Mr. McLure: Mr. Speaker, as nearly every other province has had quite a number of speakers on this momentous question, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) calls it, I think perhaps we might have a few words on behalf of the province which I have the honour to represent here, namely Prince Edward Island. If I did not say a few words on this occasion it might be thought that, since Prince Edward Island was wiped off the map printed in an advertisement the other day, we were still removed from the map. I saw an interesting cartoon the other day concerning the removal of Prince Edward Island from this map. It was in some of the leading papers in the east, and pictured half a dozen school boys asking their teacher, who was looking at the map contained in the advertisement, where is Prince Edward Island? With a long pointer the teacher was going from one end of the map to the other but could not find it. I am going to try to place the position of this island before the minister.

The resolution before the committee at the moment seems to be a rather peculiar one, although I must say I am not familiar with the drawing of resolutions of this kind. A corporation is to be created called the St. Lawrence seaway authority. The title seems to be rather broad, and this corporation will have absolute authority if the resolution passes in its present form. Mention is made also of the fact that the corporation may borrow amounts not exceeding $300 million. It appears that authority is given to borrow this $300 million four or five times for this one project, because the resolution says that amount is not to be exceeded at any one time. Probably the minister will have a different explanation of that sentence, but as I see it the St. Lawrence seaway authority has the power to borrow an amount not to exceed $300 million at any time it so desires.

A great deal has been said, Mr. Chairman, by the hon. members from the maritime provinces. For instance, the hon. member for Cumberland just made a speech in which he dealt with the historical aspect of maritime claims, and I consider he made a good case for the maritime provinces. We have listened also to excellent speeches from the hon. members for Royal and for Annapolis-Kings. I might say that all the speeches made on behalf of the maritime provinces have placed good arguments before the Minister of Transport. I should like to deal with the subject from the point of view of my province, the province of Prince Edward Island.

We all know that agriculture is the basic industry of any country. The province of Prince Edward Island not only equals but excels most provinces in the productivity of the soil. This fact has to be considered when we are appealing not only to the Minister of Transport, but to the government, for consideration. My province has no great industry except the basic industry of agriculture. Close to it in importance are our fisheries. In looking at this project from the point of view of an agricultural province, one can see that it is possible we shall not obtain any direct benefit. On the other hand if some benefit can be obtained for the maritime provinces, then perhaps the province of Prince Edward Island can benefit indirectly.

When the minister was introducing this subject the other day he made a wonderful speech in which he stated this was the most important subject upon which he had ever made a statement in this House of Commons. No doubt that is true from the standpoint of the great vision of tremendous benefits that will come to Canada. In his speech, however, I could not detect one ray of hope for any benefit, either directly or indirectly, coming to the province I have the honour to represent. The minister was speaking on behalf of the greatest province in Canada, namely the province of Ontario. He has the honour to represent a constituency lying close to the site of this great project. In view of this fact, he had a right to speak of the scheme in such glowing terms, and to relate what this project would mean to the province of Ontario. I repeat that I followed his speech quite closely, but I could see no ray of hope for the province of Prince Edward Island, the banner province and the cradle of confederation.

If the minister had held out any hope of a plan which would have been of direct benefit to the maritime provinces from which my province might have reaped some indirect benefit, I would have been satisfied. I want to make it clear that I am not opposed to this great project outlined in the resolution before the house. I feel, however, that we should not support it unless we receive some assurance that the maritime provinces will derive direct benefits. The hon. member for Cape Breton South said that he did not care where the government wanted to place steel works for the further processing of steel. I say that we have a steel works now established at Sydney, and that is the type of thing we do want in the maritime provinces. If the minister had announced that he would expand this steel works that is in operation in Cape Breton so that it could manufacture enough steel to supply the demand, that would have met with our approval. Today they cannot fill one-third of their orders. If they want support from the government, let them get it out of this enormous sum that is to be voted following this resolution. I hope that when the minister revises his speech he will give some ray of hope to those of us in the east. I am sure it must have been an oversight on his part, but we want it put in writing this time that we are to get something; that is, if we are expected to support in every way this immense project. Of all the speeches that have been made here, I had great pleasure in listening to the leader of the opposition. In his speech on behalf of this project he included all of Canada from one end to the other. In his remarks he told the house and the minister that the maritimes had been neglected, and they should not be neglected, if this great project is to be what it could be on behalf of the whole of the Dominion of Canada.

I want to say a word or two with regard to my position. I have always said that I am not opposed to it. I know the good people of Prince Edward Island would not desire me to be opposed to anything that is in the interests of Canada as a whole, but they do desire to have something to show for their support of it. In the maritimes we should have something directly, and it may be indirectly to Prince Edward Island, which we will gladly accept.

As I said on a previous occasion, in reading the speech from the throne I noticed there was one thing which should have applied to our province. When the government said they were going to build this seaway project they left the hope that we in the east, who had been clamouring for different things in our provinces, would now get some consideration. We felt that the government was now loosening up, as it were, and that we could now demand action on some of the projects that we have been talking about over the years but had never received down in the maritimes. I want to mention one in particular. While this project may be a great vision, we all know that from time to time great men in Canada have had great visions. For instance, it was visionary at first when some men thought that the provinces of Canada should become united. That vision became reality. After that the question arose as to where the capital of this Canada of ours would be located. That great man, Sir John A. Macdonald, when looking over the size of the grounds for the capital, had a vision of where the capital buildings should be erected. He had a vision of the greatness of the future of Canada. In talking about the grounds for the parliament buildings, and where they should be erected, he said they should begin at the east of the canal, then run directly in a straight line to what is now Queen street until it meets the river. Had that vision become a reality, instead of the small area we have, all our great buildings in this capital belonging to the dominion government could be in one great common area instead of being scattered around the city.

Another great vision was the linking of eastern Canada with the western provinces by means of a railway. That was finalized, and what a great undertaking it was. There were other great visions. Some became realities and some did not. We have this great vision of a seaway. According to the minister it is going to become a reality, and in the most rapid manner possible. As soon as it is finished it will become the chief competitor of our great railway systems. That may be quite proper. If this project is all that the sponsors say it is, then I believe it could be built and operated from tolls. We all know that the tolls from the canals in Canada today are not sufficient to take care of the burden of running them. Even if it is not a paying proposition, would it not be better for the government to say that the interest alone on this $2 billion or $3 billion that will eventually be spent would pay the deficit of our railways to the extent of $60 million a year? Would it not be better to put our efforts into the solving of the transportation difficulties of our railways instead of taking on this new project of a seaway for the benefit of centralization in the great provinces of Canada to the detriment of the outlying provinces?

I had hopes when we asked for the development of certain things in our provinces. When we have asked for certain things such as improvements to public buildings, new buildings and improvements in transportation, and also improvement of our harbours, which was at one time the policy of the Liberal party, the reply we received from the ministers was: No money, no material. Yet at the same time they have this enormous surplus, greater than they ever dreamed of getting. They have more now than they ever thought of. They have $640 million in the first half of the year. We find that Prince Edward Island has paid toward that surplus a little over $4,800,000. That is quite a lot of money when you are asking for only a few things that do not cost much over $1,500,000. We have been definitely promised certain things. It reminds me of this. When the Liberal party comes before the people they always have so much to offer but so little to give. This has been very true in our case.

I should like to deal for one moment with a project which, it seems to me, would come within this resolution, because it refers to transportation. I have in mind the harbour improvement we have been promised time and again by all political parties. Only one of those parties, however, has made any attempt to carry out those improvements. That was the Conservative government of Sir Robert Borden.

Here is an opportunity to carry out the St. Lawrence seaway and at the same time help us indirectly through improving our harbours, so that we may ship our products again and so that we may export and import. This may not be important to some who are smiling; I know they have no interest in the matter. But I say to them it is of vital importance to those of us in Prince Edward Island. Let me tell the minister and the committee that for years we have been given definite promises of harbour improvements, but those promises have been passed by.

I believe the promise is set out in one of the Liberal platforms and it was also being stated in the platform of the local Conservative organization, as well as in that of the federal organization. A plank in the platform of the provincial Liberal administration states this:

> We will urge upon the federal government the necessity of improving the Charlottetown harbour and waterfronts, and that the railway marine slip, for which a site has been surveyed, must be built immediately.
> We shall also explore new avenues to keep our people employed in the urban centres, and to introduce and develop new industries in our province.

During the last election campaign this was a vital subject, and one to which both major parties were committed. These harbour improvements would mean a great deal to Prince Edward Island and to the city of Charlottetown. We have a good harbour location. It may be that, in common with the harbour at Montreal, Jack Frost occasionally pays a visit so that shipping may be held off for two or three months, or perhaps four or five months, in a year. On the other hand the fact is that we have good harbour facilities and, as the Duncan commission pointed out, we are entitled to have that harbour maintained in proper condition. One of the recommendations by the Duncan commission in 1926 was to that effect.

I hope we will receive some assistance after this resolution is passed, and the seaway is being built. Perhaps I might make some further comments about the indirect benefits that would accrue to Prince Edward Island if an additional plant were added in Sydney, and if perhaps 10,000 more people were employed at that point. This would give us an opportunity to supply foodstuffs to those people, and Prince Edward Island is well suited to do that. We would have a market at home, a market at our own door, for all the foodstuffs we could produce, if we were permitted to supply additional steel works that could be erected in Nova Scotia.

I would repeat that harbour improvements would constitute a direct contribution that could be made for our benefit at the present time. While I do not oppose the resolution, because I know my people would not want me to do so, because of their interest in the Dominion of Canada as a whole, yet as the hon. members for Cumberland, Royal, Annapolis-Kings and Cape Breton South have said, something should be guaranteed directly to the maritime provinces by way of an undertaking as to what will be done for us when this St. Lawrence seaway is accomplished.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I am proud to be a member of parliament in Canada at a time when our country is embarking upon a project of such gigantic proportions and with so much promise as the St. Lawrence seaway development. I believe hon. members from all parts of Canada have taken the Canadian view. While many of them have emphasized the need for improvements in their respective areas, nevertheless this project seems to have been given almost unanimous approval.

As other hon. members have said, the government should bring forth not only a plan for the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, the benefits of which will be reflected chiefly in Ontario and Quebec, but an over-all plan for development in all areas of Canada.

This is a power and transportation project. The minister has said it will enable the rapid development of the Canadian steel industry. It is certain that as a result of it there will be a greater impetus to the industrial development of Ontario and Quebec, and a subsequent increase in the populations of those provinces.

I am sure those of us coming from other parts of Canada would like to see the government undertake other projects which, from our point of view, are as greatly needed as this one, and which would help industrialize the prairies and the maritimes as well as help us increase our populations in those regions.

The St. Lawrence seaway plan has been under study for many years. The government is now bringing forth a measure which will bring about the inauguration of that plan. I am sorry that, thus far, it has failed to announce a much needed project in western Canada, namely the development of the South Saskatchewan river. The far more expensive St. Lawrence seaway project is being embarked upon, but as far as our project is concerned, we are given another commission. We do not know when that commission will report. In fact, I have heard it said that the report cannot be made until the middle of next summer, which will mean that there can be no commencement of that project next year. While we from other parts of Canada support the St. Lawrence seaway project, the fact that the government is bringing forward this large and expensive project at this time leaves the government no excuse for further delay in the development of the South Saskatchewan river project.

It is debatable just what benefits may accrue to western Canada from the St. Lawrence seaway project. It has been implied that the development of this project will result in lower freight rates for grain moving to world markets, which saving would be passed on to the prairie grain growers in the form of increased prices. When considering a statement like that one should bear in mind that grain prices are set at Fort William. If there is an increase or decrease in the cost of moving grain to Fort William, there is a similar change in the price of grain to the producer. I do not think it follows that a four cent per bushel saving, for example, in shipping wheat past Fort William necessarily means a four cent per bushel increase in the price to western farmers. As a matter of fact I do not think that that result will flow.

If this project results in a substantial lowering of the cost of moving grain from Fort William to the markets of the world, that reduction in cost will be split between the western farmer and the importer of grain. The saving brought about by the St. Lawrence seaway project will benefit the prairie grain producers as well as the buyers of our grain. I do not think it is right to say that a substantial reduction in the cost of moving grain over the lakes means a similar increase in the price received by the western farmer for his grain.

During the last two or three years there has been an increase in the cost of shipping grain on the great lakes. In connection with wheat at any rate that increased cost has been passed on to the buyers of the wheat by adding a six cents per bushel handling charge to wheat obtained under the international wheat agreement. Had this project been in effect during the last two years the saving on the movement of grain over the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river would not have been passed on to the western farmers but would have been passed on to the buyers of our grain. I do think, however, over a period of time the St. Lawrence seaway will result in a saving on freight charges on grain and increased prices to western producers.

If through this measure the government is prepared to assist in the development of the lake ports of Fort William and Port Arthur then I think the government should under an over-all plan assist in the development and further use of Churchill. It is not enough for the government to lay down a plan which benefits in the main two provinces of Canada without at the same time including beneficial measures for other parts of Canada.

On a comparative basis we in Saskatchewan are more in need of power than is Ontario. The province of Ontario has industrialization and rural Ontario is electrified to a large extent. Saskatchewan lacks industries and while some rural electrification is going on, the vast majority of farms still do not have the benefits of electricity. If the farms of Saskatchewan are to be electrified we must have new sources of power. Unless the federal government is prepared to proceed with the South Saskatchewan plan the provincial government through its power commission will have to develop its own power site at Fort à la Corne or produce power by the use of coal. The alternative is the development of power at high cost.

The government of Saskatchewan is not at all anxious to embark on the development of new power sources if there is any chance that the federal government will go ahead with the South Saskatchewan plan. Because of the need for power in Saskatchewan, because our province needs industry, because the prairie farmers should have the benefits of electricity the same as the farmers in other parts of Canada, the government should announce immediately that the construction of the South Saskatchewan river project will begin in the spring.

The development of power in Saskatchewan will not represent a dead loss to the federal government. I have here a report on the South Saskatchewan plan over the signatures of L. B. Thomson, director; G. L. MacKenzie, chief engineer, and G. N. Munro, associate chief engineer under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; A. E. Palmer, superintendent, dominion experimental station, Lethbridge, Alberta, and Dr. C. C. Spence, senior economist, dominion Department of Agriculture, Edmonton, Alberta. This fully-qualified committee states in its report that the annual gross value of commercial energy to be produced from the South Saskatchewan plan would amount to over $2 million.

It is estimated that the South Saskatchewan plan will cost the federal government $68 million as compared to $300 million for the St. Lawrence seaway. When we consider that great benefits will result to the people of Saskatchewan from the South Saskatchewan plan and that there will be revenue derived from that plan, there is no excuse for further delay by the federal government.

I support the St. Lawrence seaway project, as I have said already; but if the government can spend $300 million on the St. Lawrence seaway project I can see no earthly reason why the same government cannot obtain another $68 million for the benefit of the people of Saskatchewan and the prairie provinces generally. I believe the government should give the house an over-all plan for the development not only of the St. Lawrence seaway, which in the main will help Ontario and Quebec, but also a plan for the development of power and the industrialization of other parts of Canada including the prairie provinces and the maritimes.

Mr. Graydon: For a long time I have been advocating in the house and out of it, on behalf of the people in our section of Canada, that a start on the St. Lawrence deep water project should be made. They have a very strong feeling, as is the case in many other parts of the country, that this is a national undertaking which should be completed. During the last session of parliament I brought to the attention of the minister, the government and the house what I thought was a desirable course to follow, namely that we should go it alone. I felt we had lingered on the edge of the precipice of indecision long enough, that there was a limit to the patience of Canada, and that we had reached the position where we should proceed with the waterway as a purely Canadian undertaking.

It is naturally a matter of great satisfaction to me that the government has taken the stand it has and is prepared to introduce legislation to that effect. I have no desire to extend the debate. All I want to say, in what will perhaps be the shortest speech made on the resolution, is that the part of Canada from which I come is strongly and wholeheartedly in favour of the resolution and of proceeding immediately toward the completion of this great national undertaking.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask questions of the minister on two different aspects of the St. Lawrence waterway project. The first has to do with shipping. When he spoke on December 4 the minister said, as reported at page 1579 of Hansard:

> For one thing, almost half the seaway traffic foreseen is in iron ore.

I had not realized that the shipping of iron ore would constitute such a large proportion of the traffic through the new seaway. That brings up the question as to what ships will be carrying the iron ore. I understand that on the great lakes at the present time iron ore is carried largely in ships belonging to the steel companies. I may be wrong, but that is my understanding. Of course most of that iron ore comes at the present time from—is it the state of Minnesota?

Mr. Chevrier: The Mesabi range.

Mr. Green: From the Mesabi range, which is in the United States, although I presume the ore from Steep Rock is loaded at Fort William or Port Arthur.

Mr. Chevrier: Port Arthur.

Mr. Green: I should like to know whether there will be a similar situation with respect to the iron ore from northern Quebec and Labrador. Most of the ore, as the minister has said, is to go to United States steel mills on or adjacent to lake Erie. According to press dispatches, some will also go to United States steel mills on the Atlantic coast. Will the ore be carried in United States bottoms, or is there any restriction under Canadian law by which it must be carried in Canadian ships?

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing with the first part of the question as to what ships will carry the iron ore, one must keep in mind the fact that it will be some years before the deep waterway is developed and, as I pointed out in the statement I made, the transportation of the ore will bring into being a new specialized ship which will carry the ore from Seven Islands to the great lakes ports and there take on grain cargoes for the downbound voyage. That is not to say that the present ships will be excluded; the ships operating at the present time on the great lakes, both Canadian and American, carrying iron ore will continue along the same lines. There is a shortage of shipping in that respect at the moment. The ships that will move iron ore from Seven Islands up the lakes will be of a new type in so far as the St. Lawrence is concerned. There are several under construction now.

Mr. Green: Where?

Mr. Chevrier: Two of them are under construction now in the great lakes yards. These ships are of a specialized kind.

Mr. Green: Is there any restriction on United States vessels carrying that iron ore from Seven Islands to ports on lake Erie or the Atlantic coast? Are United States ships just as free to carry the iron ore as Canadian ships?

Mr. Chevrier: The provisions of the Canada Shipping Act and of the agreement made between Canada and the United States will apply with respect to that ore as they do with respect to other movements. United States ships are free to come here, but I take it the ships that will take the ore at Seven Islands will be of Canadian registry. Unquestionably those that are being built now are of Canadian registry.

Mr. Green: I understand they do not have to be ships of Canadian registry. In other words a ship of United States registry is just as free to carry that iron ore as a Canadian ship. Is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: That will be a matter for the mine owner who will be selling his goods to determine. If he cannot charter a Canadian ship I am sure that is what he will do. If there is a Canadian ship available I am positive that is what he will want, but if there is a shortage of Canadian ships he might seek United States ships. At this time the position is that there is a great shortage of both Canadian and American ships, but by the time the seaway will have been completed I take it there will be sufficient Canadian carriers to transport the ore up the lakes.

Mr. Ferguson: May I speak on a question of privilege?

Mr. Green: May I finish my questions?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Green: According to the minister's statement that decision will rest with the mining company. If the mining company wishes to have the iron ore carried by a United States ship the company is free to do so. Am I correct in that belief?

Mr. Chevrier: I should not like to leave it on that basis. I would rather put it on the basis that the agreement which exists between Canada and the United States leaves it to the shipper to use either of the two.

Mr. Green: I would point out to the minister that the iron ore is being developed largely by United States interests. They control the iron ore. No one can question that fact. It is to be used largely by United States steel mills. I am afraid the minister is being extremely optimistic when he suggests that the mine owners will want to ship this iron ore by Canadian vessels. I hope he is right, but I think he would be far more realistic if he faced the fact that this iron ore is likely to be carried by United States vessels manned by United States crews, and that there will not be a great deal of employment for Canadian vessels, for Canadian shipyards or for Canadian crews. However, I have the answer I was looking for, Mr. Chairman. Before I go on with my other question I should be quite willing at this point to have the hon. member for Simcoe North make the remarks he wants to make.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, my colleague really answered the question for the minister. The minister was quite emphatic in saying that the owners of the mine would surely use Canadian boats to carry the ore. It certainly is a stretch of the imagination, but probably not to the minister when he thinks United States mine owners are going to go out of their way to put their freight on Canadian boats in order to ship it to the United States ports. It is just about in keeping with what the minister said yesterday when he told us that the shipbuilding industry on the great lakes would be a great enterprise during a war, in that they would be inland shipbuilding plants.

The minister seems to be satisfied as long as our plants on the great lakes are operating during a war. He made the remark that he could not understand what I was trying to drive at. I can quite understand his not understanding when I hear these remarks from him. I was trying to get this government to do something so that our yards would not need a war in order to keep busy. May I remind the minister that the great lakes shipbuilding yards in Canada grew grass on their properties between the first great war and the second great war, and that it took this Liberal government two years to open up the Collingwood yard to build ships, and two and a half years to open up the Midland yard. It required the efforts of the mayor of Midland, of that great paper in the city of Toronto, the Telegram, and of the late member of the house, Dr. Herbert Bruce, to get this government to budge or make any semblance of a move with regard to building ships in yards that for years have been noted for their competence in doing just that, namely building ships of any kind and any type. Yesterday the minister thought he would salve the conscience of the people of Canada by saying that this undertaking will make a great wartime industry. He could not understand what I was trying to drive home to hon. members, namely that we should be thinking of industries that operate during wartime and during peacetime.

Mr. Chevrier: Nor can I understand what the hon. member is saying today.

Mr. Ferguson: I would not doubt that at all, because you are so convinced that your ideas are right at all times that nobody else could interject any comment in here, and you cannot see the real situation. You are too close to this waterway picture. Step back from it a little bit. Probably you have been in this picture too long.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member was going to ask a question. I understood that was why he interrupted my hon. friend, and that my hon. friend gave him the floor so he could ask a question; but for the last ten minutes he has been making a speech.

Mr. Ferguson: Hear, hear. I am glad you recognize a speech.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra goes on with his questioning I wonder if I might make a few remarks, as a representative of a part of the country which perhaps has a great interest—

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do you want to speak? I thought you had finished.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra had the floor, and he may have it if he wants it.

Mr. Green: There is one other matter on which I should like to get a statement from the minister. Before I go on to that, may I suggest to the minister that consideration be given to adopting a policy whereby this iron ore will be carried in Canadian ships manned by Canadian crews. I do not believe there could be any objection from the United States to a policy which will ensure that at least the great bulk of this iron ore is carried in our own ships.

Mr. Ferguson: The government know they cannot do that.

Mr. Green: The other question I should like to ask him also has to do with the iron ore; and I ask it because, as I said a few moments ago, the minister himself has placed such great emphasis on iron ore in this seaway picture. In effect he made it appear that the shipping of iron ore by the waterway was the most important feature in connection with the canal, or in any event one of the prime factors in the whole project. Has the government any plans for a great expansion of Canadian steel production?

Mr. Ferguson: No.

Mr. Green: I would point out that that is not the minister answering.

Mr. Ferguson: That is the right answer, though.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: Has the government any plan, for example, for expanding production by the present steel plants in Canada or has it any plan for the erection of steel mills in new centres in this country? I have in mind new sites in the maritimes—for example, in the province of New Brunswick—and in Quebec on the lower St. Lawrence, probably somewhere in the vicinity of Quebec city. Upon my visits to Quebec city I have always felt that great capital has suffered by reason of the development of the city of Montreal. It is tragic to go and see the harbour of Quebec, and note how much shipping could be handled there but how few ships are in the harbour; at least that has been the situation on any occasion I have had the privilege of visiting the city.

Then, are there any plans for steel production in the province of Manitoba? We now have the Steep Rock mine in northwestern Ontario producing large quantities of high-grade iron ore. All of it is being shipped to the United States. I see no reason why that ore could not be used, in part at least, in the province of Manitoba. Are there any plans for the production of steel on the west coast, in the province of British Columbia?

What I have in mind is this. Has the government any plans for using to the maximum our newly discovered and extremely valuable iron ore resources? What I have always advocated, of course, is a policy under which the Canadian people get the first opportunity to use their own resources. Hon. members will recall that for several sessions that same issue was fought out in this chamber on the gas and oil pipe-line question. What I should like to know is whether or not there is to be a Canada-first policy with regard to our resources of iron. I do not think anyone has the slightest objection to our surplus iron ore being used by our good neighbours to the south, or by any other nation. So I ask the minister whether or not the government has any plan for the expansion of Canadian steel production.

There would appear to be no such plan in contemplation, Mr. Chairman. In any event, as yet there has been no disclosure of a plan to the house. The main concern seems to be to get this Canadian iron ore down to the United States steel mills. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made that quite clear when he spoke in Washington a few days ago. I should like to quote from a report of his speech advocating the construction of the seaway, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 29. It ended with this paragraph:

> But above all, it would provide the best assurance of adequate supplies of iron ore to feed the steel furnaces of the east coast as well as the great lakes.

The reference, of course, is to the United States. The head of the company which is developing the iron mines in northern Quebec and Labrador is reported as having taken much the same stand. I have here a press clipping from the Ottawa Journal of March 5, 1951, reporting the evidence given by George M. Humphrey, president of the M. A. Hanna Company of Cleveland, Ohio, before the public works committee of the House of Representatives, which committee was considering the St. Lawrence project. It reads:

> His company, Humphrey said, plans to ship from 2 million to 4 million tons a year from Seven Islands—

Which of course is on the St. Lawrence river.

> —to such eastern ports as Baltimore and Philadelphia, and from there by rail to the furnaces.

I presume that would be to the furnaces on the Atlantic seaboard of the United States. Then the report continues:

> The remaining 6 million to 8 million tons would go from Seven Islands up the St. Lawrence to Montreal. From there part would move by rail and part on smaller lake ships to the steel mills.

The reference, of course, is to the steel mills in the lake Erie area. These figures, Mr. Chairman, add up to the 10 million tons of iron ore which is to be the annual maximum produced from the northern Quebec and Labrador mines. Mr. Humphrey, who is head of the company which is mining the ore, said a certain percentage is going to the eastern United States and the remainder to the states south of lake Erie. I am citing that to show that the main concern is to get this Canadian iron ore down to the United States steel mills.

The minister himself, at page 1669 of Hansard for December 6, 1951, made it plain he has the same policy in mind. He was answering questions which had been asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and we find these words:

> In any event the point was made by the member for Cape Breton South: Why export iron ore? I believe the words he used were these: To whom are we making the iron ore available? Why export iron ore? Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need answer that argument, because the people of this country answered it many years ago. What happened to our gold and our silver in northern Ontario and northern Quebec?

Then the minister went on to try to justify the export of Canadian iron ore to the United States, and he used an argument which I believe is unsound and does not do him justice. I believe it is not a good basis on which to found Canadian policy in this regard. First of all, gold is a commodity itself. It is one of the precious metals, and not in the same category as iron at all. Silver is also a precious metal, and these two metals are sold in the raw state. Any comparison between shipping iron ore to the United States and shipping gold and silver is quite beside the point. I hardly think the minister would push that comparison any further or try to convince any intelligent person that there was much in that argument.

The minister did not stop there, but went on to aluminum. He said: Look at what has happened in the lake St. John area in the province of Quebec, and in the Kitimat area in British Columbia. No one has objected to the shipping out of aluminum, and he compared that with the iron ore. The fact is, Mr.

Chairman, that there again there is no possible comparison. The Canadian contribution to aluminum is electric power, which is perpetual. It goes on and on, and that is the great feature of electric power. We bring in the bauxite from British Guiana—I am not just sure of the source—but both in the case of the development at Arvida and the development at Kitimat practically all the raw material will be brought in from outside Canada. The Canadian contribution to aluminum is the electric power derived from our great water resources. So there again there was not any basis for comparison at all.

The fourth illustration the minister used was copper and nickel. He said the Canadian National is going to build a railway in northern Manitoba, costing many millions of dollars, to take out this copper and nickel which would go to the United States. Well, the minister was far off base on that. The point was carefully considered in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines last session. Evidence was given by Canadian National Railway officials as well as officials of the Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited, the company which is to produce this nickel and copper.

What is happening there is that the Canadian National is building a line into Lynn Lake, where there are these large deposits of copper and nickel; but that copper is to be taken out and smelted at Flin Flon in Canada, and the nickel is to be taken by the Canadian National Railways all the way to Edmonton, there to be smelted in a new plant using natural gas. The bulk of the cost to the Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited is in that plant at Edmonton. I hold in my hand the annual report of this year. It shows that their whole program is to cost $28,318,000, and of that amount $17,522,000 is to be spent for a refinery at Edmonton in Alberta. They have done just exactly the opposite of what Canada is going to do with this iron ore. It is a Canadian development of the type that will make this country great; not a case of just digging our ore out of the rocks and then shipping it over to the United States for them to refine and sell the products back to us at a vastly increased price.

Then the minister mentioned oil. I do not think he mentioned natural gas, but perhaps we could take the two of them together. He said: "We are going to export our oil to the United States." Well, the government has been very careful to take the position in the house that the oil which is going through the pipe line to Superior, Wisconsin, is not for the United States, that it is to be carried by tanker down to Sarnia, Ontario. The government itself has been very careful to keep from getting into the position where it could be accused of sending our oil to the United States. The hon. member for Fraser Valley and I have been busy for a long time fighting out this question in the house, trying to bring about a policy whereby Canadian oil would be shipped to the Canadian Pacific coast before going to the United States. The same applies to natural gas. I think we have a reasonable prospect of winning out and seeing our policy followed; but certainly there is no basis there for comparison with what seems to be the policy of the Canadian government with regard to iron ore.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that iron ore is in an entirely different position, because iron is not of much use of itself. Iron is the basis for steel, and it is steel which is of such great importance; it is steel which should be produced in Canada. We should be putting the spotlight on the production of steel here rather than on the production of iron ore.

Another thing that worries me about the minister's statement with regard to policy on iron ore is that in his remarks last night he emphasized the great difficulties we would face if we had a Canada-first policy. The hon. member for Cumberland mentioned pulpwood. That was a very hard one for the minister to answer, but he got around it in this way. He said that in pulpwood we have no competition. In pulpwood we can do whatever we like; we can hold up the Americans if we wish; it cannot be compared at all with iron ore, because we cannot do that with iron ore; that there is iron ore away down in Venezuela; if we did not sell them iron ore the Americans would get theirs from Venezuela; that they will not buy ours and we will be in a terrible mess. That was his answer on the question of pulpwood, and I submit to hon. members that on that point, too, the minister was very far from reality.

Then he had another excuse as to why there should be no dominion policy on iron and steel. He said, why, it is up to the provinces; they are the ones who are handling the pulpwood. They fix that up for Canada. They are the only people who can deal with this iron ore. The dominion government cannot do it at all. It has to be done by the provinces. Well, I say the dominion has a few powers left yet. The dominion has absolute control over iron and steel at the moment, and if it wishes to do so it can take steps to see that the very maximum amount of iron ore that can be used in Canada will be used here. This government cannot evade its responsibilities for seeing that Canadians get first chance to use their own iron ore.

Another reason I am worried about the minister's policy, or lack of policy, on this question is that we are going through exactly the same difficulty in British Columbia today. Last year we had the Minister of Fisheries out on the coast. He was questioned about the establishment of a steel industry there. We have been desiring a steel industry on the coast for many years. We thought we had it several times. We have had many promises, but nothing has ever happened. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Vancouver News-Herald, dated November 4, 1950, headed: "Mayhew says time ripe for steel plant in B.C." He is quoted as saying:

"I say a steel industry is a must so far as we are concerned in B.C." he declared Friday.

The article goes on to say:

"This will always be a place where ships are built and steel will be needed for that. There are quite a few miscellaneous industries here now that also need steel."

I am not questioning the genuineness of the Minister of Fisheries. I have great regard for him, and I am not complaining for a moment about his attitude on this question. The dispatch goes on:

"The mill at present uses scrap as raw material." Mr. Mayhew observed.

He is referring to a small mill we have in Vancouver, which does not use raw ore but uses scrap. I continue:

"Steps should be taken, I feel, to develop raw material from the natural ore."

The minister said the ore could be provided from known deposits on Texada island, Zeballos or Quinsam on Vancouver island.

That was last November. What has happened in the meantime. Well, last summer some arrangement was made, in which I think the Canadian government was involved, whereby iron ore from at least two of these districts to which the Minister of Fisheries referred is being sent to Japan. That had to be done through the United States occupation authorities in Japan, and the United States government would have to deal with the Canadian government. But however it was done, the facts are that British Columbia ore is being shipped out to Japan and is being bought back in the shape of steel. I hold in my hand the script of a news round-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, dated October 30, 1951, and we find this statement in the script:

Last August the Argonaut Company, a big American firm—

Incidentally in British Columbia this iron ore is being mined by a United States firm.

[Mr. Green.]

It is probably a great deal more American even than the firm which is going to mine the iron ore in northern Quebec and Labrador. I continue with the quotation:

Last August the Argonaut Company, a big American firm, shipped its first load of ore out of here from the new Quinsam lake development,—

That was one district referred to by the Minister of Fisheries. The script continues:

—and the Japanese promised that Canada would share in the resulting finished steel.

Today, a good eight weeks sooner than anyone expected, they are making good on their promise.

Down at Ballantyne pier on Vancouver's busy waterfront is the big 10,000-ton freighter S.S. Chuyei Maru.

A Japanese freighter, by the way.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, I would ask you to rule, Mr. Chairman, whether a discussion such as this can be brought on when we are discussing jointly two resolutions for the development of navigation and power on the St. Lawrence river. If there is not going to be some control over the discussion we will never be able to come to a conclusion on these resolutions.

Mr. Green: The minister himself has stressed the importance of shipping Canadian iron ore to the United States. That point was discussed in the house last night, and I am speaking about it at this time. I have asked the minister whether the Canadian government has any plan for a great expansion of Canadian steel production. I submit I am entirely in order in pointing out what is being done on the Pacific coast at this time, because it is all part of one policy. The question is: Are Canadians to have the benefit, first, of Canadian iron ore?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Are you in favour of the project, or not?

Mr. Green: You are not going to draw me off with a red herring like that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am drawing you up the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Green: I have sat here, watching and listening to the Minister of Public Works for a long time. I am not going to bite that easily.

Mr. Laing: Will the hon. member say whether having regard to all the conditions he is in favour of the shipment of iron ore to Japan?

Mr. Green: No, I am not. I think it could be smelted in British Columbia; and our resources of iron ore at that point are certainly not sufficient to ship it to Japan and then buy it back as finished steel.

Mr. Chevrier: I suggest we should have a ruling on the point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Now that I have heard the point of order raised by the Minister of Transport, and the explanation by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I am in a position to agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when he says the matter was introduced last night by the Minister of Transport. I am referring to the development of the use of iron ore throughout Canada, through the deep waterways project.

What the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was saying is only incidental to the matter under discussion. I believe the hon. member will agree that what he was saying was incidental to the matter introduced last night. The practice has been to deal with the main subject, and to discuss only briefly those matters related to it. I think however that on this occasion the hon. member should direct his remarks mainly to the point before us. I think that was what the Minister of Transport had in mind. If the hon. member speaks for half an hour about the iron ore situation in Vancouver and for only five minutes about the deep waterways project on the St. Lawrence, which is the main subject under discussion, then I think he must agree that the point is well taken by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The main question would become the incident.

Mr. Green: I have practically completed the illustration I was about to give. I suggest the reason the minister rose was that the subject was getting a little hot.

Mr. Chevrier: I would like to tell the hon. member that he is not hot at any time.

Mr. Green: I do not know whether that is a compliment or an insult.

Mr. Chevrier: It was not meant as an insult.

Mr. Green: The final paragraph of this radio broadcast reads as follows:

> The long-necked cranes dipping into her holds are unloading 7,000 tons of high quality steel plate worth one and a half million dollars.

That works out at over $200 a ton for the steel. On the other hand I am told by the experts that Canada would get about $10 a ton for the raw ore shipped to Japan. This is a difference of $190. The situation was summed up admirably in an article headed "The Case for an Iron-and-Steel Plant," written by Mr. C. M. Campbell, one of our outstanding authorities. This appeared in the Western Miner for June, 1951, and states:

> Texada, Quinsam, and Zeballos to supply Japan.
> Those are the three districts mentioned by the Minister of Fisheries as sources of iron ore.
> Published information is that Utah Construction is opening up Texada; that its subsidiary, Argonaut Mining is opening up Quinsam; and that Frobisher plans to open up Zeballos. The statement is that this ore is to be exported essentially to Japan. The operators will receive about $10 for each ton of contained iron as against a minimum of $120 per ton if made into steel here. We should not be content with holes in the ground and $10, less whatever profit is taken out of the country.
> Incidentally the profit goes out of Canada.
> We have to go back to the days of Esau to find the record of a similar arrangement.

Again I ask the minister whether the Canadian government has any plan for a great expansion of Canadian steel production. So far as we have been told up to the present time, the plan would appear to be a barefaced exportation of our iron ore in the raw state, without any thought being given to expanding and spreading Canadian steel production. Meantime Canada is crying to the United States all the time for more steel. That is the second question to which I would ask an answer from the minister.

In closing I would like to answer the question asked by the Minister of Public Works. I am in favour of the St. Lawrence waterway development. But I suggest it would have a far greater appeal to parts of the country which will have very little benefit from it if that development included a proper Canadian policy on iron ore and steel.

Finally, I hope the Minister of Transport will give an undertaking that the government will help the maritime provinces. Up to now no such undertaking has been given. Representatives from the maritimes who rise in the house to plead for their people are treated as though they were bad boys, and should not be making so much trouble. Perhaps that is putting it a bit unfairly; but they are being more or less pushed aside, they are just tolerated. They are not given the consideration to which they are entitled.

I wonder what the situation would be if some of those who take this unfair attitude had come from parts of Canada where, year in and year out, the people see their sons and daughters having to leave home and go to what they call Upper Canada—Ontario and Quebec—and in some cases even to British Columbia. When I have visited the maritimes I have had young maritimers inquire from me as to how they might settle in British Columbia. When one has to face that condition, where thousands of young people go to another part of the country while others go to the New England states or to other parts of the United States, he realizes that this is not a laughing matter. Then, when one sees the headquarters of great industrial organizations moving from Halifax to Montreal or Toronto—and I have in mind the headquarters of the Bank of Nova Scotia—

Mr. Winters: The headquarters of the Bank of Nova Scotia has not moved to Toronto. It is still in Halifax.

Mr. Green: The Royal Bank moved from Halifax to Montreal. The headquarters of manufacturing concerns are also being moved into central Canada. I say when one sees that sort of thing going on, one wonders why every maritimer in the house is not on his feet making demands that there be some quid pro quo for the maritime provinces.

It is obvious that the great power development on the St. Lawrence along with construction of the seaway will concentrate population and wealth in the Montreal-Toronto-Windsor area to a greater degree than at the present time. On November 19, as reported on page 1122 of Hansard, a series of questions was asked by the hon. member for Royal, as follows:

Mr. Brooks:

1. What is the number of industries established by foreign countries, other than the United States, in Canada, since January 1, 1946, to the present time?
2. How many in each of the provinces, respectively?
3. In each case, what is (a) the country of origin; (b) the amount of capital invested; (c) the product being manufactured?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. 136 plants were established during that period.
2. Ontario, 61; Quebec, 59; Newfoundland, 5; Nova Scotia, 5; Alberta, 3; British Columbia, 2; New Brunswick, 1.

None in the other provinces. I think the same picture would be found in regard to the establishment of new Canadian industries.

The maritimes seem to be dubious about this plan, and I hope that the minister will give some undertaking that definite steps will be taken to build up the shipbuilding industry in the maritimes, or to help them develop their power resources. Without power you can do very little in this modern age. I do not see why an immediate investigation should not be made of the Passamaquoddy and Chignecto canal projects, and why those developments should not be undertaken.

