He contended that this motion was based on no statistics of any reliability whatever. It was based on the report of two commissioners who only went to the States to enquire into the working of the system there. One of the commissioners was a total abstainer, and therefore a prejudiced party, and the other he knew nothing of. The statistics were gathered in a one-sided way from one-sided parties. The commissioners made the following candid confession at the commencement of their report:—

"Your commissioners endeavored to gather as many statistics bearing on the inquiry as possible, but experienced great difficulty in that branch of the enquiry, inasmuch as many of the cities, more particularly, Portland, Bangor, Agusta and Boston, had suffered from fires that had to a very great extent, destroyed their public records. Your commissioners also found that the frequent changes of the office-holders under the American system of Government, is not favorable to the preservation of statistical information. These causes largely contributed to increase the labors of your commissioners, by compelling a search for records in the hands of private individuals; and with a few exceptions, prevented their going back, as they would have desired, to a period anterior to the passage of the prohibitory law."

He contended that the information was derived by prejudiced individuals from one sided parties in only two States of the neighboring Union—Maine and Massachusetts. Such information was not such as would serve revolutionary resolutions upon. Another fact cropped out in this report from beginning to end—while prohibition worked well in the rural districts, it did not give satisfaction in the cities. He might state as a fact that within a few miles of Portland there was a place of resort not only for Americans but for Canadians, where the landlord admitted that only for the bar he could not keep his hotel open. He was informed that the increased use of opium in the States where prohibition was in force was alarming. It must be remembered also that this House was not dealing with a people among whom Puritain influences lingered as in Maine and Massachusetts. It must be remembered that the Canadian people partook more of the British character, and any one who would reflect on the difficulty that would be experienced in England of getting even such an Act as Judge DUNKIN'S passed, would recognize the fact that what might do for Puritains would not suit us. On this ground he decidedly objected to this resolution. But the hon. member for Middlesex proposed to go even further than those Puritans in the United States. Not content with preventing the sale of liquors, he wished to prohibit the use in private houses of even the lightest wines. It was absurb and monstrous to ask this House to go further than the Legislatures of Maine and Massachusetts had gone, when it could not be shown that even partial prohibition in those States had been successful. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) was aware that a large number of members of this House, from good nature or other causes on which he would not dilate, were disposed to support this Bill. Some of them said: "Oh, we will support a prohibitory liquor law because we know it will be a failure. We know it is a farce and we'll give it a trial." This was a most ridiculous view of the situation. It was bad in every sense of the word to put on the records of this Parliament an Act which would be violated every day by the best men in the country. The practical effect of it would be a failure, but in the meantime we would be forcing the good people of this country to commit perjury. The fact was, the advocates of prohibition had written a new gospel, the first doctrine of which was, "you must be a total abstainer; it is only of secondary importance that you should be a Christian." They had added an eleventh commandment to the decalogue, which was, "you shall drink only what I believe you should." If this law should be enacted, we would next see legislation asked for to compel our sisters and wives to wear only particular kinds of dresses, to restrict our literature and abolish the drama. If we were to be deprived of the wine which was used at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, no doubt these Puritans would go further and abolish marriage also. Then, when all pleasure was at an end, and we were handed over to a moral gloom and despair, we would feel that chaos had come again, and those of us who were left on this desolate planet could only hope there would be some pleasure left for us in future spheres where there would be no prohibitory liquor law.

Mr. SMITH (Peel) said that in the history of Canada many important questions have engrossed the attention of the people and Legislature of the country. Responsible Government, municipal institutions, seigniorial tenure, clergy reserves, Confederation and many other questions of more or less importance. But perhaps in no single question had the people generally evinced so deep an interest as the one now before the House. It is not a party question; it is not one affecting a portion of the community; but a question that deeply interests every man, woman and child in this broad Dominion. The time was when a greater diversity of opinion existed on this subject than at present. Judges, jurors and ministers of the Gospel were not wanting to stand up and defend the drinking usages of the day. But now, from the Bench, the Bar and the Pulpit—and, I am happy to say, a good portion of the Press—but one voice is heard, that spirituous liquors are filling our jails, our asylums and houses of refuge, sending poverty and misery to many otherwise happy homes. He was not one of those who thought that the drinking usages of the present day were worse than those of former times; nay, he thought it otherwise. Glancing for a moment at other countries in days gone by, some of them present a sad picture. If they turned to England, from the reign of Edward VI. to James II, drunkenness appears to have been the rule rather than the exception. It was during this period that the people thought to stem the torrent of drunkenness by restricting sale to licensed houses, and about that time the first license was granted for the sale of spirituous liquors. But, contrary to all expectations, this had the effect of increasing rather than diminishing the traffic. MACAULAY computes the population of England at a little over 5,000,000, and about the same time almost 150,000,000 gallons of beer were annually made, thus giving for consumption to each man, woman and child in the kingdom the large quantity of 30 gallons. Drunkenness appears to have reached its height in the reign of ELIZABETH. The historian tells us that at a sumptous feast given to that sovereign by one of her wealthy subjects, 365 hogsheads of beer besides large quantities of other liquors were consumed. At a later period, in the year 1725, there were, in the city of London alone, 7,000 houses for the sale, of intoxicating drink, and the population at the time would number about three-fourths of a million. Thus giving to each 100 of the inhabitants, a drinking house. Over 40 years ago, there were 49,000 licenses granted in England for the manufacture and sale of fermented liquors. In the reign of GEORGE II drunkenness was so common, that a prominent member of the House of Commons, stated that on his "way to the House, he saw persons lying about in every direction hopelessly drunk." Even the sign boards hung out by the publican of those days were indications of the prevailing customs of the times. The inscription on one of those signs, is handed down to us as follows :—"Here you may get drunk for a penny—dead drunk for two pence, and clean straw for nothing." Who was not familiar with the excesses of some of the best mean of those times? The drinking haunts of those bright stars, at their club meetings, and social gatherings. Such as FOX, BURKE, GARRICK, GOLDSMITH, JOHNSTON, and others, and in that graphic description of one of those drunken revels given by OLIVER GOLDSMITH in his admirable poem entitled "Retaliation," where occurs the following lines :—

"Here waiter more wine, I'll drink while I'm able, Till all my companions are under the table."

If they turned to Scotland and Ireland they meet with the same state of things in almost every particular. It is said that Edinburgh and Dublin, were quite equal to London, in the number of their drinking dens, and in the wild riot and dreadful consequences that follows the free use of alcohol. It had been argued by some, that in no place in the world had drunkenness prevailed to such an alarming extent as in England, while some Scotch writers declare, that there is more liquor drank in Scotland—in proportions to numbers than any other place in the world. Others again claim the palm for Ireland. The warm-hearted son of the green Isle, whether in the domestic circle, attending a good first wake, or acting a prominent part at Donnybrook fair, the black bottle, or brown jug, was his indispensible companion, and the effects only too apparent, in the marks of respect—not to say affection—in the gentle taps of the shillelah extended to those whom he most esteemed. The undemonstrative Scot takes things more easily, as exhibited in one of the past prevailing customs of the country, called "drinking bouts." A number of people collected together, and after seating themselves in a circle, liquor was served round by waiters, each one getting a measured allowance. This was continued till one after another they tumbled over, when two men with a wheelbarrow stationed at the door, assisted them into the one-wheeled carriage, conveyed them away, and dumped them into a corner to sober off. Great as were the extremes to which the immoderate use of intoxicating drinks was carried in the British Isles, and still is, in the opinion of some writers —for a time at least—the United States far outstripped them. In 1810, the value of liquor manufactured in that country was estimated at 16½ million dollars. Eight years later, the returns showed that 15,000 distilleries were in active operation. In 1790, 3,700,000 gallons were imported ; seventeen years later, this large quantity had increased to 10,000,000. The population of those States at the time referred to would probably not exceed 12,000,000 or 15,000,000. As early as 1822, what was then known as the Western States, with a sparse population, exported 7,500 barrels of whiskey, and 3,000 barrels of porter, valued at $500,000. But, sir, let us take a glance nearer home. I am not in possession of statistics to show the quantity of liquor drank in this country in former years. But we do know something of the drinking usages that prevailed, and the lamentable consequences that followed the too free use of the poison. At logging bees, raisings, quilting bees, births, marriages, dances, deaths and funerals, all alike whiskey was indispensable. But perhaps on no occasions were the disastrous effects of this curse of our race so clearly seen as at annual trainings and township meetings. On such occasions whiskey flowed in abundance. Old spites, personal or family feuds, or imaginary insults had to be settled. Brute force was generally resorted to, and in not a few instances valuable lives sacrificed to the fury of men maddened by strong drink. The report of the Minister of Inland Revenue of the past year informs us that for the twelve months 5,500,000 gallons of whiskey were manufactured. In addition to this the large quantity, over 11,000,000 gallons of beer was made, making in all 16,500,000 gallons ; or in round numbers 42 gallons to each man, woman and child in the Dominion. For the manufacture of this large quantity of liquor, 4,000,000 bushels of grain were consumed, a quantity that would furnish bread for nearly one-fifth of the inhabitants of the Dominion, and would at least be ample to supply every prison, asylum and benevolent institution in the country, besides leaving a surplus that would be sufficient to supply the wants of all the really destitute poor in the country. He regretted to find that most of the distilleries reported were in the Province of Ontario. In the town of Windsor, three distilleries produce an aggregate of over 2,100,000 gallons. But perhaps one of the largest establishments of the kind on this continent was in the city of Toronto. The annual production of that establishment amounts to an average of over 2,250,000 gallons, being nearly one-half of the entire production of the Dominion. What portion of this was exported, or what quantity was consumed in the country he had no means of knowing. In addition to the immense quantity thus manufactured, there was imported, and entered for home consumption in 1873, the following liquors :—Brandy, 555,039 gals. ; Gin, 610,095 gals. Rum, 243,889 gals. ; Whiskey, 172,038 gals. ; other strong waters 2,000 gals. ; —total, 1,583,061 gals. In order to insure the proper distribution of this large quantity of intoxicating drink, and place it within the reach of every man, woman and child, as well in the remotest districts of the backwoods settlements, as the frontier towns and cities, we have licensed 6,232 taverns. Some of these returns are taken from the census reports of 1871, and have very much increased since. Taking the population of that time, which was under three and a-half millions, would give one tavern to each 561 of the inhabitants. The same average does not prevail in all the Provinces. As Ontario takes the lead in manufacture, so it occupies the first place in the retail. While it contains less than one-half the population of the four great Provinces, it supports two-thirds of the taverns. The following table showed the number as compared with the population in each Province respectively :—Number of hotels in Ontario, 4,124, or 1 to about 400 inhabitants ; Quebec, 1,313, or 1 to about 880 inhabitants ; Nova Scotia, 372, or 1 to about 1,037 inhabitants ; New Brunswick, 423, or 1 to about 675 inhabitants ;—total 6,232. In 1871 there were in the Dominion 2,807 groceries. It was not too much to say that at least one-half of these sold liquor, that with other shops licensed, they would make the number at least 2,000. These are in addition to the taverns already mentioned. The amount of human suffering and woe caused by the consumption of so large a quantity of liquor, no tongue could tell or pen portray. Fortunes squandered, health and character ruined, honourable positions lost, ending too frequently in death as a criminal, or by suicide. The united testimony of Police Magistrates, Sheriffs, Jailors and Judges, all went to show that the great bulk of crime committed in our land was mainly attributable to the free use of this enemy of man. The united voice of ministers of the Gospel of every denomination—the wail of the distressed wife, the mother, and sister—rose from all parts of the land too audible not to be heard, and too strong, to be disregarded. The request of 40,000 in 1873, and 133,000 persons as expressed in petitions, presented to this House at last session, is too important to be overlooked or lightly treated. They might inquire what had been done, or what could be done, to meet this crying evil. The license system had been tried for more than 300 years, and proved a failure. He was not one of those who thought that it had proved the means of encouraging drunkenness. He thought otherwise, and was of opinion that in some measure it had proved a check to the torrent of drunkeness that might have otherwise deluged our land. This check, he was convinced, was mainly traceable to the united efforts of temperance people, through their temperanee organizations, lectures, and the firm stand taken by ministers of the Gospel. The first account that they had of any united attempt being made to meet the emergency was in the year 1600. A temperance society was formed. The pledge, however was not very strict. The members were restricted to seven glasses at a time, and that to be repeated but once in the day. Other societies of a similar kind soon followed, but it would be observed that the efforts put forth in this direction were intended to restrict rather than prohibit the too free use of ardent spirits. And no very serious objection, I fancy, would be raised to those societies when fourteen glasses a day were allowed. Coming down to the year 1804, public attention was roused on both sides of the Atlantic to the growing evils of intemperance, and active steps were taken to stop its ravages. In 1808 we have the account of a society formed in the State of New York, which had among others the following rules :—"No member shall drink rum, gin, whiskey wine, or any distilled spirits or compositions of the same, or any of them, except on the advice of a physician, or in case of actual disease (also excepting public dinners), under a penalty of 25 cents. No member shall be intoxicated under a penalty of 50 cents. No member shall offer any of said liquor to any other person under a penalty of 25 cents." It will be seen, Sir, that these restrictions were not very formidable. That any person desirous of going on a bender 50 cents fine was no great obstacle in the way.

During the past forty years immense efforts have been put forth by private enterprise to stop this crying evil. Many noble men have spent their time, their talents and their means in the laudable effort to stem the onward progress of this terrible scourge. Temperance societies and lecturers have done an incalculable amount of good. Father MATTHEW in Ireland, JOHN B. GOUGH in America, and CHALMERS and GUTHRIE in Scotland, besides a regiment of worthy men of less note, who all have contributed to this noble work. In 1862 there were in the British Isles 4,000 Temperance societies, with a membership of 3,000.000. They employed 40 paid lecturers, and supported three weekly papers devoted to the cause of temperance. These, with the British Workman, Band of Hope Review, and a few other papers of a similar kind, had an agregate circulation of 600,000 copies. Sermons and lectures innumerable have been delivered on this all-important subject. In the United States even greater efforts have been put forth. To that country is due the credit of making the first determined effort to prohibit by legal enactments the manufacture and sale of strong drink. And although that effort has not been crowned with that degree of success that many good people could desire —yet enongh has been accomplished to show, that such a measure is practicable, and that it has been, and will be supported by the people. Five States of the Union have adopted prohibitory liquer laws, and although they have not been able to completely drive out the enemy, yet it is under such complete control, that the injury done is comparatively trifling. Canada has doubtless done her part. Her Ministers of the Gospel have given no uncertain sound—magistrates and judges have lent their aid in the right direction —Temperance lecturers, and societies have done a great work. The Press has lent invaluable assistance. But all this work has not been carried on without the expenditure of a large amount of means. And these means have been contributed from the pockets of private individuals while the public has been reaping a large revenue from the traffic in the waters of death—is this right? All right-thinking men answer no. We have in our country some five or six papers ably conducted, and devoted to the cause of temperance. Besides, Sir, nearly every sect in the Dominion has its organ, and they are not backward in raising a standard against the prevailing drunkenness of the day. Of such is the Church Herald, Home Journal, British American Presbyterian, The Baptist, Christian Guardian, and a number of others. But, perhaps foremost in the ranks of this list of advocates of the cause, stands the Montreal Witness, which fearlessly for years, and in the teeth of powerful opposition, has not ceased to boldly attack the drinking usages of the day, and hold up to public view the many fearful consequences resulting from the use of this wretched stuff. A goodly portion of the secular press of the country is found on the right side. But we want more. All are ready to admit the immens influence of the fourth estate, and we trust that more of the press of our country will be found advocating the good cause. The question may be asked, Can anything more be done than has been done? We answer, yes—prohibit the manufacture and stop the sale. This undoubtedly is surrounded with very many formidable difficulties; but we cannot regard them as insurmountable. The difficulties in this case are not greater than those that surround many other greater national questions. Men who were equal to the task of uniting in one whole the scattered Provinces that now form this great Dominion, or those who can undertake the stupendous work of constructing a great highway across this continent, encountering difficulties of no ordinary magnitude, crossing great rivers, traversing unknown regions where the foot of men has never trod, stretching across immense prairies, and unexplored woodlands, scaling lofter mountains, and skirting the precipitous sides of hills whose tops are capped with eternal snows, spanning fearful gorges, tunnelling through prodigious rocks and requiring for its construction and equipment from 100 to 150 millions of dollars, and when finished, will form one of the greatest works of art ever undertaken by man. Such men will, no doubt, be found equal to the work of carrying through this House a law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, a boon, the value of which, cannot be measured by dollars and cents. Nor can we regard this question of greater magnitude than that great reform undertaken, and carried to a successful issue by the Right Honorable WILLIAM GLADSTONE, the dis-establishment of the Irish Church. It may be asked, have we any GLADSTONES here? We have talent on both sides of this House that would do credit to any Parliament. In conclusion he expressed his gratification at liquors being excluded from the House of Commons dining room; but he regretted that the Senate should still persist in keeping open their saloon, where liquor was freely sold, and too much of it brought into apartments connected with the Commons, despite the vigilance of our worthy SPEAKER, and the positive order of this House.

Mr. DYMOND said hon. members had been performing a feat similar to that of the King of France who with "twenty thousand men walked them up the hill and then walked them down again;" not perhaps in quite so imposing, but in quite as inconsequential a manner. He rose not to deliver a third temperance oration interesting and instructive as they were to listen to, but to offer his humble protest against this question being any longer treated as it was being treated by the House at the present moment. They had had with reference to this question of a prohibitory liquor law an overwhelming amount of influence from the outside world in the shape of petitions They had had committee after committee and they had had, he would venture to say in spite of remarks made by members opposite, the report of a very able and impartial commission. The all but unvarying testimony so far had been in favor of a prohibitory liquor law. And yet the leader of the movement in the House had discussed the question before empty benches. What did this mean? It meant that the House of Commons was not sincere in its desire to abolish the liquor traffic at the present time. If it were sincere hon. members would at least be in their places to testify to the interest they felt in the movement; but empty benches could only mean one thing when a question of that kind came before the House. He confessed that when the question came up last year in the greenness of his Parliamentary youth he thought there was some sincerity felt in dealing with it; and he ventured to tell his constituents so when he passed among them. He would tell them so no more, and no hon. members could go to the country and ask its support and approval for the course they were taking on that subject to-night. The speech and resolution of his hon. friend for Middlesex had the same appearance of weakness. He (Mr. DYMOND) did not think, however, it was possible for his hon. friend to have gone further than he had done on the present occasion. But he ventured to say that this must not be repeated, that this was the last time they must be content with empty declarations, that if any good was to come out of speeches and resolutions, they must be prepared to give logical force to their arguments, and come what might, test the sentiments of this House by an Act of legislation, and thereby ascertain whether the House and the Government were prepared to carry out the professions which they had made during past years. If his hon. friend for Middlesex could not adopt that course, he (Mr. DYMOND) hoped he would be content to rest himself on appeals to the country, and there endeavor to raise public opinion, which if not quite as direct in operation, might perhaps in the end be more effectual than any resolution proposed in the House of Commons.

Mr. LANDERKIN thought the question of a prohibitory liquor law was the most important one that had come before Parliament during the present session. Various adverse agencies had been resorted to with a view to bring about a better state of things. The licensing system had been tried but had failed, and intemperance was increasing among the people, notwithstanding all the influence which churches, temperance associations and other preventative means could bring to bear. It was the testimony of the Judges and Officials charged with the administration of justice that a very large proportion of the crime in this country was due to intemperance. The public had taken considerable interest in the question, and by petitions had sought to induce the House to stop the progress of the drinking evil. Although he was in favor of any law or enactment that would tend to remove the evil, yet the constituency which he represented did not appear to be very earnest in favor of temperance, for out of 20,000 people only 300 had petitioned in favor of a prohibitory law. If that and other constituencies desired that a prohibitory law should be put into force they must plainly manifest their determination to have such a law placed on the Statute Book. There would undoubtedly be many difficulties encountered in carrying out a prohibitory law in the Dominion on account of it lying alongside of the United States, and to accomplish the task would involve very great expense; unless the people were a unit on the question it would indeed, be almost impossible to carry it out. But sufficient arguments could not be adduced why the Government and Parliament should not deal with the question. It was known that the liquor traffic produced great injury to the State, and it was the first duty of Government to protect the rights, liberties and peace of every citizen. The actual cost of liquors consumed in the United States annually was estimated at $739,000,000, and the consumption in Canada was proportionately as large. The hon. member for Montreal West had opposed a prohibitory law because of the difficulty of carrying it fully out; but that argument was not sound because if we were to abolish all laws that were not fully carried out, some of our most beneficial laws would have to be struck from the statute book. Although such a prohibitory law might be violated in same cases, yet the fact that it was necessary for the preservation of the well being of the country was sufficient of itself to demand that such a law should be enacted. He thanked the hon. member for Middlesex for submitting the question to the House in such an able and exhaustive speech, and he trusted that if the people desired a prohibitory law to be passed they would fully show their desire by petitions and otherwise, and if it appeared that the people did desire such law, then the House would be prepared to deal with the question notwithstanding the many difficulties which surrounded it.

Mr. McCRANEY said the report of a commission to inquire into a Prohibitory Law in the United States, referred to by the hon. member from Middlesex, in his speech continued a contrast between the License Law and a Prohibitory Law, and it was quite clear from all the evidence submitted that where a Prohibitory Law has been tried it has been successful. After listening to all the arguments against the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, it appeared to him that the business was one of the very worst speculations that any country ever engaged in, or any Government made legitimate by legislation. There was not a single sound principle of political economy that was not to a large extent counteracted and undermined by the operations of this terrible traffic in strong drink. If we take the large capital invested in this business and invest it in any legitimate commercial pursuits where it would meet the requirements of the people what a mine of wealth it would be to our country. But in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors the greater the investment of capital the greater the injury to the country, because it had been shown by indubitable evidence from reports to this House that the manufacture and sale of strong drink increases the taxes of the industrious, which is not fair, and puts money into the pockets of the non-producers, or, in other words, robs the many and gives to the few. It is a recognized principle that every man endowed with reason and health should be a producer of something that is good and useful to the whole country in which he lives, and the country that gives him protection, and that every man should pursue such a business so as to render a valuable consideration for what they receive. And if he fails in this he obstructs the very design of human society, which should be constructed on a benevolent principle or basis, and should provide for the happiness and comfort of the whole community. What may be said of individuals may be said of Governments, namely, to assist only those interests that will provide for the happiness and comfort of the people. Those engaged in the liquor business in all its different branches are not only non-producers of anything that is good and useful, and that is conducive to the happiness and comfort of the whole community, but the country loses their labour and their moral influence for good; they are positively destroying the producers and productions of the country. How many of the working men, the very bone and sinew of our country are destroyed annually by the traffic who will never reveal it. This is a terrible cancer in the body politic, and the sooner the Government knife is applied, and its complete removal effected the better for this young but rising Dominion. Then the revenue from this traffic has been referred to by the hon. member for Middlesex, which amounts to between four and five million dollars annually, while the loss to the country is estimated for liquors imported at the retail price, about $8,000,000; liquors manufactured at the retail price, about $10,000,000; land used in the cultivation of hops and grain, $2,000,000; loss of capital and labor invested in the wholesale and retail business, about $8,000,000; loss of labor to employers and working men, $5,000,000; destruction ot property on land, lakes and rivers, loss by theft, bad debts, failures and various other crimes, $3,000,000; loss through pauperism, destitution, sickness, insanity and premature death, caused by drink, $3,000,000; cost of police prosecutions, Courts of Justice, support of criminals, losses to jurors and witnesses, $2,000,000. Thus the balance sheet stands:—loss, $41,000,000; revenue, $5,000,000; money enough to build the Pacific Railway in three years. This is political economy with a vengeance. But the fact that a larger proportion of the revenue is derived from this source, should not stand in the way of its removal if it were seen and felt that no amount of revenue, however great, could justify moral wrong and social suicide. There must be in the nature of things, and in accordance with the laws of political and social economy, some other and more equitable method of providing for all the necessary expenditure incurred by this Government. He was in favor of a prohibitory law, pure and simple, but failing to secure that, would support any other measure that had for its object the lessening of the drinking usages. He spoke the sentiments of the constituency he represented, and of the whole of the Province of Ontario, when he said "we are ready for this law, and believe if this law was passed for the whole Dominion, and giving those engaged in the business say two years to close up, there would be no difficulty in carrying out the law." Friends of the temperance cause hoped and trusted the Government may see their way clear to give us this law. He was pleased to learn from the hon. the First Minister that in the Bill for the government of the North-West Territory, intoxicating liquors were to be excluded, and for this he will receive the thanks of the friends of temperance in this Dominion; and just as long as this Government uses its influence and legislation to curtail this traffic, and administers the Government in truth and righteousness, just so long will the King of all Kings and Governor of all Governments continue to bless and prosper this young Dominion.

Hon. MALCOLM CAMERON said it was competent for the House, when it went into Committee, to carry out the arguments adduced in favor of prohibition, to their logical conclusion. He was supported in that view by a communication he had just received from the Sons of Temperance Society of Duffin's Creek, declaring by resolution, "That the people of the Dominion of Canada are sufficiently educated up to, and prepared to entertain, a law for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation and use of intoxicating liquors, and that the passing of such a law during the present session of the Dominion Parliament should go into force and effect within a reasonable time, and that Bill would be to the great majority of the people as the greatest reformation and blessing ever vouchsafed to this country." The hon. member for West Middlesex, and the cause he had adopted, thought proper to go cautiously and steadily, but at the same time when the House went into Committee, a Bill might yet be introduced and passed. He regretted that the temperance question should have come up so late in the Session, but if a Bill was introduced he would give it his hearty concurrence. He never expected to stand in a Legislative Assembly and hear such sentiments uttered as had been uttered to-night. Although he had been fourteen years engaged in temperance work, he had never before heard any person ready in an assembly of Christians to come forward and declare that beer was a natural beverage. But however much he might be surprised on hearing that statement, he was considerably more surprised at the speech of the hon. member for West Montreal. He had the misfortune not very long ago to leave this city by night train to proceed to Montreal to give that hon. gentleman his support with a view to return him to this House little knowing what sentiments he would utter; but he made the hon. member a promise that he would not do so again. This young man, brought up in the best society at a seat of learning, must be a Mahomedan because if he cannot get drink and dancing here he hopes he may do so in another world. If that sentiment represented the views of the constituency of Montreal West, he (Mr. CAMERON) was much mistaken in his estimation of the people. The action of the hon. member was the more surprising in view of what was transpiring in his own constituency—in view of the stand Archdeacon BOND, a member of his own church and one of the most devoted ministers in the country, had taken, whose name was known not only over this land but in the other countries. When the hon. member spoke of the temperance men being a low class and being fanatics, he ought to have remembered that one thousand clergymen of the Church of England had formed themselves into a temperance society, of whom some were chaplains to HER MAJESTY the QUEEN. A brother of Earl RUSSELL was at the head of the movement, and the secretary was the Rev. Wm. ELLISON, who was known all over the world for his devotion to the temperance cause. Two months ago four thousand clergymen of all denominations met in Manchester to demand a prohibitory law for England. Did the hon. member not know that men were meeting by thousands in England, Scotland, France, Germany and the United States, setting forth the misery and wretchedness arising from the sale of drink, and protesting against the increase in the number of saloons being licensed. Did he not know that JOHN GOUGH had stated that a young man who publicly took the side of dissipation and malpractices never ended his career successfully. He would quote a few words from a magazine of very high literary authority which declared that the use of alcohol as a medicine was a mistake and that the faculty were changing their views on the subject. The magazine said :—"The combat against the far-spreading, the overwhelming vice of intemperance, is not to be fought on the outskirts of the question. The disease must be followed home to its origin—the family circle. The chairman of the Ministerial Conference on Temperance that assembled in Birmingham last November did not hesitate to bear his testimony against the frightful spread of family intemperance, and this, we contend, is mainly owing to the vicious influence of medical attendants. He said that :—'Among educated, aye, and the Christian ladies, this vice had now got a hold and grasp of which it never had before. Let them ask any medical man who had got a large practice, no matter whether he was friendly or unfriendly to the movement, he believed his evidence would be that intemperance among ladies had fearfully increased. If, then, this vice was increasing among our sisters and wives and mothers, what was to become of the next generation.'" The case of Dr. TODD mentioned in the magazine, showed the danger of alcohol, as did also that of the member of Parliament who died under Dr. TODD'S practice of giving brandy. The past history of the world, and the past history of the article was not to be a justification for our going on in a mistaken policy contrary to the evidence of our own senses ; contrary to the evidence of all philosophical and chemical intelligence, and contrary to the statements of some two thousand physicians of London that it was dangerous in very many cases when given in medicine. He need not attempt to describe the sufferings of the poorer classes in England through the gin palaces and the beer shops ; but they would not disregard the words of Archbishop MANNING who said :—such are the sufferings among his people, such the sufferings and disgrace brought upon his country that wherever there is a meeting or platform for temperance he would be there. The clergymen were united in that course. He also quoted the testimony of Capt. HUYSHE concerning the Red River expedition. He declared that the troops could never have accomplished their work had not alcohol been entirely kept away from them, and that the men used only tea. And the fact tested by experience in the day's work of the men, the absence of crime, showed the advantage of the course. and there was no trouble and no court-martials : but the day after they got there they got liquor, and one of the soldiers was found dead from the effects of it. There was a large number of facts of that kind, though he need not detain the House by giving them—showing the great change that had taken place in the last forty years, and now they found total abstinence advocated by the first men in the first positions in the world, and by men, too, of the highest scientific attainments. He could give instances in this city of Ottawa, if it were necessary, of men who had been lost in the gutter through drink, but had been reclaimed, and were now useful and industrious and respected members of society, through the agency of total abstainers and their associations. The great obstacles now in the way of prohibition were the men and capital in the liquor trade. All the Judges in the land had condemned the liquor traffic, and had declared that it was the principal cause in filling the criminal calendars and the gaols, and contributed more largely to the lunatic asylums than anything else. But they, like too many others, did not give this movement the influence of their example. They said "Am I my brother's keeper?" and considered that all should have as much common sense as they had, and there would be no excess. He need not point out the danger and fallacy of that argument.

Mr. GORDON said it was too late in the day to go into a temperance lecture on this subject to educate public opinion, for that work had long been done. The exhaustive speeches of the hon. member for West Middlesex last year, and on this occasion, left little to be said, but he (Mr. GORDON) was one who took the ground that public opinion was not yet educated to the point of carrying a prohibitory law into effect if it were placed upon the Statute Book. The hon. member for Vancouver's Island had asked why, if temperance men were in earnest, they did not seek to place a law on the Statute Book; but he thought no greater evil could be done the temperance cause than rash legislation with regard to it. The evil was a gigantic one; its ramifications were very great, and extended through all classes of society, and they would have to meet all the opposition that would be raised to this measure. The people must be educated to the struggle that would be required from them in order to carry out the law, and he contended that public opinion had not been educated up to the difficulties and sacrifices they would have to make in order to work out this law in good faith. He maintained public attention had not been called to the probability that a suit of clothes now costing $12 would then cost $18, and that tobacco now costing 50 cents per pound would then cost 75 cents per pound. If they said in the face of all these, "we are prepared to make this sacrifice," they would have a powerful backing. An enormous difficulty in the event of a prohibitory law would be the prevention of smuggling along the extensive frontier of the neighboring public where the liquor traffic was carried on, and which would entail a heavy cost upon the country. Another difficulty would be the amount of compensation those now engaged in the liquor traffic, and it was one to which the great bulk of temperance men had never given any consideration, and probably any person who would have dared to mention it on a public platform would be scouted. But when we come to place this law upon the Statute Book we would have to meet that question. Of the six millions of revenue derived from the liquor traffic, some four millions come from the excise. When institutions are fostered under the law, and suddenly the law steps in and deprives them of all source of revenue, a sense of justice called upon us to make them due compensation. This was done in the case of slavery; and when the public mind had been educated to support the abolition of slavery, Parliament voted twenty millions sterling as a compensation to those who dealt in that enormous evil. The hon. member for North York had stated that this House was not sincere in dealing with this question; but he (Mr. GORDON) believed the House and the country was sincere, and when the country become fairly roused he believed the House would be fully in earnest, and if it were not in earnest he believed their successors would be, for at the next general election it would become the great question of the day. He condemned the remarks of the hon. member for West Montreal, and his attempt to ridicule this movement. That hon. gentleman must have known many a noble youth whose earthly prospects had been ruined, or who had gone down to an untimely grave through intemperance, and it ill become him to lend his influence to foster a cause that had wrought so much ruin. He would say with all humility that one single soul was of more value than all the arguments that could be put in the balance against it, and he hoped that on this account the question would be weighed seriously by the House.

Mr. GOUDGE said he could not give a silent vote on this important subject; and he was more and more convinced that the course pursued by his hon. friend from West Middlesex was the most prudent one that could be taken. The reason was that it was not competent for a private member of this House to bring in a resolution affecting the revenue of the country. This was a question of very great importance to the revenue, as well as to the social relations of the country, and it required very full and careful discussion before this House would be ready to pass a measure of prohibition. He thought the question had very nearly reached that point; and as soon as they had prepared a measure to provide for the ordinary revenues of the country the people would be ready to ask the House to pass such a law as they had in the State of Maine. He believed the people were sincere, and that the conviction was rapidly growing in their minds that such a remedial measure was necessary to destroy the evils of the liquor traffic. They had used moral suasion for years to educate the people, and very properly, for a prohibitory law would be inoperative unless a large proportion of the people were in favor of it; and he thought as soon as the people were prepared, this House would be prepared to give them a prohibitory liquor law. The sentiment of his county was that the legislators were not willing to grant this measure, and he believed this feeling prevailed extensively or there would have been a great many more signatures to the petitions to this House to pass the law. He believed if arrangements were made for a plebiscite, as he hoped there would be, it would be found that public opinion would demand the passage of such a law. and he was prepared to assist in procuring such a law, as he believed it was the only cure for intemperance. Temperance men should not shut their eyes to the many difficulties in the way, and one of which was the question of revenue. There was much doubt as to how the revenue could be raised; but he contended there need be no fear, on that score, as the money now sent out of the country to the West Indies and other countries for the purchase of liquor, would be spent at home, and, if turned into its proper channels, as it would be, go so far to increase the comfort and prosperity of the people that there would be a much larger consumption of dutiable goods, and thus largely increase the revenue. Then there would be an immense saving in the expenditure upon penitentiaries in the great reduction that would take place in the numbers of people who are now paupers and criminals, and inmates of gaols, so that instead of being a burden to the public they would become a source of wealth, and soon our revenue would be fully equal to what it now is. In Maine the principle of total abstinence had extended to every party, and the Governor of the State was a tried temperance man, and was elected upon that ticket. He (Mr. GOUDGE) had had the pleasure of meeting in Halifax, in the summer of 1873, thirty-two members of the Press of Maine, and of that number twenty-eight were pledged teetotalers. It could not be otherwise than that public opinion must be very much advanced in the State of Maine when such a large proportion of the Press of the State were pledged teetotalers. The American Consul at his (Mr. GOUDGE'S) home had been identified with the Government of the State of Maine for many years, and had assured him that so far from the liquor law being a failure in Maine, it was a decided success; and while there were cases at Portland of evasion of the laws, it was, on the whole, well sustained.

Mr. WILKES said that the time taken in getting up the enormous petitions to the House justified the time spent in discussing the question. He took the view that this question had sometimes not been advanced but injured by unwise and precipitate advocacy. He was pleased to find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross) was not extreme in his views, and was not determined to force the Ministry of the day into the immediate adoption of the principle, whether public opinion were ripe for it or not. That was an answer to those who charged all the advocates of a Prohibitory Liquor Law with being Utopian and extreme. We were also charged not with being extreme, but that if we were sincere we should have a measure placed upon the statute book now. It was his candid opinion that in Ontario a Prohibitory Liquor Law would carry at the polls, for the people felt that the license system had failed, and they would now try prohibition for better or for worse. This discussion if it bore no immediate fruit, would have the effect of awakening public attention to the efforts being put forth in advocating this question. This traffic had a very considerable relation to the electoral system in this country ; and an instance was to be found in the late contest for the mayoralty in Toronto. The license question had been taken to the polls, a temperance candidate had been bought out, the supporters of the liquor traffic had elected their candidate on that account, and not because he was an Orangeman or because of his politics. He need not remind the House that the recent elections in England were effected largely by the Opposition of the liquor sellers to the Permissive Bill, and in this country the same influence worked to a greater a less extent. The light wines of the continent were heavily fortified to make them suitable to the English taste, and he thought the wines thus manufactured should be taxed more heavily than the non-intoxicating wines. He hoped the time was not far distant when this House would deal with the question of prohibition.

Mr. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said there was such a vast amount of suffering throughout the country that they should do all they could to put down this unmitigated evil. The increase in the numbers of persons in our penitentiaries and asylums was to be attributed to the use of liquor. Last summer he had had the honor of addressing a large meeting in his own county and they were in favor of prohibition ; and he was prepared to give a vote on this question in favor of suffering humanity, and without regard to any he might meet with in his county at the next election. He thought the hon. members on the Treasury Benches had sufficient ability and intelligence to devise some scheme to make up any deficiency that might occur in the revenue by the adoption of a prohibitory liquor law as they would have had to do had the Reciprocity Treaty been negotiated. He had stated two or three years ago that the members of this House were "standing upon a whiskey barrel," and he was sorry to have to say that they were standing upon it to-day. The keeper of the restaurant below stairs had stated he could not not succeed unless he could sell intoxicating liquors, but he hoped that would not be permitted. Was the House setting an example to the country in this matter ? He hoped the time was not far distant when this traffic would be abolished at once and forever.

Mr. RYMAL said that for thirty years the minds of the people had been agitated over this matter of prohibition and for twenty years they had by tens and hundreds of thousands been asking for prohibition, and was he to be told they did not know what they were asking for, and that they were not educated upon the question. The supporters of the traffic had all along had the law for their protection, and he now thought it was time for the friends of temperance to have the aid of the law, and then it would be seen how much easier it would be to put down this vice. The licence law had been a failure, admittedly ; but let the friends of total abstinence have the law on their side, and it would be seen if they could enforce it. It should not be forgotten that after the passage of a liquor law the real battle would have to be fought out ; and it was for us to decide whether the real friends of prohibition were to have the law on their side. If they expected with moral suasion and public agitation to secure the passage of the liquor law they might keep on for the next century. Was there any evidence in society to-day that temperance was on the increase ? Were those who gave tone to society temperance men ? Did they find temperance principles governing the hospitalities of the GOVERNOR GENERAL and the Ministers of the Crown ? He recollected receiving the advice that if he wished to be at all times an independant member of Parliament he should seldom put his legs under the mahogany of ministers. He believed until there was a perfect approval of society upon this matter, public opinion would not be thoroughly advocated and ready for the passage of a prohibitory liquor law. The importance of this question was very great, and he would be false to every feeling of his nature if he did not raise his voice on every occasion on behalf of what he considered would be the greatest boon to the people of Canada.

Mr. SCHULTZ said that having an amendment to offer to the motion now before the House, he would briefly state the reasons which led to his moving it. Ever since he had been in Parliament, each successive session had had its discussion on the question of Prohibition. He remembered well how much he was impressed when first he sat in the House with the force of the arguments used in favor of the measure, and the vehemence with which its advocates insisted on its immediate adoption. He felt that should it come to a vote, so many had committed themselves to its support by their utterances in the House that it must carry,and that as carrying it would imply the necessity for the Government providing five millions of revenue in some other way, he looked at the Treasury Benches expecting to find that anxiety in the faces of Ministers, natural to men shortly to be called upon to meet such an emergency. Anxiety there was evidently none of however. Ministers wore that placid expression which a fair following and a respectable surplus gives, and he felt fairly puzzled at the earnestness on the one side and the indifference on the other, till the riddle was solved by a friend longer in Parliament than himself explained that it was all right. The question would be by mutual consent avoided, and the matter referred to a committee. On one pretext or another the danger of a direct vote of the House was tided over by the late Government till it came to be looked upon as a necessary annual farce; necessary to be enacted to satisfy the temperance part of the community. Things took a better turn when the new Administration came into power, and to do them justice they had treated the matter in a much fairer manner, and he had understood the Premier to intimate, while advocating the reference of the matter to the Committee of last session, whose report was now before us, that when the House was fully prepared to recommend such a measure the Government would be prepared to meet their views.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said—I made no such statement.

Mr. SCHULTZ said he regretted that he had misunderstood the Premier on this important point, but in any case he felt that the time had now came to obtain a direct expression of opinion from the House in this matter. The Committee to inquire into the working of the law elsewhere had made what seemed to be an able and exhaustive report, the essence of which his hon. friend from West Middlesex had embodied in the motion now under consideration. That motion he fully agreed to in all but its last clause, which seemed to him to leave the matter still indefinite. It proposed to wait for expressions of opinion from outside this House before asking the passing of the Law. He felt that they were sent here to express the opinion of their constituents in this and all other matters affecting the general good, and if additional evidence was needed in regard to outside feeling they had it in the numberless petitions which had been presented session after session. He had no personal object to serve in moving this amendment. He was not a member of any Temperance society, nor had his county sent a single Prohibitive petition. He was simply a convert to the arguments used and so ably urged by the hon. member for West Middlesex and others, who had since he had been in Parliament advocated the measure. Believing, as he had before stated, that the time had come for a direct expression of opinion from the House, and fearing that reference to Committee, which had been fatal to every previous effort to bring the question to a direct issue, he moved, seconded by Mr. White. He moved in amendment to the resolution that the following be substituted for the last paragraph: "That in view of these facts, it is the opinion of this House that a prohibitory liquor law is the only effectual remedy for the evils complained of, and it is the duty of the Government to submit such measure for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable."

AFTER DISCUSSION,

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the amendment was out of order, because it was irregular to give an instruction to a Committee to do a certain act which the Committee would have power to do without an instruction, and the amendment he held to be such an instruction.

Mr. SCHULTZ then altered his amendment to read as follows:—that all the words after "that" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"it be Resolved, That in the opinion of this House a Prohibitory Liquor Law is the only effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance, and that it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable."

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said he thought the course he proposed to adopt was one which would fully meet the present exigencies of the case, and it was simply to ask the House to assent to the proposition that Parliament was prepared to promote such legislation as would prevent the manufacture, sale and importation of intoxicating liquors. He did not ask the House to cast the responsibility of such a measure on the Government. He would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that it was not competent for the mover of the resolution to now move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thereupon moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BUNSTER hoped the debate would not be adjourned, for the question was only simply of political bunkum, introduced by a few hon. members.

Mr. BOWELL said no reasons had been given for the adjournment of the debate. He had no doubt, however, in his own mind as to the cause for adjournment. He did not desire to impute motives, but he had no hesitation in saying that the motion for adjourning the debate at this late hour, after the whole evening had been spent in discussing the question, was done for the purpose of burking it. The House was as well prepared now as it would be a fortnight hence, after sixteen caucuses had been held, to come to a direct vote on the subject. The country was as well prepared now as it would be ten years hence, to decide whether it would have a prohibitory law, for the question had been discussed since he was a boy, and was agitated every year. The question should be left to the Government to grapple with. He did not say that if the motion passed, the Government shall bring down a scheme this session; but if the House was in favor of a prohibitory liquor law, let hon. members express that opinion, and during the recess the Government will have ample time to prepare a scheme to the House next session.

Mr. MASSON reminded the House that during previous debates the Opposition had asked for the adjournment of the debate at a late hour, and it had been refused. The motion for adjournment was now made by the Premier, that the Government might consider what action they would adopt.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was for no such purpose. He did not move the adjournment as leader of the Government, but in the exercise of his privileges as a member of the House. But he could see that hon. gentlemen opposite could not even discuss the temperance question without the political element cropping in. The chagrin and vexation upon the faces of hon. members who had moved, seconded and supported the amendment showed that they cared nothing about temperance principles; they cared simply to embarrass the Government if they could, and they could not do it in that House.

Mr. ROSS said he fully accepted the responsibility of moving the adjournment of the debate. The hon. member for Bothwell and other hon. members desired to speak, and he would therefore certainly object to the debate on such an important question being cut short.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said it was quite obvious that the whole question was changed by the amendment which gave the discussion a political turn, affirming as it did that it was the duty of the Government to deal with the question. The debate should, therefore, be adjourned.

Mr. MASSON called attention to the fact that the Government had sprung a motion on the House during the New Brunswick School Law discussion, and refused to allow adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FARROW expressed himself prepared to vote upon the question, and opposed the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SCHULTZ could not allow this question to go to a vote without entering his protest against the rude manner in which the Premier had assailed those who favoured the amendment. It was entirely uncalled for, and he challenged any man to state whether or not he knew the substance of the amendment. It had been determined upon by him (Mr. SCHULTZ) five days before. He showed it to nobody except the head of the temperance body in this city, and took advice from nobody in this House on the subject. Its being seconded by the hon. member for Hastings was entirely an accident. If he (Mr. SCHULTZ) had known the hon. member for Annapolis would have seconded it he would have asked him to do so, because he wished to keep politics out of this matter He hoped in future the Premier would find some better means of expressing his views. He would thereby secure to himself the friends he had, and mollify the opposition to his Government.

Mr. PATERSON said it must have struck every one in this House as very unfortunate that the hon. member for Lisgar had not consulted with the hon. member for West Middlesex, the recognized leader in this movement, before offering this amendment.

The motion to adjourn the debate was carried on a division, and the House adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 16th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIN introduced a Bill respecting the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal Company, which was read a first time.

THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DYMOND in the chair, to consider the following resolutions :—

1. That it is expedient to amend and consolidate the Laws respecting the North-West Territories, the Government thereof, the Administration of Justice therein, and other matters relating thereto.

2. That it is expedient to provide that salaries, not exceeding the following amounts per annum, may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada to the following officers to be appointed under the Act to be passed in the behalf aforesaid :—

To the Lieutenant Governor, not exceeding	$7,000
To each Stipendiary Magistrate, not exceeding	3,000
To two Members of Council, each, not exceeding	1,000
To the Clerk of the Council, who shall also act as, and perform the duties of Secretary to the Lieutenant Governor, not exceeding	1,800
To the Clerk of the Court of each District, not exceeding	500
To the Sheriff for the said Territories, not exceeding	1,200
To a Registrar of Deeds for the same, (to be recouped by Fees and Registration) not exceeding	2,000

Mr. KIRKPATRICK — How many Stipendiary Magistrate will there be ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Three.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions which were concurred in.

CASK MARKS.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION moved the second reading of Bill to compel persons delivering merchantable liquids in casks, to mark on such casks the capacity thereof. —Carried.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, Mr. FORBES in the chair.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said the Bill contained no provision for marking ullages in casks not quite full.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said the object of the Bill was to mark the capacity of the cask, and not the amount of the contents which might be in it.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

LIFE INSURANCE INSPECTION.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of a Bill respecting Life Insurance Companies and Companies doing business other than Fire and Inland Marine. He explained that the object of the Bill was to enable the Superintendent of Insurance, who is to be appointed under the other Insurance Bill before the House, to examine into the solvency of life insurance companies. That would be his sole duty, and he would be directed to estimate their assets at the rate of five per cent. per annum. In Massachusetts the rate fixed was 4½ per cent., but in this country we could fairly make it a little higher. In England it was a little lower. It was not proposed to alter the existing law in any respect except to subject these companies to inspection. Life Insurance was more complicated than Fire and Marine, and the Government had decided not to deal with it in general manner for the present.

Mr. WOOD said Life Insurance was more important than either Fire or Marine. There was a large amount of money invested in these companies for the benefit of widows and orphans, and the Government should see that they were rendered safe.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said this Bill met his hon. friend's wishes to a great extent as regards their solvency.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, Mr. WOOD in the chair.

Mr. YOUNG asked why five per cent. had been adopted. Most companies calculated upon 4½ per cent., and certainly ½ per cent would make a considerable difference on the total.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON thought most securities held by these companies bear a higher rate than 4½ per cent., and many of them higher than five. He thought that was the best rate. It was the rate which most of the loans located by the Dominion for some years past bear, and he thought that would be found a justification for fixing the rate at five per cent.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said a lower rate would have discriminated against Canadian companies.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it would have made Canadian companies look less favorable in the eyes of the public than they really were. Some United States companies doing business in the Dominion had their caculations based at six per cent., and it made their statements of affairs look more favorable than they should be. If the rate in Canada were the same as in Massachusetts, it would make our companies look still more unfavorable. It was quite compatible with the safety of our own companies, and the rate could not well be made less. The hon. member for Cardwell, who was deeply interested in this Bill and connected with a very successful Canadian company, was satisfied with this rate.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill. Third reading to-morrow.

SALARIES OF SUPREME COURT JUDGES.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. FOURNIER, the House went into Committee of the Whole on certain resolutions respecting salaries proposed to be paid to the Chief Justice and Judges mentioned in the Bill to establish a Supreme Court—Mr. LAFLAMME in the chair.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said he had been informed from all sides of the House that the salaries proposed in the Bill were too low, and that the Government would on that ground have very great difficulty in the composition of the court. He, therefore, proposed to amend the resolutions by proposing that the salary of the Chief Justice be $8,000 and the puisne Judges $7,000 each, thus placing them on the same footing as the salaries of Ministers of the Crown.

Mr. SCATCHERD said he was opposed to the salaries of the court altogether, and hought the Government would have done better to have deferred till next session at least any action in the matter as their predecessors had done. The Dominion had got on so far without a Supreme Court; there was no demand for it; and its establishment on the scale proposed would cause dissatisfaction throughout the country. At the very start the court would require $43,000 for salaries of Judges alone, and there would be the salaries of other officials besides. A public Court House and other buildings would be required, and $100,000 would soon be expended. The country did not expect this from a Reform Government, it was Reform in the wrong direction.

The resolutions were reported.

SUPREME COURT.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved the second reading of the Bill to establish a Supreme Court and a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion of Canada. He said it was only proposed at the present time to discuss the principles of the Bill, and then refer it to a Committee of the Whole to which amendments might be submitted.

Mr. PALMER said as the Bill was one of very great importance to the whole Dominion it was desirable that it should be framed so as to effectually meet all requirements. He had several serious objections to the Bill as drafted. The first to the sixteenth sections provided for the formation of the court, and then followed provisions with regard to its appellate jurisdiction and onwards to the 35th clause were provisions as to the different modes of procedure to the guidance of persons coming to the court with appealed cases. He did not object to a Supreme Court of Appeal, but his opinion was that such a court ought to confine itself entirely to matters of appeal and should have no original jurisdiction whatever. The second objection he took was that having created this Court of Appeal it was of the greatest importance that where matters by way of appeal were carried from so many courts of different jurisdictions and different modes of procedure the most simple and general form of appeal should be adopted. There was no necessity whatever for any writs of error or other mode of procedure than one simply applicable to all cases. He would direct attention to the fact that the procedure he suggested would be a simple notice given to the opposite party filed in two different courts with proper security or other preliminary requisites that might be considered expedient before the right of appeal would attack. One point was lost sight of entirely in the Bill which was this—that we could not do away with the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for it was not within the power of Parliament to do so. By section 17 the right of appeal was given when the amount reached $1,000; but this should be altered so as to give the right of appeal when the sum was that amount, and also in cases where the importance seemed to demand it. There was also a set of clauses connecting with section 58 to which he could not agree. Their object was that when a question arose in any court in the different Provinces in which the question of the validity or ultra vires of the particular and of the Local Legislatures or of the Dominion Parliament was raised, it immediately removed the jurisdiction from that court and forced the litigant in the Supreme Court which would only hold its sittings at Ottawa. As every lawyer of experience knew, that would cause great hardship. The clauses from 58 to 62 which had reference to the Exchequer Court were entirely unnecessary. A grave mistake had been made in making provision in the Bill for such a court. He believed there was ample jurisdiction in the different Provinces for deciding Exchequer cases, and for dealing with them more conveniently and at less expense than before the proposed court. Another powerful argument against the creation of an Exchequer Court was the fact that if this court were created for original jurisdiction, there was necessarily no appeal from it. Of course the parties might appeal before the same Judges but that would be unsatisfactory. Another objection was the provision made for the residence of all the Judges to be at Ottawa, while a more advantageous arrangement would be to have them residing in the capitals of the other Provinces, where they could hear preliminary matters in Chambers. There was no reason, moreover why the terms of the court should not be held in rotation at the different chief cities.

Mr. TASCHEREAU said the vast importance of this measure, the great interest which it may effect, especially in the Province of Quebec, would well form an excuse for a young member of this House like him to take part in this debate. But in taking the floor he would confine himself to making a few remarks with respect to a part only of the Bill now before them; the general principle of which he fully approved and acquiesced in. He had mentioned the Province of Quebec as being especially interested in this discussion. This interest arises out of the civil appellate jurisdiction proposed to be given to the Supreme Court, and of the peculiar position of that Province with regard to her institutions and her laws compared with those of the other Provinces. Situated as she is, no Province in the Dominion is so greatly interested as our own in the passage of the Act now under discussion, and which before many days are over, will form a most important chapter in the statute books of the Dominion. Far from him was the least intention of speaking in a sectional point of view, of raising any kind of prejudice. But they had as legislators to deal with facts, and facts he intended to submit to their consideration, if the House could give him a moment's attention. They had in Quebec their own laws of real estate, own testamentary and succession laws, their own laws respecting marriage community, marriage contracts and dower, their laws of contracts, and laws of procedure. Even our commercial laws were distinct from those of the other Provinces, except as regards evidence. In a word, they have their good old French laws which had been secured to us by solemn treaties, laws of which they were so proud, and under which their forefathers had lived so happy, and he might add, so loyal, under the protection of the British Crown. All these laws had a few years ago been codified by the most eminent jurists of their Province, and at the present time their two Codes of Civil Law and of Civil Procedure could well bear the comparison with the French modern Napoleon Codes. The English speaking citizens of Lower Canada had long been accustomed to see their civil rights governed by these laws, they had learned to admire and cherish them, and they were now perhaps as firmly attached to them as the French Canadian population was. In fact he hoped to see the day when all their sister Provinces, seeing the perfectness of their Codes, would adopt them as their laws of the land. But the more they were attached to their dear old laws, to their own legal machinery, so different, so widely different from the system of the other Provinces, the more they were inclined to see a danger in all innovations proposed, in all new jurisdictions which were intended to be established, and he thought he was not going too far when he said that when a Supreme Tribunal of Appeal was proposed to be created outside their Province, composed of Judges, the great majority of whom would be unfamiliar with the civil laws of Quebec, which tribunal would be called upon to revise and would have the power to reverse the decisions of all their Quebec Courts, there was, for them at least, cause for alarm, if not a danger, a great danger to be apprehended. He would perhaps be told that the same anomaly exists, that the same danger is constantly impending over them by the exercise of the right of appeal to the Queen's Privy Council in England. True, the appeal to the Privy Council had often proved fatal to suitors who had succeeded in all their courts, and sometimes by the unanimous voice of all their Judges in Lower Canada. True, some of the decisions of the Privy Council had been rendered contrary to the plainest principles of their civil law ; but this evil had been, and is a necessary, an inevitable one. The right of appeal to the Privy Council could not be prevented, except by Imperial legislation, and moreover it could be exercised only in cases where the amount or value of the thing demanded exceeded £500 sterling. Because of a danger they could not escape from, it might properly be asked if they were now justified in accepting, in fact in creating, another evil, the necessity of which was not felt, and with the fact before them that the right of appeal to England would still be preserved and exercised, over and above the appeal to the Supreme Court. Of course his remarks applied to the Bill now under discussion, in so far only as regarded the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in civil cases coming from the Province of Quebec. He did not intend to contest the desirability, nor even the necessity, of the creation of a Supreme Court and of an Exchequer Court for all the other purposes indicated in the Bill. As regarded their civil cases, he humbly thought that the people of their Province were quite satisfied with the different degrees of jurisdiction now existing in Quebec. It was a well known fact that their court of last resort, the Court of Queen's Bench, was now so composed as to inspire full confidence and respect. Of the decisions of this high and enlightened tribunal, the Bill proposed that an appeal will lie to the Supreme Court in all cases where the amount or value of the thing demanded shall exceed $1,000 currency. Well, how would these cases be disposed of? Out of six Judges who would compose the Supreme Court, he did not expect that their own Province would be represented by more than two Judges, and our own population, the French Canadian element, by more than one Judge perhaps. Without alluding for the present to the unfairness of this proportion, if it was adopted, and without insisting now on the fact that their population was about one-fourth of the population of the whole Dominion, he would content himself with laying down this proposition:—one of two things. Either the two Judges from Quebec would, in fact, control the whole Court in the decision of civil cases coming from Lower Canada, and in that case the authority of their Court of Queen's Bench, composed of five Judges, would be superseded by that of two Judges, who could not be possibly more competent than the members of their Court of Appeals, and might possibly be inferior to them. And, moreover, in that case, the two Judges from Quebec might differ one from the other, and then the decision of the case would rest altogether with the other members of the court, unfamiliar with their laws and customs. Or, in the other supposition, the entire court will presume to hear and judge their civil cases, and then their two Judges, although agreeing together, might find themselves in a minority, and then they should find perhaps the decision of all their Lower Canada courts, of all their Lower Canada Judges, reversed by Judges of other Provinces. The truth, the exact truth of this proposition could not be denied, and the danger to which he drew their attention was too apparent and too imminent to be overlooked. If it were possible (and he made this suggestion with all due respect), to increase the number of the Judges of the Supreme Court so as to allow their Province a representation of three, then it could be enacted that for the decision of civil cases from Quebec, a sub-division of the court, composed of only the Judges from Quebec, or of a majority of them, would take cognizance of these cases. This would be at least a safe-guard against one of the evils of the system. Another objection to the proposed appeal is this :—Their country people, their farmers, who owned the soil, who were exposed to frequent and most important litigation, could generally well afford the costs of and appeal to the court of Queen's Bench. But he doubted very much if they could, in most cases, and without ruin to themselves and their families, go a further step and sustain the burden of another appeal to the Supreme Court, while a rich, and perhaps dishonest, neighbor could always force them to advocate once more their just rights before that tribunal, at comparatively enormous costs. He desired now to mention the very grave doubts which had been expressed as regarded the constitutionality of the measure in so far as appeals to the Supreme Court in civil cases were allowed. These doubts for his part he could not help entertaining, and he ventured most humbly to express them. Under the heading "Power of Parliament of Canada," he found in the "British North America Act of 1867," clause 91, as fol lows :—"It shall be lawful for the QUEEN, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated. The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters. Such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces. And any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature, comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces." So the only legislation the Parliament of Canada can make with regard to Common Law is a legislation in Criminal Law and Procedure in criminal matters. Clause 92, under the heading "Executive Powers of Provincial Legislatures," reads as follows : "In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter mentioned : Property and civil rights in the Province ; The administration of Justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of Provincial Courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts ; generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province." Now clause 101 is the one under which it is pretended we possess the necessary powers to pass this measure with all its provisions. It reads as follows : "The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada." If he read this clause well, they could not do more than constitute, maintain and organize a General Court of Appeal for Canada and for the better administration of the laws of Canada. Now the civil laws of Quebec were not laws of Canada. He did not see that they possessed the power to give to that court jurisdiction over cases coming under the civil laws of a particular Province, because this would interfere with property and civil rights, and procedure in civil matters, which by clause 92 were within the exclusive powers of Provincial Legislatures. He could not convince himself that the "power to provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a court" means and includes the power to give jurisdiction to that court over matters exclusively within the powers of the Provincial Legislatures, by the British North American Act. On the contrary, he believed that having once constituted and organized the court, and that court being maintained by us, they had nothing more to do, and the legislative powers were exhausted. It remained then with, and belongs to the Provincial Legislatures to determine in their respective Provinces what class of cases under civil law can be submitted to that court. Any other interpretation of the British North American Act seems to me a serious interference with their Provincial rights. He submitted these remarks in justice to his Province, but in a most friendly spirit, and with all the respect he owed and the confidence he reposed in the hon. framer of the Bill, the Minister of Justice. He (Mr. TASCHEREAU) trusted that the hon. gentleman would give them the consideration which he thought they deserved.

Mr. MILLS said he purposed to invite the attention of the House to the provisions of this Bill relative to the appelate jurisdiction to be given to this court. It was proposed to embrace many things which in his opinion it should have no jurisdiction over. He said this with considerable diffidence, because not only the Minister of Justice, but his right hon. predecessor, entertained a different opinion. It seemed to him (Mr. MILLS) that under the section in the constitution relating to this question, no such jurisdiction could be conferred. In a preceding section provision was made for the constitution of the various courts, not only for the administration of the laws of Canada, but also for the administration of the laws of the Provinces. In this section provision was made for the administration of the laws of Canada if it should become necessary to establish courts specially for that puopose. The word Canada occurred three times in this section. In the first it referred to the Parliament of Canada, and no one would suppose that the term included the legislative functions enjoyed by the Provinces as well as the functions exercised by the two branches of the Legislature here. The word was used the second time in reference to a Court of Appeal for Canada, and the third time it referred to the better administration of the laws of Canada. What was to be understood by this expression? Did the "laws of Canada" include not only the laws enacted in the Federal Parliament but also those of the Local Legislatures? It seemed to him no one would for a moment say it could have that meaning. The word Canada was used in every instance for the purpose of defining some other word or expression. It seemed to him that this expression "a general Court of Appeal for Canada" meant a Court of Appeal having cognizance of questions arising under the legislation of this Parliament and not on any question that might arise under the jurisdiction of any one of the Provinces. What was the design of this section? Under a sort of partnership arrangement the Local Legislatures constituted the courts and defined their jurisdiction and the Government of Canada had the power of appointing Judges. There might be such a thing under this arrangement as Local Legislatures refusing to make provisions for giving effect to the laws of Canada, and the power was retained to Canada, notwithstanding the previous provisions of this Act to establish besides this Court of Appeal such additional courts as might be necessary for the better administration of the laws of Canada. What was the object of the Court of Appeal? Was it that the laws in New Brunswick should have precisely the same construction as those of Ontario? Not at all! The New Brunswick law did operate in Ontario. If the people of New Brunswick were satisfied with the construction put upon the laws of that Province they would administrate them as construed; if dissatisfied their Local Legislature would change the law to suit their wishes. Therefore there was no propriety in giving to the law in New Brunswick precisely the same construction given to the local law in Ontario or any other of the Provinces, but that did not apply to the law of Canada. It was of very great consequence that the laws of Canada operating over the entire Dominion should receive the same construction in all the Provinces. In order that they might receive an uniform interpretation, where interpretations were given, it was necessary there should be a court of final resort for determining the construction of Canadian Acts of Parliament. It seemed to him for that this court was intended. It was said by the Minister of Justice that if it was intended to make this Court of Appeal for Canada alone, the word "general" would not have been embraced. Without this it might have been in the power of a Government dissatisfied with the administration of the laws in a particular Province to establish a Court of Appeal for that particular Province. This section prevented that, and provided that any Court of Appeal established must be general. It could not be a Court of Appeal for a particular class of cases in New Brunswick, and not a Court of Appeal, for a similar class of cases in every other Province as well as New Brunswick. In this respect it was the same as the third article of the United States Constitution. There it was stated the United States should have power to vest judicial functions in the Supreme Court, to embrace matters affecting the States as well as the Federal Government. This was construed to apply over the entire territory, and cases growing out of legislation, either of Congress or of particular States, should be appealed to that court. But this was a special provision of the Constitution of the United States. There was in our Constitution, however, no special arrangement by which a particular case growing out of the Provincial law could be brought before this court. This was a court not for the Provinces, but a general Court of Appeal for Canada, and it could not be seen in this section how the word Canada was used. It was meant to embrace the entire Dominion; but only those subjects lying within certain limits. It no more applied to the existence of legislative functions of the Provinces, than if the Provinces and the powers which they possessed had no existence whatever. The preamble of the British North America Act declares that our union is to be a union on a Federal basis. As some hon. gentlemen had charitably accused him of too great attachment to American authority, he would not quote an American authority but a very high English authority—Mr. FREEMAN. It would be remembered that although the United States might serve as an example of Federal Government, it was not the only Federal Government in existence; and when our constitution said the union was to be on a Federal basis a construction must be put upon it that would render it consistent with that declaration. He thought they would admit it was a sound interpretation that wherein any fundamental law a general principle was laid down, and there were exceptions to that principle, the general principle should receive a large construction and the exceptions should be strictly construed. Mr. FREEMAN said:—

"Two requisites seem necessary to constitute a Federal Government in this its most perfect form. On the one hand each of the members of the Union must be wholly independent in those matters which concern each member only. On the other hand, all must be subject to a common power in those matters which concern the whole body of members collectively. Thus each member will fix for itself the laws of its criminial jurisprudence and even the details of its political constitution. And it will do this, not as a matter of privilege or concession from any higher power, but as a matter of absolute right, by virtue of its inherent powers as an indepent commonwealth. But in all matters which concern the general body, the sovereignity of the several members will cease. Each member is perfectly independent within its own sphere; but there is another sphere in which its independence, or rather its separate existence vanishes."

When he looked at the provisions of this Supreme Court Bill he found it stood in antagonism to this general principle. He considered the Federal principle of the union should be applied to the three departments of Govern ment, the legislative, the executive and the judicial; and he asked the House whether the Federal principle was properly applied to the judicial department by this Bill. They did not claim to legislate upon matters belonging to the Local Legislatures any more than they would admit the Local Legislatures to trespass upon their functions. But in this Bill the whole judicial department was treated as though this was a Legislative Union, for the Bill not only gave the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction with regard to the due administration of the Dominion laws, but also appellate jurisdiction in matters of local concern. It was to have appellate jurisdiction over the smallest as well as the highest courts, as if this were a legislative and not a Federal union. As a matter of policy he thought this measure was highly objectionable. It might be laid down as a general principle that courts to be successful must be familiar with the working of the law itself. Every court is disposed to lay down general principles and particularly to depend upon those who have decided cases before them. If a court were called upon to decide under a law, with the administration of which it was not familiar, it would as a consequence lay down general principles the bearing upon which it did not foresee. This would be precisely the position of this Appelate Court. It would be established at Ottawa, and composed of members of the bar, some of whom would have no pratical knowledge of the administration of the laws of the courts ; and before them would come lawyers who were in the same position. Then there was another objection as to which members of the bar could speak more accurately than he could, but he believed that Judges that had little to do would become rusty in their profession, and would be precisely in the same position as a retired lawyer. Those courts had ever been the most successful in the administration of the laws who had constantly to interpret, construe and give effect to them. Under this Bill cases would be taken from local Judges, who knew all about them, to Judges who did not know anything about the circumstances and principles of the administration of their laws ; and on this ground as a matter of politics and pratice, it was objectionable. Let him suppose an ejectment case taken in appeal from the Court of the Queen's Bench at Toronto to the Supreme Court at Ottawa. Would they be likely to be more competent in construing the law than the Ontario Judges. If they overturned the decision of the local courts, and if the country agreed with the view of the local courts, sympathy would be felt at once, and there would be an endeavor in Ontario to amend the law and to give it the construction that had been put upon it by the courts of their own Province. It was of very great importance to the country to have cheap and speedy notice. We should not put it into the power of the rich man to worry the poor man with constant appeals, but that would be done by this Bill. It would be better that there should be an occasional misinterpretation of the law than that its administration should be made slow and expensive. He thought they ought not to give appellate jurisdiction to this court with regard to local matters, because in doing so they would seriously interfere with the speedy administration of justice. He would beg to call the attention of the House to a few observations on this matter by a very high American authority during the discussion of the question of the establishment of their courts. Mr. WEBSTER said :—

" In the first place, it appears to me that such an intercourse as the Judges of the Supreme Court are enabled to have with the profession, and with the people, in their respective circuits, is itself an object of no inconsiderable importance. It naturally inspires respect and confidence, and it produces a reciprocal communication of information through, all the branches of the judicial department. This leads to a harmony of opinion and of action. The Supreme Court, by itself is in some measure insulated ; it has not frequent occasions of contract with the community. The bar that attends it is neither numerous nor regular in its attendance. The gentlemen who appear before it, in the character of counsel, come for the occasion, and depart with the occasion. The profession is occupied mainly in the objects which engage it in its own domestic forums ; it belongs to the States, and their tribunals furnish its constant and principal theatre. If the Judges of the Supreme Court, therefore, are wholly withdrawn from the circuits, it appears to me there is danger of leaving them without the means of useful intercourse with other judicial characters, with the profession of which they are members, and with the public. But, without pursuing these general reflections, I would say, in the second place, that I think it useful that Judges should see in practice the operation and effect of their own decisions. This will prevent theory from running too far, or refining too much. But further, Sir, I must take the liberty of saying, that, in regard to the judicial office, constancy of employment is of itself, in my judgment, a good and a great good. I appeal to the conviction of the whole profession, if, as a general rule, they do not find that those Judges who, decide most cases decide them best. Exercise strengthens and sharpens the faculties in this more than in almost any other employment. I would have the judicial office filled by him who is wholly a Judge, always a Judge, and nothing but a Judge. With proper seasons, of course, for recreation and repose, his serious thoughts should all be turned to his official duties ; he should be omnis in hoc. There is not, Sir, an entire revolution wrought in the mind of a professional man, by appointing him a Judge. He is still a lawyer ; and if he have but little to do as a Judge, he is, in effect, a lawyer out of practice. And how is it, Sir, with lawyers who are not Judges, and are yet out of practice ? Let the opinion and common practice of mankind decide this. If you require professional assistance in whatever relates to your reputation, your property or your family, do you go to him who is retired from the bar, and who has uninterrupted leisure to pursue his readings and reflections, or do you address yourself to him, on the contrary, who is in the midst of affairs, busy every day, and every hour in the day, with professional pursuits ? But I will not follow the topic further, nor dwell on this part of the case."

These were the opinions of a very high authority, which were in perfect accord with the views that have been expressed with regard to the policy of this law. He thought it would be a very great mistake for the Minister of Justice to persist in retaining in his Bill the provisions conferring upon this court appellate jurisdiction in local matters, and taking away from those daily engaged in the construing of such law, and who had been trained to it, and putting the cases under the final supervision of those who did not belong to that system, and who were utter strangers to it, and like lawyers out of practice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD inquired if the hon. member for Bothwell held that if a Provincial Court decided inter partes in a local question, whether that question arose under a Dominion or a Provincial Statute, whether it should be based on a Provincial Statute.

Mr. MILLS said that if based upon a Dominion Statute there would be an appeal.

Mr. IRVING said the question was one that was surrounded by peculiarly complicated features, but still he thought it was one which should be discussed by practical men, who were endeavoring to give to the country such a measure as it required, though owing to its importance nobody supposed that a question which had engaged the attention of the Imperial Parliament for many years could be satisfactorily disposed of by us in one session, and even when it had finally passed this Parliament he thought experience would show that many changes and amendments would be necessary. The thought the result of many years' study of this question in England had been that if possible there should be one set of courts of primary jurisdiction and one of final and conclusive appellate jurisdiction. There were other features which to his mind which should be embraced in the plan and which might ultimately be attained, and which he thought were great points to have in view. One was to leave to to the Provinces their own courts of primary jurisdiction, and after that we should build up a Supreme Court, while the Provinces shonld be content to abandon and abolish their own courts of intermediate appeal. The two larger Provinces stood alike in regard to courts of intermediate appeal, but he believed the other Provinces had no such courts, and from those courts there was an ultimate appeal to the Privy Council. This will give suitors of all the Provinces the right to appeal to the Supreme Court here, but in the larger Provinces they could first go through their own courts of intermediate appeal, giving them an additional Court of Appeal. He considered it a fatal feature in the Bill, that it did not compel the courts of any of the Provinces to come to this court but left it optional with them, or to go direct to England—a course which he thought would not be satisfactory to the people. It would simply be making additional expense by giving an additional Court of Appeal if it were not made compulsory to come to that Court. Then, with respect to the extent of business. Suppose that the Supreme Court of Appeal could attract to it the appellate business, wholly irrespective of the intermediate Courts of Appeal, it still would not have sufficient business to occupy the whole year. For the past four or five years the average number of days during which the Court of Error and Appeal in Ontario had been occupied was twenty. In some years the number was fifteen, in others as high as thirty-one or thirty-two, but the average, including days on which the court sat to gsve judgement, would not exceed twenty days. In Quebec he was told by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that the average sittings of the Appeal Court was forty-five days—so that the whole appeal business of those two Provinces would not occupy more than sixty-five days. He did not now refer to the other Provinces whose business was necessarily small. But the Supreme Court could not draw that business. The only business which we expect to find attracted to this court was that which at present goes to the Privy Council in England which was a mere bagatelle. In Ontario during the last four or five years only two cases had been carried to England and looking back on the last twenty-five years the hon. member for Cardwell would not be able to count more than eight or ten appeals to England from Ontario. In the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, taking the evidence given by the member for St. John there was scarcely ever an appeal to England. In the Province of Quebec he admitted that the case was otherwise, but was the sole object of creating a Supreme Court to hear the few cases which would otherwise be sent to England? If so the business would be very trifling. And we did not even yet know whether we would be able to catch all the business that now crosses the Atlantic, for it would be almost as easy to go by steam vessel over to England as to come to Ottawa. Then it was proposed to establish a court with six Judges who were all to reside at Ottawa. He would not speak further as to the amount of work that would have to be transacted, he would only say that the extract read by the hon. member for Bothwell represented very clearly his ideas on the subject. He could not, however, imagine a more dismal spectacle than would be afforded by six melancholy men living in this city endeavoring to catch an appeal case, which, but for this Act, would have gone to England. They would become rusty and relapse perhaps into a state of barbarism; they would lose their professional knowledge and the result would be that the court would be such a one as not to command the confidence of the bar, or respect of the people generally. He had now given his objections to the jurisdiction of the court as a Court of Appeal, and he would now venture to point out his objections to the constitution of the court. He agreed partially with the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell with respect to the necessity of the Judges being in constant intercourse with the bar—we cannot have a bench unless we have a bar. The hon. member for Cardwell and other leading members of the Ontario bar, the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier, the hon. member for St. John and others, would come to Ottawa by one train, argue their cases, and leave by the next train. The bench would not be known to the bar generally, and it was absurd to suppose that the members of the bar would congregate here. The leading members of the bar were to be found at Montreal, Toronto, Halifax and St. John; and it was impossible to attract men to towns where there is no businsss. While the hon. member for Bothwell pointed out objections to the Bill, he did not offer any solution of the difficulty. He (Mr. IRVING) did not know whether he would be able satisfactorily to do so, but he would make the attempt, as the hon. Minister of Justice had invited the co-operation of hon. members with a view to obtain a perfect measure. His view was that, as we had already courts which were doing the business of the country very efficiently, we should to some extent, auxiliarise that judicial strength in order to launch the Supreme Court. We were all very much in the habit of praising our own possessions; but he believed it was conceded that the bench of Upper Canada, running over the last thirty or forty years, had been an extremely successful bench, one originated almost by a handful of men who by great ability, assiduity, and great knowledge of their profession had earned for the bench of Ontario a character and weight which it would take many years to efface, even should the bench fall into weaker hands, which he did not anticipate. Even though the hon. members for Quebec did not speak always in terms of eulogy in regard to their bench, still he thought he had sufficient knowledge of it to say that there are men on that bench who would be an ornament to any bench of any country, and whose services the Dominion might well enlist on an occasion of this kind. It would be prudent to limit the number of Judges appointed to one or two, who would be Judges of the Supreme Court only, and certain Judges of other Provinces should be utilized in assisting these Supreme Court Judges. He would not particularise the Judges of any particular Province; but in order to deal with the question in a statesmanlike manner, when there was no business to begin with for the Supreme Court to transact, he thought the Government ought to take into it all the judicial talent and ability of the country, even if it could only be done in a tentative way for a few years. If that idea should meet with the approval of the House, he had no doubt the Minister of Justice could elaborate a plan which would prove acceptable to the House generally. He objected to jurisdiction being given to a Court of Exchequer. There was no necessity for it, no quantity of business likely to be brought before it; and as the Provincial Courts already discharge those duties, it was desirable that the Provincial Courts should be strengthened by making as much of them as possible, by confirming to them the jurisdiction that attaches to them, and not remove from them any part of the business, such as Excise, Customs, or Post Office. He objected to the Exchequer Court—the name was an objectionable one—because it would introduce an additional practice, and the tendency of modern practice was to break down the differences of practices, and, if possible, have a uniform practice in the country. If, therefore, it was the policy of Parliament to strengthen the courts of primary jurisdiction, and in the strongest way build up a Supreme Court, then we may, by winning the confidence of the Provinces, induce them to abolish their intermediate Courts of Appeal. His intention was to prepare some amendments which he would move when the House was in Committee on the Bill, and they would include amendments with respect to appeals to England, the Constitution of the Court by auxiliarising Provincial Judges, and with respect to abolishing the proposed Exchequer jurisdiction. With respect to appeals to England, he would propose to abolish the rights of Provincial Courts to give an appeal to England.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD — You cannot do that.

Mr. IRVING said he was prepared to discuss the point. He would compel the parties appealing from the Provincial Courts to go before the Supreme Court. He proposed to declare that the judgment of that Supreme Court would be final; that there should be no appeal to any Statutory Court in England, that was any court having an appelate jurisdiction by statute, which he thought the Dominion Parliament had power to enact, but saving the prerogative right of the Sovereign to hear any appeal to Her in Council, because he had found there was a distinction between an appeal to the Sovereign in Council and an appeal to the Appeal Court in the sense of the Judical Committee of the Privy Council. He regretted at being compelled to offer those views which differed so widely from the Government Bill as introduced, but the Government were very strong with a majority of seventy or eighty in the House. He believed the hon. member for Kingston was about to support the Bill, and therefore the Government was in no danger from any remark he (Mr. IRVING) might make. It had been a very dreary session with little for the members of the back benches to do, and therefore he thought a little dressing would do the Government no harm.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—So my hon. friend would not oppose the Bill if he thought he had any chance of succeeding.

Mr. CURRIER was gratified to learn from the hon. gentleman who had just spoken that the six Judges to be appointed would not actually relapse into barbarism by coming in contact with the society of Ottawa. It would be something new for the people of this part of the country to hear that this city was a place of no business whatever. Ottawa had as much business as Quebec, Toronto or Kingston.

The Bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole, to-morrow.

Mr. MOSS hoped there would be further discussion of the very important questions raised by the hon. member for Montmagny and Bothwell. It was true the late Minister of Justice and the present one had concurred in the opinion that there was no doubt of the jurisdiction of this Parliament to establish an appellate court which should have power to revise the proceedings of Provincial Courts, even in matters relating to the operation of local law, or founded upon Provincial Statutes. The question appeared to him to be one of very grave doubt, one which should be discussed fully and one which hon. gentlemen, both professional and lay, were entitled to hear the views of those who had maturely considered the question, before being asked to vote upon it. The first question raised by the hon. member for Montmagny and Bothwell was whether or not there was power in this Parliament to establish a court which should have jurisdiction to revise or review the proceedings of Provincial Courts upon questions of purely local law, and the second question was whether or not, if the power existed, it was expedient at present to invoke its exercise. He agreed entirely with the general principles that had been enunciated by both hon. gentlemen with regard to the distribution of powers among the several branches of the Federated Government. There could be no question that all sound principle pointed to the propriety of Provincial Courts being the final tribunals to determine questions of purely local law. All considerations of convenience pointed to that conclusion. The hon. member for Bothwell had pointed out in a very strong way some of the inconveniences that might result from the adoption of different courts. This Bill itself indicated very strongly inconveniences that might arise. For instance, an appeal is given in actions of ejectment under this Act. Now, in an action of ejectment, the rights of parties in the vast majority of cases—in all cases, he might say, except where the rights of the Crown were involved—must be governed by the local law, and it was hardly to be assumed that a Court of Appeal for the Dominion, however carefully constituted, would be composed of Judges who would have the same experience of the laws relating to a particular Province that the Judges of the highest court of that Province must be presumed to possess. Then, as another inconvenience that might arise if this view of the law was to prevail, it was to be observed that appeal was given in the case of decisions of Provincial courts respecting municipal by-laws. Whether a Provincial court quashes or upholds a municipal by-law, its decision is subject to appeal to this court. That opens the door to an anomaly referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell. The Legislature of a Province establishes a municipal system. It confers certain powers upon the municipalities. In the presumed exercise of these powers, a municipality passes a certain enactment. The court of the Province determines that it is beyond the power of the municipality, and accordingly quashes the by-law. An appeal is taken to the court at Ottawa, and that court, constituted under the authority of the Dominion, determines that the decision of the Provincial court was erroneous, and that the action of the municipality was within the scope of its authority. What is the consequence? The Legislature of the Province takes up the question and considers whether or not it be in the interests of the Province that the municipality should or should not have such power, and the anomaly is presented of the Legislature of a Province immediately proceeding to reverse a rule laid down by the Supreme Court. Nay, he did not know anything that would necessarilly prevent them passing a law settling the construction of the statute. These were very serious anomalies, but, after all, their existence did not go to the root of the question. While he was pressed by these considerations and by the arguments of the hon. member for Bothwell, and felt the full force of the objections that hon. gentleman had brought forward to the establishment of such a system, he (Mr. Moss) felt compelled to ask himself one question in endeavoring to form an opinion. That one question must be, after all, whether in the British North America Act the constitution of the courts was provided for in such wide terms that whatever might be these anomalies and inconveniences, this Legislature had the power to give the large jurisdiction claimed. In other words, the single question, after all, must be not what would have been the best form in which to have placed this act, but what was the true interpretation of the British North America Act upon this point. Now, he confessed, he entertained considerable doubt upon this question, but the best opinion he could form was adverse to that so ably presented by the hon. member for Bothwell. However inconvenient it might be, it would be found in this statute that the Imperial Legislature had given to the Legislature of the Dominion power to establish a Court of Appeal which should have jurisdiction to revise the decisions of all the Provincial Courts. He could in no other way read all the sections of the Act. On a former occasion he had endeavored to point out that our Confederation was not precisely similar to the United States system. That consideration had some bearing on the question now before the House. Under our system larger powers were existent in the various branches of the Dominion Government than were existent in the United States Government. He need not repeat to the House what he said on that occasion, but it would be manifest that it had a bearing upon the question whether or not the British North America Act should have been intended to give to the Court of Appeal to be constituted under that Act, jurisdiction over Provincial Courts. When this Act was passed there were various Provincial Courts in existence, and the Imperial Legislature was providing for the administration of justice generally. It proceeded to distribute the legislative powers. It first specified the powers which should be possessed by the Parliament of Canada. The Imperial Parliament, as he had pointed out, did not choose to limit the powers of this Parliament in precisely the same way as the powers of Congress had been limited by the Constitution of the United States. The 101st section of the British North America Act, on which so much stress had been laid by the hon. member for Bothwell, proceeded to enact "the Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act," that was to say, notwithstanding any powers which might have previously been given to the Provincial Legislature or Provincial Judicature, "from time to time to provide, maintain and organize a General Court of Appeal for Canada." It was impossible to give any meaning to the word general at all, unless it were applied to a court having jurisdiction over the decisions of the courts of the respective Provinces, no matter whether the cases in which appeals were brought involved questions of Provincial or Dominion law. Much stress had been laid, as might naturally have been expected, upon the words of the constitution of the United States. The hon. member for Bothwell pointed out that the powers of the Supreme Court of the United States to revise the decisions of the State Courts, were restricted to cases where the law of the United States was brought into question. It was quite clear then, that the Supreme Court had no right to review the decisions of State Courts upon questions relating purely to State law, but then, he apprehended, the reason for that was to be found in the constitution itself. The hon. member did not read the whole of the clause which determined the powers of the Supreme Court. It was quite true that the article relating to the constitution and powers of the Courts of the United States began in a manner not unlike the wording of the 101st section of the British North America Act. "The judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The argument derived from these words was that inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States conferred no power upon the Supreme Court to review the decisions of the State Courts on matters of State law, therefore, no such power could be found in the 101st section in the Court of Appeal that might be constituted here. But the answer to that argument was to be found in the 2nd section of the 3rd article. That section proceeded to define with strictness and precision the extent of the powers of the Supreme Court. Accordingly in determining what the powers of that court were to be, the Judges were not compelled to infer to what extent their judicial powers were to be exercised. An analogy, therefore, cannot be safely drawn between the words of the United States Constitution and the 101st section of the British North America Act.

Mr. MILLS explained that he referred to the section for the purpose of showing that the word United States was used there the same as the word Canada was used in the 101st section of the British North America Act.

Mr. MOSS said that the arguments were of no assistance to us. However he found it might be, it was to be observed that there unquestionably must be an appeal to the Supreme Court from the Provincial Courts in no case involving a question of the construction of a Dominion Statute or any case involving a construction of the British North America Act that was not found in the Act which did not contain any distinction between the two classes of cases.

Mr. MILLS — You find the word Canada.

Mr. MOSS said no conclusion could be drawn from the use of that word. He found even those who contended most strenuously for the narrow interpretation, admitted there was a class of cases in which an appeal could be brought. He found no distinction as to these cases. The section declared that the Court of Appeal should be general, but he failed to see if there was to be an appeal at all from a Provincial Court how that appeal was not to include every conceivable case.

It being six o'clock the SPEAKER left chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MOSS resumed the debate on the Supreme Court Bill. The question, he said was of such interest that he had ventured to address the House at greater length than he should otherwise have cared to do. When hon. gentleman considered that it was proposed to establish a tribunal which would have a power under certain circumstances, paramount to that exercised by the House of Commons itself, they might well turn to the question their best attention. If a question arose whether this Legislature had exceeded its powers, conferred by the British North American Act, in passing any enactment, the Supreme Court would be able to determine the controversy finally, virtually therefore, the Supreme Court could overrule the decisions of this Legislature. Many members were of opinion that we should be exceeding our powers in establishing such a court, among them the hon. member for Bothwell. If the hon. member and those who thought with him were in the right, what would be the consequence, a case might be tried in one of the Provincial Courts, involving purely a Provincial point, and a decision might be had from the court of last resort in the Province. The Supreme Court of the Dominion might reverse that decision. The case might then be taken before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and they might determine that this Legislature had no power to create a court exercising such authority. The mere suggestion that we might be placed in such a position should make us pause before we gave Parliamentary assent to a measure creating the court. He thought it would not be going too far to say that still more disagreeable consequences would arise if the Bill were passed and the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell should turn out to be well founded. In that case it would be in the power of the Court of Queen's Bench in either of the Provinces to prohibit the Supreme Court from taking cognizance of such cases. It could not be denied that any court before which a suitor could come, complaining that his rights had been infringed by a certain Act, was bound to determine whether or not the statute under which the right was claimed was constitutional or not. It did not matter how inferior that court might be, or how inferior its jurisdiction, it must determine the question. If, therefore, a person who had succeeded in a suit in a Provincial Court upon a purely Provincial point of law, applied to the Court of Queen's Bench in Ontario to prevent an appeal being entertained by the Supreme Court, on the ground that the Dominion Legislature had no power to establish a court, having reviewed every case involving questions of purely Provincial law, the Court of Queen's Bench, if it agreed in that opinion, would be obliged to prohibit the Supreme Court from adjudicating in such a case. His hon. friend from Bothwell, after dealing with the first part of the 101st section of the British North American Act, laid great stress upon the latter part of it relating to the establishment of a Court of Appeal, and argued that the Imperial Legislature intended that such a court should have reference only to the laws of Canada. If the rendering of that portion of the clause by his hon. friend was correct, there would be no doubt on the subject, but it was from the wording of the language of this Act that he (Mr. Moss) had been compelled to come to the conclusion that it authorized this Legislature to establish a Supreme Court, which should have jurisdiction over and revise the decisions of the Provincial Courts, even upon questions of Provincial law. But there still remained the question, even if it were satisfactorily settled that this Legislature had the power to establish such a court—whether such a course would in the meantime be expedient. Arguments had been pressed upon the House attempting to show that it was not expedient, even if the right existed, to exercise it at present. As he understood many of the gentlemen from Quebec thought that the laws there required that those who administered them should have a very special training. They argued that it was not sufficient that the Judges should have a training in general jurisprudence—that it was not enough that they should be familiar with the general principles of civil law and the law relating to real property. They seemed to be under the apprehension that but two of those gentlemen at most could have a special training in the law of that Province, and they argued that it was impossible to expect the majority to arrive at decisions which would be perfectly satisfactory. The objection in his opinion was not insuperable. The Judges would be guided very much by the opinions of their brethren, who had received that special training, and in the course of time they would doubtless all acquire the necessary knowledge. The system of law in that Province depended largely upon the provisions of a written code, and he contended that on that account also there need be no great apprehension entertained by gentlemen from that Province with regard to the competency of the Judges to deal satisfactorily with all questions affecting the rights of property in Quebec. The Province of Ontario would labor under a greater difficulty than they. There had recently been established in that Province a Court of Appeal. For years that had labored under a difficulty in regard to the constitution of the court which had exercised final appellate jurisdiction, which consisted of the Judges of the three courts in existence in the Province, or was actually the case in practice, a quorum of them It was not the special business of these Judges to attend to matters in appeal. They were naturally more concerned in the business of their own courts, and it was often extremely difficult to get cases satisfactorily dealt with in appeal. A court was gradually established whose jurisdiction was primarily appealed, although the Judges might assist their bretheren in the other courts in the discharge of their duties. It was believed that that court would be found to work satisfactorily, and he could not help entertaining serious doubts as to whether it was possible to establish another Court of Appeal, which would be equally efficient. For a time, at any rate, that difficulty might exist. But he could not entirely agree with the hon. member for Bothwell, that it was not of importance to the people of the Dominion that uniformity of decision in legal questions should be secured. It was not a question of vital importance to our well-being; we would undoubtedly get along if the highest court of New Brunswick decided one way on a question of Provincial law, while the highest court in Ontario arrived at quite a different conclusion on a similar question under the Provincial laws of Ontario; but even uniformity was a good thing in that matter. It was desirable that where the highest Provincial Courts had decided in similar cases, the same rule should prevail throughout the Dominion. Every one could judge whether it was desirable to incur increased expenditure at the present time for the establishment of a Supreme Court. He could not speak for other Provinces; but, speaking for Ontario, he did not think it was necessary, in order to determine the controversies between the people of that Province, that this additional court shall now be adopted. There were one or two other points connected with the Bill that seemed to call for passing notice. Some of the questions might be dealt with in Committee; if so, the slightest allusion to them would suffice. The power which was proposed to give to the court to deal with Constitutional matters, would be admitted to be of the greatest importance. In the 55th and succeeding sections it was proposed the GOVERNOR GENERAL, with the advice of his Council, of course, have power to lay special cases before the Supreme Court, and to enable the Supreme Court to determine on the constitutionality of any Act or Bill passed or brought into this Parliament or into the Legislatures of any of the Provinces. It was proposed to give the court power to decide on the constitutionality not only of Bills proposed but of Acts which had been actually passed, and that this power might be set in motion upon the application of the GOVERNOR GENERAL by the advice of the Privy Council. By succeeding sections still wider powers were given, and he confessed he was startled when he first saw the Act on observing the wide extent of that power. The GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council was authorized to refer to the court for hearing or consideration certain matters, and this one section says: "and such other matters whatsoever he may think fit." That appeared to be going to an extreme length. Those provisions seemed to enable the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council to obtain that advice from the Supreme Court which he ought under our system of Government to obtain from his responsible advisers. But that he found was not unprecedented. In England, under the Act, enlarging the powers of the Privy Council extending the functions of that tribunal, power was given to the Sovereign to refer to the Judical Committee of the Privy Council for hearing or consideration any such matters whatsoever as HER MAJESTY might think fit.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD called attention to a fact that a provision, identical in language, to that referred to by the hon. member, was contained in the Supreme Court Bill of the late Government.

Mr. MOSS said that the provision had not been deemed incompatible with the working of responsible Government in the Mother Country; and it was an argument, quantum valeat, in favor of the provision that it was contained in the measure introduced by the right hon. member for Kingston. He confessed he had not been impressed by the arguments addressed to the House against giving the proposed court any original jurisdiction. He did not see any reason why exchequer business shonld not be assigned to the court as proposed in the Bill. He agreed with hon. members who had spoken during the debate, that the proposed court would not have too much to do. One objection made was that the Bill would cause a change in the practice prevailing in the different Provinces, and no lawyer liked to change the practice. But there was a tangible advantage to be gained in securing a similarity of practice in the exchequer businest. That was a class of business that peculiarly pertained to the Dominion, it was a branch in which the principles of the law were the same in all the Provinces, and, therefore it was desirable to secure uniformity of practice which could be best obtained by transferring this branch of business to the court which would be known as the Court of Exchequer. If after this debate the House should determine that it had power to pass the Bill, and that having the power, it was advisable to proceed with the enactment and constitute the court, he was satisfied that the best efforts of every hon. member would be directed to making the measure as perfect as possible.

Mr. WILKES said that, though a layman, he need not apologise for offering any remarks because the question of the creation of a Supreme Court was one not necessarily Ministerial because it had been proposed by the late Government, and was therefore a subject open to debate by hon. members on both sides of the House. He remembered the remark of a witty gentleman who said, that we, in Canada had one good court, the Division Court, from which there was no appeal. When the Government proposed to establish courts of law in new Provinces and territories they had his hearty support, because it was necessary that the people throughout the Dominion should be protected. The public regarded, however, with different feelings any proposal to facilitate the extension of litigation on any parties who had already obtained a decision on their cases from our highest legal tribunals—tribunals which stood among the highest not only on this continent but in the world. Therefore there was not much public sympathy for measures tending to promoe additional litigation. The hon. member for Bothwell in the course of his remarks thought that when "Canada" was used in the Confederation Act it did not include the Provinces of Canada. He confessed that it appeared to him that Canada included all within the territory, just as much as Ontario included every county in it, and consequently he could not see the force of that reason, because if the Parliament of Canada passed any Act that Act most certainly applied to all parts of the country.

Mr. MILLS—Do the laws of Canada mean the laws of the Provinces on the same principle.

Mr. WILKES said he did not draw that inferance, but the hon. member would find from the language of the Act that it did not say the laws of the Provinces but of the Parliament of Canada. As he read the Confederation Act, it provided that we might constitute, maintain and organize a Supreme Court; but he saw no provision in it whereby we could compel litigants to avail themselves of the court after the Dominion had provided it. We would then be in the same position as that of the famous King who provided a banquet and on inviting the guests they all, with one consent, began to make excuses. One of the advantages we possessed as British Colonists was this that, in common with our fellow subjects in the Mother Country, we possessed an inherent right of appeal to the SOVEREIGN. There was only one mode by which that right could be denied to us as colonists, or to HER MAJESTY'S subjects residing in Great Britain, viz:—by the co-operation of the House of Parliament and by the Colonial Legislatures. It was, therefore, within the power of the Dominion Parliament by legislation to take away the right of appeal to the SOVEREIGN from her subjects in Canada. Now, it might be said that right of appeal would remain notwithstanding the creation of the Supreme Court, but he submitted that the tendency of that court would be, in having a great deal of business before it, to encroach on that right of appeal, and before many years were passed some Minister of the Crown might come down to Parliament and propose legislation which would deprive the people of that privilege of appeal to the British Crown. In the United States they had established a Supreme Court, and they had established one from great necessity, because they foolishly committed national suicide by their severance from Great Britain. No nation ever lost so magnificent an opportunity of developing constitutional governments as the early colonies—now called the United States. What he desired to point out especially, however, was this—that legislation of this kind, by whichever side of the House proposed, would tend considerably in that direction, and if it were proclaimed to the millions who would, before fifty years had elapsed, fill up this country, that the right of appeal to the SOVEREIGN had been taken away one of those links which bound Canada to the Mother Country would be broken. The establishment of a Supreme Court would entail a considerable expense upon the country, at least from $60,000 to $75,000 annually when the salaries of the Judges and other expenses have been provided for. He suggested to the Government whether it would not be desirable to retain this Supreme Court Bill for the adornment of future speeches from the Throne, which purpose it had served for many years.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said the hon. member for Toronto Centre might as well ask the Government if they would not allow the Insolvency and the Insurance Bill to remain for the adornment of speeches from the Throne. There were some people, however, who would like to see the judicature of the Dominion placed on what they believed to be a proper basis. Every hon. member knew that the difficulties raised by the hon. member for Centre Toronto were difficulties existing only in his own imagination, and not such as were likely to interfere in any way with the Government Bill, for by an Imperial Act, passed in the 7th and 8th years of Queen VICTORIA, the right of appeal was expressly reserved to the Colonies. He regretted that the Ministers of Justice in the present and the last Government considered they had power to pass an Act of this character. When the hon. member for Bothwell discussed any question of a constitutional character, he always gave to it an amount of consideration and knowledge, and learning and judgment, that entitled him to the respect of the House: but he (Mr. CAMERON) could not help thinking that his hon. friend had gone astray on this question when he made the admission, fatal to his argument, that there would be an appeal from any judgment given by a Provincial Court on a law passed by the Dominion. By that admission he gave up his whole case, for he had in some way or other mingled up matters connected with the Federal system of the United States with the Federal constitution of this country, and did not see clearly the important differences there were and the great distinction there was in the two systems, and which had been pointed out by the late and present Ministers of Justice in offering reasons to this House why this House had power to pass this measure. As he admitted one part, he could not show any ground that would justify the other part, and the whole matter was placed in precisely the same position as it was in this Bill. It was a matter of the greatest possible importance; for questions would arise not merely as to the constitutionality of an Act of the Local Legislature, but as to the constitutionality of Acts passed by this Parliament. These questions would come up, and had come up already before various tribunals. We had at this very moment two Supreme Courts of the Dominion in two different Provinces, giving contradictory decisions upon exactly the same subject. The Supreme Court of New Brunswick had decided in one way, and the Court of Queen's Bench in Ontario had decided in another way. We had the knowledge that at this moment any jurisdiction, never mind what that jurisdiction might be, was capable of deciding upon a law, whether that law is in the judgment of that jurisdiction, a magistrate's court, a higher court, or the highest court, a matter within the jurisdiction of the Province or not, and we ought to have within ourselves some means of disposing of such questions, that means as far as the Government had been able to take it had been adopted in accordance with the way in which they had adopted the English Statute 2 and 3, William IV. We believe that although that Act was passed so long ago as that period it had not been brought into operation until it had been brought into operation for a statute passed by the Legislature of Canada. The Legislature of Canada had passed an Act twenty years ago which was reserved for the consideration of HER MAJESTY. When it came before the Privy Council the first idea was to refuse the Royal assent, and it was kept for a long time in abeyance. The Colonial Minister, and the Attorney General and Solicitor General thought that HER MAJESTY could not give her assent, and the reason given was that any Minister who might advise HER MAJESTY to assent would be liable to impeachment because it interfered with the prerogative of the Crown. After a great deal of difficulty had been experienced this Act of William IV. was discovered, and the question was referred to the judicial Committee, who after hearing the arguments of the law officers of the Crown decided that HER MAJESTY might give her assent to the Act without there being any danger of impeachment. The Act received HER MAJESTY'S assent. and was now the law of the land in this country as well, and large bodies of people acted under it every day. We had the best possible proof in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council acting in the same way as the Supreme Court would, as exactly the same words were placed in this Statute. By this clause the QUEEN could send any question to the Judicial Committee for consideration and report. A difficulty arose in reference to the Privy Council's judgment being given upon matters that had gone through the Courts of Error and Appeal; a very serious trouble arose upon that point. The law still stood upon the Statute Book, and he had no doubt it would be exercised just as fully as it had been before. The matter now before the House was one upon which many persons had entertained grave doubts, and he could not help thinking that it would be a most advisable thing, in view of the entire settlement of these doubts, so that there could be no uncertainty in the future that further power should be invoked from the Imperial Parliament, either before or immediately after passing the Act. It would be a very serious difficulty in the way of the administration of justice and in carrying out our law, if any considerable portion of the people entertained any reasonable doubt as to the propriety or authority of Parliament in passing an Act of so important a character as that which might affect the title of property and the character and lives of so large a number of them. It should be a matter for the serious consideration of the Government whether it would not be advisable that further steps be taken, in order that any doubts that might exist should be clearly set at rest.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said he had felt the force of the conviction entertained by the hon. leader of the Opposition and by his (Mr. FOURNIER'S) predecessor in office upon the question of jurisdiction. Were there any doubts as to our well-defined power to create such a court he would be the first to destroy the measure, but it seemed to him that notwithstanding the arguments of the hon. members for Bothwell and Montmagny that it was not possible to have any doubts, especially after reading article 101 of the British North America Act, which was sufficient to convince any one that we had the means for the creation of a general Court of Appeal for all the Provinces. The hon. member for Bothwell had made a comparison between our Act and the Constitution of the United States, but the hon. gentleman was too apt to forget the many very important differences between our Constitution and that of the United States. In the United States the principle was that the States were independent and sovereign, whilst here the Provinces were subordinate powers ; and general and special powers that were not given to the Provinces, resided in the Federal Government. The 101st clause stated that the Parliament of Canada may notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. It seemed to him that this clause could not be read otherwise than meaning a Court of Appeal from the existing courts of the time ; and it would be a Court of Appeal for local laws as well as for Dominion laws. If hon. gentlemen would refer to the Confederation debates they would not have the least doubt in the mind as to the meaning of the article. The 34th clause of the Address to the QUEEN called for the establishment of a general Court of Appeal on the Confederated Provinces. There was no mention of Canada as distinguished from the Provinces; and he considered the right meaning was that the court should have jurisdiction over the courts of the Provinces. The speech of the hon. member for Kingston at the Quebec Conference clearly defined the meaning of the clause, and the gentlemen all voted for it, knowing that in spite of the difference between the laws of Quebec and the other Provinces, we had the power of establishing a Court of Appeal having jurisdiction over their own special laws. At that conference Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said: —"There are many arguments for and against the establishment of such a court, but it was thought wise and expedient to put into the constitution a power of the General Legislature, that, if after full consideration they think it advisable to establish a general Court of Appeal from all the Superior Courts of all the Provinces, they may do so." That was the interpretation at the very moment the article was proposed, and it was considered sufficiently satisfactory to every one, and that it was the intention of Parliament that this court would apply to their own laws. But he believed it would take away every possible doubt as to the meaning of the clause by giving the views of Sir GEORGE CARTIER expressed in the same debate:—"Accordingly, when we have lived some years under the Federal regime, the urgent need of such a Court of Appeal with jurisdiction in such matters will be felt, and, if it is created, it will be fit that its jurisdiction should extend to civil causes which might arise in the several Confederate Provinces, because it will necessarily be composed of the most eminent Judges in the different Provinces, of the jurists whose reputation stands highest, of men, in short, profoundly skilled in the jurisprudence of each of the Provinces which they will respectively represent. Well, if this court is called upon, for instance, to give final judgment on a judgment rendered by a Lower Canada court, there will be among the Judges on the bench, men perfectly versed in the knowledge of the laws of that section of the Confederation, will be able to give the benefits of their lights to the other Judges sitting with them. I must observe to my hon. friend the member for Montmorency, that he disparages the Civil Law of Lower Canada in the estimates he makes of it; but he need be under no uneasiness on that head. He should not forget that if, at this day, the laws of Lower Canada are so remarkably well understood in HER MAJESTY'S Privy Council, it is because the code of equity, which is a subject of deep study and familiar knowledge among the members of the Council, is based on Roman law, as our own code is. All the eminent Judges, whether in England, in the Maritime Provinces or in Upper Canada, are profoundly versed in those principles of equity, which are identical with those of our Civil Code. Now, as to my own personal opinion, respecting the creation of that tribunal, I think that it is important not to establish it until a certain number of years shall have elapsed from the establishment of Confederation, and to make it consist of Judges from the several Provinces; for this court would have to give final judgement in causes pronounced upon in the courts of all the sections. Neither can I tell what functions and powers might be assigned to it by the Act establishing it. Time alone can tell us that; but I do hold, and the spirit of the conference at Quebec indicated, that the appeal to the judical committee of HER MAJESTY'S Privy Council must always exist, even if the court in question is established. He thought this would answer all the objections raised on this ground. Now, he believed that when these two opinions expressed, at the time the article was framed so clearly and explicitly, declaring what it meant, were on record, there could be no reasonable doubt on the subject to-day. The hon. member for Bothwell had argued that there was very little necessity for having uniformity in jurisprudence; that it mattered not whether a case was decided one way in one Province and a different way in another Province. The hon. gentleman forgot that the laws of all the Provinces except Quebec were almost similar. All over the Dominion we had the same criminal and commercial laws. In Quebec the commercial laws were based principally upon the English law, so that the laws on most subjects were similar, and it was in the interest of the public that there should be but one interpretation of them, which would be uniform. The hon. gentleman should also bear in mind that there was a special clause in our constitution for the assimilation of the laws of the Provinces. He (Mr. FOURNIER) referred to this to show that the whole spirit of the Confederation Act was to give the Court of Appeal jurisdiction over Provincial as well as Dominion laws. These were the most important objections made to the Bill. The other objections were to the details of the measure. The hon. member for St. John had objected to the procedure as being too long. That had been modified considerably. Writs of error and appeal had been dispensed with. All that was necessary was to furnish security, but security must always be given. The hon. gentleman had also objected to special jurisdiction on account of the inconvenience that would arise from it. It was true there might, in some cases, be inconvenience, but one decision would establish a precedent for hundreds which were arising in the various Provinces. The law should be the same all over the Dominion and interpreted in the same way. If we could arrive by summary proceedings at a means of settling this inconvenience we should do so. He believed the means proposed in the Bill would be found satisfactory. One of the gravest objections to this Bill was that it added another court to the tribunals of the country. There were, however, reasons of the highest order for the creation of this court. Every day this Government was called upon to interfere in the legislation of the Provinces. Not a day passed without his being obliged to read over statutes of the different Provinces and pass opinions upon their constitutionality and legality. There was now an enormous mass of legislation which had been reported as ultra vires and unconstitutional. All these were on the statute books and would cause innumerable difficulties in the future. Parties acted in accordance with the provisions of Acts which might in future be declared void by the court when cases arising out of them were brought to trial. Such uncertainty as to what was, or what was not, the law should not prevail in our confederation. Were there only this in its favor, it would be a sufficient ground for passing this law. If we had an independent, neutral and impartial court of this kind, it would prevent difficulties with the Provinces, some of which infringed on the rights of the Dominion, as the Dominion sometimes interfered with their rights. Under the present system HIS EXCELLENCY had the power to disallow the law, but could not do so without the advice of his council, whose advice was based on the opinion of law officers of the Department of Justice. The result, as might be expected, was not satisfactory. All the hon. gentleman, who had spoken on this subject, had lost sight of the importance of this Bill in that respect. He believed the Provinces would accept the court as suggested, because they entertained the same desire as this Government, to refer all cases of this kind to a tribunal whose decisions would be accepted by all parties. With reference to the objection urged by the hon. member for Montmagny, he (Mr. FOURNIER) admitted that under this Bill Quebec would not have as many Judges, as it was desirable she should. Still, the position of that Province, as the hon. gentleman had admitted, would be better under this law than by reference to the Privy Council of England. He foresaw that at a day not distant, the appeal to the Privy Council would end, and he would not be so anxious to have this measure passed. After January next, instead of an appeal to the foot of the Throne, as it was termed, we could only appeal to a Statutory Court in England. The hon. member for St. John had objected to the division of jurisdiction. He (Mr. FOURINER) was not favorable to it either. He believed it was just as well to give original jurisdiction to every court and give appelate jurisdiction to a larger number of courts. This system was adopted in the new Supreme Judicature Court of England. One branch of the court had original jurisdiction, and the other appellate jurisdiction. There was a great public interest in settling this question which had been so many years before the public, and every day they felt more and more the need of such a court.

Mr. BABY asked if the establishment of this court would have the effect of assimilating the laws of Quebec to the laws of the other Provinces.

Hon. Mr. FOURINER said he had merely pointed to the fact that there were provisions in the Confederation Act for the assimilation of the laws of all the Provinces except Quebec. The motion was carried.

QUEBEC TRINITY HOUSE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions with respect to the powers and authorities of the Trinity House of Quebec. The resolutions were reported.

SUPERVISOR OF CULLERS' OFFICE.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION moved the second reading of Bill to amend the Act respecting the culling of timber.

Mr. CURRIER hoped the Government would give some explanations as to why this Bill was brought into this House. For his part he was not aware that any pressure had been brought to bear on the House to change this law.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman was mistaken. In fact, if the hon. member had not himself mentioned the matter, the hon. member for South Renfrew had, and the Government had been importuned to make a change in the law. It was proposed by a special committee on the subject that the Government should take the matter into their own hands.

Mr. CURRIER said a change had been recommended, but he happened to be in a minority on that committee. There were some features of this Bill which he approved of, and others which he did not. For instance, it would be very objectionable to make the culling or measuring of all timber compulsory. That should be left out.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the only desire of the Government was to make the Bill as perfect as possible. It could be read a second time and referred to committee, where suggestions would be considered.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole, Mr. PELLETIER in the chair.

On the motion for the adoption of the first clause,

Mr. ROCHESTER said he considered the clauses of the old Bill which it was proposed to strike out were far more satisfactory than those it was proposed to substitute for them, and he therefore moved that the following sections of the Bill before the Committee be struck out, viz :—"Clauses 5, 6. 11, 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 24, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 40, together with all such parts of the Bill as are inconsistent with the provisions of the said Act hereby repealed," The Cullers Act of the present day, with some very slight alterations, was all that the trade required. This Bill proposed to go into culling all kinds of timber and sawn lumber. The previous Act made provision for the culling of square timber and deals, but it did not make provision for the culling of boards or sawn lumber; and he was satisfied that so far as the trade with the United States and South America was concerned, no such provision was necessary, the trade regulating itself in that respect. Individuals came here to purchase their lumber and they generally sent men during the time of the shipping of that lumber to see that it was culled according to bargain. It regulated itself in that way. He thought it would be wrong in the House to step in and make new laws and regulations which would involve great expense and inconvenience without being any benefit to the trade. There was one amendment which he thought the trade asked from the House. According to the provisions of the old Act a certain number of cullers were appointed to act under a superviser. A man arrived in Quebec with his raft and applied to the cullers to have it measured. He had to wait until a certain culler's turn before it could be done. It so happened that more than double the number that were really required to perform this service were employed, and the trade thought that it was a great injustice that they should have to pay for the support of so many useless hands. To remedy this was the only change that was asked, and so far as sawn lumber was concerned, he had not heard that any amendment whatever was required. It would be time enough for the House to appoint cullers for that class of timber when the trade asked for it. He read the clause on this subject which he proposed to strike out, and also the succeeding clauses, and declared that he did not see that there was any reason for changing the old provisions. In that connection he remarked that the gentleman who superintended the Department of Inland Revenue under the Ministry was one with whom he (Mr. ROCHESTER) had had a good deal to do. He was fully aware of the ability of that gentleman, but he noticed that in all the acts with which he had anything to do he invariably inserted a provision which enabled him to make such rules and regulations as he thought fit. Gentlemen in the distillery and brewery business throughout the Dominion, and those engaged generally in the manufacture of spirits, had had ample experience of his despotism.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman must confine himself to the merits of this Bill, and not to the demerits of the Inland Revenue Act.

Mr. ROCHESTER said the references he had made were made with a view to show that those engaged in the sawn lumber trade felt keenly on this subject, and were very desirous that they should not be subjected to the tyranny of the individual referred to. He spoke feelingly on the subject himself, from the fact that he had a good deal to do with him.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE objected to hon. members making general charges against Government officers, and asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. ROCHESTER) if he had any specific charge to make, to bring it forward in the proper way. The principle of the Bill was this—the cullers were made a department of the Inland Revenue office, and they would be managed under the entire supervision of the Minister of Inland Revenue. He understood the 13th clause of the Act was strongly objected to, and if so the Government would be glad to consider any amendment in regard to that, as well as any other section.

Mr. ROCHESTER hoped the Committee would do away with all the clauses that related to sawn lumber, and left the Act so as to reduce the number of cullers from sixty to ten or twenty.

ON CLAUSE IV.,

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION, in reply to Mr. CURRIER, said that the Department would make regulations for the appointment of officers and the Government would be responsible for the appointments. The intention of the Government was to appoint in future only cullers who were qualified to cull all kinds of timber.

In reply to Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew),

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said the number of cullers being at present unnecessarily large, it was proposed to reduce it, and the Government took power to give certain pensions to those who retire. The Governor in Council could decide the amount of compensation to be paid.

Mr. CURRIER maintained that any men who passed an examination in culling should be licensed as cullers, no matter how they were employed.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION, in reply, said it was important that we should retain the confidence of the English and foreign buyers. If the licensing system as proposed were put in force, every lumberman would have one of his men qualifying himself to obtain a license, and consequently the culling would prove practically useless.

Mr. CURRIER said he would give every culler a license when he passed an examination, and only the best and most impartial would find employment, while those who were inefficient from any cause would have to fall out and adopt some other occupation for a living. This system existed in the United States at Albany, where there was more lumber shipped and sold than at Quebec, and the difference between that system and ours was that the latter would be double the expense to the trade. There would probably be 25 or 30 cullers on the list at $1,000 each, but ten or twelve good men would be sufficient at the same salary, and thus the expense could be reduced one-half.