The minister mentioned shipbuilding. I suppose he was referring to shipbuilding during wartime, but he did suggest that destroyers would be built on the great lakes. Every destroyer built in Canada during the last war was built in Halifax. Why on earth should Canadian destroyers be built on the great lakes where they would be frozen in for perhaps five months in the year? Certainly there is no reason why destroyers could not be built in Halifax. I do hope that the minister will be able to give some assurance to the members from the maritime provinces, something a great deal more definite than he has given thus far.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, as a representative from Newfoundland I feel I should have something to say about this project which has been looked forward to by the people of Newfoundland as one that will be beneficial to them. As everyone knows, Labrador is an appendage of Newfoundland containing around 110,000 square miles. Until a few years ago it was regarded as being only a source of fish and the site of the operations of the Hudson's Bay Company and Indian trappers. In 1936 the Labrador Mining and Exploration Company was formed to explore the mineral discoveries that had long been reported by geologists. Many people in Newfoundland were most enthusiastic about the possibilities of the iron ore development in Labrador. That was during the days of the commission of government and a large concession of 20,000 square miles was leased to this company for a term of years.

That company is controlled in Canada. I have before me the Financial Post Survey of Mines, 1951, which gives the names of the directors. Mr. Timmins is the president and the company is controlled by the Hollinger Mining Company which owns the larger proportion of the stock, and M. A. Hanna and Company, holding the minor interest. This parent company has made agreements with other companies, including the Iron Ore Company of Canada which was formed in Wilmington, Delaware, and which is financed by a group of United States steel companies including Armco Steel Corporation, Hanna Coal and Ore Corporation, National Steel Corporation, Republic Steel Corporation, Wheeling Steel Corporation and the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company. That company is also associated with Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines, Hollinger North Shore Exploration Company and Labrador Mining and Exploration Company. There is also the Hollinger-Hanna Limited, which is a Canadian company formed in 1949 to manage the operations for ten cents per ton. Then there is Hollinger North Shore Exploration Company Limited which was formed in 1942 and which received a number of concessions from the province of Quebec. That company is working in conjunction with Labrador Mining and Exploration Company of Newfoundland because the properties in Quebec and Labrador are contiguous.

I am sure everyone will agree that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra takes second place to nobody in this house in his patriotic desire to see the industries of Canada developed and expanded. At the same time I am sure he must recognize that even in connection with an industry of which he knows so much, the oil industry, the principal interests are from the United States. We must look to the richest country in the world to provide funds for the development and exploitation of our natural resources. We in Newfoundland must look outside. Before confederation we were told that Canadian capital would pour into Newfoundland to help in the development of that province, but unfortunately that has not been the case. The only capital we have at the present time to develop the industries of Newfoundland is English and American, with a combination of Canadian and United States capital in connection with this development in Labrador.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has stressed the desirability of the government promoting the smelting of iron ore in this country. I hope I do not do him an injustice when I say that the hon. member for Cape Breton South seemed to me to favour nationalization, that the government should take over the business if private enterprise is not willing to do it.

Mr. Gillis: I want to correct my hon. friend. I never used the word "nationalization" and I am not responsible for his interpretation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member did not use that word, but he suggested—even the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra suggested—that the government should take steps. It would be a great departure from the policy that has been pursued in the past in the development of the great industries of this country if the government should go into industries of that kind. Only the other day the people of England turned out the Labour government because it had gone in for the nationalization of steel. It is certainly very questionable whether the government could do as good a job as private enterprise.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, is that in order?

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will realize we are not engaged in a discussion of private enterprise versus nationalization or vice versa.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, if what I have to say in connection with the use to which the iron ore is to be put is not relevant, inasmuch as the principal reason for building the waterway is to carry it to the mills, then I do not know what is relevant in this discussion. The minister himself has said that the chief commodity which will be transported through the canals will be iron ore. Therefore I feel it is a matter of very great importance, especially when the question has been so widely discussed by previous speakers, to make a passing reference to it, which is all I intend to do. If I may, I should like to say that we are perhaps looking too far ahead. It will take several years to build the waterway. It will take several years to build the railway and bring the mines to the state where the iron ore can be marketed anywhere.

Furthermore I want to point out—and I believe this is relevant—that we have other iron ore mines in Newfoundland. There is the iron ore mine on Bell island which is owned by the company that operates the coal mines at North Sydney, Sydney and elsewhere in Cape Breton. They are not able to use all the ore that is being produced at Bell island at the present time, and have never been able to do so. Up to the present time Canada has never been able to use all the ore produced in this country. I would say most of the iron ore produced in Canada is exported somewhere. We export iron ore to Germany, the United States and England.

I should also like to make reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) concerning his desire that Canadian ships should carry the ore to market. May I point out to him that would be a restriction upon the companies operating the mines that might be prejudicial to their interests and might be a burden upon them. They might not be able to meet it. As he pointed out, iron ore sells at a very low price, between $5 and $10 a ton. Therefore in the export of iron ore at so much per ton it might be a matter of great consequence to make a beneficial contract at the best rates possible for transportation. English and Norwegian ships are also engaged in the transportation business to a very large extent. If, as is possible, this valuable high grade ore may be shipped to England, Germany, The Netherlands and places along the Atlantic seaboard, it may be most desirable to have other ships in addition to those of Canadian registry. I doubt very much whether Canadian ships can handle even a small proportion of the production of the mines.

I am sure everyone will agree that it must be a proud occasion for the Minister of Transport, as he told us the other day, to be introducing these resolutions in the house. Coming as he does from the city of Cornwall, where all his life he has looked upon the great restless St. Lawrence passing by his door, some time in the past he must have visualized what is now about to happen. I think we can all agree with him it is a matter of pride that he should be the one to introduce these resolutions.

There are two resolutions, one dealing with the development of hydroelectric power concerning which there has not been much criticism. There cannot be any, because it is a natural resource that belongs to the province of Ontario and the state of New York. Its development is not going to cost the dominion a cent. No claim can be made upon the dominion's taxpayers. Therefore it is a natural development which the Ontario government is proceeding with, in the first place for the benefit of the people of Ontario, and I believe indirectly for the benefit of all the people of the dominion. The other feature is the waterway; that is the one that has given rise to the criticism that has come from this side of the house. Naturally I sympathize with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the other speakers from the maritimes who feel that government funds are now going to be invested in a project that seems to hold within it possibilities of damage and even, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, ruin to their coal industry. I am not so pessimistic as he is that the industry cannot stand the shock of further expansion of the transportation system of Canada. No one who has criticized this measure has been so bold as to say that he is opposed to it because it too is a natural development.

Many years ago in the early days of the exploration of Canada les coureurs des bois, French soldiers and missionaries did not hesitate to travel upon the waters of the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa through the rapids for purposes of exploration and to ascertain the resources of the country. It seems to me that in the second half of the twentieth century the government should be criticized if it did not do something to improve the system of waterways beyond its present condition. Anyone who goes to Cornwall today cannot help but feel somewhat astonished at the poor condition of the waterways in that area, and that the proposed development is not only opportune but seems to have been too long delayed. It should have been proceeded with long ago.

When one sees the magnificent locks at Sault Ste. Marie and realizes what has been done in that area, and compares it with the condition existing near Cornwall, one has ground for saying that the Dominion of Canada has been negligent in its duty rather than complimenting it on being ambitious and forward looking. Members from the maritimes have often expressed a certain criticism of the government that is associated with a feeling of envy of the two central provinces, Ontario and Quebec. It seems to me we have no right to envy these two provinces that have been so graciously endowed by Providence with such marvellous natural advantages and tremendous resources. The St. Lawrence and the waterway system right through to the head of the lakes are a tremendous asset to both these provinces. I cannot see that it is a disadvantage to the rest of the country that industry should be expanded to the extent it has been in Ontario and Quebec, because it means that goods are being produced in this country that formerly would have been imported from other places. They are being produced in large quantities and are of high quality, thus giving people value comparing favourably with that of the goods they used to import from elsewhere.

When hon. members from the maritimes speak of the decentralization of industry, I wonder what they mean. I feel that what they really mean is that there should be more industries in their home towns. Certainly I can understand every hon. member wishing to see his own home town developed as rapidly and broadly as possible. But, sir, there is such a thing as decentralization even in the central provinces, and it exists today. While I have not a great knowledge of the subject I feel that the little towns and smaller cities in Ontario and Quebec are examples of decentralization. They are not worth an atomic bomb, yet most of them contain industries of considerable proportions and of great value to the people who live there. Decentralization was made possible by the development of hydroelectric power, and I doubt whether in any other area of Canada, or anywhere in the world, electric power has been better developed, preserved so carefully, or so highly thought of as in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The decentralization that exists in those provinces means that electric power can be supplied to almost all of their villages, towns and cities. There is hardly any point in the two provinces for a long distance from the rivers where the power is developed that electricity is not extensively used.

My hon. friend who has spoken so much about decentralization is no doubt thinking of the industry that exists in the cities of Montreal and Toronto. I feel that is his main objection. He was not thinking of the smaller towns in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec where industries are established. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me difficult for the federal government to interfere with expansion of that kind. I have heard my hon. friends on this side of the house speak of the abnormal developments in the city of Toronto.

During the past few years many industries have established themselves there and millions of dollars, even hundreds of millions, have been invested. But once again we must look at the natural advantages these two cities possess. With their geographical location in the centre of great populations, as they are, they are the natural places for industry to be established.

It seems to me, however, that the government, in developing a waterway like this, even if it is justified in doing it—and I am sure it is—must nevertheless give an ear to the complaints that come from the maritime provinces. They feel that they are being overlooked. My hon. friend who sits opposite me at the moment, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I am sure must be thinking of the great dock in the city of Saint John that is so often empty when it might have shipping there to be repaired or ships being built. I suppose it is the largest dock in Canada; if not, it is one of the largest.

Mr. Riley: Drydock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, the drydock. It is a sad thing that the people of Saint John have to look upon that dock and see it not in use. Many hon. members and many people outside this chamber often express the opinion that the government should be run like a business. That is a theory with which I have never agreed. I think it is entirely unsound. A government is not a business. In my opinion, to express the matter in my own simple way, a government should be like a family, and the government should look after those parts of the country which are not so highly endowed with perhaps greater care than those parts like Ontario and Quebec which already have benefited so greatly from the gifts of divine Providence. So if in the maritime provinces, especially in the province of Nova Scotia, there is not the natural resource of water from which electric power can be developed to be sold cheaply, still there are great resources of coal which can be converted into electricity.

In that respect I think the federal government may be able to be of some assistance. If it is found that the development of electricity in Nova Scotia or any other province must be done at a higher cost than when it is produced from the natural resource of water on the St. Lawrence or on the Ottawa, it seems to me there is a case to be made out for a subsidy to those provinces where the electricity cost is so high. In the matter of freight rates the government is doing a similar favour to this province. Perhaps I am not using the right word when I say "favour", but it is showing proper consideration to this province when it adjusts the freight rates so the manufacturers in the maritime provinces can get their products on the market in the central provinces, which have large populations, more or less on the same footing with the manufacturers in the central provinces. In this and in other things, too, I think what is required is for the federal government to be sympathetic.

I know the minister himself is extremely sympathetic to any reasonable argument that is put before him. As he sees this great development mature; as he watches it frequently from his home; as he looks out upon the St. Lawrence and sees that flood of water being converted into electrical energy; as he visualizes the ships going up the St. Lawrence, let us hope they will not only go up with iron ore, but that they will go up with coal from the collieries in the constituency so ably represented by my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and also other products from the maritime provinces, even if they have to be assisted, as they are assisted in their transport by railway. Let us hope those products will be coming from these provinces in great quantities, and that this development which seems to me to be so beneficial to the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec will also in the long run prove beneficial to all the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am rising at this point merely to try to straighten out the mind of the hon. member who just took his seat, if that is possible. As I sat and listened to him, I was amazed. First he is in complete opposition to the government of Newfoundland in the methods now being employed to create subsidiary industry in that province.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes. I am absolutely opposed to that; certainly.

Mr. Gillis: I am glad to know that the people of Newfoundland will be fully aware of that fact; because after years and years of the kind of development visualized by my hon. friend, Newfoundland stood as a rather badly undeveloped and in every way neglected section of North America. In 1944 I heard a representative of the British government make a report to a meeting in London. The hon. member for Melfort was there at the time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member is out of order now?

Mr. Sinnott: Oh, sit down and take it.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps we might give the speaker a chance to make his point, so we may find out whether or not he is in order.

Mr. Gillis: I can understand the impatience of my hon. friend. He is an ex-judge; he has been in the position where he called the shots and whether you liked it or not that was his judgment. He made a poor job of assessing my evidence. I may say to my hon. friend that I am getting around to his ideas as to developing the province from which he comes. After listening to the report of that commission of government on the educational standards, the economic backwardness, the lack of sanitation and everything that was not modern in this world, if I had not known the section of Canada that was being referred to I would have thought the representative of the British government was describing a section of South Africa where civilization has just gone in to make a survey.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gillis: If my hon. friend will just permit me—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for St. John's West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: On a question of privilege, I should have said.

Mr. Gillis: He cannot do that while I am making a speech.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the hon. member sit down?

Mr. Gillis: The chairman is still in control of this committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Now that I am standing up, I will have to ask the two hon. members to sit down.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. While the hon. member for Cape Breton South was speaking, the hon. member for St. John's West rose on a question of privilege.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Now the hon. member for Cape Breton South will have to wait until the hon. member for St. John's West has stated his question of privilege in order that I may ascertain whether or not it is a real question of privilege.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman is referring to a report made by a member of the commission of government in 1944. He has not mentioned his name.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

The Deputy Chairman: I must advise the hon. member that is not a question of privilege, but it is a matter of clarification. The hon. member should have risen on a question of order, but if the hon. member for Cape Breton South does not resume his seat thereby acquiescing to the member for St. John's West interrupting him, then the hon. member for Cape Breton South cannot be interrupted. Upon the conclusion of the speech by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for St. John's West may rise and clarify the matter. As a matter of fact that is what the hon. member for Cape Breton South is doing. He has risen to clarify some points mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's West. When the hon. member for Cape Breton South has concluded his remarks, the hon. member for St. John's West will have the privilege of doing likewise.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member is clarifying some comment, but is it necessary for him to go back into the history of 1944 to mention certain remarks? Those remarks are unjustified and untrue.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize that it is not for the chairman to say whether or not these things are true. When the hon. member for Cape Breton South has concluded his remarks, the hon. member will have an opportunity of clarifying that point.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask him to mention the name of the commissioner?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I shall not sit down. When the hon. member refers to a member of the commission of government, I suggest to you that he should give the name.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor, and is not to be interrupted unless he consents.

Mr. Gillis: I would not be on my feet at the moment if it were not for the fact that the statements made by the hon. member need clarification. He raised the question whether or not the development of this country should take place in a certain way. I am merely pointing out to him, in view of his ideas as to how this country should be run, the circumstances which prevailed before the present Newfoundland government undertook to create and assist industries in that province. If he wants things to remain as they were before confederation, and to quarrel with what is taking place in his province now under government direction and guidance, I think that should be made plain for the benefit of the people of Newfoundland.

In his remarks the hon. member stated that I had suggested this project should be nationalized. I do not know where he got the word, because it was never mentioned here and it certainly is not applicable to the development proposed by the minister. What I suggested the minister should consider, and I still hope he will give it consideration, is that the authority being set up under the terms of this resolution should be set up along the line of the T.V.A. in the United States. My hon. friend professes to be a great supporter of the co-operative movement. One of the largest and most successful co-operative developments in the world is the T.V.A. in the United States, which operates under government guidance and support. I visualized this project developing in Canada under a co-operative authority along the lines of the T.V.A. in the United States, with the support and guidance of the government. In this way we might have equality of opportunity as between province and province. If my hon. friend cannot differentiate between nationalization as interpreted by his own party across this country and a co-operative development under government guidance, then the responsibility is not mine. I refuse to allow any one in this house to tie me up with the sort of thing the hon. member attempted to write into my speech.

The second point the hon. member tried to make was that the iron ore development in Ungava or Labrador was being made by Canadian capital. I do not have to answer that, because he answered it himself. He put on the record the fact that two Canadian companies were organized to receive a franchise from the government of Newfoundland and the government of Quebec, but they are merely subsidiaries of the M. A. Hanna Company in the United States. Then he tied in the whole picture just as I did three years ago, by proving that National Steel, M. A. Hanna Company and the other companies he mentioned really have the capital, and the Canadian companies are merely a front. It was necessary to have Canadian companies to get the franchise, but actually the control of the whole operation is under the M. A. Hanna Company of the United States.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I had to get up and say what I did. I refuse to be misinterpreted by anyone in this house. I am willing to sit here and let anyone express his own opinion on this project in any way he sees fit, but if he tries to tie me in with his thinking on the project then I am going to object. I am sorry that the hon. member spoiled an excellent, impartial and non-political analysis of this project by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I just wanted to straighten out this business of nationalization, because I did not visualize this project as coming within my hon. friend's interpretation of that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Now that the hon. member has finished, may I point out to him that I was not referring to this project but to his reference to steel.

Mr. Gillis: I made no reference to steel, either.

Mr. Blackmore: Is the minister not going to answer the questions put to him by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra?

Mr. Chevrier: If I may be allowed, I would prefer to do that on the bill. I have spoken on two different occasions for forty minutes each, and if the house will allow me I would prefer to make any additional comments on the bill.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister tell us whether his department has given any consideration to extending the authority of the corporation to be set up under this resolution, in order that it may plan and integrate the various developments that must of necessity follow the opening of this deep waterway? Does the government plan to use the authority we are setting up here, or does the minister plan to set up another authority? Does he plan to bring this project under some government department? Yesterday the hon. member for Halifax objected to any authority being given to plan and execute the work that may be subsidiary to this development. I am not particular whether they are carried forward under some government authority or by a department of the government. I certainly think an authority set up by the government would probably do a more efficient job—at least it would be freer from political patronage—than if the project were carried on directly by a department of government. But I do not think we should proceed with this waterway without giving some thought to the planning of the results that are to follow.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member will wait until the bill is tabled in the house he will get the answer to that question.

Mr. Noseworthy: In conjunction with what others have said I simply want to say a word or two on the question of the development of the great ore bodies in Newfoundland and Quebec. To me it just does not seem right that we should have vast ore bodies in that part of Canada; that Canadians should be engaged to dig that ore, and that Canada should get no other direct benefit from it other than the few dollars we get from digging and transporting it. The minister's arguments for building the seaway would be much more effective if applied to the United States than to Canada. The best of his arguments are that the United States should be building this waterway and not Canada. If Canada is to build this waterway, and if the primary object is to carry the extra tonnage of ore which will result from the mining, then surely some thought should be given to processing that ore in Canada instead of shipping all our raw material 1,500 miles up the waterway to the United States and processing it, and then bringing the processed material back to Canadian mills. That does not seem to be good business even for private enterprise. I certainly would not expect a Liberal government, or a Conservative government either, to undertake this as a government project; but I would expect a Liberal government to be sufficiently interested in the economy of Canada to see that at least whatever private enterprise did process that iron ore was controlled in Canada, and that the iron ore was processed in Canada to the greatest possible extent.

I just received a copy of a speech made by Mr. Crombie, president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. It is not very often that I quote the Canadian Manufacturers Association, but for once I am in entire agreement with them. He tells us that:

> It is expected that during the next five years over two and one-half billion dollars will be spent on the development of our resources.

He goes on to say:

> By 1955 we expect to be producing 250,000 barrels of petroleum per day instead of 80,000 . . . 600,000 tons of aluminum a year instead of 400,000 . . . 19 million tons of iron ore instead of 3,600,000 . . . and 4,400,000 tons of primary steel instead of 3,700,000 tons.

According to Mr. Crombie we are going to produce 19 million tons of iron ore instead of 3 million tons, but we are going to produce only 4 million tons of primary steel instead of 3,700,000 tons at the present time. He complains of the fact that Canada is exporting most of its raw materials to other countries instead of processing those materials in Canada. Since he is a manufacturer, of course, and interested in manufacturing, I can understand his point of view. But I agree with it. I think we all agree that Canadians should not continue indefinitely to be diggers of canals and carriers of iron ore for the United States or any other country. Canadians should use these natural resources for the development and the benefit of Canada. He goes on to say:

> According to the latest available figures, more than half of our farm products are exported as raw materials and more than half of our forest products are exported either as raw materials or in a partly manufactured state. It is obviously better for the national economy to export flour rather than wheat, shoes rather than hides, and paper rather than pulpwood. Why should we export wood pulp and import artificial silk?
> The more we process our raw materials in Canada, the more we buy Canadian-grown fruits and vegetables, both fresh and processed, the more we buy Canadian magazines, the more we patronize Canadian authors and artists, the more we employ the services of Canadian engineers and contractors, the more employment will be provided in Canada, the more stable and healthy our economy will be, and the higher the standard of living all Canadians will enjoy.

It is with that thought in mind, Mr. Chairman, that I would say the Canadian people are becoming sick and tired of this policy which the government seems to be following, namely that all Canada can do is produce raw materials for export to other countries in order that they may be processed there. I had hoped, as did the hon. member for St. John's West, that when this great discovery was made in Labrador some great benefits would accrue to that part of the country and to Newfoundland, and not just the opportunity to go in there and dig ore for a few dollars a day. Knowing the power resources of the region, knowing there is coal and limestone in the adjacent province of Nova Scotia, I had thought that probably even private enterprise—I did not expect either the government that was then in Newfoundland or the government in Canada would have been farsighted enough to develop that as a publicly owned project for the benefit of the people—would be farsighted enough to see that an industry could be established there where the raw materials are in such close proximity. Instead of that we give foreign capital control of 20,000 square miles of mineral rights. We build 350 miles of railway; we dig a canal up through 110 miles of the international part of the river, and we do it all so that the Americans can get Canadian ore for their plants in the United States, while we Canadians are satisfied with the few crumbs that fall from their table, crumbs in the way of a few dollars for digging the ore and a few dollars for floating it up to the United States mills. I submit that before this project is completed, and while it is still under review, the government should give some consideration to seeing that steps are taken to provide for the people of Canada the greatest possible social benefits that could accrue from an undertaking of this kind.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, the other night I said I would support this project. In order to have the record straight let me quote my words, as they are recorded at page 1590 of Hansard. I said:

> Whatever is done we must keep in mind the maritime provinces. We must remember that those provinces should be given the opportunity of growing into the great and happy areas the Creator intended they should be, and that they should not be trailing in the wake of federal policy in this nation, greatly to their disadvantage, as has been their unhappy experience in the past.
> This project is one of the most serious, from the standpoint of the maritime provinces.

And again:

> We have not had the opportunity to study the project deeply enough to see all the possible pitfalls, but in a general way it would appear to be a good thing for Canada.

And again:

> Ultimately what is good for Ontario and Quebec is going to be good for the rest of Canada, if Ontario and Quebec use the common sense they ought to use.

And I closed with these words:

> I repeat that Alberta and the Social Credit movement will support this great project.

The context of my remarks makes it completely clear that our support of this project will be contingent upon the establishment of the fact that the project is not going to injure any province in Canada; in fact, that all the provinces of Canada shall be benefited. Up to the present time I must say I have not been very much impressed as a result of all that has come out in the debate. I was moved last night by the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I have a high regard for the hon. member. I believe this house is deeply indebted to him and, while perhaps it is not in good taste to make comparisons, I doubt that his province ever sent to the House of Commons a man who reflected more credit on it than this man has done. He said, as reported at page 1675 of Hansard:

> Instead of hurting my case all he has done is confirm what I suspected right along, that there is no intention to look after maritime needs.

A question may be raised as to whether or not that is correct, but I believe the hon. member was justified in his statement. I should like to add to what I said in my closing remarks the other night a further expression which, I suggest, is clearly indicated by the context but which was not stated in so many words. I express this as the attitude of the Social Credit group: "I repeat that Alberta and the Social Credit movement will support this great St. Lawrence seaway project, provided it is established that it means a benefit to each of the provinces."

The question may be raised as to whether we are entirely in order in discussing that matter in this debate. Our maritime friends have expressed themselves effectively and convincingly time and again in the debate thus far. I believe that in so doing they were completely in order, and that we would be in order to go forward to an even greater extent with a general discussion as to what impact this development is going to have on the maritime provinces. I am the more convinced that it would be in order by reason of the fact that the minister himself, as reported at page 1579 of Hansard, used these words:

> I have mentioned already Newfoundland's interest in the Labrador development. Beyond this, the four maritime provinces would get a new and low cost transportation route to the heart of the continent. They complain now with some justice that there is no effective water competition to keep down the rail rates. Well this is it. There can be no doubt but that it would bring new opportunities to explore in pulpwood, wood pulp, paper, lumber, specialty agricultural products, minerals and other products.
> Mr. Gillis: Say that a little louder.
> Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend interjects, but I well remember the essence of the debates on the freight rate legislation both in the house and in the committee. It was said that the maritime provinces required a greater opportunity to move their commodities into the markets of central Canada. This will provide a cheaper route than the one which already exists, and I am sure, knowing the maritimers as I do, that with the initiative they possess they will make use of these many advantages.

I was considerably impressed by the minister's statement at that time. I thought he did it beautifully, and that he had behind his statement a good number of substantial arguments. But I must say I was somewhat disturbed last night when the hon. member for Cape Breton South so completely exploded the minister's argument in that respect, by pointing out that by giving an opportunity to Nova Scotia to ship coal at a cheaper rate we were, at the same time, giving the United States a water route by which they could ship coal more cheaply from the American coal fields down to Montreal, in irresistible competition with the maritime provinces. This is just exactly the kind of pitfall in this whole measure that I feared.

I doubt very much whether the House of Commons has given this matter anything like as much study as it should be given before we put our seal of approval upon it. I say that, after having stated the other night that we favour the project and after having given the reasons. But after all, when I was a little boy my mother used to impress upon my mind a story that appeared in the Ontario school reader. This was the story of the little boy who paid too much for his whistle. Canada can pay too much for this big whistle, if the cost is sufficiently serious. I am very much afraid we are going to give too much for this whistle, if we fail to make adequate provision for the safeguarding of the interests of the maritime provinces.

Mr. Ferguson: This would not be the first time men have taken too much to wet their whistles. It is about the same kind of thing.

Mr. Blackmore: I can understand why the hon. member would use that expression. I would have hesitated to use it, but coming from him I can understand it. I am not implying that he ever wets his whistle, but I am suggesting that probably he knows more about men than I do.

Mr. Ferguson: There is nothing like good experience.

Mr. Blackmore: I think we ought to ask ourselves why it is that the maritime provinces have suffered, as they have suffered, since entering confederation. The minister closed with these words:

> This will provide a cheaper rate than the one which already exists, and I am sure, knowing the maritimers as I do, that with the initiative they possess they will make use of these many advantages.

That is just one of many advantages he spoke of, but the hon. member for Cape Breton South shot that one so completely full of holes that you would think a liner had been torpedoed; and still the minister has not made any effort to stop the holes. The minister compared the 1939 production of coal with the 1950 production and thereby endeavoured to create the impression that the maritimes were increasing their consumption of coal to such an extent that probably they would no longer have any substantial surplus to export. The hon. member for Cape Breton South showed how completely fallacious that argument was. If there are many arguments of that kind in the minister's reasoning then I think we shall have to scrutinize this whole matter with exceptional care.

Why have the maritimes had so many difficulties to face through the years? It is necessary to examine this matter in order to be able to say what the minister and the government will have to do in order to enable the maritimes to take advantage of this and all the other opportunities the minister has referred to. What happened to the maritimes when they came into confederation? In the first place, they were forced to buy goods, which they formerly had bought abroad, at a higher price by reason of the tariffs imposed by Ottawa. This made for an increased cost of production of all the maritime products into the making of which goods from abroad had entered, and thereby destroyed the competitive ability of the maritimes to sell their goods. That is No. 1. All the superficial advantages that you give to the maritimes which make no allowance for what has happened to the maritimes' economy will be just froth on water.

What was the next thing that happened to the maritimes? They were forced to buy most of their manufactured goods from Ontario and Quebec. They were faced with a long freight haul of one thousand miles on those goods, and with a similar haul for the raw products which they desired to sell in Ontario and Quebec. Unless measures are taken to cancel the evil effects of that disadvantage, then once more any superficial advantage to the maritimes will be of no value.

Those two points are of major economic importance. They are just plain common sense that any fourteen-year-old boy would be able to see. As I go over the tragic story of the maritimes I find that in the relatively long history of this parliament no attempt has been made to compensate them for the disabilities they suffered by reason of those two obvious economic disadvantages.

What was the third disadvantage they had? Before they entered confederation they had their own banks and their own banking policy. As a result they were able to control credit within their own provinces. Very soon after entering into confederation their banks began to have their policies influenced by federal legislation having to do with interest rates and items of that sort. They began to operate under the federal Bank Act. All too soon the banks in Ontario and Quebec began to acquire a controlling interest in the banks of the maritimes. They were thus able to influence credit policy in the maritimes. Imagine a situation where a bank in Toronto has on its board a number of men who have interests in certain manufacturing plants in Ontario. This bank is able to influence the credit policy of a bank in Nova Scotia; and when a company manufacturing products similar to those manufactured in Ontario comes to that bank—

Mr. Pouliot: Would my hon. friend be kind enough to tell us what connection this has with a prospective seaway?

Mr. Blackmore: I shall be delighted to do that. The minister indicated in his statement, which I read, that it is proposed to remedy the situation in the maritime provinces, to give them a sort of new heaven and new earth. I am merely pointing out the things which this federal government will have to do if it is to remedy the economic disabilities from which the maritimes have suffered ever since entering into confederation.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member will admit that there is a difference between a canal and a bank skyscraper?

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member recognizes that the hon. member for Temiscouata is asking a nonsensical question. That is quite obvious. This bank in Toronto would be able to influence the bank in Halifax and prevent that company in Nova Scotia getting the line of credit which it needed. I can cite evidence from the New Brunswick submission to the Rowell commission showing that that sort of thing actually did happen, that certain companies were pinched out of existence by the refusal of credit by a bank which was manipulated from Toronto.

Mr. Dickey: Does the hon. member mean that last remark to apply to a particular bank, or is he just referring to banks in general?

Mr. Blackmore: I did not refer to any particular bank; I spoke generally. I can produce the submission by New Brunswick to the Rowell-Sirois commission, as I have it right here on my desk. However, I do not think it is needed. My general statement was that one of the things which had injured the maritimes was the fact that credit control was no longer in the hands of the maritime provinces, that it was exercised from Toronto and Montreal.

Mr. Pouliot: To what bank does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. Blackmore: Is it necessary to refer to any bank? I think the hon. member will agree that that is a thorough possibility.

Mr. Dickey: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Do not talk nonsense. The maritime provinces have suffered enough misery without having one of the members from that province imply defence of the outrageous things which have been done.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to refer to a great banker who is dead, although there are many others alive in the same category. I would call my hon. friend's attention to Mr. Morris Wilson, the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, who was a maritimer. Also Mr. Burns, former president and now chairman of the board of the Bank of Nova Scotia, who came from Nova Scotia. Also Hon. W. D. Ross, former lieutenant governor of Ontario, who was born I believe in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. If you would give me a list of the directors of the banks I could mention many others. There is Mr. Dobson, president of the Royal Bank, who replaced another maritimer. I am sure there is no end to the list.

Mr. Brooks: You could go on for hours naming them.

Mr. Pouliot: I could go on for hours for the edification of my hon. friend. Why did he not check the list of directors of the banks before making such a statement? All members know it. He must know it and he should give credit to the genius of the maritimers in the field of business. I do not want to interrupt him any longer, but I wanted to make that correction.

The Deputy Chairman: Are we not getting too far from the main question?

An hon. Member: No, it is good.

The Deputy Chairman: I followed the hon. member very closely. I know how he prefaced his remarks and how he has developed them to this point. He will remember that a while ago, because the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) made a passing reference to the development of iron ore in British Columbia, a point of order was raised; and I think it was generally admitted that we must discuss the question now before us.

Mr. Green: I was ruled in order.

The Deputy Chairman: These other matters must be referred to only incidentally, as passing references. The hon. member said we must find out why the maritimes have been injured since confederation and how they arrived at the situation in which they find themselves. When he began I thought he was going to give a brief sketch of the history of that period, but I did not think he was going to carry on and make his main speech on that point. What we have before us now is the question of the St. Lawrence deep waterway. If the hon. member feels that it would injure the maritimes, like other hon. members he may develop that to a certain extent but he should not make his main speech on the difficulties of maritime provinces since confederation. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and hon. members generally. After all, if one hon. member was called to order before, for the same reasons, I think it is only fair that the same rule should apply to everyone.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your kindly and thoughtful comments but the whole situation is this. First of all may I give a little attention to the hon. member for Temiscouata. I do not blame him for trying to drag a red herring across the trail, but I have been around in the world too much to be fooled by red herrings.

Mr. Pouliot: What about Grant Macintyre, the former assistant general manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia. He is a regular reader of Hansard, and he will be shocked.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member's comment is entirely irrelevant to what I was saying. In the closing words of the passage I quoted the minister said:

. . . knowing the maritimers as I do—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member read that a moment ago. That is exactly how he started and how he justifies the long argument he is now making about the situation in the maritimes. I heard the statement made by the Minister of Transport, and I would tell the hon. member that he does not have to argue with me as to whether or not what he is saying now is in order. It is my opinion it is not quite in order. I am only asking him to be brief. If he devotes his forty minute speech to the history of the maritimes I think he will not have any time left to discuss the question before us. I should like to remind him that is what he rose to discuss, and I would ask him to co-operate. I know he is usually very agreeable in doing so, and I ask him again to co-operate.

Mr. Blackmore: I would have been all finished long ago if the hon. member for Temiscouata had not needed so much enlightenment. The point I was making was that it will be utterly impossible for the maritimes, in spite of all the "initiative" they can possibly exercise, to make a success of their affairs if they are burdened by restrictions and conditions which render success utterly impossible. That is exactly the position in which they find themselves. I mentioned the matter of credit policy as being one of the restrictions which have so impeded them that success in the long run is utterly beyond their reach or the reach of anyone else, no matter who he is or where he is. Therefore if we are going to make it possible for these people to have a chance of success we must remove these difficulties. I think I am in order, as far as I can make out. If I am not, there are plenty of other things I can talk about that will be less palatable than what I am talking about now, and I can turn to them.

The fourth cause of the difficulties of the maritimes was transportation. I do not think I need to go into detail with respect to that. The maritimers were put under a burden of transportation costs, from which they had suffered even before confederation, that tended to make it impossible for the finest initiative to make a success in the long run.

May I come back now to the discussion of the St. Lawrence seaway project. All the things to which I have referred have a distinct bearing. According to what the minister said, the project has a chance of doing good for the maritimers in that it will give them cheaper freight rates to central Canada. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has proved that argument is completely specious, fallacious and meaningless, because the main commodity the maritimes wish to export to Ontario is coal. If in supplying the maritimers with a water route from the maritimes to central Canada, to Toronto, for example, United States competitors are provided with an equally inexpensive route to Montreal, surely there is no possible advantage to the maritimes. There is only disadvantage, and until the minister shows by plenty of statistics and sound reasoning that there is any advantage to the maritimes I am safe in assuming the hon. member for Cape Breton South was right when he said there was no advantage at all. Similarly any other apparent advantage would be nullified by the four basic economic disabilities I have just outlined. He indicated that there is injury to the maritimes. I see no other possible conclusion than that there is going to be injury to the maritime provinces. I believe my remarks have established pretty well the position that Social Crediters will have to take unless that difficulty is cleared away. We favour the whistle, but we certainly do not favour paying too much for it in terms of Canadian well-being. If the maritime provinces are going to be injured in any degree beyond what they have suffered since 1867, then Canada is paying too much for the whistle no matter how valuable it is. I hope I have put myself in the clear so far as the chairman is concerned.

I wish to draw one conclusion before leaving this aspect of the question. The time has got to come when the Dominion of Canada as a whole, and particularly Ontario and Quebec, must take in hand the problem of the maritimes. They have got to extend a helping hand to the maritimes to bring them out of difficulties from which no amount of effort on their part can possibly enable them to extricate themselves. There will be those from the maritimes who will want to get up and make a starched front apology for that region and all that is going on there. I have on my desk reports of commission after commission, the Duncan commission, the Norman Rogers commission and others I can quote, so it would be just as well for these members not to try to make it appear that things are fairly good for the maritimes. Conditions there are certainly not fairly good.

When the time comes for this government to take in hand the matter of providing for the improvement of conditions in the maritimes, they must take into consideration those four factors which I mentioned. If they do not do so, then all they will be doing will be providing the maritimes with a little bit of relief to keep them alive instead of giving them the nourishing food which they need in order that they may grow into a strong, virile, vigorous part of the Dominion of Canada. In this St. Lawrence seaway project there is no evidence that any such thing is even remotely in the mind of the department which planned the project or that of the government which stood behind the department. Consequently, to try to pretend that this seaway project is going to be of any real economic value whatsoever to the maritimes is simply to be farcical.

I think probably I have said just about enough on that aspect of the whole question. I just want now to say this. The time has come when something ought to be done about this maritime problem. We have had the submissions of commission after commission. I have here submissions from the probably finest authorities in eastern Canada, time after time, showing how long these people have suffered and how earnestly they have pleaded for some consideration; but nothing has been done for them. We now have to decide whether the maritimes are going to become a great and thriving portion of Canada, able to contribute the amount of well-being to Canadians that their resources and the nature of their people enable them to contribute, or whether we are going to pinch them more and more and smother them to the extent that they just simply cannot possibly do their part.

If the minister is prepared to answer the questions asked of him by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I will take my seat while he does so. The minister says he would much rather answer those questions when the bill comes in. Let me tell the minister something he certainly must know. Just the minute we get on that bill we will be held strictly to order, under the rule of relevancy, on every single clause and phrase; and as a result it will be impossible to discuss this whole problem successfully at all. That is exactly the way it always is when we get into the bill. If the members of this committee want to have an effective discussion and want to find out the facts concerning this whole measure, the place to find out those facts is when the resolution is in the committee stage, as it is now. I am therefore asking the minister to answer right now the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I am not satisfied to have them answered when the bill is before the house.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to answer my question?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I have no intention of making any reply at this stage.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Blackmore: Not by any means. The minister in charge of the resolution has flouted a responsible member of this house. He has refused to answer a perfectly reasonable and relevant question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should have risen before and given my opinion as to the various conditions, one might call them, which have been put by hon. members, in certain cases, on their approval of this resolution. The hon. member who has just taken his seat began his remarks by saying that the Social Credit party was supporting this resolution contingent upon the government declaring its policy as to the development of iron ore or the establishment of a steel industry in Canada or something like that. I hope I am not quoting the hon. member's words wrongly. Other members as well have declared themselves in favour of it, but have spent much more time than is generally the practice in discussing problems which, admittedly, are germane to the question before the committee. Discussion of those problems, however, has occupied more of the time of the committee than has discussion of the resolution which I now have before me.

I am just wondering whether we should continue discussing those problems. On the government side hon. members have said they are not admitting that this resolution and the project that will emerge therefrom will create the injury which is seen by members on the other side. The matter that has been discussed is relevant, but at this time should we not focus the discussion merely on this one point? It has been said: Let us not have any more discussion on the deep waterway but let us have from the minister a statement of policy on iron ore, or on protecting the maritimes as far as the effects of this project are concerned. I understand that this is a difficult question, and I should like hon. members to think over what I have just said. What we have before us is this:

> That it is expedient, for the purpose of providing a deep waterway between Montreal and lake Erie, to create a corporation to be called "The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority" with power, inter alia, to expropriate; to construct, maintain and operate all necessary works; to borrow amounts not exceeding three hundred million dollars; to establish tariffs of tolls and to employ such officers and employees as may be required for the purposes of the authority.

That is all I have before me. As was said, latitude is given. In replying to some of the arguments brought forward by some hon.

members the minister had to go into the whole iron ore and steel question, and into other germane questions. I think the debate was wide in its scope, and I think hon. members have had ample opportunity to express their views. But at this point, when the general discussion seems to be almost concluded, I should like hon. members to think over whether they should delay the passing of this resolution merely because they would like to have from the government a statement of policy on a matter which to me is not quite covered by the resolution we have before us.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister should have answered that question. When a resolution is in the committee stage it is the duty of the minister to answer questions that are asked him. That is the only opportunity members have of probing into the whole problem.

Mr. Chevrier: My understanding is that the resolution is debated for the purpose of going into the general subject matter of the resolution. As it now stands, I have made one general statement which took over forty minutes. Then at the request of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I made a second statement, which took forty minutes, in reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South and some others. It is now suggested that I make another reply, the object of which will be to reply to my speech, and we will go on and on interminably. I may be mistaken, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think that is the object of the discussion on the resolution. When we get into the discussion on the bill, where we have the terms of the bill and where many of the questions which have been raised here will be answered, I think that will be the place to discuss the matters that have been taken up here.

My hon. friend says there are questions that were asked and that we will not have an opportunity of getting a reply to them because we will be held strictly to the section under consideration. But that is not the position when we get to second reading. As my hon. friend knows, when we get to second reading there is a general discussion on the first section. I will then take the opportunity to reply to the questions that were asked of me by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the other questions that remain unanswered; then I will try to answer them to the best of my ability.

Mr. Blackmore: When we get to the second reading stage of the bill it will not be within the rules for the minister to answer questions the members ask. We are undertaking here and now to commit this nation to an expenditure that can well amount to $600 million. Surely the members of this house have a responsibility to the public which they cannot escape, to go into every aspect of this proposition in order to determine whether or not it is expedient. How can I tell whether or not it is expedient to spend all that money on that project unless I can get my question answered? That is the point I believe the minister has to explain away.

If the minister does not see fit to answer that question, I have several more. One of the main arguments advanced for the speedy construction of this project is that it is essential to Canada's defence. Will the minister tell the house some respects in which it is essential to Canada's defence position? Surely that is a reasonable question.

Mr. Chevrier: I replied to that question last night when I put on Hansard the statement made by the permanent joint board on defence. This board has examined the project carefully and gave four reasons why it was urgent for defence.

Mr. Blackmore: Those were merely general conclusions. The board did not go into details. It appears to me as though the house ought to have some details concerning this matter. It may be argued that this is a matter of defence, and consequently should not be aired on the floor of the house. I ask this question. How in the world can hon. members of this house form any accurate estimate of any proposition if they are unable to obtain details concerning that proposition? It certainly looks to me as though the minister should give more details than have been given to justify the statement that this project is essential to Canada's defence.

As I recall it, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong because I have not had an opportunity of reading his final remarks, we were told that we would be building ships in that secluded and invulnerable area of the great lakes. Do I recall correctly, that we would be building ships up there in time of war? This is how the whole thing looks to a person who stands on his own two feet and tries to do his own thinking, just as his mother and father told him to do when he was sixteen years old. War might come within a year or two, and we cannot possibly get this project completed within five years. After we finish the project, how many years would it take us to establish slips which would enable us to build ships with any success comparable with that of the Clyde shipyards? It would take a long time to do that. Surely if an enemy got sufficient control in Britain to destroy those slips completely we would be in a bad way, even if we had that secluded area in which to build ships. This is the way it works out to the ordinary person. I am not satisfied with the arguments that this constitutes an invulnerable area in which to build ships.

One more thing which comes to my mind is that I am convinced from the arguments of the maritime provinces that if we spent the money we propose to spend on this project to develop power in the maritime provinces and establish strongholds there, with our tremendous air power, naval power and our control over radar and other modern means of war we certainly could make any area in the St. Lawrence valley invulnerable. Instead of having a lot of enemy submarines prowling around the Gaspe peninsula as we had in world war II, we would have them safely shut out in the Atlantic. That is the common sense way of looking at it. I have to rely on the experts and the minister to answer a lot of questions concerning this matter. Those are questions my people will ask me when I go home. Can the minister go into some detail with respect to that?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not propose to go into any further detail than I have. At this stage I do not think I should. I believe the matter of defence measures and defence urgency, in so far as the seaway is concerned, might well be considered when we are in committee of a whole on the bill.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not find myself impressed at all with the minister's attitude in this respect. I am sure the ordinary young man and woman in Canada listening to this debate would consider the minister's reply rather flat after the splendid display of oratory he gave us in connection with the railroads and other problems. It is quite a lot short of what we believe the minister is capable of. I should like to ask the minister this question. If it be so vital in the interests of defence that this seaway be constructed so we can deliver iron ore to United States factories to be processed into steel, why is the United States not manifesting more concern about the building of this project? Why should we take the initiative? Has it not got around to the authorities in the United States that they need ore and steel? Cannot the congressmen be impressed with the need?

Mr. Chevrier: The United States have manifested great concern over it. The position of the President of the United States is indicative of that, when he states that he is willing, if the congress does not act within a reasonable time, to consent to the development of this project in conjunction with us, both as to power and navigation.

In so far as the first part of my hon. friend's question is concerned, if he will only wait until the bill comes before the house he will find the seaway project is self-liquidating. He is going on the assumption that the taxpayer is going to be faced with a tremendous expenditure. In the original statement I made I indicated that it is intended to liquidate the whole project by the imposition of tolls. Not only that, but it is also indicated that those of the present canals which will be taken over will be operated and maintained by the authority, thereby cutting the expenditures on Canadian canals to a substantial extent.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not much concerned about the cost of this thing if the need—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I call your attention to citation 293 in Beauchesne, paragraph (i):

> (i) use his right of speech for the purpose of obstructing the business of the house;

A moment ago, Mr. Chairman, you told the hon. member that he had repeated the same arguments and re-read and quoted the same parts of speeches on questions that may be germane to this resolution; but at the same time you called his attention to the terms of the resolution. For the last hour the hon. member has been obstructing the business of the house—and I call as my witnesses everybody sitting in this house—even when the minister tried his best to answer the questions that were put to him. I would like to see him kept in order, to see if we can have this debate concluded after two days.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister has been specializing now for the past two years in this kind of obstruction against me. I say if we let him get away with it we will abrogate most of the privileges of the members of this house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is still out of order in imputing motives to me. An hon. member cannot impute motives to another hon. member, and I had no such motive. I try to lead the house to the best of my ability. When I see the hon. gentleman doing something I think he should not do I tell the chairman that he should be called to order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might get into this for a moment, and without resorting to the rule book either.

Mr. Pouliot: Peacemaker.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Temiscouata has taken the word right out of my mouth. I would like to play the role of peacemaker for a moment or two, if I may. The hon. member for Lethbridge knows that no member of this house, and certainly no one from the opposition side of the house, rises to his feet more often in defence of the rights of the members of the opposition than I do. In fact I have a copy of Beauchesne open on my desk, and I could read a citation in defence of the right of the hon. member for Lethbridge, in committee on the resolution, to seek to get all the information he wants before the bill is brought in. I do not think there is any question about that, and I assert it as strongly as I can. However, I could not help but notice, despite the fact that there are some remarks being made back and forth which are a little sharp, that a few moments ago the Minister of Transport did offer to have a discussion on all aspects of this matter when we get into committee of the whole on the bill, after second reading. He specifically said we could do that on clause 1. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra knows that we sometimes have an argument as to what our rights are on clause 1 of a bill. But the Minister of Transport has given what I think should be accepted by the hon. member for Lethbridge as an undertaking that whatever the argument may be sometimes, on this occasion we will have the right, when we get into committee of the whole on the bill on clause 1, to take up and get the answers, if we can, to the questions the hon. member for Lethbridge is asking here.

As I said before, it is well known that I like to see things threshed out in full. I certainly want to see members of the opposition have their full rights, but we had a discussion on this resolution on Tuesday from five o'clock until ten o'clock of that day. We had it all day yesterday and we have had it thus far today. I think it would serve the purpose of the hon. member for Lethbridge, as well as the purpose of the rest of us, if this resolution could get through today and we could see the bill. As a peacemaker I suggest that we let the hon. member for Lethbridge get what information he can between now and 6:15 o'clock, but I would hope that by that time he would be willing to let the resolution go through and the bill come in on the basis of the undertaking given by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What does the other peacemaker say?

Mr. Pouliot: I agree.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Lethbridge any comments to make on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, there is not a doubt in the world that the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the correct one. If we allow the Minister of Public Works to establish the principle that was implicit in what he said he would abrogate 90 per cent of the effectiveness of the members of the opposition in the house. There is just no answer to that statement.

The Deputy Chairman: The point that now seems to be rather important is the one made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Blackmore: I am sorry, I cannot hear you.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre understood that the Minister of Transport gave an undertaking that on clause 1 of the bill there would be a general discussion, as has been the practice, and intimated that the hon. member for Lethbridge might be satisfied with that undertaking. He then went on to say that we could let the hon. member for Lethbridge get whatever information he could between now and 6.15, and then carry this resolution. I want to know whether that is agreeable to the hon. member.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, this is a rather new thing to me. In the first place, I think the Minister of Public Works made a personal reflection on me for which he had no justification.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps that point may be cleared up immediately after. What I would like to obtain, if possible, is the impression of the hon. member of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not prepared to announce that until the Minister of Public Works rises in his place and makes a statement that he is not going to say that kind of thing any more.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Really, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman insists and lets this resolution pass I can make a good many promises to him.

Mr. Nowlan: On the point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: We have a point of order before us; we cannot have two at the same time.

Mr. Nowlan: On the point of order, is the minister not himself out of order in saying someone is obstructing? If you refer to Beauchesne, citation 299, you will find that is one of the expressions which is objectionable and must be withdrawn at any time. More than that, Mr. Chairman, I certainly would say that anyone was always out of order who tried to prevent any debate on the maritime provinces.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I might as well comment on the point of order which was raised by the Minister of Public Works. He cited citation 293, paragraph 1, of Beauchesne. I know that the hon. member for Lethbridge has been insistent, and his insistence might have been construed by other hon. members as being repetitious. Sometimes one does not follow the trend of the questions that are being asked, and it is difficult to perceive whether they are the type of repetition which would justify the application of citation 293 to say that it is obstruction of debate. In his later remarks I think the Minister of Public Works has agreed that, provided the intentions of the hon. member for Lethbridge are good—and he says they are—his point of order will not be taken. On the other hand I think the hon. member for Lethbridge, realizing that the Minister of Public Works has good intentions as well, as he said, will not take umbrage at the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works, and that we can carry on in the few minutes at our disposal and perhaps accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which apparently has some merit.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I ask the Minister of Public Works to withdraw the remarks he made.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will withdraw, if it pleases the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Blackmore: I want to make this statement. I have never yet obstructed in this house. There are others in this house who perhaps—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Minister of Public Works has withdrawn. If he has, the hon. member has no more to say. Shall the resolution carry?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER DEVELOPMENT

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND ONTARIO GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to approve an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario respecting power development in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river; and to provide further for the transfer to the government of Ontario of the administration of certain lands or property pursuant to the agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I object to this.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): If my hon. friend will permit me, on Monday I met the leader of the hon. member's party and the leaders of the other parties, at which time it was agreed that the discussion on the first resolution would apply to the second resolution. Yesterday during the debate I did not bring this matter up, except at the adjournment.

I now feel somewhat ill at ease, because after having these interviews with the leaders it was agreed that this resolution would go through and that the bill would be tabled immediately, so that hon. members would have it. I am appealing to the hon. member to see if we can keep this agreement.

Mr. Blackmore: The information had not been conveyed to me that this arrangement was made by the leader of this group. Since it was made, I am bound by it. Otherwise I would oppose this thing for days, because I believe we are making a very serious mistake in passing these important measures through too fast.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Gillis: I think some explanation is necessary from the minister. This resolution is completely different from the one just passed, in that it involves an agreement between the province of Ontario and the federal government as to the method of financing. Lands are to be handed over on a reciprocal basis, and so on. I would like the minister to tell us how the financial details are to be worked out as between the province and the dominion.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps briefly I might say this: In the first place it was thought unnecessary to introduce a resolution with reference to this agreement at all, by reason of the fact that there is no money passing. Under the terms of the agreement which has already been tabled by the Prime Minister, the province of Ontario is going to establish and produce its share of the 2,200,000 horsepower. But because of the fact that in this agreement there is a clause which provides for the turning over to the province of certain crown lands of the dominion, such as Sheek island, and other islands in the vicinity of the international rapids section, this was done in order that a point of order might not be raised in case someone thought a constitutional point was involved.

Really both resolutions have been dealt with in the general discussion. I have given the only reason for this resolution. That is why the leader of the house thought he had an understanding that both would be considered together.

Mr. Gillis: That does not answer the question. I have read the agreement. The reason I am asking the question is that, even after reading it, I am still not clear as to the financial responsibility between the dominion and Ontario, and as to the value of the lands. Ontario will be passing some lands to the dominion government and the dominion government will be transferring crown lands to the province. Considerable capital is involved in the transaction, and I do not think the agreement makes it quite clear.

Mr. Chevrier: The agreement certainly makes clear the question of the cost, in so far as the development of power is concerned. In so far as the lands are concerned, those will be determined when the authority in the state of New York and that in the province of Ontario, through the Hydro Electric Power Commission, have completed their negotiations.

Mr. Gillis: The authority we set up under the first resolution will have complete power in working out the details of this power agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: No, we have nothing to do with that. We have complete power with reference to the seaway.

Mr. Gillis: That is why I am asking the questions. Of course right now there is no authority at all, except the agreement on paper between the dominion government and the province of Ontario. Then the state of New York enters into it. Actually there is no supervisory authority so far as the federal government is concerned. Is the province of Ontario going ahead with the state of New York, on its own, so far as development is concerned, without any control at all on the part of the federal government?

Mr. Chevrier: If it is to be an all-Canadian project the answer would be yes. The application would be made by the province of Ontario and the state of New York to a federal body, the international joint commission. But if it is to be a project under the 1941 agreement, then the answer to my hon. friend's question is no.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, respecting construction of works for the generation of electrical power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMBINES LEGISLATION

JOINT COMMITTEE—SECOND AND FINAL REPORT

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano) presented the second and final report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on combines legislation.

Mr. Drew: I hope the Minister of Justice will not overlook the suggestion in the report that has just been tabled, that his department is apparently not enforcing the Criminal Code.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will resume the debate on the address in reply and, if we are fortunate enough to conclude it, we will take up the resolution concerning the Dominion Elections Act; the bill to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board; Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act, and the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 6.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 10, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE, MR. BRADETTE—SESSIONAL INDEMNITIES

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal and parliamentary privilege affecting not only myself but each and every member of the House of Commons, regardless of political affiliation.

I quote from "Ottawa Diary", at it appeared in The Daily Press, Timmins, December 5 issue, as follows:

> Harvesting two sessional indemnities totalling $12,000 in the one year, with $4,000 of the total tax free in the case of members of the House of Commons, isn't too bad.

As every member of parliament knows, and as every informed, accurate writer on parliamentary affairs should know, our total indemnity payments this year will be $8,000, not $12,000 as stated, plus an annual tax free expense allowance of $2,000, payable on December 31, not $4,000 as stated.

It is pertinent to point out the obvious fact that quite a portion of our second $4,000 sessional indemnity this year will go at once in higher income taxes. I venture to say that the majority of members of parliament actually would have been further ahead financially had they been able to carry on their regular occupations at home this fall rather than attend this second session, which was made necessary by the pressure of public business to be transacted. Much important, far-reaching legislation has been approved at our second session now drawing to a close.

In my parliamentary experience, going back to 1926, I have noted that the more responsible writers on parliamentary affairs have the courage and the responsibility to write under their own names. It is to be doubly regretted, therefore, that the writer of "Ottawa Diary", which I understand is a syndicated feature appearing in a dozen or more smaller newspapers across the country, writes anonymously.

Members of parliament, of course, are open to criticism, but surely such criticism should be based on truth and fairness.

I recall on one occasion, some years ago, Miss Agnes Macphail, pioneer woman member of parliament, declared that the patriotic, public service rendered by members of parliament would compare favourably with that of any other cross-section group of Canadian citizens. I agreed with Miss Macphail's expressed views at the time and I have neither seen nor heard any reason recently to change my opinion in that regard.

In these difficult days, when it is most desirable that democratic ideals and parliamentary institutions should be upheld and strengthened in every way possible, it is to be greatly deplored that writers, such as "Ottawa Diary", by resorting to anonymity, should disseminate false information and criticism about the high court of parliament and its members.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Matthew MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria) presented the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the resolution of which notice appears at page 11 of the order paper, as follows:

> That on and after Wednesday, December 12, 1951, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that, in addition to the usual intermission at 6.15 o'clock, p.m., there shall be an intermission every day from 1 to 2.30 o'clock, p.m., except on Friday, when the intermission shall be from 1 to 2 o'clock, p.m.; and every Wednesday and Friday until the end of the session the house shall meet from 8 to 10 o'clock, p.m.

I feel that it is the hope of many members of parliament that without unduly rushing anything we might complete the business that is to be dealt with perhaps even this week, and if not this week by early in next week so that hon. members, including those who reside at great distances from Ottawa, may have plenty of time to reach their homes before Christmas day. I hope that this motion will meet with unanimous approval of the house.

Business of the House

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I am not prepared to give unanimous approval to a motion of this kind for a particular reason among others. Early in the session there was an indication that after several years of discussion there was going to be a committee on defence expenditures set up at this present session. In spite of the importance of that committee it began to sit only last week and for reasons which I need not discuss but which I do not regard as valid it has held only intermittent meetings.

The committee met again this morning and adjourned until Thursday. I would suggest that if there is any other reason why we should meet in an orderly way and not hasten the proceedings of this house to the point where business cannot be dealt with expeditiously by members who wish to sit on committees as well it is that there should be a report from the committee on defence expenditures before this house rises.

The motion before us is obviously for the purpose of getting work done so that the predictions that have been offered that we might terminate the sittings this week can be fulfilled. I believe that it is immensely important that the time of our sitting remain as it is so that hon. members who attend committees may also have an opportunity to sit in the house. A number of the committees are still sitting and these are all important committees. There is the committee on defence expenditures; there is the committee on radio; there are committees on other matters, and I think hon. members should still attach some importance to public accounts, which committee is still sitting.

There cannot be that attention to the work of these committees and also attention to the business of the house that the nature of the work of the house justifies if this motion is adopted. I urge strongly that it should not be adopted and that we continue to meet at the hours that have been set.

There is another reason. I think members of this house should be given an opportunity to digest the reports in order to be able to present their views thereon. It is perfectly clear at the moment that they will not have the slightest chance to examine these reports and express their opinion if this course is followed. Therefore I oppose the motion and I hope that it will not pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: Is the motion in order?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Green: May I ask how this motion can be called when it appears on routine proceedings after the orders of the day?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recall that I made a ruling on that matter last year, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will also recall that I made such a ruling. Here is what I said, as reported in Votes and Proceedings of Monday, September 4, 1950:

> I may say to the leader of the opposition that last year I considered this same question, and it then seemed to me, as he says, that such a motion should be considered at a later time. But under citation 132 in Beauchesne's second edition I notice the following:
> "The motions allowed on routine proceedings are motions relating to the business of the house and for the discussion of reports from committees."
> This motion definitely relates to the business of the house and should therefore be considered at this time. I think the misunderstanding arises from the fact that such motions generally appear under "government notices of motions." Actually, however, they are not "government notices of motions" in the usual sense.
> In view of the citation which I have mentioned in Beauchesne's second edition and of the practice which has been established, I think the motion should be considered now.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. St. Laurent) which was agreed to on the following division:

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the public accounts of Canada and the report of the Auditor General of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951, which were tabled on October 31, 1951, be referred to the public accounts committee.

Mr. Fleming: I think we should have some sense of reality in this matter. Is the minister suggesting that the committee is going to have time at this session to go into the question of public accounts?

Mr. Abbott: I would think not. This is a routine motion. Since the public accounts are available, hon. members will now have an opportunity to read them. They were tabled in typed form a couple of weeks ago. They are now available in printed form.

Motion agreed to.

Redistribution Commission

REDISTRIBUTION COMMISSION

CONSTITUTION AND DUTIES

Hon. C. G. Power (Quebec South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35, respecting the constitution and duties of the redistribution commission.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Power: This bill is to set up a commission of three members, whose duty it will be to draw a plan for the division of the provinces of Canada into electoral districts in accordance with the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act, as enacted by the British North America Act, 1946.

This proposal is not a new one. It has been bandied back and forth across the floor of this house since 1889. I had the honour of being given the task of preparing a bill for presentation to this house in 1940, but owing to the abrupt conclusion of the session of that date it was not proceeded with. The details of the bill are somewhat complex and are likely to be controversial. It is for that reason I am asking permission to introduce the bill so that it may be distributed to the members, and it will be reintroduced next session.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Knowles: Now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO FORBID THE FIXING OF SPECIFIC OR MINIMUM RESALE PRICES

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Garson: The main purpose of this bill is to forbid persons engaged in manufacturing, buying or selling articles or commodities from fixing specific or minimum resale prices for such articles or commodities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time?

Mr. Fraser: Next session.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting.

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Information is available only for years in which the census of merchandising and service establishments was taken. For these years the number of firms not classified as department stores operating three or more stores was:

1930, 957; 1941, 975.

Note: The dominion bureau of statistics classification used in the decennial censuses of merchandising and in the annual surveys separates chain stores from independent stores at the four and over rather than at the three and over level. A chain store is defined as a group of four or more stores or other retail places of business under the same ownership and operation and carrying on the same or similar kinds of business. Many firms in Canada, however, operate two or three retail outlets, thus occupying an intermediate position between single independent stores and chains. These are classified for census purposes as two or three-store multiples. The above figures were obtained by adding the number of firms operating chain stores (four or more stores) and the number operating three-store multiples.

The number of firms, (excluding department stores) operating four or more retail outlets, as recorded in the census or in annual surveys was:

1925, not available; 1930, 518; 1935, 445; 1939, 446; 1941, 533; 1945, 429; 1948, 403; 1951, not available.

2. Information available only for years in which the census of merchandising and service establisnments was taken. For these years the number of stores operated by firms operating three or more retail stores was:

1930, 9,821; 1941, 9,338.

See note to answer No. 1.

The number of stores operated by firms (excluding department stores) operating four or more retail outlets was:

1925, not available; 1930, 8,504; 1935, 8,022; 1939, 7,595; 1941, 8,012; 1945, 6,705; 1948, 7,152; 1951, not available.

3. Information not available. For census purposes all department stores are classified as independents irrespective of the number of stores operated by any one firm.

4. Information available only for years in which the census of merchandising was taken. For these years the number of department stores was:

1930, 148; 1941, 504.

5. The total volume of retail business done in Canada was:

1925, not available; 1930, $2,755,570,000; 1935, $2,120,348,000; 1939, $2,597,752,000;

1941, $3,440,902,000; 1945, not available; 1948, $7,276,400,000; 1950 (preliminary), $9,087,714,000; 1951, not available.

6. Information is available only for years in which the census of merchandising was taken. For these years the total volume of business done by firms operating three or more retail stores not classified as department stores was:

1930, $549,275,000; 1941, $707,745,000.

See note to answer No. 1.

The volume of retail business done by chain stores (four or more stores) was:

1925, not available; 1930, $487,336,000; 1935, $364,129,000; 1939, $432,026,000; 1941, $642,636,000; 1945, $876,209,000; 1948, $1,335,735,000; 1951, not available.

7. The total volume of business done by department stores was:

1925, not available; 1930, $355,259,000; 1935, $258,993,000; 1939, $291,161,000; 1941, $377,806,000; 1945, $516,141,000; 1948, $803,092,000; 1950 (preliminary), $873,099,000; 1951, not available.

8, 9 and 10. Separate information on mail-order houses is not available. The figures shown in No. 7 include the business of mail-order houses or offices. Since the major portion of the mail-order business in Canada is transacted by a comparatively small number of the larger departmental firms it is necessary to combine the mail-order sales with department store business in order to avoid disclosing, at least within narrow limits, the operations of individual firms.

Canadian material for these editions is obtained from commercial sources as well as from the board.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING—AMOUNTS OWING TO KING'S PRINTER

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is any of the printing for which payment has not been made by various departments of government to the king's printer, printing which the department refused to accept, or refused to pay for?
2. If so, what is the amount so involved, by departments, and what is the reason for such refusal, by departments?
3. What proportion of the printing done by the government printing bureau for any recent period for which figures are available, is letterpress printing, and what proportion is offset printing?
4. How much of the money owing to the king's printer as at November 22, 1951, is for (a) letterpress printing; (b) offset printing, by departments?

Mr. Bradley:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3 and 4. The department of public printing and stationery maintains no record of the printing methods used in the production of any specific printing job. In many cases both letterpress and offset processes enter into the production of one job.

The compilation of the figures are possible, but it would involve an examination of individual time sheets in respect to every single job produced in the department. The number of jobs completed and charged to departments of the public service during the fiscal year 1950-51 was 21,608. Additional staff would have to be provided for the compilation of such a report.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

CANCELLATION OF SECTIONS 61 AND 62

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sorry I did not send him notice of it until he came to the house, but the matter was not brought to my attention until just a short time ago. What authority is there for the recent action of the transport controller in cancelling the operation of sections 61 and 62 of the Canada Grain Act, 1930, with regard to the operation of a car order book? Will the government, in view of the strong representations made by the pools and other farm organizations in western Canada against this order, reconsider the matter?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The transport controller was appointed under the Emergency Powers Act passed by parliament, and under the terms of his appointment he has authority to control all matters affecting transportation. I think there is no doubt that he has the necessary authority. A complaint has been received from the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and will be referred to the transport controller for a report and for such action as seems appropriate in the light of the complaint.

DEFENCE CONTRACTS

ORDERS PLACED BY UNITED STATES IN CANADA AND VICE VERSA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct to the Minister of Defence Production a question of which I sent him notice—I hope he received it. Will the minister, before the end of the session, advise the house the total amount of (a) defence contracts placed by the United States in Canada; (b) defence contracts placed by Canada in the United States.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): In reply to the question, I will be glad to furnish such information as we have, which is confined to orders placed officially by the government of Canada in the United States and orders placed officially by the departments of the United States government through the Canadian Commercial Corporation in Canada. I might point out that, in addition to these orders, there is a great volume of orders being placed directly by parent firms in the United States with their Canadian subsidiaries, or by departments of government in the United States directly with firms in Canada of which this federal government has no record. I think it may well be that the total of these orders, of which we have no record, is about equal to the orders of which we have official record. I would like to bring these circumstances to your attention before bringing down such information as we have.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

SERVICES IN NEW BRUNSWICK AND NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What air service in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia has been taken over by the Maritime Central Airways from the Trans-Canada Air Lines, or was there an exchange of service so as to avoid duplication?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): No air services have been taken away from New Brunswick. The air transport board handed down a decision recently upon an application by Trans-Canada Air Lines to serve Fredericton. In exchange for that service, Canadian Maritime Central will now serve Yarmouth on the route from Boston to Saint John, into Yarmouth and on to Halifax.

IMMIGRATION

DISCONTINUANCE OF IRO—ARRANGEMENTS FOR MOVEMENT OF IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? Would the minister care to expand this morning's radio news report to the effect that a new international arrangement is to take the place of IRO with respect to the movement of immigrants? Can the minister tell us what Canada's position is with respect to this new arrangement, and anything else that would be of help?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I did not hear the radio comment, Mr. Speaker, but I suppose it was a version of the story which appeared in the newspapers. The international refugee organization is coming to the end of the labours which were assigned to it by the UN at the end of the war. It was the feeling of the principal countries concerned with the movement of these unfortunate people that something should be done to completely dispose of the problem by some method other than IRO. A conference has been held in Brussels for that purpose. Canada was represented by the director of immigration. The only conclusion they reached, of which I am aware, was that a provisional committee would be set up to continue the study of the problem, and that efforts would be made through the respective governments to find a solution to the problem of dealing with about 115,000 people who are still on the rolls of IRO.

Mr. Knowles: Is Canada a member of that provisional committee?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have not been informed, Mr. Speaker, whether or not we are. It was intended that those who supported the provisional committee at the conference would be represented upon it.

FEED AND COARSE GRAINS

INQUIRY AS TO MOVEMENT INTO SHORT SUPPLY AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether the government or the wheat board has yet taken any steps to move feed grains into those areas of western Canada in which they are in short supply or, in some cases, non-existent?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The wheat board sells grain to any purchaser, and will arrange to have it loaded for any destination. I have no knowledge of any movement of the type described, but I presume if such movement is required some purchaser in the area will be buying wheat and having it moved in. If so, I am sure prompt attention will be given to the movement.

Mr. Harkness: What about coarse grains, which are even more important than wheat from the point of view of feed?

Mr. Howe: The same statement applies to coarse grains.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY—LORD PROVOST OF GLASGOW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I rise on a special question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I know that earlier this session it was decided that hon. members would not notice distinguished visitors in the gallery, but there are outstanding exceptions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIvor: I am sure you will allow us the privilege of noticing the presence in the gallery of the distinguished Lord Provost of Glasgow, and welcoming him.

KURT MEYER

REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS BY COUNSEL—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the uncertainty which has been created by the statements made by those counsel responsible for the prosecution of Kurt Meyer and those defending him, as well as statements by counsel more recently engaged, which throw a great deal of uncertainty upon the propriety of what is taking place, will the Prime Minister indicate whether the government intends to take any action?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry, but I have no comment to make at this time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Argue, as amended.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in this house we have been engaged for some time in debating a motion that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, Field Marshal the Right Hon. the Viscount Alexander of Tunis. It so happens, sir, that today is the birthday of His Excellency the Governor General. I know I am speaking on behalf of all hon. members of this house when I extend to him birthday felicitations, greetings and good wishes. A man great in war and in peace, the manner in which he has discharged his responsibilities as Governor General has made him justly popular everywhere in this Dominion of Canada.

There have been amendments and subamendments, the latest of which was moved on Wednesday last. For the first time in more than a generation, in order to water down an amendment that would constitute a motion of non-confidence in His Excellency's advisers, a member supporting the government has moved a subamendment which was, to say the least, constitutionally unusual. I believe the result of that subamendment, regular in its form as it was and in order as declared by Your Honour, has been to place the government of this country in a quagmire of difficulty. I intend, if I may, to refer to the only examples that exist of an amendment or a subamendment along the lines of the one in question. When I do so, I want to give my thanks to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) for his collaboration and study in connection with this matter.

An hon. Member: North Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is usually North Centre who deals with the rules, but this time I refer to South Centre, a new member who has come into the house but recently, and who adds that strength and ability to the house which able and qualified men bring to our deliberations.

I believe it is worth bringing to the attention of the government that an examination of the Journals of this house indicates that from 1867 until 1902 the practice was followed of moving a resolution to the effect that a humble address be presented to the Governor General. The formal address was followed by a series of paragraphs repeating almost word for word the corresponding statements which appeared in the speech from the throne. From 1888 until 1896 the practice was to put the question for each paragraph of the resolution, and it was discontinued.

The custom up to 1895 was to refer to a special committee of the house the drafting of an address to His Excellency or to His Majesty the King. In 1903 a short form of address was adopted which is the one in effect now. It is interesting to note that. Between 1867 and 1902 only two amendments to the resolution were ever considered. The first of these was in 1893 and was an amendment by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then in opposition, and the amendment was defeated. The second amendment occurred in 1899, and that is one similar in nature to that moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater). That amendment proposed adding a tenth paragraph to the resolution and suggested the appointment of a judicial commission to investigate alleged malpractices in the administration of the Yukon. A subamendment was moved by the government supporters expressing confidence in the commissioner of the Yukon. The subamendment carried and was added as paragraph ten of the resolution.

Someone will immediately say that what the hon. member for The Battlefords has done, even though it is as far back as 1899, indicated that we have the right to do it now. At the time that subamendment was moved general procedure was different from what it is now. As I pointed out a moment ago, in 1903 the humble address that we now send to His Excellency was then adopted. From 1903 to the present day the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has occupied more time of the house than it had previous to the adoption of the short form of address. In the period between 1903 and June 1951, 35 amendments and 30 subamendments, a total of 65, that have been found in order or have not been challenged, have been proposed to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In all those 65 amendments never has there been a case, since the alteration in the procedure connected with the address from the throne, in which a government member has moved a sub-amendment. We therefore have to turn to Britain and examine its constitutional practice and history.

The practice in the British House of Commons appears to have been the same as that which is now followed in Canada. The short form in reply to the speech from the throne was adopted in Britain in 1891, and amendments thereto have always been considered as motions of want of confidence. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave his imprimatur to that viewpoint when, on October 15 last, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) moved an amendment and asked that there be a free vote in the House of Commons, and said that there was no intention to have the amendment to the motion considered as a vote of non-confidence. As reported at page 33 of Hansard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said:

> If it is not a motion of no confidence it probably is not in order . . .

He had said earlier that it was a matter for the Speaker to decide. In the fifteenth edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, 1950, there are only two references to amendments to the address being passed in Britain. One of those occurred in 1924 and resulted in the immediate resignation of the government. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I said a while ago, that this government is in a procedural quagmire. I think they are in the position that the psalmist referred to when he said: "In the net which they hid is their own foot taken". Apparently they devised this form of adulteration which removes from the opposition the right to place before parliament and have parliament vote on amendments that are non-confidence amendments. We have gone far enough along the way of the one-party state. We in this opposition and all future oppositions should not be denied the right to introduce specific motions of non-confidence and have them voted upon in the house irrespective of the difficulties or the mental exercise that may be caused to some of the members for having to vote on an amendment which they would like to support but which their political persuasion does not permit them to do.

I believe that before we are through with this matter, if we are to restore some degree of constitutional regularity to what has happened, I think the government will have to do something similar to that which was done in 1894. Then a Liberal government was in power and Lord Roseberry was Prime Minister. Sir William Harcourt was leader of the house. An amendment was put forward by a private member on the opposition side dealing with the subject of restricting the power of the House of Lords. Some of the government members then had a higher degree of independence than has been characteristic of government members at other times and in other places, and they voted for the amendment. The result was that the amendment to the address was supported on a vote of 147 to 145.

If you read Hansard and the London Times of that period you will find that, for two or three days, there was an unusual degree of excitement in the house. The government was embarrassed. Governments sometimes became embarrassed in those days as a result of constitutional difficulties in which they found themselves. There was no precedent. Mr. Balfour of the official opposition, who was always a master of understatement, said that this was "an unexampled position in our parliamentary history". The government did not feel they should resign. But the government found itself in a position where it could not submit the address in its amended form to the king. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, His Excellency receiving the following address, as it will read if the sub-amendment passes:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament; but this house regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems.

When His Majesty's representative receives that message, it will have one qualification: it will be unique in parliamentary history. In effect it says: This is a motion of confidence and regret but in voting for the motion of non-confidence we want at the same time to say that we have confidence in the government. We are slipping a little but we will not fall in expressing our confidence in the government. My submission is that if the government and the members supporting it vote affirmatively in connection with the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), as amended by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), it will be tantamount to saying that they have no confidence in the government while at the same time saying that they have.

Mr. Ferrie: You are a good lawyer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am quoting from Liberal records in Britain now. That is the point. It is not a lawyer's argument. What had to be done in Britain will have to be done here. What great parliamentarians in Britain had to do in order to extricate a government that was put into difficulty by a motion of the opposition, not by one of their own members, may have to be done here.

Mr. Sinnott: And the member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to speak to those who will follow intelligently what I am trying to say. I am glad to know my hon. friend is following this argument.

Mr. Sinnott: I am glad to know the hat fits.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the British parliament, to extricate themselves from the unusual situation the government had to ask the assistance of the official opposition, with the result that the house voted down the main motion as amended and subsequently moved a new address expressed in terms similar to the original. And thus, though humiliated, a precedent was not established of the government amending its own address.

That, sir, is the position in which, as I see it, the government is placed. After all, the form of address if the amendment of the hon. member for The Battlefords is adopted is bound to be unusual. It will be a departure from a hundred years of parliamentary practice in Great Britain. It will be a departure from over fifty-five years of parliamentary procedure in this country.

The situation that occurred in Great Britain in 1894 occurred, I point out, not with the connivance, assistance or condonation of the government, or with the assistance of a government member. It arose by an amendment moved by an opposition member. I suggest, sir, that the government take immediate action to remove the anomalous situation created by the subamendment, in the interests of sound and constitutional parliamentary procedure and in order to preserve future parliaments from a ruling that, while sound and unchallengeable, will have the effect of removing from the opposition the right that oppositions should have, and that should surely not be denied even though the government has an overwhelming majority—the right to move amendments on specific matters and to have the amendments voted on; otherwise a precedent will be created that future parliaments will always be subject, on amendments expressing non-confidence, to subamendments by government members designed to make them palatable to government members by a substituted form of adulteration such as will take place if the subamendment is passed. I suggest that this subamendment, in its present form, is an example of a trend indicative of an all-powerful government which would remove from the opposition the last surviving right it has in parliament, that of moving a clear-cut motion of non-confidence.

I pass on now to discuss the excessive load of taxation the Canadian people are carrying today, in consequence of the bad guesses made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and his advisers a few short months ago. Before proceeding further I may say that this amendment could have been moved a considerable time ago, but it was not moved until the Minister of Finance returned to Canada, after having represented this country abroad. One of the pleasant amenities of parliament is that while we all cannot and should not see eye to eye, and parliament could not exist with only one party, nevertheless, regardless of party we do endeavour to maintain those friendly relationships without which parliament would be chaotic and ineffective. I know every member of the opposition joins with me in welcoming the Minister of Finance back to this country. He will have the opportunity today to answer personally for whatever may be said regarding the overtaxation that has taken place here during recent months.

The other day in opening my remarks I said that no Canadian would object to paying a fair share of the taxes necessary to run this country and to build up our defences. I am sure the minister has been back in Canada long enough to find out that everywhere in this country people are aroused, as never before, owing to the fact that in the past several months hundreds of millions of dollars more than required for civil expenditures and for defence have been collected by the government.

It is not as though a warning had not been given in this connection. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and the financial critic of this party, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), when the new taxation measures were brought in last spring warned as to what would happen, and pointed out that there was no need for this extra taxation. We objected to the increase in sales tax from 8 to 10 per cent. We said that could only have the effect of increasing the high cost of living, applying as it does to household furnishings, clothing, shoes and other needs. Not only would it increase the price index, but it would increase the cost of living; for in my opinion the index number does not represent the degree to which, in an individual case, the cost of living has gone up in this country.

The leader of the opposition and those who followed him in the debate objected to the 15 per cent tax on refrigerators, stoves, washing machines and the like. We objected to the 20 per cent added to income tax, the so-called defence surtax, and joined in support of a motion moved by hon. members to my left stating that that added 20 per cent income tax should not apply to people in the low income tax brackets. On every one of these matters the government and its supporters voted in unity for the additional taxation.

We dealt with the extraordinarily heavy tax imposed upon cigarettes and tobaccos. We endeavoured to show that there was no need for this extra taxation. The answer of the Minister of Finance was that the best estimates that he and his advisers could give would be that the surplus for the fiscal year would not be over $30 million. The government talks about using the surplus for the purpose of discharging debt, but they never said anything about that last spring when they secured the approval of parliament for additional taxation. There was no mandate on the part of parliament to impose upon the Canadian people excessive, overwhelming and unwarranted taxation at a time when the cost of living was as high as it was then, so as to have a surplus for debt retirement.

Yet, because of the government majority, numerous as it is, these taxes were imposed. And now the people of this country find themselves in many cases caught between the squeeze of rising prices and high taxation. I think everywhere in this country the Canadian taxpayer would like to know where members of the House of Commons stand on this question.

I intend to move in amendment the following:

> And further regrets that Your Excellency's advisers continue to collect unnecessarily high taxes beyond requirements and have failed at the present session of parliament to relieve the people from unnecessary, burdensome and unjustified taxation.

The latest report of the bureau of statistics indicates that the cost of living is still rising. A major factor in this increasing cost of living is a government policy of taxation far in excess of its requirements.

It has usually been said that high taxation siphons off savings and meets the onrush of prices and inflation. With the government today collecting hundreds of millions of dollars more than it needs for its purposes, this extra taxation is inflationary in its operation.

I repeat that Canadians are willing, in the interests of national defence, to stand behind the government and parliament, and will pay the taxation needed. But surely there is no justification, without a mandate from parliament, for collecting from every person in this country in a period of seven months $45 more than required for the purposes of governing the country, developing the nation, building up our defences and playing our fair part, and paying our share in the international sphere.

When the Minister of Finance announced his budget on April 10 last he estimated that the total expenditures for the present fiscal year would amount to $3,700 million and it was upon that basis that he was budgeting. The estimate was $1,664 million for defence; $1,923 million for non-defence, and $113 million for supplementary estimates. As it turned out the supplementaries amounted to $195,172,000.