Mr. J. L. McDOUGALL (S. Renfrew) said he believed in the fee system, and that the cullers should be employed by rotation, as men would almost invariably become cullers when their salary did not depend upon the work done. He did not think there would be any trouble about incorrect or dishonest measurements, as people when buying always measured sufficient to give them a test of the quantity. There were some cullers who never left the office because they were too old, and they had to send others to do the work for them, and some who through drink could not attend to their business.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said the intention was to get rid of inefficient men and then compel the remainder to master the business, and thus reduce the expense of the service. Whether they ought to be placed upon salaries or fees was another question; but they ought to be paid reasonably. There were preferences in culling, as some first-class men could make no more than $200 a year, while others would earn $2,000 or $3,000. Merchants showed this preference to men who would come up the river in winter and measure for them, and when the timber was sent down they received further favors. He thought the system, as it now existed, ought to be abolished.

Mr. TREMBLAY dit—Je formais partie du Comité chargé, l'année dernière, de s'occuper de la question maintenant soumise à cette Chambre— La majorité des membres Comité, après un examen attentif, en est du venu à la conclusion qu'un changement était absolument nécessaire, et je crois que le rapport du Comité est dans le sens de la mesure préparée par le Ministre de l'Intérieur. Comme l'a fait remarquer le député de Québec Centre, il a été prouvé que des colleurs de la plus haute capacité gagnaient de $200 à $300 tandis que d'autres réalisaient jusqu'à $3,000 par saison. Le fait est que plusieurs de ces derniers allant travailler dans les chantiers pendant l'hiver moyennant des gages peu élevés, ont l'avantage d'être choisis de préférence par ceux qui les ont employés pendant l'hiver. Les propriétaires doivent certainement avoir de bonnes raisons pour retarder, comme la chose a été prouvée, pendant 7 à 8 jours, le mesurage de leur bois, afin d'avoir un colleur de leur choix. Dans l'intérêt du commerce de bois, le gouvernement doit protéger non-seulement le producteur ou le vendeur, mais aussi l'acheteur. L'acheteur venant de l'Angleterre ou de la France, doit trouver pour le marché les garanties nécessaires sur la quantité et la qualité du bois qu'il achète. Il en est de cette classe de commerçants comme des autres classes. Le Gouvernement nomme des inspecteurs de farine et de lard non pas tant dans l'intérêt du vendeur que dans l'intérêt de l'acheteur qui a le plus besoin de protection quant au poids et à la qualité. J'espère donc que la mesure de l'honorable Ministre du Revenu de l'Intérieur rencontrera l'approbation de la Chambre.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he would not oppose the Bill; neither would he enter into the question whether payment by salary or payment by fees was the better mode, but he would give his own experience in relation to what the system of culling was in other ports than Quebec. In the lower ports there were surveyors of lumber who not only measured but also classified the lumber. Any lumberman could employ whatever surveyor he pleased, and his measurement was received as a certificate not only of the amount but also of the quality of the lumber. He could quite understand the reason why a gentleman who brought a raft of timber to market might not be disposed to take any culler who might turn up under the rotation system. The trade might consider one-third or one-half of the cullers unfit for their duties. It was the same with the pilots, of whom there were some two hundred below Quebec. Ask any shipowner how he would like to be compelled to take any pilot who came, and he would say he would prefer to pay four times as much and be allowed to select a man in whom he had confidence. It might be the same with lumbermen who desired to employ men of some standing in the class to which they belonged. He could quite understand the objection taken by the hon. member for Ottawa who desired to get thoroughly reliable and efficient cullers, whose certificates could be depended upon. The weeding out of 26 worthless cullers and retaining of 20 good men was an improvement, but it was desirable that the cullers retained should be men of character and reputation.

Mr. CURRIER hoped the sixth clause would not be insisted upon.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said it was the very principle of the Bill. The Government could not limit the number of cullers. They would assume the responsibility of employing a sufficient number to do the work.

Mr. HAGAR said in Montreal and Sorel there were only two cullers who measured 4,000,000 feet, annually, and measured it satisfactorily. In Quebec they averaged between 300,000 and 400,000 feet for each culler.

The clause was passed.

On the 8th clause,

Mr. CURRIER asked if the stamping of initials to denote the quality, applied only to square timber.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said it applied to square timber only.

Mr. CURRIER said the clause should specify that.

The clause was passed.

On the 12th clause,

Mr. CURRIER said he did not see how it was possible to carry out this provision, because in shipping lumber to foreign countries it was impossible to say whether it came from Ontario or Quebec.

Mr. McDOUGALL said this clause would refer to square timber altogether because the duty that was payable on account of deals was paid on the logs and not on the timber.

Mr. CURRIER—Then the word" lumber" should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION promised to make the amendment.

The clause was passed.

On clause 13,

Mr. CURRIER said this clause should be struck out. It would never do to make culling compulsory.

Mr. McDOUGALL said he had a telegram from the Quebec Board of Trade against it.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said he would consider the matter and make such amendments as seemed advisable on the third reading.

M. TREMBLAY dit : — La dernière partie de la 13ème clause, fixe à la Pointe Est de l'Isle d'Orléans, la limite où se rendront, en bas de Québec, les colleurs chargés en vertu du Bill actuel d'inspecter les bois d'exportation. Je pense que l'hon. Ministre du Revenu de l'Intérieur, n'aura pas d'objection à retrancher cette partie de la clause, afin de donner aux commerçants de bois de St. Thomas, par exemple, ou de Rimouski, et aux propriétaires des autres chantiers sur les côtes du St. Laurent et ailleurs, l'avantage d'avoir des colleurs commissionés, lorsqu'ils en auront sbeoin. En laissant la clause telle qu'elle est le Gouvernement se trouverait dans l'impossibilité d'envoyer un seul colleur plus bas que la Pointe Est de l'Isle d'Orléans, ce qui pourrait nuire gravement dans certain cas aux intérêts du commerce de bois dans cette partie de la Province de Québec.

Hon. M. GEOFFRION :—Si la clause toute entière n'est pas retranchée, je comprends qu'ils sera nécessaire d'en modifier la dernière partie dans le sens indiqué par le député de Charlevoix, afin de procurer à tous les commerçants de bois de cette partie du pays de se servir des colleurs sous le contrôle du Gouvernement.

The clause was passed, and the Committee rose and reported the Bill.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The House went into Committee to consider certain proposed resolutions to increase the salaries of the Civil Service of Canada as provided in the "Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada."—Mr. SCATCHERD in the chair.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the details of these resolutions would be found in the Bill now in the hands of hon. gentlemen. They stated in the first place that the sum to be expended under this Act was not more collectively than had been granted for the past two years to the parties affected. There was some difference in the amount the classes received. The junior classes received something more and the senior something less. The only other alteration on the present Civil Service Act was to divide the Chief Clerks into two grades—the first and second grades.

Mr. YOUNG said he was very glad to hear the explanation of his hon. friend the Minister of Finance, because he was aware that some misconception existed in regard to this subject. The manner in which the resolutions were placed on the notice paper permitted the inference that a considerable increase was being made in the salaries of the officers of the Civil Service. As he (Mr. YOUNG) understood the hon. gentleman, there was in the main no material increase over the amount formerly paid in the way of salaries and bonuses.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—A decrease.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that formerly $70,000 had been voted to regulate the salaries, but the sum distributed in future would not be equal to that.

Mr. YOUNG said he had turned up the former Act and found that the salaries of first, second and third class clerks would generally be the same as the amount they now received between bonus and salary before. In some cases it would be a little less. In regard to the deputy heads, there would be an increase of some $400. At present their salaries were fixed at $3,200; under the Bill before the House they would be fixed at $3,600. He understood, however, that the deputies had heretofore received no part of bonus. He (Mr. YOUNG) was glad that the explanation of his hon. friend had been given, because he knew there was a feeling in the country from the way in which the resolutions were framed that there was to be a general increase in salaries. He was himself of opinion that the members of the Civil Service should be well paid, but that no greater number should be employed than was necessary. At the same time there had been a very considerable increase in these salaries of late years, and of course we ought as far as possible in this as well as in the general expenditure of the Dominion to keep economy very strongly in view. The country had entered into a great many serious engagements which might, if we were not careful, result in an increase of taxation beyond that which was found necessary last year. Very many of the members of this House, and not the least gentlemen of the Ministerial side, who had always been advocates of economy, looked to these estimates with careful scrutiny hoping to see as small an increase as was consistant with the efficiency of the public service.

Hon. Mr. POPE said his hon. friend was mistaken when he believed that the deputy heads had not shared in the bonus. They had their salaries increased from $2,600 to $3,200, so that they participated very largely indeed.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE quoted the resolutions passed in 1873 to show that while some of the deputies were receiving $4,000 before that time, none received less than $3,200. At the present time some three of them received about $4,000.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said so far as he remembered only the deputy of the Minister of Public Works was receiving the regular salary of $4,000. The Auditor General, between salary and allowances, had about $4,000. He would like to ask the Minister of Finance some questions with relation to the meaning of some portions of the resolutions. He desired to ask whether any clerk would under the Bill based on these resolutions receive less than he had been paid during the last two years, adding salary and bonus together.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the junior second class clerks would receive a little less. For example a clerk who was receiving at present $805, salary and bonus added, would under this Act receive $800, which, as the hon. gentleman would see, was a little less. In the succeeding class the reduction would be proportionately a little more. To a certain extent the same rule would apply to the senior second class. Third class clerks would be paid more than they had received hitherto. Their salaries would be $500 instead of $460 as heretofore. Clerks of the first grade would receive $50 more. When they had attained their maximum they would receive $2,800.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL inquired at what date the new rate was to come in force.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—The first of July, 1875. It would not have been convenient to apply it from the beginning of the year, because the bonuses have already been begun to be distributed.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL inquired whether it was the intention to re-organize the classes so as to define anew the rank of each clerk, or whether they would continue to take rank as at present.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was intended to classify them according to length of service. Of course the hon. gentleman was aware that the Civil Service Act had not been rigidly adhered to in that respect in certain cases, and that a number of clerks had been placed in the more advanced classes out of the regular order. The Government would not in these cases give any increase until the clerks in question had attained the maximum of their class. Of course the head of the Department must be satisfied of the efficiency of the clerk whose salary was in question before the increase was recommended.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL inquired whether a clerk or officer, having served four years, would under the new scheme, be entitled to the maximum rate at once, or whether he would have to commence anew and gradually arrive at it.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said they had all received $50 per annum increase from year to year, and he did not think there was any exception to this rule. The operation of this Act would certainly not be to place them in a worse position than they were before. Taking them as a whole, they would remain substantially in the position they were at present.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he observed his hon. friend (Mr. CARTWRIGHT) had stated that there would be some reduction upon the $70,000 voted for bonuses during the last two years. Practically, however, that vote was reduced by $7,500, which had been appropriated to officers of the House. He desired his hon. friend (Mr. CARTWRIGHT) to say whether he proposed dealing with these officers under the new Act, or whether their salaries would remain as formerly.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT—These are in the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said his hon. friend was right, but the Government had asked for a vote which covered both classes, and he desired to know if they meant also to deal with them in the Act. He did not come there for the purpose of advocating an increase in salaries, and he extremely regretted that almost the first thing a Reform Government found it necessary was to do this same thing. He was disposed to deal liberally with public officers, but he thought this whole scheme might very safely have been left over for another session. Some of the increases were excessive; the increase to the deputy heads entirely so, for their salaries had been only a short time ago raised by a large amount, and now they were going to be still further increased from $3,200 to $3,600—nearly twice the salary of a county judge. No case had been made out for increasing the salaries of the deputy heads of departments as was proposed in the Bill. He regretted that a scheme for the general increase of the salaries of the Civil Service had been felt to be necessary so soon after the Government acceded to office. The fact only showed that if this increase was necessary, the late Government notwithstanding their extravagant expenditures, had not considered the claims of the deserving and hard-working Civil Servants.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said that every one knew that there had been a large increase in the cost of living within the last ten or fifteen years, or a large deduction in the value of money. It was a question of practical importance for the House to decide whether salaries of £800 rising to £900 were excessive for heads of Departments. He thought their position should be compared to that of the general officers employed under the chiefs of the great railway companies, or to the position of a gentleman occupying a fair position in the legal profession at one of the leading cities. He did not desire to increase the taxation of the country, but to reduce it as soon as possible. Every one would understand to how great an extent the Government in this country depended on the permanent deputy heads of the departments, and would comprehend the necessity of securing a superior class of men. Having regard to the salaries paid in Canada to men of moderate attainments, Parliament should place the salaries at the top of the scale on a liberal footing. A considerable number of promising Civil Servants had after a considerable number of years left the service on account of higher salaries being offered them than the Government had it within their power to give.

Mr. WOOD complained that Civil Servants outside of Ottawa, who had been in office twenty years, only received a salary of $1,060. The only fault to be found with the Bill was its omission to deal with the outside Civil Service.

Mr. COLIN MACDOUGALL said that he would support the Bill on the ground that the increase proposed was to secure greater efficiency, as had been established by the speech of the hon. Finance Minister.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD regretted that as the Government were undertaking a revision of the whole Civil Service Act, they had not brought down in this, or a separate Bill some general system for the management, organization, payment and examination of outside clerks. In the original Civil Service Act, 1831, there was a clause which related to the outside service, but by some accident the schedule which referred to the matter was never attached to the Bill, and therefore did not become law. The omission was never remedied. There was no reference in the present Act to the outside service, and it was for that reason that he suggested to the Premier that the measure might be supplemented in this respect. In order to have the system complete we should have Acts for the inside and outside service, as they had in England, though under a series of Acts instead of a general Act. He agreed with the opinions expressed by hon. members that there should be a wide distinction between the deputy heads and the ordinary departmental officers. They stood in a different position from the clerks, for the deputy heads were permanent Ministers. They were the persons to whom the political leaders must look for all the details of the department. The political leaders must trust, in many cases, implicitly to the deputy heads for the management of the departments, especially when a change of ministry occurred. Before the Civil Service Act was adopted a gradual scale of salaries was in operation under which the deputy heads was only a step above the chief clerk, receiving an additional salary of perhaps £50 ; but the subordination under that system was not what was desirable. In England the permanent heads of the departments were men of the first ability drawn from the Universities, and on their retirement they were frequently made peers. The permanent Secretaries of the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office had been called to the peerage. As to the proposed increase to be given to the deputy heads under the Government Bill, at the risk of being considered wanting in economy, he would certainly vote for it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said this was a question upon which he hoped hon. members would freely express their opinions. Although the Government took the responsibility of introducing the resolution they did so with the view of obtaining discussion thereon. As hon. gentlemen who had taken part in the Government of the country knew there was nothing probably more annoying than the constant demands made by parties in the Civil Service on the heads of the departments. It was well that in a matter of this kind there should be a full expression of opinion by the House because it was not a matter in which the Government felt bound to carry out the ideas contained in the resolutions unless those resoluions should be found to harmonize with the general opinion of the House. He quite concurred in the major part of the remarks made by the hon. member for Kingston as to the necessity of obtaining first class men as deputy heads, and more than that, of obtaining good men as heads of the Union Branches. It was certain that the office of Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department would not be filled by an able man possessing the requisite technical knowledge, at a less salary than would be paid by railway or private companies. It was also quite impossible to obtain first class officers for the Finance Department at much less salaries than ordinary banks would be willing to pay. All these points had to be considered ; the Government like other people had to enter the labour market and compete for the kind of labour they required, and they found great difficulty in obtaining for the salaries offered, the services of the best men. There were undoubtedly numerous applicants for offices at all times, yet occasionally it happened, and it had been so in his own department, that great difficulty was experienced in obtaining suitable men unless the Government was able to offer them fair remuneration for their services. It was a matter that had caused the Government of Canada a great deal of concern, but not more than the Governments of England and the United States. The hon. member for Chateauguay had regretted that the Government had been compelled to propose these increased salaries. The only increases proposed were in the case of the deputy heads. There was a very considerable reduction otherwise when the bonuses, which were distributed during the last two years, were taken into account. In his own department the salaries paid under the present Bill would amount to a very much less sum that the amount paid last year for salaries and bonuses.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he had always entertained a different opinion from that held by the right hon. member for Kingston in regard to the position of the deputy heads. He quite agreed with the hon. Premier, that the Government should endeavor to obtain public officers of the utmost efficiency at a fair remuneration. He differed, however, from his right hon. friend in regard to the position occupied by the deputy heads. We, in Canada, ought not to follow the practice in England in this respect, where these officers obtained peerages for their salaries in addition to the high salaries paid them.

Mr. YOUNG said, from expressions which had fallen in this dicussion, it was likely that misconceptions might arise, and the impression go abroad that there was a considerable increase in salaries through the resolutions before the House. It was a fact, however, that there was no increase except in the case of deputy heads. He had no hesitation in saying that he would prefer to see no increase in the salaries of these officers. They received salaries equal to the Judges of our county courts, who were men of the highest education and ability. In some few cases the salaries were not too high, but it was equally true that in other departments scores of men could be found to efficiently discharge the duties of these offices for the salaries paid at present. He was glad to see that the Government had decided when any additions were to be made to the staff, to lay the matter before Parliament. He regretted that some increases had recently been made in the number of officers in the Departments. He would like to have no increase made for a year or two at least. He was sure the Premier was highly desirous of keeping down the expenditure in the departments, and he hoped before next year came round they would find if there was no decrease there would at least be no increase in the expense of the departments. No doubt there were occasions where an increase was necessary, but he hoped there would be a disposition shown to keep down the number of officers.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) found fault with the present Government for showing a disposition to increase the salaries of these officials. He hoped the Government would make no increases until next year.

Mr. GORDON did not approve of these resolutions. It struck him there were a good many employees about the House and in the service of Parliament who were not required. For instance, he observed a number of men in the lobbies who were apparently without occupation. There was a man sitting on one side of the door to open it in that direction and another on the other side to open it the other way. It frequently happened that neither of them were attending to their business and members had to open the door themselves. Efficient servants should be well paid, but with regard to the deputy heads he did not think it would be found in accord with the mind of the country that they should have an increase. The salary of $2,600 had been increased $600, and now it was proposed to increase it $400 more, with the object, no doubt, of ultimately running it up to $4,000. He was decidedly opposed to any increase in the salaries of deputy heads.

The resolutions were adopted and the committee rose and reported.

COMMON CARRIERS.

The Bill to define and settle the duties, rights, and responsibilities of carriers by land and water was read a second time.

The House adjourned at 12:20 a. m.

———:++:———

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 17th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it had been customary for the House to adjourn for a portion of St. Patrick's Day—that was, after six o'clock. The St. Patrick's Society and other bodies waited upon the Government some weeks ago to ask for an adjournment this evening. He then communicated with hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to say that so far as he was concerned there was no objection. The House had sat late every night to the present time, and there could be no harm in an early adjournment to-day. He moved that when the House rises at six o'clock it stand adjourned till to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE DUTY ON TEA.

Mr. DONAHUE asked whether it was the intention of the Government to impose a discriminating duty of ten per cent. on tea coming from the United States.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT — With respect to this question, which is one of some interest to a considerable number of parties, the House will allow me to make a few statements in explanation. I desire to say in the first place that there have been a very considerable number of petitions against the re-imposition of this duty presented to the Government. On the one side, no doubt, there have been gentlemen, having a large wholesale interest, who have urged its re-imposition, but on the other side, there have been a considerable number of houses, some of them of considerable note, throughout the country, who oppose very earnestly the re-imposition of this particular duty. Now, I desire to say with regard to this duty, as far as I am informed, it was never imposed by the United States, except when they repealed all duties on tea. When they imposed duties to any considerable amount, they abolished the discriminating duty. I hope that the statement is erroneous, but that is the information given to me. With respect to the general question I may just point out that although I do not at all desire to say that these gentlemen may not be exposed to hardship, there is no doubt you cannot re-impose this duty of ten per cent. without inflicting a very heavy tax on consumers—that is the people generally—the greater portion of which will not go into the public treasury at all. Under these circumstances, therefore, the Government could not see their way to re-impose this duty.

QUEBEC GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. FRECHETTE asked whether it is the intention of the Government soon to determine the site for the construction of the proposed Graving Dock for the Port of Quebec ; and whether they intend in this matter to trust to the report of the Engineers, Messrs. KIMPLE and MORRIS ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government are not to build the dock, and therefore, will not themselves fix upon the site, although, as the Bill before the House will show, as the Government are to guarantee the interest on a certain expenditure they will exercise some control in the location of the dock. While the Government will be bound to see that it is located in such a place as will in all probability meet the public interest, and secure the least expenditure, we do not feel that we ought to exercise absolute control in the selection.

THE ORDER OF MOTIONS.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON called attention to the fact that the first question on the paper was not put, although the hon. member who should have asked it was present. The rule ought to be rigidly enforced that such motions be moved when reached or dropped.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said if this system had been enforced at the commencement of the session it would have been well, but for several sessions such motions had been allowed to stand if the hon. members interested desired it. If the rule could be stringently enforced it should be so enforced in regard to motions and not questions. He was quite in accord with the hon. member for Chateauguay as to the general principle of allowing motions to remain on the paper. Under the present system the House could not know whether the motion was to be brought up or not ; and he thought it was absolutely necessary, if any business was to be done, that the paper should be kept clear and that the House should rigidly require that when a motion was reached if the member was not ready to go on with it that it should be dropped, and the hon. gentleman be required to give notice de novo. As an instance of the difficulty of the present system he would mention the fact that the motion of the hon member for Bothwell with respect to the Senate, had been allowed to stand from time to time, and in consequence of the day not being known when it would be discussed, a good many members were absent. If this House was to be anything more than a body to consider votes upon Government measures, they would have to take cognizance of the rule, which existed here as well as in England, and adhere to it stringently.

Mr. SCHULTZ, to whose question Mr. HOLTON had referred, asked leave to withdraw it.

THE VETERANS OF 1812.

Mr. DELORME asked whether it is the intention of the Government to provide means to prevent the gratuity given to the veterans of 1812-13-14 and 15 from falling into the hands of jobbers or speculators to the detriment of these old militia men.

Hon. Mr. VAIL said that the object in asking the vote was to acknowledge the services of the veterans who had served in the war of 1812-13-14 and 15, and it would be the duty of the Government so far as possible to see that the money got into the hands of the persons for whom it was voted.

PETITION OF S. THEBERGE AND OTHERS.

Mr. TASCHEREAU asked whether it is the intention of the Honourable the Minister of Justice to request immediate action on the part of the House on the facts alleged in the petition of S. THEBERGE, Esq., and others ; praying for the impeachment of the Honorable Mr. JUSTICE BOSSE, seeing that by the rules of this House, it is impossible, between the present time and the close of the present Session, to take into consideration the motion of which notice has been given on the subject, by the member asking this question ?

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER—In reply to the hon. member I may inform him that the question is at present under the consideration of the Government.

THE ESCUMINAC LIGHT-HOUSE.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked whether it is the intention of the Government to connect Escuminac Light House by a line of Telegraph with the Telegraph system of the Dominion, for the purpose of promoting the greater efficiency of the Storm and Weather signal system, and as a means of conveying timely warning of wrecks, &c., on that coast?

Hon. Mr. SMITH in reply was understood to say that the question was, at present, before the department and would receive consideration.

WAY OFFICE SYSTEM IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. BORDEN asked what is the policy of the Government with regard to the present Way Office system in Nova Scotia, as regards the creation of such offices in the future, and as regards those which are already in existence?

Hon. D. A. MACDONALD said it was the intention of the Government to do away with the Way Offices as rapidly as possible. Hereafter there would be no additional Way Offices either in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia.

INDIAN VETERANS OF 1812.

Hon. Mr. POPE asked whether it is the intention of the Government that the Indian veterans of 1812 will be placed upon the same footing as regards pensions as other veterans of that war? If so, what evidence of service will be required in cases where they were not enrolled?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that was a matter that required some consideration, but where the Indians really had fought in the British service their labours would be recognized, proof, of course, being required. He thought, however, there would be no difficulty in obtaining that information.

BAYFIELD HARBOR.

Mr. McISAAC asked whether it is the intention of the Government to send an engineer next summer to examine the condition of Bayfield Harbour and Arisaig Pier and report thereon?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said, in reply, that an Engineer of the Department would examine those places sometime during the ensuing season, but he could not state when.

LAND GRANTS TO VOLUNTEERS.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said that with the permission of the House he would call attention to a subject not on the orders. Some weeks ago he made a motion for a return of the names of all those veterans who went up on the first expedition to the North-West. It was known that when those volunteers enlisted they were promised, if they went up to that country and remained there during three years, they would receive a free grant of 160 acres. Some of those men, in consequence of the hardships to which they were exposed, were invalided, some incurred protracted diseases, and some died. The return which had been presented to the House showed that 59 men, of those who went to the North-West, broke down in health and were discharged as unfit for service, in consequence of their physique not being able to withstand the hardship. He therefore, would ask the Premier whether, under the circumstances, without any formal motion being made, he could see his way to secure to those 59 men those grants.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government had already decided that in the case of those who had been invalided, not on account of any misconduct of their own, but from sickness contracted in service, their claims would be recognized.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD — And their representatives?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — They will be treated in the same way as others who were entitled to it.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

The House went into Committee on a Bill to confirm articles of agreement and consolidation between the European and North American Railway Company for extension from St. John, westward, and the European and North American Railway Company of Maine, and for other purposes (as amended by Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.) Mr. CASGRAIN in the chair.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he considered it his duty to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this Bill. It was considered with some care by the committee on Banking and Commerce, and was referred to a sub-committee, which made some amendments, but the Bill itself was of somewhat an exceptional and extraordinary character. Having, as chairman of the committee, called the attention of the hon. Minister to the question, his duty was discharged; he had no further objections to offer, if the honorable Minister was himself satisfied.

Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD asked the hon. member for Chateauguay to state the objections.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the Bill was to amalgamate a railway in New Brunswick with a railway in the State of Maine, and the object was in itself quite an objection. But what was more exceptional in the Bill was that it proposed to make part of the Statute Articles the agreement entered into between the two Companies some years ago. Those articles were not framed with a view to their becoming a part of the Statutes, but for an entirely different object, and they were scarcely in such a form as to adorn our Statute Book.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER stated that the sub-committee having reported in favor of the Bill, he could see no objection to its passing.

The Bill passed through committee without amendment and was read a third time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. CAMERON, (Cardwell) the House went into Committee on the Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Provincial Insurance Company of Canada, (as amended by Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce). Mr. McKAY WRIGHT in the chair.

The Bill was reported, read a second and third times, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACKENZIE (East Elgin) Bill to authorize the Canada Southern Railway Company to acquire the Erie and Niagara Railway and for other purposes, was read a second time, and on motion referred to the Standing Committee on Railways and Telegraphs.

On motion of Mr. JETTE the Bill to change the name of the Montreal Permanent Building Society to that of "The Montreal Savings and Loan Company," and to extend the powers thereof, was read a second time and referred to the Private Bills Committee.

THE PETERSON BILL.

Mr. JAS. MACLENNAN moved the second reading of the Bill for the relief of HENRY WILLIAM PETERSON (from the Senate.)

Mr. TASCHEREAU moved, seconded by Mr. POZER, that the Bill be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day three months.

Mr. MACMILLAN said if the Bill were now passed he was afraid justice would not be done. He was made aware from circumstances that came to his knowledge that the respondent was lying ill, and could not be here for the purpose of defending herself as she could have done; and the evidence taken before the Senate was merely the evidence of the petitioner without a particle on behalf of the respondent. He had been desirous of placing some evidence before the Senate. But it had arrived too late; the Bill had passed before the Committee of the House before he was aware of it, or he would have brought the evidence before them. He read the certificate of Drs. HART and CLARK of Guelph, to the effect that the respondent was ill with an attack of rheumatism and was unable to come; and he also read an affidavit by Mrs. PETERSON denying the charge. This affidavit was not perhaps quite so full as the affidavits in the suit before the Court of Chancery, in which the respondent and co-respondent denied the charge. If the Bill were pressed he would claim the right to read the evidence taken before the Court of Chancery.

Mr. STIRTON said he had just received a telegram from a most respectable authority in Guelph that Mrs. PETERSON was walking about on the streets this week. The case had come before two law courts in different shapes—before the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Chancery—and the verdict had been given against the mover. He did not see why the House should now hesitate in doing an act of justice.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) had voted for the first reading of the Bill, but would now vote for the amendment as he had learned from a friend capable of judging evidence that the evidence was not clear against the respondent.

The House then divided on the amendment with the following result :—

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN moved that the Bill be not read a second time, but be sent back to the committee for re-consideration. He said he had received an affidavit and medical certificate which were very important in the case.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the committee was no longer in existence, and the motion was therefore out of order.

The House then divided on the motion for the second reading which was carried on the following division :—

Jodoin,

Mr. MACMILLAN moved that the House go into committee on the Bill to-morrow.—Carried on the same division.

Mr. SINCLAIR moved for copies of papers and correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Government of Prince Edward Island, relative to the building of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and the transfer of the same to the Dominion Government. He said he had various reasons for moving for this correspondence. First he understood that the Prince Edward Island Railway had been accepted by the agent of the Dominion Government under protest, and he, (Mr. SINCLAIR) would like to see what the agent had to protest against, for that railway had not run one day since it was taken off the hands of the contractors. No doubt the weather had been the chief cause of this, but even if it had been fine, the rails and machinery were not good, and the opening might have been delayed. The Government had laid on the table correspondence up to June. What he wished to obtain was the subsequent correspondence relating to the transfer, and extending into November and December. If the terms of the contract had been fulfilled the railway should have been handed over to the Dominion Government in September, and it was expected every week that it would be opened for traffic. Speculators had purchased grain along the line, and after waiting until winter had set in were obliged to make an arrangement with the contractors for conveying the grain to the harbors. He (Mr. SINCLAIR) would like to ascertain whether the charges then imposed were to be continued in the future. If so it would be found that the road would be unprofitable. Many speculators not expecting the line would be worked this winter had purchased grain at the ports and shipped it by vessels. They found that they could do so much cheaper than conveying it by rail at the rates charged by the contractors. He did not want to see the tariff reduced below what would be a profitable rate for the operation of the road, but the Government would find that the Island was in a different position from the continent. Railways on the mainland passed through sections of country of which they formed the only outlet for trade, but on the Island the railway was obliged to compete with water transportation. He thought the Government should reduce the tariff, and he wished to know whether the correspondence for which he asked would contain any reference to the matter.

Mr. DAVIES said he was bound to admit that the Government had done everything in their power to open this railway. The gentleman sent down to manage the road went to the Island in May and was told by the contractors that it would be ready in July. He went in July and was told that although the trunk line was finished, it would not be handed over until the branches were finished, which would probably be in October. He returned in October and the road was not then ready. When it was handed over at last, a snow storm set in, and for ten days the road was blocked. He (Mr. DAVIES) made it his business to go to Mr. SWINYARD and tell him that it was unnecessary to waste fifteen or twenty thousand dollars in trying to keep this road clear of snow. It was covered with ice and could not be cleared. If it had been handed over at the proper time it could have been set in operation without this expense. Mr. SWINYARD, nevertheless, tried it for a week and failed. He (Mr. DAVIES) believed it was the worst road in the world, full of curves and easily blocked with snow. Time would show what tariff ought to be established, but there was no fault to be found with the Government in this matter.

The motion was carried.

LEASES OF WATER POWER ON RIDEAU CANAL.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) moved an Address to HIS EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for a statement of Leases of Water Power made by the Department of Public Works between the Dominion Dam at the Whitefish and Kingston Mills on the Rideau Canal, both inclusive. Date of Lease or Leases; Time such Lease or Leases expire; Quantity of power rented and approximate power used during past year, under each Lease; with copy of Reports and papers, if any, submitted by the Superintendent Engineer of the Rideau Canal during the past twelve months to the Department of Public Works on this subject. This motion, he said, related to an interference with private rights, which he would endeavor to explain. In 1866 he brought this matter under the notice of the then Minister of Public Works, and some action was taken on it in the way of making reservoirs for supplying the Rideau Canal in low water. It had also been brought within the past few weeks to the notice of the Public Works Department but he did not know whether anything had been done in the matter. On reference to the office of the Superintendent of the Rideau Canal it would be found by the maps and plans there that there was a diversity of opinion among the Royal Engineers who built the western end of the canal, with regard to its outlet. One route was by the height of land and the Gananoque River through to the St. Lawrence; the other by the River Cataraqui to the Bay of Kingston. It would be seen by the plans that locks were proposed to be placed at the Whitefish where the Dominion dam exists. The route by the way of Kingston was taken for the reason, he supposed, that it was the head of river and the foot of lake navigation and also for the reasons that it was a long distance from the American frontier and a well fortified place. In order to take that route it was necessary to place the dam at the Whitefish to divert the water from it and the Gananoque to the Cataraqui River, so as to supply the Rideau Canal. Therefore, there was a diversion of the natural outflow of the Gananoque and Whitefish by the building of this Dominion dam, thus interfering with important private interests in South Leeds. At that time it was not a matter of great importance because the country was not cleared up, and there was not so much use for the water, and therefore it was not brought under the notice of the Government at that time. But the Government not satisfied with diverting the water from its original channel, had also leased water powers on the Rideau Canal for the purpose of getting a few hundred dollars into their coffers. He did not object, though he might do so, to this, but he did object to their leasing the waters of the canal in such a way as to interfere with private rights. At Gananoque he believed the present Government were making some inquiries into the matter. At that town the manufacturing establishments gave employment to between five and six hundred persons, and were run with water power. On the Whitefish and Gananoque there were some 800 hands employed in mills and manufactories, while on the Cataraqui there were only some fifteen men employed. In order to keep these men at work, the water supply was diverted from its natural channel, and 800 men were kept for months at work on half or three-quarter time. This was caused by leasing water to the extent of two or three hundred horse power where only twenty-five or thirty horse power was required. He hoped that the Government would see that these licenses when they expired were not renewed, or at any rate that no more water would be supplied than was actually paid for.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for South Leeds had no doubt brought the subject before the House in order to call attention to it. The truth was that when the canal was constructed there was an ample supply of water for the canal and the works on the stream down to Gananoque, but as the country got cleared up the sources of water supply failed, and now there was not sufficient water for both purposes. He had given directions that in every case the leases for saw-mills and factories requiring very large power in proportion to the number of hands employed be cancelled as soon as possible, and that the water power should be given, whenever it was to be given at all, to such factories as employed the largest number of hands. He was aware of the peculiar difficulties experienced in the section to which the hon member referred, and while the Government could not at present cancel the leases, they would be able to give some little relief to the works referred to. The Public Works Department would do every thing possible to meet the exigences of the circumstances referred to by the hon. member.

The motion was carried.

LONDON EMIGRATION OFFICE.

Mr. COLBY moved an Address to His Excellency the Governor General for a Return giving the annual amount paid, at the time of the late Mr. Dixon's death, for salaries, permanent and temporary, at the Dominion Emigration Office, London, England, distinguishing the yearly, monthly and weekly amounts paid to such officers or persons, also the amount of all personal, travelling or other expenses, the contingent expenses of the office and amount paid for rent; Also, the amount now paid for the same services and expenses, giving the names of all officers and persons now employed, nationality and previous residence, the designations and salaries of the same, distinguishing in the case of Mr. Edward Jenkins the salary paid him as Emigration Agent, and as Agent General.

The motion was carried.

EASTERN CONNECTION WITH THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. MASSON moved an "Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all correspondence between the Canadian Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec on the subject of Railway connections between the eastern terminus of the Canada Pacific Railway and the Province of Quebec." He said that his intention in placing the motion on the notice paper was to obtain from the Government a copy of the petition sent by the Legislature of Quebec in relation to the Quebec railway connection with the eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway. It was not, perhaps, of much use to submit the motion at the present time, because the question had been decided by the Government, and their policy had been supported by the House. He quite admitted that the hon. Minister of Public Works in considering anything that related to the position of the Province of Quebec on the Pacific Railway question was bound to follow to a greater degree the advice offered by his friends on that side of the House, than to the advice tendered by him (Mr. Masson) and his friends. He would have desired that the petition had received some consideration at the hands of the hon. Minister of Public Works, but after the expression which had fallen from the hon. member for Chateauguay on the subject of that petition, he had lost all hope of the wishes of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, as manifested by an unanimous petition, receiving any consideration at the hands of the Government. He would not, therefore, appeal to the hon. member for Chateauguay—who had lately been appointed President of the Reform Association of Montreal, but not of Quebec—but to the hon. Minister of Public Works, and would leave the case presented by the Quebec Legislature in his hands. That hon. Minister had not up to this time said it was a moribund Legislature, and that its petition was not worth the paper on which it was written, and therefore, he (Mr. Masson) hoped that hon. gentleman would see his way clear, if he could not grant the first part of the petition (he was not expressing his own opinion but that of the people of Lower Canada as represented by their Local Legislature) he would take measures so that the line would not go to Renfrew and Douglas as was provided for, but would take means, as suggested by the Quebec Legislature, of carrying the route round by Pembroke.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member for Terrebonne had referred to an expression used on a former occasion in discussing the petition from the Legislature of Quebec. The hon. member seemed to think that the expression was a very peculiar and offensive one. A little reflection would lead the hon. member to the conclusion—what he certainly meant to convey—that in the use of that expression he meant to emphasize this and this only: that the address referred to was passed in the last moments of the last session of that Legislature. A moribund Legislature it was necessarily—moribund, for it could not meet again, and an Address was passed at the very last moment of its last session without very much discussion—without indeed any discussion at all. It was moved by Mr. CHAPLEAU, the colleague of the hon. member in the representation of Terrebonne, the late Solicitor General. He left the Government for reasons which he would not now dwell upon, but for reasons which were perfectly well understood in the Province of Quebec. He characterized it as a moribund Legislature, and used another term which he need not repeat, as the hon. member had not referred to it. He would only say further that he was quite ready to debate over again this question of the route of the extension of the Pacific Railway if the hon. gentleman desired it. If he desired to renew the sectional conflict which he invited the other night, and which was attended with results to the hon. gentleman and his party, the most signally fatal that he had ever known, he was again prepared to meet the hon. gentleman on broad national grounds, or which he (Mr. HOLTON) desired to consider every question brought before this House. The hon. member, whether he was aware that the question was referred to a Committee of the Legislature, and that it was after they had reported thereon that the House unanimously adopted the petition. He asked the hon. member if he did not know that when that "tarnished" and "moribund" Legislature passed the resolutions unanimously, the most distinguished members of the Opposition were present, including MM. JOLY and MARCHAND, whose names were honored by both sides of the House, whether they did not agree to the resolutions.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member ought to have made his entire speech when placing the motion in the hands of the SPEAKER, for he (Mr. HOLTON) had no right to reply to these last remarks. He would not put himself out of order by speaking to the motion now. He would nevertheless be gratified to have an opportunity of expressing his opinion of the miserable policy pursued by the hon. member in dragging this question, in season and out of season, before the House, in order to raise, as he believed, in certain constituencies, a sectional agitation utterly unworthy of him—utterly unworthy of any political party which had any expectation of a future in this country.

The motion was carried.

Mr. LAURIER said the hon. member for Terrebonne had made an attach upon the Government, because it had not followed the advice of the Legislature of Quebec, but he (Mr. LAURIER) did not attach the slightest importance to the advice of that Legislature, for in railway matters that Legislature has shown that it was influenced by political jobbery. Last year the Quebec Government had adopted a policy called the Railway policy for subsidizing all the Railway lines in course of construction in the Province. A certain Railway known as the South Eastern Counties Railway was promised a subsidy of some $2,000 per mile, but this year the Government had refused the subsidy to the company, although they had granted a subsidy to certain other companies. What was the reason? No doubt a reason was given, but the real reason was that in the interval between the two sessions the "Tanneries Scandal" had taken place, and the conservative representatives for Brome, Drummond and Arthabaska had refused to follow their party in that scandal. They had seceded from the party; and that was the only reason that could be given for the refusal of the Government to subsidise the company. He considered this was political jobbery, and the hon. member for Chateauguay had properly said the Legislature was a "tarnished Legislature." He could not blame the Dominion Government for not following the advice of the Legislature for Quebec.

Mr. BABY did not think that because the Quebec Legislature was approaching dissolution it deserved the title of a "moribund Legislature," and he considered that the expression "tarnished Legislature" should have not been made use of. The Railway policy of the Quebec Legislature having been passed unanimously the responsibility, therefore, must certainly belong to the friends of the hon. member who supported his side of politics. He respected Mr. JOLY very sincerely, but he and his friends could not be very proud of the expression thrown in their faces by the hon. member for Chateauguay. There was an English saying to the effect that "It was a dirty bird that defiled its own nest." He would not make any application of the saying in this case. He had never heard within the walls of this House a member from any Province talk of his own Legislature as the hon. members for Chateauguay and Arthabaska had done.

Mr. LAURIER—Fortunately for the other Provinces.

Mr. BABY said there were things that happened in other Provinces like that which had happened in Quebec, but they had the good sense to wash their own dirty linen in private; but in Quebec they had to expose these little infirmities before the great public. He thought the hon. members for Chateauguay and Arthabaska would regret having used such strong language.

Mr. MACKENZIE explained that when he had stated we had not received the address of the Quebec Legislature it had been in the office of the Provincial secretary, though he (Mr. MACKENZIE) had not known it, and it had afterwards come to him.

Mr. MASSON said that when he had asked about the petition he had received a telegram from Quebec that it had been sent to Ottawa about ten days before.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said the hon. member had refered to that address in a debate on another subject and had based arguments upon it and had extolled the action of the Province of Quebec. He (Mr. HOLTON) had characterized the legislature of that Province in his own way, and he was prepared to repeat that characterization and stand by it on every hustings in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POPE said he thought his hon. friend was mistaken, and that it came with ill grace from any member of this House to attack the character of gentlemen in other Legislatures. The South Eastern Counties Railway had not received aid, not because the Government had not received political support from its promoters, but because the railway was in a different position from the others, and did not come within the category of railways that the Quebec Government had proposed to aid. The road had been built previously to the adoption of the railway policy; but still it had a year ago received some assistance.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said he would not enter into the merits of the South Eastern Railway; nor would he here discuss the question whether the Quebec Legislature was tarnished; but he had an impression that the Quebec Government had been influenced by the amount of support it received. The year before the South Eastern Road, though it was built, had been in the list for Government aid, for all the people having interest in it were supporting the Government; but the hon. members for Brome, Megantic, and Drummond, and Arthabaska had refused to support the Government in the land swap and the objections to aiding the road had been discovered. He agreed with his hon. friend that the relations of the Government and the Province of Quebec should not be discussed here, and he would not discuss them unless forced, because he wished to be complimentary to that Province and it would be impossible for him to speak in any such sense as he would be glad to speak of the authorities of his native Province. It was better to draw a veil over what had occurred there and in order that the small and narrow policy and bigoted disposition in the dispensation of patronage should not be exposed and bring the Province of Quebec into disrepute. If there were a little forgetfulness of the local elections, and of the manufacture here of political capital, with the view of effecting them, it would be much better.

Hon. Mr. POPE said the road had received a $1,000 per mile, aid, and others had got a much larger sum.

The motion was carried.

WHITBY HARBOR.

Mr. GORDON moved for an address to His EXCELLENCY the GOVERNOR GENERAL for a Return of the Report and Survey of Whitby Harbor as made by the Government Engineers during the Summer of 1874; with all correspondence respecting the condition of said Harbor and piers, depth of water and general efficiency as a Harbor of Refuge. He said the Government Engineers had made a very careful survey of the harbor and reported; and he wished to have this report brought before the public. He trusted action would be taken at an early day as Whitby Harbor was a most important one, and afforded an outlet to a large section of country; but owing to the shallowness of the water there was considerable difficulty in entering it and if it were improved it would be used by a larger class of vessels than at present.

The motion was carried, and the House adjourned to Thursday at 3 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 18th March, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three P. M.

THE LENGTH OF THE SESSION.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said before the orders were called he would like to invite the attention of the First Minister to a matter in which hon. members of both sides were deeply interested, and that was the probable period at which this session would be brought to a close, and also the manner in which his hon. friend would deal with the Easter adjournment. They had all been exerting themselves to bring the necessary business of the session to a close before Easter if possible, but it must be evident to all now, without any intimation from the Treasury Bench that that was out of the question. In previous sessions it had been customary to adjourn for three or four days at Easter : but as Easter had fallen at an earlier period than this year, three or four days were of less importance than on the present occasion. He, therefore, suggested that there should be an adjournment for Good Friday, and that the House should sit on Saturday and again on Monday. By having an arrangement of this kind there was a strong probability that they could get through during Easter week, whereas if they adjourned for three or four days, hon. members would come back refreshed, and the close of the session might be potsponed indefinitely.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the state of public business was such that it would be utterly impossible to adjourn before Easter. He thought there had been no delay from any cause whatever on the part of the Government during the session, and while he was anxious to get through the work as soon as possible, it was evident they must give a good deal of consideration to several measures which had yet to go through stages. He had always taken the ground, when not charged with the responsibility with which he was now charged, that with so many members coming from a distance there should be no long adjournment, and these reasons were stronger now at the close of the session. He proposed to continue to sit on Saturday week—after Good Friday—and again on Monday, and he believed there was no objection to doing so. By adopting this course they might reasonably expect to get through business during Easter week, and that, too, without having more than one session each day.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) called the attention of the Government to the propriety of making some change in the "Orders of the Day" so as to put "Private and Public Bills" before "Notices of Motions." A great number of the latter come to nothing, but through their precedence the consideration of Public and Private Bills of great importance was often postponed to a very late period of the session, if they came up at all.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would like to have the opinion of the House on this matter.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL did not agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cardwell. It was true a great many of the motions might come to nothing, but hon. gentlemen did not place them on the paper without some good reason. The adoption of his hon. friend's suggestion would have the effect of postponing almost indefinitely a large number of those motions. Some of them had been on the paper for three or fours weeks already, and some might not be reached this session. Many of them might be dispensed with, but others were important, and if they were place below Private Bills, it might be necessary to drop them. The Private Bills were always reached in some way or other.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON thought the object of the hon. member, for Cardwell was to secure a better opportunity than now existed, of pressing Private Bills in the hands of members. His (Mr. HOLTON'S) opinion was that the present order of business secured consideration of all those. It was a very rare thing for such Bills to be left over, the difficulty was with respect to public bills, many of which were introduced late in the session. They should be placed on the table at an early date, when that was done they could be got through in good time. This year the House had yielded one of its days to the Government. Next session they should resist an application of the Government for an additional day at so early a period. By retaining Thursday, and introducing public bills earlier there would be no difficulty in getting over the business in good time, and it would be unnecessary to change the rules of the House.

THE TREATY VIOLATION.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) brought under the notice of the House and the Government a matter which he considered of sufficient importance to be submitted on the earliest possible occasion for their consideration. It was known to hon. members of this House that the Washington Treaty of 1872 provided for the admission of the products of the British North American Fisheries into the United States on terms equal to those under which the products of the American Fisheries were admitted into the Dominion. It was specially provided that the fish-oils and fish of all kinds, excepting the products of inland lakes and rivers, as fish preserved in oil shall be admitted free of duty. He had within the last few days received a communication which showed that Congress had, at its last session, imposed a duty on an article of commerce in which the people of the Maritime Provinces were largely interested—that was canned lobsters. It was quite clear that, under the first article of the Treaty, lobsters merely boiled and not preserved in oil should be admitted duty free into the United States. Congress in order to establish a differential duty in favor of their own products, had imposed a duty on the cans in which the lobsters were packed, of one and a-half cents on each one. These cans cost two and a-half cents each, and consequently the duty was equal to sixty per cent. on the cost of those packages in the Dominion and equal to ten per cent. on the cost of the article when packed in lead for exportation, and the exports of canned lobsters from the Dominion amounted, during the last year—that for which the public can be furnished returns,—to $571,000 and a duty of 10 per cent. on that would amount to over $50,000. That of itself was an amount of considerable importance to one branch of our industry ; but when the House considered the fact that if we acquiesced in this decision by the American Government the same principle would apply to all packages of a similar nature, and would be practically a duty in favor of the American fishermen on herrings, mackerel, ale-wives and fish-oil. He held it was a grave violation of the Treaty of 1872 which should be brought before the House in order that the Government might be called upon to make such representations to the United States authorities as would put a stop to legislation, hostile to the commerce of the Dominion. He hoped the question would be considered of sufficient importance for the House and the Government to deal with it at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the subject had not escaped the notice of the Government and representations had been made to the United States Government already. The contention of the Washington authorities was that although lobsters and fish might be entered duty free, they were entitled to charge duty on packages, which was a most unreasonable course ; but so far the Government have been unable to obtain any relaxation from what the United States Government were pleased to call an order within their competency. This Government proposed to make further representations on the subject through the British Minister at Washington. Of course they could do nothing more.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said if the American Government persisted in such a course it would destroy the whole benefits of the Washington Treaty, in so far as it related to any articles contained in packages. Take for instance the barrels in which the articles were packed. If this principle were correct, the duty on them might be made even more extortionate than on the cans containing lobsters which was ten per cent. on the whole products. They might as well make a hundred per cent. and turn it into an actual prohibitory duty. He held it to be a good law that if we were entitled to send fish free of duty we were, also, entitled to send that which contained the fish free of duty ; otherwise there was no protection at all under the Treaty. Of course the Premier was right in saying that his Government could do no more than make representations to the British authorities. But he hoped it would not go to the world that our protests were unavailing. He could not believe that the great nation with which that Treaty was made would persist in violating the very letter of it as well as the spirit.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Treaty had been violated in another particular. It was held by the Treasury Department at Washington that it did not apply to British Columbia at all, and the Minister of Justice had given his opinion that we were entitled to the benefits of the Treaty in British Columbia as well as in any other parts of the Dominion; still we had not been able to obtain a recognition of that fact. With reference to the duty of 1½ cents on each can containing lobsters the Government had given a drawback on tin entering into the manufacture of these cans, but it was not nearly equal to the amount of the duty imposed on them by the United States.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the doctrine laid down by the hon. member for South Bruce was a true one. If any manufactured articles could be sent free, the package, without which it could not be exported, should go free also. The duty could only be imposed when the package could be made a cover for introducing an article of commerce which was not admitted free, which often happened when lead was run into busts and statuettes in order to avoid duty, but this was a different case. With respect to the other branch of the subject in which it was alleged that the products of the British Columbia fisheries could not be admitted free of duty into the United States, he had no hesitation in saying, so far as his humble judgement went, they should be allowed to go free as well as similar products on the Atlantic coast. British Columbia was not a portion of Canada when the Treaty was made, but it was now by addition; and all treaties affecting Canada would affect British Columbia precisely as all treaties of commerce between the United States and England applied to Texas, as if it had formed a portion of the Republic at the time those treaties were made.

Mr. FLYNN said that this was a very important matter. If the principle upon which the American Government justified the taxing of fish—because it was nothing more or less than putting a duty on fish—was recognized, they could tax the whole of the products of our fisheries, for the only kind exported without packages was dried fish, and that was principally sent to the West Indies. Mackerel, herrings, and ale-wives must be sent in packages, therefore, if the American Government could tax lobsters on the plea that they could tax cans, then they could tax the barrels in which the fish were contained, so that would go for nothing. He trusted that something more than mere remonstrances from this Government would be made.

Mr. McKAY said the industry of packing lobsters was almost in its infancy in the Lower Provinces, and if a differential duty were imposed on it, it would seriously affect this industry in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for the export amounted to some $500,000 during the last fiscal year. He had no doubt whatever, that in the course of four or five years it would increase fully 200 per cent. This duty could not be imposed on lobster cans because they were of no possible commercial value in the United States after having been used once. It was certainly desirable that we should know the position in which we stood, and whether this Legislature was to be followed up by the imposition of similar duties on all the products of our fisheries. We could not allow the principle to be recognized in this treaty, and permit the imposition of such a tax.

INSURANCE BILL.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT moved the third reading of the Bill respecting Life Insurance Companies, and Companies doing an insurance business other than Fire and Inland Marine.—Carried.

CULLING OF TIMBER

On motion of hon. Mr. GEOFFRION, the House went into Committee of the Whole to consider further amendments to the Bill to amend the Act respecting the culling of timber. Mr. PELLETIER in the chair.

After the Bill had been amended in certain particulars,

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL inquired whether the Bill precluded merchants and lumberers in country places, for example at Chicontine, from employing their own cullers, or compelled them to obtain the services of Quebec cullers.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION said the Bill had no such intention.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—It is entirely voluntary?

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION—Certainly.

The amendments were read and reported.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved the House into Committee to further consider the Bill respecting Controverted Elections. Mr. DELORME in the chair.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he observed in the reprinting of the amendments that the period within which the trial must take place was fixed at six months from the day of presentation of the petition. As the Bill was originally printed, the period within which the trial should take place had reference to the period at which the petition was at issue, and it was with reference to that proposed clause that he submitted, when the House was in Committee, an amendment which they adopted as to an elector having the right to apply to have his name substituted, and placing the time at three months from the date from which the petition was at issue. He would therefore move that instead of the words "at issue" the words "has been presented" should be added. He did not object to the period of six months as that within which the petition was to be filed, but if after a general election such a large number of petitions should be presented as had been presented in respect to the recent local election in Ontario it would be with some degree of difficulty, or at any rate not without very great diligence that all the petitions could be disposed of within six months of the time of their presentation.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said there would be five or six Judges conducting the trials.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said there was a certain time allowed for answering and other preliminaries, and the effect was to reduce the time to three months. If between thirty and forty petitions were presented, the Bench of Ontario would be pretty much exclusively occupied in disposing of them within the three months.

Mr. PALMER thought the time had better run from the date the petition was at issue.

Mr. LAFLAMME moved the following amendment:—

"That the following be added to the same Bill. That whilst doubts have arisen as to the proper construction of clause 73, 101, and 103 of the Dominion Election Act, 1874, and as to the effect upon elections held under the said Act of the avoiding of previous elections, be it enacted that elections held under the said Act, as well as elections already held, as elections hereafter to be held, shall be deemed and taken, as respects both candidates and voters, to be new elections in law, and in fact to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

That the last mentioned section shall apply also to the Election Act of 1873."

The amendment was carried and the verbal alteration suggested by Hon. Mr. BLAKE was adopted. The necessity of that amendment he said arose from the fact that in Ontario there had been differences of opinion as to whether under the decisions rendered in England on elections which had been voided was not a continuous election until the exigencies of the writ were fulfilled. Consequently a party who had been elected once and came forward a second time after the voidance of the election would be liable to accusations of corruption by agents, which had been already settled by the first contestation. The object of the amendment was to make plain the real meaning of clause 73.

Mr. COLIN MACDOUGALL (Elgin) inquired whether the amendment would apply to a case where an election had been declared void on account of bribery by agents, although no participation in these acts had been proved against the candidate himself, and where the latter again contested the seat.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said it would so apply.

Mr. MASSON inquired if the amendment was intended to have a retro-active effect

Mr. BOWELL—It has that effect.

Mr. MASSON said the hon First Minister was the guardian of their rights in this House, and he hoped he would see it had no retro-active effect.

Mr. LAFLAMME said it was merely a logical interpretation of an existing law and consequently it must have a retro-active effect, but only from the day the original legislation went into force.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Caldwell) stated that if the amendment were allowed to go through committee, concurrence should be taken to-morrow, and it could be carefully considered as it seemed that its effect was was rather broader than was at first supposed.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE suggested that it would be printed in the journals of the House when its meaning could be carefully considered. He thought it should be made perfectly clear that this House never intended to provide that a man who had been unseated once for acts committed by his agents without his authority should be disqualified for being a candidate at the following election. He understood it to be the intention of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that this amendment was simply an interpretation of the law, which we were quite competent to make clear.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) mentioned that the courts had already decided two cases in the line of the amendment, and on the second case there was already an appeal against the decision. There was no reason why there should not be this interpretation of the law; but the difficulty was that it might go further than anticipated.

Mr. LAFLAMME said it was not his intention that it should go any further.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said that if this House by some mistake had legislated so that a man unseated for corrupt practices by his agents without his knowledge was disqualified from running again, they should correct the mistake, and he was quite prepared to support the requisite retro-active legislation. He would not favor the removal of pains and penalties for the prevention of corrupt practices at elections; but he considered that it was preposterously absurd that a man should undergo the disgrace and humiliation of being disqualified for a new election because was unseated for the corrupt acts of his agents at a former election, and of which corrupt acts he had no knowledge. If the House had done wrong it should repair it. The courts had declared that it had not done wrong, but the House had better make it clear beyond all doubt.

Mr. BOWELL said as he understood the amendment, it went a long way beyond the point to which the hon. member for South Bruce referred. He thought the House did not for a moment desire or intend that any member unseated for corrupt practices by agents without his knowledge should be disqualified for running again; but he understood the object of the motion to be more particularly that in the case of an election, held after a member had been unseated, it should be held to be a new election; and all the faults committed at the first election should not be brought up for judgment against him, but it should be held as if the first election had never taken place. He could see the importance of that as there were cases before the court hinging upon that very point. Under it a man might purchase his election with the firm conviction and knowledge that he would be unseated, but at the second election he would be returned by a majority of votes purchased at the first election, and who would be sure to go for him again. He was certainly of the opinion that this House should not adopt the amendment without giving it more careful consideration as upon a hasty reading he thought it was open to serious objections.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said his hon. friend would see that the case was different if a man were clearly proven guilty of corruption. The question was whether a man who had been unseated for corrupt practices, and it was proved he had no part in them, and had nothing to do with the bribery and corruption by the means of which his election had been set aside, should be disqualified for a second election. The courts had held that the Legislature had never intended that the law should have such an absurd meaning and the Legislature now proposed to declare what the courts had said was the law.