To meet these increased expenditures the Minister of Finance announced taxation changes designed to produce actual additional revenues of about $405 million, which he estimated would result in a surplus of approximately $30 million for the entire year. But with every passing month the surplus gets greater and the government boasts of a month by month increase in the revenue. If revenues are maintained at the present level, and there is every probability that they will be not only maintained but increased, the gross revenue for this year will exceed $4,000 million.

Do not let the government answer that by saying that the surplus is caused by the fact that they have not been able to get their defence mobilization under way as it was anticipated. Allowing for the expenditure of every dollar provided by parliament for defence purposes this year, and irrespective of the fact that government is behind in its defence expenditures, if they expend every dollar for which the minister budgeted the surplus on the basis of the present monthly increases in revenue over expenditures will amount to at least $230 million at the end of the fiscal year instead of $30 million as estimated.

This situation is serious. If the present rate of surplus continues to pile up month by month at the present rate it will amount to around $900 million at the end of the fiscal year. On the other hand, if the government even at this time were to expand its expenditures for defence to the amount that was budgeted we would still have at the end of the year a surplus of $200 million beyond that estimated by the minister.

I want to point out that reduced expenditures for defence are not the only contributing factor to that huge surplus now being taken from the Canadian people under what I believe to be exorbitant taxes. The revenues for the entire fiscal year after additional increased taxes were levied were estimated to reach $3,730 million, which would result in a surplus of $30 million. Ordinary revenues for the month of October amounted to $352 million, making a total of ordinary revenues for the first seven months of $2,147,967,000 as compared with just a little under $1,500 million for the same period last year.

What does all this mean? It simply means that either the government guessed wrong or they did not properly place before parliament the facts when the support of parliament was secured for this extra taxation. I should like to read an article by Austin F. Cross, which I am sure every hon. member of the government has read, which appeared in the December issue of New Liberty magazine and in which the matter is set forth clearly, distinctly and factually. He points out that the government may call it taxation that has provided so large a surplus but in reality it is taking from the Canadian people money that parliament never considered was being voted, and that that is unjustifiable having regard to the estimates made for national defence and for civil expenditures last April.

It may be said that we are not overtaxed, but I would refer hon. members to figures which appeared recently in the Financial Post. In the article a comparison is made between United States and Canadian federal taxation and it shows that we in Canada are paying far more in taxes on many of the necessities required by the ordinary person than is paid in the United States. It compares the taxation on cigarettes, and I shall refer to that in a moment. It compares the taxation on automobiles, automobile parts, beverages, blankets, household requirements, and all of those things by the hundred which are used by the ordinary people.

Mr. Decore: What about income tax?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall let my hon. friend put the figures on the record with regard to income tax. In the United States capital gains are taxed in part; here they are not. I submit too that it shows that the tax on many things that are so necessary in the home is not and cannot be justified.

I should like to refer to some of the effects of this heavy taxation. Taxation in excess of requirements is an added factor contributing to the increased cost of living. We have the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) in legislation to be introduced trying to find out ways and means of keeping down the cost of living, and other ministers in the government putting on additional taxation and doing their part thereby to raise the cost of living.

Governments are no different from individuals and when they have a lot of money lying around they consider it an invitation to spend. The non-defence expenditures which the Minister of Finance promised last spring would be reduced to a minimum have been increased and not decreased. The Minister of Finance has repeatedly stated that there was no need of a committee of parliament to be set up to cut down non-defence expenditures; that the government was doing their best; that they had committees and the treasury board and the like; that they had saved on civilian defence expenditures one and three-fifths cents on the dollar. Making allowance for additional provincial subsidies of $7·2 million; additional family allowances of $6·3 million; government contributions to the unemployment insurance fund of $2·8 million; old age and blind pensions, $3·6 million; general health grants, $4·2 million; not taking these into account at all we find that during seven months the ordinary non-defence expenditures in Canada have increased by $13·6 million, and this in spite of the promises by the government that in order to fight inflationary pressures civil expenditures would be kept down.

Another effect of high taxation has been increased lawlessness in this country. There is no greater invitation to lawlessness than unjustifiably high taxation in a nation which lies alongside another nation in which the same high taxation is not imposed. The tax on cigarettes in Canada is $11.50 per thousand or 23 cents per package of 20; in the United States it is 8 cents per package of 20, or $4 per thousand. Our tax on manufactured tobacco is $1.15 per pound and the United States tax is only 10 cents. On raw leaf the tax is 40 cents per pound in the United States and 10 cents per pound here. Tobacco products in Canada are subject to an additional federal sales tax of 10 per cent which is calculated on the total manufacturer's price. The cigarette tax at its present level is a detriment to the production of tobacco. It strikes a challenge to the existence of the tobacco farmers of this country and is an encouragement to the development of widespread contempt for the law. At the same time it has resulted in a loss of revenue to the country. Nobody has benefited by this high tax, least of all the Canadian people or the revenues of this country. No amount of government stubbornness can justify its continuance. I am not going into the facts regarding the extent of the smuggling except to point out that in the Globe and Mail of December 4 there was an article in which a high ranking mounted police officer was quoted as saying:

> . . . enforcement is impossible. Seizures were made from time to time . . . but even fines and the loss of trucks did not stop the smugglers. No individual could stand the losses, and the fact that men whose trucks had been seized appeared again a short time later indicated the smuggling was operated by a well-financed ring.

Cigarette smuggling—and I have heard something about it in the last few days—has become a national scandal with up to 50 million United States cigarettes being brought into Canada each month according to the estimates of qualified people. The increase in taxation last spring was estimated to produce greater revenue to the extent of $26 million by the end of the year but has resulted in a loss of $20 million to the revenues of Canada.

Someone has argued in justification of the high tax that in England the tax is higher on tobacco and cigarettes. That is true, but there they do not have thousands of miles of border. Cigarette bootlegging is now big business. What is happening teaches the lesson that taxation can be made so high that revenues fall. Taxation can be raised so high, as it has been unjustifiably in the last few months, as to impede and interfere with production. Time magazine sums it up in these words:

> The flood, estimated at 50 million cigarettes a month, continues unabated. The price is too good, the demand too great, the border too long and too free.

This menace, this undermining of the law will continue as long as taxation remains at its present height. I suggest that the only way in which excessive government spending can be stopped—and I am not going into the examples I have here today—is to keep the tax collectors poor, and not allow them to have more than is necessary within reasonable limits of expenditure. I think the time has come to say to the government: You must do away with unnecessary taxation and give the Canadian people a break. Remove the sales tax on necessities such as household appliances, clothing, prepared foods and the like in order that a contribution may be made by the government to a reduction in the cost of living. Unless we are to encourage smuggling over the next few months, and in spite of the minister having said a day or so ago in Montreal that he did not intend to do anything regarding taxation reduction at the present session, the time has come to make provision for the immediate removal of the additional taxation imposed on cigarettes and tobacco at the last session. Second, after securing the approval of the governor in council the government should ask parliament to reduce unnecessarily high taxation, in the form of the sales tax on necessities, to levels consistent with requirements for government expenditures.

I shall now refer to an example of the kind of thing that arouses the Canadian people. The government is spending with almost profligate ease, taking from the Canadian people hundreds of millions of dollars more than are necessary; but what solicitude over a citizen in Manitoba who owed the government $5.76. I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is not here. Last Friday week the court of appeal of Manitoba brought down a judgment. It is one that governments can read with profit to themselves. This citizen's name is William Wood. On October 14, 1950, a letter was sent to him by the unemployment insurance commission stating that he owed $5.76 in insurance stamps, and twenty-four hours was given him within which to make up this terrible depredation at the expense of the Canadian people. He paid within twenty-four hours. On February 19, 1951, a charge was laid against him for not having paid the amount when he should have paid it. It was tried before the police magistrate on March 30, 1951, who dismissed the charge. Would you not have thought that was far enough to drag an honest taxpayer along the way of litigation?

The crown took him to the county court on an appeal and the hearing was held some months later. The county court judge dismissed the appeal. I do not want to mention this out of respect for the profession, but the Minister of Justice employed lawyers on the case, and against a man who dared to owe the Canadian people $5.76. The appeal was dismissed. Was the department satisfied? They went to the appeal division of the high court of Manitoba, and when you get into the high court, costs do mount. Last Friday week the court of appeal of Manitoba handed down its judgment dismissing the appeal. Mr. Justice Adamson and Mr. Justice Montague were in favour of dismissing it while Mr. Justice Coyne dissented. Mr. Justice Adamson said that the county court judge was correct in dismissing the appeal. Referring to the letter as a result of which Mr. Wood paid the $5.76 within twenty-four hours, Mr. Justice Adamson said:

> That letter and the immediate compliance . . . should have been taken as settling the matter. That is what any reasonable or fair person would have considered the letter meant. However, the complainant Rudd, on behalf of the commission, then laid this charge and has seen fit to press it through three courts. The respondent has remedied his fault—he owes no money. The charge was purely technical . . .

Apparently there is a threat that the crown is going to carry the case to the Supreme Court of Canada because, Mr. Speaker, there is some principle at stake. I ask that the responsible minister put an end once and for all to this nonsense of treating a taxpayer in this way who remedied his default within twenty-four hours; and that is what the court of appeal said. Mr. Justice Coyne, who dissented, said:

Further litigation would be still more unfortunate and not conducive to justice.

However, he said in his dissent that he felt the man had done wrong and he would have imposed a fine of $1 without costs. The court by a majority dismissed the case. When, on the one hand, you see a government unjustifiably spending—and I could mention examples of recent months, but I am not going to because there will be another opportunity to deal with the question of over-expenditure and unjustifiable expenditure—you understand why the Winnipeg Tribune on Monday last had an editorial entitled "Poor show by Ottawa Brass". The editorial reads in part:

What we would like to know and what a lot of people would like to know is how much these three trials cost the commission in court costs and lawyers' fees.

I think it would be most interesting to ascertain what was the amount of that wasteful expenditure.

I am asking the government at this present session to end this national scandal of cigarette smuggling that is taking place and that is resulting in law-breaking by thousands, while at the same time the little fellow in Manitoba for $5.76, which he paid when notified, is dragged through three courts in order to maintain the dignity of the law. If the dignity of the law is to be maintained for $5.76, there are immeasurably greater reasons for assuring the maintenance of the dignity of the law of this country by enacting legislation at this session to remove the extra tobacco taxes that have caused wholesale bootlegging and law-breaking. By doing so the house will be actually increasing the revenues of the Minister of Finance for the next several months of the fiscal year. At the same time, if parliament removes the sales tax in so far as necessities are concerned and the surtax on income tax, it will be doing something to restore equilibrium between what the actual costs of running government and defence will be and the amount of taxes that should be taken from the Canadian people.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), that the following words be added to the amendment:

And further regrets that Your Excellency's advisers continue to collect unnecessarily high taxes beyond requirements and have failed at the present session of parliament to relieve the people from unnecessary, burdensome and unjustified taxation.

Mr. Speaker: The question I must determine is whether the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre is in order. It is necessary that an amendment which is moved at this time should be relevant to the amendment as amended. I am not sure that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre is relevant to that amendment. I am not making a ruling in advance, but it seems to me that it might be more appropriate if this amendment were moved when the main motion as amended is presented to the house. I shall be glad to hear hon. members on it.

However, perhaps we might consider it from a practical point of view. May I just for a moment do something that is probably a little unusual, and refer to the ruling which I made last Wednesday on the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater). Hon. members will recall that in making my ruling at that time, I said I had had very little time to study the precedents. I did refer to the fact that I could find only one instance in which a similar amendment had been moved. The other day, when I was reading Beauchesne's third edition, I ran across a ruling which was made by Mr. Speaker Lemieux on June 26, 1926. I find that a similar amendment was moved at that time. It is interesting to note that the amendment which was moved at that time, and which struck out all the effective words of the amendment which was then standing, was moved by Mr. Woodsworth, who at that time represented the riding of Winnipeg North Centre. Apparently it has been characteristic of the people of that riding to send to parliament men who have a very keen appreciation of the rules of this house. I recall that last Wednesday the present member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) argued against the regularity of the subamendment. I would like him to read the amendment which was moved in 1926.

On Wednesday of last week it was said that hon. members might not have an opportunity of voting on the subamendment which was then before the house; but if members will read the words of the Speaker which appear on page 629 of Beauchesne's third edition they will see that he also considered that question

Since my ruling of last week was an important one, with the permission of the house may I refer in this debate to my ruling of last Wednesday, that is, to correct my ruling by referring to the debate that took place in 1926. I think it might be helpful on some future occasion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I must dispose of the present amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Probably it should be moved, to be in order, on the main motion as amended. However, I think for all practical purposes it might be better to dispose of this question now. The hon. member for Lake Centre has made an address on the subject. I see that the Minister of Finance is in the house. He rose as if he were prepared to speak. Probably it would save the time of the house, without this being considered a precedent, if the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre were allowed to stand.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no quarrel with your ruling on the procedural matter. I had not given it any consideration myself. Whatever the strict legality of the matter may be, I agree with the views you have expressed that it might be well to dispose of the question now. I have not had occasion to speak to the house for some little time. In view of a good deal of what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, it would seem that this is perhaps an appropriate opportunity to do so. I appreciate his courtesy in withholding the comments which he had to make today until I could again be in the house.

He has raised some very important questions, raised them with his usual force and vigour. They are questions which merit a reply, and that reply I intend to give this afternoon.

At the outset let me hasten to state the obvious. It is clear, of course, that the revenues which have been accruing to the treasury during the first seven months of the year are substantially in excess of those which I estimated when I delivered my budget speech last spring. It is clear also that expenditures, particularly in defence, are not running at the full rate which was contemplated at that time. Nevertheless, the criticism which has appeared with respect to the surplus which is accruing, and the alleged overtaxation, implies necessarily that in submitting these estimates last April I must have been either dishonest or incompetent. I concede readily that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) would not suggest for a moment that I possess the first of these qualities, and I doubt whether he would press very hard the second one. Nevertheless I think that is the necessary implication of the charges that have been made in some other places.

Let me say this at the outset, Mr. Speaker. In the estimates I have placed before the house in the five years that I have been Minister of Finance, every estimate has been made with complete honesty, without mental reservations, and based upon the best technical advise available to me, either within or outside the government service. Moreover, I have made a practice of disclosing fully and frankly in my budget speech, and in the accompanying papers, the basis of my statistical estimates. In every budget I have explained and emphasized the difficulties of forecasting. I do not need to tell the house again, because I have done it before, that estimates of expenditures have to be forecast some fifteen to eighteen months before the end of the year to which they refer. Right now we are, of course, in the middle of preparing and compiling our estimates for the coming fiscal year which will end on March 31, 1953.

On the revenue side, the Minister of Finance brings down his forecast of revenue in March or April. As a rule these forecasts are based on statistics, the latest of which are available for January or February, and many of them are still only preliminary estimates for December. So that as a consequence the forecast of revenue must look fourteen or fifteen months ahead. These forecasts are all subject to a change in price levels, shifts in imports and exports, the ups and downs of employment and investment, and other unforeseen changes in the economic climate both at home and abroad.

If hon. members will cast their minds back they will recall that almost every year, far from being charged with being too pessimistic in my forecasts, I have been charged with being too optimistic. I well remember that as late as March 1950 my hon. friend the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) charged me with being unduly optimistic. He pointed out that a small change in my estimates for that year, a small change in business conditions, could result in a deficit rather than a surplus. On the average, over the past four years, performance has exceeded forecast by just about 12 per cent. My revenues, over this period of unprecedented prosperity in the history of Canada, have on the average exceeded expenditures by about 12 per cent. Expenditures are much more easily forecast because they are more directly under our control than are revenues. In the past four years actual results have exceeded forecasts by only about 4 per cent. All governments at all levels have been faced with these same difficulties, and I have been far from alone in underestimating revenues during the period to which I refer. In the fiscal years ending in 1951 actual revenues exceeded forecasts in the case of some provincial and other governments as follows: Ontario, 16 per cent; Quebec, 19 per cent; British Columbia, 17 per cent; Alberta, 40 per cent; United States, 29 per cent. This is against the average which I mentioned in the case of federal revenues of approximately 12 per cent.

As the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out, this year I forecast our revenues at $3,730 million. I told the house explicitly that this was based on the following assumptions: First, high employment; second, average crops; third, a price level not much higher than in April; fourth, gross national production of $20 billion. In my budget speech I went on to say that should production and incomes continue to rise beyond that level—as they well might—I should expect my forecast to be exceeded. Should they not go quite that high, our revenues could fall short of the estimates I was submitting. This figure of $20 billion was based on careful studies prepared by experts in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it compared with a gross national product the preceding year of $17·5 billion. In other words, it assumed an increase during the coming year of 12 per cent over 1950, as compared with increases of 6 per cent and 8 per cent respectively in the two preceding years.

I said that of that estimated 12 per cent increase in gross production, about half was estimated to be in price increase and about half in volume. It now seems reasonably certain that our 1951 gross national production will be something over $21 billion, or an increase of about 18 per cent. In other words, it is about 6 per cent higher than I forecast. There have been greater increases in both price and volume than either my officials or I expected, or that any other responsible person could have estimated. I would not have believed it possible we could continue to increase our gross national production at the rate we have during the past four or five years. Therefore, unless there are other unforeseen changes—which I do not expect—I anticipate that our revenues next March 31 will exceed my forecast by about 8 per cent or 9 per cent, or by some $300 million to $350 million.

As I have said, normally our expenditures are much easier to forecast accurately, but this year there have been some unusual problems. Apart from defence, and the new universal old age pension payments which will start on January 1, it looks as though our expenditures will exceed our forecasts, but only by 3 per cent or 4 per cent, and this in spite of higher construction costs than I had expected, and the further increases in salaries and in the pay of armed forces and the R.C.M.P. which will be announced shortly. Hon. members will do well to recall, in comparing last year's expenditures with this year's expenditures, that government costs have increased in the same ways other costs have increased. If you take into account these factors and the increases in the salaries and wages, and government services, it would have been a fairly creditable achievement to have held our non-defence expenditures at the level of last year. In fact, that would mean an appreciable reduction in government services.

As to defence expenditures, the actual expenditures on defence for the year which will end on March 31 were most difficult to forecast. A year ago at this time, when the armed services were presenting their estimates to the members of the treasury board, they honestly thought they could usefully spend a good deal more than the $1·7 billion which parliament voted. So far as we were concerned, it was not a disagreement on needs or speed. It was a matter of judgment as to how much could be procured or constructed in that twelve-month period. As the house knows, the final amount which was voted by parliament for defence was approximately $1·7 billion.

To my personal knowledge every country is finding it most difficult, almost impossible, to carry through its planned defence program at the planned rate; and we are certainly no exception to that general rule. Those parts of our program which are wholly within our own control are well up to schedule, but such matters as construction, which depends on imported steel or imported equipment, and on equipment and supplies which must be procured in the United States or elsewhere, either in finished form or in the form of key components, are behind schedule. The services hope, of course, that they can catch up a good part of that lag before March 31, but it is clear to me now that the defence votes which parliament appropriated last year will most certainly not be fully spent before the end of this year, although commitments will have been incurred which will fall due for payment in coming fiscal periods.

In saying that we have been delayed by inability to obtain certain essential supplies from outside, I am not casting any criticism, of course, on the United States or on any other country from which we have to obtain these materials. It is a common problem, one which is shared by all of us. We have to take our place in the agreed production schedule, and having regard to the world situation we cannot always claim first priority.

What is this surplus that we have heard so much talk about? I must confess that I have been somewhat surprised at what seemed to me to be the rather naive and erroneous inferences drawn from our monthly statements by people who really ought to know better. The monthly statements of the comptroller are, of course, completely accurate summaries of each month's revenues and expenditures. But surely all hon. members know better than to take one or three or six months' figures and multiply by 12 or 4 or 2. A most elementary checking back on published figures would save people from some of these erroneous inferences.

Revenues, of course, come in fairly evenly throughout the year, since income taxes were placed on a pay-as-you-earn basis. There is normally a slight slump in the summer and a moderate peak in the final quarter of the fiscal year. But expenditures are highly irregular and they have a pronounced seasonal pattern. They do not occur in a regular 8 per cent a month or a regular 25 per cent a quarter. The house will be interested to know that the past three fiscal years show the following average quarterly pattern:

April to June, 17 per cent of total annual expenditure.

July to September, 21 per cent of total annual expenditure.

In other words, approximately one-third of your total expenditures come in the first six months of the year.

October to December, 22 per cent of total annual expenditure.

January to March, 40 per cent of total annual expenditure.

The low figure for the first quarter and the very high figure for the last quarter show perhaps the most conspicuous feature of that pattern. That is due to two long established accounting practices in the government service.

By statute all payments actually made in April on account of expenditures properly incurred prior to March 31 are charged back into March. That means that the comptroller's figure for April budgetary expenditures covers barely half a normal month, while his March figure is, as a rule, about double a normal or average month.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The second point is that the whole of certain large annual expenditures such as deficits on government-operated railways and the like, government contributions to the superannuation fund, interest on numerous trust funds and the like, and on post office savings accounts, reserve against active assets and these other items are charged at the end of the fiscal year. The net effect of these two practices is that the month of March normally shows expenditures which are equal to those of any three other months.

All these figures are available from the comptroller's monthly statements and from tables which are in the public accounts.

If the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) will take the trouble to refer to page 18 of the public accounts for 1951, for example, he will see that last year our October month-end surplus was $363 million, that the peak month-end surplus rose to $649 million in January, but that our final surplus was $211 million. So that if I did not have a fairly substantial surplus by the end of October or November, it would be quite clear that I would be bound to run into a substantial deficit at the end of the fiscal year.

As the house is well aware, our accumulated budgetary surplus for the first seven months of this year stood at approximately $605 million, compared with $363 million at the same period last year. That does not mean, of course, that we have on hand an extra $605 million in cash because, in addition to our ordinary or budgetary expenditures, we have had to lay out the following funds:

	Millions
Loans to or investments in housing, railways, farm loans, foreign exchange reserves, etc.	$293
Cost of replacing defence equipment supplied from stock to NATO countries	74

The house will recall when we transferred existing equipment to some of our allies in NATO, we set up a credit in a special account for the value of that equipment and that can be drawn against to purchase new equipment, but that represented a cash outgo but is not reflected as a disbursement in our books in the year in which the cash is paid out. The other items are:

	Millions
Redemption of international bank demand notes	$ 7
Net reduction in matured debt	16
Redemptions of Canada savings bonds and of war savings certificates	131

After taking care of these obligations we have left only $84 million out of our $605 million budgetary surplus.

We also have non-revenue cash receipts, such as purchases of annuities, deposits in post office savings accounts, loan repayments by other governments and so on, amounting in all to about $124 million, so that our actual cash on October 31 was $208 million above April 1.

Perhaps I might add here that during November we paid off $523 million of debt, but we borrowed $492 million, largely Canada savings bonds which were the only new borrowing during that period, or a further net use of cash of $31 million to reduce debt.

Mr. Adamson: What were the securities paid off?

Mr. Abbott: I have not the figures here now, but they are readily available. As anyone who is familiar with conditions as they exist today knows, as things have turned out in New York, in London, as well as in Canada, we can congratulate ourselves, I think, that we have had a substantial surplus so far for this year; because if we had not had a surplus we would have been obliged to borrow additional new money to the tune of $300 million to finance housing, the C.N.R., and other government loans and investments, and another $200 million to meet maturing debt, or $500 million in all.

Those who know something about the bond market will realize that the marketing of an additional $500 million of new bonds during recent months would have had to take one or the other of two forms. Since there is no pool of idle savings in Canada, the sale of $500 million of Canadian federal government securities would have diverted an equivalent amount of savings away from private investment in housing, in municipal improvements, in hydro, or in oil or iron developments and the like. If there had been that much less private capital investment, obviously we would have had less employment, less imports, less revenue and a much smaller budgetary surplus. That would have been one way to get $500 million.

Alternatively we could have borrowed $500 million from the banking system. But that would have been straight inflationary financing under existing conditions; and I well remember the strong disapproval voiced by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) in August of last year when, for good and sufficient reasons, we temporarily financed a $200 million inflow of United States funds by borrowing $200 million from the banks.

So that our current surplus has been, in part, a reflection of inflationary pressure. But had we had no surplus the effects of those pressures on price levels would have been very much more startling than they have been.

Those who may have taken the trouble to examine the details of the public accounts will have noticed that there have been only two successions of years since confederation when we have significantly reduced our public debt. The first was after world war I, in the period 1923-29, when during most of that time my predecessor Mr. Robb was minister of finance. We had a succession of surpluses during those years totalling $276 million. Those surpluses equalled about 10 per cent of our revenue in those years, and during that period of time we reduced our debt by about 11 per cent from its peak.

The second period during which we have reduced our debt has been the years commencing with 1947, since your humble servant has been Minister of Finance. In those five years we have had surpluses averaging about $375 million a year, or about 13 per cent of our revenue in those years. Those were the most prosperous years in Canada's history, and if one is ever to achieve any reduction in the national debt, then surely it is wise to do so during a period of prosperity.

As a matter of fact, as of last March we had reduced our net debt by about $2 billion or approximately 15 per cent, during the period to which I have referred. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has referred to existing taxation, and made reference in particular to the additional taxes imposed on tobacco. I am not going to deal in detail with the various suggestions he has made concerning reductions in this tax. I wish to say this, that as a general rule I think it is desirable that tax changes should be made once a year. It is extremely embarrassing for the business community to be in a period of uncertainty, wondering whether commodity taxes in particular are going to go off or go on at varying periods of the year. I departed from that principle on two occasions, one of which was at the beginning of the war in Korea and the second when we dissolved prior to the passing of a budget. But, speaking generally and referring to the general principle, I think it is undesirable that tax changes should be made more often than once a year, and I have no intention of recommending any changes in the tax structure until the budget presentation next spring.

The tobacco tax is a tax imposed for revenue. It is not imposed to prevent people from smoking. My hon. friend has rightly pointed out that, in respect of commodity taxes, as in other things, one can run into the law of diminishing return. The question of the tobacco tax, as in the case of all other taxes, will be considered between now and the presentation of the budget next spring. If it is desirable at that time to make any change, that change will be made. But I would caution hon. members against jumping to too quick conclusions about the effect of the additional tax. Unquestionably the consumption of cigarettes in particular is down. That is probably due in part to the increase in tax, in part to the increase in price made by the manufacturers of cigarettes, and in part to the accumulation of inventories prior to the budget, both because it was felt that the tax might be raised, as indeed was the case, and also because in the case of one large producer labour troubles were anticipated and later developed.

Mr. Fraser: And smuggling.

Mr. Abbott: The question of smuggling is a very important one. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that when a tax or any other impost is pushed to the point where there is too great an incentive to break the law, then that situation should be pretty carefully considered. I can assure him and other hon. members that, between now and budget time, revenue officials will do their best to see that smuggling is kept down to a minimum.

That is the picture. I have nothing for which to apologize in my budget of last year. I have said fully and frankly that revenues have exceeded my expectations. But in the light of the responsibilities we have before us, and in the light of the inflationary pressures which exist today, I take pride in the results which have been achieved. And so far as I am concerned I am quite prepared to leave the verdict to time.

If one travels outside Canada, as I and a good many hon. members have, I am sure they will find, as I did, that Canada's record in the fiscal and economic sphere is considered as one which, without indulging in any overstatement, compares very favourably with that of any other country. Therefore, I deny, Mr. Speaker, that there has been any overtaxation of the Canadian people, and I am quite prepared to stand by the fiscal proposals I made last April. When next March or April comes we will see then what has to be done.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I comment on the new subamendment, and before I make reference to a further matter which I wish to discuss, perhaps I might be permitted to offer a comment on the position you have taken, sir, with respect to the subamendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). As I listened to you it seemed to me that you said quite clearly two things. In the first place, you expressed the view that this subamendment would have been more in order as an amendment to the main motion as amended, when we reach that stage. With that I fully agree. But you also expressed the view that since the same practical result is obtained by deciding now whether or not this additional regret is to be added, it might be just as well for the house to give its decision now on the substance of the matter, rather than to have a long debate on procedure.

I agree with your judgment and your wisdom in that matter; and I offer as evidence in support of the position you have taken the fact that the record of the decision to which you called the attention of the house, namely that of Mr. Speaker Lemieux on June 26, 1926, occupies twenty full pages in Beauchesne's third edition. That is to say, it took twenty pages to record the important parts of the debate on that point of order and the Speaker's decision. In other words, had we at this time got into a debate as to the propriety or otherwise of the subamendment, we might have had to amend the hours of sitting still further in order to finish this session's business before Christmas.

Perhaps while I am saying a word about this decision I might point out that although we were interested in your reference to Mr. Woodsworth, the point of order did not relate to Mr. Woodsworth's subamendment itself. Mr. Woodsworth's subamendment to Mr. Stevens' amendment apparently was not questioned but was defeated by a vote of 117 to 115. Then there was a subamendment by Mr. Fansher which carried, and then there was a later attempt to move another subamendment at a point corresponding to the point at which we now find ourselves. That was made by Mr. Rinfret and a long procedural argument developed. Mr. Speaker Lemieux finally ruled in favour of Mr. Rinfret's subamendment. So far, that would seem to indicate that there might be propriety in the subamendment being moved at this time.

On the other hand, and this is rather unique, in Beauchesne's third edition at page 630 we find in small print at the end of that long recital a letter to Dr. Beauchesne written by T. Lonsdale Webster, who was then Clerk of the British House of Commons. This was in reply to an inquiry which it appears Dr. Beauchesne had sent to Mr. Webster, and it would seem from Mr. Webster's reply that he had some doubt about Mr. Speaker Lemieux's ruling. I note with interest the last sentence of Mr. Webster's letter, which reads:

> So far as Mr. Rinfret differed from Mr. Woodsworth, he should, I think, have moved amendments by way of additions to Mr. Stevens' amendment when that amendment became the substantive question.

I shall not add to the confusion, as I think I have demonstrated my point with these few references. Had Your Honour decided to entertain a procedural debate as to whether or not this subamendment is in order at this time we would have been here for quite a while. After all, at some point or other, either now or later, an amendment of this kind would be in order, and I think it is well that the house be given an opportunity to decide on the substance of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and that is what you, sir, have done.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre and I listened also with interest and attention to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he tried to answer the charge, both in the hon. member's speech and in the amendment, that there is unnecessary taxation in this country at the present time. Despite all the figures he produced, despite the reference to the way in which money comes in at one time of the year more heavily than at another, frankly I could not see that the Minister of Finance was able to offset the fact that the present rates of taxation are taking from the Canadian people sums of money greatly in excess of what is really needed, and at a time when our people are having an exceedingly difficult time to meet the still rising cost of living.

At the end of his remarks the Minister of Finance indicated what he believed to be the principle to be followed in matters of taxation. If I heard him correctly he said he believed that as a general rule there should be tax changes only once a year. I want to say that the Minister of Finance and the government have another rule regarding tax changes. That rule is that there are to be tax reductions only once a parliament, and the time for those tax reductions is just before an election.

The Minister of Finance referred to this himself when he gave the exceptions to the rule of making tax changes only once a year. He said there had been two occasions when he had broken that rule, one being when taxes were increased because of the situation in Korea and the other, as he put it, in that interesting year of 1949 when parliament was dissolved before the budget was adopted. For a few years prior to 1949 the practice was to build up surpluses. That was part of the government's theory of cyclical budgeting. Suddenly when we were on the eve of an election that theory was thrown out the window and it was considered desirable to give the Canadian people substantial reductions in taxation just before an election.

We are back in the same cycle again. It would be interesting to find out just what point in the cycle we have reached. The government is still building up surpluses. Of course nothing is more risky in the political field than to make predictions, but I shall make the prediction that these surpluses will continue to mount until the eve of the next election. On the eve of the next election these surpluses will be used to bring about reductions in taxation.

When the minister brings down his budget in March or April of next spring, if there are substantial tax reductions because of this huge surplus to which attention has been drawn we will all know what it means. It will mean an election in June, 1952. If next year the Minister of Finance in his budget speech continues to assert his belief in the desirability of draining off these surpluses so as to pay off more of the national debt, we will know that the election is not yet.

Mr. Abbott: I may fool you.

Mr. Knowles: It will be very interesting to see what happens, but I believe the rule will hold so far as this government is concerned, that taxation changes should be made only once a year and taxation reductions are to be made only once a parliament, and that just before a general election.

The subject about which I wish to have something to say at this time is not unrelated to the fact that the government has quite a pool of money on hand just now, but it is a little different in nature. I refer to the plight of the retired pensioners of Canadian National Railways. This is a matter which some of us have raised on several occasions this session by means of questions on the orders of the day. We have asked whether the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) would soon be in a position to announce general changes in the pension structure of Canadian National Railways. In particular we have asked whether there would be any increase in the pensions of Canadian National employees already retired.

Thus far the only answer we have been able to get from the Minister of Transport is to the effect that he has not yet been advised as to what is the situation, but when he does get that information he will communicate it to the house. Let me read the answer he gave on one occasion which in substance is the same as the answer he has given every time. When the minister was replying to a question of mine on November 15 he said, as reported on page 1044 of Hansard:

> I can only reply to that, as has already been stated in the house, that Canadian National Railways pension rules are now under reconsideration, and my understanding is that the brotherhoods and the railways are discussing changes in the pension rules. I have not been advised what they are; but when I am, I should be in a postiion to give information to the house.

I emphasize the word "information". That is what the Minister of Transport has indicated he might be in position to give to the house this session. Information is sufficient if it is the right information, but I wish to point out that in my view the responsibility of the Minister of Transport and of the government goes further than the desirability of imparting information to this house.

I base that claim on certain statements that were made at the last session of parliament by the minister. He and others will remember that we had quite a series of debates here and elsewhere on the question of Canadian National pensions during the last session of parliament. Those in the house who took part in that debate were the Minister of Transport, on the government side, and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I in the main on this side of the house. In addition to the discussions we had in the house there was a discussion of the whole question in the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. One of the features of the discussion in the committee, and later in the house, was a certain letter which had been addressed jointly to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and myself by a trade union official on behalf of some of the interested employees. Copies of that letter were sent to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and to the president of the Canadian National Railways. It was thought by them that the letter was a suggestion to us that we should not be pressing this matter too much in parliament. I want to come back to that in a moment. I point out to the minister and to others that I now have before me a copy of a further letter written by the same Mr. A. A. Hutchinson, who is general chairman of the order of railroad telegraphers, urging the Canadian National employees affected to get in touch with their members of parliament and to get them to put pressure upon the government here in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the date of that letter?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The date of this letter is October 3, 1951. It is included in a mimeographed circular letter sent out by the general chairman of the brotherhood of railroad trainmen. It is a very interesting letter of three full pages which goes into the whole question of what is likely to happen with respect to Canadian National pensions. In the letter Mr. Hutchinson says, in reply to retired C.N.R. pensioners who are pleading for some adjustment of their position, that there was a meeting of the vice-presidents with the general chairmen and that certain recommendations were made to the C.N.R. board of directors which were considered at their January meeting. Then he says:

> We have no official information as to what was recommended but unofficially we do understand that the board did make certain recommendations in regard to changes which would have been beneficial and these recommendations were submitted to the Hon. Mr. Chevrier, Minister of Transport, for government approval.

Then there is another paragraph comparing the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway with its responsibility to its shareholders and that of Canadian National Railways with its responsibility to parliament. Then there follows this paragraph:

> We understand that the government refused to give approval to the recommendation of the board of directors and gave as the reason that "it would be contrary to declared public policy" as set out in a press release dated January 23, 1948 . . .

And so on. At the last session the Minister of Transport and the president of Canadian National Railways accepted Mr. Hutchinson as an unqualified authority, and I did not object to their doing so. The point I wish to make at this juncture is that it appears from Mr. Hutchinson's letter, which, as I say, is being widely circulated amongst Canadian National retired employees who are concerned about their plight, that the Canadian National board of directors did make a recommendation that something be done with respect to the plight of retired C.N.R. pensioners. But it is also clear from Mr. Hutchinson's letter that so far as they can ascertain the recommendation made by the C.N.R. board of directors was turned down by the government.

Therefore, as I said a few moments ago, the Minister of Transport and the government have a greater responsibility than merely that of imparting information to this house. The minister is not just an errand boy to tell us what the Canadian National has decided. The minister is the person who, with his colleagues in the government, makes the final decision as to whether or not anything is to be done on behalf of retired C.N.R. employees. I remind the Minister of Transport that he took that position in the house last April 27 when we were debating this whole question. I am looking at page 2459 of Hansard for that date, and I note that he said:

> This is first and foremost a matter for Canadian National Railways and its employees to decide, and that is exactly what Mr. Hutchinson says. That is exactly as it should be, because parliament has authorized the Canadian National Railways management to deal with problems such as this.

I agree it is first and foremost a C.N.R. matter, to be settled with the employees, but the Minister of Transport went on to say:

> But if it turns out that they are unable to deal with their employees and they make representations to the government with reference to the matters to which my hon. friends have referred, then I think it is not only the duty but the responsibility of the government to decide whether or not it will revise upwards or take no action with reference to this problem. Therefore I say, putting it in its proper light, that this is a matter which is now under discussion between the authorities of the Canadian National Railways and its employees. It is being given careful consideration by a joint committee of the employees and the officers. I think, as the letter states, we should at least give the committee a chance to see what it is possible to do. If they are not successful in dealing with it, then I think it will be the responsibility of the government if Canadian National Railways should decide to recommend to the government a plan upon which both will have agreed, or an alternative plan in case both cannot agree.

I agree with the position the minister took last April, namely, that the people to deal with this matter first of all are the railways on the one hand and the employees on the other. But the minister also said last April that if the railways come forward with a recommendation it is the government's responsibility to decide what to do with it. He also said if the railways and the employees cannot get together then it is the government's responsibility to make up its mind what is to be done in that situation. The reference of the Minister of Transport to a letter in the quotation I have just read is a reference to the letter from Mr. Hutchinson who at that time took the view that at that stage of the game this was a matter to be worked out between the employees and the company.

Now Mr. Hutchinson says in the further letter to which I have referred that the information which has come to them is that, whatever may be done with regard to changes in the basic plan, there is nothing in prospect by way of any increase or adjustment for C.N.R. employees who are already retired. Mr. Hutchinson says that in a further paragraph in his latest letter:

> We have been and still are proceeding to revise the pension rules and expect to have a new set of rules to put into effect soon, probably January 1, 1952, but these new rules will only apply to future pensions and will do nothing for those who go on pension before they take effect.

The same Mr. Hutchinson who was quoted by the minister and the president last April sees what these retired employees are up against, and he goes on to say:

> I feel quite sure that if C.N.R. pensioners are to get any consideration, other than that which is being given generally under bill 395—

That was last session's old age assistance bill.

> —that such consideration must be given by the government of Canada in its role as shareholder of the Canadian National Railways, and if your veterans associations are to accomplish any good I believe you will have to work through members of parliament who have influence with the government rather than through C.N.R. officials who do not seem to be able to apply their wishes to the problem. If the general chairmen's association can be of assistance we will be glad to do so but about all we could do would be to add the weight of our appeal to the members of parliament to your own appeals, as our appeals to the C.N.R. on your behalf have met with failure on account of government opposition.

That letter is signed by A. A. Hutchinson, representing the general chairmen's association in respect of pension matters. Mr. Hutchinson was regarded at the last session, I thought erroneously, as the government's chief witness in this whole matter. I regarded him as our witness, and now the matter is clear. There is the way Mr. Hutchinson now sees the position. He affirms that something should be done with regard to the basic pension plan so far as those still in the service are concerned. But, he says: "Despite our best efforts we could get nowhere by way of getting any changes for those who are already retired. We thought we had made headway with the board of directors, but that board has run into government opposition and so the only way you are going to get anywhere by way of any change is by persuading the government that something should be done for those men who are already retired". It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, before this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne comes to an end, I feel that I want to put this matter squarely up to the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I regret that the minister is not in his place. No doubt he is engaged in something that prevents him from being here. Just for the record I want to say that I did send him a note about an hour ago to the effect that I intended to raise this matter if I was able to get the floor. Nevertheless I hope that he will read these remarks and that he will take them into consideration. I have noted his positive statement across the floor of the house that as soon as he gets information as to what the Canadian National is going to do he will impart it to the house. Well, from Mr. Hutchinson's letter it would appear that that information is not going to be very helpful to those now retired. My fear is that we will not get that report until a day or two after parliament has prorogued. That often happens with respect to statements that are unsatisfactory. After we have gone home, and can no longer say anything about it here, an announcement is made. I hope that will not happen this time. Let us have the announcement now.