The Bill was reported.

PROTECTION OF PERSONS AND PROPERTY ON RAILWAYS.

The Bill for the better protection of persons and property conveyed by railways was read a second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.—Mr. ST. GEORGE in the chair.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

NOVA SCOTIA COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

The Bill to provide for the salaries of County Court Judges in the Province of Nova Scotia, and for other purposes, was read a second time.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

COPYRIGHTS.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the second reading of Bill respecting copyrights (from the Senate.)

Mr. DYMOND said he would briefly refer to the circumstances under which this question came before the House. Two years ago an Act was passed by the Dominion Parliament, if not at the instance, with the sanction, of the Government, the object of which was to place the publishers of Canada on an equal footing with those of the United States. For 25 years United States publishers had exported to Canada reprints of English copyright works, a custom duty of 12½ per cent being exacted by our customs officials for the benefit of the authors of those works, on their importation into this country. The Act to which he had alluded passed by the Dominion Parliament in 1872, gave similar privileges to publishers in Canada, they paying, not a customs duty, but an excise duty, or royalty of 12½ per cent., which also was to go to the original holders. That Act had remained for nearly two years in the hands of the British Government, he believed, without any intimation being given to the Government of Canada as to the course that was to be taken with reference to it. During the last session a member of the Senate and himself (Mr. DYMOND) moved an address in their respective Chambers, asking that the Act be not allowed to expire by efflux of time. He did not anticipate any immediate results of a satisfactory nature from those appeals. It must have been evident to the House, as it was to himself, that when the Act had lain for so long a period unnoticed, and a change of Government had taken place in Great Britain, it was useless for us to expect it would be revived and made a living enactment. However, the object of their respective motions was to obtain from the British Government the series of despatches relating to the final disposition of the question so far as it stood at that time. Lord CARNARVON gave three reasons for the Bill being allowed to expire. The first was that the Imperial Copyright Act of 1842 extended throughout the whole of the British Dominion. The second was that the power of Canada under the British North America Act was strictly limited to local copyright, and the third was that as our Act contravened the Imperial Copyright Act of 1842, it would be useless for the Crown to assent to it, because it was ultra vires and the courts would set it aside. It would, therefore, be no protection to the publishers of Canada, being unconstitutional. Lord CARNARVON closed his despatch in these words :—

"I will only now express my readiness "to co-operate and my confident hope that "we may without difficulty be able to "agree in the provisions of a measure "which, while preserving the rights of "the owners of copyright works in this "country under the Imperial Act, will "give effect to the views of the Canadian "Government and Parliament."

The views of the Canadian Government and Parliament were strictly contrary to those of the publishers in England, and there was no hope, therefore, that by any such legislation as we were proposing at the present time or had proposed in the past, we could effect the result we desired. The Bill before them so far as it went was a good one. It was a Bill which certainly extended in some degree our existing copyright law, the law of 1868; but so far as the object of the Bill of 1872 was concerned, the Bill for which we had been contending for many years, this Bill was of no avail whatever. When he said, a few evenings since, it might probably have been better not to have attempted to legislate in this matter, he meant that it was possible we might, by implication perhaps, discourage those further exertions which, he held, we ought to use in order to obtain the rights unjustly withheld from us. The gist of the Bill was to be found in the third and fourth clauses, including the subsections of the latter. Under the former copyright law of Canada, "any person resident in Canada, or any person being a British Subject and resident in Great Britain or Ireland" might obtain copyright in this country on registering his work and having it printed and published here. The new law would go somewhat further. Any person domiciled in Canada, or in any part of the British possessions, or being a citizen of any country having an international copyright with the United Kingdom, who was author of a book, might, on condition of his obtaining a copyright in Canada, on printing or re-printing, and publishing or re-publishing it here, have all the protection which it was within our power to afford him. The wording, "a citizen of any country having an international copyright with the United Kingdom," obviously suggested that the inhabitants of the United States were excluded. The United States had acted with respect to the copyright question in a manner the most discreditable, and had refused from time to time to enter into those international arrangements which many European countries had entered into with Great Britain, in order that the subjects of either country might be mutually secured in the matter of copyright. But he was inclined to think that we would gain, not lose, if we had left the clause entirely without restriction, and induced the people of the United States to come here, if they would, and take out copyrights, always, of course, providing that the works should be printed and published in Canada. He believed we could print and publish far more cheaply than could be done by the United States, and although we might seem to be giving a boon it would be one that would redound to our own advantage. But the feature in the Bill which had caused it to be most favourably regarded by publishers, and therefore deprived him to a certain extent of that moral influence which he might have expected to receive did he endeavour to press the question further, was what was called the interim copyright clause, which gave the person intending to take out copyright an interim copyright for one month from the date of the original publication elsewhere. The object of giving that time was said to be to provide that advance sheets might beforwarded from England and a month was taken in order to cover any possible delay. He was inclined, however, to think that the object of that clause was to obtain, not a protection so much to vested rights as a certain amount of trade protection to the publishers here, and it might be, to the British publishers at home. But the clause was not a protective one to an extent that would render it really effective. The penalty contained in the Bill was $100 to be levied on any person who having taken out an interim copyright, failed to print and publish the work here and keep faith with the Government; but as those persons might be scattered over the whole British Dominion it would be exceedingly difficult to collect the penalty. Again, there was a clause which at once showed the difficulty in which we were placed, and how the Bill fell short of the purpose intended. Again sub-section 4 of section 10 very properly admitted newspapers and magazines, containing portion of British copyright works. Now, it was perfectly impossible to say when those periodicals came into Canada what were and were not portions of British copyright works. We could not discriminate, and consequently could not exclude. In more or less express terms the Bill assents by section 15 the validity of the Act of 1842. If it did controvene that Act we knew it would be invalid; if not, then it practically failed to touch the one question at issue. If the British publisher or author chooses to disregard our law he falls back on the Act of 1842. A British author might make his bargain with an American publisher to take out no copyright in Canada, and his reprints would come in here while our publishers were bound by their allegiance to the law, and the right to sell reprints was expressly recognized by sub-section 2 of clause 15. The old sore thus remained, and the Bill altogether failed to heal it. This opened up the larger question at which he just hinted the other evening as to the extent to which our power of self-government should go. Of course it would be very presumptious in him, in the presence of many constitutional authorities, to point out precisely the extent to which it might be desirable to expand our existing privileges, but he thought the House would agree with him that in a question so purely domestic in its character as the publication and circulation of literature, the people of Canada ought to be able to legislate exclusively in their own interests. He was the more disposed to think we ought to possess that right because we were excluded from it apparently by something in the nature of an accident. Up to 1814 the Copyright Act of Great Britain did not extend to Canada, and this country would have had a right had we possessed publishers with sufficient energy to publish copyright books, without any fear of the consequences to the publishers. Up to that time the expression used in the Act was "British possessions in Europe," but in that year the two words "in Europe" were omitted, and from that time our privileges had been circumscribed. The Act, however, of 1842, which copied pretty nearly the phraseology of the Act of 1814, was the one with which we had at the present time to deal. Now, on an examination of the debates in the English Hansard, which took place in both Houses of Parliament when that Act was passed, he found not one single reference to the question of Colonial copyright. The whole question turned on the abstract rights of authors to copyright, and on the question as to the limitation of the time for which copyright should run, and which was by that Act extended. Canada was at that time, it would be remembered, barely entrusted with responsible government. We were still combatting for that larger measure of freedom which was afterwards conceded, and subsequent to 1842 Imperial officers in Canada were invested with the power, which they exercised in the most arbitrary manner, of seizing and even burning those works imported into Canada which were an infringement of the Imperial copyright Act to which he had referred. The result of this state of things was the excitement and interest in the question which led to the passage of the Act of 1847 in England, followed shortly afterwards by the Act of the Legislature of Canada, allowing American reprints to be introduced into this country. He thought the abstract question of copyright need not be discussed. He was not sure whether in sound economical principles either copyright or patent rights ought to be granted; but copyrights were granted at all events to its own subjects by every civilized nation. He did not think it would be expedient for us to refuse to grant them to our own countrymen in Great Britain or Canada, indeed he was prepared to say that it would be eminently inexpedient and unwise were we for one moment to refuse a British author any right which we would propose to give to our own people. But his contention was that no man had a right on Canadian soil to claim a copyright except under Canadian law, and that we were simply bound to give an author facilities for obtaining copyright, leaving it to him to avail himself of those facilities or not as he thought proper; and if he did not respect our laws, if he did not think it worth while to take the protection, then he had no right to ask for protection if we dealt with his productions of the brain as we dealt with anything else found on the soil for which there was no owner. He would suggest therefore in the first place:—that the British North America Act be amended so as to give us exclusive and entire jurisdiction over copyright; and in the second place that we should grant copyrights to all persons printing and publishing works in Canada—that was to say—that they must, in order to obtain a Canadian copyright contribute to the wealth and taxation of the country by encouraging that branch of industry with which copyright was connected, and finally that any person not availing himself of that privilege within a reasonable time should lose the right of claiming protection. In asking that, he did so with some confidence because he was convinced that no legislation we could adopt—no efforts we could make by the aid of our Custom House machinery would even succeed in excluding American reprints from the Canadian market, and they would enter our country either in a fragmentary manner through the magazines or in the form of published works. Complaints had already been made in the House that tons of American periodicals came into this country under the postal connection with the States, and he ventured therefore to say that notwithstanding everything we could do to the contrary, so far as excluding American reprints was concerned, the Postmaster General would be the most successful smuggler in the whole Dominion. That being the case it became the more important that we should seek to place our publishers on such a footing as regards our American rivals that they might be able to enter the market with the possibility of successfully competing with them. If this question went before the British Parliament again as a mere trade issue we would be over-weighted, but if we asked it as a national right, which it was originally, he believed, intended to have conceded to us, and which might have been conceded had the matter been brought prominently forward at the time of Confederation, or which might have been granted to us in 1847, but that the Ministry of that day thought the Canadian publishing trade was too small to be of importance,—the right would not be with held. The very fact that the Confederation Act gave us the power to deal with patents went to show that our present position on the copyright question had elements of injustice in it. He was not disposed at that time to raise the general question of our relations with the Mother Country. He held himself at liberty at all times and seasons to speak plainly on that great question when it came before the House. He did not think they would be really disturbing the Constitution, assuming that they were disposed to press the question on the attention of the Imperial authorities. He contended that whilst a dependency of Great Britain and an integral part of the Empire it was our duty to have due regard to all that might be termed Imperial interests, but he denied that it was the duty of the Canadian Parliament or of the British Parliament to subordinate the interests of Canada to the interests of individuals in Great Britain. He thought we had had within the last few years—almost within the last few months —several instances showing the need for taking a firm stand on this question. We find even now we were called upon to say who should or who should not invade our territory in the interest of a telegraph monopoly. We found on a recent occasion, when proposing to make some alterations in our fiscal araangements, that a number of British manufacturers had rushed to the Colonial office and desired that the tariff of Canada should be adapted to their interests. The question before them was another of the class of occurrences which suggested the necessity for protest. While he wished our connection with Great Britain should be perpetual, he did not believe that the way to make that connection permanent, and to bind us together as one nation was to allow any part of our people to feel that they were subjected to a wrong or an injustice.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the Bill was admitted to be a compromise between British publishers and authors and our own publishers. Whatever might be thought by the House on the question of the desirability of our having entire control over copyrights—and he did not differ much in opinion from the hon. member for North York in that respect—still the fact remained, that we did not possess such control, and it had become a matter of urgent necessity to have some settlement rather than allow the recriminations which had been going on during the last two years to continue. The Bill, admittedly, was a considerable improvement on present legislation, and the Government had to deal with circumstances as they existed, and to endeavor to obtain the best possible results from the materials they possessed. The Government had devoted considerable attention to the measure before the House met, and the Bill was the result of deliberations held with Canadian publishers, English authors and other persons who had taken an interest in the subject of copyright, and the Government believe that while no serious exceptions would be taken to the Bill in England, it would fairly meet the wishes of the Canada publishers at the present time.

The Bill was read the secoud time.

The House went into committee, Mr. DYMOND in the chair, and reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE SEAMEN'S ACT.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) the House went into Committee to consider the expediency of extending provisions similar, as circumstances permit, to those of "The Seamen's Act, 1873," to vessels employed in navigating the Inland Waters of Canada—Mr. MILLS in the chair.

Hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said it had come to the knowledge of the department that a good deal of inconvenience was caused shippers and shipowners in the inland lakes—particularly in the case of vessels going to American ports when the men could desert—and it was proposed to adopt and extend such provisions of the Seaman's Act of 1873 and 1874 as would be applicable.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL asked if it were intended to apply to all the provisions of the Act of 1874 to the inland waters.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said there were many of the provisions of the Act of 1873 that would not apply. The principal part was that which required the men to sign shipping articles of agreement.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he thought the main principle of the measure which had been introduced would be acceptable to ship-owners and seamen on our inland waters. No doubt a great practical inconvenience had been felt by reason of the want of these shipping articles. Captains of vessels had often been placed in an unfortunate position on going into an American port, and having no written contract were liable to be hauled up by any seaman who gave in his own oath a statement of his agreement, often contrary to the real agreement; and therefore this agreement should be in writing. There were many provisions in the Act which he was sure the hon. minister did not mean to have applied. The resolution was very vague—it said to "apply the provisions of the Act as far as practicable," but there were many provisions applicable that were not required. The resolutions ought to be amended so as to state what provisions were to be applied.

Hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said if he had brought down all the provisions of the Act it would take a day to get through them. When the Bill founded on the resolutions come up objections could be taken to it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL trusted his hon. friend (Mr. KIRKPATRICK) would accept the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Marine.

Mr. NORRIS said that any Act of this nature should be made so as to give as little trouble as possible to vessel-owners and masters, as the Act stated that the crew would have to be engaged before a shipping master or Custom House officer, which could not be complied with on our inland waters without a great deal of delay as the vessels passed night and day through our canals when these officers would not be on duty, consequently vessels would be delayed too long to remain until these officials come on duty the next day. He thought the engagements with the crew should be made by the master without waiting for any Custom House officer or Shipping Master. He saw that a clause required any erasures, interlineations or alterations in the agreement must be made before a Consular officer or a Customs officers of HER MAJESTY'S Dominion. It would be almost impossible to do that at all times; and he thought the measure should be amended so that such alterations or interlineations could be made before two respectable witnesses.

The resolutions were reported, and a Bill based thereon introduced by hon. Mr. SMITH.

On motion of Hon. Mr. LAIRD the Bill to amend the "Patent Act of 1872" and to extend the same as amended to Prince Edward Island was read the second time, and referred to Committee of the Whole.—Mr. STIRTON in the chair.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD explained that the first amendment proposed to amend the provisions of the present Act in regard to Patents for a portion of a machine. Under the existing law no patent could be issued except for a whole machine, and he proposed that one should be obtained for an important improvement in a part of a machine. The Bill also provided that a patentee, who had permitted the two years to elapse within which the statute provided he must act upon his patent, otherwise it would expire, must give three months' notice of his desire to have that time extended. The existing law provided that patented articles must have stamped upon them the year in which the patent was issued. To some articles such a stamp was a flaw, and he proposed to make it simply necessary to affix a printed label instead. The remaining clauses of the Bill related to the extension of the amended Act of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FLESHER inquired whether the possession of a patent upon a part of a machine would enable a man to manufacture the whole machine without reference to the original patentee.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said it did not.

Hon. Mr. POPE said when he introduced the existing Act, his hon. friend from Stanstead and Hon. Mr. CHAUVEAU proposed that the time within which a patent must be acted upon should be extended to five years, and he (Mr. POPE) was inclined to accede to the propositions; but it was very strongly objected to by the gentlemen who now occcupied the Treasury Benches, as the Prime Minister could well remember. He was therefore surprised that a proposition to extend the time should have come from them now.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said there was no intention to give more time than was allowed by the previous Act. The object was to fix the time within which an application should be made for an extension. That time was three months preceding the expiration of the two years.

Mr. CURRIER—Why limit the time at all? Why not extend it to five years?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—For the very best reason—we want to limit it.

Mr. CURRIER asked whether, in case an application were made, it followed that the applicant obtained the extension asked for.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. POPE thought the time was too short. A longer time ought to be given than this Bill allowed.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD said if an applicant made application showing by affidavit that there was good reason to ask for an extension, it would be granted. If the two years were allowed to expire without an application being made, the matter was of course open to all.

At six o'clock the SPEAKER left the chair.

AFTER RECESS,

The Bill was reported; third reading to-morrow.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

The Bill respecting the Intercolonial Railway was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole,—Mr. CHARLTON in the chair.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that this was simply a Bill to apply the law under which the Intercolonial Railway proper was constructed, to the other branches of the Government Railways in the Lower Provinces.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

THE CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

The Bill to further amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole—Mr. THIBAUDEAU in the chair.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked for explanations of the first and second clauses.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said under the present law gentlemen who were upwards of forty years of age could not be admitted into the service. It was now proposed to limit the age to thirty, because as a matter of fact the men the Government most desired in the services were those between the ages of thirty and forty. The object of the second section was this :—As the law now stands, the Government might dismiss absolutely any one who was found inefficient, but it was found that after men had served ten years or more there was a very great objection to taking such an extreme step as to turn them off. This clause would empower the Government in dismissing such persons to give them some slight allowance.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said a certain amount was deducted every year from the salaries of Civil Servants to be paid back in the shape of an allowance to them when they were superannuated. This clause gave the Government power to say that they would not give a Civil Servant the full allowance to which he was entitled under the Act. His opinion was that if any Civil Servant did not give satisfaction his services should be dispensed with at the time, or otherwise he should be warned that he would not get the full benefit of the Act, in order that he might not pay the full amount of his contributions to the fund every year. He should not be placed at the mercy of the head of a department, and any Civil Servant who paid his contribution regularly from year to year to the fund should get the amount he was entitled to by law when superannuated.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member failed to see that this was an amendment entirely in favor of a certain class. It was quite competent for the Government to discharge a Civil Servant at any time, without giving him an allowance. This clause gave the Government power in removing an employee in the interests of the service to give him some allowance.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK—It should be confined to that class.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—So it is. It is to give superannuation to those who are not entitled to it under the law. There are some now who would have to be dismissed without any allowance at all if we had not this amendment.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said this second clause gave the Government power to grant an allowance which would be less than what an employee would, otherwise, have been entitled to.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE explained that 65 years was the age at which superannuation might take place. Under the existing law employees were only to be superannuated from natural causes, that was, when something for which they were not themselves to be blamed prevented them from discharging their duties. This clause provided for removal from causes other than that of ill-health. To be very plain, he might say that the Government were obliged sometimes, and would probably be obliged now to get rid of some people whose conduct had been so dissipated that it was impossible to keep them in the department on full pay, and yet some regard for their long services and for their families made it desirable that they should receive some allowance on being removed from the service. At present the law did not allow the Government to do so, and they would be obliged to dismiss such persons without any allowance at all. It was purely from a charitable and kindly consideration for their positions that this amendment was introduced. The leader of the opposition the other night entirely understood the object of this measure and expressed his approval of it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL approved of the Bill and thought the Government should possess the power which it conferred.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON thought that a similar provision should be made with respect to the officers of this House. He would also suggest that some means should be taken of recognizing the long and satisfactory services of those in the employ of the House who were not strictly classed under the provision of the Civil Service Act. Such persons if promoted, as their services would otherwise have entitled them to be, would have received an increase of pay. He merely called attention to this matter now, because it seemed to him that there was, in some way, an omission in not making provision for those who did not come under the Civil Service Act, but who were employed by the Legislature.

Mr. PALMER said if he understood the Bill right it gave the Government no dower over those who were entitled to superannuation but merely enabled them, under the power which they already possessed, to dismiss officials who did not give satisfaction, and to grant them some allowance on their removal.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said he had no objection to the object of the Bill, on the contrary rather approved of it. He merely called the attention of the Government to the fact that the wording of the clause was unfortunate since it would have the effect of going beyond what they desired. A person over 65 years of age and entitled to superannuation might under this clause be met with a statement from the head of the department that his services had not been satisfactory, and he would therefore get a smaller amount from the fund to which he had contributed, then he was entitled to under the law. This clause should certainly be amended.

Mr. McDOUGALL (W. Elgin) did not think the section would bear the construction his hon. friend was putting upon it. A close analysis would show that it intended to express the opinion intimated by the Premier and the hon Minister of Finance, and that the phraseology was clear. There must be some discretion assigned the head of the department, and that discretion was expressed in the section; and without that discretion the person about to be superannuated would not be entitled to any allowance.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said on a suggestion from his hon. friend from Kingston he would add the words "or age," and the clause would then read "when any person is about to be superannuated from any other cause than ill health or age." These were the only two causes for which a man could be superannuated when the service was perfectly satisfactory. Of course the Government had no other object than to make the clause clear, and would have no objection to insert any words that would make it so.

Mr. FLESHER inquired if it were the intention of the department to superannuate persons who by intemperance had rendered themselves unable to perform their duties.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said it was not.

The Bill and amendments were read the second and third times and passed.

INSURANCE BILL.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to consolidate and amend the several Acts relating to Insurance in so far as regards Fire and Inland Marine business (as amended by Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Mr. ARCHIBALD in the chair.

The Bill was reported and read a second time.

On the motion for the third reading,—

Mr. OLIVER moved in amendment that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions so to amend it as to provide that the same amount of security be deposited with the Receiver General for the protection of the public against Canadian Companies as is required to be deposited by foreign Companies, viz., $100,000. He said it appeared the deposits were for the protection of the Canadian public against foreign companies, and not, as was once supposed, to put money into the treasury of this country, and he thought if it were necessary to ask foreign companies for $100,000 deposit, it was also necessary to ask the same amount from Canadian companies to protect the Canadian public from them. It was wiser and better to put them both on the same footing.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said he would oppose the amendment. It had been proposed to make the deposits $150,000 for foreign (including English) companies, and $100,000 for Canadian companies, and so long as that proportion was maintained he supposed there would be no objection. But the amount had been fixed at $100,000 on foreign and $50,000 for Canadian companies. In the Committee, the Government had stated they were prepared to agree to the determination of the committee as to the amount of deposit, and it had been moved and carried that the deposit should be precisely the same as it was now, which was made according to the report of the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Personally he had not the slightest objection that the amount for Canadian companies should be made $100,000, but in that event $150,000 should be required from foreign companies. The hon. gentleman who moved the amendment had given no reason why there should be a change; why the Canadian and foreign companies should not remain exactly as they were. There was an additional reason why no change should be made. In the law as it was now proposed by the Finance Minister there was by the 8th clause an entirely new provision introduced altogether independent of the general provision of the law which had been so wisely and properly introduced by the Government, of having an inspector of Insurance Companies. This provided not only for a deposit of $50,000, but that there should be assets of the company equal to the liabilities reported upon by the superintendent, so that, in point of fact the superintendent had the right, wholly irrespective of the deposit of $50,000, to cause a report to be made to the Finance Minister under which companies might be suspended provided they did not comply with the provisions of this eighth clause. He thought the House would act most wisely in abiding by the decision of the Banking and Commerce Committee. In view of the fact that the Bill required a deposit of $50,000 from each Canadian company and of $100,000 from each foreign company, and also that it gave the right of inspection which would be sufficient security if there were no deposit at all, he could see no reason why the House should be called upon to increase the amount of deposits of Canadian companies when there was no occasion whatever for it.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he had agreed with the hon. member for North Oxford in committee and voted with the minority for the amendment. Under the circumstances, however, he felt bound to stand by the report of the committee. He would consider it unfortunate, after the careful consideration of this Bill by that numerous committee, if any decision arrived at on the leading features of the Bill were to be disturbed now. He therefore hoped the House would stand by the report of the committee and that the hon. member for North Oxford would be satisfied with placing his views on the journals.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he was bound to admit that the hon. member for North Oxford had given due notice of his intentions.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he did not contend that the amendment should carry; he merely rose to take exception to the doctrine enunciated by the hon. members for Cardwell and Chateauguay that whatever the committee might do ought to be endorsed by the House.

Mr. OLIVER said he had always supposed that the Government was a free trade administration. He warned the Government that if they granted this concession and acknowledged the principle of protection in this insurance Bill, it was nothing but fair they should recognize the same principle in all other measures coming before the House. If the House protected home companies to the extent of one hundred per cent. in the matter of insurance, surely it would not be too much if the hon. member for Hamilton instead of asking for 17½ per cent. on manufactures should ask 100 per cent. added to that. This was an indication that the Government were willing to concede the principle of protection. Was there any reason why the Canadian public should not be protected against local as well as foreign companies? It was not the interests of Canadian companies that this House was so much to look to as the interests of the Canadian people as against the companies, and if it required $100,000 from a foreign company to protect the Canadian people, was it not reasonable to suppose it would require an equal amount to protect the people against the local companies. He would not divide the House, but he desired to put his views on the journals.

Mr. WILKES said it was not simply in deference to the finding of the Committee on Banking and Commerce that he supported the Bill, but because good and sufficient reasons had been shown for it. Fifty thousand dollars was not a sufficient protection. The real protection was afforded by inspection. We had no inspection of foreign companies, and it was advisable that they should deposit more than local companies.

The amendment was lost on a division, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the second reading of a Bill respecting the lien of the Dominion on the Northern Railway of Canada.

Mr. MASSON asked for explanations of the Government proposal.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that the matter was fully discussed and resolutions passed last year authorizing the proposed arrangement to be made. The Bill introduced by the Government in 1873 provided for a valuation of the lien at £23,750 sterling, but the Government had arrived at a valuation of the same lien in the sum of £100,000 sterling, and the country possessed £100,000 of second and third class preference bonds. That was the only explanation he had to offer except with regard to the second section, which gave authority to the Government to appoint a director who would have exclusive control, until that payment was made, of all expenditures beyond ordinary working expenses, and any future expenditure on new works or equipment would be under his control. The House would observe that the time was limited to 1st April 1876, which might be extended three months longer, but not to a more distant period.

Mr. MASSON said that last fall a deputation waited upon the hon. Premier respecting railroads in the western portion of Ontario. In answer to a question regarding the Northern Railway, Mr. MACKENZIE was reported to have said that the reduction contemplated would not be made to the Northern Railway. From that statement he (Mr. MASSON) undertood that the Government were determined to exact from the company every dollar which they actually owed to the Government. That debt amounted to nearly £500,000 exclusive of interest which reached $1,300,000. If the road were one of national importance the Government might consider the advisability of making a reduction in their lien in order to enable the company to extend their line even to the Nipissing Railway. But he understood the company was not one of that national character. Moreover it was understood that the company was in a prosperous condition, and the Ontario Government held the opinion that it could pay interest at 5 per cent. on its indebtedness. The Treasurer of Ontario, Hon. Mr. CROOKS, stated that the total debt of the Government amounted to $2,300,000 without counting, and said: "Upon an examination of the returns of "revenue as earned by this railway, and "after a liberal allowance for expenditure "on capital, &c., it appears to the under- "signed that the company could with "facility pay interest at the rate of five "per cent. per annum on this amount of "the Provincial lien, and at the same time "exist in full efficiency, and make, from "time to time, such alterations and addi- "tions as its traffic and the public "interest might require." The company did not fulfil either of the conditions which would entitle it to the reduction of its lien. The company was not one of a national character, and it was not necessary for the prosperity of the country, though it might be for the district through which it passed. A similar measure was brought forward by the late Government, but he (Mr. MASSON) and several supporters of the late Government strongly opposed it, as did, also, the Hon. E. B. WOOD, now Chief Justice in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that his remarks on the occasion referred to by the hon. member were to the effect that the Government would not relinquish one farthing of what that lien was worth to the country. He was aware that the Government proposed to do so. The question, however, was not what they were open to receive, but what they could get out of the road ; nor was it a question whether the road was of local or public importance. The hon. gentleman would be aware that between £500,000 and £600,000 sterling of bonds were placed in advance of the Government lien. They had to receive interest before the Dominion would give anything, but their lien was simply worth what it would bring after paying bondholders what they were now entitled to receive. That was the whole question at issue. The late Government came to the conclusion that the lien was only worth £23,000, whereas the present Government valued it at £100,000, and they had bonds of £200,000 or $1,000,000. If any hon. member could discover any way to get any more money out of the road than the Government was proposing to do, he would be very willing to receive it, but he had failed to see any such way yet, because they must stand between the bondholders and the results of any legislation forced on them against their will.

Mr. SCATCHERD said that by reference to another Bill which had been introduced by the hon. member for Muskoka, it appeared that the first preference bonds amounted to £250,000 ; the second preference to £283,900 ; class A., third preference, £50,000 ; class B., third preference, £100,000 ; and then came the Government lien. So the question was not whether the road was worth only the amount the Government proposed to take in, but whether that amount could be received in view of the position occupied by the Government lien. The Government were taking out of the road all they could get. The hon. member for Terrebonne had, however, supported the late Government in making a large reduction on the Great Western Railway debt, but in this case the Government were not giving the Northern Railway anything, but were obtaining the fullest amount which the lien was worth

Mr. WOOD said it would be in the recollection of hon. members that a similar Bill to this was introduced, relating to the Northern Railway, by the late Administration. It was true that the Government of that day were willing to take a smaller amount in compensation than the present Government. A very strong article on the subject appeared in the Globe, which shook the Government to its very centre. The present Government came before the House asking for powers almost similar ; they asked that the country should give up a claim equal to about three million dollars for about one million dollars. In 1859 the company was in embarrassed circumstances. They owed a very large amount of money, and arrangements were made to place them in a better condition. The Government lien at that time amounted to £475,000 sterling, and the interest unpaid up to August, 1859, was £116,000, which brought the total up to £591,000. The company's bonds of various classes amounted to £243,738, which, together with £43,434 unpaid interest up to August, 1859, made a total of £287,172. The amount required to cover the floating debt and place the road in an efficient condition was £250,000, while the stock subscriptions of that day still in force amounted to £169,000 ; making the total liabilities of the oompany £1,297,000. In 1859, an Act was passed, at the instance of the company, vesting its assets in the Crown, as a matter of protection against its creditors. The company afterwards was prosperous. A reference to the annual reports would show that notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen had said about the company being embarrassed, its annual income had increased until in 1872 it amounted to $900,000. The liabilities of the company in that year were $1,298,000 ; the gross receipts for the year amounted to $894,774. The ordinary expenditure was $528,509, or nearly sixty per cent. of the receipts, showing a balance of $366,265, which in all fairness belonged to the Government, the municipalities and the stockholders, without whose assistance the road could not have got through its troubles in 1859. The company did not, however, so divide the money. It appropriated $185,723 for special works, leaving $180,541 for the purpose of paying interest on the first and second preference bondholders. The management of the road since 1864 had simply aimed at saving money and paying the interest on the first and second class preference bonds. He would be quite satisfied if the Government would appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the company's affairs, which he was sure would convince them that the debt was a good one, and would be repaid to the utmost farthing. They would not then come down to this House and ask an amount equal to two millions of dollars to be placed in the hands of the bond holders. The resolutions of last year were submitted at a late stage of the session, and were not thoroughly discussed. He therefore thought it was not quite fair that the House should be called upon to-night, on the faith of that resolution, to pass a Bill doing away with the existing lien of the country upon that company. The company was perfectly able to pay, and this was simply a means of putting a large amount of money in their coffers. Corporations of that kind were well able to take care of themselves. It was said that the company desired this Bill passed, in order that they should be enabled to change their gauge, add new rolling-stock and make extensions. There was no necessity why it should pass on that account, for the line was an independent one, and no change of gauge was required. Hon. members were told that the Great Western Railway had received a large reduction of their debt from this Government, but the circumstances were entirely different. The Government loaned the Great Western Railway an amount of money at six per cent. which they had themselves borrowed at 4½, and the Great Western Railway was simply repaid the 1½ per cent. difference between what the Government had themselves borrowed the money, and the rate at which they had loaned it. There was, therefore, no parallel between the two cases. The Northern Railway Company came to Parliament and asked to be forgiven for a debt of $3,000,000 for which the Government would simply receive £100,000 in cash and £50,000 of third-class preference bonds which might be worth 50 or 75 cents in the dollar. This really meant a payment by the company of 30 cents in the dollar. He protested against the Government giving the Northern Railway any more than they were entitled to, and they were not entitled to receive $3,000,000 out of the taxes of the people.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he had explained already that the Government were not giving away one dollar but were receiving for its lien the fullest amount possible. There was an amount of $169,000 preference stocks, and these shareholders had never received one cent of dividend in any shape, and they would not receive any now as far as he could see. They had endeavoured to raise a loan in London last year sufficient to re-organize the company and pay off the bondholders but it was found practically impossible to do so, although every effort was made to effect some accommodation. The city of Toronto had given up its lien, and would be content in future to consider it simply as a bonus, it having voted £50,000 sterling towards the road. The longer the road was allowed to go on in its present condition the less were the prospects of the Government ever obtaining anything from it, and they were losing interest on the money the whole time. He desired to be understood as not in any way advocating the interests of the company, but as advocating measures that were in the interests of the public.

Mr. WOOD—Have you ordered an investigation into the affairs of the Company?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I have not.

Mr. MASSON — I should like to see the report of the valuation, and how it is arrived at. I have been unable to see a complete report.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — I have no report.

Mr. MASSON—How is the valuation then arrived at?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I valued it.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON said it would be known to hon. members that the original stockholders of the Northern Railway had never received any dividends. When the county of Simcoe and the city of Toronto had agreed to allow their subscriptions to be considered as bonuses to the Company, Toronto asking to have a representative in the Board of Directors, it was not asking too much to apply to the Government to give them relief. He was a bondholder of the second class for many years. For many years they were paid interest at the rate of 2½, 3, 3½, and at one time 6 per cent, but afterwards they occupied a worse position. It was generally felt that the Northern Railway was like a Grand Trunk—a leading line, and opened up the northern position of the country. It was true that the Great Western had occupied an excellent position to that of other companies; at one time, however, the dividends ran up to 9 per cent, although at the present time the bonds were in an inferior position. The Northern Company was deserving of consideration at the hands of the hon. members, and he hoped no difficulties would be placed in the way of the Government measure, which would be not only a boon, but a necessity.

Mr. LITTLE would support the action of the Government as it would be the means of placing the railway in a better position, for it was a national work, despite what hon. gentlemen had said, and of great importance to Ontario and to through trade, inasmuch as it was one of the leading thoroughfares to the North-West, and as great a national work as the Welland or Baie Verte Canals. The line was not in good working order; a change of guage was required, and a double track should be laid down. The County of Simcoe had done all it could in this matter, and he desired to thank the hon. Minister of Public Works for having brought the matter before the House. Particularly as the county of Simcoe in Council had memorialized the Government to take action in the matter.

Mr. COOK (North Simcoe) did not rise to oppose the measure, but the Northern Railway Company was now endeavouring to sweep away from before them every claim, municipal or any other. The hon. member for Muskoka had introduced a Bill to consolidate the Northern Railway and its extensions and branches, and also a line of boats. He was in favor of the Government measure, from the fact that the time was past when this company might have added to the revenues of the country which it could have done, if it had not been for the mismanagement of the company in years past when lumbering was active, and when the forests through which it passed had not been denuded, and therefore it become the Government to relinquish its claim on the road to a certain extent. The Meaford extension would never pay, and would be a burden upon the company for all time to come. The Northern extension would help to establish a connection with the Canadian Pacific, and was therefore a judicious project, as it would thereby secure a share of the trade of the North-West. The freight tariff upon this road was very much in excess of the freight upon other roads. He knew lumber could be shipped from Midland City or Penetanguishene—and though Collingwood was only 50 miles distant—and sent round to Goderich, some 300 miles, and by the Grand Trunk to Toronto for fifty cents a thousand cheaper than direct by the Northern Railway to Toronto. And yet the company was knocking at the door for Government assistance and relief from its municipal obligations. By this Government aid the railway would be better able to secure the trade of the North-West, but they would require to improve the Harbor of Collingwood. The town wanted a bonus for dredging the harbor, as it was only deep enough for vessels of light draft; and he thought there should be a stipulation by which the railway company would be bound to deepen Collingwood harbor within a certain time. If this was not done they would find the Northern Railway before many years asking the Legislature for some additional relief. There was one thing that had been overlooked by hon. members in discussing this matter. The Northern Railway Company had in the city of Toronto a very valuable property, —worth two millions of dollars—and he thought that should be taken into consideration. The County Council of Simcoe was then in session at the special call of the Warden to consider this question; and it would not be in good grace for hon. members to remove the county of Simcoe lien without knowing the opinion of the County Council. He would at the proper stage move an amendment by which it would be stipulated that Collingwood Harbor would be improved so that the road would secure the traffic of the North-West, that vessels of heavier draft would bring down.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) would only speak about the remuneration or rather the amount the Government proposed to allow for the aid to the Northern Railway. His impression was that the Government was making a very good bargain. When he saw the Northern Railway unable to pay any dividend on stock for the last ten or fifteen years, and when it was unable to meet its debt to the Government from the moment they borrowed, he came to the conclusion that the Government had a claim against the Company which they could not collect. How was the Government going to collect a debt from a railway? Would they take charge of the railway? He thought it was one of the greatest absurdities for any Government to write up interest on the debt as a part of the debt. They should under the circumstances, and as the people who had benefited by the road were the aggregate creditors, consider the original amount of the debt as sufficient. The Northern would never be in a better position to pay than it was now, as he considered the Muskoka extension and other extensions would weaken the road as far as paying the Government was concerned. He spoke without the slightest interest in the Northern Railway, and had offered the same application some years ago because he thought there was a scheme in it, but as Toronto had given up $200,000 and the county of Simcoe $200,000, he would support the proposition. As to the property in Toronto it was like this Parliament Building, they could not sell it because, they needed it for the business of the road.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he agreed with his hon. friend from Welland regarding this matter, and from a careful investigation of the affairs of the company, it would be ruined if it were compelled to meet its obligations. Had a different policy been pursued by a former Government a different result might have accrued to the country. The sum his hon. friend proposed to ask was as much as he could procure from the road, and he believed any larger demand would result in rendering impossible a basis for the re-organization of the company, involving the payment of the amount required by the Government. He believed the extension projects were likely to render the road less able to pay this debt than it was now. The proposition of the late Government was to give up the lien for £120,000 stg.; the present Government had £200,000 stg.; which was a much better bargain, and which was he believed as much as could be got.

Mr. COCKBURN did not rise to take any part in the debate, but simply to take exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe with reference to his reflections upon the officers of the company. He was not afraid to say that there was no better managed road in the whole country than the Northern Railway, and it was only an act of justice to the managers of the road to make that statement.

Mr. McCALLUM said this was considered in 1873 a good asset of the Province, and capable of paying interest at the rate of five per cent., and in support of this statement he quoted the following extract from a memorandum to the Lieutenant Governer of Ontario in Council on the 3rd May, 1873:—

"'Upon an examination of the returns of revenue as earned by this railway, and after a liberal allowance for expenditure on capital account, etc., it appears to the undersigned that the company could with facility pay interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum on this amount of the Provincial lien, and at the same time exist in full efficiency, and make from time to time such alterations and additions as its traffic and the public interests might require. The undersigned therefore consider this sum to be a good asset of the Province of Canada for the amount of $2,311,666.67, and that the sum of £50,000 stg. of bonds, with interest from July 1st, 1867, is equally so, and that it would be a most disadvantageous arrangement, and unjust to this Province. if the proposition contained in the said resolutions were adopted.

(Signed),

AD. CROOKS.

It seemed strange to him that the Company should not still be running the road at a profit. If it were the Government were giving away as much money as possible. As one of the representatives of the people, he must enter his protest against this thing. Were we to pay six millions, including land, for the building of a road to Georgian Bay, and then to be asked to give away three millions to keep this road going? He thought the hon. member for South Bruce had changed his mind within the last three years.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE was surprised at the hon. gentleman being so ignorant of public affairs as not to know that he (Mr. BLAKE) was not a member of the Ontario Government in the fall of 1872, and that he was not a member of any other government until the autumn of 1873.

Mr. MASSON—But the hon. gentleman was a supporter of the Ontario Government.

Mr. McCALLUM defied the hon. gentleman for South Bruce to contradict his statement. It made little difference how much he (Mr. McCALLUM) knew, but he endeavored to be consistent and to act in the interest of the people of this country.

Mr. WILKES thought that public opinion had decided that the proposition was a very liberal one towards the country, while at the same time not oppressive towards the railway. He did not wish to be understood as advocating the claims of the Company against the claims of the public. The hon. member for Terrebonne had stated that the Northern Railway was not a public work in the sense of the Grand Trunk Railway, inasmuch as it was not a work of national importance. He gave the hon. gentleman credit for considerably more geographical knowledge. There had been a proposition to make a canal at an expense of £10,000,000 sterling on the very line traversed by the Northern Railway, which was the identical line between the Georgian Bay and Toronto, travelled by the old French traders. If that was not a public highway, he would like to know what public highway we had. We are expending an enormous amount of money in improving our water ways in another direction via the Welland Canal, and after going 400 miles by that route we reach a point to which the Northern Railway can take us by a journey of three or four hours. If the Northern Railway was considered a national work before, how much more was it to be considered a national work now, when we are spending millions of money in opening up the great North-West? The hon. gentleman (Mr. MASSON) had forgotten the debate only a few days ago, when a large subsidy was voted to the Canada Central Railway for the purpose of establishing direct communication between the Georgian Bay and the city of Montreal, or, as the leading argument of the hon. member of Chateauguay stated it, for the purpose of establishing direct communication between tide water and Lake Huron. That was a great consideration for Lower Canada to receive for the expenditure westward, and now the hon. gentleman was contending that the Northern Railway which run through a section between two great lakes was not of national importance. At all events it was the opinion of the people of Ontario that the small amount relatively now being granted to that road in abatement of its claim was comparatively small besides the expenditure that was to be made to secure communication for the city of Montreal. He did not object to that expenditure for he believed it would be a great benefit to the country at large. It was important that we should develope our railway system as well as the whole system of the Welland Canal, and one important part of that railway system was the road between two great lakes. He admitted that was a misfortune, but he did not see that this country could help it just now, particularly as he had no doubt that the remedy would be applied by building another line sooner or later, but that did not alter the financial aspect of the question, which was the argument the hon. gentleman had presented. The mode of calculation referred to had been effectually answered by the hon member for Welland, calculating the interest on a bad debt would be a ready mode of making a fortune. The Northern Railway of Canada had not paid to the Government of this country the interest on the debt at all, consequently for more than fifteen years it had been an unproductive debt. The company having no capital must allow the road to get into a state of dilapidation. It was obliged to allow lumber to lie at the stations for months for want of rolling-stock to carry it. A very large sum was required for rolling-stock alone. The timber had been cut along the line and an extension north to Muskoka became necessary. It was now within a few miles of that lake which would bring it within reach of a large area of timber land. It was utterly impossible to complete this extension, to put rolling-stock on the road, or to lap the Pacific Road from Georgian Bay to the Ottawa River, unless the indebtedness of the road was re-arranged. He estimated that the liabilities of the Northern Railway Company, with the $1,000,000 now proposed to be paid to the Government would be seventy or seventy-two thousand dollars per mile of the road. The Government proposition was a very fair one and it was in the interest of the whole Dominion as well as of the section of country through which the road ran to have this lien re-arranged.

Mr. IRVING was ready to support the Government in their policy and would hold them responsible for the propriety of the arrangement they had made. There was no doubt in his mind as to the course which should have been pursued. The hon. member for Centre Toronto had travelled far out of his way to criticise the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. WOOD). Because the Northern Railroad was a Toronto road, therefore the hon. member for Toronto Centre would permit any one who did not come from that city to express an opinion upon it. The Northern Railway Company transacted business with the Bank of Commerce, of which the hon. gentleman from Toronto Centre was president, and it would be equally fair to charge him with being actuated by personal motives as to make a similar charge against the hon. member for Hamilton.

Mr. WILKES declined to reply to the personal reference to him further than to say that his relations with the Bank of Commerce and the Northern Railway had no influence whatever on him in a discussion of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL recollected that when the Confederation was formed this debt was put in as an asset against the substantial assets of New Brunswick, as worth one hundred cents in the dollar. Like the hon. member for Hamilton he would hold the Government responsible for this arrangement, but would expect some compensation to the Lower Provinces for the assets they were giving up.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the Government did not pretend to be doing this for Toronto, Simcoe, Collingwood or any other place or interests. They were simply getting rid of a troublesome debt on the best terms they could make. The hon. member for Simcoe proposed to compel the company to pay $30,000 to deepen Collingwood harbor. That was the Government should spend $30,000 where they had recently expended $35,000, for if they could get that amount to expend on Collingwood harbor, they could get it for themselves.

Mr. WOOD disclaimed any sectional feeling in this matter. He spoke what he believed to be the opinion of the people west of Toronto, when he expressed disapproval of the measure.

The motion for a second reading was carried on a division.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BLAIN moved that the order referring Bill No. 69 to the Committee on Banking and Commerce be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals, and Telegraphs.—Carried.

On motion of Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE, the House adjourned at 10.45.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 19th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

ESQUIMAULT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked leave to introduce a Bill entitled "An Act to provide for the construction of a line of railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo, in British Columbia." In doing so he said :—Mr. SPEAKER :—the necessity of this Bill arises from the fact that the Government have agreed with the Government of British Columbia, as stated in the papers laid before the House, to build this road at the earliest possible date. The Government have taken an estimate of a certain amount of money to be expended this year, but they have no Parliamentary authority for taking the necessary steps for the construction of a line of railway as to land and otherwise. The Government are not prepared to consider this a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they therefore require special authority. Parliament may at a future time, if it pleases, declare this to be a part of the Pacific Railway, provided that it is in the line that may suit for the ultimate terminus of the road on the Pacific. If the terminus be at Bute Inlet, for instance, and Parliament should resolve at a future day to go beyond the head waters of that Inlet and connect with the Esquimault and Nanaimo road, it may become a part of the Pacific Railway, but it is decided to build that part on the island as an ordinary Government railway, leaving the future to be controlled by Parliament. The first section simply provides that there shall be a railway constructed between these two points. The second section determines the gauge, and that the Governor in Council may provide such plans and specifications as may be required for its construction. The third section authorizes the Governor in Council to enter into contracts with a company or individuals for the construction of the road, and the sub-sections of the clause are practically the same as, or nearly a repetition of the clauses in the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill of last session, regarding the security to be given, and the mode of payment to contractors, namely, $10,000 for each mile with the land somewhere on the line of the railway, and any further amount that may be required. Sections, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 refer to the letting of contracts. The Government do not propose to submit these contracts for the approval of Parliament for the reason that they expect to be able some time during this season to let out contracts for this work, and they took Parliamentary authority for letting them in the ordinary way that other contracts were let out by the Public Works Department. As the Government do not in this Bill recognize this line as part of the Pacific Railway, it becomes necessary that they should have a special section for the land grant from the Province. Section 9 accordingly provides that the railway shall not be commenced, and that no contract shall be entered into for the construction thereof until the Government of British Columbia shall grant and convey to the Canadian Government in trust a similar extent of public lands along the line of the said railway throughout its entire length, not to exceed twenty miles on the side of the line as may be appropriated for the same purpose by the Dominion Government for the North-West Territories and Manitoba, provided the amount of land that may be held by pre-emption shall be made good to the Dominion Government from contiguous lands. Section 11 and sub-sections simply apply the provisions of the general Railway Act to this Act, so far as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the law. The Bill, although a little lengthy, is very simple, and is merely a repetition of the clauses of the Canadian Pacific Act, with a clause providing that the Government may proceed in the way indicated.

The Bill was read a first time.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD asked leave to introduce a Bill, entitled—"An Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba." The intention of this Bill, he said, was to simplify the mode of procedure respecting such claims. The Government considered the machinery under the late Act to be cumbrous and expensive.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD asked leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act, to amend and continue the Act 32 and 33 Vic., Cap. 3, to establish and provide for the Government of the Province of Manitoba. The intention of this Bill, he said, was to define more particularly what was meant by "Children of half-breeds." It was also to enable the Government to dispose of a portion of the 1,400,000 acres granted to the half-breeds. It was found when the division took place that some of these lands remained over, and it was difficult to distribute them equally. The proposition was to give scrip instead.

The Bill was read a first time.

DOMINION LAND ACT.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD moved for leave to introduce a Bill to extend to the Province of British Columbia the Dominion Land Act.—Carried.

The Bill was introduced and read a first time.

PAYMENTS TO JUDGES.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT presented a return to an Address for details of payments made to Judges of the Province of Quebec, on account of travelling expenses.

PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE, before the Orders of the Day were called, gave notice that he would to-morrow call the attention of the House to the petition introduced by the hon. member for Victoria; and moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. HOLTON, that the petition be printed in the Orders of the Day.—Carried.

SALARIES OF COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved that the Bill to provide for the salaries of County Court Judges in the Province of Nova Scotia, and for other purposes, be not now read a third time, but be referred back to Committee of the Whole House.—Carried.

The House went into Committee of the Whole—Mr. BECHARD in the chair.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said the amendment proposed was simply to limit the application of the second clause which provided for the increase of the salaries ot Judges receiving $2,000, and to place them on the same footing as the County Court Judges of Ontario.

Mr. McISAAC wanted to know upon what principle the hon. Minister of Justice made a distinction between inferior courts and superior court Judges. The former were required to be fifteen years on the bench before they could receive a retiring pension; while the latter after five years' service was provided for if he should be rendered unfit by ill health for the performance of his duties.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said his hon. friend had not been in Parliament when the first provision had been made for retiring allowances to County Court Judges. His hon. friend, the member for Kingston, had proposed to give them a pension after fifteen years, and it had met with no opposition from his (Mr. BLAKE's) side of the House. As to the distinction between County Court and Supreme Court Judges it had been stated by the hon. member for Kingston that the important character of an appointment to the Supreme Court was sufficient security to the public against such a thing as a person too advanced in years to perform his duties satisfactorily being appointed, but with reference to appointments of County Court Judges, there was not such a security against improper, extravagant and not economical appointments, and men might be put upon the bench with the view of getting for a short time a retiring pension. He did not think he misrepresented the statement of his hon. friend from Kingston and had taken the same view of the matter. Since then the hon. Mr. DORION had introduced a slight amelioration of the Act which provided that after twenty-five years' service it would be within the competence of the Government to give a County Court Judge a retiring allowance. The measure now before the House was simply to apply the same principle to the courts of the Maritime Provinces.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said his hon. friend from South Bruce was perfectly correct in reference to the distinction he had drawn respecting the retiring allowances to Supreme Court and County Court Judges. Before that law had been passed, County Court Judges had no retiring allowances at all; and they had welcomed it as a great boon, for there were several at the time the measure was brought in who were incapable through advanced age or infirmities of performing their duties properly, a service of fifteen years had been required, not only because their appointments were less noticed by public opinion, but because the most of them were comparatively young men when appointed; while the appointments of Superior Court Judges were so important that public opinion would always be a protection against any one being appointed who was too old or too infirm to perform the duties satisfactorily.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Iverness) considered the Bill unsatisfactory in its provisions, and that it was no argument to a criticism of the Bill to say that the law in Ontario did not provide for retiring allowances for County Court Judges. Those Judges should equally with the professional men selected for the Superior Court, be appointed because of their high attainments and qualifications. In Nova Scotia there were seven Superior Court and seven County Court Judges. Suppose vacancies should occur in each class, and they were filled by men of the same legal ability, and each fifty years of age. The Superior Court Judge would receive $4,000, while the salary of the County Court Judge would be $2,000; each had important duties to discharge, which occupied their whole time and attention. Upon what principle could Parliament enact a law providing that the former should be entitled to a pension should he become incapable, on the day following his appointment, ot discharging the duties of his office, while the latter Judge, possessing equal abilitles for the performance of his duties, would receive nothing.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD—Then they should receive the same salary.

Mr. MACDONNELL said two wrongs did not make a right. He failed to understand why the Judge of the Inferior Court was obliged to serve fifteen years before he was entitled to a retiring allowance ; if he served fourteen years and 364 days, and, becoming infirm, retired he would not obtain it. On the other hand, his judicial brother, who was appointed on the same day, if he became incapable of performing his duties, would receive a retiring allowance of £600 a year.

The Bill was reported as amended, and afterwards read a second time.

LETTERS PATENT.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the first reading of a Bill respecting patent rights (from the Senate.)—Carried.

THE PILOTAGE ACT, 1873.

On motion of Hon. Mr. SMITH, the House went into Committee, (Mr. BURPEE, Sunbury, in the chair) to consider the following resolutions for the purpose of amending the Pilotage Act, 1873 :—

" That it is expedient to amend ' The Pilotage Act, 1873,' by providing

1. That sub-section 5 of section 57 be repealed, with the proviso referring to it at the end of the section, and by enacting, that ships registered in Canada of such description and size not exceeding two hundred and fifty tons register, as the Pilotage authorities of the District, with the approval of the Governor in Council, shall from time to time determine, shall be exempt from the compulsory payment of pilotage in such District.

2. That for any of the offences mentioned in section 71, the pilot shall be liable to suspension or dismissal by the Pilotage authorities of the District, and on any evidence which they may deem sufficient whether he has or has not been found guilty of misdemeanor.

3. That section 11 and 16 authorizing the appointment by the Governor of Secretary and Treasurer for the Halifax and St. John Pilot Commissioners be repealed, and providing instead thereof that all Pilotage authorities may, with the sanction of the Governor in Council, appoint a Secretary and Treasurer, and pay such salary or remuneration out of pilotage dues received by them as they may see fit, and may with such sanction and out of such funds pay any other necessary expenses of conducting the Pilotage business of the District."

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved that the third section be amended by adding the words " or fees from licenses or both," after the words " pilotage dues."—Carried.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) understood that pilots were not required to take out licenses every year. If such were the fact, the Pilotage Commissioners after the first year would not have a revenue out of which to pay their Secretary.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said the pilotage authorities would have power to determine whether licenses should be issued annually. At many ports they were now issued each year.

Mr. McKAY (Cape Breton) said in his county examinations were held and certificates issued annually.

The resolutions were reported and a Bill based on them entitled " An Act further to amend the Pilotage Act of 1873," was introduced and read a first time.

Bill to still further amend the Patent Act of 1872 and to extend the same, as amended, to Prince Edward Island, was read a third time and passed.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the third reading of Bill respecting the lien of the Dominion on the Northern Railway of Canada.

Mr. McCALLUM said it was, in his opinion, a very serious thing to relieve the Northern Railway Company from the payment of this large amount of money, and he considered that the Government had not made out their case in behalf of this road. He held in his hand a statement of the condition of the road in 1873, signed by the Treasurer of Ontario, but hon. gentlemen opposite had endeavored to throw discredit upon it. Nevertheless, Mr. CROOKS lived in Toronto and had every means of knowing the ability of the Company to pay their indebtedness. The statement was that the Company could pay five per cent. of its indebtedness to the Government on the whole of its preferential bonds. When that statement was made, the Premier and the hon. member for South Bruce were in Opposition. The Government of Ontario was not in sympathy with the Government of that day at Ottawa, and the Northern Railway Company was not in sympathy with the Government of Ontario. He could not understand, therefore, why hon. gentlemen opposite attempted to throw discredit on this statement. It was cruel to discredit the statement of the Treasurer of Ontario when he was wandering over the Province unable to find a resting place for the sole of his foot. The hon. member for South Brnce had not long ago held up Mr. CROOKS as a model statesman aud financier, but now opposed him like a Parliamentary pugilist and political bully.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE called the member from Monck to order. The language used by that hon. gentleman was simply disgraceful.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the language was unparliamentary.

Mr. McCALLUM moved "that this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months."

The motion was lost on a division.

Mr. COOK said it would be absolutely necessary in order to make this road pay to dredge the harbor of Collingwood so that vessels with a heavy draught could get access to it. This would be necessary in view of the increased trade of the North-West, and on Lakes Huron and Superior and of the northern country. He was of opinion that this was the best time, and the best opportunity for accomplishing the dredging of the harbor. The company were receiving a great favor in connection with the disposal of that lien. He moved "that this Bill do not now pass, but that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole to provide that if the company get such relief, the said company shall not later than December 1876 dredge the harbor of Collingwood so as to admit vessels drawing at least 14 feet of water."

Mr. WOOD thought that the motion was fair and reasonable under the circumstances. If the Government were giving relief to this company to the large amount of over $3,000,000 the least they could do in return for that, was to make this harbor deep enough to accommodate vessels drawing fourteen feet of water. He thought in the interest of Ontario when the Government were constructing a road to divert the traffic of the North-West by way of French River to Quebec they should enable Ontario to compete for that trade. The Minister of Public Works no doubt honestly believed he could get no more from this railway than the amount proposed, but the hon. gentleman, had, last night, frankly admitted that no investigation had been made by the Government into the affairs of the company. The hon. gentleman had simply taken the figures of their predecessors, something which they were not always disposed to do with reference to railway matters; and he was glad they were not. This motion should be carried and the Premier should not oppose it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said there was no reason why the Government should give $30,000 for another object. If they were not going to get it for the Dominion they should not give it for Collingwood. This would simply be a diversion of the public money to purposes for which the House had not voted it.

The amendment was lost on a division.

The Bill was read the third time on a division and passed.

THE CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved that the Bill to amend the Act respecting controverted elections be referred to a Committee of the Whole.—Carried.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) moved the following amendment:—

5. "Whereas doubts have arisen as to the proper "construction of Sections 73, 101 and 103 of "the Dominion Election Act, 1874, and as to "the effect upon Elections held under the said "Act of the avoiding of previous Elections, it "is hereby enacted, that elections held under "the said Act, as well as Elections already held as "Elections hereafter to be held, shall be deemed "and taken, as respects both candidates and "voters, to be new Elections in law and in fact "to all intents and purposes whatsoever. "Except as the personal acts of the candidates "and the acts of agents of candidates done "with the knowledge and consent of such can-"didates."

6. "The next preceding section shall also apply to Controverted Elections tried under the Controverted Elections Act, 1873, as to the effect upon the status of the candidate of the acts of agents done without the knowledge or consent of candidates, but no further or otherwise."

7. "The sixty-seventh section of the said secondly recited Act is hereby amended by striking out therefrom, wherever they occur, the words 'and who is not a member of the House of Commons.'"

8. "In every case of an Election Petition presented under the Controverted Elections Act, 1873, in which twelve months shall have lapsed since the said Petition was presented and it shall then be untried, the Respondent may require, and the Petitioner within six days after demand, shall give new security in accordance with the terms of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, for the payment of all costs, charges and expenses that may become payable by the Petitioner in respect of such Petitioner."

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was inconvenient that amendments of such great importance should be made in committee. He would like to understand their propriety. This was a subject in which we were all deeply interested, and while there was every desire to take all necessary steps to carry out the objects of the Controverted Elections Act, it was just possible we could carry it to an extreme, and throw so many embarrasments and difficulties in the way of obtaining a repetition of the subject in the House, as to have the effect of making a great many men, that the country would desire to see in the House, and whom it would be an advantage to the country to have in the House, shrink from the efforts that would be necessary to secure a seat. It was quite possible to over-do the Controverted Elections Act, and produce a re-action nobody would like to see. If he understood this clause, it would subject a man, who had been once put upon his trial and acquitted, to having the whole matter gone over again, provided he run for election at a future period, and it was adopting a principle in relation to elections that did not exist in relation to anything else. He thought it was proper for any hon. member to give expression to a feeling widely prevalent in this House, that the Controverted Elections Act was quite stringent enough.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said if his hon. friend had been here the last two or three days, he would not have made those observations, because he would have known that the subject had been very carefully discussed yesterday, held over for further consideration to-day, and instead of hedging the Controverted Election Act so that a candidate should have more difficulties than at present it was actually intended to relieve him of the doubts and difficulties in which he was now placed; while it was making clear, what everybody desired should be made clear in the minds of all, that if a man or his agent had been guilty of personal bribery, he would not escape from it; but that if an election had been set aside for the acts of an agent, of which the member had not a particle of knowledge, he should not be liable to have the case tried over again, should he become a candidate for a second election. The law never intended that that should be the case, and the courts had declared that the law did not give any such intention; therefore, this clause was merely reiterating what the courts had declared was the intention of the law.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Renfrew) said it appeared to him to be altogether a matter of costs, and it was a great hardship if a person who had been tried once and acquitted should be tried a second time and made pay the costs, but a person might on the second investigation succeed in proving a personal charge. He did not want to be understood as raising any objection whatever, provided that at the second trial it could be proved that the person formerly tried was guilty.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he agreed with the observations of his hon. friend from North Renfrew respecting the question of costs, and it was possible that Parliament would have to interpose and lay down certain rules as to the manner in which costs should be disposed of. From several cases of which he was aware in which personal charges had been made against candidates and pressed as far as they could be pressed, and the Judge had decided there was no foundation for them, and had acquitted the candidate of them, it was but justice under those circumstances that the candidate should be relieved from so much of the costs as depended upon the personal charges. On the contrary, the judgment had been in several cases that there would be no division of costs, and a candidate had had to pay costs, and had been unseated for acts committed by his agents, of which he had no knowledge, and was not responsible for, and when an attempt had been been made to inflict a personal stigma upon his name. He thought Parliament had never intended that the law should have such effect; and considered it would be a grievous injustice that when a candidate had been tried and acquitted he should be liable to be tried again and made to pay the costs exclusively.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said there were several cases in which the Judges had awarded the expenses; and he agreed that a person who had made unfair and unjust charges of personal liability should pay that portion of the expense. He understood there was now under the consideration of the courts, as far as Ontario was concerned, a tariff with reference to that matter, and that rules concerning it would be distinctly laid down, so that in fact every one would know beforehand in a great measure precisely the class of liabilities, though not the amount of liability, to which he would be subject. He thought the cases in which this matter was involved might go before the whole Election Court.

Mr. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) inquired what objection there could be to have the clause put in so as to prevent the injustice mentioned being done.

Mr. BOWELL said he thought that if a few more amendments were proposed to this Bill it would become rather formidable in its character, and the Minister of Justice would scarcely know his own bantling. When first introduced it contained but one small clause, which did not now convey the meaning first intended, for all that was material in that clause had been eliminated. It seemed to him that the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier went much farther than appeared on the surface. If the hon. member for Cumberland had been here he would have learned that instead of throwing difficulties in the way of members running for constituencies and retaining their seats if they were elected, this Bill would seem to have the effect of keeping them here, no matter how they obtained the seat. If as a layman he might express an opinion, he would say he was in accord with the hon. members for South Bruce and Cardwell in thinking that a candidate or member should not be held responsible directly for the acts of his agents, but he did not think the clause should go so far as to relieve the voter who had been proved to have been guilty of corruption, and that those who had been bribed to record their votes should be allowed at an election two or three weeks or months afterwards to go forward and record their votes, as would be the case if this amendment carried.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—They are disqualified from voting for eight years if they are found guilty of corrupt practices.

Mr. BOWELL said if the hon. member referred to the 73rd clause he would find that it referred exclusively to the scrutiny of votes, and if a man who had been purchased or bribed recorded his vote for a candidate, and it could be shown afterwards at a second contestation that such bribery had taken place, his vote could be struck off. He would like to know how the amendments would affect such a case. In his mind it would have the effect that the election being declared a new election then those purchased voters would have a right to go and record their votes again, provided they had not been disqualified and reported. They knew how certain provisions had been avoided. They knew how members who had been elected, had had the election contested, and had gone into court, and in order to prevent an exposure of the corruption and bribery that had taken place had allowed himself to be unseated; in fact had brought up some trifling case of a dollar or two that had been expended and had thereby got unseated, thus preventing an investigation into the actual facts of bribery and corruption that had taken place, and after preventing in this way an investigation of the charges of corruption those persons had become candidates for the next election, and could go and do the same thing again. This course would be facilitated by declaring the succeeding election a new election, by which means the hon. member who had introduced the amendment would no doubt accomplish the object he had in view. The 103rd section of the Act read:—"If, on the trial of any election petition, any candidate is proved to have personally engaged at the election to which such petition relates, as a canvasser or agent in relation to the election, any person, knowing that such person has, within eight years previous to such engagement, been found guilty of any corrupt practice, by any competent legal tribunal, or by the report of any Judge or other tribunal for the trial of election petitions, the election of such candidate shall be void." Why should Parliament repeal a clause so as to allow a candidate to employ a person whom he knows to have been guilty of purchasing votes and using all those acts that have been practised to secure elections, to repeat what he had done at previous elections. What the meaning of the clause was, as interpreted by that amendment, he confessed he did not understand. Another objection was that raised on a previous occasion during the present session by the hon. member for Chateauguay, who objected to the passing of a railway Bill because it would interfere with an action now pending in the courts of law. This Bill, if passed, would interfere with one or two dozen cases now before the courts, by putting an interpretation on the law which it did not bear and could not be construed to mean, in order to prevent the unseating, if found to be guilty, of certain members who now occupied seats in the House. The whole object of the legislation of the last three or four years had been to prevent, by adopting the most stringent measures, bribery and corruption at elections ; and yet the very moment we arrive at a stage in our history when these practices are about to be suppressed, propositions were submitted to the House which would have the effect of retaining in their seats hon. members who otherwise would be unseated. If that were the will of the House, it was contrary to his ideas of correct legislation.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON thought the discussion of the clauses of the Bill might have been safely left to the legal gentlemen of both sides of the House. After the personal reference to himself, however, he would simply state that there was a very obvious distinction between cases, where material interests and vested rights were involved and election cases, where there were no vested rights, for no man could be said to have a vested right in his seat. He would regret to see any substantial positions of the law changed, pending the trial of cases arising under that law, but if there were a reasonable doubt as to the intention of Parliament in enacting the law, there could be no wrong, hardships, or violation of sacred principles in legislation, in declaring what its intentions were. Any change in the substantial positions of the law as applicable to pending cases, would be very improper. He was not, however, prepared to say that any such change was postponed.

Mr. BOWELL said it was, with diffidence that he, a layman, had discussed legal questions, but the subject was one that affected all hon. members, and each one might venture to express his opinion as to the effect of the passage of this law. He understood that the amendments was ex post facto legislation, and applied not only to the status of a candidate but also to voters. If the flood gates were to be opened so as screen the corruption that had taken place at the late elections they should open them wide, and adopt the principle that he who pays most should get most.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said if the hon. member for Hastings knew that for the purposes of the Act the first and second elections were to be taken as one election, he knew more than the country generally did.

Mr. BOWELL understood that was the decision of the English courts.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it was part of the old law, but he was not speaking of that. He was speaking of the intention this House had in passing the Controverted Elections Act. It was the doubt which existed as to the intention of the Legislature in passing the Act that necessited making it clear. Under the system of open voting it was known how an elector who was bribed recorded his vote ; but it was not so under the ballot. How would the proposition of the hon. member for Hastings, which was to strike off the vote of every elector in the second election, who had been bribed at the first election, apply to the London contest, for instance. In that case neither of the candidates who ran in the first election stood in the second. Would the hon. member strike off the votes of electors in the second election who had been bribed in the first by candidates who were not in the field in the second election ? Take an instance where one of of the old candidates stands again and is opposed by a new man. The former is exposed to the risk of having the votes recorded by voters who were bribed by his agents in the first election struck off in the second. Say forty or fifty were bribed. It is presumed that they voted for the same candidate at the second election and their votes are struck off, whereas the fresh candidate escapes that. There may have been sixty men who voted on his side who were bribed by the candidate he succeeds, but he loses none of these votes. That would be a palpable injustice. He did not believe that it was intended, in passing the law last session, that this should be the effect of it. He was entirely in favor of preserving this unexpected stringency of the law. A candidate who had been guilty of misconduct in the first election should suffer the consequences of it in the second. It seemed to him that the amendment met the case. The last clause referred to the employment of an agent who had been disqualified. For the purposes of the law, in a new election it must be treated as the one election or as two. If treated as one, then a man who had been proved to have been guilty of corrupt practices as an agent cannot be considered to be a corrupt man in the second election. But if the second election be considered a fresh election, then the agent found guilty of a corrupt act in the first contest suffers the consequences of it in the second.

Mr. BOWELL said there was but one way, then, to avoid the difficulty, and that was to prevent a respondent in an election case from electing to vacate upon acknowledging bribery by agents, or evidence being elicited to prove corrupt acts by himself or by his agents. If every case were thoroughly investigated, and all electors who were proved to have been bribed were struck off the list, it would meet the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—Ask the hon. member for Kingston to frame a clause to that effect.

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. member for South Bruce had the reputation of being the first to suggest throwing up the sponge as a means of getting out of the difficulty of a thorough investigation, and would therefore be equally well able to frame such a clause.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE denied being the first to make such a suggestion. It would be utterly impossible by any process of law to arrange that a case should be tried when both parties to it desired to drop it.

Mr. BOWELL could understand the difficulty in such a case as that, but not when the arrangement was on one side only.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it would not be practicable in either case. After a general election it would be impossible. There were frequently two or three hundred particulars in a case, and three or four hundred witnesses summoned. The moment it is ascertained that enough is proved to avoid the election, the only course open is to avoid the election.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said if the suggestion of the hon. member for Hastings were carried, it would be necessary to provide a very large contingent fund for such cases. He recollected in one case every man who had voted was summoned as a witness. How would all these men be kept if they were all to be examined? He remembered a case in which he was engaged as counsel in the local elections. They had three days of it. They had summoned to the place where the trial was to be held every witness, and they filled every tavern in the town. On his side they paid the first day $700 as witness fees. The second day, after some of them had been examined and allowed to go, they spent $600 in the same way, and the third day the expense for witness fees was $520. His clients said if they were going to spend any more he did not think his property would stand it. When the lawyer was consulted on the other side he said they had spent still more, because none of their witnesses had been examined. That election was set aside after a few of the witnesses had been examined, and if the law had compelled them to proceed with the case and examine all these witnesses, it would have been necessary to provide a contingent fund or compel the gentlemen on both sides to sell or mortgage their farms to meet the expenses.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said some reference had been made to his case in this discussion. He had ascertained that his seat could not be held, and he instructed his counsel to say so at once, but the petitioner went on as far as he could to prove bribery by agents, and then to prove personal charges. So far as he (Sir JOHN) was concerned, there was no arrangement made between the petitioner or his counsel and himself to have the case set aside without going into the testimony.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said he was aware of that fact. He knew that the personal charges had been pressed as far as possible, and that the right hon. gentleman had taken the course which he (Mr. BLAKE) was satisfied was the correct one under the circumstances. The result of the proposition of the hon. member for Kingston would be to render this law perfectly impracticable. The old law was unworkable in consequence of the tribunal and the expense, and if this House obliged people to incur ruinous expense in carrying on an investigation the law would defeat its object.

Mr. BOWELL said that in 19 cases out of every 20 contestations which had taken place there had been an indiscriminate summoning of witnesses without any knowledge whether these witnesses could throw light on the subject. If his suggestions were adopted it would prove what was called "fishing for evidence," for it would make petitioners more careful what witnesses they summoned, if they knew they would have to pay the expenses of the people investigated. His (Mr. BOWELL'S) desire was to make the law against bribery and corruption at elections just as stringent as he possibly could.

The Bill was reported as amended and the report was concurred in.

DISTRESSED MARINERS' FUND.

The Bill to amend the Act respecting the treatment of sick and distressed mariners was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole—Mr. DYMOND in the chair.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL regretted that his suggestions with reference to this Bill had not been adopted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The whole of his objection turned on the fact that sailing vessels were required to pay only twice a year whilst steamers were required to pay three times. He saw no reason why the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should discriminate against the latter class of vessels. He knew the argument of the hon. gentleman was that steamers came oftener into port, and brought more sick and distressed sailors than sailing vessels; now, his (Mr. MITCHELL'S) experience was to the contrary. The voyages of steamers were shorter than those of sailing vessels, and consequently the sailors had not time to get sick, and were not liable to become sick from the use of salt meat and want of vegetables as were the sailors on sailing vessels. If the hon. member was determined to persist in this measure he would suggest that an exception should be made in the class of vessels trading along the coast of the Provinces. That would to a certain extent meet his objections.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said that after having considered this matter thoroughly, it did not seem to him that he could with propriety adopt the suggestions of the hon. member for Northumberland. He (Mr. SMITH) did not consider it was an injustice to steamers to require them to pay three times a year. It must be apparent to every one that the vessel which came most frequently into port must leave the largest number of sailors at the Hospital.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE asked if this provision applied to coasters.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said vessels under 100 tons were exempted.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE said that coasters did not send sailors to the Hospitals.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL explained that coasting vessels on the St. Lawrence when they happened to have sick sailors on board sent them as a rule, to their homes, and they did not become a tax on the public in the same way as foreign sailors did.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill without amendment.

It being six o'clock the SPEAKER left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

The following private and local Bills were read the third time and passed:

To amend the Act passed by the Parliament of the late Province of Canada, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Montreal Board of Trade."

To amend the Act incorporating the Board of Trade of the Town of Levis.

To amend the Act incorporating the Western Insurance Company, and other Acts affecting the same, and to extend the powers of the said Company.

To amend the several Acts incorporating and relating to the Richelieu Company, and to change its corporate name.

To amend the Act incorporating the Canadian Navigation Company.

To incorporate the European and American Express and Agency Company.

To incorporate the Anglo-French Steamship Company.

The following Bills were read the second time and referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraphs:

To incorporate the Quebec and Lake Huron District Railway.

Respecting the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal Company.

Mr. MACLENNAN moved that the House go into Committee on the Bill for the relief of HENRY WILLIAM PETERSON.

The motion was carried on division.

The Bill passed through Committee and was reported.

The motion for the third reading was carried on the following division :

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

REPORTS.

On motion of Hon. Mr. FOURNIER the report of the Committee of Whole on certain proposed resolutions respecting salaries proposed to be paid to the Chief Justice and Judges mentioned in the Bill (No. 31) to establish a Supreme Court and a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion of Canada, was received, read a first and second time and concurred in.

On motion of hon. Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) the report of the Committee of Whole on resolutions with respect to the powers and authorities of the Trinity House of Quebec was received, read a first and second times and concurred in.

SUITS AGAINST THE CROWN.

Mr. IRVING moved the second reading of the Bill (No. 13) An Act to provide for the institution of suits against the Crown by petition of right and respecting procedure in Crown suits. He said as he observed that it had been announced in the Senate that the Government had assented to the adoption of this Bill, he would now explain, but very briefly, its objects. There was no procedure in the Dominion whereby the Crown could be impleaded ; and in England the only way, until within recent years, by which the Crown could be impleaded, was by petition of right and the fiat of authority thus given by the Crown had to be under the hand of the Sovereign, advised in the responsibility of the Secretary of State. There was no analogous machinery in Canada whereby such rights could be given. In England some fourteen years ago a Bill similar in substance to this, and from which in fact this was copied, was introduced into and passed by the Imperial Parliament, whereby a petition might be sent to the Crown and be referred to the Home Secretary, whereby the Crown may be impleaded, the consent of the Crown being obtained in the same way by which the subject could be impleaded. All that had worked with very great satisfaction for fourteen years in England, and had been adopted in Ontario for three or four years, as well as in the Province of British Columbia. He had now introduced this Bill under the impression that it was desirable in the interests of the country, as we were about to give out an extraordinary number of contracts, and as the business between the Crown and the subject would extend to considerable proportions, there would be constant claims by subjects against the Crown, and we should be putting such claimants in a better position, as under this Bill they would have a legal standing in the courts which they do not now possess.

Bill read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell), the Bill to amend the law relating to bills of exchange and promisory notes, was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole (Mr. PALMER in the chair), reported and read a third time and passed.

PROTECTION TO LIFE ON WHARVES.

Mr. COOK moved the second reading of Bill to provide means of escape for persons falling into the water in the vicinity of wharves and docks.

Mr. KILLAM objected to the bill as being out of order. Since it proposed to deal with a question affecting commerce it should have originated in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled the Bill out of order. It imposed a penalty and should have originated in Committee of the Whole House.

SUMMARY TRIALS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) moved the second reading of Bill to amend the Act for the more speedy trial in certain cases, of persons charged with felonies and misdemeanors in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. He said the object of this Bill was simply to give Judges of the County Courts in Ontario the power to reserve questions at law under the Statute 32 and 33 Victoria. There was a Statute in force in Ontario and Quebec that gave to County Court Judges the power of trying persons charged with offences that could be tried by the General Sessions of the Peace where the person so charged consented to be tried without Jury. Chapter 112 of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada gave the power to the Chairman of the General Sessions of the Peace to reserve any question of law that he might see fit, for the consideration of one of the Superior Courts. Now, he was only asking by this Bill that the same power shall be granted to the Judges of County Courts so that if any question of law should arise on which they desired to take the opinion of the court, they could do so by reserving it. This would be a very great convenience to the person tried, as well as satisfactory to the Judge himself, because if any questions of law arose it could only be brought to the court above at present by proceeding in error, which was very expensive. All that this Bill asked for was to give to County Court Judges the same power under this Statute that they had as Chairmen of the General Session of the Peace.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.—Mr. SCATCHERD in the chair.

The Bill was reported: third reading to-morrow.

INTEREST AND USURY LAWS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

On the motion of Mr. PALMER, the Bill relating to interest and usury in the Province of New Brunswick was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

DOMINION NOTE CIRCULATION.

On the order being called for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. WILKES for the appointment of a Select Committee on the subject of the Dominion note circulation,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said he would suggest to the hon. member that it was too late in the session to appoint a Special Committee to consider an important subject of that kind; and while he (Mr. MACKENZIE) regretted that he had not obtained a committee at an earlier day, it was quite evident that it would be undesirable to enter on an investigation of that question at this late period of the session. He suggested that the hon.

member should allow the order to be discharged.

Mr. WILKES quite concurred in the remarks of the hon. the First Minister that it was too late to have a committee to consider a question of this character; and therefore he asked the House to allow the order to be discharged.

Order discharged accordingly.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

On the order for the House to again go into Committee on the resolutions respecting the mode of constituting the Senate,

Mr. MILLS moved that the order should be discharged.—Carried.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) moved that the order for the second reading of the Bill to amend the Acts respecting controverted elections be discharged. —Carried.

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW.

On the House resuming consideration of the motion of Mr. Ross (Middlesex) for a Committee of the Whole to consider a series of resolutions on the subject of a prohibitory liquor law, and the motion of the hon. member for Lisgar in amendment thereto.

Mr. OLIVER moved in amendment to the amendment as follows:—"That all the words after 'that' in the amendment be struck out, and the following be substituted :—' That this House do forthwith resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the means best calculated to diminish the evils of intemperance.' "

The amendment to the amendment was carried.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole.—Mr. GOUDGE in the chair.

Mr. ROSS moved that having regard to the beneficial effects arising from a prohibitory liquor law in the States of the American Union in which the same was fully carried out, the House is of opinion that the most effectual remedy of the evils of intemperance is to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON (Cardwell) said the most effectual means of accomplishing prohibition would be to do away with drinking altogether.

Mr. ROSS said if Parliament would prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors he was quite willing, so far as he was concerned, that other people should use it if they could get it.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON thought that as this measure was scarcely expected to come up to-night the Committee should report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BOWELL said that if it was the desire of the hon. member for Middlesex to give effect to his resolution something should be added to it. The mere affirming of the principle without any intention of going further seemed to be playing with a very serious question. In order to give effect to the principle laid down it would be desirable to adopt another motion to the effect that the Government should take up the question, and at a future time submit a measure to the House. He therefore moved that the following be added to the resolution :—"And that it is the duty of the Government to prepare a measure at as early a day as possible to carry the principles of prohibition into effect."

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he would now make the motion he had thrown out as a suggestion a little while ago, and for the same reason then given—the action of the hon. member for North Hastings. He would move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, Seconded by Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—Carried on division.

SUPPRESSION OF GAMING HOUSES.

Mr. MOSS moved the second reading of the Bill for suppressing Gaming Houses and the Keepers thereof. He said he had already fully explained the objects of the Bill. It had been found by experience that although the authorities were well aware that gambling was being practiced in certain houses, the means which the law at present gave them of entering those houses and obtaining the requisite evidence for the punishment of the persons concerned in the offence were entirely inadequate. He accordingly proposed to give to the authorities powers which had been given in England under similar circumstances, and had been found exceedingly beneficial in their practical operation. It was notorious that although the authorities were perfectly well aware that gambling was going on in a particular house, and although evidence of the most difficult kind reached them that the offence was actually being committed, when they had managed to obtain an entrance by the only way they could by the law as it stood at present, the only evidence of the fault was generally the extreme innocence that persons engaged in the offence exhibited. This Act would provide that the police magistrate of any town or the commissioners of police might upon information in writing from the proper authorities, such as the chief constable or the deputy chief constable or other proper officer, could give power to such officers to enter any place which the report stated was used as common gaming houses, and that for that purpose they might, if necessary, use force. Of course the officers who were to give this information would be extremely careful not to give it unless there were reasonable grounds for believing it to be true. No abuses had arisen in England from the exercise of this power; on the contrary it had been found to be exceedingly benificial. It had been found by experience that when an entrance had been made by officers into a gaming house they were scarcely ever able to find the implements that had been used in the game. The Act provided that the officers could make a very wide search for the purpose of finding any instruments of the game. The Act further provided that the proof of persons being engaged in gaming should be made more easy and simple; officers never did actually find persons engaged in gambling. As soon as an entry was made into a house there was no gambling going on, and all the officers could possibly find were the instruments though they might have a very strong suspicion that the offence had been committed. This Act provided that if the implements of gambling were found in a house it would be presumed that gaming was going on, and the burden of proving innocence would be thrown upon the persons who had been found in the house. The Act also provided that no person should obstruct an officer, who, under the direction of the authorities, had entered a house on the ground of its being devoted to gambling purposes; and if the officer be so obstructed it should be considered evidence that the house was of evil character. This was an extremely necessary provision. The tendency of occupants of such houses was to prevent officers entering, and the attempt to obstruct or prevent the entrance, and to resist the mandate of the law should be considered evidence of the offence, and the cases of proof of innocence was thrown upon the resisting occupant. The Act provided that persons arrested in the house would be required to give evidence as to what was going on, and should not be allowed to protect himself by the statement that his evidence would be incriminating. At the same time if he made a fair and full disclosure to the satisfaction of the court, he would receive a certificate that would prevent any of the facts being used to his injury. This vice might not be so prevalent in our country as in some other countries, but it was assuming proportions in this country, especially in some of the frontier towns and villages, where it was customary for persons to come from the other side to carry on gambling with impunity within our borders, because the arm of the law was too weak to reach them here. He hoped this Bill would pass, and it would have the effect of preventing them from continuing such practices. In introducing the Bill he had mentioned a doubt as to whether or not the Bill was one which should have been initiated in this House or in the Legislature of Ontario. He had conferred with his hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and had concluded that it was quite within the competency of this House to initiate this legislation. In fact, legislation of this kind ought to be initiated here rather than in the Provincial Legislatures, as the offence was clearly a misdemeanor at common law.

Mr. WRIGHT (Pontiac) asked if this Bill referred to pool selling.

Mr. MOSS said that matter had been suggested to him since he had been here. Unfortunately he was not sufficiently familiar with the art of pool selling to know what would be the proper means of preventing its continuance. He hoped at a future session to be able to deal with that offence also.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole—Mr. MACDONNELL (Iverness) in the chair.

The Bill was reported.

The third reading was postponed until to-morrow, Mr. SPEAKER desiring to consider whether it was not out of order since it imposed penalties for certain offences.

HOMESTEAD RIGHTS AND WOOD LOTS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. RYAN asked whether it is the intention of the Government to amend the law so that those who have settled upon Dominion Lands in Manitoba, for the purpose of acquiring homestead rights, will get their wood lots without payment of the twenty dollars charged at present.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—It is not the intention of the Government to bring in such an Act this session. During the recess we will duly consider the circumstances which may arise and decide whether it would be advisable to do so next session or not.

Mr. RYAN asked whether it is the intention of the Government to confine the system of leasing wood lots in Manitoba to the settlement belt.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—It is not the intention of the Government to extend it beyond the settlement belt at present.

Mr. RYAN asked whether it is the intention of the Government to amend the law so as to extend to persons settled upon homesteads in Manitoba at the time of the passing of the 37th Vict., Chap. 19, the right to pre-empt a quarter of a section of Dominion Lands, given by that Act to persons settling after its passage.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—As I have already stated, it is not the intention of the Government to amend the Dominion Lands Act this session. During last summer by Order in Council we provided for persons, who had come in up to that time, pre-empting quarter sections adjacent to them.

Mr. RYAN asked whether it is the intention of the Government to take any measures to prevent the valuable woods south of the Assiniboine, in the county of Marquette, from being destroyed by the constantly occurring prairie fires.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—This is a matter with which the Dominion Government considers it has nothing to do. The Local Government must attend to it.

Mr. SCHULTZ asked whether it is the intention of the Government to permit Homestead settlement on any portion of the twenty miles belt along the proposed Railway line from Rat Portage to narrows of Lake Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. LAIRD—The matter is under consideration. No arrangements have yet been arrived at in that direction.

The House adjourned at ten o'clock.

THE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW :—The following portion of the debate on the Prohibitory Law on the 16th inst., was accidentally omitted.

Mr. WHITE, in seconding the amendment moved by Mr. SCHULTZ, said he did so because although not a teetotaller himself he believed the Government to be the proper parties to take this matter up. To adopt the original motion would amount to nothing, and was like the member for Centre Toronto, who made a long speech denouncing the result of the election of Mayor in Toronto because one of the candidates advocated the granting of a greater number of tavern licenses than the hon. member thought necessary. The hon. member, however, might well do that, for he owned a property in Toronto which was rented for a hotel—the American House—and the fewer licenses granted the more valuable would that property be. Since he (Mr. WHITE) had been in Ottawa he had seen an hon. gentleman take a bottle of wine at dinner on a Sunday, and then go and deliver a violent temperance lecture in the afternoon. He would like to see this put an end to by the passage of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. He fully approved of the suggestion made by the member for North Ontario that the Government should protect the interests of those who had their means invested in the trade on the same principle that Great Britain indemnified the slaveholders in the West Indies on the abolition of the slave trade.

Mr. WILKES, in reply, stated that the statement just made was simply a repetition of what had appeared in certain newspapers. He did not reply to it then, nor would be now. His character was sufficiently established not to be affected by such slanders. It was true he owned the American Hotel in Toronto, but he nevertheless would vote for a Prohibitory Liquor Law, and take his chances with the others as to the loss that might follow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, March 20th, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

RAILWAY PROPERTIES.

Mr. JETTE asked leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Railway Act of 1868. He explained that its object was to remedy a defect in the General Railway Act. Some of the Railway Companies were possessed of property which they did not use for railway purposes. He knew one company in the Province of Quebec which held a very important property in Longueuil that had not been employed for railway purposes for fifteen years, and no company could have possession of it either by ex-propriation or otherwise. It became evident that after a certain time these companies should be placed on the same footing as private individuals, and he would like to allow other companies to ex-propriate such lands if necessary.

The Bill was read a first time.

A QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. SPEAKER said he felt it his duty to state that having looked carefully into the authorities with regard to the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe, he was satisfied that the Bill was in order, and that the old principle of regarding penalties imposed for the purpose of enforcing an Act of Parliament as an impost upon the people, in the ordinary sense, had virtually become obsolete. In accordance with modern practice, the Bill was in order. The other objection he regarded as untenable.

Mr. COOK asked permission under the circumstances, to allow the Bill to be advanced a stage.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) was unwilling that the Bill should be proceeded with without a full explanation of its object. The House would see that it was utterly impracticable to carry out such a measure in the Maritime Provinces. It might, perhaps, apply very well to inland waters where there was no great tidal wave, but it would be impossible to keep ladders on wharves in the harbors of the sea-coast. It would be a great inconvenience to vessels. The more the Bill was looked into the more objectionable it appeared. If the hon. member for North Simcoe insisted on pressing his Bill, he (Mr. JONES) would feel obliged to move a three months' hoist.

Mr. KILLAM suggested that it should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Bill was read a second time and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said before the Orders of the Day were called he proposed in accordance with the intimation he had given of his intention to call attention, on a question of privilege, to the petition which it became his duty to present some time ago, and which was printed in the votes and proceedings of yesterday. That petition being forwarded to him he believed it to be a duty incumbent upon him as a member of Parliament to give the petitioners the opportunity of stating their grievances or alleged grievances by presenting the petition to the House. Of the accuracy of the facts therein stated, he had no further knowledge than he drew from the fact that those signatures to the petition were appended by parties, and the petition came to him from a source which was a sufficient guarantee of the genuineness of the signatures, and the respectability of the names. He desired to call the attention of the House to the subjects of which the petition complained, and the course which it appeared to be proper to invite the House to take in regard to it. The petition complained of certain matters in connection with the last election for the county of Victoria. It might be divided into two parts—one with respect to the appointment of the retiring officer, and the other with respect to the conduct of the returning officer in the execution of his duty. He was informed that the petition was now pending in the proper court for the trial of controverted elections, for the county of Victoria, and in that petition of course it was competent to the petitioners to prefer any complaint they might have as to improper conduct on the part of the returning officer relative to the merits of the petition. There might, however, be some conduct on the part of the returning officer which did not relate to the merits of the election petition, and which would not therefore come under the cognizance of the court; but most of the acts which the returning officer might be charged with would come before the cognizance of the courts necessarily, and inasmuch as the principal acts here complained of in the conduct of the returning officer were such as properly came before the cognizance of the courts on the trial of an election petition, it did not appear to him that it would be acting in accordance with the spirit of the Act to invite the House to deal with the conduct of the officer in the present state of these proceedings. He would he very sorry to believe that the House had been deprived, by the position of the Controverted Elections Act, of its power over returniug officers, and deputy returning officers—of its power to investigate complaints made against them, and to punish them for improper conduct. But when Parliament transferred the trial of election petitions to the Judges, and expressly provided that the conduct of returning officers might be complained of, and they might be made respondents to petitions, Parliament thereby expressed a preference for that mode of investigation, or at any rate a petitioner could adopt that course. Under those circumstances he did not think it would be proper to ask the House to enter into an investigation of the conduct of that returning officer pending the election trial. The appointment of the returning officer was a different matter. In the petition certain allegations were made which the leader of the Government would have an opportunity of answering. Hon. members knew that the general discretion of the Government with respect to the appointment of returning officers was by the present Government abridged during last session, and an Act was passed providing that the writs should be sent to one of two officials who existed in every county, from which the electoral districts were formed, namely, the Sheriff and the Registrar; and in the event of a refusal through his disqualification or inability to act, the GOVERNOR GENERAL in Council might appoint another person as returning officer. The petition contained the statement that the writ was not offered to the Sheriff, and that a person being neither the Sheriff nor the Registrar was appointed returning officer. He had been informed not by any member of the Government that there was good and sufficient reason for that course, in that the High Sheriff was unable to act because he was engaged in the discharge of his duty, as an officer of the Local Government, in holding an election the same day. The Government would state whether that was the case or not, and it seemed to be impracticable that the High Sheriff could discharge the duties of returning officer at two elections, when the polling places were at different places and the hours of polling different. There was also the complaint made in the petition that the returning officer was a person of no property in the county, and a brother-in-law of one of the candidates. Upon that he had no information other than what was contained in the petition. He had felt it to be his duty to present the petition which had been forwarded to him, and also felt it to be his duty, not only to the petitioners, but also to the Government, having presented it, to address those observations to the House in order that the Government might offer the necessary explanations with respect to the appointment of the returning officer.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that he was not aware that his hon. friend had given notice of his intention to bring the matter up to-day, and had not therefore made inquiries from the Secretary of State of the reasons for appointing as returning officer the person referred to. He would offer the necessary explanations on Monday.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said he heartily approved of the course taken by the hon. member for South Bruce. He was glad the hon. member did not propose to ask the House to consider the points raised in the petition when the election case was before another tribunal; at the same time it was not to be supposed that the House had abandoned its right to control, censure, and if need be punish, returning and deputy returning officers.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE — Since making the statement which I have made to the House, I have been informed that the reason this gentleman was appointed returning officer was that the Sheriff was otherwise engaged and the Registrar refused to act.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD— Then, of course, the Act applies, and the Government may appoint who they please.

Mr. CHARLTON rose and desired to call the attention of the Government to the fact that since the death of Judge WILSON three months ago there had been no adequate provision made for the transaction of legal business in the county of Norfolk.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. member should have either put a notice on the paper or given him notice privately of his intention to bring up the question. To discuss the subject at the present time was quite irregular.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD advised the hon. member to put a notice on the paper respecting the subject.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE —My hon. friend called my attention privately to this matter, and it has been attended to as far as the Government can attend to it.

INSOLVENCY.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER moved the House into Committee to consider the Insolvency Bill. He said the Select Committee to whom the Bill was referred had held numerous sittings, and had devoted much attention to it. With respect to the appointment of official assignees, the intention of the Government in taking to itself the power to appoint those officers was as far as might be in the public interest to appoint to those offices Sheriffs, who, he believed, would be acceptable as such officials. When the Bill was in committee, hon. members had stated that if it was the intention of the Government to appoint Sheriffs their principal objection to the Government having this power would be removed.

Mr. YOUNG understood the hon Minister to have offered an explanation only on one point of the Bill. As the question of an Insolvency Law was one of great importance to the country, he hoped the hon. Minister of Justice would extend his remarks so as to clearly indicate the changes made in committee, and that leading members of the committee would offer explanations, for by adopting that course the progress of the Bill through the House would be accelerated.

Mr. POULIOT:— Je ferai observer que la discussion de ce Bill semble prématurée. La Chambre n'a pas encore eu le temps de lui rendre justice. La version anglaise vient d'être distribuée, et nous n'avons pas encore eu la version française. Ce Bill est très important et nous devrions avoir le temps de l'examiner avant de procéder à le considérer.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER explained that the Bill as amended in committee had been reprinted, the object being to allow members an opportunity of noticing the amendments made. When the House was in committee he would, when necessary, call attention to amendments which had been inserted when the Bill was before the select committee. The Bill was a very long one, and had been examined with very great care by a special committee, and as he believed the Senate would require a good deal of time to consider it, he did not think hon. members would insist upon any more details before entering upon the consideration of the Bill in committee, when it could be discussed and explained clause by clause. He hoped the French members would not insist upon having a French copy for this afternoon as it had been impossible to get them printed, and he was desirous of proceeding without waste of time.

Mr. YOUNG said they had only just received copies of the Bill and had very little time to compare it with the other Bill, but probably all would be quite satisfied with the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he hoped this Bill, if adopted, would not be applied to British Columbia. There they had some years ago adopted the English law, and it had been found to work very satisfactorily; and the application of this law would be a step backwards as far as British Columbia was concerned.

The House went into Committee of the Whole—Mr. IRVING in the chair.

On the first clause,

Mr. MILLS inquired whether it was the intention that the Act should apply in case of a non-trader who through becoming surety for a trader was unable to meet his liabilities. He thought the Act should contain some provision to meet such cases as these were of not unfrequent occurrence. He did not desire to have the principle of the Insolvency Bill extended to non-traders, but he thought a provision should be made that when any trader or non-trader could go into insolvency the trader ought not to be discharged from his liability to a non-trader. For instance, a farmer was called upon to endorse for a retail merchant, and while he was held liable to the full extent of which he had incurred as an accommodation or endorsation for another, the trader could go into insolvency and get discharged in time, and the farmer would have no charge against him and might have all his property taken from him to meet the obligation incurred on the trader. He thought it was only just that the Act of Insolvency should not give traders a discharge from any liability incurred to non-traders. The retail dealer in the country incurred liability to the wholesale merchant from whom he purchased, but the latter took into consideration the risk, and by his charges and profits in a general trade, in fact insured himself against a certain number of failures; but the non-trader stood in no such circumstances, and while he was liable to the trader to the full extent of his indebtedness, whatever the circumstances, he had no remedy against the trader other than that which was possessed by other parties. If we did not give traders a discharge which did not extend to the community at large, we ought not to extend that discharge beyond those who were actually engaged in business, but the liability should still stand as between the trader and the non-trader.

Mr. COLBY said at a meeting of the committee he had brought up the same matter, and there had been an informal discussion, but no memorandum had been made, and he intended to bring before this committee an amendment setting forth that view. He believed that it was within the knowledge of many hon. members that many instances had occurred in which non-traders who had become creditors, or essentially sureties, for traders who had failed, had become involved in the same calamity without the same opportunity of being relieved from their obligations, and in many instances farmers had been obliged to sacrifice their entire property to meet that class of engagements, and could get no relief whatever. He could see no reason why a farmer who lent his credit to a trader should become involved in the same calamity as the trader and not stand, as far as relief was concerned, in precisely the same position as the trader. He thought the proposition he had made met such cases fully. As to the other proposition of the hon. gentleman (Mr. MILLS) he did not think it would be practicable. It might lead to collision between traders and non-traders if it were provided that there should be no discharge of the non-traders' obligations, by which the former could transfer negotiable securities to the latter. He did not think it was in the interest of any class that the operation of the Act should be extended further than it was. Many had assumed that it would be a benefit to extend it to the farmers of the country, but he thought there would be no greater possible injury to them. This Act was not a beneficial one for the trader, but it was purely in the interests of the creditor, and the relief given was only that fair relief which should be given under the circumstances. If it were made to apply to the farming classes, or to all classes in the community generally, it might result in the most disastrous consequences. Farmers might find themselves through a short harvest, or from any other cause, unable to meet their liabilities, and if they were thrown within the stringent provisions of this most stringent Act, they would find themselves stripped of their property and placed under most disadvantageous circumstances.

Mr. PALMER said there was a great deal in what the hon. member for Stanstead stated, but it was well worth discussion whether the operations of the Act should apply to all parties. He thought that every person in the Dominion came within the provisions of the Act. It would be impossible to carry it out in the manner his hon. friend had proposed. As he (Mr. PALMER) understood the proposition, it was that if a farmer endorsed for a merchant he sould receive the benefit of the Act, but did he mean that the farmer could get a discharge from that liability or from any liability. If he proposed that the farmer should be discharged from all his liabilities, it carried the Act to the farmers, for there was nothing to prevent a farmer getting into that position; and if it were proposed to clear him of all his liability, his whole estate would be taken away from him before he could get his discharge.

Mr. COLBY said it was intended to relieve the farmers of their liability.

Mr. PALMER thought the principle of voluntary assignment should not be in the Act at all. His own view of the working of this Act, so far as had seen it in his own Province since 1865, led him to be against it altogether. His idea was that an Act of this description ought to be temporary in its application, and not permanent. People in this country generally go into business without much capital, and in the event of a great crisis coming on, an Act of this description, of a temporary character, would be useful for the purpose of clearing persons who happened to require its provisions. He was not, however, going to oppose the Act, but should be rather inclined to include everybody within it. If, however, any class of subjects were to be excluded from it they should be put under exceptional circumstances, because he believed the working of the Act led to a great deal of practical fraud. He thought it would be impossible to eliminate fraud by the practice of voluntary assignments. It had been tried in England and persons of knowledge and experience admitted that it utterly failed, and it was often found that assignments supposed to be voluntary were arranged by friendly creditors, who made a composition for the exclusion of other and real creditors.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) said there was another principle underlying this Insolvency Act which hon. gentlemen had not fully considered. An Insolvency Act was not intended for every one. It was only intended for that class of the community who by the nature of their trade are subject to great risks. The class of people named in the first clause were, from the nature of their occupations, exposed to great risk, while, on the other hand, the farmer, and those who worked for hire, were not running any risk which would involve them in insolvency.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said the observations of the hon. member for Halifax furnished the true solution of this question, and the true justification for any Insolvency Act at all. Of course, there was something captivating at the first blush about the motion of the hon. members for Bothwell and Stanstead, but in practice the Act would not work satisfactorily if this rule were adopted. The general policy of this Insolvency Bill was that there were certain risks in trade which rendered it justifiable under certain circumstances to take the property of the trader and apply it in liquidation of his debts, trading and non-trading; and that being done honestly, to give him a discharge of all his liabilities. And why was this? Because it was said to be in the interests of the country that a trader should be entitled to his discharge and allowed to resume his occupation instead of compelling him to leave the country. The hon. member for Bothwell wished to have the discharge affect none but the trading debts. But, if the discharge were not complete it would be valueless. Everything the trader possesses is taken from him, and if he is left loaded with debt the object and justification of the Bill is blotted out. Then the hon. member for Bothwell contended that traders and non-traders stand on a different footing. It is true they do. The trader runs risks in the actual discharge of his vocation, which the non-trader does not. The non-trader need not endorse or lend money to the trader if he does not like. If he chooses to lend money or endorse for the trader, he knows that in doing so he runs among other risks this one—if the trader to whom he lends money or for whom he endorses should become insolvent, the debt will be wiped out, and he cannot recover it. What hardship is there upon him then? He enters into the arrangement voluntarily and knowing the risk he runs. He (Mr. BLAKE) believed it was one of the greatest mischiefs in this country that trade is conducted so much on the credit system, and anything which points out to the non-trading community the impropriety, the risks and the dangers which they incur by lending their money or credit to traders will be a benefit to them instead of a disadvantage.

Mr. COLBY—That has been pointed out always.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE said it had, but his hon. friend encouraged them to lend it. Now, he (Mr. BLAKE) said to the non-trader—"Do not lend your money, do not give your credit to the trader. Tell him he should trade on his own credit. Remember the words of Solomon and don't give surety." The relation of the non-trader to the trader is voluntary.

Mr. WOOD quite agreed with the hon. member for Bothwell that great hardship was sometimes done to farmers who were by some means or other inveigled into endorsing paper for country merchants. He thought that this was wrong in two ways. It was wrong to the farmer and to the wholesale merchant who was misled by the very fact of the endorsation. It frequently happened that a trader fell behind and induced a farmer to endorse for him, thus enabling him to get deeper in debt by a sort of false pretence. The farmer is the loser, but, as had been pointed out, it is not the business of the farmer to endorse notes. It is his business to sell the products of his farm for cash, and it is the business of the trader to buy and sell goods. If the principle advocated by the hon. member for Bothwell were adopted, every farmer in the country would be encouraged to go into insolvency. It would encourage him to go into speculations that he would not otherwise undertake. Very few farmers are placed in a position to be required to take advantage of this Act, and for the small number who would, it was not worth while to make this special provision.

M. POULIOT :—Je dirai de suite que je préférerais qu'il n'y eut pas du tout de loi de banqueroute. Mais puisque l'état de société l'exige, dit-on, il est désirable qu'une telle loi soit aussi propre que possible à protéger les victimes des dangers du commerce et à punir l'extravagance et la fraude. Si l'on jette un regard en arrière, on voit comment le système des banqueroutes s'est introduit dans notre pays. Des étrangers sans moyens ont d'abord commencé un grand commerce dans nos grandes villes, menant grande vie et faisant brillant étalage, ou se livrant à des spéculations très hazardeuses. Bientôt après on apprenait que ces grands marchands étaient en banqueroute, après quoi on les voyait apparaître réellement plus riches qu'auparavant. Les marchands Canadiens de nos villes suivirent naturellement leur exemple avec le même résultat. Puis les campagnes furent ensuite atteintes de la contagion, et comme toutes ces banqueroutes augmentent le prix des marchandises, ce sont les consommateurs qui souffrent. Il en est résulté de grands vices pour la société, la morale a diminué, le luxe s'est répandu, le commerce même on a souffert, et les établissements agricoles ont été empêchés par la tentation qu'offrait un commerce, malhonnête dans bien des cas, et considéré comme un moyen de vivre aisément, de mener la grande vie et de s'enrichir en peu de temps. Autrefois un marchand vivant avec économie et conduisant ses affaires avec prudence, augmentait son crédit; aujourd'hui on considère que c'est un signe que ses affaires sont mauvaises et qu'il va tomber en banqueroute. On peut aussi être en garde contre le marchand qui, à la veille de l'hiver, faits de grand approvisionnements et grossit son passif dans la proportion qu'il grossit son stock. Pourquoi le commerce ne ferait-il pas comme les cultivateurs qui s'entr'aident entre eux quand ils sont la victime d'une inondation ou d'un incendie ! Mais s'il faut absolument une loi de banqueroute, encore une fois faites en sorte, autant que possible, qu'elle protége les marchands malheureux, et non pas la dissipation et la fraude.

Mr. COLBY said the committee were now but on the first clause of the Bill, yet the discussion had been lengthy. He did not think this was a fitting time to discuss the general principles of the measure, and in order that something definite might be before the Chair, he would move the amendment to the provisions of which he had directed the attention of the committee already. He therefore moved in amendment: "That the following words be added to the first section, to follow the 35th line, viz.: This Act shall also apply to non-traders, who, by reason of being creditors or sureties of insolvent traders, are unable to meet their engagements" To show how necessary it was that this amendment should be made, he pointed out that the Bill provided that millers who were unable to meet their engagements could take advantage of the Insolvency Act, whereas the farmer who sold his grain to the miller, and because of the failure of the miller also became insolvent, was precluded from its advantages. He (Mr. COLBY) could not see for what reason any difference should be made between the two. The same cause had operated to bring them both to the same condition. In the same way, if the farmer entrusted his grain to the grain-merchant, the grain-merchant became insolvent, and as a consequence the farmer also failed to meet his liabilities; and if the grain-merchant were to be absolved from his obligations, he did not see why the farmer should not receive receive absolution also. The hon. member for South Bruce said it would not do for farmers to take risks. The hon. member spoke as if some new feature of legislatian were being initiated in that direction. The truth was, however, that no change was being proposed in the law. If the logic of the hon. member for South Bruce were carried to its proper conclusion, it would be enacted by law that no farmer who became a creditor should be able to collect his debt. This was the only possible way of preventing a farmer from taking risks. If a farmer, seeing a friend or a relation in difficulties risked his all in order to extricate him, and by this manly and self-sacrificing act was himself involved in the common fate, he should be placed in the same position, at the very least, as the man whose misfortune was the cause of the failure. He did not under ordinary circumstances, believe in making this law applicable to the farming community ; but under the peculiar circumstances prevailing, he believed a provision such as he proposed should be made. He was not stating any hypothetical case, but facts which occurred every day. He desired to press his amendment as being in the interests of the farmers, and if it were not agreed to in committee, he would make a similar proposition on concurrence. He saw no danger of bad results if his amendment became law.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL said he agreed with his hon. friend from St. John, that there should be no Insolvency Law at all. Whilst taking that view, however, he was free to admit that the great force of public sentiment was in its favor. He entirely dissented from the principle, but if we were to have a Bankruptcy Act, it should, he thought, apply to all classes alike. The first section of the Bill before the committee he deemed to be most inartistically drawn. It was said to be framed upon an English Act—certainly not the Act in force in England at the present day, for its benefits were extended to all, irrespective of their being traders. He read the clause over, showing that while carpenters were included, blacksmiths were excluded, brickmakers were given the advantage of the law, and an ice dealer was not, aud so on throughuot. He could see no justification of this system of picking out a few favored classes in this way. If the Act was going to be of any benefit to the country, why not extend those benefits to all, why, for example, should the great and important lumbering interest be excluded.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said the end of the clause covered that objection entirely.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL doubted very much whether it would. It would be difficult, for example, to say under what designation the lumberer could classify trees felled in the woods, and the clause required that the nature of the goods should be specified. If this clause were sustained, and we were to have special class legislation, it would be far better merely to state what classes were excluded. He was in favor of a law which would confer upon every person in the community whatever advantage or disadvantage there was to be derived from it. If no other hon. gentleman submitted a resolution to that effect, he would do so himself.

Mr. OLIVER said his hon. friend from Hamilton had stated that if the Act were made applicable to farmers they would all go into insolvency ; but he assured his hon. friend there was no fear of that. He denied also the correctness of the same hon. gentleman's assertion that farmers ran no risks ; they ran just as many risks as any class mentioned in the clause before the committee. He held that a great injustice would be done the agricultural community, subject as they were to the chances of having their crops ruined by bad seasons, if they could have no relief when they got into difficulties. The distinction between those who cultivated land for ordinary agricultural purposes and those who tilled the land to send its products to the market, the former of whom was excluded from the operation of the law, and its advantages conferred upon the latter. Neither could he agree with the amendment of his hon. friend from Stanstead. It would still not apply to the great mass of those who unfortunately required an Insolvency Act. The only remedy of this defect was to make the Act apply to all. The farmers composed a very large majority of the people of this country, and he considered it extraordinary and unprecedented that they should be excluded from the privileges of this Act. His hon. friend from Hamilton said a farmer had no right to endorse paper to a country or city merchant, but the truth was that these merchants compelled the farmers to endorse their paper. He was himself of the same opinion as the hon. member for St. John, that there should be no Bankruptcy Law, and the same opinion was shared by a great many gentlemen in this House.

If it had not been for the interference of Boards of Trade, the Insolvency Act on the Statute Book would have been allowed to lapse; but those bodies had not only assumed to legislate for themselves and dictate to this House, but also to legislate for the whole community. If it had not been for the pressure which those Boards brought to bear there would have been no longer an Insolvency Act. The late law acted as an inducement to young men to enter into business without either experience or capital, knowing that if unsuccessful they had an institution created by Parliament to protect them in the event of failure, and if successful so much the better for themselves. Many failures which occurred were due to the action of the wholesale houses of Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton, whose representatives visited every village and pressed goods on the merchants, offering three and six months credit, and even twelve months credit to make a sale. It was the practice of travellers for the wholesale houses pressing their goods on the country merchants that had caused so much distress.

Mr. JONES (Halifax)—They cannot compel the merchants to take the goods.

Mr. OLIVER said that while such was the fact, when country merchants owed the wholesale houses a debt they were often induced by travellers to take more goods than they required. The representatives of the wholesale houses visited the village in such numbers that frequently ten or fifteen of them called on a trader in one day. He hoped in framing the Insolvency Law there would be no attempt at class legislation, for if such a law were desirable for the brick maker, the tailor and other traders, it would be also good for the farmer.

Hon. J. H. CAMERON said it was quite certain that if every clause was to be discussed after the manner in which the discussion had commenced, the debate on the Bill would not be closed by the middle of April. There were three propositions that in some way or other the House would have to decide upon before they could come to a conclusion respecting the measure. The first was whether there should be an Act of Insolvency at all. Many persons thought there should not be such an Act constantly enforced; but that when a period of great distress came, Parliament should sweep away the consequences by having an Insolvency Law passed. But the feeling of the people of this country was that there should be an Insolvency Law of some kind. The second question which hon. members discussed at the very beginning of the debate in committee on the Bill was whether the Bill should apply to non-traders as well as traders, or to traders only. His own idea was that it should apply to all sections of the community exactly as was the case under the present English Law. According to the old law in England there were two Statutes, a Bankrupt Law for traders and an Insolvency Law for non-traders. For a great number of years the law was carried out in a separate and distinct manner for these two classes of the community. Only four years ago the Imperial Government made alterations in the law, by which they merged the two classes of business into one law, and they were now conducted under the same Act, applicable, in different ways, to both traders and non-traders. Thus, in a country having such large commercial transactions as England, he did not find that they had found it desirable to confine the principle merely to traders, but they had extended the principle to non-traders too. He failed to see how it was possible to carry out the view of the hon. member for Bothwell, or that embodied in the amendment framed by the hon. member for Stanstead. It was absurd to say that because a non-trader endorsed a trader's note that thereby he became a trader, as that was what would have to be said if the proposition was carried out. It was desirable that the question should at once be decided by the House, by some hon. member moving an amendment, whether the Act should be so applied to non-traders as well as traders. The third question on which a great deal of opinion existed, was whether the insolvency should be a voluntary law or purely a compulsory one. Many persons said that as the law was now being framed the act of insolvency would be as much a voluntary as a compulsory one, because, it was alleged all a debtor had to do was to make an arrangement with some of his creditors to place him in insolvency; and although the committee had endeavored to prevent it by inserting a clause requiring that an affidavit be made alleging that no collusion had taken place, everybody knew perfectly well that what might not be collusion under the law might have the same effect. But so long as the law declared that the insolvency must be compulsory, he thought the provision inserted in the Bill in regard thereto might be made more stringent. This was another point, therefore, on which discussion might necessarily take place, and a decision theron be arrived at by the House before they entered upon a consideration of some of the minor clauses. He was prepared to move, if it were not done by some other hon. member, that the provisions of the Act be extended to non-traders as well as traders, whereby the question would be raised whether the country was to have an Insolvency Act, it should not be made similar to the law in England and apply to all classes of the community.