I have put these figures on the record so often I certainly should not do it again in any detail; but in passing may I just refer to figures that were placed upon Hansard on March 12, 1951, at pages 1129 to 1131, respecting Canadian National pensions. These figures were given in answer to questions that I had placed on the order paper. Just to pick out a couple of examples, they show that as at that date last spring 3,256 Canadian National pensioners were drawing a pension of only $25 a month. They also show that a total of 7,269 pensioners of the Canadian National Railways were drawing a pension of less than $40 a month.

One of the suggestions that has been made frequently when this debate has come up is that these people would get some assistance, some improvement in their position, when the old age pension legislation was sorted out, including old age security for those 70 and over and old age assistance for those between 65 and 69. Well, the old age assistance provided for those between 65 and 69 is really of no help to these people who already have a little something. The means test is there, and these men who have even a small pension from the Canadian National Railways will in most cases be precluded by that small pension from drawing old age assistance. So far as old age security improving the pension position of those 70 and over is concerned, I want to say I do not think that the government, or any other employer in this country, public or private, should use the fact that there is old age security as an excuse for crawling out from under its responsibilities to its retired employees. This is a responsibility which still rests on the employers of these people. The employer is the Canadian National Railways which the people of Canada own, and which is administered under the direction of the parliament of Canada. These are our employees, and our responsibilities to them are such that I do not feel we can continue to allow 3,256 of them to draw as their industrial pension only $25 a month, nor can we allow 7,269 of them to draw pensions from the railways, for whom they have worked, of less than $40 a month. This is a question separate from old age pensions. It stands on its own feet, and I insist that the federal government has a responsibility to deal with it properly.

[Mr. Knowles.]

As I say, prior to the circulation of this last letter by Mr. Hutchinson, some of us had ideas as to what was happening; but we did not have the evidence in black and white. But now Mr. Hutchinson says it is quite clear what has happened. The Canadian National Railways was prepared to do something for its retired employees, those already on small pensions, but any recommendation they made, whatever it was, says Mr. Hutchinson of the general chairmen's association, has been turned down by the government. And says he, "We, your trade union representatives, in our efforts on behalf of the retired employees have run into government opposition." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have raised the matter here to put the responsibility clearly where it now belongs, namely on this government and on the Minister of Transport who must be responsible for any recommendations in this field. It is not good enough to leave those pensions at those figures. That basic pension should be increased. It should be certainly a good deal more than $25 a month. Last spring when we were debating this I suggested it should be $40 a month. The cost of living has gone up since then. I would suggest that $50 a month is a more reasonable figure for that basic Canadian National Railways pension at this time, apart from the service pension and any other provisions. If a change in that basic pension could be made, on the understanding that it would apply to those who are now retired, it would be meeting to some extent at least the responsibility of the government to those people; and I make the plea as strongly as I can to the minister and the government that they deal with this matter right now.

It would seem from the terms of Mr. Hutchinson's letter that an announcement may be made before January 1, 1952, which is not very far away, concerning basic changes in the structure of Canadian National pensions. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a tragedy and most unfortunate if, when that announcement is made, nothing is said as to the position and the plight of those already retired, and I plead with the government to deal with this matter now so that any announcement which is made will include both groups. Let there be improvements for those still in the service; that too is most important. But right now it is imperative that there be an increase for those who are retired already, particularly those in the lower brackets.

I wish to say a few words in that same vein with respect to retired civil servants. As hon. members know this, too, is a question which I have raised a good many times. It, too, is a question which the Minister of Finance and others have said should wait until we have dealt with old age assistance and old age security. With respect to these retired employees I want to say the same thing I have said with respect to Canadian National employees, namely that it is not right for any employer, be he a private employer, the federal government or any other government, to crawl out from under its responsibility to pay proper pensions to its employees merely because the Old Age Assistance Act and the Old Age Security Act are now on the statute books of this country.

The last figures that I had with respect to retired civil servants are contained in sessional paper 102-C, which was tabled on March 12, 1951, in response to questions of mine which were made an order for return on Monday, February 19, 1951. This return gives a good many figures and a good many different brackets, but to pick out the significant ones I would point out that at that time—in March of this year—there were 9,877 retired federal civil servants. Of those 9,877 some 1,478 were receiving pensions of $39.99 a month or less. In addition there were 4,677 widows of retired civil servants drawing pensions provided by statute. Of those 4,677 considerably more than half, 2,647 to be exact, were drawing pensions of $39.99 a month or less. In other words, in both cases these are the numbers drawing pensions of less than $40 a month.

As hon. members and the Minister of Finance well know, this matter has been brought to their attention repeatedly. I have in my hand a copy of the correspondence exchanged recently between the association of superannuated civil servants at Toronto and the Minister of Finance. The letter to the minister contains a reference to the sympathy which the minister expressed for these people the last time a delegation met him, so the minister replied on October 11, 1951, that he still had that sympathy but he felt the retired civil servants should look for such improvement as they might want to the Old Age Assistance Act and the Old Age Security Act. Again, Mr. Speaker, we have here an example of an employer doing something which I believe is totally wrong, that is, crawling out from under his own responsibilities by virtue of a public statute.

I am sure that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) were to hear of any private employer doing anything like that because of the Old Age Security Act he would frown upon it. He would say that this pension, small enough as it is, is being given to everyone on a national basis, and does not take the place of the responsibility of a private employer. I suggest that that applies to the federal government as well. It is not good enough to tell these faithful servants of the federal government who are on these low pensions that the only supplement they can have is the means test pension between 65 and 69 if their income is low enough, or the pension which everyone receives at 70 years of age or over. There is a distinct responsibility there which has not yet been met. I plead with the government to give consideration to it.

There are other matters, Mr. Speaker, which occur to one at this time. Perhaps the way this debate is going this is not the last stage of this throne speech debate, so I shall leave the matter at that point. It seems to me, however, that His Excellency the Governor General will be glad his term was extended for an additional period of time so that he will be able when he leaves Canada to take away with him a unique address. As the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has pointed out, if the amendment as amended by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) is voted for when we reach that stage, it means that the address to be delivered to the governor general on this occasion will be an address which says, "Thank you very much, sir, for your speech. It was lovely, but —." It will be an interesting point for historians to discuss in the future, as to whether the amended address was a vote of confidence or not. It will be recognized, of course, that it was just a bit of a trick, really, to get around the necessity of voting on the amendment which was put forward by my colleague the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). However, at the moment we have before us the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre and I am glad the house will have an opportunity of voting upon the substance of that subamendment, dealing as it does with burdensome and unnecessary taxation.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): The hon. member who has just spoken will forgive me, I know, if I make no effort to follow directly his line of thought. I realize quite well that anyone who delays the house in this debate at this stage in the session is most certainly not going to add to his personal popularity with this house. Nevertheless I intend to take advantage of the opportunity presented by this debate to say a few words about my recent visit to Canada's fighting forces in the Far East. I believe I should do this, because I realize that when the opportunity came my way to accompany the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) on his trip to Korea, it was not accorded to me as an individual but as a member of this house. I feel, therefore, that anything I may have learned or any impressions I have gained should be given to this house and I would hope through this house to the country.

Let me assure hon. members that I am not going to discuss strategy in our conduct of the war. I do not feel qualified to talk on that subject. But I do feel qualified to say something about our men over there, having visited and talked with several hundred of them under actual battle conditions. I have a few notes here, but what I am going to give the house is a rambling account of our visit to these men and the impressions I gained from that visit. May I take a moment to tell hon. members that if at any time they are considering trying to find a travel companion for a visit to a battle area, they could look a long way before they would find a better one than the Minister of Fisheries. They will find that there is no terrain too difficult for him to cover; that there is no interesting spot which he will overlook; no person with whom one might converse with whom he will miss an opportunity to converse. But I should like to tell the house that he has one definite disadvantage in that he has an almost fatal attraction for enemy shellfire.

Our first contact with the forces was with the air force, who provided our transportation for the four days during which we travelled. I felt a little doubtful about the justification of some half dozen men and an airplane being tied up in order to take us around. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we accomplished a little practical good even there. The personnel of this aircraft remained with us throughout our visit to the various units, and had an opportunity of meeting some of the navy and seeing some of the army under actual battle conditions. Two or three of these men told me that they had a much higher opinion of the surface fighter than they had before they actually saw the army and navy under battle conditions.

As the house knows, in that part of the world our air force is restricted almost entirely to the transport command. It would hardly be correct, therefore, to say that we saw the airmen under battle conditions. But I must say it was impossible to spend four days with these men, more or less dependent upon them, without coming away with the usual impression with which one always leaves the air force. The first impression is the extreme efficiency with which they carry out all their duties, and the second one is the extraordinary courtesy which they always manage to show civilians, when I am sure there are many times they could wish the civilians much farther away.

Our first actual visit was to the navy, and I do not know whether I should mention the port in eastern Japan. We were fortunate enough to find two of our destroyers moored alongside each other, and I am told I might mention them by name, the Cayuga and the Sioux. We arrived there late at night and slept aboard. The following morning the ships' companies were assembled in the waists of the ships and the minister and I were able to speak to the men briefly over the public address system of both ships at the same time. This is another example of those discomforts, I suppose, which our men on active service undergo. After we had spoken over the P.A. system the men on both ships went to their mess decks and the officers went to their wardrooms; and escorted only by boatswains, we were able to visit the men in their mess decks. In other words there was not a commissioned officer around; the men could talk frankly and freely, and they did so.

Naturally the first thing one was looking for was evidence of morale. There had been so much talk about morale that I suppose it would be the first thing in the mind of any civilian who visited any of our forces in the Far East. All one can say about the morale of the navy—that part of the navy which is under actual fighting conditions at all times—is that it is absolutely tops and could not be improved upon. It is no exaggeration at all to say that the general atmosphere exuded by all the men aboard the ships was one of cheerfulness; and that was not something that was put on. They were naturally cheery fellows. When they had suggestions to make—and they had some—or personal "beefs" to bring forward, they always brought them forward with a bit of a sense of humour. They usually made a joke of even their complaints.

I asked about their mail. Their mail is coming through regularly and speedily. They told us to tell the people in Canada that there was only one trouble with the mail, and that was that they were not getting enough of it. I hope that thought may be passed on and given as wide circulation as possible. We talked about their supply of reading matter. They told me that they were well supplied with reading matter but—and this might surprise some hon. members—they said they could do with a little better diet than a constant one of "whodunits". I would not suggest to the people of Canada that they fill up our ships with Shakespeare or the Encyclopedia Britannica, but I would suggest that our men in the navy would like some of the better and more serious reading matter which is available in Canada.

Then they had a bit of a "beef"; it was not virulent, but they brought it to me several times. There had been considerable suggestion in Canada at one time or another that ours was largely a dry land navy. Shorn of its picturesque naval language, what these men asked me to do when I got back to Canada was to tell the people this: We have been at sea for 29 days out of every 30 since we came out here, and on the thirtieth day when we get on shore we are back on board ship at eleven o'clock at night—for reasons which are good, considering the nature of the port they are in. Your navy out there is a navy in every sense of the word.

In order that there might be no discrimination, we visited the wardrooms as well as the mess decks and, as this house would expect me to say, we found the officers on both ships to be an outstanding group of efficient, keen young Canadians. Doubtless it was because they are of that type that the morale amongst their men was so high. So after a short visit, which was only a matter of hours in duration, one comes away with the positive conviction that, so far as Canada's navy in the Far East is concerned, they are doing a worth-while, difficult and dangerous job and are doing it well; that the men are in good health and good spirits, and that they are not suffering from the lack of things which we might be providing for them but are not.

Naturally from my point of view, and I suppose from that of anyone else, the big thrill was to visit the forces actually in Korea. In so far as Korea is concerned, this is not a travelogue. I am going to pass up any description I might be tempted to give of the country, of the damage and of the appalling poverty which is evident there amongst the civilians, except just to refer in passing to the part Canada is taking in the relief of the Korean civilians. Mr. Speaker, it is a part as to which we may feel justifiable pride. That our contribution was the first cash contribution to that service is a fact of which we may feel extremely proud.

I should like to warn this house that the time is going to come before long when a great deal more will be needed than is being done at the present time. When that time comes, Canada should not hesitate to do much more. I know the conditions there are really appallingly tragic. For immediate relief UNCACK—the United Nations civil assistance commission in Korea—which is operating under the supervision of the United States forces is doing a fine job. It is doing as much, I suppose, as any such organization could do under present conditions to meet the poverty, the cold and the distress. It is getting to nearly all but not quite all those who need its attention. That brings to mind the fact that some stories were circulated—inspired, I think, in this country at one time—of the callous Canadian troops in Korea, of the brutal attitude adopted by the troops of Canada towards the civilians in Korea.

Let me tell you a little story which came to my attention while I was there. At Seoul we have a field dressing station in a former school building. Near that field dressing station is a Korean orphanage. To the horror of the Canadians serving in the field dressing station it was found that not long ago two small children in this orphanage died of exposure. As from that moment, to the extent that they can do so, the staff of our field dressing station are providing medical services at that orphanage, and the personnel of our Canadian army have dug up out of their own pockets $1,000 for relief and comfort for that orphanage. That shows that they are not callous or inconsiderate towards civilians. I ran into other incidents, but time will not allow me to go into them in detail. I can tell hon. members of this house quite genuinely that they can be just as proud of the character of their forces as of their fighting qualities.

In that connection I think we at home should consider carefully and tenderly the necessary monotony and discomfort experienced by those who have to serve behind the lines. While we think, quite rightly, of the heroism and sometimes the suffering of those in the actual forces, let us not forget the fact that conditions are extremely unpleasant, and they must be hard, for those who serve behind the lines in Korea without the stimulus—because it is a stimulus—of actual combat.

We visited the Canadian troops on the actual line north of the 38th parallel. Shortly after our arrival in that area we were taken by our brigade commander to an observation post on the top of a mountain almost, you might say, between the Canadian and Chinese lines, where for some two hours or more we were able to watch what was going on while the locations of the various Canadian units were pointed out to us; and while we were safe in a slit trench up to our necks we watched the effect of the artillery from both sides of the line, as well as tank fire from some of the Canadian tanks. We were there. We could hear the colonel or other observation officer transmitting back to the guns or to the tanks the actual location upon which the fire was to be directed. Then we could see, almost immediately, the fire being directed on those locations. We had good reason to see for ourselves and to appreciate the efficiency, accuracy and speed of the Canadian artillery and tank fire—and, I might mention, that of the enemy as well.

We then went back to those guns, and to some of the tanks, and saw the same performance in reverse. We were back at the guns when the instructions from the observation post came in. We saw the speed and efficiency with which the orders were handled, how the gunsights were corrected by some mathematical process which remains a mystery to me. In a matter of seconds there was the report back from the observation post as to where the fire had landed.

It was shortly after that, on our first day in the battle area that, due to the fact that the Chinese also have some pretty good artillery, and that our brigade commander had things to think of other than civilians in his hair, we were sent back some five miles to an area of comparative safety. But on the following day we returned to the front lines. It was then we had the privilege of meeting the Canadian infantry. We visited two out of three of the units in the advanced position. I am told that I may mention them by name. They were the R.C.R.'s and the Van Doos. Both these regiments were visited in their extreme forward positions, just at the back of the hills facing the enemy. The forward position of the P.P.C.L.I. we were unable to go to, due to the heavy artillery fire at the time.

We spent between one and a half and two hours with each of the infantry units, meeting every officer and man on the hill with the exception of those who were actually engaged in keeping their eyes on what the Chinese were doing. We went back farther to visit an advanced dressing station; and I would like to mention this advanced dressing station, because I think it would be of interest to hon. members. It had been moved forward to its then position only five days before. The station consisted entirely of tents. It was completely manned by army personnel; there were no nurses that far forward. This dressing station was a model of spotless cleanliness and quiet efficiency. If one had to be treated for wounds or illness out in the barrens of Korea, I doubt if anything could be put up which would give a greater feeling of confidence than that advanced dressing station being maintained some few hundred yards behind the Canadian lines. That, of course, is the second point for casualties. We did not get forward to the casualty clearing post right at the front line.

Near the advanced dressing station we visited the first rear echelon, "A" echelon of the R.C.R.'s. I should like to describe that camp briefly. It is known as Peterson's paradise, and is entirely a unit affair. As fast and as regularly as conditions allow the men of this unit are brought back from the front. This occurs roughly at ten-day intervals. They are brought to this echelon for a twelve-hour stay. There they have a hot shower bath; every stitch of clothing is taken away and replaced, not by new but by clean underwear and pressed uniforms. They have in the camp—and I do not know where they got them—a Korean barber and a Korean bootblack. A man who comes in has his bath, gets a fresh uniform, a shave and has his shoes shined and buttons polished, and for at least twelve hours out of the ten or twelve days he is a clean citizen again. There are picture shows running almost continuously. They have a certain amount of sports equipment, a softball field, and so on.

I find it difficult to imagine anything more that could be provided, within the range of enemy guns, than is being provided at "A" echelon of the R.C.R. battalion. I had the idea when I went there with a cabinet minister that, so far as possible, I would let the minister talk to the officers, the top brass, and I would try to circulate among the other ranks. I started out on that theory and to a considerable extent it was effective. The only point was that before I had been there very long I always found the minister also down among the other ranks.

The point I am trying to make is that I talked with as many as possible of the men we have out there. I did not know their names, and did not want to know them. They could talk to me absolutely without danger of being quoted. I wanted to find out what they thought, what they needed and what they wanted. I wanted to find out what their much-maligned morale really was. I found out.

Living conditions in the front line of a war can never be pleasant. Our infantrymen at the front are living on the tops of hills in Korea, in holes or tunnels from four to twelve feet deep, sand-bagged around the entrance, and deep enough—they believe and hope—to protect them from enemy mortar or shellfire other than a direct hit at the entrance. There they must live. There is nothing we can do about it, as long as we have men under wartime conditions. It is unfortunate that they must live under those conditions. Their bunkers or foxholes are reasonably warm. Fortunately, due to the terrain and the nature of the soil, there is no seepage. If the foxholes are well drained on the outside they can be dry on the inside. There is no mud on the walls or floors. They are clean, because the men who occupy them are clean and keep them clean. The water, of course, is not safe to drink until it has been chemically treated. Under those conditions they live; yet they maintain a cheerfulness which, quite seriously, would put to shame most members of parliament at the end of a three months' session. One would almost think—almost—that these fellows were up there on a picnic. But one does not talk to them very long before he realizes that they know just how serious a picnic it is. They do not hesitate to accept the responsibility that goes with that kind of undertaking.

I asked about their mail. It comes through from Canada in approximately nine days. They say they could do with more of it. Their statement is that while their families write to them fairly regularly, other people do not. I wonder if it would not be too much to hope that, if I were to mention this fact here, it might be broadcast further; and could one hope that those people in Canada who went to school with some of the troops in Korea, or held a job alongside some of them, would sit down once in a while and drop a note to those fellows. Do not necessarily expect them to find the time to reply. News from home is the one thing that they really crave. Another suggestion I should like to make, and I hope some organization across Canada will take it up, is with particular reference to those men who come from the little towns and communities where the local paper is published perhaps once a week. Put the home town boy on the home town newspaper subscription list. That is the sort of news our men really want.

There is only one thing that is weakening or can weaken the morale of our troops in Korea, and that is to attack them. I make that statement most seriously after having talked to a great many of them. I say to the press and the public of this country that any form of utterance belittling the morale of our men at the front is the one thing calculated to reduce that morale. Those utterances, those cartoons, those little statements have got back to the men in Korea. I know that because literally dozens of them mentioned it to me. I would be ruled out of order if I repeated the expressions they used in mentioning it to me, but the fact is that some of these men were hurt in their feelings and thereby not at all assisted in their efficiency when they thought that we back here in Canada should doubt their morale or their ability to cope with the conditions under which they find themselves.

I checked up, because I wanted to know, the needs of the men in connection with smoking, and this reminds me of cigarettes. I must correct an impression which seems to have grown up. There are no Australian cigarettes issued to our men in Korea. Australian cigarettes are issued to our men in the hospital at Kure, to which I shall refer in a minute, and at the commonwealth relief camp or base in Tokyo, both of which are administered through the commonwealth by Australia. I do not want anything I may say to deter anyone from continuing to send cigarettes to the boys in Korea, because they can use them. But I can tell you that the minister and I went to Korea with our pockets full of Canadian cigarettes. For my part I had taken them from Canada thinking they would be a treat. I found they were a drug on the market, because in Korea our men are issued with United States cigarettes. Not only do they have the Canadian cigarettes sent to them from home, they have them when they get out because there are places at which Canadian cigarettes can be purchased.

I do not want to make this controversial, but it occurs to me that at one time there was a suggestion in Canada that we should have a commonwealth brigade. To some extent that is what we have. It is an entirely commonwealth brigade in so far as it draws its supplies entirely from Australia, including cigarettes.

While at the front I asked time after time what we in Canada were not doing that the men there thought we should be doing. It is surprising, but I could not get a positive reply. I made inquiries about mail and cigarettes, and found that both those items were coming through regularly. What I want this house to know is that I made no effort over there to whitewash this government or any branch of it. I simply wanted to find out so I could come back here and from a back bench tell the people of Canada what they were not doing and what should be done.

I have found it most difficult to find anything at all. That there are things, I do not doubt; and that they will come to our attention from time to time is a certainty, but there was no noticeable need for anything that I could find. That is why I would like the mothers and wives and relatives of our men in Korea to know, because it is the truth, that their men are in good health and good spirits. They are tough like good leather is tough, and they are proud of that toughness. They are the best fed army in the history of the world, and to that we must give due credit to the United States because it is through them that we draw our issues.

Their rations include free issues of soap, smokes, razor blades, chocolate bars and other items. In the way of advice to the people of Canada, I repeat the three needs so far as the men actually on the battleline are concerned: write often and not only to the members of your family; send them the home town newspapers; criticize the government or the department if you will, but do not appear to be criticizing them.

At the conclusion of our little visit to the front we returned to Seoul and there the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) was presented with a medal ribbon—I think it came from the neck of a bottle of some description—in token of his having spent twenty-four hours under fire in Korea. I should like the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to bear in mind that when that ribbon was presented we were assured by the senior officers of the Canadian army that it was the only truly Canadian medal ribbon so far available indicating service in Korea. I am sure the minister will see that the condition is remedied before very long.

We also visited at Kure the British commonwealth overseas forces 29th general hospital. As our time was running short, the minister and I separated, and I visited this hospital alone. I had seen what we were doing in the way of temporary quarters in an old school at Seoul, and so had great pleasure in visiting this hospital at Kure. This had been built some years ago by the Japanese as a hospital so we started with a hospital building to go into. In general terms the casualties sent to this hospital are those whom it is expected will not be able to go back to their unit within fourteen days. In other words they are going to be hospitalized for fourteen days or more. Some are not sent to Kure for special reasons; they are flown to Tokyo, Honolulu or elsewhere. There were well over one hundred Canadian patients at the Kure hospital when I was there. There were two Canadian doctors and six or eight Canadian nurses on the staff. It is a truly commonwealth hospital staffed by Australians, people from the United Kingdom and Canadians. I would say that there, as in other places in the Far Eastern theatre, there is great room for more Canadian doctors and nurses. I talked individually to over one hundred Canadians in that hospital. Part of the time I was taken around by a Canadian doctor and part of the time by the matron, who is a Canadian. We stopped at the bed of every person who had a Canadian unit identification hung on the foot of his bed and I had a little chat with each one.

There were a few sad cases. It is perhaps no comfort to know that there must be cases of that description in any war. You cannot have a war without having some unpleasant and serious casualties. There were a few cases in that hospital which drew me up pretty short in my tracks for a few minutes, but I am glad to say that over 90 per cent of those in the hospital at that time will completely recover with no visible major maiming. Not all were battle casualties. There was a considerable proportion of accidental casualties, and some illness, although very, very little when you consider the conditions under which these people had been living.

Here again came up the question of morale. With the exception of the few cases to which I have referred the hospital was a cheerful, cheery place, and I am referring to the attitude of the patients. I asked them my old question: What are we not doing for you that we should do? I could get no positive reply, but people here may be interested in knowing the two questions asked me most often by Canadian patients in that hospital. The first was: Who is the leading contender for the Grey cup, and the second was: What is the weather like back home? These are the things about which these men are thinking. Their mail is coming through well and they are well supplied with cigarettes and reading matter.

I asked one fellow: "How are you making out"? He said, "All right. Why the so-and-so wouldn't we be? We have Canadian nurses." I should like other Canadian nurses to remember that, because I think we could use more of them. I want to tell you of one case, a lad with a broken elbow and other arm injuries caused by shrapnel. He was a young fellow from Montreal. He asked me what the weather was like in Montreal when I left Canada. I told him as best I knew and made some inane remark such as: "I suppose you are hoping soon to see it for yourself". He said: "Oh, no. I was only up on the hill for thirty-six hours when I stopped this one. I do not want to go home yet. We have a job to do." And there are people in Canada who have dared to talk about the low morale of the Canadian forces!

The hospital draws its supplies through the Australians, and as many of us know the Australians lean heavily to mutton. I was a little worried in chatting to one fellow who was flat on his back. He was giving me a long line of criticism about the endless diet of mutton. I thought he really had a genuine complaint until I suddenly discovered he had finally got a rise out of the man in the next bed, who was an Australian. That was typical of the hospital. The patients would kid back and forth among themselves. If they had a serious complaint they turned it into a joke.

You learn one or two lessons, or think you do, from a trip of that sort. Hon. members may recall that when this debate first started we had an eloquent speech by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Cauchon) in which he referred to national unity. I should like to tell the hon. member that if he wants to see national unity he should go to the battlefields of Korea and see the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Princess Patricia's and the Van Doos side by side. He should see them side by side in hospital beds at Kure. I can assure him that none of them care a bit whether a man first learned from his mother to speak French, English with a Scotch brogue, or Ukrainian and then came to Canada and learned one of the other languages. There you have national unity and national respect. I did not hear anybody from the Van Doos complaining because some colonel spoke English. I did not hear anybody from the R.C.R.'s or the P.P.C.L.I.'s complaining because other fellows, who were doing their share of the job, learned to speak French before they spoke English. There are no language difficulties over there. When you get down to the realities of life people have no time to worry about those factors which unfortunately at times would appear—and it is only an appearance—to disrupt our national unity.

One comes back from Korea very proud of the Canadian forces. One would not be human if after spending a few days there, seeing these men in action and hearing the Americans, Australians and others talk about them, one was not also very proud of being a Canadian. You cannot go out there, meet these fellows and see them on the line and in the hospitals without feeling pretty humble in the face of what they are and what they are doing, officers and men alike, army, navy and air force. As strongly as I know how I should like to make a suggestion to the members of this house, the press and the public of this country. First let me make it clear that so far as I am concerned there is no reason why anyone should hesitate to make constructive criticism whenever it is due. But—and I say this only because it was mentioned to me so often over there—give some thought to the effect what you are going to say or write will have on the men who are actually doing the fighting and living in the mud.

We in this house regard ourselves as public servants. We know that we and other public servants are fit subjects for criticism and public discussion. It might be said that the Canadian army and navy are also public services and therefore they should be criticized and discussed. I do not enjoy it when somebody undertakes to take me to pieces or explain where I have shortcomings as a member of parliament, but how much more hurtful it is for our soldiers and sailors to be taken to pieces to find out what is making them fall short of what they should be as soldiers and sailors when they are not falling short of what they should be at all. If you and I are criticized, Mr. Speaker, we have our right of reply here in the house. The men over there have no right of reply. They can make only one reply. If their morale is attacked it is a suggestion that they are not the type of soldiers they should be, and the only reply they can make is by a demonstration of the way they meet the enemy and put up with the conditions they have to face. I think they have made the reply and made it very effectively. I left Korea with one very strong impression, and that was that the best morale in Canada is in Korea.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I make no apologies for entering the debate at this late stage of the session. My remarks are based on the unemployment situation in the city of London and the surrounding district. On November 19 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg):

> I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what steps, if any, have been or are being taken to alleviate the serious mounting unemployment in London, Ontario.

At that time the Minister of Labour replied as follows:

> I do not think the seriousness of the unemployment situation is as great as my hon. friend implies in his question, but I can assure him that we are keeping in close touch wtih the situation.

This was on November 19, and ever since that day the unemployment situation has become more acute. I hold in my hand the figures as of December 1, issued by the national employment service in London, Ontario. Comparing them with the same date a year ago we see that on December 1, 1950, some 1,381 were unemployed. Today there are 2,857. This says nothing whatever about at least 800, and probably more, that are on a very short work week. It says nothing whatever about those who have not registered with the national employment service as being out of work. I want to point out to the house the industries that are most seriously affected, and I give them in the order in which they were given to me as those most seriously affected. The first is General Steel Wares, Adelaide street plant; second, General Steel Wares, York street plant; third, Kelvinator of Canada; fourth, General Motors diesel; fifth, Eaton Automotive Products

Limited; and sixth, Empire Brass Manufacturing Company. What I want to point out is the fact that all these companies are engaged in the processing of metals; in other words, they are firms that could be and should be producing the sinews of war.

In trying to arrive at the root causes of the situation two things of course come uppermost. One is the credit curtailment. We have inflation caused by this government; then where they turn around and try to fight it the men who are being injured the most are those in the industries that we need to keep operating to produce the munitions of war. The second cause is the shortage of steel. That of course goes back a long way. Steel is vital in our industrial life. Since I have mentioned that, I may say that I hold in my hand sessional paper 161, issued in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). It shows the imports of steel from the United States to Canada, and also the production in tons in Canada. Without going into detail about it may I say it shows that the imports from the United States have been going up consistently every month but one. Ten months of 1951 are shown in this return. It also shows that while there has been a slight increase in the production of steel in Canada, that increase is not very great. In fact it is hardly noticeable in our over-all production of steel.

I want to point out also that in the defence production report, issued for the period October 16 to October 31, 1951, only two defence orders went to the city of London in western Ontario, and those two together amounted to only $79,374. During that two-week period some $35 million worth of contracts were let in Canada. That does not of course include the $630,000 contract for the construction of a barrack block in the city of London. But I am pointing out that so far as steel and metals are concerned very few, if any, contracts came to the city of London. In fact one contract for $62,585 went to a paper box company, and the other for communication equipment amounted to $16,789. We have in the city of London a good many firms working in steel, yet we have idle men at a time when we are facing a relentless enemy and the sinews of war are steel. I would say that it is nothing short of criminal negligence to have idle men at a time like this when we are buying time, Mr. Speaker, in Europe and in Asia so the western world can prepare to meet the enemy, and also to prepare our defences.

Some will say the reason the companies in London are not working at full time, or that there is unemployment there, is the allotment of steel to essential industry, those industries that are working on war orders. Such is not the case, Mr. Speaker, because I know of one firm there which has 50 per cent of its men laid off. They are working on war orders, and the men have been laid off because they are not getting the steel.

Another angle that is pretty provoking is the fact that if a steel concern in Canada is affiliated with a United States firm they are able to secure prefabricated steel from the United States, while the purely Canadian firms are left holding the bag and their men are idle. This is a very serious situation. We are again on the short end of a bad deal as far as arrangements with the United States are concerned.

I want to point out to the house the export of vital war materials that we produce in Canada in abundance. I am just going to mention two of them, namely aluminum and copper. We find that in 1946 we exported aluminum to the value of $56 million, in 1950 to the tune of $106 million and in the first ten months of 1951 to the tune of $108 million. In 1946 we exported $37 million worth of copper; in 1950, $87 million worth, and in the first ten months of 1951, $66 million worth. The United States are receiving these vital war metals, but when it comes to steel coming back into Canada we are being given a rather raw deal. I bring this matter to the attention of the house to point out that in London we have these idle men, and the situation is worse than the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) suggested in his reply to me. I had the opportunity to attend a meeting in London last Thursday when industry, labour and welfare organizations, including Catholic charities, all met and this position was explained to us. The people in charge of the charities said that at the present rate of welfare being dispersed by these organizations in the city of London their funds would be exhausted long before the end of the fiscal year.

There is another angle to it that does not appear on the surface. Take a plant that is fabricating steel. Labour in the plant see that the supply of steel is running short, so they slow down in their work. That is what you and I would do if we were in the same position. They try to spin the work out as long as they can, and the net result is that our defence dollar is only buying about 25 cents worth of material. There are three things that could happen: unemployment, the high cost of the end product, or financial ruin for the firm. This is the situation many of these people are facing.

Rumours were abroad that it was part of government policy to have a certain amount of unemployment in order to obtain recruits for the army. I hope that is not true, but it indicates how seriously the people are viewing the situation. They are calling it a left-handed recruiting drive.

Black and grey markets exist. I was made aware of the fact that quotations on certain types of steel were in this ratio: the Canadian price for a certain product is 31 and the United States price is 46. This is an indication of what the cost of some of these goods would be when finished. I just want to draw the situation so far as steel is concerned to the attention of the house. It was brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who quoted the following few sentences from Time magazine:

> By 1952's end, Jones and Laughlin will have spent $390 million in six years, boosted its capacity by 32 per cent. By the same time, Bethlehem—big steel's chief rival—will have spent $700 million, boosted its capacity 36 per cent since 1946. Inland is spending $145 million, Republic $250 million, . . .

This gives an indication of the increase planned for steel production across the border. Then, in Time magazine of December 10, 1951, there is an article entitled "Steel Surgery". It reads in part as follows:

> After Washington fixed Canada's allocation of U.S. steel for the first quarter of 1952 at 415,050 tons, Ottawa gulped in dismay; it had asked for a rock bottom minimum of 527,809 tons. The news meant an unexpected 9 per cent slice in the overall supply. The government had long ago clamped down on non-essential steel construction. Last week it began to cut into the muscle of other civilian uses almost as ruthlessly as it did during world war II.

I would suggest that another item that is adding to cost is the fact that tenders for war orders require a deposit of 10 per cent. One department of the government under the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) cashes these cheques and apparently uses the funds as working capital, while the other department holds the cheques as a deposit. These two departments are under the one minister. I suggest that where the cheques are cashed the production cost of that firm is higher than in the case where the cheque is not cashed. The firm whose cheque is cashed has to pay a higher rate of interest than does the one whose cheque is not cashed. I have brought this serious situation to the attention of the house, and I hope the minister will take more action than he did when I first brought the matter to his attention.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address. They did very well. Just before the dinner recess, I ask the genial clerk assistant how many members had spoken, and he told me that 157 had done so. Hence the mover and seconder have been congratulated 157 times, and quite deservedly so.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can my hon. friend remember when the debate began?

Mr. Pouliot: Some time in the month before last. I listened with pleasure to what the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said about Lord Alexander, the governor general, who is a great governor and a great man. It was my privilege to suggest some time ago that his term should be extended, and this was finally done. I am not going to suggest the name of anyone to replace His Excellency when his term is ended. That is a matter to be dealt with by the government and His Majesty the King. I have nothing to say as to whether we should have a Canadian citizen or a British subject to represent His Majesty the King in this country. I leave that matter to the government. The only warning I give to the government is this. If the suggestion made by some papers is adopted, namely that Mr. Arthur Meighen be appointed governor general, it would perhaps lead to a movement for annexation to the United States. But it is quite improbable that such a suggestion would be adopted.

I was delighted to pay my respects to Her Royal Highness The Princess Elizabeth when she came to my constituency. I had the privilege of paying to her the same compliment that I paid to her mother, Her Majesty the Queen, when she came to visit this country a few years ago, namely that she had conquered all hearts. The Canadian National Railways did things well in my constituency. The station at Riviere du Loup was painted. The stations at Cacouna, at St. Eloi, and St. Arsene were also painted. As the station at Isle Verte was new, it was the big tank that was painted by the railway. They wanted to prepare the reception quite properly.

Mr. Speaker, we hear so many criticisms about everything that tonight it is my intention to thank the government and the whole house for what has been done for my constituency during these last few years, especially with regard to the fire that destroyed the village of Cabano and also the one that, a few days afterwards, destroyed Rimouski. There are many people whom I must thank on behalf of those who have rebuilt that village quite well. At first it was the army that gave great assistance to the people. Station CJFP at Riviere du Loup was there, kept the people informed, and secured some help. After the fire the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) and I interviewed the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and Mr. Mansur of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to ask them what could be done. My good friend Mr. Wilbur Arkison, a prominent journalist of Montreal, published a front-page interview in the Montreal Standard three days after the fire. All the newspapers gave their support to the victims of the fire. His Worship the Mayor of Montreal, who is also the member for Papineau, organized a great meeting at the Forum to come to the assistance of victims of the fires at Rimouski and Cabano, and the net profit was between $6,000 and $7,000. My colleagues of the house were kind enough to direct people who were sending food and clothing to both places. A genial maritimer by the name of Alistair Fraser who is a dear friend of mine and who is a prominent railway man succeeded in giving Cabano and the Temiscouata Railway milling in transit rates, which were extremely helpful to the lumbermen of that part of the county. I remember the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was kind enough to pay a visit to Cabano, and succeeded in comforting the people. He wanted to see the extent of the damage, and he spoke to them in encouraging terms. At that meeting there were two local members of my comté who were there to pay homage to the Prime Minister of Canada. They were two members of the provincial legislation.

A report was made by the commissioners early in May. There was an understanding between the federal and provincial governments with regard to the amount that was to be provided by Ottawa and the province for purposes of relief. I express my thanks to the Prime Minister of Canada as well as to Mr. Duplessis for what has been done in that respect.

Also I received word from Mr. St. John Chadwick, first consul at the office of the High Commissioner for Great Britain, who brought gifts from the United Kingdom to the people of Cabano. They were most generous gifts including some chinaware, some clothes, some shoes; all sorts of things. There were very precious gifts of silverware sent by the nobility of England to the people of Cabano and Rimouski.

I was there with Mr. John Lewis, deputy secretary of state for the commonwealth, who came to Cabano with Mr. Chadwick. I attended the distribution of gifts from Great Britain to the people of my constituency. I offer special thanks to my colleagues of the House of Commons, because the whip, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) gave me a cheque for $505 contributed for Cabano by members of parliament. Also our lamented friend, the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, told me that he had sent directly to the mayor of Cabano his personal cheque for $50. Then Hon. Liaquat Ali Khan, deceased premier of Pakistan, when he came to Ottawa subscribed $1,000 for the relief of the victims of the fires at Rimouski and Cabano. This was most generous of him.

I must not only thank the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of Quebec, but I must congratulate them upon the appointment of the commissioners, Brigadier Antonin Theriault of Quebec city and Mr. Edouard Laurent of Quebec. Brigadier Theriault was the representative of the Ottawa government and Mr. Laurent represented the government of Quebec. Then they had as a third commissioner His Worship Emilien Morin of Cabano, who did splendid work to assist his fellow citizens.

There are only one or two points in this connection I would like to mention. The first is that in those two fires the compagnie de pouvoir du Bas Saint-Laurent charged $26,522, and the corporation de téléphone de Québec charged $53,439 for damages suffered by them at Rimouski. These amounts were paid to these companies. Perhaps they got more, I do not know. On the other hand, I must tell the house that the compagnie de téléphone de Kamouraska, whose president is Mr. F. C. Whitaker of Montreal, suffered damages to the extent of more than $4,000, by reason of the Cabano fire, but they were generous enough to cancel their claim. It was their contribution on behalf of those who had suffered in the fire. Hon. members may judge from this the difference of approach in a matter of this kind. The compagnie de téléphone de Kamouraska was public-spirited and generous, while the other two companies were very greedy. This is not new.

And, sir, I want to say something about the Canadian National Railways. I will tell you that all my life, especially since the beginning of my public career as a member of parliament, I have been a strong advocate of the Canadian National Railways, that big organization that goes from coast to coast. I happen to live at a divisional point in the Intercolonial section of the national railway company. At the beginning Riviere du Loup was the eastern terminal of the Grand Trunk Railway, before the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. If railway employees can claim seniority rights, then the shops must have the same right. The shops at Riviere du Loup must have seniority over all other shops of the Canadian National Railways. This is ignored. There are big shops at Moncton, at Point St. Charles, as well as at Stratford, Ontario, and at Transcona, which is not far from Winnipeg. But the shops at Riviere du Loup existed long before these others were built. No one spoke about them at that time.