Mr. MACLENNAN thought it would be a great misfortune in this country if an Insolvency Law were passed which should be applicable to the whole community. It was of the highest importance that we should admit the obligation of every man to pay the debts which he had legally incurred; that principle must rest at the very foundation of every well regulated and well governed community. He believed that when a man incurred a debt he ought to feel that he was placing not merely his present property, but also his future property in the scale for the purpose of paying the debt; not only so, but that he was incurring an obligation which would affect not only his own comfort, but also the comfort of his family. Any law of a general character which tended to impair that obligation, which ought to be preserved, was an unsound and impolitic law, and ought not to be enacted by any Parliament. Then, if that principle were a sound one, we must bring the portion of the community, to whom we apply an Insolvent Act, into some exceptional position with respect to that principle, and the only ground on which an Insolvent Law could be defended was that it was for the interest of the community that a certain portion of it should embark in business of a kind which involved risk. We therefore proposed to confine the operations of the law to that portion of the community who were engaged in business attended with risk, and we would be violating the principle he had ennunciated by going beyond that class. While in committee, hon. members endeavored to limit the operation of the law to traders. That term was sufficient to indicate, in the Province of Quebec, the class to whom the Act would apply; but in Ontario that term had no legal meaning, and it became necessary to define those classes of business involving risk to which the Act would apply. Parliament was not without a precedent for that course. The British Parliament which in times past had enacted many Acts on the subject of insolvency, had at an early period defined the meaning of the word "trader," and in the Bill now before the House the English definition of that word was adopted with a view to render more easy the interpretation and construction of the law. The committee adopted this course for another reason, that, inasmuch as the existing Insolvency Law contained no definition of the word trader, questions had arisen in Ontario and other Provinces as to what was the precise limit of the meaning of that word. The hon. member for Oxford had admitted the claims of the farming community, but the business of a farmer was not one attended with risk. It was not essential to the proper carrying on of a farm that the farmer should deal upon credit, and if he did he ought to feel the obligation that, not only his present, but his future welfare and the comfort of his family, were involved in his paying his indebtedness. He should not incur a debt, looking forward to the chance, that if he should not be able to pay it, he would be whitewashed. With reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell, he (Mr. MACLENNAN) would like to know how it was possible to justify the sweeping away of the means of a man's paying his debts, and yet not give him a discharge, provided he had acted honestly in his business. That was simply the position in which the proposition of the hon. member would leave the trader if it were adopted. He hoped the House would say that the clause of the Bill which had been passed in committee was one that should be adopted by the House. It drew the line where it ought to be drawn with reference to this legislation on the subject of insolvency.

Mr. BOWELL had proposed to criticize this clause, but the hon. member for Northumberland had dealt with the question already, and it would be much better for the House to act upon the suggestion of the hon. member for Cardwell that the sense of the House should be tested as to the extent to which the principle of an Insolvency Law should be carried; then all this discussion would be avoided. If, on the contrary, the House would not carry the principle to the same extent to which it was carried in England, they could discuss the propriety of extending it to that class of people not included in the Bill. He proposed to move an amendment in that direction. It had been stated by some one in this discussion that the brick-makers mentioned in the Act were not those who worked in the yards, but those carried on the business of brick making; and yet a carpenter was allowed to take advantage of the Act. Now a carpenter was just as much a workman; he worked by the day for hire as did a brick-maker. Where there was one carpenter who rose to the position of a builder or contractor there were hundreds and hundreds who never took a contract.

Mr. YOUNG—And they were excluded.

Mr. BOWELL—Then what is the meaning of the word "carpenter?"

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—It means such carpenters as had not worked for hire.

Mr. BOWELL—Then the word "builder" would be the proper term.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE—There are many master-carpenters who are not builders.

Mr. BOWELL continued—Then again, a market-gardener, who had half or quarter of an acre of land in the vicinity of a city was allowed to take advantage of the Act. He might incur his debts in some other way and yet get whitewashed; while the farmer who cultivated hundreds of acres of land might sell all his grain to a miller, and after waiting for months for his money, the miller goes into insolvency, and the farmer loses all his means in consequence. Now this was unfair, and he therefore moved the following amendment to the amendment: "This Act shall apply to all traders and all co-partnerships and companies whether incorporated or not, except incorporated banks, insurances, railway and telegraph companies and debts incurred by breach of trust." He added these last words because he thought persons who had made away with monies intrusted to them should not be allowed to take advantage of this Act.

Mr. STEVENSON seconded the amendment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Elgin) said with regard to market-gardners, their position was not the same as that of farmers. They carried on trade and incurred risk, and for that reason this Act applied to them. With regard to whether it was desirable or not that this law should apply to all classes of the community, non-traders as well as traders, he would state that it was in existence in Canada from 1864 to 1869, during which period it was applicable to all classes of the community, and the feeling of the country, as expressed by Parliament, was that it was desirable that it should be restricted to certain classes. The experience of boards of trade—and he was not one who undervalued their opinion on commercial questions—was that it was not in the interest of this country that this Insolvency Law should apply to all classes. The non-trader who became responsible for the debts of the trader, did so voluntarily and should not be allowed to take advantage of this Act—otherwise in assisting his friend he would do so not at his own expense, but at the expense of the creditor.

Mr. YOUNG said no time need be taken up in discussing whether we should have an Insolvency Law or not. That had been passed upon by the House already in the affirmative, and all the boards of trade and commercial men in the country were almost unanimously in favor of an Insolvency Law. There could not be a shadow of doubt as to that fact, so far as the commercial community was concerned. He for one would consider it a great mistake to extend this law beyond those who were engaged in trade and risky enterprises of that character. What would be the effect of it? We would have every laborer who found himself in debt to his grocer, going into insolvency.

An Hon. MEMBER—And why not?

Mr. YOUNG—For the simple reason that it would greatly interfere with, and disturb the trade of the country. If this clause were extended to all the non-trading classes, there would be a hundred insolvency cases for ten at the present time? Non-traders might run a few debts, and, if pressed for payment, might go into insolvency. The effect of such a law would be that these classes would soon get no credit at all, and that under the circumstances, would be a great evil to many of them.

No trader would trust these persons if the law were in that condition. It would also seriously affect farmers in the back parts of the country. They were often placed in positions of hardship, and obliged to get credit. Many of our best farmers, in the early settlement of the country, had been placed in such a position, and would have been obliged to leave the country. if they had not been able to obtain credit. He was not surprised at the hon. memher for North Oxford and others who took his view of the question, wishing to have this clause extended to all classes, because they were opposed to us Insolvency Law altogether. They would like to destroy the Bill altogether, and they knew that if the amendment which they suggested, if adopted, would have a tendency to make the measure absurd. It would so worry and annoy the trade of the country that appeals would be made to this House at its next session to set aside the law. With regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead, if it would open the door to a large number of insolvencies, he (Mr. YOUNG) for one would certainly oppose it, but he thought it would be possible to so word the clause that non-traders who had been rendered insolvent by assisting those who had the benefit of the Act, might receive a certain measure of relief.

Mr. COLBY—It would act in that way precisely.

Mr. YOUNG would like to have the opinion also of other legal gentlemen in this House on that point. If. they held that it would have that effect, he would not oppose it. He had seen many cases of hardship which would come under the working of this proposed clause. He knew of farmers who had set up their sons in business, not only giving them capital but also endorsing for them. These persons after losing all their means, ruined their fathers also by their failure. Under the operation of the late law the sons were able to pass through the Insolvency Court, and commence business again ; but the father who had assisted the sons by his means and his credit, could get no such relief. The hon. member for South Bruce had remarked that the farmer need not lend money or endorse, while on the other hand the trader risked his capital. Well, did not the farmer who ventured his capital in a business conducted by his son, practically engage in that business and risk his capital. He thought there should be some provision made for the relief of such persons. He hoped the House would not be led away by the amendment of the hon. member for Hastings. The practical effect of that amendment would be to render the law absurd and destroy it. It would harrass and annoy the whole trade and business of the country, and create a state of things which he was sure his hon. friend would regret after he saw it in operation.

Mr. BOWELL—Why does it not have that effect in England.

Mr. YOUNG said there was a very different state of things in England to what existed here. In England farmers operated on a very large scale. It was not unusual for a farmer to have from $50,000 to $200,000 invested in the business in which he was engaged ; but it was very different in this country. He hoped the amendment to the amendment would be voted down, but he was of opinion that an exception might be made in favor of the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead. It would give relief to many of our best citizens who are just as much entitled to it as many traders to whom the Act is intended to apply.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said it was not only a waste of time to discuss the question as to whether there should be an Insolvency Law or not, but it was out of order, and he hoped the Chairman would use his authority to prevent such discussion. This committee must discuss, as it was sent to them. With regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Hastings he thought it was approached by him from a wrong point of view. It seemed to be the hon. gentleman's opinion it was in the interest of the non-trading class that they should have the advantage of this Act. He (Sir JOHN) thought it would be the greatest misfortune to the farming community if they were brought under this Act. It would not be optional with a farmer if he got into the strait mentioned to go into insolvency, but he could be forced into insolvency by his creditors, and it was not in his interest that this could be done whenever it pleased them. A farmer could only meet his engagements once a year when his crop was garnered and ready for sale. Under this amendment the creditors could, in the spring of the year, force the farmer into insolvency and sell his farm and his green standing crops to meet his liabilities. From his (SIR JOHN'S) point of view it would be a misfortune to the farming community. He was not a farmer himself, and of course could only give his own view of the case, and if the hon. gentlemen who represented the farming community in this House thought differently, he (Sir JOHN) could have no objection to the amendment. The hon. member for West Elgin was correct in saying that the experience of the old Provinces of Canada was that the Act should not apply to all classes.

Mr. KIRPATRICK thought this Bill was in the interest of the creditor, in order that a debtor might not allow one creditor to get the whole assets of an estate in his own hand to the exclusion of all others. Moreover, the principle was admitted that the creditors should say whether a debtor should be placed in insolvency or not. Now he (Mr. KIRKPATRICK) did not see why creditors of non-traders should not say whether a debtor shall be placed in insolvency or not just as well as the creditors of a trader. As for the illustration of the right hon. member for Kingston he (Mr. KIRKPATRICK) thought he was not quite correct this time. The right hon. gentleman had given a melancholy instance of a farmer getting into difficulty and being driven into insolvency, while his crops were growing. Did not the right hon. gentleman know that under the present law one creditor could sue him and put the Sheriff upon him, without any chance of having a fair distribution of the assets, and sell out his farm before he could harvest his crop.

Mr. CURRIER said it was quite time, as the hon. member for Kingston had stated, that the harvest come but once a year; but there were other classes of the community for whom the harvest come but once a year. The same arguments applied to farmers could be applied to lumbermen and with more force, for it took the farmer only six months to get his return, while it took the lumberman six months to get out his timber or lumber, and three months to get it to market. His opinion was that if we were to have a bankruptcy law at all it should be applied to all classes in the community alike. There could be no reason why it should not apply in that way.

Mr. STEPHENSON said he thought one man was just as good as another man, and that a farmer had just as good a right to get a discharge as a trader. In his own section many a farmer had been ruined because he had endorsed for a tradesman, and the tradesman had got whitewashed through the Insolvency Law, but the farmer was left where he was. He thought the man who gave his name to enable another to get credit should, so long as both acted honestly and squarely, be treated in the same way—in case insolvency were necessary—and that both should be entitled to a discharge. As it was now, the farmer was not. He knew for instance in his county where a farmer with property worth $25,000 endorsed for a tradesman who failed, and the tradesman under the Insolvency Act got his clearance, but the farmer was left without any resource whatever. He could not see why a farmer should not be able to get his discharge just as well as a trader, so long as they acted honestly. He would, therefore, support the amendment to the amendment and if that did not carry, then the amendment to the original motion.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said he thought if one man was to be included under this clause all should; any man, whether a farmer or not, should be dealt with in the same way as a trader. In looking over the clause enumerating the clauses to whom the Act should apply, he found a number left out who should be included. He had come to the same conclusion as the hon. member for Northumberland, who had pointed out that carpenters were included and blacksmiths left out. The shipwright was included; but the men who were doing other work required by the shipwright were omitted. Printers were secured, but the men for whom the printers worked—the newspaper proprietor and publisher—were left out. We had heard a great deal recently from the hon. member for West Middlesex about the debasing influence of drinking liquor, and we had a prohibitory liquor law advocated, and all the horrors of intemperance brought before us, but here we found tavern-keepers, the men who were supplying the liquor that caused the ruin of their constituents were included in the law. These men could purchase all they wanted from the farmers, put the money in their pockets, and take the benefit of this Act. Why should they not give the honest, hard-working farmer the benefit. Many manufacturers and mechanics were ommitted and others were included; and he thought it was necessary to have the clause withdrawn. There were no precise reasons given why the line should be drawn where it was. In his own Province there was one class of men who contributed more largely to the wealth of the Province than any others—the miners—and they were not included. They invested in many cases thousands of dollars in mining enterprizes, and had to go on month after month and year after year, without realizing anything. In his own district there was a company who had worked two years and had expended from $25,000 to $30,000 in machinery and improvements before they had actually begun to search for the minerals. Yet those men were debarred rights that packers had—the men who packed their machinery—also under this Act could fail and swindle their creditors. He was in favor of the amendment of the hon. member for North Hastings for he saw no reason why one man should be debarred and another should have the right. He saw no ground whatever for the various distinctions that had been made; in fact he considered the whole Bill from beginning to end was a mixture of absurdities. The attention of the House had been drawn by the hon. member for Victoria to the fact that in British Columbia the English Law had been in operation some years, and had been found to work to general advantage and satisfaction. He would therefore move, if the hon. member for Victoria would second him, that British Columbia should be exempt from the operations of the Act. On a suggestion to divide before six o'clock, or adjourning.

Mr. MACKENZIE said it would be inconvenient to cut the discussion in two, and suggested a division. But there should be a careful discussion as it would be a great calamity if the amendment were carried as it would do immense harm to the country.

Mr. BUNSTER rose and was proceeding to speak on the question when six o'clock was called, and the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The House in Committee renewed the consideration of the Insolvency Bill.

Mr. BUNSTER resumed the debate. He said he felt called upon in the interests of his constituents to discuss the important question now before the House. Last session he had endeavoured to obtain the insertion of a clause in the Insolvency Act for the benefit of the farmers of British Columbia; but as he failed on that occasion, he would discuss the general principle as to whether or not the farmers and mechanics of the Dominion should not be allowed the same protection which the Bill would offer to traders. It was mistaken policy on the part of the Government to exclude the classes to which he had referred; but it had doubtless been done unintentionally. It was an old-fashioned Bill, one which did not cover all the interests in a new country. It was well known that all our wealth arose from the products of the soil, and hence the farmers above all others were entitled to consideration and protection. But unfortunately for themselves they did not pay sufficient attention to their own interests, and lawyers, doctors and shopkeepers were returned in large numbers to Parliament. But while the farmers were blameable for not looking better after their own interests, that circumstance afforded no reason why Parliament should do them an injustice. He cordially supported the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Hastings, inasmuch as it laid down the principle that every man should be treated alike in legislation, so that the farmers would have the benefit of protection under the Act. It was unfair that the farmer should not be allowed to have the benefit of the Insolvency Laws, which traders enjoyed. Farmers often entrusted money to brokers to invest in securities, and if, through mismanagement the broker got into difficulties he could claim the protection of the Insolvency Law, while the farmer, whose money was squandered had not that advantage. The same argument also applied to bankers and some other persons mentioned in the Bill. He desired to see a more simple and at the same time a more comprehensive measure enacted, one which could be easily understood. The United States had set Canada an excellent example in that regard and passed laws which were easily interpreted and understood, for there the farmers controlled the country and returned representatives of their own class to the Legislatures. All the legislation passed in Canada was against the interests of the farmers, and that explained the fact that the agricultural class were not so successful in the Dominion as in the adjoining Union. He desired to see no class legislation, but the Bill before the committee was of that character. Under the Bill a cow-keeper could claim protection, but a farmer could not; which was tantamount to say that a man who kept one class of cows could be an insolvent while a man who kept cows of another color could not. Again, if millers were to have the advantage of the Act, there was no reason why milliners should not be placed on the same footing. It was moreover most unfair to exclude miners from the Bill when they invested large capital to develop the mineral resources of the country.

Mr. BLAIN desired, as the question had been raised regarding the exclusion of the farmers from the Bill, to be allowed as the representative of a farming constituency to declare that it would be a great misfortune to the farmers if the Act should be extended to them. A perusal of the terms of the Act would show that it was intended to deal exclusively with traders whose circumstances and business were entirely different from those of farmers. If the farmers were included under the Bill, they might be made bankrupt at the most critical time of the year for a debt of $500, even though the farm might be worth $10,000. The representatives of agricultural constituencies had not carefully perused the Bill, otherwise they would have seen that it was drawn in the interests of the debtors. The intention of the Bill was to give the creditors the power of taking the control of a debtor's estate whenever he was unable to pay his debts, and instead of the measure being a benefit to the debtor it was the very reverse. He objected to the farmers being brought within the operation of the law, which was not in their interests. It was all very well to argue that, unless such were the case, farmers could not obtain a discharge from their indebtedness, but the effect of placing that class within the scope of the law would be to place them at the mercy of creditors. That proposition was directly opposed to the farmers' interests, and he hoped no representative of a agricultural constituency would support it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings), as the representative of an agricultural constituency, believed four-fifths of the farmers did not desire an Insolvency Law; but if such a law was to be enacted they wished to have the benefit of it equally with the trader. Hon. members had argued against farmers endorsing notes. Wholesale city houses told a tailor, for example, that they were quite willing to give him credit if he could get some responsible person to endorse his notes, and perhaps a farmer made an endorsement. If the tailor became bankrupt, the farmer would be sold up, and left destitute, and under the proposed law he could not fyle a petition in insolvency and obtain the benefit of the Act, while the tailor secured its protection. It was a fallacious argument to say that farmers who endorsed paper, would, if they had the opportunity, take advantage of the Act in event of financial difficulties, and come out of court rich; and that, therefore, they should be excluded from the operation of the law. It was the duty of hon. members to see that the farmers received equal justice with the rest of the community, and should defend their rights. He hoped the amendment moved by the honorable member for North Hastings would be carried.

Mr. RYMAL said he had always held that class legislation was unjust. He could not see why, because one man gained his living in a different calling from another, they should not be each entitled to the same rights and privileges under the law. It was said by some that farmers had no occasion to become embarrassed—that they never should become indebted to any one. He did not know why, if a farmer did become embarrassed, they should not seek relief in the same way as other men. It was said by some that there was no risk in farming. If he had not been bred and lived all his life upon a farm, and if he did not know so intimately the nature and number of their risks, the ingenious way in which the arguments of some hon. gentlemen were worded might have made some impression upon him; but experience had taught him that there was really no calling in which any considerable number of people were engaged in which risks were heavier or losses more frequent. He had seen splendid crops of wheat completely destroyed by frost; he had seen the glorious prospects of June entirely blasted by the drought of July; he had seen the homestead and its contents razed to the very ground by fire; he had known the farm stock nearly all die from disease; and yet there were hon. gentlemen who said there were no risks connected with farming. Farmers, lumbermen, miners and fishermen—the men who drag the riches from the soil, from the forests, from the bowels of the earth, and from the depths of the sea—the men in whose hands lie the development of the great wealth-giving resources of the country—these were all excluded from the operations of the Bill before the committee. Why they should be debarred from participation in the results of legislation tending to relieve unfortunate men who got into embarrassed circumstances, he was fairly at a loss to see. He did not believe the farmers had any desire to be legislated for in that direction, but neither did they want to be legislated against, they simply wanted to be left alone. The day when we ceased to have an Insolvency Law, we should have less bankruptcy, and less speculation, and society would be altogether in a much sounder condition. He trusted the good sense of the House would frown down all attempts at class legislation, and if were the settled opinion of the majority in the House and of the masses in the country that we must have an Insolvency Law, at least let one and all alike have the benefit of its provisions.

Hon. Mr. HUNTINGTON said from the discussion which had taken place it would almost appear as, if insolvency were a boon. It would no doubt be well if we could go back to the original state of things when every man could pay twenty shillings in the pound, but unfortunately that was impossible. However, since every man was not able to pay twenty shillings in the pound, and since it appeared to be necessary that we should have an Insolvency Law, it did not appear to him that the same rules should necessarily be applied to every class. The nature and extent of the risks which were incurred in certain businesses created a necessity for an Insolvency Law. He had seen the day himself when he believed that it was merely necessary to make special provision for a great commercial crisis, and that crisis being tided over the further extension of the operation of the law was unnecessary. Whether he held that opinion still or not, it was unquestionable that it was not the opinion held by a large majority of the people. He was a representative of the farming classes, and he knew very well that the old law which prevailed in Quebec was anything but a public boon. He had seen farmers in his own county who could not pay their debts, and who, simply because they manufactured a little lime, had their effects handed over to the official assignees, got his property sold, and his prospects ruined. There was really no risk in the farming life to compare with that in commercial life. A calculation of those who were successful in commercial life, and those who were not, would satisfy anybody that this was the case. Ten per cent. of those who started in commercial pursuits were unsuccessful. Every commercial man understood that he had to run great risks, and as a result, wherever a creditor was known to have failed through misfortune, there was a brotherhood existing amongst men engaged in commerce, which dictated that they should deal with him liberally. If, however, the provisions of the Bill were extended to farmers, there would be no such bond to shield them, and those who supplied them would not be unlikely to deal with them in such a harsh and unscrupulous manner as would satisfy the country of the undoubted evils which an Insolvency Act, harshly administered, would bring, even to commercial men. It was argued again that it permitted men without capital, and with nothing to lose, to rush thoughtlessly into speculation with other people's money. If that were true of commercial men, how much more strongly would it apply to the agricultural classes, who closed up their operations every year without speculation, and without a chance of those contractions in the value of their property to which commercial men were open. His own experience amongst farmers was that the class who would be likely to go into insolvency were not the best, but the worst farmers. The question to be considered now was whether in the general operations of the farming community there was danger of wide-spread commercial disaster. Whether there was a direct danger as in commerce, or of such a contraction in the value of their property as would induce a large percentage of them to desire to get relief. The general relations of farmers to their creditors were entirely different to those existing between commercial men and their creditors. If a farmer were subject to be put into the Bankruptcy Court whenever he found that he was unable to meet his liabilities promptly, he would frequently find himself embarrassed, and driven to insolvency, when such a course was not only unnecessary but unfair, because with a little time he would have been in a position to clear himself of his debts. He thought that instead of placing within the reach of farmers the expensive luxury of going into insolvency, or rather of putting them in a position to be driven into insolvency, when they did not desire it, it would be better to leave them alone. If he saw any disposition in this House to discriminate against the farming interest, he would be one of the first who would resent it. He believed, however, that it was especially in the interest of the farmers that a distinction should be made between different classes in regard to this particular law, for, if the opportunity were given them of turning bankrupt, as he had already said, the class of men who would take advantage of it would be those who did not deserve to have its advantages, if advantages they were. He believed that the difference between the position of commercial men and the position of agriculturists was so wide and so vast as to make it quite unnecessary that the same law with respect to bankruptcy should apply to them both.

Mr. SCATCHERD said from the tone of this discussion it almost appeared as if the Insolvency Law were a mere instrument to enable wholesale merchants to collect their debts from retail traders. It was proposed that if a man failed, and if there was nothing wrong connected with his failure, his creditors could decide if they chose that he should be placed in bankruptcy. Now, if there was nothing wrong or immoral in a merchant's failing and going into insolvency, there could be nothing immoral or wrong should the creditors of a farmer think it necessary that he too should go into the Insolvency Court. It appeared to him that members representing rural constituencies should seek to inquire what effect this Act would have upon those constituencies. It had been said that the creditors of the farmer would deal unfairly with him in regard to putting him into insolvency, but he did not think the farmer's creditor would deal any more unfairly than would the merchant in dealing with a trader. He would much rather that there were no Insolvency Law at all; and he did not believe that the people outside the towns and cities wanted an Insolvency Act, but if we were to have an Insolvency Law, it should treat all alike. Under this Act the trader could not go into insolvency of his own accord; but his creditors must decide whether it was fit and proper and in their interest that the man should go into insolvency. A previous speaker stated that farmers might be unnecessarily hurried into insolvency; but there were provisions to prevent a merchant being hurried into insolvency—such as if he could show his ability to pay twenty shillings in the pound—and this provision could be applied to the farmers. The truth was that the creditors of one man could if they saw fit put him into insolvency; but the creditors of another man should not put him into insolvency. This appeared to be class legislation. This Act was framed at the instance of merchants to help them to collect their debts; and it became the members of this House to consider how the provisions of this Act affected the people living in their constituencies, rather than the merchants in large cities who tendered their goods out on credit, and wanted this Act to help them in their collections.

Mr. COLBY said if this law was to stand precisely as it was now before the committee, he should hesitate a long time before he would consent to its application to the farming classes. He did not believe that the Bill as it was now drafted was fitted to apply to the agricultural classes, or to any other classes outside of those. However, he believed that with regard to other classes its stringent peculiar provisions might work a great deal of harm. But we were simply on the threshold of the Bill, and had the law to make. He believed it was quite competent for the House, and there ought to be wisdom enough in the House to devise a law that would work equally well for the trader and the non-trader. They had in the Province of Quebec a civil law, which in the absence of a Bankruptcy Law had worked equally for the trader and non-trader, had given universal satisfaction, and which had all the features of the Bankruptcy Law, with the exception of the discharge of the debtor. He mentioned this to show that it was possible to construct a law that would have all the essential elements of an Insolvency Act, and that would work equally well for all classes to whom it might be applied. If they were at the last clauses of the Bill, he would not vote for the application of the Bill to the farming classes; but as they were at the first clause, and as he believed it was competent for the House to construct a law for universal application, he was inclined to support the amendment of the hon. member for Hastings. He believed that the dogma that had been thrown out with so much emphasis that the Bankruptcy Law must be extended to the trading community, because trading was extra hazardous, was fallacious. It might have had application in other places and in other times; but in these days and in this country there was hazard in all business. We were living in a time of speculation, when men not traders were investing their means and encountering hazards as well as traders. The hon. member for Wentworth had pointed out the ordinary hazards of farming, the risks to which his crops were exposed every year, and the legitimate uncertainties attending the occupation of agriculture; but there were other risks for a farmer; the father of a family desired to place his son in a prosperous business, or establish him in trade, and to effect that object endorsed his note, so that he was to all intents and purposes a trader, and might be fairly included in the operation of the Act. The father would not, and did not desire to divide the pecuniary profits with the son if the business prospered; but if the son failed the father would be brought down by the same calamity. The son, however, could be emancipated; but the father would remain with the incubus of debt upon him at an advanced age. We were every day incorporating enterprizes that invited the capital of farmers. We were incorporating local insurance companies all over the country, especially directed to the farming classes for investments; the farmer became a stockholder and paid his ten, or fifteen or twenty per cent. as might be, and if the company was brought down the investment was lost, and not only that but there was a large liability which might wipe him out if he met his liabilities in that direction, and he had no means of relief. He believed the Legislature should contrive a law of universal application, as he did not believe in class legislation, and did not thi nkit was necessary. He was not now going to suggest a mode by which an Insolvency Law of universal application could be devised, but it had occurred to him that it might be possible to frame a law based upon the idea that all liabilities not exceeding a certain amount, say $10,000 or $5,000, whether liabilities of a trader or non-trader, should be settled according to the ordinary Provincial laws for the collection of debts, but that al obligations exceeding that amount, whether of a trader or non-trader, should be brought under an Insolvency Act. He was not at that time prepared to frame a method, but he believed it was possible to devise an Insolvency Law that would give general satisfaction. There was no disguising the fact that any Insolvency Act we have had on the statute book since Confederation has not been satisfactory to the country. It was unsrtisfactory to the people to-day. That disapproval had been expressed every time the question was brought up in this House. Twice the Insolvency Act had been abolished by the vote of this House. The Act of 1869 had been an odious law to the mass of the people, though it might be an acceptable law to a certain class, and the Bill before the House was not so different from the law it was to supersede, that it would be popular where the other was unpopular Now, he believed it was possible to frame a law which would work satisfactorily to all classes of the community. This first clause should beframed in accordance with the amendment of the hon. member for Hastings, if that was possible.

M. MOUSSEAU dit que c'est avec la plus grande satisfaction qu'il a écouté l'hon. Premier Ministre, et les hons. députée de Kingston, South Bruce et Shefford, exprimer des vues saines et essentiellement conservatrices sur la loi de faillite discutée en ce moment en comité. S'il en avait le pouvoir, ce serait au nom du pays même qu'il les remercierait. Malheureusement il y a eu, d'un autre côté, des remarques absurdes et ridicules même; l'on a paru vouloir faire de cette question, une question de caste, et l'on a parlé comme si le cultivateur devait être jaloux de partager les tristes avantages de la banqueroute, et c'est à ce point de vue honorifique qu'on a voulu convoquer au banquet de la faillite le maçon, le charpentier, le forgeron. Certes si le niveau des mœurs commerciales était sur ce point aussi élevé ici qu'en France et en Angleterre on n'oserait jamais émettre d'idées aussi immorales. Suivant lui, (M. MOUSSEAU), le certificat de décharge accordé aux faillis est un certificat qui classe les banqueroutiers en trois catégories : les malheureux, victimes des fluctuations financières ; les malhonnêtes et les maladroits ou les sots. Il espère que son collègue de North Hastings ne persistera pas à vouloir augmenter la classe des banqueroutiers, et s'il persiste, sa motion devrait être repoussée par la grande majorité de la Chambre, tant pour l'honneur de la Chambre que pour l'honneur du pays. J'avoue (continue M. MOUSSEAU) que la première clause de la mesure que nous avons devant nous, laisse beaucoup à désirer, et je regrette qu'on n'ait pas accepté en comité la suggestion du député de Jacques Cartier, qui voulait que comme en France, la loi dit simplement : Cette loi s'applique aux commerçants. Il est malheureux, M. le PRÉSIDENT, que dans certaines circonstances, on s'éprenne à outrance des idées anglaises, qui peuvent être bonnes là-bas, puisqu'elles s'appliquent à un état de choses souvent bien différent du nôtre, et c'est pour ne pas tenir compte de ce fait que l'hon. député de Cardwell s'est en quelque sorte écarté de la voie saine et droite qu'il suit généralement. Plusieurs catégories qui existent dans la loi anglaise n'existent pas ici, ou sont spécialement exceptées par la loi civile de la Province de Québec. Notre vieux droit français, notre code donnent aux non-commerçants, créanciers ou débiteurs, parfaite garantie et satisfaction. Il est basé sur un principe sage et chrétien. "Les biens "d'un insolvable sont le gage commun "des créanciers." Tout un système compliqué un peu mais clair, de procédés et de formalités a été greffé sur ce principe et sauvegarde les droits respectifs des créanciers et des débiteurs, tout en ôtant aux commerçants la facilité de s'endetter outremesure qu'offre aux commerçants toute loi de faillite, quelque sévère qu'elle soit. C'est sans doute parceque l'hon. député de Cardwell sait que la loi de faillite s'applique en Angleterre même à tous les non-commerçants, qu'il désire voir prévaloir la même règle dans notre pays. Mais en Angleterre les conditions sont bien différentes. Les fortunes colossales coudoient la misère extrême et si en Angleterre on a senti le besoin, tout récemment, d'étendre à quelques catégories de non-commerçants les lois de banqueroute, cela est dû à des circonstances exceptionnelles, extraordinaires et qui n'ont rien de commun avec notre état social. Ceux qui ont quelque peu étudié l'histoire de l'économie politique en Angleterre depuis quelques années sont convaincus de l'inopportunité de transplanter ici le système anglais. On sait qu'après le rappel des Corn Laws, on prodigua les capitaux aux agriculteurs pour activer et augmenter autant que possible la culture des grains. Des capitaux énormes furent ainsi mis en circulation. Ces capitaux venaient des grands fermiers, des grands capitalistes ruraux et un peu des villes. On les prodiguaient parce qu'il s'agissait d'améliorer le sol pour produire beaucoup et à bon marché, afin de faire compétition aux grains importés. Le mode était nouveau ; on dépassa le but et l'on s'endetta un peu. C'est pour venir au secours des gens comme ceux-là, qui faisaient en grand de l'agriculture commerciale, si l'on peut ainsi parler, et à d'autres classes de non-commerçants dans une position analogue, qu'on a jugé à propos en Angleterre de faire l'extension des lois de faillite, mais dans des conditions bien autres que celles de notre Bill. La situation dans nos campagnes est bien différente. Nos cultivateurs—et je parle de nos vrais cultivateurs—et non pas de ces prétendus cultivateurs qui font un commerce de prêter leur nom et de spéculer sur leur endossement—nos vrais cultivateurs, dis-je, ont un sens d'honneur et d'équité trop élevé pour désirer une telle législation ; et si cette brave population était consultée, sur les propositions faites par les député de Stanstead et de North Hastings pour la faire participer aux tristes avantages de la banqueroute, elle repousserait d'une voix unanime jusqu'à l'idée même d'être abaissée à la position de banqueroutiers. D'ailleurs la différence entre le cultivateur et l'homme d'affaires est énormes. Et l'homme d'affaires lui-même a moins besoin de secours dans ce pays que dans d'autres pays, et cependant ici l'homme d'affaires commerce et spécule plutôt avec son crédit qu'avec son capital. Ici le capital est souvent une chose factice; le commerçant est tout au plus le "fiduciaire," le "trustee" de ceux qui lui avancent des marchandises ou lui escomptent son papier. Aussi faut-il que la loi le surveille avec sévérité, et en vue de l'honnêteté et de la régularité du commerce, leurs fournisseurs devraient avoir le droit sous certaines circonstances, (quand, par exemple, de mauvaises rumeurs courent sur l'état des affaires du débiteur ou dans des temps de crise financière) de visiter les livres et de s'enquérir de l'état des affaires de leur débiteur, afin que ceux qui ont avancé puissent recouvrer. D'un autre côté, il est juste que la loi vienne au secours du commerçant que le malheur a réellement atteint, car le contrecoup des fluctuations financières sur les marchés de Londres, de Paris ou de Berlin se fait quelquefois sentir dans toutes les parties du monde et ruinent parfois en un moment les hommes d'affaires les plus honnêtes. C'est le résultat de la solidarité commerciale en quelque sorte imposée au monde par la vapeur et l'électricité appliqués à la transmission des nouvelles, et au transport et à l'échange des produits comme des idées. Je voterai donc contre les deux amendements maintenant devant le comité, pour deux raisons. D'abord, je suis en principe opposé à toute loi de banqueroute, parce que je considère que toute loi qui libère un homme de ses dettes, qu'il n'a payées qu'en partie ou pas du tout, est mauvaise et immorale. En second lieu, les représentants de la Province de Québec ne doivent pas oublier que le système de nos lois civiles détermine la condition de ceux qui sont commerçants et de ceux qui ne le sont pas. Nos lois pourvoient à la perception des dettes d'après un système qui est fondé sur l'anxiôme que les biens du débiteur sont la propriété de ses créanciers, et notre procédure donne au créancier le moyen de se pourvoir avant que les biens aient été dissipés comme je l'ai déjà dit. De plus, je considère qu'il serait inconstitutionnel de changer la condition du débiteur. La clause 91 de l'Acte Fédéral ne peut s'appliquer qu'à la banqueroute, qu'à la faillite commerciale et nullement à ce que nous appelons la déconfiture civile, l'insolvabilité de ceux qui ne sont pas commerçants; cette déconfiture est régie, dans la Province de Québec, par la coutume de Paris, notre code civil, et les lois en existence avant même la création du Conseil Supérieur de Québec. C'est pourquoi, le Parlement de Québec a jugé de sa compétence de passer deux lois, pour venir aux secours de deux sociétés de Montréal qui se prétendaient incapables de remplir leurs engagements envers les veuves et les orphelins. La constitutionalité de ces lois fut mise en doute, le Juge TORRANCE les déclara insconstitonnelles et donna droit aux veuves en disant que la position de ces sociétés les amenait à la condition des banqueroutiers et que cet attribut législatif n'appartenait qu'au Parlement Fédéral. La Cour d'Appel a confirmé ce jugement. Porté en Angleterre, le Conseil Privé a maintenu que ces questions étaient de la compétence des Parlements Locaux. Vous voyez, M. Président, que les députés de Québec ont de grands intérêts spéciaux à sauvegarder et qu'ils doivent être jaloux de la conservation intègre de leurs droits. Non-seulement je voterai contre les amendements du député de Stanstead et de North Hastings; mais je proposerai des amendements pour augmenter le nombre de ceux qui doivent plus particulièrement être retranchés de l'action de la loi de banqueroute.

Mr. WILKES rose to reply to the arguments of the hon. members for Stanstead and North Middlesex, who might be taken to represent a considerable class in this House who opposed an Insolvency Act. The hon. member for Stanstead had stated that he would not have offered an objection or proposed his amendment if the House were not discussing the first clause of the Bill. He had stated, moreover, that he was opposed to an Insolvency Bill in toto, and the House was allowed inferentially to conclude that the hon. gentleman, and the hon. member for North Middlesex who held the same opinion, being opposed to the Insolvency Bill were disposed to make it as nearly no Insolvency Bill as they possibly could. He (Mr. WILKES) had no doubt the tendency of the amendment would be in that direction. The hon. member for Stanstead had gone further and expressed the hope that after introducing in the first clause such a distinctive amendment as would emasculate the measure, to make such further changes of the subsequent clauses as would render it no Insolvency Bill at all. He (Mr. WILKES) would answer the objection to the exclusion of non-traders from this Bill. The assets of traders were generally transient; the assets of the non-trading community were more permanent. There was a wide difference between the farm, buildings, stock and implements of a farmer and the stock of a merchant. The former could be enumerated, that could not be done so easily with the latter, which was of a perishable nature. Close the doors of a merchant's store for twelve months and the stock would deteriorate, and much of it would lose its value altogether. The value of a merchant's assets consistep in their being immediately made available, and consequently it was of the highest importance to the creditors not only that they should have access to the stock, but immediate access before it was made away with. Another very strong reason was this: the tendency of a man in insolvent circumstances was to live upon his assets, the profits of his business not being sufficient to keep him. With the farmer it was different. He could not consume his farm or implements, and his expenses were not large. Therefore, the difference between the two classes was that the assets of the merchant were perishable, while the assets of the farmer were imperishable, and the same conditions were not applicable to both. The farmer in embarrassed circumstances whose property was unincumbered, could resort to the borrowing power. He could ordinarily borrow money at eight per cent. per annum. Now, where could an embarrassed storekeeper go to borrow money on his property. The enumeration of his assets was almost impossible, for the moment he would undertake to sell any of it its character would be changed. It had been argued that the amendment was in the interest of the farming class. He was prepared to assert that there could be no scheme more detrimental to them than this. The argument of the right hon. member for Kingston was a good one, but he would not make use of that. He would merely point out that the borrowing power of the farmer would be very largely decreased. Where a farmer applied for a loan for a term of years, the leading condition upon which he obtained it was the unalterable nature of the security. The lender knew he would receive his interest regularly and that he had the right of foreclosure. What would be the effect if the farmer by endorsing for a friend or otherwise was driven into insolvency, after borrowing a sum of money? The lender would be obliged to value his assets, and take his money at a time when it might be inconvenient for him to have it returned. The effect would be to increase the uncertainty and thereby the price of money, and instead of a farmer being able to get money at 8 per cent. as at present it would cost him ten per cent. The experience in this country of the lenders of money upon farm property has been very satisfactory. They are not ordinarily compelled to foreclose their mortgages, the interest is ordinarily paid, but introduce this insolvency business and confidence in this class of security is shaken, and the price of money is raised to the farming community. He did not believe it would be urged in this House that the farmers asked for this change, and he certainly hardly thought it complimentary for hon. gentlemen to urge it, apparently as in their interest. The farming community were strongly independent and did not wish for this new mode of dealing with their estates. He considered that both of the amendments were strongly objectionable. Both of them included the farming class. It was of the highest importance that the non-trading community should regard their liabilities as debts of honor and it would be much better that occasional cases of hardship should occur either to creditors or debtors than that a wholesale system should be provided for, sweeping away the assets of those who were not engaged in trade. If the Minister of Justice would dispense with the alphabetical enumeration of occupations which was copied from the English Act, and use instead the general terms applied to the trading and non-trading classes it would meet with less opposition. Enumeration either included or excluded occupations. Those which were not mentioned were supposed to be excluded. A gentleman from British Columbia had raised the question why miners were not included. He (Mr. WILKES) had asked the same question in committee, and was assured they were included.

Mr. ROSS (Prince Edward) said he had moved on a former occasion when this question was before the House, to strike out the word "traders" and succeeded in carrying his motion as he hoped a similar motion would be carried on this occasion. He would vote against both amendments. He wished to know why labourers were not included in this clause. Were lime-burners, and cow-keepers commercial men? Were wharfingers and cattle and sheep sellers traders? If they were, he did not know a class of people that kept more cows than the farmers. His opinion was that dishonest men took more advantage of this Act than of any other Acts passed by the Legislature of Canada for the last twenty years. The men who had the greatest benefit from it were the official assignees, and the lawyers came next. He knew one case where an estate of some six or seven thousand dollars went into the Insolvency Court. All the money that was realized was five or six hundred dollars. The assignee got one half, the lawyers got the other and the creditors did not get one dollar. He thought it would be wise for this House to throw the Bill out. He would vote against both amendments and against the Bill itself if he got a chance. It was in the interest of the wholesale merchants altogether.

Mr. FARROW said he happened to represent a farming community, and was a farmer himself, having been brought up to the business. He was surprised to hear the arguments made use of by the hon. member for Centre Toronto, and he could only say that they formed good proof that the hon. gentleman was unacquainted with farming. He (Mr. FARROW) supposed that no law would suit creditors generally, unless it guaranteed them twenty shillings in the pound, and the law that would let the debtor off most easily would be the only one which would suit that individual and the class to which he belongs. The question appeared to him to be, whether shall the farmers have the advantages of this Act (if advantages there are) or shall they not? Of all the arguments he had heard, probably that of the hon. gentleman from Toronto Centre was the strongest advanced. Much had been said about the risks of commercial men, and about as much to the effect that farmers had no risks at all. What risk, he desired to know, was it possible for the storekeeper to run that the farmer was not equally subject to? The storekeeper might be burned out, but so might the farmer; and it was the duty of each to provide against the contingency by insuring. Another risk to which they were equally liable was this. If the farmer and store keeper were both young men, and got married, they had each to take the risk of getting a fast wife, who might bring them down to bankruptcy. The farmer's wife was just as likely as the storekeeper's wife to be fond of driving a carriage with fine horses, of having expensive pianos, and all those things. In all earnestness, however, there was one risk to which the farmer was subject, as had been well noticed by an hon. member, to which no merchant was liable. Although his crops might look promising, one single night of June frost might leave him almost ruined—nothing left on his wheat-field but straw. It would have to be a very hard frost indeed that would destroy the calicoes, and the poplins, and the muslins, and the tea, sugar, &c,, in the shops. He did think, therefore, that the risks to be run by the farmers were as great, if not greater, than those of commercial men generally. He, however, had scarcely made up his mind yet which way he should vote. The hon. member for Centre Toronto talked of farmers owning 200 acres of land. He would remind the hon. member that there were thousands of farmers who did not own a foot of land. The hon. member for Shefford told the committee that only the poor and bad farmers would take advantage of the Insolvency Law. There was some truth in the statement, but it applied with equal force to commercial men. There were a great many farmers whose property was as unstable as the property of the merchant, for the reason that they did not own their farms, but simply rented them. That class of farmers was largely on the increase, but he was not very decided whether it would be wise to make the law so that it would include these men or not. He had no sympathy with the runners of wholesale and retail merchants who teased the life out of farmers, or with the representatives of wholesale houses whom it was impossible for a store-keeper to get rid of without insulting them. The same class of men, having agricultural machines for sale, pressed their goods upon farmers with such persistency as frequently to quite ruin them. If there was any benefit to be derived from the operation of this law —and he presumed there must be some— why should not the farmer who came by misfortune, as well as the insolvent merchant, have through its operation the opportunity of retrieving himself. Some members described it as class legislation; he called it partial legislation. We found, for example, that an auctioneer could take advantage of it. Now, it so happened that farmers were frequently auctioneers, and in reality all that any farmer had to do was to pay five dollars for an auctioneer's license to be on a par with any trader so far as the Insolvent Act was concerned. When a farmer did not own the land, as was frequently the case, what was transient with the store-keeper was also transient with him. His implements, his horses, and his cattle were liable to destruction, and if he (Mr. FARROW) did not hear any stronger arguments advanced in favor of the clause as it stood than had yet been advanced, he would be compelled to vote for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KERR rose to address the committee, not as a representative of the commercial interest, not as a representative of the ancient and honorable profession of which he was an humble member; he rose to remind hon. members that they were just entering upon the discussion of a measure containing over 120 clauses, and as there were from 100 to 120 members who probably desired to have something to say upon it, he really thought it was very undesirable to protract this discussion. He rose also in the interest of the good listeners in the House. It was a good thing to be an instructive, fluent speaker, but the next best thing in his opinion was to be an appreciative listener. He claimed himself to be of the latter class. It was said that vengeance was sweet, and while he had no intention to indulge in anything like a threat, he would say that if hon. gentlemen persisted in moving amendments and making speeches at the rate they had done on this occasion, they need not be surprised if those who had hitherto listened patiently should convert themselves into speakers no matter whether they had anything good to say or not. They would certainly act upon the principle laid down by his countryman, the Irishman, when he said that one man was as good as another and a great deal better. He had not the honor of being upon the select committee to which this Bill was referred; if he had, no doubt his advise would have been so valuable, and his assistance so great that the necessity for this discussion would have been avoided; but he was strongly of opinion that the House ought to accept the Bill as it came from the hands of that committee. The subject had received from them an amount of attention and a dispassionate consideration which it would be impossible for it to receive in this House. He believed the Bill as it stood was a considerable improvement upon the existing law. He shared very largely in the views of those who looked upon the very idea of an Insolvency Law as odious, but there was nevertheless no denying that in this country, as well as in Great Britain, it was found a very necessity of the mutations of trade. It was the very offspring of trouble and troublous things, but unfortunately these times came but too frequently to the commercial man and the trader. He was not surprised that the Bill was creating dissatisfaction in some quarters; the mind that framed it was, like all things human, a fallable mind, and it was impossible, therefore, to expect a law that would please all. He repeated the hope that the committee would not protract the discussion, for it being once granted that such a law was a necessity, and the only question being whether it should be limited in its operations or extend to all classes. There was nothing that could possibly be said, either for or against, that had not been already said. For his own part, he failed to see that the extension of that law to the farmers would be productive of any good. He did not believe that as a class they either required or desired it. He knew that in the riding he represented they would regard it as somewhat of a reflection upon them were he to ask the extension of the benefits of the law—if benefits they were—to the farming community generally. He did not, on the other hand, share the views of hon. gentlemen who stated that the privilege would be abused. There was a time, before the Act was limited in its operation, when farmers could take the benefit of it, and he had in his own mind one or two instances where farmers took the benefit of the Act, and he knew that their neighbors in the community regretted these two gentlemen were obliged to take such a step, considering that the Act had tarnished their hitherto untarnished names. They would never get this Bill passed at all if each hon. member expected to engraft his own peculiar views upon every clause of it. The number of improvements and changes suggested in the measure reminded him of what must have been a somewhat similar scene described by the poet—"It's with men's minds as with their watches—no two go just alike, yet each believes his own." He hoped hon. members would speak as little as possible upon this question, and accept the Bill as it was proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice. If every one tried to improve it, the result of their joint contributions would be that it would be like that something described by his hon. friend for Wentworth, as having nothing like it in the heavens or on the earth.

Mr. SCATCHERD said the hon. member for Centre Toronto had endeavored to answer the question why the farmers should not be entitled to the benefits of the Act. The reason he had given was that the property of the merchant was transient, and that of the farmer was fixed. But that was no answer at all, for the man who had a transient estate was discharged altogether, and the man who had a fixed estate could not be discharged. The answer was given in a way that showed the hon. gentleman considered he had met all the objections, but, although the hon. gentleman when he answered the question as he had done, he would find a great many would not be satisfied with an argument of that kind.

Mr. ORTON said it devolved upon every member of this House to give his most serious and anxious consideration to this measure. He thought from the various arguments advanced on both sides of the House, no good reason had been given why the Bill which affected such a large number of interests should not apply to every interest. He failed to see why one of the largest interests in the Dominion, namely, the farming interests, should not be included in a measure of this kind. He maintained that the arguments that had been advanced against farmers being included had utterly and entirely failed. The chief argument had been that their occupation had no risk in it, but he maintained there was no single occupation that was more risky than that of farming. In the North-West, whose agricultural capabilities were just being developed, and where the community was largely agricultural, crops were year after year destroyed by grasshoppers. We had found in our own country there were seasons when the wheat crop had been almost entirely destroyed by the midge; and in the Old Country the risk of the farmers' occupation had been shown in Ireland by the devastations of the potato rot, which had been felt throughout the whole country, and entirely ruined the people. If a farmer got into difficulties by the failure of his crops, why should these debts be kept hanging like a mill-stone around his neck, and he be unable to get relief. If the farmers were to be excluded there was no earthly use for the Insolvency Act at all. Why should not trade regulate itself? He believed there was too much meddlesome legislation in the country now-a-days, and if the matter was left to itself he thought they would find that trade would regulate itself. It was not incumbent upon the merchant to give credit unless he liked, and he did not see why the merchant and saloon-keeper should have a law to escape from responsibility when the farmers and other men engaged in a more industrious manner in earning a livelihood should be debarred from the same privileges. This Bill was evidently one to create a risky trade and uncertain business in this country. If the farmer should be careful and cautious, then every other man in business should show the same amount of care and prudence. Then, he did not see why laborers should be excluded. A man who, through sickness or any other mishap, got into debt, and this debt was hanging over him, preventing him from rising into any position in life, should have the same means of getting free from them. He might have been an industrious, struggling man, working for years and years, and misfortune and sickness might have overtrken him, and involved him in difficulties. Why should he have no means of escape? When he looked into the large list of classes included in the Bill, he thought no reasonable man should go for the amendment, and endorse the principle of the Bill, if it excluded laborers. There was another matter to which he might refer. When they looked at the decided feeling in reference to this Bill, they would find, except in cities and towns, especially amongst laborers, that the very general opinion was opposed to the Insolvency Law. There was very good reason why the legal fraternity should be so strongly in favor of the Insolvency Act, for it caused any amount of litigation. With those remarks he would vote to have all classes included in the Bill.

L'hon. M. FOURNIER :—Avant que ce débat ne se termine sur l'amendement par lequel le député de North Hastings veut étendre cette loi de banqueroute à tous les non-commerçants, je dois exprimer ma suprise d'avoir vu autant d'honorables membres se prononcer en faveur de cet amendement, quand il est notoire qu'un grand nombre de ces hons. membres ont antérieurement, dans deux sessions consécutives, voté contre toute loi de banqueroute. Je ne puis faire autrement que d'attribuer à un moment d'oubli la position si illogique, si incompréhensible du député de Stanstead. Et quel est le funeste présent que l'on veut faire aux cultivateurs du Bas-Canada ? Je ne suis pas moi-même en principe favorable aux lois de faillite. Mais puisque les nations les plus avancées dans la législation,—et je cite la France, l'Angleterre, et autres nations plus civilisées,—ont cru devoir donner leur sanction aux principes généraux de lois de faillite en introduisant de telles lois dans leur législation, nous sommes obligés de suivre le courant qui entraîne le législateur dans ces voies nouvelles. Mais pour nous garantir autant que possible des mauvaises conséquences, la loi que présente le Gouvernement rend extrêmement difficile l'obtention d'une décharge. Il n'y a plus de cession voluntaire. Un commerçant ne peut plus se mettre lui-même en faillitte ; ses créanciers seuls peuvent prendre l'initiative et doivent représenter un montant de créances d'au moins $500, ou de $200 s'ils ont des raisons suffisantes pour agir par la voie de saisie d'arrêt, et le délai accordé au débiteur dans les deux cas pour discuter la demande n'est que de cinq jours, ce qui équivaut à une obligation de payer immédiatement toutes les dettes. Or, je le demande, quel est le député dans cette Chambre, qui voudrait que tous les constituants de chacun de nous, dans tous les comtés du Canada que nous représentons, fussent exposés à ce qu'un seul de leurs créanciers ait le droit, après un simple avis de cinq jours, de faire saisir tous leurs biens et de les mettre en banqueroute. Une pareille disposition ne pourrait être agréable aux cultivateurs. Elle aurait pour eux l'effet le plus préjudiciable et le plus désastreux, et c'est en leur nom et au noms des plus grands intérêts de la population agricole que je proteste contre une pareille proposition. Je crois que l'on ne pourra entretenir plus longtemps cette proposition, si l'on veut se donner la peine de référer aux clauses concernant la décharge et la rigueur des procédés qui peuvent la faire obtenir. Je ne vois rien dans la loi qui puisse s'appliquer aux cultivateurs. La loi a été faite pour réprimer la fraude. Elle rend très difficile l'obtention des certificats de décharge et impose aux débiteurs la nécessité de consulter leurs créanciers. Je n'ai pris la parole que pour protester contre l'assimilation que l'on veut faire de la condition du cultivateur et celle du commerçant. J'ajouterai cependant un mot au sujet de la clause définissant le commerçant. Cette clause est littéralement extraite du statut anglais et est d'application plus facile dans les Provinces Anglaises. Où le mot trader n'a pas la signification précise qu'a le mot commercant dans la loi française. Dans la pratique les juges et les avocats du pays ont sans cesse recours aux précédents anglais; en adoptant autant que possible lr texte du Statut anglais, on évite les écarts de jurisprudence qui résultent de lois différentes sur un sujet commun à tout l'empire. L'hon. député de Stanstead a proposé un autre amendement, qui donnerait le privilége de faire faillite aux cultivateurs qui, ayant fait des avances d'argent ou de crédit, subissent des pertes qui les réduisent à l'insolvabilité. Eh bien ! je le déclare hautement : je préférerais que la loi ouvrirait la porte de la faillite à tous les non-commerçants indistinctement, plutôt que de laisser ainsi entrer par une voie détournée dans le système de la faillite, une certaine classe de prétendus commerçants, qui pourraient se grossir de tous ceux que l'on prétend laisser exclus. Ce serait offrir à tout cultivateur la tentation de se mettre en faillite par la collusion et la fraude, en endossant des billets promissoires ou en s'en faisant signer par des personnes insolvables, ou en se faisant commerçant pour le quart d'heure. C'est ainsi que nous arriverions indirectement aux inconvénients incroyables et désas-treux de l'amendement du député de North Hastings. Je crois donc de mon devoir de prévenir la Chambre des périls que présentent ces propositions subversives de nos lois civiles sur la question d'insolvabilité, et j'ai le ferme espoir qu'on ne se laissera pas entraîner à commettre un pareil écart.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that if any hon. member have a right to consult farmers' interest it was himself, because he represented more farmers than any other honorable member in the House. Hon. members had spoken of the rights of farmers, and they actually seemed to assume that it was a great privilege to be placed in a Bankruptcy Court. They pleaded that farmers might be allowed to be made bankrupt whether they were willing or not; they actually prayed that the injustice might not be done to farmers, to take it out of the power of money-lenders to make them bankrupt when they pleased. He never heard a more absurd argument addressed to an intelligent assembly. What farmer wished to be made a bankrupt? No one could be made bankrupt under the law except by his creditors. If the principle of voluntary assignments was embodied in the Bill, there might be some show of reason for admitting all classes within its operation; but the Bill proposed to abolish voluntary assignments and that with the almost universal assent of the community. That was the principle of the Bill; and yet hon. members pleaded for farmers—though the farmers would not thank them for their pleadings—that they might be placed in a position to be forced into bankruptcy by a money-lender if they were in arrears with the payment of interest. That was not what the farmers of North Hastings or any other constituency wanted—no intelligent farmer could want to be placed in such a position. It was one of the most extraordinary proceedings he had witnessed, that representatives of farmers should plead that farmers might be placed in a position of great danger to themselves, for that was really what the argument amounted to. As to the other proposition his hon. friend the Minister of Justice had explained that he had strictly copied the English law in order to make definite what was indefinite; and avoid difficulties and conflicts in the decision of the courts. He would not say another word on the subject, beyond stating that he would be astonished if many farmers' representatives gave a vote to-night that would have the effect of placing the farmers under the thumb-screw of money-lenders and country storekeepers.

Mr. PLUMB inquired whether there was any means by which the large class of the community who were excluded from the operation of the Act, could obtain a discharge from their creditors after having surrendered all their property to creditors.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said there was no method of doing so, provided the persons did not come within the scope of the Act.

Mr. PLUMB said that such being the fact, a large class of the community must suffer because of defects in the law. It was desirable to extend the operation of the law to all classes.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL desired to show the fallacy of the hon. First Minister's arguments. The hon. gentleman had stated that the object which the members of the Opposition had in view in opposing the first clause of the Bill was to obtain for farmers the privilege of being forced into bankruptcy; and he asserted that the farmers would not thank those hon. gentlemen for giving their creditors the opportunity of forcing them into bankruptcy. But that was not the question before the House. The question of considering the desirability of placing an Insolvency Law on the statute book was, whether the law should apply to certain classes of the community, or all citizens. If it was a privilege to be able to take advantage of that law, then it should be enjoyed by all. If it was a grievance, or its possession involved responsibilities then all should be liable to them, and the manufacturers, merchants and traders should not have a privilege that the farmers and non-trading classes did not enjoy. And when the hon. Premier asked whether the farmers of North Hastings or any other constituency would thank the mover of the amendment for asking that they should enjoy that privilege, he (Mr. MITCHELL) on behalf of the farmers of his county, replied that all they asked was to have the same privileges and responsibilities as belonged to other classes of the community, which should in justice be accorded to them. The explanations of the hon. Premier in regard to the first clause were eminently unsatisfactory. The truth was that the Government had taken this section from an old, exploded English Act, which had been repeated, and they sought to embody it in the legislation of this country, to which it was not suited. He believed the country wanted an Insolvency Bill, but the farmers, lumbermen and fishermen, who constituted four-fifths of his constituency, should not be excluded from its provisions. The hardship which would be entailed on those classes by their being excluded from the benefits of the law, could be easily illustrated. A lumberman might sell lumber to the value of $3,000 or $4,000 to a merchant, who perhaps shortly afterwards failed. The merchant went into insolvency, paid five shillings in the pound, and got rid of his responsibility, but the lumberman, who held the merchant's bill, could not take advantage of the Insolvency Law, and had to pay his debts in full. The same argument applied to farmers and fishermen. He could not believe that the House would act so unjustly towards certain portions of the people by passing class legislation of the character proposed.

Hon. Mr. TUPPER said it was evident that Parliament was in favor of an Insolvency Act of some kind. While every Bill that came before Parliament should be discussed in the fullest and freest manner, and while no examination of a question outside of this House could remove it from the consideration of Parliament, he believed if ever there was a measure laid on the table of this House which had been carefully considered by the Government and perfected by every means in their power, it was this Bill before the House. He confessed when he found the amendment of the hon. member for Hastings, heartily endorsed by the hon. members for Stanstead, North Middlesex, Wentworth and Northumberland, who were avowed opponents of an Insolvency Law at all, he (Mr. TUPPER) was forced to the conclusion that the measure to which he attached importance was in danger, and he would heartily support the measure before the House.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he held in his hands a copy of the Statutes of 1869. The hon. member for Northumberland was then a member of the Government who were responsible for the introduction and passage of chap. 16 of the statutes of that year. The first clause of that Act read thus:—This Act shall apply to traders only.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL was obliged for this opportunity of defining his position in this House. While he was a member of the Government he was bound to accept the decision of a majority of the Cabinet, but it happened that the Bill of that year was not a Government measure. If it had been, however, and the Government had chosen to introduce it against his views while he was in the minority, he would, nevertheless, be responsible as a member of the Administration for the measure. Now, however, as an independent member of this House, he had a right to express his individual opinion as such. He would refer to the votes and proceedings of 1869 to show the inconsistency of the hon. member for Chateauguay. On a motion to re-commit the Bill to Committee of the Whole to provide that "this Act shall "apply to all persons whether traders or "non-traders, except that in the case of "non-traders there shall be no voluntary "assignment under this Act." In the list of the affirmatives he found the name of the hon. member for Chateauguay.

Mr. BOWELL said he had no objection, whenever the Premier had sufficient time on his hands, to visit North Hastings, to discuss this question among the intelligent farmers of that constituency. No remarks had fallen from him (Mr. BOWELL) in reference to any particular class of the community. He had simply laid down the broad principle that if an Insolvent Law was requisite at all to this country, all countries were entitled to its advantages or disadvantages, as any other class.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL referred to the Journals of 1871 to show that the hon. member for Chateauguay had during the session of that year voted in favor of the principle of voluntary assignment.

The vote was taken on the amendment to the amendment, which was lost on the following vote :— Yeas, 36 ; nays, 67.

The amendment was lost on a division.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) suggested that the word "miners" be inserted on the 16th line.

Mr. CURRIER suggested that this clause should be so framed as to leave no doubt that those engaged in the lumber trade should be included.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER said it was so clear they were included that he was surprised that the question should be raised.

Mr. BUNSTER suggested that the words "farmer and graziers" be inserted in the 14th line, and struck out of the 28th line.

The first clause was carried, and the committee rose and reported progress.

The House adjourned at 11.15 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 22nd, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read a first time :—

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Bill respecting the Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Quebec. Also—To amend Act 36 Vic., Cap. 9, and 37 Vic., Cap. 4, respecting the appointment of Harbor Masters. Also—Bill respecting certificates of masters of inland and coasting ships.

Hon. Mr. FOURNIER—To remove certain difficulties in the administration of Criminal Law.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. BLAKE desired to say a word to the House with reference to the question of privilege which he had raised the other day respecting the petition concerning the Victoria election. On that occasion he fancied he saw his hon. friend from Victoria present, otherwise he would not have brought up the matter. It had since been intimated to him (Mr. BLAKE) that the hon. gentleman was absent when the question was previously brought up, and he wished to make this explanation because the hon. gentleman had informed him he desired to refer to the matter in the House. He (Mr. BLAKE) hoped the House would give him an opportunity of bringing up the subject again.

Mr. CAMPBELL said the object of that petition could be only this—to leave a false impression on the mind of the House. This Parliament he held was not in a position to deal with the matter. It was not in a position to disprove the allegations it contained. These allegations against the Sheriff, for instance, were false, and that gentleman could not come here and defend himself. The petitioners said the Returning Officer had only returned from Texas in October. That was true. But they did not say when he went to Texas. This omission would lead to the supposition that the Returning Officer was a penniless stranger. That gentleman left his native county in September last, and returned in October; and that was the length of time he was in Texas. This fact alone would show how little dependence could be placed in the statements of the petitioners. They went further, they said he (the Returning Officer) was his (Mr. CAMPBELL's) brother-in-law. So he was, but the Sheriff happened to be his brother-in-law too. There was another charge, namely, that the Returning Officer did not own a dollar's worth of property in Victoria. This statement was made in the form of a petition, he supposed because in any other shape such a statement would afford good ground for a libel suit. These petitioners could come here, and slander a man behind his back, when he had no opportunity of defending himself, when it would not be safe to do it anywhere else. The statement was a gross slander. The Returning Officer had held a respectable position in the county, and had also a large stake in it. The other statements in this petition were of the same nature, and he did not see why it should be brought here at all. If there were charges of this kind to be made they should be taken before the court which would in a few days try the case. He thought the hon. member for South Bruce was the last man in the world that should come and attack him in this way.

The Orders of the Day were then called.

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

On motion of Mr. JETTE the House went into committee on the Bill to incorporate the Royal Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada—Mr. OLIVER in the chair.

Mr. WOOD called attention to the fact that this was not a "Mutual" but a "Stock" company, and the word "Mutual" should be struck out of the Bill wherever it occurred. A mutual company was one in which all the policyholders were stock-holders, and this company had a stock of $500,000. Under this title it would act under an assumed name which was wrong.

Mr. YOUNG said that point had been taken up by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and the general opinion was the word ought to stand. After it had been discussed there the matter ought to be allowed to stand where the committee left it. The fact was a great many of these companies did a "Mutual" business though they were "Stock" companies, the policy-holders having an interest in the profits as well as the stockholders.

Mr. WOOD said he had taken objection to this in committee, but was told by the Chairman that the House was the proper place to bring it up.

Mr. JETTE said it was time that the company would have a certain amount of stock, but it was also true that the policy-holders would be share-holders in the company. They would be entitled to the right of voting at the meetings of the company. They would be entitled to be elected Directors, and to share the profits, so that really he believed the word "Mutual" was not taken under false pretences.

The Bill was reported without amendment and read a third time.

On the motion that the Bill be now passed,

Mr. WOOD moved "that the word 'Mutual' be struck out of the title wherever it occurred."

The motion was lost and the Bill passed.

On motion of Mr. DESJARDINS the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to incorporate the National Insurance Company (as amended by Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce).—Mr. MOUSSEAU.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Moss the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to amend the Acts of Incorporation of the Great Western Railway Company, (as amended by Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—Mr. IRVING.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACLENNAN the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill to incorporate "The Canadian Steam-Users' Association," (as amended by Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce) —Mr. BIGGAR.

The Bill was reported, read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JETTE the Bill to change the name of the "Mutual Insurance Company of Canada" to "The Dominion Life Assurance Company," and to amend the Act of Incorporation thereof, was read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

On motion of Mr. CARON, the Bill to change the corporate name of the St. Lawrence Navigation Company (Steam), and to confer on it certain powers was read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

BILL FROM THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE moved the first reading of the Bill to regulate the construction and maintenance of Marine Electric Telegraphs (from the Senate). —Carried.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked whether it is the intention of the Government to keep up, during the winter season, steam communication between the Province of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, in accordance with the terms of the Union of Prince Edward Island with the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—It is the intention to do so if it is found at all possible. Every effort will be made to accomplish it.

GAS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked whether the Government will take into consideration the defective arrangement for lighting the gas in the House of Commons, and consider the propriety of providing an electrical apparatus for the simultaneous lighting of all the gas-burners in the Chamber, thereby preventing the unwholesome stench that now poisons the air of the Chamber when the gas is lighted.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE thanked his hon. friend for the suggestion. As the chief architect of the House had been very ill he was hardly able to answer the question, but the suggestion of his hon. friend would be attended to.

STEAM DREDGE.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) asked whether in view of the large amount of shipping frequenting Lingan Harbor, Cape Breton, for coals, and fishing vessels taking refuge in it from easterly storms, the Government would send the Government steam dredge to deepen the bar at the entrance, or send an Engineer to examine and report on it.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—I believe the hon. gentleman's colleague has already had an official answer from the department stating that this will be attended to as soon as possible, but I cannot specify any particular time.

DREDGING THE ST. CROIX.

Mr. GILLMOR asked whether in the event of the Government of the United States granting an appropriation of $24,000 for dredging and deepening the River St. Croix, the Government of the Dominion will grant a similar sum for the same purpose.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—The Government have for the last two years put some $24,000 or $25,000 in the estimates for dredging the St. Croix River, but according to the report of the Engineer of the United States department in that State, it would require an appropriation of something over $100,000. Our appropriation was to he met with an equal appropriation from the States for the purpose; but I did not feel justified in proceeding with the work unless they were prepared to do the same thing, as the cost was entirely disproportionate to the benefits to be derived. If the United States, however, will make an appropriation to obtain a certain depth of water, such as can be accomplished at a moderate cost, I will be prepared to ask a vote for the purpose at any time the United States will comply with the provision mentioned.

THE VETERANS OF 1812.

Mr. BROUSE asked whether the Government has decided to divide the $50,000 granted for pensions to the veterans of 1812, irrespective of the number who may be entitled to participate in such grant; and if not, do they propose to offer a fixed sum to each without regard to the rank he may have occupied in the service; and may not the successful applicants hope that they may receive an uniform pension of $100?

Hon. Mr. VAIL—It is quite impossible for the Government to give an answer to that question at the present time We must wait until we see the number of men who make application.

THE RECIPROCITY NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. PLUMB moved "an address for correspondence in relation to negotiations for a treaty of Commercial Reciprocity with the United States." He said that during the recent discussion they had with regard to measures of reciprocity with the United States, the basis upon which all those negotiations were carried on was evidently too wide. The consequence was that complications arose that resulted in the defeat of the treaty, the draft of which has been published. Those who were generally supposed to have favored the adoption of the treaty on this side, had not taken a very fair part in the discussion; but it seemed to be very desirable that every expression of opinion might be made with regard to the great questions involved in that treaty, because it was very evident that negotiations were considered to be at an end. It would be remembered that shortly after the House opened, the First Minister in reply to some remarks of the leader of the Opposition stated "that he intended to bring down the papers with regard to the matter, and that the draft treaty would be laid before the House, but the sanction of the Government as well as the Senate of the United States, would be required to the treaty." He (Mr. PLUMB) thought the sanction of the Government of the United States was never given, and that the proposition that had been made was binding upon one side only, and there was not the slightest indication given by the Government of the United States that it was binding upon their side. He thought this was a peculiarly hard feature of the case, but the Premier had stated that he was satisfied when the treaty would come up it would bear favorable comparison with some other treaties that had been made. He trusted that there would be a full and thorough discussion of this question. Last year, when the House opened, they were told that owing to the reckless prodigality of the late Government, in undertaking large works, it was necessary to increase the taxation on the country, and it was further held that the building of the Pacific Railway was a project which the resources of the country could not meet. In order to provide for the expenditures to which the country was already committed, it was deemed necessary to impose further taxes. That view was opposed by the Opposition, but a measure was brought with such haste into the House that no time was taken to consult the great interests of the country before it was submitted to Parliament. That measure, in a modified form, passed. At the same time that the Government were adding to the burdens of the people, one of the leaders of the Ministerial party was in Washington, offering terms to the United States Government which involved an immense diminution of the revenue of this country. The negotiator was offering free trade upon a large scale with the United States, taking in some of the principal articles of domestic manufacture, and, at the same time, including, as it was necessary to include, free trade with Great Britain in these same articles. In addition to that, in the draft treaty, it was proposed that the Dominion should give up an important claim—a very large claim if we take the estimate of the negotiator—in connection with the Treaty of Washington. There was also an agreement to construct large public works, to some of which it was true, we were committed, but it included new ones. A very short period was fixed for their completion, thus involving a very large expenditure, within a short period. There was also a very large outlay provided for in the construction of works for which there was no pressing necessity, and which were in the hands of private companies, while there was no corresponding work to be undertaken on the other side for our benefit. All these works involved such an increase of expenditure, and so large a diminution of the revenue that it would seem, if the theory upon which fresh taxes were imposed was correct, any additional revenue could only be provided by direct taxation. It was not at all strange that those negotiations were carried on with the idea of direct taxation. It was no new idea with the negotiator of the draft treaty. While on the one hand one portion of the party in power were raising fresh taxes, it was proposed, on the other hand, by one stroke of the pen to reduce the revenue so far as to make it necessary to resort to direct taxation. On one occasion Mr. BROWN remarked :—"The farther free "trade is carried by Canada the more she "will prosper. If we could abolish the "tariff altogether, and pay the expendi- "ture by direct taxation, we should do "more for the prosperity of Canada than "all that was ever dreamed of by Pro- "tectionists." Mr. BROWN'S views were strengthened by those of another gentleman who though not a member of the Government, was a prominent supporter of theirs, and whose order in this House seemed to be Parliament's first law. He referred to the hon. member for Chateauguay, who, not long ago remarked :— "It is the imperative and solemn duty of "the House to adopt measures to increase "our annual revenue by at least three mil- "lions. Our population ought to be famil- "iarized with direct taxation. It would, be "from all points of view, a blessed reform if "a number of considerable items were paid "by the local or municipal funds." Who knows where direct taxation would fall. The most likely mode of collecting it would be from property, and there is no scale of taxation which falls equally upon land. The larger properties as a rule pay the smaller sums, and it would principally fall upon the farmers. It would not fall upon the man who has bonds and debentures locked up in his chest, but upon the farmer. Although this treaty was, he considered, a direct bid for the farming interests, the fact that the final result of it would be direct taxation, would take away every possible contingent profit and advantage that the agricultural interest might derive from it. While war prices ruled in the United States, great advantages resulted from reciprocity, but of late years prices had fallen, and western farmers could now compete successfully with ours. This changed the whole aspect of the case. He did not pretend to say that there was not a feeling in the country in favor of a renewal of the treaty, and so far as the exchange of natural products was concerned he had always advocated it, but there was another interest to be consulted—the manufacturing interest. Manufacturers were looking with the gravest anxiety for the discussion upon these resolutions. Since he had the honor to address the House on this subject on a former occasion, he had been in Western Ontario, and the universal expression which he met there was a hope that this question would be taken up, that while this House had been discussing theoretical questions, the most important practical question had been left till almost the end of the session. There was a deep interest felt in this matter, and he hoped it would be taken up and discussed, not in a party spirit, but in the interests of the public and of those interests which were standing shivering, suffering and waiting for some decision to be arrived at with regard to this question. The whole trade of the country had been paralyzed by the vicious meddling with those interests. We were prosperous enough and doing well enough until the nice adjustments of trade were interfered with and thrown out of balance. While it was possible that we could compete with the manufacturers of the United States, it was certain we could not with those of Great Britain, and we would be crushed between the upper and nether mill-stone if this treaty were ratified. It was this fact which alarmed the manufacturing interests of the country. The whole session of Parliament had passed without any discussion on the treaty, with the exception of some discussion in the Senate, which scarcely touched the points at issue, and there had been no statement as to the course which the Government proposed to take—whether they intended to renew the negotiations through the hon. gentleman who had so signally failed, or to appoint other commissioners, or to drop the subject altogether. He could inform the Government—and he knew something of American politics — that they never could negotiate a treaty with the United States so long as the Republican party was in power, but they might be able to do so in a year or two when another party with different ideas as to free trade would come into power and assume the reins of Government. It was short-sighted policy for the Canadian Government to go to Washington, when the ultra, free trade party was in power, and attempt to negotiate a treaty. If the treaty had been ratified, he failed to understand any theory why Canada should be bound for twenty-one years to the terms of the treaty without the power of changing it, when the country was rapidly growing, and with a Pacific Railway to build.

Mr. CHARLTON said the discussion on the reciprocity question in Canada had been principally confined to the enemies of the proposed treaty, and any remarks that he might make in regard to it he desired to be regarded as simply a statement of his own views. It was well, he thought, that the Government had abstained from the discussion of this question while the treaty was pending in the United States Senate, as our case might have been prejudiced had they appeared before the Canadian public as vindicators of the treaty, and place before it the benefits that Canada would derive from its adoption. He held, however, that the time had arrived when reticence was no longer necessary, and in his remarks he would present no advantages that Canada would derive from this treaty that had not been urged by the United States as objections from their standpoint to the treaty. The hon. member for Niagara told the House, and with reference to the negotiations that the Government of Canada had bound itself to the provisions of the proposed treaty, while the Government of the United States was at liberty to reject them. He could not understand that such was the case. The Secretary of State, the President of the United States, the British Minister at Washington, and the Hon. GEORGE BROWN acting in their respective capacities for the United States, Great Britain, and Canada negotiated the treaty and it was rejected by the Senate. But had it been ratified by the Senate it might have been rejected by the Parliament of Canada, and this Government in any future negotiations was in no way bound to the principle of the proposed treaty, any more than was the Government of the United States. Then the hon. member drew somewhat upon his imagination in picturing the wealth, population and resources which this country would possess at the expiration of twenty-one years, the period during which the treaty would run. The hon. member had stated that Canada would by that time, have quadrupled its population, which would, indeed, be the most marvellous growth ever recorded. The highest rate of increase of the United States was 33 per cent. but the average was somewhat less. It was a simple fact that in all the discussions upon the treaty, and in all the diatribes which had been uttered respecting them, the hon. GEORGE BROWN occupied a very prominent position. In fact it might be suspected that had some hon. member on the Opposition side of the House instead of a leader of the Reform Party, negotiated the treaty it would have been more acceptable to the hon. members opposite. The treaty had been made to operate against the Reform Party, and the course taken by the Opposition throughout has been an unpatriotic one, their opposition having been dictated by no regard for the interests of the country, but by a desire to drag down a prominent man and injure the party which was wielding the destinies of the country. The hon. member for Niagara told the Government, the other day, that they ought to have foreseen the political change which was impending in the United States, and that the present was an unfavorable time for negotiating a treaty. Indeed, the Government ought to have known what the American people did not know, viz. : that at the coming elections the Democratic party would return a majority to the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLUMB explained that he said that the hon. Mr. BROWN from his intimate knowledge of American politics ought to have known this fact.

Mr. CHARLTON said that if Mr. BROWN ought to have foreseen this result, then he was expected to know more than the Democratic party themselves knew, because they were astonished at their success ; and more than the Republican party knew, for they were equally astonished at the success of their opponents. But even had Mr. BROWN or the Government foreseen that the Democratic party would have had a majority in the House of Representatives at the next Congress, it made no difference in the treaty-making power. The Senate was still Republican and would remain so for years to come, and, moreover, the executive and the whole treaty-negotiating and treaty-making power was in the hands of the Republican party, and would remain so for years to come. It is probable the success of the Democratic party in returning a majority to the House of Representatives was a mere temporary success, and would not obtain two years hence when the next election for members of Congress would take place. The hon. member for Niagara had also argued that after the abolition of the treaty of 1854 this country was prosperous in a remarkable degree. He inferred from that that the hon. member was opposed to reciprocity on any terms whatever, and that this country would be better without it. But an increase in the population of the country was a pretty sure indication of its increase in wealth, and of the measure of prosperity which it enjoyed. During the decade between 1861 and 1871 the progress of Canada was most unsatisfactory to all real lovers of their country, and those who wished to see it great in wealth and progress. The increase in population during that period was less than thirteen per cent., and that was a sufficient answer to the argument that this country would prosper without reciprocity. It was not a healthy increase as compared with the increase in the United States where the increase was twenty-three per cent., although the country was subjected during that time to the drain of the civil war. He need not dwell further on the subject to prove the desirability of a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States. Nature had placed us side by side with a nation which now possessed forty-two million people. A country that had one-half of the railway mileage of the globe, and with thirty thousand miles of navigable inland lakes and rivers—a country that had every variety of soil, of clime, and of production. It would be unnecessary to dwell upon the benefits that the thirty-eight States and ten Territories had derived from free trade between themselves, and from the abolition of Custom House regulations, and Canada, lying alongside that Republic, forming geographically and commercially a part of it, felt that free trade with it was in the highest degree desirable. Her desire to participate in the benefits that free trade conferred under these circumstances, had been shown on various occasions. In 1866 Sir ALEXANDER GALT, and Messrs. HOWLAND, SMITH, and HENRY, of Nova Scotia, were sent to Washington to endeavor to procure a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, when the Government was led by the hon. member for Kingston. In 1869, SIR JOHN ROSE was sent there for the same purpose. Both these missions were, however, unsuccessful. In 1874 the Hon. GEORGE BROWN was sent to Washington with the same object, and unlike his predecessors his mission, to a certain extent, was a success, and it was a misfortune for Canada that the treaty negotiated had not been ratified by the United States Senate, and carried into effect. When the draft of the treaty was made public it was astonishing to see the objections offered to it. The Boards of Trade objected to it because it was going to ruin our manufacturing interests, and nearly all the interests in the United States objected to the ratification of the treaty, and memorialized the Senate to reject it. British merchants thronged to Downing Street and the Colonial Office likewise protesting against it. The treaty appeared to be a diplomatic bull in the national china shop, breaking and smashing unmercifully the goods belonging to the unfortunate proprietors. What were the objections offered in America? One was that it would divert trade from American channels, and build up Canadian emporiums of trade by the enlargement of the Canadian canals. There was force in this, because a large portion of the trade would undoubtedly be diverted from American ports when the St. Lawrence and Welland Canals were enlarged so as to allow the passage of vessels drawing twelve feet of water. Another objection raised was that the treaty would have the effect of diverting ship building from the United States to Canadian yards. There was also force in this objection. The treaty that gave Canadian-built vessels the privilege of registering as American vessels —a privelege never accorded by the United States except by a special Act of Congress —would have transferred the entire business of shipbuilding from the Republic to this country; it would thus have given employment to thousands of mechanics and artisans, and millions of capital, and would more than have compensated for any loss that could have accrued to our manufacturing interest from the adoption of the treaty. Then the objection was raised by American carrying interests that the treaty opened the carrying trade of the great lakes to Canadian shipping, and persons not familiar with that trade were not aware of the importance to Canadian shipping of that concession. Under the present law, Canadian vessels clearing with a cargo of grain from Chicago, Milwaukee or other ports could not call at Buffalo or Detroit to take return cargos of coal. The consequence was that Canadian vessels were obliged to go up light, and Canadian vessel owners could not thereby compete with American vessel owners, especially in dull seasons like the past one. If, however, the concessions given under the treaty were obtained by Canadian ship owners a large proportion of the carrying trade of the lakes would be transferred to Canadian bottoms. Then it was urged that the treaty would injure the lumber interests of the United States, a vast interest employing 200,000 men and $40,000,000 of capital, the production in Michigan last year being three thousand million feet, or ten times the production of the Ottawa district. The American lumber interest was therefore very powerful, and it had used its best efforts to defeat the treaty, for they knew it would be injurious to their interests. Then a protest came from the American woollen manufacturers and wool growers, they apprehending that the Canadian woollen mills which now made excellent tweeds, would if the barriers were thrown down, find a market for their goods among the fotry millions of people in the Republic. The agriculturalists of the United States protested against the treaty, even those western farmers who the hon. member for Niagara said could drive our grains from the American market. There was in fact scarcely an industry in the United States that had not memoralized the Senate, protesting against the ratification of the treaty negotiated by Mr. BROWN. Now what Canadian interests objected to the treaty? Did we hear any objections from the agriculturist, the lumberman, the mine-owner, the fisherman, the colliery-owner? No. The great interests of the country never raised their voices against the treaty, they were in favor of the treaty, and knew it would conduce to their prosperity. With respect to agricultural interests, from a free trade stand-point the treaty was a wise act, but he proposed to view it from a protectionist stand-point. The object of a protective tariff was to develop manufacturing industries and create a home market for produce of the soil which will not bear the cost of transportation to a distant market; and although the people might pay higher for the products of the loom, yet in the end the balance of benefit would be in their favor. The policy of the United States had been for many years a protective policy, and for the last ten years it had been one of extreme protective. The tax-payers of that country had paid thousands and millions of dollars for the purpose of creating their vast home manufactures and markets for them, and that they might have their Lowells, their Manchesters, their Fall Rivers, their Providences, and the various manufacturing towns of the New England States. What did this treaty purpose to do? Were we to enact protective tariffs, and create a market by the most protective duties, it would be half a century before our market would be in a position like the American market; but this treaty proposed to throw down all the barriers and give us the benefit of a market which they had paid millions to create. The great West with its millions of population had borne its share of taxation that they might make those vast manufacturing industries in the East, but those places occupied a secondary position to us, and had this treaty become law it would have placed us not only upon equal terms, but better terms in the market to create which they had paid so much. Viewed from the protectionist stand point the treaty recommended itself to all who would recommend protection for the creation of a home market. He had attended the committee that had the duty of examining into the state of the manufacturing interests of the Dominion, and the committee had had before them manufacturers from all parts of the country. He had invariably asked those gentlemen what their opinion was as to the probable effects of free trade with the United States upon the particular commodity they dealt in or manufactured, and in no instance had he received an unfavorable answer. The universal answer was that they desired nothing better than free trade with the United States, and that they wanted nothing better than to meet the American manufacturer upon equal terms. And why should they not? We had no manufacturing interests created by an imposition of a protection of more than fifteen per cent., but most American manufactures had been created by the imposition of a duty of thirty-five per cent, and many by a duty of fifty per cent. If those two interests were to stand side by side, the one requiring fifteen per cent. and the other thirty-five and fifty per cent., would not the one with the smallest degree of protection be able to compete with the interest having the greatest degree of protection. He believed that in negotiating this treaty the Hon. GEORGE BROWN builded better than he knew. Of all the benefits that would accrue to Canada, the greatest benefits would have accrued to the manufacturer. He believed that when the barriers were broken down, and the markets of forty-two millions thrown open in addition to the markets of four millions the operations of Canadian manufactures could be so largely extended that a reduction in the cost of manufacturing would be made of from ten to twenty per cent. He believed that those who were unnecessarily scared would have found if the treaty had come into operation that the benefits accruing to them would have been almost incalculably great. It had been objected that in securing this treaty we had given too much. What did we give for the treaty of 1854? We gave the fisheries, and the free navigation of the St. Lawrence; but when the treaty of 1874 come to be negotiated, we had not the latter to give, and why? Because it had been given before, and without any consideration. The benefits secured by the treaty of 1854 were secured by the late draft treaty; and we secured besides much more. We gave for the late treaty the fisheries; but we had given those before. We gave our pledge that certain public works would be constructed and completed by 1880; and we were to receive in return, in addition to the free importation as in the old treaty, of the produce of the soil, the forest and the mine,—the privilege of American register for Canadian built vessels and the carrying trade of the Great Lakes. One of the strongest arguments against the treaty by the American shipping interest was that indirectly we would receive the entire carrying trade of the sea-coast. Not directly; but indirectly; it being held that if our vessels were admitted to American registry a nominal transfer would be made, though the real ownership remaining in the hands of the Canadians; and Canadian vessels would enter upon the carrying trade of the Atlantic and Pacific sea-coasts. This concession was worth more to Canada than all she gave in return for the treaty. With regard to the value of our fisheries it was well enough known the value the Americans estimated them at. When the hon. member for Kingston was assisting in the negotiations of the celebrated Washington Treaty they would remember that the American commissioners had offered for them the free admission of coal, lumber, salt, and fish with the provision that lumber should not be admitted free until after 1874. The British commissioners had demurred, and the Americans had not seen fit to increase the offer, but withdrew it. With regard to the canal enlargement, undoubtedly the expense would be very great to Canada. But the Canadian system of canals was not designed to benefit the Americans, but to divert a portion of the vast commerce of the West from the American canals, and for the purpose of carrying out more fully that plan it was the policy of this country to enlarge those canals without reference to reciprocity. For this purpose we proposed to enlarge the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals, and by this enlargement we hoped that a very large proportion of the trade that passed through the Erie Canal and from Oswego to New York would go to Montreal and would make the latter a commercial emporium, and one of the greatest cities of the continent. Much had been said about the building of the Caughnawaga Canal, and efforts had been made to mislead the public regarding it. We were told that we were to be cheated in the operation, because the American Government only undertook to urge it on the State of New York that the Whitehall canal and Erie would be opened to Canada, but we were bound to build and open the Caughnawaga Canal to American vessels. But the draft treaty reserved to Canada the privilege of refusing American vessels the use of the canal if the State of New York did not chose to accept the recommendation of the United States Government, and open her canals to the Canadians. We were to have the free use of the Erie Canal, 465 miles in length, and of the Champlain Canal, 95 miles in length, for the use of the Caughnawaga Canal, of about 40 miles, or we were to get the use of eleven times as many miles of canal as we gave. He considered the construction of that canal would be good policy under the circumstances, because it would afford the cheapest and most convenient outlet for the lumber of the Ottawa Valley, and would save fully $200,000 per annum. to the Ottawa lumbermen. The vast amount of food consumed in the New England States would go down this canal, instead of the Erie Canal, and Burlington would become the great distributing point instead of Albany. If the Americans denied us the use of their canals we could deny them the use of the Caughnawaga canal. It might be urged that under this treaty we would not be allowed the free navigation of Lake Champlain, but it would make very little difference, for instead of making Burlington the distributing point, we would make it at Rouse's Point, or some place on the boundary line. There were two interests he had not mentioned that would be very much benefitted by reciprocity. We had in Canada vast deposits of iron—and a very valuable mine within a few miles from the House. The trade in iron ore of the United States was enormously great, especially from the Lake Superior mines, remove the duty of twenty per cent., and enormous quantities would be exported to the others ide, and coal could be brought and iron manufactured here, and exported to the United States. With this treaty in operation employment would be given to an immense amount of capital, and to thousands and tens of thousands of men. We had in Nova Scotia enormous deposits of coal which could be taken to the New England ports for the New England manufactories, and could be laid down in New York more cheaply than American coal, and a great coal business would spring up in Nova Scotia. Had this treaty been ratified, Canada would have received an enormous impetus; we should have entered upon a new career. One of its strongest features was that it would have existed twenty-one years, and in that time interests would have grown up, and grown permanent. We were well aware that Canada had superior political institutions, and that standing side by side the two forms of Government were on trial. The Americans had a theory hatched in the brains of those who framed the constitution. We had a Government, the result of experience gained in ten centuries. It remained to be determined which of those two systems were best adapted to secure the happiness and prosperity of the people living under them. In order to give our institutions a fair trial, it was necessary that we should have a due share of pros-parity. If we went on increasing at the rate of only 10 or 15 per cent. in ten years, while the population of the United States showed twice that rate, we should fall behind in the rate of progress, our institutions would attract no attention, and our nationality would in time be snuffed out. All who had the interests of the country at heart should seek a policy that would advance our interests, and he believed no measure was devised that was so thoroughly calculated to advance our prosperity as this treaty, and any party who had opposed it for party purposes was guilty of an unpatriotic act. He would only say in conclusion, when the hon. gentleman who negotiated this treaty passed away, he needed no prouder epitaph upon his tomb than that "Here lies the man who negotiated the Reciprocity Treaty of 1874."

Mr. CAMPBELL said when the Province of Nova Scotia entered the Confederation it was hoped that its resources would have been developed and its industries fostered, but the patience of the people had been almost worn out, and their interests well nigh trampled out of existence. As for this treaty, he regarded it as an abortion, and the Government had shown no disposition to relieve the industries of Nova Scotia that were suffering. Talk of Menonites! Why we could not keep our own population in the country without spending money in bringing strangers to our shores. Our fishermen, our ship-builders, and our manufacturers received some measure of protection, and why not protect our coal industries? He believed the tendency of the Reciprocity Treaty and the Pacific Railway policy was to throw us into the lap of our future destiny, as it was called. If that was the policy of the Government, we should know it at once. As we were at present nobody knew how we stood. He believed there were a great many factories in Canada standing still, waiting to see how the Reciprocity Treaty was going to turn out. There was an uncertainty which prevented men from investing their capital in industrial enterprises. He appealed to the fathers of Confederation to protect the coal interests of Nova Scotia. The imports of foreign coal last year into the Dominion amounted to 804,000 tons, and cost $3,805,000. A duty on that such as the Americans put on our coal would amount to $603,625. That was a handsome sum to add to our revenue. How did the Government suppose they could make a treaty with the United States when they were so liberal as to open our markets to them while they closed theirs to us. They were too astute to do such a thing, and we should learn a lesson from them instead of trying to teach them a lesson in free trade. There was the obnoxious Stamp Act which yielded a revenue of only $200,000 a year. If they would abolish that and put a duty of ten cents per ton on coal they would relieve the people from an annoying tax, and at the same time increase the revenue. While our coal industries were unprotected our miners were leaving the country, and it would be hard to replace them. The Government had a large majority at their back, and could afford to adopt a policy which would foster our industries, and make our country more self-dependent.

The motion was carried.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE HAWAIIAN KINGDOM.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved that in view of extending the commerce of the Dominion on the Pacific, it is desirable that the Government take into consideration the advisableness of securing a commercial treaty between Canada and the Hawaiian Kingdom, similar to the treaty negotiated between that Kingdom and the United States. He said hon. gentlemen might have had their attention called to this subject by the fact that the United States Government had recently negotiated a treaty with the Hawaiian Kingdom. That treaty was for a free exchange of the products of the Sandwich Islands and the manufactures of the United States. This treaty was to continue for several years unless terminated by notice from either Government. The treaty would be unfavorable to British Columbia by turning the trade done by that Province to Washington Territory. The value of the shipping trade between British Columbia and the Sandwich Islands amounted last year to $60,000, yielding a revenue to the country of $25,000. This might appear a small matter, but that trade was rapidly increasing. Now, he knew no reason why the manufactured goods of Eastern Canada should not be carried by Cape

Horn or San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, and a profitable trade established. He would call the attention of the Government to the last telegram from Washington, which was as follows :—

"WASHINGTON, March 18.—In the Senate "to-day a vote was taken on the amendments "proposed by the Committee on Foreign Rela- "lations adding manufactured leather to the "list of articles of American products or manu- "factures to be admitted to the Hawaiian "Islands duty free ; also, providing that during "the treaty the Hawaiian Government shall "not cede or lease any port, bay or naval "station to any foreign Government except the "United States, or grant any special privileges "to any foreign nation which is not now granted. "The amendments were agreed to."

The object of the United States Government was simply to acquire possession of the Sandwich Islands. From a national stand-point it would be most unfavorable to the interests of Great Britain that what might be called the half-way house between British Columbia and the Australasian Colonies and China should fall into the hands of the United States, as in all probability it would, unless the Dominion Government saw that it was to their interest that it should be maintained as an independent country. This matter was brought up two sessions ago by the hon. member for New Westminister, and at that time the Government of the day promised to deal with it. Up to this time, however, he had not heard that the present Government were doing anything in the matter.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—There is no objection to the motion of the hon. member for Victoria passing, although I am not able to say what the Government can do in the matter, further than to institute such inquiries as will enable us to take advantage of any favorable circumstances that may arise. I am aware of the great importance to our Pacific end of the Dominion of obtaining the greatest possible benefit from the trade of the Sandwich Islands, and other parts of the Western Pacific, and I can only say the Government will do everything in their power in order to meet the views the hon. gentleman has expressed in his speech on this motion, though at the present moment I cannot possibly say what we can be able to accomplish.

The motion was carried.

At six o'clock the SPEAKER left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

STEEL RAILS FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. PALMER asked whether or not two thousand tons of steel rails were purchased last autumn for the Intercolonial Railway, and if so, who acted for the Government in making such purchase, and from whom were the same purchased, and at what price were public tenders asked for, if so, how ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—Tenders were taken, under the direction of the department, by the Chief Superintendent, by sending samples to all the great iron firms in England. The lowest tender was that of Messrs. WILSON, CAMMEL & Co., at £11.10.0, delivered at Halifax and St. John. That tender, being the lowest, was accepted, and the rails were to be delivered next season.

Mr. PALMER—What was the price of the rails for the Pacific Railway ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE—They were to be delivered in Montreal at $50.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Hon. MALCOLM CAMERON moved an Address to HER MAJESTY, praying that she will be graciously pleased to cause her principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to enter into negotiation with foreign powers with a view to further improvement in international law, and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration. He said that some days ago when the hon. member for Grenville introduced a proposition to this House he gave a very interesting, elaborate and physiological disquisition, on the exercise of gymnastics in schools, for which the House and country would feel obliged ; but he was somewhat surprised when the hon. gentleman concluded his address with a proposition which was entirely unheard of in this country, and which had been spruug upon the House and the people, viz., for the introduction of military training in our schools. He (Mr. CAMERON) felt bound to acknowledge that he was so much taken by surprise that he rose suddenly, and drew a proposition which he intended to submit to the House, and which he thought it was now his duty to himself as well as to the hon. member to make some apology for; because nothing could be well done that was done so hastily, and what he had said had led to various erroneous ideas being entertained throughout the country. He thought that when he had stated that he was a volunteer, and the son of a soldier, it could not be supposed that he intended to insult the military profession. He knew the value of volunteers and soldiers, and the honor which they had earned in every land in the discharge of their duty, but that had nothing to do with the question whether men ought to be soldiers or not, or whether making a man a soldier was not the very worst use to which he could be applied. He did not mean, by stating that, to either insult or censure those noble men who had discharged their duty at all times and in all countries. It was this that made it appear to him necessary that he should put his views in a better shape before the House. It was this that induced him to look into the question which had been so recently discussed in England; because he thought there was no higher duty before the Parliament to-day than that of expressing the opinion of Canada on the question of settling disputes by international arbitration instead of by war. The Christian's true mode of adjusting differences was by a reference to competent authority, not to barbarous and savage war, and in using those words he used only the words of the first men and first soldiers of Britain. The resolution which he proposed was very nearly similar to one proposed by that great and and lamented man RICHARD COBDEN, in the House of Commons, as early as 1834, and on that occasion the sentiments of Lord PALMERSTON were so much in accord with those of Mr. COBDEN that he would not vote against the resolution directly, but he voted for the previous question, carried it, and the matter was then disposed of. In framing the resolution he (Mr. CAMERON) had followed the exact words of a proposal made last year by Mr. RICHARDS in the British House of Commons, for which he obtained the support of a majority of the House. In that debate Mr. GLADSTONE, like Lord PALMERSTON and Lord DERBY, expressed himself cordially in favor of the principle, but doubted whether the time had come when there was any prospect of nations resorting to that mode of settlement of disputes. The vote on that occasion gave a majority of ten against the previous question, and then the resolutions were adopted unanimously as appeared by a reference to Hansard. He (Mr. CAMERON) regretted that the duty of bringing that important question before the House had not devolved upon a more able member, but he could offer the same reason for his action as that given by Mr. RICHARDS, who said that for twenty-five years he had been deeply interested in this question, had studied it, had written respecting it, and had come to the conclusion that the great bulk of the country was with him. He felt from the very few remarks made in the House the other day, he would be sustained to-night by hon. members, and from the letters he had received from different portions of the country, he had no doubt the proposition would receive the hearty concurrence of the people. Some persons would endeavor to shirk this important question by saying that he was a man of crotchets. He was glad his crotchets were not in the direction of the old fogyism and antiquated doctrine of the divine right of Kings and Heaven appointed Senators, the old system of voting and property qualifications; but they were in accord with the benevolent, the wise, the liberal of every land, on the side of humanity, and the poor and suffering, and in accord with the teaching of our Divine Master who proclaimed peace on earth and good will to men, and by whom we were authorized to expect a day when it would be said :—

> "No longer hosts encountering hosts
> Their crowds of slain deplore,
> They hang their trumpets in the hall
> And study war no more."

Those who had treated the subject as Utopian, and thought it hardly worth while to discuss, should remember that almost all the Churches of Europe had united on this subject, that Congress, Conventions, Synods and general assemblies had united in addressing the Government of England and the Governments of the various countries of Europe on this subject. The fact was stated by Mr. RICHARDS that 1,380,000 workmen had united and prepared petitions in favor of international arbitration, and those men were not bought men, were not manœuvred by politicians, but they attended meetings and prepared their petition. Now, what did that prove? It proved this—and he desired those who delighted in war and whose interests it had been to maintain war—that when the mass of the people began to look into this subject, possessing the advantages of education, and a free press through which they could express their opinions, they began very naturally to think what righteous cause and that interests of humanity were served by fierce wars. They were very apt to think if there were five millions of men under arms who had to be paid, clothed and fed, and were kept from useful employments, that some men must do the work of those five millions. When they thought that 550 millions of money had been expended for providing armaments and means of transport, when they saw in all countries men working beyond their strength often not earning sufficient ways to supply their daily wants, and that those wars had been for the amusement of Kings, Princes and Presidents, and had been to put a brother or friend on the throne—they were satisfied that wars were unjust, and none was more unjust than that war which arose lately in Europe as to whether the Latin or Greek monks should repair the cupola of a certain church, a war which cost one million of lives. Men were now beginning to understand that they had an interest in averting war, and that mankind had been too long a plaything for Kings. Tyranny quakes under the popular movement. What was it that was depopulating Germany to-day, that was causing the young men to leave its shores by tens of thousands? It was because every man was enrolled as a soldier. Under a more liberal government and a free press the people learned to hate war too much and love peace too well to remain longer in a land where every man was a soldier. The subject of the wise and Christian settlement of national difficulties by arbitration was no new doctrine. It was as old as Grotius at least, and Vatel and Puffendorf, and writers since their day, had admitted their desire to see the plan carried out, and their confidence that this desirable result could be accomplished. We were astonished to learn from books that treaties or international arbitration had maintained peace between Norway and Sweden for six hundred years, and between other nations for hundreds of years. There had been a disposition manifested by England, France and Spain of late years to adopt that principle. CHARLES SUMNER, in his work "The True Greatness of a Nation," has shown the absurdity of the war of 1812, which arose regarding the question of right of search. During three years this country was devastated, and he remembered going to York in 1815 after it had been burnt, and subsequently proceeding to Niagara where the orchards had been cut down, and the houses destroyed. An arbitration was subsequently arranged and at the convention the American representatives would not yield without an arrangement was made on the subject of impressment. The British would not agree to that, but the war was shortly afterwards closed. The war terminated without any settlement of the question of the right of search, regarding which the war originated. It was absurd to suppose that these circumstances could transpire without their being discussed. It had been said by honorable members that this was no time to talk of peace and international arbitrations when European nations were arming, and when a great conflict seemed imminent. This, however, was precisely the time when he desired the voice of this Dominion to be raised against the absurdity of involving us in a war with the nations of Europe in which we could have no possible interest. He believed some arrangement might be entered into between Great Britain and the United States by which, in the event of war between those two nations, Canada would be allowed to remain at peace. It was said that the time of peace was the time to prepare for war. It would be just as wise to say that the best way to save your premises from fire was to fill the cellar with gun powder, quicksilver and lucifer matches, and then send the boys to play there. Whenever there were threats of war soldiers were called out and it was said "we must be prepared for war;" and 50,000 or 100,000 men were drilled and kept ready for action. The adjoining country forthwith declared that the preparations were a menace to it, and the people likewise armed. These peace preparations cost the nations five hundred and fifty millions annually. This useless expenditure had led many people to look into the effects of war in the past that they might prove an argument in favor of some other mode of settlement in the future. Austria, Italy, Spain and even Russia were burdened with war debt, and young and wealthy America was staggering under its immense debt. There were a great many people who approved of the outlay of money in any way. He was liberal in such matters if there was any return for the expenditure. In a Parliamentary experience of forty years, he had hardly ever voted against expenditures for canals or immigration. He held that a young country could not be overloaded with debt in making such improvements. He was ready to support the Government in any such expenditures. He believed we should have had a canal to Lake Huron long ago. He found that no less a sum than $1,500,000 was spent under an economical Reform Government, during the past few months for these warlike amusements, viz.:—mounted police, $200,000; militia branch and staff, $28,046; brigade majors, $27,199; military schools, $29,000; care of ordnance property, $9,668; drill instructors, $42,000; military stores, $69,000; drill sheds, $5,420; gun boats, $9,400; armories, $56,000; ammunition, $57,000; clothing, $32,000; artillery, $109,713; ordnance, 37,315; improved fire arms, $39,000; and contingencies of various kinds which made up the rest of the amount. They had reduced it, he believed, nearly half a million dollars, and drilled only 26,000 instead of 40,000 men. These young men had been removed for a time from the social circle, home influences, and everything calculated to make a man good and happy. Our soldiers were young men, of sound health, examined and re-examined by physicians. They consisted of the very flower of the country. These young men were taken out and put into camp for sixteen days, and he knew that their parents in this part of the country, considered it sixteen days badly spent. It had a demoralizing effect. Probably had there been no West Point, the foolish civil war in the United States would never have taken place. The difficulty would have been settled by arbitration but for the enthusiasm of the cadets. And what terrible results followed that war? The South was filled with desolation and suffering. Families were reduced from wealth to beggary. He could not dwell on the terrible record. Think of a Borodino where 80,000 in three days were torn to pieces and left in the snow and ditches to satisfy the ambition of a ruler whose name is execrated by all who love peace and holiness. Take half a dozen cases out of the 80,000 connected with that battle, and think of the sufferings of their families, and then ask can we talk of war as something glorious! Nobody delights in war now but the savage who regards it as honourable. In Russia, it was true, there was a love of military glory, but although there was an educated aristocracy there, the serfs knew nothing of liberty, of schools, or a free press, and hence they looked up to military men. But it was not so in England, and officers liked well to go to the colonies, because they knew they were not looked up to at home. War was looked upon as discreditable, and he had just as much faith in getting rid of it, as forty years ago to get rid of duelling. It was said that as long as man was what he was, there were some offences for which nothing but blood could atone, but when it was made a crime, it was put an end to. This scheme of beggar-my-neighbours had become so unsatisfactory that he found the principle of international arbitration had been frequently adopted since 1834. The Portendi claims between England and France were settled by the King of Prussia. In 1853, all outstanding claims between Great Britain and the United States, since the Treaty of Ghent, in 1814, were satisfactorily adjusted by arbitration. Questions of considerable difficulty between the United States, New Granada, and between the same power and Costa Rica, as well as Paraguay and Peru had at different times been settled by arbitration. In 1863, a dispute between Great Britain and Brazil was settled by the King of the Belgians. All these cases were disposed of satisfactorily and no objections were made. These were questions much larger than had caused war in other instances. It was found these could be arranged, and so could other matters, and cases could not be imagined which could not be settled by arbitration. Boundary lines could be adjusted as in the case of the line between Oregon and British Columbia, and of that to the east of us between Maine and New Brunswick. Our peculiar circumstances here were such as needed such a mode of settling difficulties. It had been said that science itself had been sold to the devil to discover means for the purpose of destroying human life. We needed such science for our mines, and canals,and for the education of our people, and not for war. He was satisfied he would be supported by some gentlemen in this House who more or less agreed with his views on this subject, and he believed the time was coming when we might very properly address our Sovereign in reference thereto. Sooner or later, in GOD'S mercy to men, this principle would prevail and all would recognize the fact—

"That there's a divinity within
That makes men great who will it;
God works with all who dare to win,
And the time cometh to reveal it.

"Freemen, though tyrants kill the brave,
Yet in our memories live the sleepers;
And though doomed millions feed the grave,
Dug by death's fierce, red-handed reapers

"The world shall not forever bow
To things which mock God's own endeavor.
'Tis nearer than they wot of now,
When flowers shall wreath the sword forever."