We live in strange times, times of centralization. Some people who are called men of vision see only one thing, a huge thing, a tower of Babel; the bigger it is, the better it is. Well, that is absurd. Why do we have a housing problem? Why did we have such a problem, especially after the war? It was more acute then than it is now, because some progress has been made, although matters have not yet been completely adjusted. It is precisely because of the exodus of people from the country to the city, due to that centralization of industry. I remember some years ago I told a story of the Noiseless Land Company or La Compagnie des Terrains sans Bruit Ltee., at Quebec city. There were two gentlemen, two politicians rather, Philippe Pelletier and Mr. Perodeau. They formed a partnership to buy some swamp land near Quebec city at a very low price. Laurier was in power and they offered this land to the Laurier government. Laurier said, "No, I will never buy it." Then Pelletier became postmaster general in the Borden government, and as he was all-powerful the Borden government bought the Noiseless Land Company's property from Pelletier, Perodeau and company at a high figure.

After the swamp had been bought it had to be used because they were afraid of a scandal. So they built shops on that soft soil and after the shops were built they needed men and machinery. They took the men and machinery from Riviere du Loup for the new shops built on the Noiseless Land property. It was like the deportation of the Acadians. It was a great blow to my city. The shops continued to exist and some time afterward Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways, decided to reduce the personnel of the Riviere du Loup shops to a minimum. I tried to argue with him but it served no purpose. But Hon. Charles Dunning, supported by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, saw to it that there was no reduction. The men who had been sent away came back to work in the shops.

That was a great advantage, not because of politics but because the Riviere du Loup shops were an asset to the community. Afterwards the St. Malo shops were closed for railway business and this work was transferred to the Department of National Defence. At the outset of the war Moncton tried to place its clutching hands on the fine machinery that was there, but Mr. Hungerford saw to it that that should not happen and the machinery that was billed to Moncton was rebilled to Riviere du Loup. The men who had been forced to leave their homes had an opportunity to come back to Riviere du Loup to continue their work for the railroads. They do most excellent work.

That was the third time we suffered from centralization. Quebec does not need a railway shop any more than a dog needs two tails. Why? The St. Malo shops were built simply to cover a scandal under a Tory government.

Mr. Fraser: A Liberal scandal now.

Mr. Pouliot: No scandal. I will fight to the death to maintain the rights of my constituents who continue to do splendid work at Riviere du Loup for the Canadian National Railways. I am not impressed by the advocates of centralization who are bringing about the downfall of the railway. We are asking for two shifts, a day shift and a night shift. If we have the number of men that we need at Riviere du Loup we will be able to compete with any shops anywhere on the Canadian National Railways. We are between the Point St. Charles and Moncton shops, between New Brunswick and Montreal. I am a friend of the maritimes and I am ready to co-operate with them provided they do not try to cut our throats.

Mr. Brooks: They would never think of that.

Mr. Pouliot: I hope not. We have a right to live and we have a right to defend what exists for the benefit not of the local community but of the country at large. So much is that the case that very often work that is badly done at Moncton is sent to Riviere du Loup to be fixed up by the railroad men there.

Mr. Brooks: That is very seldom.

Mr. Pouliot: That is the reason I am so proud of the men whom I have the honour to represent in parliament. I am casting no reflection upon the maritimes. This shows that the men at Riviere du Loup are just as good as those in the maritimes.

Mr. Brooks: I think the hon. member should give instances of that inferior work. I doubt very much if he can.

Mr. Pouliot: I am sorry that the time at my disposal is not long enough to permit me to mention all those cases.

Mr. Brooks: It is a very good argument.

Mr. Pouliot: No. I hope my hon. friend will be good enough to stop at Riviere du Loup the next time he passes that way and I will bring him to the shops where he can meet the men who witnessed these incidents. They are in a better position than I to give specific details. I have never said anything in the house that I did not believe was accurate.

Not only do we want to have two shifts at Riviere du Loup instead of one; it is also important that the work started last summer by the Canadian National Railways to repair the right of way of the Temiscouata railway be continued next year. Why should that be done? There is only one line on the Intercolonial between Montreal and Levis and Halifax, which line runs through Moncton. It is essential that there be a double line from Riviere du Loup onward and the Temiscouata railroad should be repaired so it can serve to its utmost capacity. A highway, which is part of highway No. 2 between Toronto and Halifax, has been completed and will be paved next year. It is one of the finest highways in Canada. The scenery is just as grand at that north of Montreal with mountains and large lakes, such as lake Temiscouata. But this is lumbering country. Thanks to what has been done by Mr. Alistair Fraser, a former vice-president of the Canadian National—and I give credit to the management for this—the milling in transit rate given to lumber producers near the Temiscouata line and in the back country would do marvels if they were supplied with enough cars. I could mention some prominent lumbermen in my part of the country. One of them is well known throughout the country because he is a former president of the Canadian Lumbermen's Association. I refer to Mr. Raoul Guérette of Estcourt who asked the railway last winter for 5,000 cars to ship lumber from Whitworth to other points. Whitworth is on the Temiscouata line. He could not get all the cars. At the meetings of the railways and shipping committee last session I questioned Mr. Dingle about it. I knew very well it was true because I was the one who sent a wire to the management on behalf of Mr. Guérette to have the 5,000 cars sent there.

The Temiscouata railway is serving a purpose. We hear about the claims for improvement that come from various parts of the country. Members ask many things from the government. I make my claim, and I am sincere, honest and earnest about it. I am sure the government will support my request because it is in the public interest. I want the completion of the repairing of the track of the Temiscouata railway so that it can be used for heavy traffic. There is supposed to be an extension of the Matane railway to Gaspe. I have no objections to it, but if there is enough money to continue the Matane branch to Gaspe there must be enough to finish the Temiscouata line so it will give the railway the profit it is entitled to get from it. I will have other occasions to mention this matter, but I rely on the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the government and the whole house to give us what we are entitled to have.

There are maritime rights. There are also Temiscouata rights and the rights of every other constituency in this country. I am only too proud to be the advocate of the rights of Temiscouata and to defend my constituents. Once I attended the blessing of the cornerstone of a hospital, and the bishop was there. I told him: Sir, you are the spiritual father of these nice people; I am their temporal father. You look after their interests in heaven and I look after their interests in this world. I am sure I shall have the support of the government and the house in the redressing of all wrongs and seeing to it that Temiscouata is not treated as a country cousin.

The last thing I have to say is about the pensions of railway employees. I discussed the matter in the railways and shipping committee last year. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Dube) made some very good speeches about it. I refer to the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway employees provident fund. There are 4,850 contributors and 3,300 pensioners. Monthly payments are $300,000. There are 2,200 who receive more than $90, 650 who receive from $50 to $90 and 450 who receive from $30 to $50. It is not much when we think of it. That is another matter that I brought to the attention of the management, and it is a shame.

Before the Temiscouata railway was purchased by the government it was operating in great difficulties. There are some men who after working for the Temiscouata railway for half a century receive much less than $30 a month as a pension. They receive $5. The management of the Canadian National say they have no responsibility. How can that be? The monthly cheques of $5 are signed by the Canadian National Railways. It is a shame, and any other organization would increase these pensions. There are other things that I might say. I do not envy anyone what he has got for his constituency. The government looked after Temiscouata. Les électeurs de mon comté have received due consideration in the applications they have made, and they are among those in the country who every time thank not only the government but the Prime Minister and the other ministers concerned for what they do for them. It is a very fine tradition and they never fail.

But, sir, I am sure after the exposé of the facts that I have related to the house tonight they will again have occasion to thank the government and also the Canadian National Railways. We are not opposed to the railways. We do not want them to do anything that is not in the public interest, but we want them to serve every part of the country as well as possible. My friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) has just taken his seat. He is doing something for Temiscouata. He built a fine wharf at Riviere du Loup. He has just bought a nice tract of land for a public building which is required for the post office, the unemployment insurance commission, the customs, the mounted police and other departments. With the support of my hon. colleagues, I am sure a fine building will be erected on that land in the very near future.

I also want an airport at Riviere du Loup for civilian use and for purposes of military defence. It is time to have it. All the plans are ready, and I am sure it will come in due course. I am just about through. I thank the house for their kind attention and, moreover, the inspiration my colleagues have given me while I have been speaking. I cannot pay a better compliment to my colleagues than to say that tonight I felt just as much at home as if I had been in my own constituency.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity tonight to draw your attention to the fact that persecution of Canadian nationals by the Chinese communists is increasing at an alarming rate. One week ago today it was drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister that two Canadian nuns had been sentenced to five years imprisonment and three other Canadian nuns had been ordered deported on the fantastic charge that they had murdered children under their care.

It is obvious from the evidence which was presented, at what passes for a trial in communist countries, that these children were past all hope of recovery when they were delivered to the orphanage, and that it was only the Christianity of those nuns which caused them to admit those children and do what they could for them whilst life still remained.

The evidence that these five nuns are completely innocent is overwhelming, and does not need to be elaborated at this time. What the Chinese communists violently objected to was the fact that these nuns were teaching and demonstrating Christianity.

Following this outrage, we read in this morning's paper that two nuns and a priest were forced to exhume children's bodies in the area near Canton. They were forced to work twelve hours a day for twelve days, without rest and with very little food, and the citizens in the vicinity were encouraged to taunt them while they were at their task.

Again in this morning's paper we read that a Canadian priest, Right Rev. Gustave Prevost, was arrested two months ago by the Chinese communists and is now reported as having confessed to having been a spy. Those who are familiar with communist methods will realize that whatever false confession he is claimed to have given could only have been forced from him by privation and torture.

I believe that the time has come for the government to tell the Canadian people what steps it plans to take to protect Canadian citizens against the kind of outrages I have just described.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): After listening to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) I am sure that the few words I have to say tonight will be more or less in order. He spoke about the various things that were going on in China, and that brings me to say that here in the house we were lobbied today by a group of people who were representing the peace congress. This afternoon I had a group of them in my room for about an hour, and after letting each one say what he had to say I had my turn in questioning them. To be truthful, I believe that some of these people are sincere in their efforts to obtain peace. When I questioned some of them I asked point-blank whether there were any communists in their organization, and I was informed that there were.

They wanted to know what members of parliament were doing to bring peace throughout the world. I told them that Canada, representing approximately 15 million people, could not bring about peace by itself, but that I had every confidence in the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), through whom Canada speaks, and in our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and I was sure that we were doing everything we could to preserve peace.

They asked me questions; they asked whether I did not think it would be far better if instead of spending what we are spending now on arms we spent it on peaceful purposes. I think we all agree on that, but I asked them how it was that our enemy, or what we think is our enemy at the present time, was building up armed forces of over 2,800,000 men at the present time, and that we did not have the right to go in there to see at what rate they were building up those arms and other weapons of war. I also told them that from my experience in many disputes in our own councils at home I thought it could be done better by negotiation than with guns.

Mr. Fleming: The peacemaker.

Mr. Sinnott: In a good many cases, yes. That is what our Secretary of State for External Affairs is trying to do. He is trying to obtain peace at almost any price, but not at the price of the Russians. If every member of the house were to inform what I call these misinformed people who have gone to the trouble and expense of coming to Ottawa to further their efforts, much good would be done. I asked them how they got their funds to come. They said they got them through their own organization; that they had no direct contact with Russia whatsoever, and therefore were on their own. It is up to every member of this house to inform these people that they cannot obtain peace as long as they have communists in their organization. When they left my room the suggestion I gave them was that before they would make any headway in obtaining peace in the world they first had to rid their organization of communists.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): During the sixteen years of my membership in this house I have never yet undertaken to tell the members of the house about my particular constituency. I believe it would be well for me in a short time tonight to depart from that custom which I have established and give the members some idea of the kind of disaster which has overtaken many areas in Alberta.

Normally my constituency is one of the most prosperous in the dominion, judged from the amount of income tax my constituents pay, and altogether it is rather remarkable for the amount of well-being which prevails there. Here are some of the things that have happened this year: In the first place, we had rain in the spring which delayed seeding a month. Everybody who knows anything about agriculture understands how serious that is. We could have recovered from that quite readily, I believe, if we had had a chance, but we did not have a chance. It kept on raining too often all summer long, thereby delaying maturity. Although the crop, with abundant rainfall and the kind of weather we generally have there in respect of sunlight and so on, was excellent, yet it was not harvested. Snow laid very much of it down before it could be cut. Much of the grain that was not laid down by snow had been swathed, and consequently was subject to the deteriorating influence of too much moisture during rather warm weather while in contact with the soil. In most cases what was harvested was too damp to be stored with safety. The result was that, in a large measure, people lost their grain crop.

Ordinarily, in my constituency, a great deal of hay is produced. We had a very fine crop because of the rain, but almost as though there had been a committee of fiends appointed to supervise what went on during the summer, we had rain just often enough to catch every cutting of hay in the windrow and destroy it. Some of you have had that experience; that condition followed us right through the season. The result was that most of the hay was spoiled in the windrow or in the bundle. A number of people are now beginning to bind the hay in bundles for protection, but the bundles were spoiled; they turned just as black as a stove. What little hay was harvested and stacked in good condition was utterly destroyed by a heavy rain in September, which soaked through from the top of the stack to the ground. In a district that does a great deal of livestock raising, hon. members can realize how tragic that experience was.

There are three sugar beet factories in my constituency. Normally the beet crop is the surest crop the people have, and this is especially true of the irrigated areas. Beet germination was delayed because of the wet weather I spoke about, and in some places there was so much dampness that the young beets were killed when they first came up. The beets did not progress as they should have, and when harvesting time arrived the weather was so wet it was exceedingly difficult to harvest the beets. Many of the growers have beet harvesting machines which were unable to function because of the moisture in the soil. Where they did function there was great expense in harvesting the beets. Finally, a great number of beets were frozen in the ground. The loss in the beet industry has been severe.

My constituency is one of the best in Canada for producing cattle. There are many ranchers, and they would have experienced a successful season because of the fine pasture during the summer except for the fact that the hay crop was destroyed. Then it was impossible to harvest the grain crop and the ranchers were unable to get access to the straw upon which many of them depend for carrying their animals through. The result has been that many of the stockmen have been forced to get rid of their stock just in the year they were depending upon stock because of the losses in other crops upon which they relied. Those cattlemen who usually pasture their stock in the fields after the grain is harvested were unable to do so this year because much of the grain lay either uncut or in the swath. If they turned their stock into the field they would founder by eating too much of the grain.

In my area there is a good deal of sheep feeding and sheep raising. Ordinarily the feeders turn their sheep into the fields to pasture on the beet tops which are left in the fields after the beets are harvested. Those who have sheep are in serious difficulties because of the poor beet harvest, and in some cases are being forced to dispose of their flocks.

One of the major industries is the feeding of beef cattle and sheep during the winter. The beet pulp which comes from the manufacture of sugar from beets is probably the finest feed for cattle that is known to man. The pulp alone is not so very good for the cattle, and it is necessary to have with it hay or straw. This year the hay and straw are lacking or have to be brought great distances at tremendous cost. The result will be that this major industry will be largely a failure this year, except in a very few cases.

I believe this picture, a rather gloomy one, which I have drawn of my constituency gives some idea of the suffering of the people in Alberta. Something ought to be done. I do not know what the government has in mind, but it appears to me to be almost an emergency. It should be called at least a provincial emergency, but it is beyond the financial competence of the province to deal with it. It seems to me it becomes almost a national emergency, especially when we recall that Saskatchewan is afflicted almost as seriously as Alberta.

May we go back to the discussions of last spring and recall that the farmers were able to establish that, as a result of the sale of wheat under the British-Canadian wheat agreement, they had lost money. This was established largely through such spokesmen as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and others. Considering all the factors which entered into the situation, it was proved that the farmers lost hundreds of millions of dollars.

It will be recalled that the government listened to their appeals to the extent of contributing $65 million towards reimbursing the farmers for those losses. It will be recalled that there was talk of $48 million being paid as compensation for another disability which the farmers suffered. Members from those areas continued to discuss the $48 million question until I was ruled out of order on April 6 for undertaking to discuss it. An amendment had been moved by the C.C.F. calling for payment of the $48 million, and when the vote was taken on that amendment further discussion of the $48 million was ruled out. That might have been a contribution to the well-being of the farmers and it might not, depending on how one looked at it.

I wonder if it would not be wise for us to consider the advisability of going back and taking another look at that $48 million proposition, to see whether or not it would be a good thing for this government now to pay that amount to western farmers. It would give those who are suffering at least some money with which to buy the children something for Christmas, and some money with which to help the merchants who are almost in despair in my constituency because they have advanced credit to the farmers, hoping for a crop, and now find themselves in the grip of the wholesalers and utterly lost to know where to turn in order to be able to carry on until spring. In that respect $48 million would help all the way around.

If I may be pardoned for reading from my remarks last spring, I should like to refer to page 1300 of Hansard of the first session of 1951. On March 15 I closed my speech with these words:

> As I have previously argued, the wheat producers ought to receive compensation to the extent of at least 25 cents per bushel. The people of Canada through the dominion government are in duty bound to pay that 25 cents. Britain, let me repeat, has not the least scintilla of a moral obligation in any shape or form in connection with reimbursing Canadian farmers for the losses they have sustained by reason of the British-Canadian wheat agreement.

I had argued that matter so fully, I think, that there could be no answer to the argument I had adduced showing that the British had no obligation, contractual or moral, in any way.

Then, if I may, I should like to turn to page 1716 of Hansard of April 6, and read my closing remarks on that occasion:

> As I say, I am closing my remarks tonight, but this is not the last I am going to say in advocacy of the proposition that the dominion government at an early date contribute $48 million more to the pool fund for the farmers of western Canada.

Tonight I am making good that promise. Inasmuch as all this is more than six months old, it might be wise for us to give some attention to the story behind the $48 million so that people who are not familiar with the situation will be able to understand what it is all about. What is the story behind this $48 million request?

Between March 1, 1945 and February 17, 1947, some 160 million bushels of wheat were consumed by Canadians. The wheat board sold this wheat to Canadian millers at 77-3/8 cents per bushel. The Canadian government paid the wheat board an additional 47-5/8 cents per bushel, making a total of $1.25 per bushel to go into the fund from which the farmers were to be paid, all that they were to get by reason of the sale of wheat to Britain during the four-year period. If that wheat had been sold to Britain the farmers would have received $1.55 per bushel. If sold to any other nation but Canada the farmers would have received more than $1.55 a bushel, for then their wheat would have become class II wheat which in many cases sold at a much higher figure than $1.55. The farmers therefore lost at least 30 cents on every one of those 160 million bushels of wheat which the Canadian people consumed. In other words they lost 160 million times 30 cents, or $48 million.

As it worked out, this $48 million was a definite subsidy paid by the farmers to bring down the price of bread, or at least the price of the wheat that entered into the bread which Canadians ate during the period I have indicated.

The farmers not only paid this $48 million as a direct consumers' subsidy to bring down the price of bread; they also paid, through their taxes, a share of the 47-5/8 cents a bushel which the Canadian government paid the wheat board to help make up the $1.25. Surely the farmers are entitled to that $48 million! I do not think any line of reasoning can be advanced or any evidence can possibly be adduced by anyone which can show that the conclusion I have drawn is unsound.

When the government last spring paid the $65 million to the farmers, many hon. members argued that it ought not to have been paid. Hon. members of the house can recall men who rose in their places and sincerely argued in that way. Most of those men felt that the dominion had no obligation to pay this money.

What sort of reasoning influenced hon. members in opposing assistance to the farmers then? There were several considerations. By members of the cabinet and others it was argued that the British-Canadian wheat agreement was an experiment in price and market stabilization. It was therefore argued that what the farmers lost was a sort of premium such as men would pay on an insurance policy to guarantee that they would have markets and reasonably stable prices. I was not impressed with the argument, but a good many hon. members were.

Again it was argued that if the 600 million bushels of wheat that Canada sold to Britain during the four years had been thrown on the markets of the world, the price of class II wheat would have been forced down and consequently it would have been impossible to show that the farmers had lost money by selling to Britain at $1.55. The general idea seemed to be that it would be quite impossible to tell how far the price would have been forced down, and that it might possibly have been forced down even below $1.55. This thought seemed to be in men's minds.

Then others argued that if Canada had not sold the 600 million bushels to Britain she probably could not have sold that wheat at all, but would have found her wheat crowded out of the world markets by competitors.

I think probably a bit of evidence that people would accept as worth considering would be in order at the present time. I should like to read a statement from the April 11, 1951 Searle Grain Company's letter. Before I start to read this, may I say that I recall how greatly exercised some hon. members became last year because I referred to the Searle Grain Company's letter. I argued—and I think soundly—that I had never known the Searle Grain Company to make any errors in figures. They make errors in their conclusions and their reasoning, I grant you that; but their figures are sound. This quotation I am about to give contains figures which can be expressed in their words quite as effectively as they can be expressed in mine, and they will carry with them the authority of the Searle Grain Company. I quote from the letter as follows:

> If the 600 million (150 million a year for each of four years) had been offered on the open market then, of course, Britain would not have purchased this wheat under contract, but she would have had to buy from somewhere the same quantity to feed her people for her people were seriously short of food. Britain, therefore, would have had to come to the open market with demands at the rate of 150 million a year, or 600 million in four years. This extra 600 million of demand would have exactly balanced the 600 million of extra supply, so price would not have been affected. Experienced grain men are convinced that the open market price for all our wheat over the four years would most probably have been even higher than the class II rates.

That is their conclusion. I am not saying anything about that.

> Could all our wheat have been sold had it not been for the agreement? Most certainly it could have been. During these four years the United States sold on world markets 1,932,000,000 bushels; Argentina sold 373,000,000 bushels; Australia 433,000,000 bushels and Canadian class II wheat 196,000,000 bushels, or a total of 2,934,000,000 bushels and all was sold at class II or better than class II price. France, India, Turkey and Russia also sold unrevealed additional amounts, again at high prices.

For the first three years the world was badly short of food. The world was even buying Canadian rye at $4.83 a bushel—worth usually 20 per cent less than wheat—and registered seed wheat for making into flour at $6 a bushel. Britain herself was buying wheat from the U.S.A., Australia, Argentina, Turkey and some say from Russia and at prices higher than class II prices.

What reason, then, have we to suppose that Britain or any other buying country would have paid less for Canadian wheat than they did for other wheats lower in quality, and while the world demand considerably exceeded the supply.

The bearing of these comments and figures on the $48 million is simply this. They tend to show that the western farmers were beaten out of a just remuneration for the wheat they produced and sold. They sold their wheat to Great Britain at $1.55 for the first two years and $2 for the second two years very substantially below the world price of class II wheat. It seems beyond any possibility of dispute that these figures and statements constitute complete proof that the western farmers lost heavily as a result of the agreement, and that they therefore have a claim on the Dominion of Canada for a considerable amount of reimbursement to cover their losses.

Some hon. members have objected to the rest of Canada paying taxes for the benefit of the western farmer. That proposition should be examined, to see whether it is valid. Let me read the statement of Chester A. Bloom, entitled "The Prairie Farmers Pay". This clipping is from the Lethbridge Herald of March 24, 1951. When I referred to this article last spring some members became almost furious, because they implied that Chester A. Bloom was employed by somebody. Their objection quite astonished me, because certainly the figures of Chester A. Bloom must be accurate, no matter whom he is employed by, or whether he is employed by anybody. This is the article:

During the five-year wheat pool including the four-year Canada-U.K. wheat agreement, while selling their wheat to Britain at cut-rate prices, the prairie farmers paid 77 per cent of all the farm income taxes paid in Canada.

During the four years of the U.K. wheat agreement, 1946-49 inclusive, the prairie farmers paid 81 per cent of all the farm income taxes paid in Canada—$48,254,000 out of $59,489,000 farm income taxes.

The farmers of the three prairie provinces were getting gypped two ways—their wheat was sold at bargain prices while they carried more than three-quarters of the farm tax load in Canada.

The answer is easy—their wheat was sold by a government board. The government tax collectors knew every cent of their income—not so with all the other farmers of Canada. No wonder governments like handling farm products through boards.

The 1950 farm tax returns are not yet available. But the prairie farmers have been paying an average of more than $12 million a year in farm income taxes. Their 1950 taxes will surely be up to the average so, during the five-year pool into which the government is now making a $65 million final payment, the prairie farmers will have paid taxes in that period within $5 million of the $65 million.

It is quite obvious why the government did not use these figures to rebut some of the $65 million payment criticisms. It is one of the big national tax scandals of Canada.

Here are some of the figures culled from a return furnished February 22, last, by the Department of National Revenue, answering a question asked in the house by H. R. Argue, M.P., Assiniboia:

In 1946, total farm income taxes collected in Canada were $9,843,000 of which prairie farmers, largely wheat growers, paid $8,134,000 or 82·5 per cent.

1947—Total Canadian farm income taxes collected, $13,581,000; prairie farmers paid $10,567,000 or 77 per cent.

1948—Total Canadian farm income taxes collected, $18,095,000; three prairie provinces paid farm income taxes of $14,168,000 or 78 per cent.

1949—Total Canadian farm income taxes collected, $17,970,000; three prairie provinces farm taxes, $15,385,000 or 85 per cent.

The only provinces which came anywhere near approaching these prairie records of farm income taxes were the immensely wealthy old farming province of Ontario whose farmers in 1949 paid $1,940,000 in farm income taxes while British Columbia farmers paid $544,000. Quebec farmers paid only $51,000. The smaller populated maritime provinces that year paid farm income taxes of: P.E.I., $4,000; Nova Scotia, $33,000; New Brunswick, $11,000, and Newfoundland, $2,000.

Even before the Canadian wheat board had records of prairie farmers' wheat receipts, however, the three prairie provinces were furnishing, since 1941, more than 50 per cent of the total farm income taxes collected in Canada. Here are the records 1941 to 1945 inclusive:

1941—Total farm income taxes collected, $1,592,000; prairie payments, $860,000; 1942—total farm income taxes paid, $3,372,000; prairie payments, $2,045,000; 1943—total for Canada, $11,630,000; prairies paid $8,563,000; 1944—total for Canada, $20,482,000; prairies paid $16,838,000; 1945—total for Canada, $13,392,000; prairies paid $8,047,000.

Anyone who will seriously contemplate those figures should indulge no more in talk about having the rest of Canada pay taxes to help the prairie farmers.

Others have argued as a reason why there should be no payment to western farmers that it was not economically sound to subsidize any group. Let us see what subsidies are paid in Canada. When a tariff is placed on a commodity like a mowing machine which causes the people in a primary producing area to have to pay $25, $30, $40 or $50 more for that machine than they would have to pay if the tariff were not imposed, then that tariff is forcing the primary producers to subsidize the machinery companies. There can be no other interpretation placed upon the effect of the tariff.

I have here an article which indicates a great deal of research in its preparation and which I believe will be quite enlightening to all people who are concerned in this matter, as I think everybody is. It is taken from the Manitoba Co-operator of May 3, 1951 and is entitled "They Talk Subsidies". It is copied from the Alberta wheat pool budget of April 20, 1951, and reads:

> The turmoil which has been raised in eastern Canada over the $65 million federal grant to the wheat board to make a final payment of 8·3 cents a bushel for wheat in the 1945-49 pool, is, and should be, resented in western Canada. One would think that the western wheat farmers were mendicants and they alone of all classes in Canada received special treatment. That is far from the case.
> H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, has listed some federal government subsidy payments made to groups and industries other than farmers, in the 1949-50 fiscal year as follows:

Subsidy for Canadian gold mines	$13,715,778
Subsidy on movement of coal	3,919,000
Subsidy on steel and iron	4,662,251
For unemployment insurance	45,059,588
Subsidy for judges' (114) pensions	458,937

> Then special depreciation on $514 million invested was allowed war industry during world war II.
> The Canadian tariff in itself operates in the nature of a bonus to Canadian industries and is oppressive particularly to people residing in the prairie provinces of western Canada. In the early 1930's the late Hon. Norman Rogers, Minister of Labour in the Canadian government, prepared a table showing how each province in Canada was affected by the dominion's tariff policy.
> That table showed that at that time the Canadian tariffs cost the people of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta $54,925,000 a year, or an annual average charge of $23 on every man, woman and child in the three provinces. With the expansion of Canadian industry and western purchasing, the figures may now be doubled.
> The table also showed that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec had an annual gain through the tariff of $83,700,000.
> The $65 million grant by the federal government to the wheat board permits a payment of 4½ cents a bushel on 1,436,000,000 bushels of wheat delivered by the farmers of western Canada between 1945 and 1949 inclusive. It brings the total payment up to a little over $1.83 a bushel, basis 1 Northern at the terminal, on total deliveries.
> Between March 1, 1945, and February 17, 1947, the wheat board sold 160 million bushels of wheat for domestic consumption at $1.25 a bushel when the export price was $1.55. That was a direct subsidy by the wheat producers to Canadian consumers to the extent of $48 million.
> The prairie provinces of western Canada constitute a land area of 452 million acres, of which 117 million are in occupied farms; 65 million acres being improved lands. This is one of the most productive farming regions in the world.
> During the war this area produced nearly 5,500,000,000 bushels of grain, over 5 billion pounds of beef, and 8,600,000 pounds of pork. This production resulted in Canadian people being among the best fed in the world, and also provided 3,100,000,000 pounds of pork and 600 million pounds of beef for export to Great Britain.
> While Canada has experienced a growing industrialism, which strengthens the nation's economic fabric, agricultural production is still the mainstay of the national economy. The farmers of western Canada, under the constant risk of drouth, hail and insect pests, have rendered an exceptional contribution to the progress of the Canadian nation. "Without a west" Canada would not be much of a nation.

In the light of the figures I have placed upon the record during this talk I think it will be realized that western farmers are most moderate when they come to this parliament asking for compensation for the amount of money they lost as a result of sales of wheat under the British-Canadian wheat agreement, and especially their argument that they are entitled to this $48 million as reimbursement for their loss in subsidizing Canadian bread consumers.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the question agitating the minds of most people in Canada for the last year has been the high cost of living. One reason for the higher cost this year has been the high taxation imposed by the government. This was well pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and also by no less a person than the president of the Bank of Montreal in his recent annual statement to the shareholders. He pointed out that the government through its policy of high taxation was contributing to the increase in the cost of living. This was also pointed out by speakers on the opposition side last year when these extra taxes were put on articles which everyone recognized to be necessaries of life. Therefore the government cannot escape the just accusation that they are responsible to a large extent for the figure the cost of living index has now reached.

This increase in the cost of living falls in various degrees upon different persons. There are some people who have the advantage of working agreements containing escalator clauses so that as the cost of living index rises their wages or salaries also rise. Those people who are getting their income from profits find that those profits are increasing in proportion to the cost of merchandise which they sell. Although they do lag behind somewhat, civil servants get bonuses. But there is a class of person about whom I wish to speak tonight who has very little opportunity of redress and who must depend to a large extent upon government assistance. I intend to speak about the Newfoundland fishermen.

It is a strange anomaly that fish, salted codfish at any rate, is one of the food products in the world that has gone down in price during the past two years. This means that the return to the fisherman is less than it was, whereas the cost of the articles he must use has gone up. In other words his cost of catching fish has increased and the value of fish has gone down.

As hon. members know, in 1949 Newfoundland came into confederation. There were many who thought this would be most beneficial to all concerned, but it has not proved beneficial to the fisherman, as I intend to point out. In 1948 the fishermen of Newfoundland received their highest prices for fish, about $13.45 for small madeira fish. In 1949 it began that way, but they could not sell their fish and the result was that there was a carryover into the season of 1950. The fisheries prices support board had to come to their assistance to a certain extent. That assistance was not very great, but they had to buy several thousand quintals of fish from the fishermen. However, 1950 was the worst season for many years. The initial price was nearly $3 a quintal lower. I suppose I should explain to hon. members what I mean by a quintal. A quintal is 112 pounds or a hundredweight of fish. The bureau of statistics does not use that figure. They use a figure of 100 pounds, but we refer to a quintal of 112 pounds. In the 1950 season the price started off at only $10.50 for small madeira fish for which $13.45 was paid the year before. There was a difference of nearly $3 a quintal or 3 cents a pound in the price of the fish.

This was bound to have an effect upon the fishermen. But that was the highest price paid during the year, and it began to drop after the month of September. Those who were not fortunate enough to get their fish sold during September had to accept a lower price. I have already brought the prices paid in 1950 to the attention of the house. Fish sold after September averaged as low as $5.50, which is only about half the better price paid in September. The men could not make a living and the provincial government instituted an inquiry to see if the merchants were paying fair and just prices. The fisheries prices support board had an investigation, and some hon. members may recall that it was decided, so far as Labrador fish are concerned, to guarantee a price of $7 a quintal, to which a supplementary amount of 85 cents has since been added in the case of semi-dry fish. Therefore some Labrador fishermen will receive a guaranteed price of $7.85.

Labrador fish is not the superior article that shore fish is and usually commands only 60 to 75 per cent in value by way of return. But with respect to the shore fish the fisheries prices support board has recommended to the government that a deficiency payment of $1.30 per quintal, a little over one cent a pound, be paid to all fishermen independently of the price they may have received. I know some fishermen who received top prices. They were good fishermen and were lucky. They got their fish on the market at the beginning of the season and received top prices. They will also get $1.30, but those unfortunate enough to live a long distance away from the city of St. John's, where the top price was paid in September, those who were unfortunate enough to have bad weather in their communities so they could not make their fish in time, received low prices and the same deficiency payment of $1.30.

As I mentioned, some of them received an average of $5.50. They will get $1.30 added to that. It will be seen that $1.30 added to their $5.50 is very far removed from what the man will get who received the top price of $10.50 and has $1.30 added to that. I suppose the fisheries prices support board gave the matter long and careful consideration and felt that the only practical way to solve the problem was to give everybody $1.30 regardless of how much they had been able to get for their fish. The effect of the depressed prices last year was to drive a lot of people out of the fisheries. They could not go fishing this year. They gave it up. Some of them went to Goose Bay, some to Seven Islands, and others have gone to Greenland. Others have gone wherever they could find work. Some of them are working in the government-owned industries now being started under the new policy of the provincial government. The $1.30 has not yet been paid for the 1950 catch, and we are getting near the end of 1951. I do not know how the government thinks the people who received a little over 5 cents a pound for their fish last year have been living. The amount of $1.30 is not going to be paid until January. I have been asking questions in the house about the matter during the time the house has been in session, and it is always put off a couple of months ahead. Now at last in the new year I suppose the fishermen will begin to get $1.30.

Mr. Knowles: Just before the election.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know if it is going to be before the election. I do not think it will amount to enough to influence the election down there. We come to the 1951 catch, and in many places this year the catch was good. It was better than in 1950, but not so with regard to the Labrador fisheries because most of the people who had been fishing there did not go there this year. There are two classes of fishermen who fish at Labrador. One is called the livyers, people who live there and fish, and the others are floaters who go there in large vessels. To a great extent the large vessels have abandoned the Labrador fishing. For them it is a thing of the past. It does not pay them to go there any more. They have given it up and the government does not seem to be the least bit worried about whether or not they give it up.

But there are other fishermen whom I met recently and whom I also met in 1949, and about whom I can tell a story and give a comparison. In 1949 I was in the village of Ship Harbour on Placentia bay in my constituency. I was in a house there, and as I was having tea a vessel came in from the banks loaded to the gunwales. Everybody was delighted. I was in that same village three weeks ago in the same house. The man who was captain of the vessel that had come in with a load of fish in 1949 was sitting at the table twiddling his thumbs. He was not fishing this year. He had two vessels tied up to his wharf all summer. He had seven traps in the holds. He said to me: "I cannot give that stuff away; I cannot sell those traps for 25 cents, although I have $9,000 worth of material there."

Is the federal government really interested in the fishermen of Newfoundland? Is it really interested in the fisheries of Newfoundland? The minister is a brave man and has received a ribbon of honour for his visit to the Korean battlefront. I know he is a sympathetic person; but does he really intelligently understand the fisheries of Newfoundland? I doubt it. His parliamentary assistant lives nearer and ought to know more about it, but he has not the authority. It is necessary for the government to remember that they have to give a lot more consideration and attention to the fisheries of Newfoundland than they have shown during the last two and a half years if they do not want them to decline. I received a letter only a few days ago from a very fine fisherman who has been in the fisheries all his life. He lives in a fishing village on Placentia bay, and he tells me that men are going to leave the fisheries in greater numbers this coming season. He also stresses the point that although there was a good catch in many places this year the weather was bad and the cull is hard. That means that the inspectors of the merchants, or cullers as we call them, the men who pick out and grade the fish, are very strict, and the quantity of the higher priced fish is much smaller in proportion. Therefore the men are in exactly the same position as they were in 1950.

I call upon the government now to instruct the fisheries prices support board to recognize that situation, because it is equally necessary for them to give a deficiency payment for the 1951 catch as it was for the 1950 catch. I have here the report of the fisheries prices support board for the year 1950-51, which contains a résumé of the purposes of the act. I should like to put it on the record to remind hon. members that I am not asking for anything of an extraordinary nature when I ask the government now to give consideration to making a deficiency payment on the 1951 catch of salt codfish in Newfoundland. The report has this to say:

> The act which came into force in July, 1947, gives the fisheries prices support board the usual powers of a government corporation; provides a working fund of $25 million; and sets out the two methods that may be used to support prices of fisheries products. These methods are (a) the purchase of any fisheries product at a prescribed price and (b) the making of deficiency payments to producers of a fisheries product equal to the difference between a prescribed price and the average price at which such product was sold during a specified period.

Now, sir, that is what was done for the 1950 catch. The government set the prescribed price for which this fish should have been sold. They said it was $10.10, and the average price received by the fishermen was $8.80. Subtract $8.80 from $10.10, and you get $1.30. I continue:

> The act furthermore directs that in prescribing prices, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for fisheries by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries and those from other occupations.

That was a very laudable object which the fisheries prices support board had in mind. I do not think they made a proper adjustment for the 1950 catch by giving $1.30 to a man who had received an average of $5.50. I do hope that this year they will profit by the experience of the past year and be a little more generous in their recommendations.

But, sir, that is not all about the fisheries. I do not suppose many hon. members in the house are familiar with the manifesto issued by the present premier of Newfoundland prior to the election that took place there on November 26. If they had been able to see that manifesto I think they would have been astonished, if they knew anything about the history of Newfoundland, because one of the policies outlined in this extraordinary manifesto is to take 10,000 men out of the fisheries and put them to work in factories. Anyone who has any knowledge of economics or sound economy for any country must realize that that is revolution. The number of people engaged in the fisheries last year could not have been much over 20,000. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant might know the figure, but I think it would be in the neighbourhood of 20,000. To take half the fishermen out of the fisheries and put them at jobs in factories would mean what? What would be the result? What would be the effect on the fisheries? Is it going to make the fisheries better? The premier of Newfoundland thinks he is going to put new life into the fisheries by taking 10,000, or half the people, out of them. That is not all. I mention this not from the political standpoint but purely from the economic standpoint, and to draw the attention of the government and the officials concerned in the fisheries department to the policy being enunciated by the premier of Newfoundland. He says the men, women and children, the fishermen, their wives and their families, must be taken away from the slavery of making fish. That was the first time I had ever heard of fishermen being regarded as slaves. I have often heard of wage slaves, of people working in factories living like slaves, but I never heard of fishermen living like slaves, and I do not think it is a sound or sensible statement.

Again, the reason I am drawing it to the attention of the federal government is that this government has a paramount interest in the fisheries of Newfoundland. I do not know what the present policy of the federal government is, but fisheries come under its jurisdiction. What does it say in regard to the policies enunciated by the premier of Newfoundland? The fisheries board of Newfoundland is going to continue to operate for five years, but after that who is going to take over the management of the fisheries? Is it the federal government? Are they going to have anything to say in the meantime? Will the pattern be cut and finished when they take over in another two and a half years? I know the minister has expressed an interest and sympathy. He has advocated an advertising program. I believe he started a kitchen to show people how fish should be cooked, and only today I received a very pleasant surprise, namely a little book of fish recipes, telling us how to cook fish, anything from lobster to salmon, cod and herring.

Mr. Knowles: A very good book.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman thinks it is a very good book. I do not know what his wife will think of it.

Mr. Knowles: I have already sent it to her.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad to hear that, too. I should like the minister to tell us what is the result of this policy that he enunciated with such enthusiasm and such confidence a year and a half ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Have you a book telling how to sell fish?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is another matter; that is something that he has not told us yet.