Mr. RICHARD said he had thought of bringing before the House for its consideration a motion somewhat similar to that of the hon. member for South Ontario, but considering the difficulty he had in expressing his ideas in a language not at all familiar to him, considering also that he had not sufficient authority to act as the mover on such an important question, he dropped the idea. He was glad to see the question brought up by the hon. member for South Ontario, and hoped that this House would unanimously adopt it. Though this question might perhaps not be productive of immediate practical results, it nevertheless was one of immense importance, conducing slowly but surely to a final result, and having a bearing beyond the limits of this Dominion, having a bearing all over the civilized world. The question of a permanent arbitration was a new one to many—it might be at first sight considered even a chimerical idea. War having always been the sad lot of humanity, it might be thought that it is a necessity, a necessary evil, the result of a disposition of the human mind. But in spite of whatever may be said either against the idea itself or its prematureness, he had not the least objection to stand before this House as an advocate of and believer in peace, because the reasons in favor of such an idea were so obvious that they cannot fail to bring conviction to the mind of any man open to conviction and unbiassed by strong prejudices. Besides the obviousness of the reasons in favor of this idea, such a question cannot be considered as Utopian that has been supported by a majority of the British Parliament, that has been partly executed in many cases, specially in the celebrated Washington Treaty by the Geneva Tribunal. An idea supported by such men as GROTIUS, WILLIAM PENN, LEIBNEITZ, KANT, WASHINGTON, MADISON, FRANKLIN, JEFFERSON, SAMUEL ADAMS, HENRY CLAY, LOUIS PHILIPPE of Orleans, GLADSTONE, BRIGHT, COBDEN, MILNER GIBSON, ROEBUCK, JOSEPH HUME, Lord PALMERSTON, Lord RUSSELL, Lord CLARENDON, MICHEL CHEVALIER, SUMNER, Lord DERBY, were not Utopian. If so, he was glad to be so with such men. NAPOLEON I. himself clearly expressed the same opinion when he said that war was the business of barbarians. In his memoirs he says—"That "he had a project for general peace, that "an agglomeration of European peoples "must arrive sooner or later by the mere "force of events, and then what a perspec- "tive of greatness, happiness, of pros- "perity. What a grand and magnificent "spectacle!" The resolution moved by Mr. HENRY RICHARD in the British Parliament at the session before last was carried against the vote of the Prime Minister. He opposed it, but only for reasons of expediency. He said—"He was not ready "to vote for Mr. RICHARD'S motion, but "he felt convinced, with a sentiment to "which he might almost give the elevated "name of faith, for all the hope he had for "humanity was so closely associated with "it, he felt convinced that there was reserved "for this country a great and honorable "destiny in connection with this subject." Lord DERBY, a well-known Conservative, on the question with Spain about the ship Mermaid, said in the House: "Unhappily "there is nothing in the nature of an "International Tribunal to which all cases "of this kind might be referred to, and "there are no international laws by which "parties can be required to submit such "cases to arbitration. I do not hesitate "to say that it would be one of the greatest "benefits to the civilized world if "such a tribunal existed." Before this century, the idea of arbitration was mostly confined to philanthropists but since that time the idea has progressed wonderfully, and is now admitted by most statesmen, not only by those of advanced political opinions but of all shades, by men of all creeds, that arbitration is practically and fairly within the power of States. There is no permanent system of arbitration, but special arbitration is often used. In fact more disputes are settled by that means than by the sword. Between special tribunals of arbitration appointed for each special case at the option of the contending parties and a permanent tribunal of arbitration the distance is not very great, the principle is virtually the same but is practically less effective in the former case because the course is open to option and less binding on the parties. Such a permanent tribunal of arbitration exists in the United States under the name of the Supreme Court. This tribunal adjudicates between different States of the Union and between such States and the Federal Government. As said Napoleon I. war was the business of barbarians. We boast very often of our advanced state of civilisation, but this is true only in a limited sense, and as a comparison with past times. War is a relic of barbarism, the obstacle which prevents humanity from attaining real civilization. With the progress of civilization war is becoming gradually an impossibility. It is true that we have still fearful wars but it is equally true that they are less numerous and shorter. The ancient causes of war have disappeared. Wars for the making of slaves, wars for the capture of booty, wars for the possession of colonies, wars for religious purposes, wars about historical rivalries have entirely or almost entirely disappeared over the civilized world. It is true that those causes of war have been replaced by others, such as those arising from the idea of great agglomerations of nationalities and those civil wars arising from the conflict of classes about the solution of social questions. But though those questions will trouble peace for many years to come in Europe, the idea of peace has yearly gained ground in the minds of political men, and with time those two causes of wars will also disappear, not to be replaced. The Westphalia Treaty has almost put an end to wars about religion, it has established a kind of equilibrium to prevent any European nation from overpowering any other. This principle by its very nature could be out a transitory agreement to answer a certain purpose. Wars have raged for the maintenance of this principle, it has been finally broken by Italy and Germany in virtue of an older principle, the one of nationalities, suppressing the old boundaries to form large agglomerations under the basis of identity of language and of origin. It was his humble opinion that a great continental war in Europe is imminent under that very principle. It is a new stage in the history of humanity which cannot be overcome without much bloodshed. But it will be overcome as other causes have with time been overcome, and the great cost of these wars in blood, money and injury to the wealth of nations will for that very reason do much towards the establishment of a permanent tribunal of arbitration. In former times, nations thought they had a great interest in making wars and sometimes they had, by making slaves they were relieved from any hard work, by conquering a country besides all the booty taken from the enemy they raised a yearly revenue from it. By the conquest of foreign lands and colonies they conquered a market for the products of their industry. By a successful war an absolute monarch satisfied his ambition, he was called a hero. At the present time no such reasons exist. Civilization does not allow us to make slaves, neither to impose a yearly tribute on the conquered country, nor to deprive them of rights enjoyed by the conqueror himself. Colonies are virtually independent, govern themselves as they please, impose duties even on the products of the Mother Country. Absolute monarchs are getting few, every civilized nation governs itself by its representatives ; having to pay the expenses of war and deriving nothing to satisfy personal ambition, nations have no interest in making wars. With the semi-civilization of past ages and the ideas then existing, the spirit of conquest could not fail to take hold of the mind of an absolute monarch. Whatever might be the justice of the war and its price, the sufferings of the people had no echo. The successful monarch was sung by poets, crowned with laurels ; arches of triumph were erected everywhere to his memory, and to his name was added the appellation of great ; while the memory of peaceful kings was despised and scorned. Military spirit and glory were the only noble occupations, the only one worthy of occupying the life of a gentleman. The progress of ideas and institutions has caused civilization to step forward in that respect, to-day brutal conquest is not much admitted. In many cases conquest is rather annexation, which is to say that it is done with the consent of interested parties. If somtimes conquest is resorted to justification is sought under the pretence of necessity, or under the pretence of the superior principle of natural boundaries, of nationalities, identity of origin. The interest of nations to make conquests seems to exist no more. The idea of liberty is too deeply rooted in the minds of people to allow the conqueror to deprive the vanquished of their liberties and to make them submit to a tribute. So even a successful war does not in many cases augment either the power or the income of the conqueror. The true hero will not always be the man who devotes his life to take away the lives of others, but rather he who devotes it to the welfare of humanity, and to the peaceful conquest of the progress of the human mind. Interest is the guide of nations as it is of individuals. Wars were caused by interest, they will come to an end if such interest cease to exist. The barbarian kills the one who disputes with him, the possession of his property, the civilized man summons him before a tribunal. It is because the civilized man knows that his interest will be better attained before a tribunal that he does so. It is because he has no tribunal that the barbarian takes justice into his own hands. Nations act like the barbarian, they make war because there is no tribunal for the redress of their wrongs. If there was a tribunal their interest would be to submit their case to the tribunal. As interest has always been and is still the strongest if not the only motive of human actions, if it can be found that with civilization, discoveries of science, extension of trade, war is becoming not only of no interest, but strongly against the evident interest of all such nations, then the case is proved that war is to come to an end, however, distant may be this contingency. Even now war is an inevitable scourge for both parties, with true liberty the spirit of conquest is incompatible ; still more, it is now known contrary to the opinion of statesman and philosophers of the last centuries that the interests of nations far from being antagonistic are largely identical. That it is better to be surrounded by wealthy neighbors than by poor neighbors. That to ruin our neighbor is to shut up a market for our products—that by means of easy and frequent intercourse between peoples, the division of work, the variety of the resources of each country and the extension of trade of the civilized world has become a great family with harmonious and identical interests. That war between two nations injures not only the trade and prosperity of the two contending parties but also the whole trade of the world. Ancient national hostilities and suspicions have almost entirely disappeared ; French, English, Germans by closer contact have established between themselves relations of friendship. To judge of the future by the past, as many do, proves a great lack of judgment and foresight, because the difference already made wider and wider every year. The progress of science had shortened distances, and as a consequence, commercial relations, reduction of tariffs and commercial treaties have ensued. International Congresses of alll kinds had consecrated the Economical Union, the community of interests of all nations. Every year great efforts were made to bring nations to adopt the same laws, the same rules, the same coinage, the same tariffs, the same weights and measures, the same postal and telegraphic taxes. At this very moment there was a Congress sitting at Brussels on the subject of making a code of International Laws to which most Governments had sent authorized delegates. Capital, this powerful agent has become of a cosmopolitan character, the savings of a nation are invested and enrich the industry of other nations. The immense savings of England are invested in all kinds of stocks all over the world. The whole world is the debtor of England, the whole world is the market of England, every nation, but specially England, is highly interested in the maintenance of peace for the security of her own stockholders, and the preservation of her markets. War between England and the States would mean an immense loss of bloodshed and money to every family in these countries. And to us it would mean, besides bloodshed and destruction of property, the complete destruction of our rising industry and of 25 years hard toil and labor. As the eminent Belgian Author, LAVALEYE says so well: "The interests of nations are so much intermixed that an enemy cannot be stricken without killing a debtor, and victory is almost as costly to the conqueror as to the conquered." Capital is a powerful agent of peace in the present time, but there is also a new agent of peace which is yet but in embryo, but will rapidly develop itself. He meant free trade. Nothing would do more to bring nations into closer contact and into relations of friendship than free trade, and for this reason nothing would do more to prevent war. How many national rivalries and disputes had been caused by prohibition tariffs or heavy duties on imports. He had, it is true, advocated protection in the House. He would still advocate it because he believed it would help the building of our industry, but he was none the less a free trader as a principle applicable to all countries in future times. He would certainly be an inconsistent Liberal if he were not a free trader. We had in our own country a conclusive illustration of the fact that wars were impossible when any interest in making them did not exist. What cruel and repeated wars had been made by European Powers during the last two or three centuries for the conquest or retention of colonies! The European Powers thought they had a great interest at stake in those colonies, and he thought they had. But now with the progress of ideas, the plundering of man by man, of a country by another is almost an impossibility. The colonies govern themselves as they please, they even are at liberty not to favor the Mother Country with differential duties on her goods. The interest in retaining colonies having disappeared, what did they see. They saw immediately a strong party in favor of their abandonment. Exactly a century ago they saw England fighting hard against her colony to keep her under her sway and now after a century they saw exactly the reverse. They saw England signifying repeatedly to one of her best colonies: "I have no interest in keeping you, you may go, and they saw the colony almost praying not to let her go. It is a fact, he believed that if there was any interest in the maintenance of the existing dependency, this interest is rather on the side of the colony. However, in our case there is a tie of friendship which may be strong enough for a long maintenance of this dependency. But so much is interest the measure of actions between peoples that this tie strong enough for ordinary circumstances would certainly not resist serious conflicts of interests. Since the policy of European nations with regard to colonies had been so radically modified on account of the interest in their retention having disappeared, it was a strong example which led us to infer that wars will also disappear if they afford no benefit to nations. But as their interest becomes entirely opposed to wars the argument has still more force. Besides the reasons he had given, it was a well known fact that every nation is sinking heavily into debt by expenses occasioned by wars more costly than ever before. In Austria the accumulated deficit from 1851 to 1866 amounted to £130,000,000. The debt of France from 1851 to 1870 before the Prussian war increased from £213,000,000 to £550,000,000 In Italy the annual deficit is about £22,000,000. The last war of France with Prussia had caused the whole debt of that country to amount to 20,000,000,000 of francs, obliging France to provide for $200,000,000 of yearly interest before the paying of the sinking fund and of current expenses. It had been calculated by Mr. BAXTER that 88 per cent of the debt of the world has been caused by wars, warlike preparations and other unproductive expenditures, with this statement he left it to the intelligence of the House to calculate the difference of prosperity if taxes had been 88 per cent less than they are now. Besides loss of money they had to consider the immense loss of lives, of men butchered in the prime and vigor of manhood? How much of vital force, productive energy, of usefulness was thus taken away prematurely; how many precious lives had been mowed down by the sword and the cannon and had been lost for their family and to their country. It had been calculated that 2,000,000 men had lost their lives in wars within 20 years. who could tell what tears, what sufferings, and sorrows were caused by this loss. For every soldier killed in battle field their are numerous relatives suffering, it is a centre of affection that we break up, a happy home which is left needy and desolate. War was also the source of most of the evils of humanity; it was the source of ignorance and pauperism and as CHANNING says: "War is "the concentration of all human crimes. "Under its standard gather violence,

" malignity, rage, fraud, perfidy, rapacity, " and lastly, if it only slew man it would " do comparatively little, but it turns man " into a beast of prey." Arbitration by the sword does not decide the justice of the litigation, it decides only who is the strongest, without any regard of justice. To many, however, the vast amount of taxes paid for warlike purposes, all the sufferings, all the crimes the result of wars were of no consideration, or rather they did not set their minds on those facts. He had demonstrated clearly the evidence of the following facts : That wars had been caused by an interest of some kind. That this interest owing to the various causes he had mentioned had almost entirely disappeared, was often adverse to it, and would with time and civilization be completely adverse. That being so wars must as a necessity come to an end, because they would never have any other basis than interest. If it was a matter of great difficulty to come to an understanding about the course to be adopted for the settlement of disputes which may arise he would have some hesitation. But the course was simple, so simple that no other reasonable course could be found. Every one admitted arbitration to be a principle of equity and right, but some still thought the question impossible. It had been so with a great many other questions, they had been deemed impracticable till found admirable changes. It had been so with the prevention of duelling ; it had been so with the abolition of slavery ; it had been so with Representative Government, it had been so with free trade. There was but one possible objection to a permanent tribunal of arbitration, which was where will rest the executive power to enforce the decisions of such a tribunal ? That had some apparent force, but when examined carefully it had almost none. Every nation would be interested to the acceptance of the decisions, the honor and interest of the country against whom the decision had been rendered would rather be to accept it than to refuse it. Special arbitration had often been used and the decisions had always been accepted. If so with special arbitration, without International Laws to guide the decisions, how much more with an International Code of Laws and a permanent tribunal. JOHN BRIGHT had said: " I believe the time will " come—and much faster than some believe " —when war between nations, will be con- " sidered as brutal and idiotic as duelling " is now considered amongst almost all " classes of the community." He did not pretend that wars were to come to an end within a short time ; it would be absurd te believe it. The cause of war arising from the principle of nationalities and agglomeration of peoples of the same origin was one which must be solved, and it could not be solved pacifically. The map of Continental Europe had, in his opinion, to be radically modified by that principle. Perhaps, in the views of Providence, this frightful storm is necessary to clear the atmosphere, and for the solution of many pending questions. All the efforts of the statesmen and of the friends of peace would be in vain used to prevent this storm. But these efforts would help the establishment of a permanent tribunal of arbitration, and would force in the meantime the settlement of many disputes by special arbitration as had been so often done within 20 years. The idea of peace was daily gaining ground, so much so that Napoleon III. to justify his coup-de-'etat and to captivate the favors of the French nation thought proper to declare that " The Empire was peace." Whatever might be the opinion of hon. members about the possibility of wars coming to an end by arbitration, however, they would differ from him in that respect, every one should admit that it would be better to have some International Laws than none at all ; that such laws and such tribunal would prevent many wars ; that special arbitration though not so binding on parties as would be the decision of a permanent tribunal, had been used successfully in many cases, then if that were admitted they should vote for the motion. It was not without importance that this question be or be not brought before this House. They had a great interest at stake. There was a double end to be attained. 1st, It would act as a recommendation and would impose on England the duty of using arbitration when our interests were concerned ; 2nd, It would promote by our example the general admission of permanent arbitration. The example had been set by the United States and by England ; our action in this matter whatever might be our importance would show to the world that the idea was progressing, and had been echoed all over the free land of America. This would show that wherever the Anglo-Saxon race is to be found, the same spirit of liberty, the same spirit of progress, the same love of humanity, the same ideas, the result of free discussion, of enlightenment and the long enjoyment of free institutions, were also to be found. The English Parliament having the session before last expressed the same opinion as the one now submitted to their consideration, they might follow suit without fear of doing anything too radical. If such a motion had been carried in a country where institutions were so deeply rooted, where the tie between the present and the past was so strong, he thought that having no such obstacles it would prove a want of intelligence not to support such a just and reasonable motion. Twice war had become imminent between England and the States within fifteen years, and twice it had been averted owing to their wisdom and to arbitration. Since the Washington Treaty they might have good reasons to believe that all disputes would be settled amicably, however they might not; in such an event, feeling more heavily the evils of a war, they might reasonably suppose that more attention would be given to secure a settlement by arbitration if Parliament expressed the opinion tsough for by the present motion. No serious causes of difficulty had ever arisen between Canada and the States. The two wars they had to support since the conquest were not for causes of our own. Having to provide for the costs of our military defence against the enemies of the Mother Country rather than our own, it was quite reasonable that they should have the privilege of advising England about the way of settling such disputes, since she could not be indifferent to the fate of her colonies. They had established the basis of a solid future prosperity, they should be its scrupulous guardians; it was becoming of them to do everything which might prevent such a calamity. If they were exposed to a disastrous war with the United States on account of comparative weakness and the special position they occupied, they should feel satisfied that progress of ideas had caused to disappear the idea of annnexing Canada by force. The idea was not perhaps abandoned but the execution was left to events and to our own will. England had become a pacific nation. Instead of dreaming of conquests, instead of dreaming to have her flag floating on all parts of the globe, she had turned her attention to herself, she had thought of solving the noble problem of promoting the happiness of her subjects by giving bread and instruction to all, and by constituting herself in her foreign relations the defender of the policy of peace. Her favorable position and the long and peaceful enjoyment of free institutions placed her in a good position to promote amongst other nations her mission of peace. This had been well understood by her statesmen. She was the advanced citadel of progress in Europe; it was to her that humanity was indebted for the best part of progress. This policy of peace which seemed to have been adopted by England had been blamed in some quarters and called a policy of isolation and effacement; they had not understood the object and the favorable results of this policy and the high mission England had to fulfil in the way of civilization. The position of England was favorable to work in this sense, she was under shelter in her island, and had not to fear any complications arising from rectification of boundaries as other nations on the continent have. It should be a great cause of satisfaction that England and the States had practically adopted arbitration. In spite of the adverse result of the Geneva tribunal, England had not set aside arbitration, since she had submitted lately a difficulty with Portugal to the arbitration of the President of the French Republic. Without arbitration the question of the Alabama claims could not very likely have been settled without a war. And what would have been the result of such a war? Without knowing how it would have ended as far as success is concerned, though he entertained a strong opinion that it would have been against us, one thing at any rate was sure, that Canada would have been the battlefield. Conquered or victorious the country would have been devastated. In a few months our rising industry, our trade, our agriculture, would have been destroyed, and all that for a miserable point of honor for a cause which was not our own. In presence of such facts could they hesitate to vote for a resolution which sanctioned a principle capable in the future of preventing the scourge of war. The expression of the principle of the motion by the House would impose on England the duty, a moral obligation to use arbitration. It was from America that the example had to come for a great many things. It was the United States who by their example had reconciled Europe to liberty and progress, and had to give to her this impulse which agitated her so much. Canada could and should emulate the same role and by voting the resolution they would make if not the first at least the most important step in that direction. The Washington Treaty had not only settled a difficulty but it had also shut the door against other difficulties by causing to disappear the deep rooted hostility which had always existed between two nations so well fitted to understand each other.

Mr. BROUSE said no one could have listened to the speeches made by hon. gentlemen without coming to the conclusion that Canada was indeed becoming a great nation, when we were assuming to ourselves the privilege of dictating to the powers of the earth the principles of peace. While he agreed with most that had been said by the hon. gentleman who moved these resolutions, he would ask the House for a moment to look at what they contained. They endeavored to establish the principle that we might have a system of national arbitration that would settle satisfactorily all differences between countries. He (Mr. BROUSE) held that so far as the difficulties which end in war were concerned, it was impossible, as a rule, to settle them by such a system. What was the power that compelled submission to arbitration between individuals? It was the power of the law, and without that power these arbitrations would be useless. Where was the power to carry out the abitration proposed by his hon. friend? There was no power that could carry it out but the armies of the nations. The liberties of the people must be protected by the people themselves. No series of resolutions such as those proposed by his hon. friend would induce nations to introduce any other system except that which they were now carrying out. His hon. friend had stated that he was a member of a peace society for over thirty years. Although no advocate of war, he (Mr. BROUSE) took the liberty of asserting that there were times when nations must resort to war. He believed that there were questions in dispute between countries which could be settled by arbitration; but he also believed that there were questions which could not be so settled. What position would England have been in to-day had she referred to international arbitration, when a foreign vessel came and dragged from beneath the British flag on board of HER MAJESTY'S man-of war Trent men who had placed themselves under her protection. If she had not come forward on that occasion to sustain her honor, and declare that these men must be returned immediately to the protection of her flag, he felt certain that there was no member in this House who would not have felt ashamed of her conduct. Mr. JOHN STUART MILL was a member of the Peace Society, yet he recorded it as his deliberate opinion that war in a just cause was not the worst evil that might befall a nation—that that degraded state of morality and patriotism which considered nothing worthy of war was worse. His hon. friend had referred to the circumstances attending Mr. COBDEN'S bringing forward his peace resolutions in 1848 on the floor of the English House of Commons. These resolutions of the Peace Society had no doubt a powerful influence in England, and he could well believe his hon. friend desired they should have an equal influence in this Dominion of Canada. He (Mr. BROUSE) had no such desire. He charged against that peace society that it had been the cause of one of the most destructive and bloody wars in the history of the world. We had COBDEN, BRIGHT and others in these days trying to induce England that she should pocket all insults, and that her people should be "a people of peace at any price." They preached this at the corners of the streets —they preached it from the platforms, and they had it preached from the pulpits. They advocated it on the floor of Parliament. Russia was at that time anxious to extend her influence towards the south so that she might become a great naval as well as a great military power. She was bound to obtain the Black Sea, and when she saw this principle obtain such influence in England she felt that the time was a proper one to make her advances, she made her peace with Prussia and Austria; she sent her emisaries to England to fan the flame kindled by the peace society. That society sent a deligation to Russia to say that it was unnecessary to go to war, and that if war were threatened England would not be prepared to uphold it. No sooner was this said than Russia advanced upon Turkey. Lord ABERDEEN, who was then in power, listened to the Peace Society until his vaciliation became fatal to the country whose interests he had in his charge. The great spirit of England, however, came forward and protested against the principles of peace at any price; and when at last they were obliged they did go to war. And as a tribute to the evil results of refusing to be prompt and energetic, when the interest of the country required that course, the bones of 100,000 of Britains best sons were now bleaching upon that foreign shore. If that Peace Society had not influenced English opinion—if Lord ABERDEEN had come forward promptly and energetically at first, that war would not have taken place. He charged this Peace Association with being entirely and wholly responsible for causing this, one of the most cruel and fatal wars that ever occurred in the history of the world. Since 1856, when at the convention of Paris Lord CLARENDON came forward with his resolution—resolutives that were endorsed by the representations of all the great powers present—some of the most bloody wars that have characterized the century have taken place. He had said sufficient to show that whatever proposition these peace-at-any-price men had to make, they could make no proposition that could prevent war If the honor of the country was wounded it must be avenged; and to avenge it there must be war. His hon. friend had referred to some remarks of his in regard to military drill, and had endeavored to show that if we taught our young men military drill it would create in them a warlike spirit. The hon. gentleman had also endeavored to prove that it was from the instruction given at West Point that the American war arose. This was astounding enough to him. He always thought that it was the clank of the chain upon the enslaved negro that caused that war. He (Mr. BROUSE) had attempted to prove, he thought to some purpose, that if military drill were begun in our schools, it would improve our young men physically, intellectually and morally. It would be an advntage toour schools, and could be had without any large expenditure of money. The hon. member for South Ontario had referred to the volunteers of the country. It was unparliamentary perhaps to remind the hon. gentleman that he stated distinctly on a recent occasion that he would rather teach his son to drink whiskey and to be a thief than allow him to learn military drill. As a volunteer of the Dominion of Canada he was delighted to hear the hon. gentleman state that he did not intend to insult the volunteers. He believed if there were one class worthy of the respect of the people of Canada more than another it was the volunteers. The young men who left their homes at a very inopportune season — who left their domestic comforts and went up to prepare themselves for a duty which they owed to their country as citizens—were deserving of the highest praise. Had the hon. gentleman not withdrawn his remarks he (Mr. BROUSE) would have to felt it his duty to have spoken more severely in reference to the matter. The hon. gentleman made another remark which could not be passed over. He stated that it was absurd to suppose that we could protect ourselves against the United States. He (Mr. BROUSE) denied the proposition entirely. He believed that if we read aright the history of the country in the past, it would be clear to all that if we were willing we were able to protect Canada from all who might attack us, whether they lived far from or near to us. The same words as were used by the hon. gentleman were spoken on the floor of the English House of Commons. It was said: "Canada cannot be defended." Lord PALMERSTON rose in his place and said "Canada cannot be defended! Canada can be defended. It is the duty and the interest of this country to protect her colonies." He (Mr. BROUSE) believed that the American nation did not desire, and never would go to war with us. We belonged to the same family, and a war between us would be unnatural. But let us look back to 1812, when the United States, at the dictation of Napoleon, declared war against Great Britain, and 40,000 American soldiers marched to conquor Canada. There were but 80,000 people in Ontario at that time, yet before the year had closed the Canadians had taken Mackenaw, Detroit, Buffalo, Oswego, Sacketts Harbor and Ogdensburgh, and we held a large portion of their territory in the State of Michigan; and not one single foot of British territory was trodden by an American soldier. Were we not in a better position to-day with England to protect us, than we were then? He was of opinion that we were, and that as long as we had the patriotism of that day—and he felt sure that his hon. friend from South Ontario was nothing lacking in that respect—we would be able to protect our homes and firesides. If we went on progressing in the future as in the past, we would be in a position to hold our own with other nations. But he would never have it said that we were simply vassals of the United States, or any other country, while we had the strong arm of England, and the patriotism of the people to enable us to defend our rights.

Mr. DYMOND said the discussion so far reminded him forcibly of those battles between Arab tribes who fought for a great many hours, made a great deal of noise, but scarcely hurt anybody. At the same time the belligerent tone of his hon. friend on the right (Mr. BROUSE) induced the impression that a peacefully inclined mediator might be of some use. His hon. friend from South Ontario, he hoped, would not be offended if he (Mr. DYMOND) presented himself as an arbitrator upon this occasion, and made a suggestion more consonant with the sentiment prevailing in the House and in the country than that contained in the resolution before the Chair. He was glad to hear his hon. friend at the outset retract the expressions he had used regarding our volunteers. Although in the abstract he (Mr. DYMOND) sympathized very largely with what the hon. gentleman termed his peace principles, he should yet regard it as a great misfortune should he commence a crusade in that direction by insulting a profession which numbered amongst its members some of the noblest spirits that our own or any other country had ever known. There was no doubt that in giving expression to these sentiments his hon. friend was faithfully representing the views of a large number of his constituents. Like himself, (Mr. DYMOND), the hon. gentleman was somewhat indebted to the most peaceful of sects for a seat in this House. It had been truly remarked that men were seldom willing to admit the noble qualities necessary to make up the character of a great soldier, although he hoped that where those qualities existed among the people of this country they might be turned in another direction. Still he could not believe, hold peace principles as he might, that it was the duty of this Parliament—the duty of those who were the conservators of the peace and order of the country—to indulge in abstract arguments or propose abstract resolutions of the nature laid before the House by the hon. member for South Ontario. A word or two with regard to his hon. and belligerent friend from South Grenville. That hon. gentleman had done a gross injustice injustice to two of the greatest statesmen, two of the best men of the age. He (Mr. DYMOND) had read every great speech delivered by Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. COBDEN from 1854 to 1870—Mr. COBDEN having died some three or four years previous to the last mentioned date; and he challenged the hon. gentleman to find a sentence, a word, a phrase in any of those speeches that would justify the assertion that they ever did or said aught that was an injustice to their country, or could be construed into an advocacy of "peace at any price." He could tell the hon. gentleman further, that it was not the teaching of the Peace Society; it was the unprepared condition of England and the demoralization of her army by the influence of the aristocratic classes; it was that millions of money had been uselessly and worse than uselessly spent, that tempted Prussia to try the issue when she did. The reference of his hon. friend to Lord PALMERSTON reminded him that even that most terrible of wars might have been averted if Lord PALMERSTON had not secretly interfered with the negotiations, and so hurried on the bloody and disastrous conflict. But even when men saw that England was being hurried into a war that could hardly redound to her glory, there was no one so base as to stand up and demand that she should bow the knee to any insult. He was aware that a deputation of the character described by his hon. friend from South Grenville went to Russia. Perhaps they were members of the Peace Society, but it was not the Peace Society that sent them. One of those gentlemen, who afterwards became a member of the House of Commons, was HENRY PEASE; another who died, all men honoring his name, was JOSEPH STURGE; the other was less known to fame but these men went there on their own responsibility alone. They went there to deliver what they believed to be a message from on high, and it ill became his hon. friend, ignorant as he was of the circumstances of the case, to cast a slur on them. The hon. gentleman, he was sure, had not many Quakers in his constituency. With regard to the remark of the hon. member for South Ontario that there never was a good war, he (Mr. DYMOND) supposed there never was a good enemy of mankind. But there was one war within the memory of all us that no human sagacity could have prevented. He alluded to the war in the United States of America. There was in the condition of society there that insidious poison which could not be driven out of the constitution but by that terrible remedy, and whilst he for one regretted as much as any man to see a great civilized community torn by civil commotion, there was the finger of Providence even in that war, until at last amid the crash of arms and the thunder of conflict the dark cloud rolled away from the face of America, and left her a home for freedom forever more. But if war was so bad, why had men rushed into it? Because it was the result of men's evil passions no sentimental influences, no peace resolutions would keep them out of it. There must be something more than mere resolutions, something which England had felt to be better than peace resolutions to avert from Christian communities the horrors of war. In 1851 we saw the great peace gathering in Hyde Park, and fondly believed that peace was perpetual, and then ensued the terrible Crimean war. COBDEN saw it was by practical means alone that war was to be averted. He had already carried the blessings of free trade into the homes of his own countrymen, but it was by the negotiations with France in 1860 which resulted in the establishment of free trade with that country that England secured her freedom from war panics. When he heard these mere abstract resolutions proposed, he turned from them to the splendid effort they had heard that afternoon of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and felt it was from his teachings, and not from those of his venerable friend from South Ontario we were likely to receive the blessings of peace. This was not a time for making free-trade speeches; this was not a time for discussing anything like the details of treaties with foreign countries; but this at least he would say, that whilst it was the duty of the House to consider all that had been said with regard to the benefits that certain interests would derive from free trade with the United States, the great boon to be obtained by that treaty after all was not the growth of manufactures or additional profits in the pockets of our agriculturists, but the establishment of that community of interests between the two countries which would preserve peace to this continent forever. We were favorably situated here for setting an example to Europe of what can be done in that respect, just as Great Britain and France set an example in 1860. He desired that the time might come when all those fiscal barriers might be swept away which were originally established by the perverse ingenuity of statesmen to gratify the ambition and avarice of kings. When he heard, as he had on the floor of that House, that he was a member of the Manchester school, he was proud to think that in advocating the principles of free trade and peace, which was but another name for free trade, on the floor of this Parliament, he was following the footsteps of the great apostle of free trade and peace, who, reviled as he was and as men were in this day by hostile politicians and ambitious, or jealous, or envious opponents, died at last to be mourned by a whole country, while statesmen, the proudest in the land, wept around the bier of one whose life's mission it had been to bring peace to nations and bread to a hungry people. He moved that all the words after "that" in the motion he left out, and the following inserted:—"This House, will at all times be ready to give its best consideration to any practical legislation that may tend to promote international intercourse, and thus, by establishing a community of interests between Canada and foreign states secure the maintainance of peace."

Mr. PLUMB had no doubt the nations of Europe would manifest deep interest when the news was flashed to them across the Atlantic cable that this great dicussion had taken place, and the wisdom of this House had settled the question of international arbitration. He had no doubt that France who had only been waiting for her revenge, who had been nursing her wrath, would wait to see whether the resolution of the hon. member for South Ontario would pass this House, before deciding whether some kind of international arbitration would not heal the differences between that country and Germany. He had no doubt Russia would pause for a moment and perhaps again invite some peace commissioners to take a peaceful cup of tea, and then go on with her designs as if this motion had never been discussed. It seemed to him that this discussion at the end of the session when there was business to be done, was out of place. He had heard once before that wars were to be no more and that the spirit of the age was such that international conflicts were almost impossible, and yet within the last fifteen years the bloodiest, the most severe, and he might almost say, the most unprovoked wars that had happened within his reading had occurred, and all this since the time when the peace apostles of whom they had heard just now, were proclaiming the principles of free trade and pronouncing that universal brotherhood should prevail. Those apostles proclaimed that nothing was necessary except arbitrations and money awards for those things that money cannot buy, and pay for national honor and national questions which were beyond the reach of anything like the rule of three or arithmetic. He believed that until the arrival of the millenium, when men would cease to be swayed by the same passions as ourselves, all these discussions were a harmless way of ventilating eloquence, and would not make any difference in the price of guns or lower the cost of gunpowder. He thought it would be a perfectly safe speculation to buy anything of that sort, no matter what might be the result of this discussion this evening. At the same time he believed this House was out of order in discussing as a colony, questions which might come very well before the Imperial Parliament, but which could have no weight, whatever way they might be decided in this House. He would therefore vote against the amendment and the original motion.

Right Hon. Sir JOHN MACDONALD said this was an important question and the House had a right to expect to hear from the head of the Government what their policy was. If the motion of the hon. member for South Ontario should be carried, this House would be pledged to address HER MAJESTY on a matter of very great importance. Now, these addresses should only go on subjects of great importance, and should go with all the weight, when they went at all, that the predominance of Parliament could give them, and if possible should go sanctioned by the Ministry of the day who, in great measures, directed the opinion of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said so far as the sentiments propounded by the hon. member for South Ontario were concerned, he entirely concurred in them so far as it was possible to carry them practically into effect. He had no hesitation at all in saying that he believed a great many wars that broke out in the world might be prevented by judicious arbitration, if it were possible to have any sort of an international arbitration court established. The great nations of the earth were jealous of each other, and be feared that a great court of arbitration through their selfishness would practically fail in effect and negotiations for peace would sometimes be provocative of war. He had no doubt, for instance, that if either Russia, Germany, Austria, Italy, France or Great Britain, those great powers of Europe that practically controlled the continent were to be subject to the arbitrament of the others, something would occurr in the affairs or domestic relations of the other five which would seriously affect the justice of the verdict about to be rendered. England felt this with regard to the recent propositions of Russia, and declined to become a party to the negotiations, not that public opinion in England was hostile to international arbitration, but from the inherent difficulties of that system of settling disputes between nations. At the same time he was not prepared to say that it was not competent for this House to raise their voice in favor of any system which would put an end to the fearful sacrifice of human life that took place in great wars. To that extent he sympathized with the hon. member for South Ontario. He (Mr. MACKENZIE) was only sceptical as to the ultimate result of such a court, because the difficulties which national selfishness and pride would place in the way of its accomplishment. As he had heard an hon. gentleman say privately to-night, suppose two or three nations were appointed to arbitrate in the case of one, and that one were unwilling to accede to the verdict, how would that nation be forced to submit? Would the three nations pound that one into submission? That would be something like war itself. The hon. member for South Ontario had not quoted anything from the discussion in the House of Commons, of England, where a resolution almost similar to his own was carried with the approval of Mr. GLADSTONE, although Mr. GLADSTONE expressed himself as doubtful of any results being accomplished by it. Now, he did not think it would do any great harm supposing this House were to adopt this resolution in favor of establishing a court of that kind. It would not indicate anything else than a desire, so far as an expression of the opinion of this House was concerned to obtain some other mode for the settlement of national difficulties than an appeal to the sword. He did not suppose it would have had any very serious effect upon national affairs were this House even to pass this resolution. He recollected having been very much impressed with the statement put into the GOVERNOR'S speech by the right hon. gentleman opposite a few years ago, that peaceful relations existed with the nations around us, but the pacific policy of the Dominion and the assurance that Canada was at peace with the neighboring nations had no effect in Europe, for in the course of a few months war broke out between France and Germany. He was afraid that any resolutions passed by this Parliament would have practically as little effect in the great council of nations, but at the same time it might not be at all wrong for this House to give expression to their opinion upon the subject. Although we are comparatively small as to population, we have a large area of country that we expect will be settled by a very powerful coummunity at no distant day, and that we will be able to exercise more influence than we can at present. He did not suppose the hon. member for South Ontario desired to do anything more than to bring up this subject for discussion, and that he had no desire to press his motion to a division, but having been taunted with reference to his speech on the militia estimates, he had brought up this resolution in order to give his own views as to national disputes and national arbitration and to place his views permanently on record. The country would understand that the hon. gentleman's views were not dictated from a spirit of meagre selfishness, or from any mere desire to save money, but rather to divert money into a better channel than an expenditure for warlike purposes. He hoped the hon. member would withdraw his motion, and that the amendment would also be dropped.

In accordance with this suggestion, the motion and the amendment to it were withdrawn.

DIVORCE COURT.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved the following resolution :—"That the practice of granting divorces by Act of Parliament is, for many reasons objectionable, and that relief in all matters matrimonial would be best secured by creating a Court in each of the Provinces, with exclusive jurisdiction in matters matrimonial, and with authority, in certain cases, to decree a dissolution of marriage." He said that he was aware that a large portion of the members of the House entertained conscientious objections to divorce; and other members held the opinion that marriage was but a legal relation, and that we had the right to sever that relation if need be. His opinion was that the mariage relation was of a sacred character, and that it should be interfered with by a court, such as the high court of Parliament, except so far as to establish a law which might be administered by the Judges. During the Parliamentary sessions he had seen hon. members canvassed to vote for and against a Divorce Bill, and in nine cases out of ten, the members when they made promises had never read over the evidence, but merely formed their opinion on the report to the House. With respect to the right of divorce, it was acknowledged that the Canadian Parliament had granted divorces during former sessions, and was about to grant a divorce during the present session. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island they had divorce laws and divorce courts. British Columbia had a divorce law, but he was not aware that there was any machinery to carry it out, and he thought that the Provincial Legislatures had the right to create a divorce court, having a law on their statute book. The Provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba had no divorce laws or courts, and the same would apply to the North-West Territories. There being already, as he had pointed out, divorce courts in the Eastern Provinces of the Dominion, and Parliament having the right to pass a divorce law and grant divorces, he held that Parliament should enact a law to establish divorce courts for those Provinces where they did not exist. Up to 1857 there was no divorce law in England. In that year the law was enacted creating a court for matrimonial causes and divorce, since which time the law had been amended session after session, and there were no serious complaints as to the operation of the law. He would be perfectly satisfied if the Imperial statute, modified to meet our necessities, were adopted. He thought the cost of working the courts would not be very heavy, if the system adopted in Nova Scotia and P. E. Island were followed.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON thought the motion was out of order, because it might involve the expenditure of money.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the motion was in order, because it only sought to assert an abstract principle.

Mr. BECHARD moved in amendment that all divorce courts existing in the Dominion be abolished.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE hoped the hon. member would not move that motion, because we had no power to abolish courts within the different Provinces. He would ask the hon. member for Victoria whether under the circumstances it would be desirable to ask the House to express its opinion on the resolution. It might be that the resolution only sought to lay down an abstract proposition ; but it also proposed to establish a court which a large number of persons were opposed to ; and although he had personally no objection to the establishment of such courts, he at the same time did not desire to afford additional facilities for obtaining divorces. But the question at the present time was as to whether any useful purpose would be served by moving a motion of this kind as the House was not discussing any subject cognate to it, and as the hon. gentleman would not obtain an expression of opinion in favor of the establishment of such a court he hoped the resolution would be withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the motion was quite in order as it asked the House to express its opinion on a grave question of public policy. If the resolutions were adopted, the Government would have to consider what was the effect of the motion when carried. This was one of the many subjects which Parliament was authorized to discuss. So far as his own personal opinion was concerned, he would vote against the resolution, for there was no reason why we should establish courts of divorce in Canada. While he would not go as far as the hon. members from Lower Canada, and declare that divorces should not be granted under any circumstances, he thought there should be no encouragement given their procurement. The present law was sufficient for all purposes. If a party established in a court of law, in a manner that was satisfactory to the court, that he had been wronged, he had a right to apply to Parliament. Happily, as yet we had very few of those applications, and the time spent in legislating for the relief of these applicants was well spent if we could avoid the creation of a divorce court. Amongst the moral triumphs which Mr. GLADSTONE had achieved there was none so great as his defeat when he protested against the establishment of a divorce court in England, which had not been productive of any beneficial effects. It was well known that cases of almost collusion occurred every day ; and arrangements were made between husband and wife so as to permit a separation or a termination of the marriage But in England there was a reason for the establishment of a court which did not exist here, and that was the enormous expense of obtaining a Private Bill for divorce, and getting it through Parliament. In this country, however, the expense of going through the courts was simply the cost of a suit before an ordinary tribunal, which involved no very large expense ; and they all knew how small the expense was of passing a Bill through the Canadian Parliament. While divorce was not prohibited in Canada, and while parties to domestic misery and unhappiness might obtain relief, nevertheless under the present system no encouragement was given to those cases, and he would be very sorry to see any tribunal established which might be the means of inviting other dissatisfied couples to apply for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON said that divorce was now a social disease, but if we established a Divorce Court, as they had in England and the United States, it would prove a social epidemic. There was nothing so inviting as a court of that kind for people, first, to marry without any consideration or reflection, and, second, to procure a divorce at leisure. There was divorce in the Roman Law, but it was not in accord with the feelings of the people, and was not during a long period carried into effect; but after the first case, it spread like an epidemic, and the consequences in Italy, the United States and England were very well known. He did not consider the subject from a religious but from a social point of view. When BONAPARTE established the Code Napoleon, he pronounced, after a long discussion, in favor of divorce. But in 1816 CHATEAUBRIAND, the eminent writer, who was at that time Minister of the Crown, succeeded in abolishing divorce and establishing the old law, not on religious but on purely social considerations, and after that the question was tried in the legislative body of France under LOUIS PHILIPPE three times. On the two first occasions a proposition to reverse the law was carried in the Lower House by an overwhelming majority, but it was rejected by the House of Peers, simply on social considerations. In 1843 or 1844 the question was again brought up before the legislative body, and upon the simple considerations he had mentioned was rejected by an overwhelming majority, and was never tried again. Its adoption now would result in a greater evil than the social evil, and he hoped the question would never be brought up again.

Mr. DECOSMOS said he thought it ought to be the duty of the Government to take the necessary steps on the establishment of a Divorce Court, and not have questions coming before this House so often in the shape of applications for divorce to the annoyance ofall. He thought there was a real feeling in the country that there should be a divorce law, as the present was very expensive.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said so far as public opinion was concerned it was not demanding anything of the kind; and he should vote against the motion as at present unneccessary.

The question being put,—a point of order was raised and discussed as to whether the motion should not be declared lost on division, and as to the calling yeas and nays,

Mr. SPEAKER said that upon division the yeas and nays need not be taken unless demanded by five members.

The question being put,—a brief discussion took place on the point of order as to whether the five members who called for a division should not be held to vote nay.

The House divided as follows :—

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said that in order to have a point settled that was not thoroughly understood he would have the matter tested. He observed the hon. members for Nicolet and North Perth had called for a division against the decision of Mr. SPEAKER (that the ayes have it) and he therefore proposed that their names should be entered as voting for the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER read (May, p. 271) "It must be well understood by members that their opinion is to be collected from their voices in the House, and not merely by a division; and that if their voices and their votes should be at variance, the former will be held more binding than the latter;" and said if he had observed or had learned on the statement of any hon. member that when the question was put an hon. member had said "aye" he should certainly have the vote called "aye"; but the mere fact that he had called for a division was not to be regarded as deciding the vote, as the rule did not say that the five members calling for a division were to be on one side or the other. The 128th rule of the House of Commons put the case in an entirely different position. After the SPEAKER had declared that the "noes" have it then those who differed from him called for a division, and the division must be had. Our rule did not say that; but that any five members may call for a division, and an entering of the names. He thought the Canadian rule was positive, and that he could not enter the names.

Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE the House adjourned at 11 o'clock, p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 23rd, 1875.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

QUEBEC GRAVING DOCK.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE asked leave to introduce a Bill respecting the Graving Dock in the Harbor of Quebec, and authorizing the raising of a loan in respect thereof. He said this was simply an act to enable the Government to borrow money for the purpose of loaning the same to the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec for the purpose of building a graving dock and providing means for the payment of interest upon that money by the Harbor Commissioners, and the creation of a Sinking Fund for the extinction of that loan.

The Bill was read a first time.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DEVLIN begged leave to offer a few words in explanation of a statement made by him in this House a few evenings ago. Before doing so, he would read the following article which appeard in the Montreal Gazette of the 16th inst. :—

"The Ottawa correspondent of Le Nouveau Monde has the following on Mr. DEVLIN'S sudden desertion of Mr. COSTIGAN on the School question and his assertion that Bishop SWEENEY approved of the amendments:—'Mr. DEVLIN, the Catholic representative who almost threatened the Government with a revolution if they did not grant full and entire justice to his co-religionists, came forward, and in the most abject manner swallowed his own words and abandoned the cause he had espoused to follow the Government. Not satisfied with this, he had the audacity to bolster up the new position he had taken by a deliberate falsehood. He stated that he had the approval of His Lordship Bishop SWEENEY in voting as he did, and this I know personally is false.'"

That statement came from a correspondent in this city, and as his (Mr. DEVLIN'S) veracity had thus been publicly impugned, he felt it to be his duty to avail himself of his position to state that every word he had uttered upon the occasion to which this correspondent referred was absolutely true, and in confirmation of the truth of this assertion, he referred to the four Irish Catholic members from the Lower Provinces who were present when His Lordship Bishop SWEENEY advised his friends to support the amendment to be proposed by the hon. member for Quebec. Having been publicly accused of a falsehood, and it having been publicly stated that he had availed himself of his position in this House that which was untrue, he owed it to himself and to this House to make this statement, and to defy any gentleman within its walls or outside of it to contradict that statement and support his contradiction by reliable evidence. The statement in the Nouveau Monde was an odious falsehood from the beginning to the end of it, and so were all the statements that had been made against him in connection with his vote on that occasion. An attempt was being made to write him down in the newspapers of this country, because he discharged his duty honestly and conscientiously. He would add no more, except to say that the hon. member for Hochelaga, who held a seat in this House, was the editor of the paper in which this falsehood appeared.

Mr. BABY said it was customary on such occasions as this for hon. gentlemen to wait till the member thus attacked was present in the House to defend himself.

Dr. DEVLIN said the correspondent did not wait before attacking him.

Mr. COSTIGAN could not agree with the hon. member for Montreal Centre, when he knew that in the public prints, and in this House, there were two versions of this transaction. The hon. gentleman had affirmed one thing very positively, and the House was requested to believe on the other hand that the statement which appeared in the Nouveau Monde was correct. He (Mr. COSTIGAN) had expected that the hon. member would bring some proof of what he had affirmed, but it was merely a re-affirmation of his former statement, and challenged any one in this House to disprove it. Now, he (Mr. COSTIGAN) believed every word in that article to be true, and he must continue to believe it to be true until the hon. member produced better proof to the contrary than the mere assertion of an individual member of this House. He was convinced that the statement was well-founded, and he could not believe that the hon. member for Montreal Centre was ever authorized to use Bishop SWEENEY'S name as he had done in this House, until he saw the statement of Bishop SWEENEY to that effect in his own hand-writing.

Mr. DEVLIN said the hon. members for Halifax, Richmond, Antigonish, and another hon. gentleman whose name or constituency he had forgotten were present at the conversation he had referred to, and he appealed to them to stand up in the House now and defend the man whom they knew had acted with them conscientiously and faithfully.

Mr. POWER said he would just merely state that he then believed and still believed that we had the concurrence of His Lordship (Bishop SWEENEY) in the course we took in the question referred to.

Mr. FLYNN said he would have preferred that the matter had not been brought up, but being called upon by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, it was due that hon. gentleman and to himself that he should state what he knew in the matter. From the Monday to the Wednesday of the week when the resolutions were before the House and were disposed of, he and the hon. members for Montreal Centre, for Halifax, for Antigonish, and from Prince Edward Island (he had forgotten the name of the riding) frequently met together to look the matter over, and frequently met His Lordship Bishop SWEENEY. On the last occasion of meeting the hon. member for Montreal Centre expressed his desire simply to vote in this House as His Lordship wished; but at the same time he advised that the amendment about to be moved by the hon. member for Quebec Centre was the best mode of dealing with the matter in the interests of those who sought redress for their grievances. He (Mr. FLYNN) might say this much that His Lordship did not appear altogether satisfied with the resolution, but at the same time expressed in his (Mr. POWER'S) presence the belief that the best thing the hon. member for Montreal Centre could do was to vote for that amendment; and when they left His Lordship in the library about five or six o'clock in the afternoon it was with the distinct understanding that they were to vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Quebec Centre. That was the impression upon his mind and it would always, be the impression. He (Mr. FLYNN) would have voted for the amendment no matter what influences might have been brought to bear upon him to vote another way.

Mr. DEVLIN—I call upon the other two hon. members who were then present, —if they are in the House—to express their opinion on this subject.

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS—That is enough.

M. DESJARDINS :—Je regrette beaucoup de ne pas avoir été présent, en Chambre, il y a quelques instants, lorsque le membre pour Montréal Centre a cru devoir faire allusion à un sujet qu'il avait pourtant tout intérêt à laisser dans l'oubli. A moins de croire que Sa Grandeur l'Evêque de St. Jean, ait voulu mettre les Catholiques de cette Chambre sous une fausse impression, il est impossible de ne pas dire que l'assertion du député de Montréal Centre est tout-à-fait dénué de fondement. Ce qui vient d'être dit d'ailleurs prouve qu'il n'était pas autorisé à faire l'avancé qu'il a fait l'autre jour dans cette Chambre. Le député de Richmond dit que Sa Grandeur a accepté l'amendement du député de Québec Centre, mais il n'ajoute pas Sa Grandeur a accepté également l'amendement du député de Québec Centre comme ajouté à celui de l'hon. Premier. Personne ne peut prouver que Sa Grandeur ait approuvé les deux amendements joints ensemble. Le dénégation publiée dans les journiaux est parfaitement établie par les déclarations de Sa Grandeur. Il est étonnant que le député de Montréal Centre, après avoir si pompeusement promis une preuve directe de Sa Grandeur, vienne comme un écolier pris en flagrant délit, sans autre autorité cette fois encore, que sa propre parole, essayer de redonner du crédit à sa première affirmation puis appeler des témoins pour essayer de donner le change sur la véritable nature des faits. Je sais que le député de Terrebonne a été autorisé à nier la vérité de la déclaration du député de Montréal Centre à la séance même où il'a faite, par un homme qui avait suivi les négociations avec les députés catholiques d'un côté et Sa Grandeur Mgr. SWEENEY de l'autre et qui savait au juste tout ce que qui s'était passé. Personnellement, je sais que Sa Grandeur était opposée à l'amendement et au sous-amendement, greffés ensemble, car j'ai moi-même entendu Sa Grandeur deux fois exprimer son dissentiment dans l'après-midi même qui a précédé la séance où le vote fut pris sur cette question. Naturellement, la question en est devenue une de véracité entre le député de Montréal Centre et moi-même. Mais je ne crains pas de soumettre à l'épreuve la position que j'ai prise, et si cette preuve écrites promise par le député de Montréal Centre vient un jour ou l'autre, je sais bien que ce n'est pas moi qui aurai à m'en plaindre.

Mr. BECHARD said as the hon. member for Montreal Centre had called upon those who were present at these interviews to state their opinions, and as he was present he would state what he understood. It was stated to His Lordship what were the bearings of the amendment that would be likely to be offered by the Government to the resolution of the hon. member for Victoria, and they also explained the bearings of the supplement proposed by the hon. member for Quebec Centre. He understood His Lordship to say that he could not give a definite opinion, as he had not had an opportunity of reading those amendments, but he said "If you think that by voting for this amendment you do not bind yourselves to the future, that your vote will not pledge your future conduct should the question be brought up again in the House, then I would accept it." That was how he (Mr. BECHARD) understood the matter; and he remembered that he had stated that on his part he would vote for the amendment, and that he intended to reserve his free action for the future.

Mr. COSTIGAN said it was unfortunate the matter had come up, but as reference had been made to meetings where he was present, he thought he should give his view of the discussion.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON raised a point of order, and called for the question before the Chair. These personal explanations were admissible to a certain point, but they could not admit that hon. gentlemen should address the House two or three times without any motion before the Chair. The hon. gentleman who had taken his seat (Mr. COSTIGAN) had already spoken relative to the personal explanation of the hon member for Montreal Centre.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was very sorry the hon. member (Mr. HOLTON) had interfered in this matter. It was quite true there was no motion before the chair; but the matter before the House affected the personal honor and veracity of the hon. member for Montreal Centre, and as particular statements had since been made respecting particular persons and circumstances, he considered the hon. member for Victoria should be allowed to state his view of the matter.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said he was quite willing to take the responsibility of enforcing the rules, and to assume the odium or credit of such a motion.

Mr. SPEAKER said his impression was that the proper course under the circumstances was to restrict the hon. gentleman strictly to an explanation of any matter that had arisen out of the statements made by the other gentlemen, and not to allow anything approaching a controversy. He should simply make a statement, but not controversial in its character.

Mr. COSTIGAN said the statement made by the hon. member was generally correct, but there was a difference, and it was a grave one between them, and he (Mr. COSTIGAN) explained it in this way. The hon. member stated that the hon. member for Montreal Centre and other hon. members had an interview with His Lordship, at which the hon. member himself was present, and it was then stated that a motion would be made in amendment to his (Mr. COSTIGAN'S) motion in a sense that an address would be presented to HER MAJESTY asking for modifications of the school law, which should not, however, change the constitution. It was stated that His Lordship had said he would be willing to accept the amendment if it did not bind hon. gentlemen in their future conduct, but His Lordship was informed that 106 members were pledged in writing to support the amendment, and therefore it was no longer a matter of choice.

Mr. DOMVILLE desired, before the Orders of the Day were taken up, to call attention to what he considered to be a breach of privilege. The morning papers were placed in his hand at Toronto, and in them he found, under the proceedings at Ottawa, a report from the sub-committee appointed to investigate the transactions of FRAZER, REYNOLD'S & CO. It stated that the sub-committee had met that morning to consider their report, and that they had adopted the report on the motion of Mr. DYMOND, seconded by Mr. GOUDGE, which report was adopted. The signitures of five members of the committee were attached to it, and it concluded by saying that "the remaining two members Messrs. PLUMB and DOMVILLE, were not present." He complained that the sub-committee having adopted a report at a meeting when he was unable to be present to sign and concur in it, or otherwise, had allowed the report to be published before he and the hon. member for Niagara were able to attend and prepare a minority report. The sub-committee's report had not even been presented to the Committee of Public Accounts and adopted by them before it was published in the newspapers. He desired an expression of opinion from the House as to whether such action was proper.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD said it was undoubtedly a breach of privilege and contrary to the usual Parliamentary practice, that a report of a sub-commitee which was made to the committee should be sent to the press before it was even submitted to the committee. It was even a breach of privilege to publish a report before it was submitted to the House.

Mr. DYMOND said as it had been imputed by the right hon. gentleman opposite that the sub-committee was responsible for the report having been sent to the papers, he would take steps which he otherwise would not have done, presuming that the hon. member for Kings would have been satisfied with having called the attention of the House to the matter. As it was not his practice to allow others to suffer from an imputation which did not belong to them, he would take the whole responsibility on himself of the report having beeen communicated to the Press, and the House would indulge him, as it was considered a gross breach of privilege, if before he submitted himself to its decision, if a decision were asked, he made a brief statement of the circumstances under which it had occurred. The committee, of which the hon. member for Kings and himself were members, whose meetings they had attended together with the exception of last Friday and Saturday, had been held with open doors. Reporters had attended, and such reports as they, in their discretion, thought proper to prepare had appeared in the Press throughout the Dominion. On Tuesday last they concluded the reception of evidence and decided to meet on Friday, in order to agree on the report, with the understanding that if between Tuesday and Friday no fresh matter presented itself no other meeting would be held. To all intents and purposes it was decided that Friday should see the end of their deliberations. He undertook, at the request, of hon. members who agreed with himself pretty much on the evidence, to draw up and present a draft report to that meeting. They learned with regret before that meeting was held on Friday, that the hon. member for Kings was confined to his house of indisposition. The hon. member for Niagara was present during a part of their deliberations, and that hon. member read over the report and without for one moment asking him to commit himself to that report, he (Mr. DYMOND) might say that he gave a qualified assent to its substance, at the same time expressing a desire, as he had not been present at many of the meetings to have an opportunity of conversing with the hon. member for Kings, who had been present before he gave his final assent to that report, with a modification of it. Let it, however, be distinctly understood that he did not hold the hon. member for Niagara to anything that took place in a very informal conversation on that occasion. Reporters, or a reporter, was certainly present when the report was read over and when it was discussed. There was not, therefore, any possible reason whatever why a report as nearly verbatim as that gentleman could have taken down or a summary of a report should not have appeared in the papers on Saturday morning. In order that the hon. member for Kings might have an opportunity of expressing his opinion on any point which he might desire, he (Mr. DYMOND) caused a copy of the report to be sent to him with a letter stating that the committee had adjourned to Saturday, and inviting him to make any marginal notes which might assist them in making any correction which might be thought proper. Before sending that to the hon. member, he also modified the draft in the sense suggested by the hon. member for Niagara. He hoped, therefore, that when the committee met on Saturday that the report would have been an unanimous one. The committee met by notice at eleven o'clock on Saturday morning and five members were present, all of whom were acquainted with the contents of the report, and they decided, then and there to adopt it. Four members forming quorum, a therefore, to all intents and purposes, the report was the report of the Committee of Investigation—it not being, he believed, the rule that a committee should sit merely to accommodate absent members, although courtesy demanded that hon. members should be accommodated as far as possible. The reason for pressing the matter to a conclusion on Saturday was this: They understood that the Committee of Public Accounts would be called on Monday, and they felt that as the matter was one affecting the personal character as well as the political conduct of certain members of the House in relation to the manager ment of a Nova Scotia railway, the report ought to be presented to the committee at the earliest possible moment. Reporters were present in the committee room on Saturday, and when the proceedings were concluded one of them asked me whether he would be allowed to copy the report. That gentleman was connected with a paper with which he (Mr. DYMOND) was by no means in political accord. He gave that gentleman a copy of the report with the understanding, of course, that it would be open equally to any other member of the Press, and he did so with a conviction in his mind that almost simultaneous with the appearance of the report in the Toronto and Montreal papers the Public Accounts Committee would be in session, when the report would be again read over in a public meeting, and the reporters would have an opportunity of taking it down. If he had committed any outrage or breach of privilege, or done any wrong to members of the Opposition, he expressed his profound regret therefor; but he believed that the course he had adopted was one which was not unjust, but might be productive of advantages. He would ask hon. members whether after the facts of the case had been before the country for upwards of a year, after the committee had sat day by day, and taken much evidence which had been daily published, it was an offence to allow an abstract thereof, with one or two expressions of opinion added, to go to the public when five members attached their signatures thereto, and assumed all the responsibility of the report. He would further add, that learning that the hon. member for Kings was dissatisfied, the committee met that day, although they had no right, he believed, according to Parliamentary usage, to do so, to give the hon. member for Kings and the hon. member for Niagara an opportunity of recording their protest. He had not anticipated, after what had taken place in the committee room, that they would have felt aggrieved, and he had yet to learn that any other person felt aggrieved in regard to the matter.

Mr. PLUMB said that as his name had been mentioned in connection with the committee he felt it due to himself and to the member for Kings that he should make some statement in respect to the subject before the House. He had been absent from the city during six or seven days, and during the time of his absence the member for Kings had been engaged with the member for North York in investigating some of the accounts in connection with the transactions which the committee were appointed to examine. The hon. member for Kings understood more fully some of the important points upon which the investigation was likely to turn than himself. When he returned to the city he found that the committee had closed the examination of witnesses, concluded their investigation, and had drawn up a report. That report was submitted to him when the hon. member was confined to his house by serious illness. He (Mr. PLUMB) stated then that the report was not drawn up in a form which he could agree to. He said that at the outset, and he had thought it might possibly be modified, but he saw that it would be necessary to make very material modifications in it, as its whole tone and spirit appeared objectionable. However, he wished to consult the hon. member for Kings in regard to it. The meeting on Friday was held in a different room from that in which the meeting usually assembled, and although he came to the House with the intention of attending it, he failed to find the committee. He did not conceive from what had passed at the previous meeting that there was any immediate and pressing haste in preparing a report. He knew that the committee had been very earnest in their investigations, and had transacted a very large amount of business, and it was unnecessary to hurry the preparation of the report. He was, therefore, very much surprised afterwards to learn what had been done. It was obviously quite impossible that the hon. member for Kings and himself could properly consider the report unless they met the committee and discussed it in open session. There were some matters connected with the investigation of great importance, and he was bound to say that when he found that a report had been adopted and also gone into the public prints, whereby he and the hon. member for Kings were left in the position of appearing as if they had not attended the committee, he felt that undue haste had been used, even if it was proper under the circumstances to lay such a report before the public, before it was submitted to the body of which the committee was a constituted part. He felt, too, that under the circumstances it was due to the hon. member for Kings to state that his illness was of such a nature that he could not have attended some of the sessions of the committee, and he believed it was so understood by hon. members, and it would have been only due to him that some little delay should have been given so as to allow him an opportunity of attending. So far as the report was concerned it was not such, either in spirit or character as he could approve of.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. member for North York had come forward in a very confident spirit and assumed the responsibility of the publication of the report. When he (Sir JOHN) offered his remarks he did not charge that hon. member or any member of the sub-committee with doing anything wilfully wrong or desiring to injure any one, or to commit a breach of the rules. He did not know that any one would suffer, or that any one would be subjected to a grevious injury by the premature publication of the report, but its publication under the circumstances was certainly contrary to the rules of the House and to its practice. His experience had been that those rules which were the production of the wisdom of ages, had always been framed for a good purpose, and although they had been set aside sometimes, yet their wisdom sooner or later became apparent.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said the views expressed by the hon. member for Kingston were undoubtedly correct, but the committeed had debarred itself from any complaint in the matter by admitting reporters and allowing the evidence submitted to be published day by day without any objection being raised.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK remarked that the report of the committee was a different thing.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE did not take that view. Both the publication of the proceedings and of the report was irregular. The rule was that evidence taken by a select committee should be privileged, and that documents ought not to be published by any member of the committee; but when the committee deliberately depart from that rule and allow the evidence to be published daily, it was no longer open to them to complain of breach of privilege. For his own part he had not seen the evidence or the report.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he never gave any reporter permission to publish this report. The report, he contended, went beyond the evidence.

Mr. DYMOND rose to a question of order. The hon. member for Kings was proceeding to discuss the report, and of course if he were permitted to do so some one would have to reply to him. It was not competent for the hon. member to discuss the report at this stage.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the Premier, in his statement of the rule, had not gone far enough. According to MAY, the publication of the report of a committee before it had been presented to the House was a breach of privilege. He quoted from that authority the statement of a case in which a Dublin newspaper publisher, who had published in his journal the draft report of a committee, and who on being questioned admitted the publication, but refused to state from what source the report was received, was committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. He did not propose to go so far as that, but he thought the House should have a ruling from Mr. Speaker as to whether these reports could be published. In this case it was not a mere summary, but the full official text of the report.

Hon. Mr. HOLTON said it was impossible to have a ruling, as there was nothing before the Chair.

The Orders of the Day were then called.

CULLING OF TIMBER.

Hon. Mr. GEOFFRION moved the third reading of the Bill to amend the Act respecting the Culling of Timber.