Mr. Noseworthy: That is fish of another fry.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have tried to encourage the minister to have confidence in the fisheries; to get him to realize that the salt cod fishery is not a dying industry; that it is a most important industry in Newfoundland still. Despite all this industrialization program of the provincial government, the salt codfish industry remains an industry that has the most far-reaching effect. If hon. gentlemen could have seen the happy look on the faces of fishermen whom I met in the northern parts of Newfoundland last year when they were taking in hundreds of quintals of fish they would have realized the beneficial influence which a good cod fishery has upon the people. I do not know what they are feeling like now with the market depressed and prices low, but I am satisfied that the government has not been doing all that it might do to assist in the marketing of codfish. I noticed that two years ago we sold several thousand quintals of fish to Spain. None was sold last year. Although we were told that a contract was being negotiated, it never came through.

Spain used to be the best market for Newfoundland codfish, taking as high as 375,000 quintals a year. Last year they took none. Does anyone think for a moment that the Spanish people are not eating salt codfish? Of course they are. They are catching some of it themselves, and perhaps they are buying more—I believe they are—from Norway. Therefore there is a market there still which has to be negotiated. The minister told me on one occasion that Spain had a favourable balance of trade with this country. There is something to work on. There are other things which may be purchased in Spain, so that we might have a reciprocal trade agreement with that country. It is a country with a very large population, much larger than Portugal, which takes a great deal of fish, while Spain takes none. I therefore urge the government to explore every avenue to try to sell codfish in Spain.

Brazil is another market that began to deteriorate back nine or ten years ago, and we have not been selling much fish to Brazil. Certainly the government cannot overlook the fact that these countries regard salt codfish as a highly desirable food. It can be so well preserved and carried from place to place, and therefore there must be a need for it if they would only arrange the transaction. I do not say that it is an easy thing to do, but I think there may be a lot more done than has been done in the past.

To go back to this policy enunciated by the premier, of taking 10,000 men out of fisheries; what would be the effect of a policy such as that? Not only 10,000 men would go from the villages, but their families would go from them. Thirty or forty thousand people would be taken out of those fishing communities and would go to the city of St. John's or wherever these industries are started, and live in crowded quarters, tenements and that sort of thing. They would not have the happiness of living in their own homes, and their property would deteriorate. I have a question on the order paper asking the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) about how much money is being lent outside the city of St. John's. I do not think any money is being lent to these fishing communities to make the homes more attractive to the families of fishermen. It seems to me that if the people in the maritimes or in the west can complain about the amount of money that is going to be spent on the seaway project, then the fishermen in all parts of this country have some cause for complaint. They live in isolated communities, and see grand houses being built in the cities while no money is being lent to them to improve their living conditions. What will happen to the schools, churches and local amenities that have to be kept up by contributions from the fishermen if half the population is taken away? It seems to me to be a suicidal policy, and I believe the man who advocates it will find he has made a tremendous mistake.

In addition to those ideas I have mentioned, he also suggested in his manifesto that instead of the traditional way in which the fishery has been conducted he is going to introduce another revolution in the curing of fish. Instead of the individual fisherman going through the various stages of curing and selling his fish, as he has done in the past, the government is going to set up a central curing establishment to which the fishermen will bring their fresh fish. There it will be treated and cured, and from there it will be marketed. This sounds like a plausible scheme, but unless it is a co-operative project in which the fisherman will get his share of the profit or benefit as a result of working through this agency, then he will be even worse off than he is today. He will receive only the price for his fresh fish, which of course is the lowest price at which the commodity is sold. Naturally when the fish just comes out of the water it has a lower value than after it has been processed, salted and dried. In that way the fisherman's family add to the value of the fish and add to their income. If the policy of establishing this central curing agency is pursued it will not only destroy the independence of the fishermen but will make them far more dependent upon government assistance than they have ever been in the past.

On occasions I believe the federal government, as well as other people, have made reference to the change that is taking place in the cod fishery due to the expansion of the fresh and frozen fish market, especially in the United States. It is a tonic, therefore, to realize that in the past few days New England interests have been appearing before the United States tariff commission demanding an increase in the tariff on fresh fish imported into the United States. I say that is a tonic because it is a reminder to those people who are placing so much confidence in the United States market that this market may be lost over night. The difference of a half a cent a pound may ruin that market for us, and the tariff may be raised more than that. Next year is an election year in the United States, and it is possible that the tariff commission may do something to satisfy the New England interests who have always been jealous of the sales made by the Nova Scotia and Newfoundland fishermen in the United States market. I noticed, too, that not only Nova Scotia and Newfoundland fish is going into this market, but since 1948 the Norwegians have been selling frozen codfish in the United States market. Although in 1948 they sold only a small quantity, about $85,000 worth, this year the value of the fish sold was over $2 million. In the salt codfish markets of the world Newfoundland has been faced with Norwegian competition, and now Norway is going into the fresh fish market of the United States.

It would not be wise for the government to depend too much upon the expansion of the fresh fish market. In Newfoundland we are going to get two or three new plants this year, and several new draggers have been built or purchased during the past year. The federal government is experimenting wih new ways of catching fish. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the chief problem facing the salt cod fishery is the marketing of salt codfish. The government need not be so worried about the question of catching the codfish. I believe the Newfoundlanders know how to catch codfish if the government can only assist them in marketing it. We have these new plants, these new vessels and these new methods, but I think it is a dangerous policy to allow the salt cod fishery to decline in the way it has during the past three years.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: It is not ten o'clock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Some of the members must like what I am saying since they want me to continue. I have something which I should like to read. I should like to draw to the attention of the house a bulletin issued by the fisheries council.

Mr. Bryce: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is there any guarantee that we should be finished this debate if the hon. member is allowed to complete his speech? Is any other hon. member going to speak, because if he is there is no use sitting here.

Mr. MacInnis: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I can finish in another fifteen minutes.

Mr. Knowles: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact the hon. member for St. John's West intends to speak only fifteen minutes longer, I suppose the hon. member for Selkirk withdraws his question? The hon. member for Selkirk suggested that this was the last speech. Shall we allow the hon. member for St. John's West to continue?

Mr. Adamson: I regret to inform you, sir, that it is not the last speech.

On motion of Mr. Browne (St. John's West) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall consider the Senate amendments to Bill No. 21, an act respecting the Canadian forces. I understand there are some minor amendments.

Mr. Knowles: Several pages of them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But they are repetitious. Then we shall consider Bill No. 33, an act respecting the St. Lawrence seaway authority; Bill No. 34, an act respecting the construction of works for the generation of electrical power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river; then the resolution concerning the amendments to the Dominion Elections Act; the resolution concerning the National Gallery of Canada and the resolution to amend the Civil Service Act; then Bill No. 8, an act to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 11, 1951

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF REPORT FOR FISCAL YEAR 1951

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the report of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

TABLING OF COPIES OF PROTOCOL FOR ACCESSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I beg leave to table three copies of the French and English texts of the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty on the accession of Greece and Turkey, signed at London on behalf of Canada and other members of NATO on October 17, 1951.

GRAIN

PROVISION FOR SHORT-TERM CREDIT TO PRODUCERS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to make provision for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties, arising from inability to complete harvesting operations or to make delivery of grain, through bank loans guaranteed by the crown with limitations including a limitation to the effect that the liability of the crown to pay losses will not exceed $5 million; moneys payable under the act to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO COMMITTEE ON DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): The Minister of National Defence has just tabled the annual report of the department. I should like to know whether it is his intention to refer it to the special committee on defence expenditures.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): As far as I know it is not the practice to refer annual reports to committees. The report is available for consideration by all hon. members of the house.

Mr. Graydon: Including the committee.

Mr. Claxton: Within its terms of reference.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

TO PROVIDE FOR COMPENSATION, PENSIONS, ETC. —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS— CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENT

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 21, respecting the Canadian forces.

He said: I move:

That the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill No. 21 sent up from the House of Commons, intituled: "An act respecting the Canadian forces," be concurred in with the exception of their sixteenth amendment to which this house proposes the following consequential amendment:

That subparagraph (iii) of paragraph (d) of section two of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, as proposed by the Senate be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

"(iii) who, wherever he may have served, is by reason of disability attributable to or incurred during such service in receipt of a pension."

And that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours therewith.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, these amendments really deal with twenty-four acts. The amendments from the other place occupy some seventeen closely printed pages in our Votes and Proceedings. I have compared them with the original sections in Bill No. 21 as passed by this house, but without referring to each of these twenty-four acts in their original form it is a little difficult to understand exactly what the amendments made by the other place consist of. I think before we concur in these amendments we should have some explanation with respect to each of them from the minister.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I was just about to make that explanation when the hon. member rose. The bill, as hon. members learned when it was before this house, is largely technical in character. A very large number of the amendments were textual in that they substituted the word "army" for "military". When the bill came before the other place it was decided that it would be desirable, instead of making the proposed amendments to the various statutes by deleting one word and substituting another, to set out the section as amended in each case. That was done, and that disposes of all the amendments proposed by the other place with the exception of one.

There is only one amendment which is not of that character. I want to make it plain that all the amendments proposed in the other place, with one single exception, simply have the effect of replacing the whole section with a new section rather than merely substituting for the amended word the word of the amendment. Therefore they are not substantive in any respect whatever. The single exception is also purely of a technical nature. When clause 16 came from the other place it was found there was a clerical error in the amendment to clause 16 as it was proposed. This error would result in the re-enactment of a provision of the Veterans Land Act in the same language in which it appeared prior to an amendment made in 1949. That amendment brought the definition of "veteran" in the Veterans Land Act into line with language used in the Pension Act. If we were to accept the proposed amendment to clause 16 in its present form, we would be restoring the law as it existed prior to the 1949 amendment, which of course would be undesirable. In other words, in proposing this series of amendments in the other place the law officers there in one instance used the name of a statute which is no longer its proper name, and I propose to move an amendment to this amendment in order to correct that error.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the consequential amendment proposed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is one that should be made, and I am glad to support it. But I feel that with respect to the series of amendments sent to this house by the other place I must say that I regard them as the most ridiculous set of amendments I have seen in parliament for a long time. The Minister of National Defence has pointed out that, with the single exception of the case which he now seeks to correct, none of the amendments proposed by the other place has any effect in substance whatsoever. All that Their Honours have done is to make the Canadian Forces Act two or three times more bulky than it already was in the form in which it went through this house.

I have taken the trouble, because after all it is our job as members of parliament, to check the amendments proposed by the other place and to compare them with the sections in the House of Commons bill which they seek to amend. I find that out of twenty-nine sections in the bill Their Honours have rewritten in whole or in part twenty-two of them. I find, as the Minister of National Defence has pointed out, that in most cases they have rejected the House of Commons proposal for a simple amendment that just changes the word "military" to "army" or something like that. In its place they propose that the whole of the section be deleted and that the section as amended be put into the amending statute. I appreciate the fact that those who put forward this idea in the other place said that the purpose was to make the law more clear. I suggest that they have added to the confusion.

As the bill was brought into the house by the Minister of National Defence, drafted I take it by our law officers, I think it was not too bad. In each specific case where an act was being amended it was set out in the simplest possible language. For example in subsection 1 of section 3 of our bill we said that wherever the word "military" appeared it should be struck out and there should be substituted therefor the words "naval, army or air". I submit that when one is looking at a statute and learns that it is amended it is far easier to tell what the amendment is if the amending statute draws your attention to the one word that has been changed, pinpointing it as our bill did, rather than having to read the whole of the section over again as Their Honours propose and then go back and read it two or three more times to try to find out what the difference is in case it escaped you the first time you read it.

I submit that Their Honours have done a ridiculous job and have made the whole thing far more confusing. If that is the best they can do in the other place it is time the other place was abolished. Let me give some concrete examples. Section 3 of the bill as passed by this house consisted of seventeen lines of type. By the way, it is 11 point type, 24 ems wide. Their Honours replaced it with a full page and a half of 9½ point type, 30 ems wide. There is no reason why I should not add to the confusion—since that is what Their Honours have done—by introducing these technical terms. But my point is that if we go through this bill section by section, and accept Their Honours' proposals that we delete a few lines and put in twice as many lines, or that we delete a few lines and put in two or three pages, the result will be that when we get through, instead of having a relatively simple bill such as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) brought in, we will have a very complex document.

I point out further that, in ordinary practice, people who have to refer to statutes do not for the most part refer to the original act and then to the amending statutes. What they normally refer to, in ordinary practice, is an office consolidation. That office consolidation is prepared in such a way that amendments such as these are incorporated in their proper place. I know office consolidations are not supposed to be admitted in court; but in ordinary practice they are used by those who wish to find out what the law is in a given case.

But in addition to the practice of using office consolidations, we have at this particular time in our legislative history the fact that we are revising the statutes of Canada. We passed an amending bill in respect to that only a few days ago. We know from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that when those revised statutes come out they will be known as the revised statutes of 1952, and they will include all the legislative acts passed by parliament up to the end of 1951. It seems to me quite clear from that that these minor technical, one-word changes made by the Minister of National Defence in his bill will be distributed through the various statutes, and this amending bill will no longer be one to which people will have any occasion to refer, at all.

It looks to me as though Their Honours realized they do not have anything to do. They just thought up a job for themselves and, instead of giving the country evidence that they are working, they simply have given the country evidence of the fact that that other institution should be abolished.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is not before the house at the present time. The hon. member should not cast a reflection upon the other place.

Mr. Knowles: Well, no one in this house is more anxious than I am to obey the rules, and I respect your stricture that I must not cast a reflection upon Their Honours. They have done it themselves.

An hon. Member: They "did" it themselves.

Mr. Knowles: They "have done" it themselves. And it is not the first time. I was referring to a few of these cases. Section 4 of our bill said all that needed to be said in four lines of large type. They propose that it be said in ten lines of small type. Accepting Your Honour's ruling I must not comment; but surely I can say to this House of Commons that we ought not to be asked to pass such a ridiculous amendment as that.

Then, I move on to the next, dealing with section 5. We said in our bill all that needed to be said in sixteen lines of large type. They rewrote section 5 to the extent of a full page and a half of small type. The next one, section 6, for some reason or other they did not decide to change. It is fairly long, and I suppose they thought that it is already long enough.

Then we come to the next one, section 7, which is headed "Exchequer Court Act". For what was said in the bill in eleven lines of large type they propose to substitute twenty-two lines of small type. And so it goes on.

I turn to another example, that of section 24 in our bill, in which we dealt with the Statute Law Amendment (Newfoundland) Act—and I congratulate the Minister of National Defence and the law officers of the crown, or whoever it was who drew up the bill, upon doing a good job on section 24. They said all that needed to be said, and said it in fifteen lines of large type. More than half of those lines are very short ones. There it is, set out so that anyone, be he lawyer or layman, can understand it quite clearly. But Their Honours were not satisfied with fifteen lines of large type. Oh no; they propose, in place of those fifteen lines, two full pages of small type.

But the honey of them all, of course, is section 19. Section 19 in our bill is one which deals with the War Service Grants Act, 1944. It is a little longer than some of the others. But Their Honours have taken the forty-eight lines of large type, which said what needed to be said quite clearly, and, as set out beginning at page 271 of Votes and Proceedings for Wednesday, December 5, they have substituted four full pages of small type. Could anything be more ridiculous? It is completely unnecessary.

It is unnecessary because office consolidations are always prepared. It is particularly unnecessary because we are going to have revised statutes within a very short time. And, not only is it unnecessary, but it means that the ordinary person looking at these four pages of amendments to this section will have to take a magnifying glass to pore through it, to try to find out what the change was.

The way the bill was brought to the house it was quite clear as to the change the government wanted to make. I have made a number of references to the fact that the bill is set up in large type. It is 11 point roman, to be exact. Votes and Proceedings is set up in much smaller type—again to be exact it is 9½ point excelsior on a 10 point slug.

If the amendments are accepted by this house—and I say they should not be—the bill will have to be reprinted, so that all these amendments may be incorporated in the reprint. When one tries to compare these two sizes and styles of type, it is pretty difficult to estimate what the result will be, so far as the number of pages to be occupied by the amended bill is concerned. It has not yet been reprinted. I take it the reason it has not been reprinted is that there is still a question whether or not this house will agree to the amendments made in the other place. I have made a rough estimate and, having had some experience with these things, my estimate would be that the bill, which now occupies only fourteen pages, will occupy at least thirty-five and perhaps might run to fifty. That is the only practical result of the amendments now before us, namely, that we should substitute for a document which did the job in fourteen pages one which seeks to do the job, although in a more confused manner, in from thirty-five to fifty pages.

I hope it will not be out of order for me to make this reference, namely, that the day after Their Honours passed the bill, arguing that all these changes needed to be made, with this resulting bulky document, in that same other place senators got up and said there was too much printing being done around this place, and they proposed that a committee of the Senate should go into the question and find out if there is not some way in which the amount of printing can be cut down. Well, even Your Honour will have to admit that that only adds to the ridiculousness of the whole picture. It is complete inconsistency. What I said a while ago, when Your Honour ruled me out of order, is certainly true.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—DEEP WATERWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LAKE ERIE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I have here a statement which explains the purpose of the bill. However, the other evening a number of questions remained unanswered. I would deem it a privilege if I could make the statement and answer the questions at the same time. I would prefer to do that in committee of the whole, and if that is agreeable to the house, I would proceed on that basis.

Mr. Adamson: If the minister does not propose to make a statement on this project, I should like to say—

Mr. Chevrier: No, that is not the position I have taken. I have a statement here which I think should be placed on the record at this time in so far as the bill itself is concerned. It explains the purposes of the bill. Any of the remarks that I have made thus far have dealt with the resolution and with the subject in a general way, but the remarks I should like to make now deal with the bill itself. There has been no definite explanation of the bill. Since I must make the statement now I shall, of necessity, have to make one later in replying to many of the questions that have been raised. I simply asked the permission of the house to do both at the same time when we are in committee of the whole, and wondered if my hon. friend would not consent to that.

Mr. Adamson: I feel that on the second reading the whole purpose of the bill can be debated in a general way, whereas in committee of the whole a more detailed discussion takes place. If the minister would not mind, I feel it would probably help the debate if he would make his statement at this time when we are dealing with the bill in a general way.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): If it is the wish of the house, then I bow to it. I hope that during the course of the debate I shall not be charged by hon. members with not replying to the questions. I am now offering to deal with them to the best of my ability, and I hope to the satisfaction of hon. members who have raised them, but I shall not be able to do that now until we are in committee of the whole.

The bill which is now before the house provides for the establishment of a corporation to be called the St. Lawrence seaway authority. The main provisions of the bill fall into four parts: one, constitution of authority; two, purposes, capacities and powers of the authority; three, tolls; four, financial provisions.

The authority to be set up under the bill consists of a president and two other members to be appointed by the governor in council. They will hold office for a term not exceeding ten years and will be paid salaries to be fixed by the governor in council.

The authority will be an agent of His Majesty, and will have power to enter into contracts either in its own name or in the name of His Majesty. It will also be enabled to hold property in its own name and to bring or defend legal actions.

The president will be the chief executive officer, and he will be charged with the direction and control of the business of the authority. The president may, subject to the provisions of any bylaw, delegate any of his powers to the other two members. The authority will be authorized to employ such officers and employees as it may determine, and these officers and employees will not be officers or employees of His Majesty. There is provision for a pension fund for the members, officers and employees of the authority.

The purposes for which the authority is established are found in section 10 of the bill. This section provides that the authority is incorporated for the purposes of:

(a) acquiring lands for and constructing, maintaining and operating all such works as may be necessary to provide and maintain, either wholly in Canada or in conjunction with works undertaken by an appropriate authority in the United States, a deep waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie;

(b) constructing, maintaining and operating all such works in connection with such a deep waterway as the governor in council may deem necessary to fulfil any obligation undertaken or to be undertaken by Canada pursuant to any present or future agreement.

Section 11 of the bill provides that the authority shall, for the aforesaid purposes, have the capacities and powers of a natural person as if it were a corporation incorporated by letters patent under the Great Seal.

The authority is also given power to lease lands, property and water power, to borrow money up to a maximum limit of $300 million, and to manage and operate any canals or works similar or related to the works covered by the act that may be entrusted to the authority by the governor in council.

The authority is also given power to expropriate land and the provisions of the Expropriation Act are made applicable to the exercise of this power by the authority.

Section 15 gives the authority power to charge tolls on vessels navigating the canals and their cargoes. In the first instance the authority establishes the tolls to be charged. The tariffs are filed with the board of transport commissioners, and any interested person may file a complaint with the board as to unjust discrimination. The board will then make a finding on the complaint and report this finding to the authority. There is provision for appeal, and section 52 of the Railway Act relating to appeals is made applicable to the findings of the board.

The bill provides that the tolls charged by the authority shall be fair and reasonable, and shall provide a revenue sufficient to defray the cost to the authority of its operations in carrying out its purposes, which cost shall include—

(a) payments in respect of the interest on amounts borrowed by the authority.

(b) amounts sufficient to amortize the principal of the amounts borrowed over a period not exceeding fifty years, and

(c) the cost of operating and maintaining the canals and works under the administration of the authority, including all operating costs of the authority and such reserves as may be approved by the minister.

Provision is made in section 17 to cover the establishment of tolls in case of works constructed by the authority in conjunction with works undertaken by an appropriate authority of the United States.

Sections 25 to 27 inclusive provide for loans and guarantees by the crown. Section 25 provides that the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the governor in council, may make loans to the authority out of the consolidated revenue fund or guarantee payment of principal and interest on money borrowed by the authority. It should be noted that no such loans and guarantees shall be made or given in any fiscal year except to the extent that parliament has authorized such loans and guarantees in that year. Parliamentary control of the financing of the authority is thus ensured.

Section 26 provides for temporary loans to be made by the Minister of Finance to the authority not to exceed an aggregate amount of $10 million. The power given to the authority to borrow is limited to an aggregate of $300 million, so that the amount of the loans or indebtedness shall not at any time exceed this maximum. The accounts and financial transactions of the authority are to be audited by the Auditor General.

There are, Mr. Speaker, a number of other sections in the bill which speak for themselves, and upon which I do not think I should make any comment at this time. I did feel, however, that a short statement should be made as to the general purport of the bill, and as hon. members have seen it can be divided into these four divisions. I believe that is all I should say at the moment.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I am very glad to have the statement of the minister at this time on this most important work. The only criticism one could possibly make of the development of the St. Lawrence, both for the purposes of navigation and power, is that it probably comes fifty years too late. The development of the St. Lawrence is a further step in the fulfilment of our national destiny, called the national policy by Sir John A. Macdonald at confederation. During the time of the financial panic in the United States Roosevelt said that the only thing the United States had to fear was fear. We are less prone to the hypnosis of fear than the people of the United States. The only thing we Canadians have to fear is timidity. When we have failed, our failures have all come from leaving undone the things we ought to have done, and undeveloped the things we should have developed. The St. Lawrence is a link in the chain of the national policy as dreamed of by the fathers of confederation. Like the transcontinental railways, the project will be a great unifying work for the stability and the solidarity of Canada. Sir John saw Canada as a great industrial nation, and we must not lose that dream. This development is but a part of it.

It used to be said that trade follows the flag. The modern adaptation of this saying is that industry follows power. Ever since the industrial revolution it has been the history that industry developed where there was an adequate source of primary power. Up till recent times this has been coal. Now it is electricity, in Canada developed by water and gravity; and it may be, possibly during our lives, derived from atomic force.

The national policy, as I see it at the half century, shall be that the first responsibility of any federal government to Canada is to encourage the development of every source of primary power, no matter where it is situated in Canada. We have recent examples of developments—for example, the Kitimat development in British Columbia, which has been the result of an amazing bit of foresight on the part of a group of industrial people who are developing that part of the country in northern British Columbia.

I believe it is part of our national responsibility that every power resource that can be developed must be developed, and that it is a prime responsibility of the federal government to do so. I wish here to say that the power resources—whether they be in the maritimes, such as Passamaquoddy, the Chignecto canal, the great untapped developments of north-flowing rivers from the height of land to the Arctic ocean, or the developments in the prairies, such as the South Saskatchewan and elsewhere—are all part of our national heritage. They are all part of the vision of development that the fathers of confederation had. Unless we are prepared to see that every single bit of natural resources is developed in Canada, we are not going to meet the challenge and to achieve the destiny envisioned by the pioneers, the fathers of confederation.

The next and equally important requirement in addition to power is an adequate supply of raw material. If this is not available at the site of the power development or the coal mine then cheap transportation—and water transportation is by far the cheapest—must be available to bring the raw material to the power; because there is an economic limitation on the distance over which power can be transmitted. For all practical purposes that distance is about 400 miles. The unique feature of the St. Lawrence is that it provides both power and transportation. It will bring to the sea an industrial area with a production at present as great as that of the whole of the continents of Africa and Asia.

Canada's industrial growth to an industrial nation has taken place in the comparatively recent past in conjunction with the development of electric power. I want to mention for example the development of the province of Manitoba. Manitoba has not been thought of as an industrial, but rather as an agricultural province. Yet figures recently given in this house by the new hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) showed that Manitoba today is an industrial province and is shortly going to be one of major proportions. That situation has been brought about largely because of the development of hydro-electric power in that province.

Canada's economy must be strengthened by doing as much as possible of the manufacturing and processing of our raw products before they are exported. Power and population are essential for this purpose. In the Pre-Cambrian shield north of the agricultural belt in the central provinces, we have an enormous base metal and other mineral potential. Much of this has now been developed, but a great deal more awaits development because of the question of transportation and the question of bringing to the mine the necessary fuel for smelting.

A friend of mine, who is connected with one of the major base metal companies, said that, were this transportation and power project to be developed, his company would seriously consider sending their concentrates for smelting either to tidewater or to the canal. This would not only result in a lower price for the final product but make available vast new deposits of low grade ore in the north country.

The steel industry, which is probably of the most vital importance to the economy of any country, is greatly dependent upon this deep waterway and upon the power as well. I remember that some years ago, when the Steep Rock development was fully proved but had not yet been properly opened up, when $10 million of new capital was required to develop the mine, we unfortunately had to go outside of Canada to obtain that capital. The development was financed through United States capital, and in consequence a great deal of that ore will have a primary duty to go to United States mills. One can understand that, but at the time to me it seemed a pity that we were not able to do in Canada the essential financing of that iron ore deposit. The question of Labrador of course is a major one for the economy of the whole continent, I might say almost the whole world, because with the gradual exhaustion of the central iron range in Minnesota, and the lack of any new discoveries, apart from Steep Rock, of high grade iron ore in the centre of this continent, the entire continent—I speak continentally—faces a shortage of the essential sinew of her economic production.

The iron ore from Labrador is a natural challenge to us in Canada, and it is imperative that our steel industry, no matter where it is situated at the present time, shall be able to have a sufficient supply of that iron ore to maintain and to increase itself, because the steel industry is the one on which the whole economy of our basic and secondary industry depends. Steps should be taken to ensure that the ore from this development, or sufficient of it, should be made available to our own steel industry.

I then come to the shipping industry. A speech was made in this house the other day with which I regret I cannot agree. With an adequate canal from tidewater to the great lakes we may expect a tremendous increase in the shipping industry in Canada. We have considerable facilities now and we have the ability to increase those shipbuilding plants along the great lakes. I am speaking this way because I disagree with what has been said about the danger to this industry. To give the history of the Panama canal, the same argument was put up in opposition to the Panama canal, that it might destroy the shipping industry along the Pacific coast. Actually the very reverse happened, and today from Vancouver right down along the Pacific coast the shipbuilding industry has been a major factor in the development of the economy of that coast. So will, I am sure, the shipping industry benefit from the opening up of this deep canal.

The canal is to be twenty-seven feet deep, and that will adequately take care of, I believe it is, very nearly 90 per cent of all the ocean-going ships that are in existence at the present time. Therefore we have no real danger for the shipbuilding industry. As a matter of fact we are likely to have a tremendously increased market for that industry.

Special types of ships will be constructed for the trade of the great lakes, as there have been special types of shipping constructed for nearly all the trade of the world. A special type of ship ran from the Argentine to England with chilled meat. There are other special types of ships—or there used to be—designed for that, and until the government of Great Britain ceased to buy meat, or was unable to buy meat, from the Argentine, these ships plied the very lucrative trade. Other special types of ships were built for frozen meat from New Zealand and Australia. I mention this merely as an example of the extent to which our shipbuilding industry on the great lakes may be expected to expand. Unquestionably new types of ships will be developed in Canada for specific trade that we do not know very much about at the present time, not merely bulk ore carriers and bulk grain carriers but specific ships developed for various different trades.

Then I come to the coal industry. It was said in the railway committee that the economic limit of Canadian coal from eastern Canada was somewhere near Montreal. I think the president of the Canadian National Railways said that the economic limit of Canadian coal was somewhere in the Montreal district, or around Montreal. With adequate shipping facilities—and, Mr. Speaker, it is not at all beyond the realm of possibility that with modern icebreakers the St. Lawrence can be kept open practically all the year—the area served by maritime coal is surely likely to be greatly expanded with this development. Up to now we in the central provinces have been dependent very largely upon United States coal, and the new generating stations at Windsor and Toronto are completely dependent, or were dependent, upon United States coal. If we can extend the area in which we could use our own coal, surely that is one of the useful things that this project will bring about.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad the minister says "hear, hear". I do not know how far that coal can be economically shipped, but I do believe that this development will greatly enlarge the area.

I mention these things, Mr. Speaker, because this project is a great link in the development of Canada as a whole. It must be considered not alone for its benefit to one part of Canada. It will, I think, be found to be of great and enormous benefit to the country as a whole.

I am not going to go into the opposition to it at great length, but I think something should be said in this house as to the opposition to the St. Lawrence deep waterways—both that, and the power development. The deep waterway has been under active discussion for twenty-seven years. Tentative legislation has been under consideration for that length of time. I think the first bill was presented in 1931 or 1932 by the government of Mr. Bennett.

Almost all the opposition is from extremely powerful lobbies in the United States and I think some mention must be made of this fact at this time. I do not propose to criticize in any way the United States form of government, but the fact is that under their system a powerful minority can and will block, and has blocked, an essential development for the national good in order to serve its own selfish interests. I say that without rancour or any feeling of animosity. Those who are opposed to this are acting in their own interests and because they feel that that is the proper thing for them to do.

I say in all seriousness that we are never likely to get an agreement on this matter through the United States congress. There are names and personalities which I might cite who have set themselves up in opposition to this development and have been and still are able to defy the wishes of both the major political parties in the United States and of every president since Coolidge. There is no reason to believe that their power has diminished in any way and we are not being realistic if we expect them to change.

This opposition is just like two men who jointly own a tool shed in which they store the necessary tools to prepare and keep their gardens fertile and prosperous. Each has a key to open the door which has two locks. One man comes over with his dog and little boy who prevent him from putting the key in the door and opening it. In this case the United States government has asked repeatedly for this development but the dog, in the shape of the United States Senate, and the boy, in the shape of the United States House of Representatives, have refused repeatedly to let their Uncle Sam use his key and thereby pass the legislation. I think we must recognize these facts and be prepared to go ahead with the project no matter what happens.

If there is anything that is likely to cause delay it is for this house to show reluctance to proceed with the waterway and the power development, which latter of course is a natural resource of Ontario and Quebec, with resolution and determination, and alone, if need be. We hope to have the co-operation of the United States because that would be infinitely better; but, if that is not to be, there should be no holding back on this development. There can be no saying that we have not enough information. There can be no suggesting that we should have more time to study this, that or the other angle.

All these angles have been studied and studied for decades. Competent engineers and economists and businessmen have almost unanimously backed the project. The time is now. There can be and there must be no further delay. We have the know-how, the money and the vision—we must put them to work. I had hoped that both bills would be considered at the same time because a great deal of what I have said applies to both the power and navigation projects. If there was ever a time when we must be resolute, it is now and in connection with this matter. We cannot be put off even though we get no assistance whatever from the United States.

The St. Lawrence canal must be proceeded with. No longer can the production of an area which equals the production of the entire continents of Africa and Asia be denied raw materials and adequate cheap transportation to the sea. That is the challenge. That is the problem facing this house today. I say in all seriousness: Let us get on with it; let us brook no more interference; let us show that timidity is no part of the heritage left to us by the fathers of confederation. Our destiny as a nation demands action now.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I think we all owe a great debt of gratitude to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for the splendid way in which he has presented the purpose of this bill and the other bill which is to follow. I understand that we will be in order when discussing this bill to set up the St. Lawrence seaway authority to refer to the other bill with regard to the development of hydroelectric power. The presentation by the Minister of Transport was both comprehensive and logical. He not only gave a concise history of this great scheme but also showed the tremendous benefits that will accrue not only to Canada but also to the United States from the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and hydroelectric development. In fact I find it particularly hard at this time to get on my feet and say anything that the minister has not already said, but at the same time I have a few random thoughts that I should like to present to the house. I might say that on several occasions I have spoken in this chamber on the subject we are now discussing, and furthermore I have addressed service club meetings in both eastern Ontario and northern New York state. I find that there is general unanimity of thought in this section of the province of Ontario and in northern New York state.

Unfortunately, however, there are still many sections of the United States, particularly on the Atlantic seaboard and in the deep south, where the majority opinion is against the building of this great national and international project. In the issue of Fortune magazine of December, 1950, there appears an article entitled, "Battle of the St. Lawrence", written by Freeman Lincoln. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read the opening two paragraphs. They are as follows:

> A brief look at the map of the world will do for a snap judgment as to the common sense of the man made ditch across the isthmus of Panama and of that other ditch linking the Mediterranean and Red seas. Strong instinct says that the building of the Panama and Suez canals at whatever cost was inevitable and right; that if they had not been built there must have been sharp and dirty knife work at some political cross roads. On the proposition of constructing a deep waterway in the St. Lawrence river to tie the North American great lakes to the Atlantic ocean and so to the world the verdict will be the same. The St. Lawrence seaway will give access to an inland sea whose busyness is indicated by the fact that more yearly tonnage passes through one of its bottlenecks, the locks at Sault Ste. Marie, than passes through the Panama, Suez, Manchester Ship and Kiel canals combined. It will give Canada and the United States together a new seacoast more than 8,000 miles long with ports such as Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago and Milwaukee. The project also includes a power station on the St. Lawrence that will allow Canada and the United States to divide twelve billion kilowatt hours of cheaply produced electric power each year, enough to take care of greater New York's annual needs.

Further on, in explanation of a map of North America, there is a short sentence which I think is also worth putting on the record. It reads:

> The St. Lawrence seaway project, now battered and hackneyed after fifty years of futile argument, will provide deep water transportation between the Atlantic ocean and cities on the great lakes, with a hydroelectric power station of greater capacity than Grand Coulee added for good measure.

The article is worth reading in its entirety. It is a wonderful record of the history and development of the St. Lawrence seaway project, but the article also shows the powerful lobby that has been against this scheme for so many years. There is an organization in the United States known as "The National St. Lawrence Project Conference", the subtitle of which is, "A Nationwide Organization in Opposition". There are no less than 250 separate organizations within the framework of this one organization. Offices are maintained in Washington, and the sole purpose is a constant lobby against the seaway in the United States congress.

We have seen how successful the lobby has been in the past. We have seen how it has deprived not only Canada but many American states as well of the advantage of this vast scheme, which must go through. I feel that the best method has been devised in order for Canada to proceed with the scheme on its own. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said to a group of college students and graduates at St. Lawrence university in Canton, New York, a year ago last June, Canada has been very patient but our patience is wearing very thin.

In setting up an authority, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has outlined to the house, we will have found a means of financing this great project without the necessity of calling on the hard-pressed taxpayers of Canada. As has been explained, tolls are to be levied against ships and their cargoes, ships of all nations and cargoes of all kinds. These tolls will be applied against the normal operating expenses of the canal that are involved in keeping the canal open for navigation and the locks running, and furthermore they will be used to amortize the bonds.

Unfortunately much publicity was recently given through the press of Canada to a statement made that the farmers of the west would be obliged to pay for this great scheme. They will make their contribution but it will only be a part of the payment, and I do not think anybody minds paying a contribution if it means a reduction in freight rates. I understand an estimate has been made that freight rates will be reduced approximately four cents a bushel by shipping through the great lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway. The statement claiming that the western farmers will pay for the seaway is unfair because all ships and all cargoes, as has been said before, will be paying tolls. I regret that this statement was made by a prominent Canadian ship owner, and furthermore that it was made in the other place.

I find it very hard to understand the attitude of certain members of the house. They preface their remarks by saying that they are all for the St. Lawrence seaway, and then they proceed to pick it all to pieces. It is quite evident that this attitude is a sectional one and completely cuts across party lines, as demonstrated by the speech just made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and the speech made last week in this chamber by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson). I wonder if those members who preface their remarks by saying that they are going to support the seaway and then try to throw every obstacle in the way of the passage of the legislation are not doing so for one of two reasons, or perhaps both reasons. The first, of course, would be to have their remarks published in the home papers for the reading enjoyment of their constituents. The other reason, a little more sinister, is that by introducing this delaying action these bills would not be passed at this session, but would have to wait until the next one. By that time they believe they will have mustered enough force to bring pressure against passage of the bills once and for all. I hate to think that this could be the motive. Nevertheless, speaking as they have, one cannot help feeling there is something more behind it than just the procedure of addressing Mr. Speaker.

I must say the statements of certain members, particularly from Ontario, are very different from those issued by the premier of Ontario and by the chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, both of whom have demanded—not requested—have demanded immediate action. Furthermore I am told the government of Quebec has signified its intention to make further developments at Beauharnois, and also in connection with new hydroelectric installations at Lachine.

Living as I do on the banks of the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river, naturally I am unequivocally supporting the two bills. I live twelve miles above Prescott. Every day during the season of navigation I see the small canal-size steamers plying their trade back and forth. When the grain begins to move I see the large upper lake freighters bringing their vast cargoes of wheat down to the Prescott grain elevator, where it must be stored for transshipment to Montreal in the small canal-sized freighters. What a waste, to see these small ships of canal-size plying back and forth, when one realizes that one of the upper lake steamers can carry as much as ten of the smaller ships. The economy of the whole system is unsound. It means larger crews, larger fuel consumption and more of everything, thus bringing about an uneconomic system.

We see also the small tankers coming up from Montreal laden with refined gasoline, and returning empty. Some day I visualize the large tankers going to the head of the lakes, and there filling with the petroleum now being piped half way across the continent from the Alberta oil wells to the vast storage tanks at Superior, Wisconsin. This would bring Canadian oil to the refineries at Montreal, which are now dependent for their oil supply upon the pipe line built during the war from Portland, Maine, to Montreal. The crude oil is piped from Portland after being unloaded from the tankers that pick it up in South America, the Near East and Texas. This is another reason why it is essential that the larger tankers be permitted to carry Canadian crude oil rather than the crude oil produced from wells in other parts of the world.

I find it very difficult to understand why North Americans are so loath to take advantage of the great God-given resources of our two nations. Forty miles below Prescott one sees the awe-inspiring sight of the Long Sault rapids. At this point a power dam capable of producing 2,200,000 horsepower is to be built. This is to be divided equally between Ontario and the state of New York.

In eastern Ontario I do not visualize vast wharves connected with the loading and unloading of grain, nor do I see the building of vast drydocks; but I do see us on the threshold of the largest constant potential supply of electrical power in the world with every port along the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river and the great lakes a potential seaport.

My mind goes back three years to the power blackouts we had not only in eastern but throughout central and southern Ontario. We have been warned by responsible engineers, and other men in authority, that we may look forward to a similar power shortage within four years, unless the mighty waters of the St. Lawrence river are harnessed. If we are obliged to undergo these objectionable blackouts, not only are they an inconvenience to householders but, far more important, they put a tremendous crimp in industry and are seriously detrimental to the proper operation of farms.

In a time of peace a shortage of power is unfortunate; in the event of war a power shortage is a national disaster. Under no circumstances must this be allowed to occur.

The answer to the power shortage, the answer to additional navigational facilities, the answer to the proper development of the ore bodies in Labrador, all lie in the passage of these two bills now before the house.

If we cannot have the support of our neighbours in the United States, then we in Canada must go ahead on our own. Naturally we would prefer to have a joint undertaking. But in the event that these lobbies about which I spoke earlier are so powerful that they will prevent the legislation going through the United States congress, we have no alternative but that of going ahead on our own with the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the building of the St. Lawrence seaway. I commend highly the stand our government has taken in this connection.

I am confident most Canadians rejoice in the government's having devised a means whereby Canada can go ahead on its own, with this tremendous scheme, and without any further delays, such as those which have been caused by the united efforts of certain wealthy minority vested interests.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, while speaking in the house last January I went on record as being very much in favour of the development of the combined power and seaway project in the St. Lawrence river. I am a resident of the Niagara peninsula, where the major part of the total developed electric energy of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario has its source, at Queenston and at DeCew Falls. Further power development is under way now in the Niagara district. Even with this power, it is expected that Ontario will experience a power shortage by 1956. From 1927 to 1950 I had the honour of being a member of the Ontario municipal electric association, and I followed power matters rather closely. During part of that time the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was the premier of Ontario. It was the policy of his government, as well as that of the present and previous governments of Ontario from the days of Sir Adam Beck, to try to meet these power demands.

This has not always been possible, however, because of the increasing domestic use of power as well as the great power demand caused by the rapid expansion of industry during the war and the more recent preparations for defence. I agree with the Ontario government and the chairman of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario that unless Ontario receives power from the St. Lawrence project the normal industrial development of that province will be hindered. I live within a few hundred yards of the banks of the Welland ship canal. The remains of sections of two previous canals clearly demonstrate the progress and development of shipping in the last century. The remnants of the old locks are there. The old locks were 110 feet long, while the locks in the present canal are something over 800 feet in length.

When we speak of the St. Lawrence development we refer to it as consisting of power and navigational projects. The original Welland canal was constructed with these two aspects in mind, namely to provide a waterway between lake Erie and lake Ontario to overcome the falls and rapids of the Niagara river, and to produce hydraulic power for local industry. I believe the subject has been well covered in the debate, and I do not propose to go over any of these matters. I thought that I might give a little historical background of the development of the Welland canal, which was the first and most important link in the development of our inland waterways.

The Hon. William Hamilton Merritt conceived the idea of a canal in 1818. At a meeting of the residents of that area in the village of Beaver Dams in the same year, it was decided to approach the legislature requesting the appointment of an engineer to go over this project. Some money was appropriated to look over the land between lake Erie and lake Ontario, but it was reported that the proposed route was too near the frontier. Consideration was given to a canal from lake Erie to some place in the area of Burlington bay. This route would have been almost twice the distance of the original route proposed by those who were interested in 1818.

In 1823, five years later, the people in the district were encouraged by the success of the Erie canal in the state of New York, so collected enough money amongst themselves to have a survey of the route made. Eight men under the presidency of Mr. George Keefer formed the Welland Canal Company, with forty thousand shares which were sold at 12 pounds and 10 shillings each. These shares were sold to farmers and such other residents as would buy them. In passing, it is interesting to note that Mr. Keefer had some illustrious sons, one of whom was the engineer who built the first suspension bridge across the Ottawa river, the first of its type in Canada and who supervised the building of the original houses of parliament on this site.

The people from Lower Canada, mostly from Quebec city, came to the aid of the people in Upper Canada and subscribed to the extent of £10 thousand. The company was incorporated in January, 1824, and on November 30 of that year the first sod was turned. On that occasion the Hon. William Hamilton Merritt made a speech from which I should like to quote a few extracts. The ceremony took place near the little village of Allanburg, and two hundred persons were present. In his introduction, he said:

> We are assembled here this day for the purpose of removing the first earth from a canal which will, by the shortest distance, connect the greatest extent of inland waters in the whole world; and it gives me peculiar pleasure to find that the line of this canal has been located in this neighbourhood, the inhabitants of which have turned out on all occasions with a zeal and alacrity worthy of the undertaking.

He expressed some of the difficulties with which they were faced in this way:

> We were fully aware of the supposed magnitude of the undertaking; we were sensible that the personal interest of the capital and talent of the district was against us, and that we had no co-operation to expect from them, which the result fully proved. Every attempt has been made to get his project taken up by able hands, but not one individual of extensive capital in the province, or in any high official station, has given it the least assistance, except the Hon. John H. Dunn.

They had other difficulties. For instance, it was hard to get local subscribers to pay up their subscriptions, because it was rumoured that the people in Quebec who had subscribed had not paid up their subscriptions. He enumerated the benefits that would accrue in this way:

> Instead of remaining in this dull, supine state, in which we have been for years past, we shall mingle in the bustle and active scenes of business; our commodities will be enhanced in value, and a general tide of prosperity will be witnessed on the whole line and surrounding country. In short, gentlemen, we are situated in a country favoured with every advantage, in soil, climate and situation; its resources remain only to be known to draw men of capital amongst us; and we trust, now that improvements have been commenced, it will increase, and that we may witness the same spirit of enterprise here that our neighbours, the Americans, possess in so eminent a degree.

Further on he says:

> We remove the only natural barrier of importance —the falls of Niagara. The rapids between Prescott and Lachine command the next consideration.

Just as they do today. There is one more paragraph I should like to read which makes some comment on what the people thought of the government of the day:

> When we contemplate the natural advantages we possess over the Americans in our water communication, it is astonishing to think of the apathy and indifference that have hitherto prevailed amongst us on this subject. If we inquire the cause, nine-tenths of us would blame the government.

Just as we do today.

> There never was a more erroneous idea. We are ever inclined to move the burden from our own shoulders, and can only blame ourselves.

Then in one last sentence he says:

> It is a rare occurrence that measures of great national improvement originate from the administration of the government.

[Mr. McMillan.]

Most of this work, Mr. Speaker, was done by hand. Diggers were hired at 63 cents a day. Upper and Lower Canada subscribed for stock, and by five years later—in January, 1829—boats were able to go from lake to lake. Since that time two canals have been built. One was built in 1870 and another was started just before the first war and was completed in the early thirties. I hope hon. members will forgive me for giving part of this historical background.

In those early days, when money was scarce, the people had vision and foresight. There was less dependence upon the government than there is today, and they tackled something more out of proportion to their means than we are asked to do today. It is true that the profit motive was present there, but in those early days the people of Upper and Lower Canada united their resources to build something that was for the good of Canada as a whole. The same spirit I would say is evident among members of this house. Practically all members are in favour of this project. Likewise, I think that we as members should support the government in projects in other parts of Canada if it can be proved that they have a good economic basis and can stand on their own feet.

I think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) made a brilliant exposition of this subject in introducing the bill the other day. I would be interested to see figures showing prospective earnings of the navigational part of this project. I think we all should like to see such figures. In the light of present-day requirements of iron ore and of the movement of other commodities, we should probably be able to get figures as to the minimum tonnage that would be required in any one year to liquidate this amount of money that has to be spent.

I am convinced that we should construct steel mills to process our own iron ore in this country as much as possible, but I would be adverse to withholding any iron ore from our friends to the south in the United States. I think we should remember that our country was built up by iron and steel from their mills.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he says that this resolution is only window dressing for the purpose of providing power for the province of Ontario. I am not conversant with the engineering part of the program, but I imagine that one project is a complement to the other. In any case, the province of Ontario will pay in full for its power, and I think it is time that we clear up this bottleneck of shipping in the St. Lawrence.

The minister said that money would need to be spent on the Welland ship canal for dredging, and that the locks were adequate. There are seven locks on the Welland ship canal. Locks Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 7 are single. Locks Nos. 4, 5 and 6 are twin; they are called twin flight locks. They are built that way because of the contour of the land which is the Niagara escarpment. These locks are built end to end, and they succeed each other much like the steps on a stair. Their total lift is 139½ feet. A few hundred yards from the top of lock No. 6 is lock No. 7, where boats are lifted to the summit level which is practically the level of the water in lake Erie. At the present time when shipping is busy in the canal, lock No. 7 is a bottleneck. Certainly in years to come, if the canal gets busier, I would think that lock No. 7 would need to be a twin lock. There are many industries along the canal. It is the hope that the minister will give favourable consideration in regard to the naming of Port Colborne, which is situated at the lake Erie end of the canal, as a port of registry.

In conclusion, I would say that the people of Welland county are much in favour of this double project, because in times past we have been short of power, and it will not be long now before we shall need more power in that area where power is produced; we should also like to get an adequate gateway to the Atlantic.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage in the session I welcome the introduction of this bill, as I think do most hon. members. I do not intend to take up a great deal of the time of the house because we have had some exceptionally fine speeches by hon. members with regard to the merits of the bill, and to go into the matter in detail would be to repeat, to a great extent, what has been said before.

First, though, I should like to disagree entirely with what the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) said a few minutes ago as to some hon. members who did not share his enthusiasm for this project and who in the course of his remarks indicated that some hon. members—the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I think, and some from Ontario—were speaking for a political purpose. I think hon. members will agree with me that any member who had occasion to speak, and who did not share the optimism of many of the rest of us but had some reservations, was not speaking for political purposes but rather was speaking in the interest of his riding, of his province and, I am sure as he thought, on behalf of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I come from Sarnia, which is in an area on the great lakes which adjoins the river St. Clair. Naturally I am quite enthusiastic about this project; and, as has been said before, I only regret that it was not started many years ago when no doubt labour and materials could have been obtained at much lower prices than those prevailing at the moment. Even at this late date the government has been well advised to undertake this project, not only from a commercial standpoint but from the standpoint of what it might mean to the defence of our own country and from the standpoint of the part that we may be able to play in sharing in the defence of our ideals.

There is one idea that is shared by most hon. members—and I want to be quite plain and factual about it. It is this. I do not think any hon. member would espouse this, or any other project, if it were going to benefit his own area to a certain extent and damage other areas to a greater extent. Hon. members are certainly to be commended on the broad approach they have taken to this idea. Some reservations were made, and I think they were made honestly. We must give those who made those reservations credit for their intent and their modesty in the manner in which the reservations were made. I think that we of the central part of Canada share with the people from the west and the maritimes in their points of view and in their problems. This is one move that is being made for the development of our natural resources. This is a scheme that will no doubt play a big part not only in the increase of wealth and production in the west but I hope in the maritimes as well as in the central provinces. I share the opinion of most hon. members when I say that we should view this project fairly, as we should view the development of other natural resources which do not necessarily affect the central provinces, but do affect the west and the maritimes. I say, as did one of my associates in this party, that the South Saskatchewan scheme should also be given prompt consideration. It seems to be worthy of the consideration of the house. In addition to that area there may be other projects in the west which should be gone on with to develop our natural resources and to make Canada the country that we hope it may be and will be. I know I speak for the Ontario members when I say we share the perplexities of the hon. members from the west and the maritimes. We know that a further development of our natural resources will bring prosperity to those areas and also will be of great help to the different areas of Canada. We should not forget the projects that have been advanced so often not only by members of the party to which I belong but also by members of other parties. I refer to the Chignecto canal and the Passamaquoddy development. There are others. I think the maritimers have been very patient and very fair in this house, in view of what they have had to—I was going to say, suffer. I do hope that when this project is undertaken it will receive the close co-operation of the different provinces. I am now speaking of the ore to be mined and smelted. I recall the statement made by the minister the other day that part of this development came within the jurisdiction of the provinces. I do hope that our government will negotiate, so to speak, with the different provinces, so that instead of exporting this ore in its raw state to our friends to the south we may have mills, whether they be in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario or Quebec, or wherever they may be, that will give a great deal of employment to the people of our country. If that is done our iron ore will not be exported in the form in which we used to export our pulpwood. The construction of steel mills will be a great factor in our economy, and it will be a great project for the maritimes. We can probably build along this waterway new mills to smelt steel, which we badly need. Steel, Mr. Speaker, is the most important factor in our industrial development. I think it is more important than ever before, and the development of this country depends to a great extent on an increased production of steel. In the furthering of this huge development I hope that those who have some responsibility for increasing the production of steel will see the opportunity and the necessity of increasing the production of that necessary product, which is in such short supply today.

Without repeating, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. As I see this picture developing along the great lakes—and no doubt the idea will be shared by many who have been to different parts of Europe and have seen the Ruhr valley and the great industrial development there—it is going to take time, but many areas along that waterway will become large industrial areas because of this development. This country is not known so much as an agricultural country today; it is becoming a great industrial nation. The more we consider the necessity for smelting our own iron into steel the more important it will be for Canadians as a whole. I should like to emphasize that I would hate to see too much of this ore go to the United States in its raw condition, because we in this country have the necessary initiative and engineering ability to undertake any project. I am glad to be one of those who share the view not only of hon. members but of the people of the country that we are happy that at last we have taken this matter under advisement, with the determination to promote it and not stall any longer.

Unfortunately we have been dependent on the United States for co-operation for a great many years. I do not hesitate for one moment to congratulate those in government today, whether in Ontario or Ottawa, who say that we are ready to go it and to go it alone. I think the people on the other side of the border realize that we are not fooling. I am satisfied in my own mind that we are not, and that we do not intend to. If the challenge is accepted and if they see the necessity of coming into partnership with us in this country in this undertaking it will mean much not only to the United States but to ourselves as well.

A moment ago I mentioned the Ruhr and the great development I could see in this country along this waterway. I can see huge investments and new industries of all sorts, which will mean the development in many ways of our different natural resources. Considerable employment will result, and no doubt this will prove an impetus for the government to increase immigration into this country, which is so necessary for the development of our natural resources. Here and there along the route of this waterway certain projects are in the offing for the development of harbours and so on; and in the development of this project I assume the government will take the long range view. I do hope that this project will be developed before too long.

There is one other angle I should like to discuss, and perhaps the minister can check me on this before I go into details. The St. Lawrence seaway authority is being incorporated for several purposes, and I wonder just where the different municipalities will stand with respect to taxes.

Mr. Chevrier: The municipalities would come under the statement brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) which provides that if there is a certain amount of government property in a municipality—I have forgotten the percentage—they would be entitled to certain taxes.

Mr. Murphy: I understand that this authority will be a crown corporation. The Minister of Finance stated, I think in February, 1950, that payments in lieu of taxes would be made under agreements between crown companies and municipalities which would be fair and equitable under all the conditions. I think those were about his exact words. In fairness to any municipality which might benefit I think there should be a revision of ideas with respect to these payments by crown companies in lieu of taxes. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is in his seat and I am going to take advantage of this opportunity to make this statement. We are proud to have in Sarnia the Polymer Corporation, a crown company. On one side of that corporation is the Dow Chemical plant and on the other side the plant of Imperial Oil Limited. Up to a year ago the crown company paid to the township a certain sum in lieu of taxes. Under the new legislation brought down this crown company, which is engaging in commercial business, was to pay what was fair and equitable. I might mention that next year Dow Chemical will pay $50,000 in taxes. I am not mentioning Imperial Oil. Polymer is now within the municipality and the agreement reached between the municipality and the crown company provides that the crown company will pay $45,000 in lieu of taxes.

That may seem a large sum to some people, but we must remember that these chemical companies are huge empires. They are not some little industry put up on a building lot. In fairness to the municipalities and to the crown companies there should be a sharing of responsibility in the future which has not been evidenced in the past. I think we all agree that any industry creates certain obligations on the part of the municipality by way of education, services and that sort of thing. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will agree with me when I say that Polymer should be assessed at five or six times what Dow Chemical are assessed, and yet they have made a settlement for $45,000. I do not know what other crown companies across this country are doing, but I am concerned about the high taxes in our community. If it is not possible to reopen the 1951 arrangement, then I think the 1952 payment should be based on the statement made by the Minister of Finance and the taxes paid should be fair and equitable under all circumstances.

I think the majority of hon. members desire the early passage of this legislation, and I reiterate the hope expressed by the last several speakers that this project will be undertaken immediately because it is something which will be of great benefit to all.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, before I forget I should like to compliment the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) upon what he said about the maritime provinces and the people who populate that part of Canada. I do not know why I should feel so kindly disposed toward the hon. member for Lambton West when just recently his native city took from my town a most capable executive director. But I am sure the people of Saint John will find that the keenness of their disappointment is somewhat dulled now that the hon. member has spoken so intelligently on behalf of our provinces.

My first inclination is to compliment the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) upon the brilliant and comprehensive way in which he presented his statement in respect to the setting up of a St. Lawrence seaway authority. I know the keenness of the interest of the Minister of Transport in matters such as this, and I am fully cognizant of the great role he has played in the development of this country during the years he has been Minister of Transport. I cannot think of anyone whom the people of Canada would rather see present such a bill as this to the House of Commons.

I have listened with increasing interest to the numerous speeches which have been made in respect to the St. Lawrence seaway project. I say I have listened with interest, but at the same time I have felt rather disappointed because when I first heard that the seaway project would be introduced at this session I had the feeling that we would be treated to some very vigorous debates. Realizing the importance of this legislation, involving as it does the expenditure of possibly hundreds of millions of dollars on the part of the people of Canada, I have been amazed at the temper of the debate that has been going on since the minister so ably introduced the subject. I have found the debate to be dull, lifeless and uninspiring. Having regard to the type of debate that rages in the congress of the United States each time this subject is introduced, I cannot help but feel that the people of Canada will suffer something of a let-down if this legislation is permitted to go through without a full scale and much more vigorous debate taking place.

It is not intelligent for anybody to say there are no arguments which can be offered against the St. Lawrence seaway project. In my short lifetime I have heard any number of arguments which seemed to me intelligent and reasonable, yet I have heard few of them expressed during this debate. I have heard the estimated cost of the seaway placed at something over $800 million. I thought there might be some debate on the cost alone because I feel that these estimated figures must be at least a year old, and since the time they were drawn up costs have increased with respect to labour, materials and many other factors that will enter into the construction of this series of canals and the hydro-electric development which will go to make up the project.

It is estimated that the project may take something like five years to complete. Many competent engineers say it will take closer to ten years, and perhaps longer than that. If the cost in 1950 was but a little more than $800 million, having regard to the fact that the construction of the seaway will go on for years and that it will be necessary as time goes on to dredge harbours, increase port facilities and build defence installations, I think it is safe for me to say—and I think I can hardly be questioned for so stating—that the cost of the St. Lawrence seaway project will be closer to $1,500 million than $800 million. This alone should provide some reason for the people of Canada to question the seaway project.

There is also the question of the practicability of the navigation aspect of the plan. There are those who say that inasmuch as the seaway will be open for navigation only a little more than six months in a year the tremendous cost is not warranted. This draws me into another particular phase of the opposition and arguments which I say should be debated on the floor of the house. What effect is the seaway going to have on the railways? I have heard it said that they have no serious objection to the seaway. If there has been an official expression of opinion on behalf of the two major railways of Canada, I wonder if the opinion was not voiced with tongue in cheek, as it were. The railroads in the United States of America estimate that the loss in revenue to their lines would run anywhere from $100 million to $250 million per annum. Surely the railroads of Canada must be going to suffer some loss. Having regard to the fact that they will most likely have to keep their usual complement of personnel on the payroll and their usual amount of machinery in repair and operation during twelve months of the year, how much loss are they going to suffer during the six months the canal is being utilized for navigation?

We have heard arguments put forward on one side to the effect that the project will offer magnificent defence possibilities. Nevertheless many of its opponents in the United States point out, and I am sure with some reason and logic, that an enemy having access to the polar route could and definitely would plant one bomb that could render the seaway useless perhaps indefinitely. Another thing that might be said is that it is going to have a serious effect on our Atlantic ports. We have heard some measure of opposition from certain maritime members, particularly the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who have pointed out that the seaway may have a serious effect on our industries. Some maritime members have said that it may seriously affect our Atlantic ports. Perhaps it may, but to my knowledge these arguments have not been properly debated in the house. I repeat that the expenditure may run into $1,500 million on the part of the people of Canada, the people of British Columbia, Newfoundland, Alberta, New Brunswick as well as the taxpayers of Quebec and Ontario, and I say more serious consideration should be given to the whole question. We have heard the suggestion that the interests who were opposing the project in the United States had no right to oppose it, that they were representative of the vested interests. Well, perhaps some of them are. No one would oppose a project such as this unless he had reason for so doing. But the fact that they have been able to stimulate such opposition in the United States congress perhaps indicates that there are many logical and intelligent arguments against the seaway.

Surely it is significant that organizations financed to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars have been formed and have devoted much time and interest, through publicity and debates in congress, to opposing United States co-operation in the building of the seaway. These interests are not only the railways, which might be described as vested interests but there are also almost all the ports along the Atlantic seaboard and the gulf coast in the United States. Hundreds of chambers of commerce throughout the United States have gone on record as opposing the seaways.

I have had very little indication from members of the house that there is any great opposition in Canada. Perhaps that is all for the best. Perhaps there is not any real opposition in Canada, but from reading editorials in various newspapers in the last two years I would say there is some opposition.

I repeat that the whole matter should be debated more vigorously before the bill is passed. I have no thought in mind of retarding the passage of the bill; I have no thought in mind of keeping members of the House of Commons away from their Christmas holidays. But I do repeat I am disappointed; and I am sure many taxpayers of Canada will be disappointed if they read reports to the effect that the bill setting up the authority for the St. Lawrence seaway went through the House of Commons with a yawn and a stretch.

Strange as it may seem, I am not opposed to the seaway. Like most of the maritime members I could not in conscience oppose any measure which I feel may add to the development of the country, although it may add principally to the development of that section of the country which has already outpaced all other sections in its development. I still feel, however, that the matter should be debated at greater length.

I was proud to be a member of the House of Commons during the past week or so when I heard members from all parts of the country speak in the debate on the address in reply, and also on this particular question when it was in the resolution stage, and urge that if the government was prepared to invest such a huge expenditure in the development of the St. Lawrence seaway project it should at the same time express some interest in the suggestion that the authority for the St. Lawrence project be expanded to take into consideration projects in the maritime provinces and in western Canada. It was significant that members such as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford), indeed members representing all parties in the house, should take time to point out to the government its responsibility in respect of projects which should be surveyed and investigated, but which lie beyond the eastern borders of Quebec and the western borders of Ontario.

During the course of speeches he made in the last year, my good friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) referred time and again to the necessity for providing increased power facilities in Quebec and Ontario. In a speech delivered over the C.B.C. on November 21, 1950, he said:

> As a result of the rapid postwar expansion of industry in Canada, together with the constantly rising consumption of domestic power, the province of Ontario has been for the past few years subject to an acute shortage of power to meet demands. This is further accentuated by the present increasing activity in defence production.

And again:

> In so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, with the increased output at Beauharnois to be available in the near future the power situation in the large industrial area adjacent to Montreal will be satisfactory but for a few years.

The minister repeated these words when he spoke before the Montreal board of trade. He repeated them again when he spoke before the Canadian Club of Ottawa. I would ask him now: Does he think it unfair that those of us from the maritime provinces and from the western provinces—and particularly in respect of power in the maritimes—should ask that some interest be taken in the power projects which have been proposed intelligently by provinces, by groups and by individuals from the maritime provinces? I was sad to hear reference in this debate to the Chignecto canal. It is all very well to say that the Chignecto canal is a dead horse, and that we should not continue to flog it. But as I put on record in the house before, and as I shall continue to do so long as I am a member, the Chignecto canal stands before the eyes of the people of the maritime provinces as a grim reminder of a broken promise made—verbally, but nevertheless made—at the time of confederation. It is said that time is a great healer. Time will never heal that sore on the hearts of our people. It is true that there have been some grave expressions of opinion on the part of governments down through the years when they set up commissions designed to determine the feasibility of the Chignecto canal. The more recent commission, without examining any witnesses, without conducting any survey, merely by looking at a number of references given by some of the provinces and perusing a brief which was put before them by the Chignecto canal committee, endeavoured to effectively close the door on this project which stands so prominently in the minds of the people of our provinces. Perhaps the Turgeon commission has assisted time in dealing with the Chignecto canal, but perhaps time will assist the people of Canada, and more particularly the people from my part of the country, in determining the value of the conclusions of the Turgeon commission in respect to Chignecto.

That is not the only project that has been put forward by the people of the maritimes. There are proposals concerning the development of power in the Saint John river, and the development of the Quoddy scheme. Recently the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and I were in Boston. While there we consulted a number of New England industrialists and discussed the feasibility of Quoddy from various angles. I was happy to note that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) made a reference the other day to Mr. Sydney Grossman, one of New England's industrialists. Mr. Grossman said that if the governments could be persuaded to go ahead and complete the Quoddy survey, and if the survey revealed that Quoddy was feasible but the government of his country did not see fit to go ahead with the project, then he could lay his hands on at least $10 million to start the project as a private enterprise. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that is significant.

When the hon. member for Charlotte and I were in Boston we heard expressions of enthusiasm from all sides, not only from laymen but from competent engineers. The last time I spoke in this house I made a reference to a sonic survey that was being conducted in the Passamaquoddy and Cobscook bays by the United States board of engineers. In Boston I talked with one of those engineers and he made this statement, and repeated it later over the radio while we were being interviewed on a program sponsored by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He said that as a result of these sonic surveys the United States corps of engineers hoped that the estimated cost of the completion of the Quoddy survey would be cut by at least $1 million. Here we have been trying to get some expression of interest from the government of our country in the completion of this survey. On the other side of the border, just as there is a bill in this house asking for endorsement of a Canadian scheme for the St. Lawrence, there has been a resolution before the congress of the United States since August 25 asking for the full amount of money necessary to complete this Quoddy survey.

As I said before, it is an interesting parallel—in one sense of the word it is—that we are asking for authority to go ahead and spend over a billion dollars on the St. Lawrence, while for the Quoddy we are only asking that something like $2,900,000 be spent. Although I intend to support this bill, I find it difficult to go home to my people and say that I helped to vote millions of dollars for the St. Lawrence but I could not get one cent for the completion of the survey of the Passamaquoddy power project. The minister must recognize it as significant that none of the maritime members have expressed themselves as being unalterably opposed to the St. Lawrence project. Surely this must be an indication to him that we are not maritime righters obstructing the development of other parts of Canada and crying for the development of our own area alone. Surely this must be proof to the government that we in the maritimes are very pleased to see the other parts of the country developed. All we are seeking is an indication of interest in the development of our provinces.

I have discussed the Quoddy with some engineers in the different departments. Many of them say, "Well, you cannot establish to us that cheap power can be produced through the Quoddy project." Yet I know a very competent army engineer in the United States who feels reasonably certain that power can be produced at Quoddy at the rate of about 3 mills per killowatt hour.

An hon. Member: Time!

Mr. Riley: One hon. member has indicated that I have spoken long enough.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Riley: Perhaps my words may encourage other hon. members to speak. Perhaps we may yet have a full scale debate on the St. Lawrence seaway project. I hope the hon. member who suggested that my time had expired will get to his feet and make an intelligent contribution to the debate. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I may yet have another opportunity to speak. If I do, I hope it is only after there has been a full scale discussion of this all-important project.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has given us a most impressive talk. I hope I shall be able to be in the House of Commons long enough to see the maritimes have something of what is their right.

As to this St. Lawrence seaway project, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have endeavoured to give the matter most careful and realistic study and consideration. In 1941 I had the honour and the responsibility of leading the Social Credit movement in this house. In 1941 there was an imminent likelihood that the project would be proceeded with after the signatures were put to the agreement between the United States and Canada. At that time I studied intensively many works on both sides of the proposition. A number of those I have preserved as being what I thought to be the most factual, objective, well-balanced and reasoned presentations on the subject. I have before me now several of what I thought were the best. I have, for instance, "The St. Lawrence Seaway Project" by B. D. Tallamy and T. M. Sedweek of the Niagara frontier planning board, Buffalo, New York, published in 1940. I should like to read from paragraph 2 of the introduction to the rather extended document:

> In the preparation of this survey, the basic materials used were the reports of a joint board of engineers (appointed by the Canadian and United States governments), an interdepartmental report of the United States government, other governmental documents, and the report published by the Brookings Institution, an impartial research foundation of Washington, D.C. Original analyses as to the costs and as to the economic and political effects of the proposed seaway were then made from this basic material. Data from such sources were believed to be the most authentic information on the subject.

I gave this whole document careful and earnest study. I have another entitled "Some Observations on Canadian Public Finances, with Special Reference to the St. Lawrence Deep Waterways Project" by George C. McDonald, chartered accountant, December 9, 1940. From this document I should like to read the first three paragraphs:

> In March last when new projects regarding the St. Lawrence deep waterways were being discussed, I was asked by friends if I would make a report on the economic features involved in the light of present-day circumstances. I gave the request careful consideration, and because I am deeply interested in certain matters of public import which are reflected in greater or less degree in the waterway project, and in the various proposals as to its future development, I decided that I should be glad to express my views on some aspects of the problem.

My active interest in the subject had first been aroused as a member of the council of the Montreal board of trade when the report on the St. Lawrence waterways project was made to that body by Messrs. Holgate and Jamieson in 1929.

In 1931, in connection with the activities of the Canadian chamber of commerce, I gave further study to the matter.

That document starts in a rather interesting and impressive way. I read it through with much interest and not a little conviction. I have also "The St. Lawrence Waterway, A Study of the Economic Aspects", by John L. McDougall, Kingston, Ontario, September 3, 1941. I should like to read from that document the first sentence on page 3:

The writer of this report is an economist who received his post-graduate training at Toronto, London and Harvard universities, and in business, and who is now on the staff in commerce at Queen's university.

That sounds attractive to those who are impressed by academic degrees. Then may I read a letter which appears at the beginning of the document:

Canadian Electrical Association
Incorporated

Montreal, P.Q., July 21, 1941

J. L. McDougall, Esq.,
Department of Business Administration,
Queen's University,
Kingston, Ontario.

Dear Mr. McDougall:

This letter will serve as formal authority for you to make a study, in our behalf, of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

Of especial interest, at this time, is the question as to whether or not Canada can afford to devote the necessary manpower and materials to the building of the navigation and power canal and ancillary works. We understand that your study will be largely concerned with endeavouring to answer this question from the point of view of the welfare of Canada, having regard to the vital need for efficient prosecution of the war.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) H. E. Blachford,
Technical Assistant

That sort of introduction always commends itself to me. I have had quite a lot of training in university matters, and I have a high regard for well-trained people. All three of these reports were not favourable to proceeding with the waterway development at that time, and in some cases they were definitely antagonistic to the whole project.

I have an editorial which, with the consent of the house, I will not take the time to read but which I will have put on the record. It is from the Montreal Daily Star of August 12, 1941. It is the leading editorial and is entitled "No Seaway Now". Have I the permission of the house to put it on the record? It discusses the whole matter objectively. I am told that the editor of the Montreal Star at that time was a man of profound sincerity and sense of responsibility. I am informed that, before attempting to write so portentous an editorial as this, which opposes proceeding with the St. Lawrence waterway project, he gathered around him the best men he could find in Canada from a wide variety of fields of activity. In order to save the time of the house, if I may have permission, I think I will put on the record a list of nineteen of the men whom he called around him, with their qualifications and their positions. These were all men who had been selected especially to study the project. May I have the consent of the house to put this document on the record?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I think the policy of this house has usually been to accept tables for the record without reading them. I think it would be a mistake to depart from that policy and put on the record reading matter that is not in the form of tables. I know that in the United States congress they put whole books on the record, and the first thing that will happen here, if we are not careful, is that we will be doing the same thing. If the names are not very long I suggest to the hon. member that he read them.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, I am quite willing to do that, but it will take ten minutes of the time of the house. I think it is of sufficient importance in the circumstances to justify putting it on the record. Suppose I leave this and put it on after I finish the rest of my remarks; then people will be able to find it. In case there is no time we shall leave it until probably the committee stage of the bill or until some other time. It may be that hon. members will not find it of sufficient value to take up our time with it; but certainly there are some impressive names and titles among the names listed in this group.

At that time I endeavoured to form a sound opinion, and I felt, after all the studying I was able to do, that probably the St. Lawrence seaway project was one for some remote future. At least I was not in favour of proceeding with it under the circumstances which then obtained in Canada.

I have endeavoured to keep more or less in touch with the whole project and the development of thought in respect of it. Everything that has come to my hand I have filed away and read as soon as I could find the time and the energy so to do.

An example of the documents I have considered is one called "The Great Lakes-St.

Lawrence Seaway", which I am sure all hon. members have had, by J. G. McLean, vice president, apparently, of the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen, and national legislative representative in Canada. His article appears in the July, 1951 issue of The Brotherhood of Locomotive and Enginemen's magazine. I am not able to find exactly what is the standing of this gentleman, but anyway the document is here. I think it is worthy of respect. It seems to be written objectively, and the general feeling one gets is that the person knows a great deal of what he is talking about. I should like to read short excerpts from this document. On page 5 he discusses the No. 1 argument—that going forward with the project would provide for lower freight rates. He says: "Actually there is no assurance that it would." No. 2 is found on page 8. He says:

> The second argument previously mentioned, i.e., the project would provide for additional sources of hydroelectric power, is the most poignant argument in favour of the proposed seaway.

Therefore he gives considerable respect to argument No. 2. On the same page the third argument is discussed. It reads:

> The third argument concerning the encouragement of American capital investments is the most contentious of all.

By the way, these are not all the arguments the minister gave. The fourth argument, also found on the same page, is this:

> The last argument, which supports the seaway development which suggests that the plan will strengthen the national defence, lacks any serious merit.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members, including the ministers, will not blame a person if, after reading such documents as this and every other kind that he can get his hands on, he finds many questions still unanswered. This was the reason I wanted to ask a number of questions. I will be given the opportunity of asking those questions when the bill is in committee stage, but I thought this array of evidence ought to remove from everybody's mind the thought that I was endeavouring to obstruct the other night when I desired to hold up the project long enough to ask some questions that were in my own mind.

As I said when I spoke first on the project, Social Crediters will favour it because I believe we all have a sort of feeling it is the right thing to do; that it is good for the country, and we are pleased also that Canada is going ahead with it regardless of United States assistance. That commends itself to us. I said all this, of course, when I first talked on the subject. At the same time I wanted to keep myself open-minded, ready for information on either side of the situation, in case we might have made a conclusion rather too hastily.

I will say that, with respect to all these documents to which I have referred, the unanimous testimony of the witnesses was definitely against the immediate construction of the St. Lawrence seaway project in 1940. The one I read recently goes down to 1951.

I feel that the other night the minister made a magnificent speech. I do not know that I have ever heard a better one, better documented, better supported, better developed in every way and more beautifully expressed.

The question will be raised then: why are you not impressed by the statements from boards and other great authorities from whom the minister quoted? Well, I am going to tell you frankly, Mr. Speaker, and I am going to tell hon. members and the government why. Our age is an age of dangerous propaganda. The means of influencing public opinion today are so much more potent than anything heretofore known in the history of the world that we fail to appreciate what propaganda can do. And the means of influencing public opinion are so completely available to men of wealth and influence and so unavailable to people without wealth and without influence that every man and woman in the nation and in this House of Commons has to exercise the greatest reservation before he takes for granted an idea which is disseminated, propagated, and stimulated by high-pressure propaganda. I am going to mention just two illustrations, and I hope I shall not be out of order in so doing, just to show how careful a person has to be.

Hon. members will recall the tremendous outburst of propaganda which filled our newspapers from coast to coast, and cluttered up our radios in every direction, all advocating the Sirois report in 1941. The actual facts were that the Sirois report was one of the most pernicious documents ever advocated by a body of men in the history of the Dominion of Canada. I am not going into detail on that matter but I shall challenge anybody to disprove what I say; yet Canadians were almost stampeded in respect to the stand on the Sirois report. You found great headlines, often in colours, in some of the newspapers. "The people of Canada demand adoption of the Sirois report," but not one per cent of them knew what it stood for. That was the kind of trash that was poured out all over the pages of our newspapers.

We have seen the same thing in respect to this St. Lawrence seaway project. There has been well-paid, carefully calculated and subtly executed propaganda to prepare the people for it. Probably nothing like that was meant, but every person who tries to keep his feet on the ground and his head down out of the clouds has every reason to be reserved.

Here is another thing. Hon. members recall the Bretton Woods agreement. From the newspaper and radio propaganda that was carried on in support of the Bretton Woods agreement you would have thought it provided an entrance into kingdom come, that the minute we accepted Bretton Woods the whole lot of us would go right into paradise. All parties except the Social Crediters allowed themselves to be stampeded on Bretton Woods. When the thing was passed many members of the house thought, "well, we have done it; now our troubles are over." As a matter of fact that was the most dangerous thing Canada ever accepted in all her history, and was one of the major causes of the troubles under which the world is now struggling. But you could not even get a hearing when you attempted to reason about Bretton Woods. Hon. members in this house can remember that. So I take with reservation what almost anybody says. We are in an age when confusion is being sown deliberately by certain people.

There is another reason I have endeavoured to be cautious, as I am sure all people in Canada would expect me to be, or demand that I be, being in the opposition. The secret knowledge which may or may not have something to do with the desirability or undesirability of the construction of this project is not known to the people of Canada or to the members of parliament. There are no means whereby we can acquire that knowledge, no matter how diligent we may be in search of it.

The next difficulty is that we cannot tell whom to trust. I do not propose to give any illustrations of the way in which some of the most eminent men have allowed themselves to be tools in the hands of powerful interests in order that statements might be made which would advance the cause of those interests. I must say that I was under considerable anxiety and uncertainty when I was asking questions the other night. I was anxious, as the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) advises us to be, that there be adequate discussion of this matter before we put our signatures to so important a contract as one involving an agreement to build the St. Lawrence seaway.

Since I spoke last in this house I have had the opportunity of obtaining a copy of a speech delivered by General McNaughton. He is a man whom I trust to the highest degree. I am not unmindful of the fact that he is a great scientist, that he was a great general in the last war, that he is a man of courage and integrity. I am not unmindful of the fact that he occupies the important position of chairman of the Canadian section of the international joint commission and also chairman of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence. I think we must accept the word of such a man.

It would be contrary to all the principles of becoming deportment for him to let me know the inner facts upon which he based his conclusions. That is one of the unfortunate elements we must allow for. If he were to let me know, there would be no reason why he should not let others know. While I believe I could be completely trusted, I am afraid there are one or two that perhaps could not be. That means that I find myself without access to the fundamental facts upon which this man would base a statement similar to the one which he made in Toronto on December 6. May I read from the speech which that great man made; and I think we will all agree that we can call him a great man. Referring to the St. Lawrence seaway, he said:

> —it has now become most urgent that an early start be made on construction.
> This need for early action applies not only to the works contemplated on both sides in the international section of the river for power for which there have long been unsatisfied markets in each country for their respective shares; the need applies also for early action on the construction of the navigation facilities which recent estimates show will be used, well up to capacity, as soon as they are made available and because their absence has become a serious disadvantage to the trade and commerce of Canada.

Further on he used these words:

> The representations which have been made to the congress of the United States favour the combined project for navigation and power as conferring the most far-reaching benefits to the peacetime economy of the two countries; they make clear also that the early completion of the works for navigation and power is a vital matter in relation to the defence of the North American continent in this period of deep anxiety and great concern.
> In addition to the favourable report and recommendation given by the international joint commission, the project for the combined development of the St. Lawrence for navigation and power has been repeatedly before a succession of national advisory committees and the like both in Canada and the United States. In every case the project has been endorsed.
> It has also received the attention of a series of joint engineering boards, where the design of the works required has been developed in great detail and to the point that there is no longer any significant question outstanding between the technical representatives of the two countries.

And further down:

> The St. Lawrence project for navigation and power neither in its physical dimensions nor in its financial implications is that colossal, stupendous undertaking that some people have set out to picture, but I would agree that these superlatives will properly apply to the useful effects on our economy and defence arrangements which will come from its construction, more particularly at this time.

And the final quotation from that speech is as follows:

> The board, after searching analysis, stated the project would increase military potential out of all proportion to expenditure in manpower and critical materials, much of which would be required to be used in any event as additional power had to be provided.
> Having in mind these considerations and reaffirming its previous recommendations for the construction of the St. Lawrence project for navigation and power the board recommended:
> "That the two governments take immediate action to implement the 1941 St. Lawrence agreement as a vital measure for their common defence."
> Thus there is now on the public record the advice of the two bodies which have been created by Canada and the United States jointly to consider matters of mutual interest and concern along our boundary both for peace and for defence—the international joint commission, established under the waterways treaty of 1909 and the Canada-United States permanent joint board on defence, set up by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister King at Ogdensburg in August, 1940, have both recommended—repeatedly—that the St. Lawrence project for navigation and power should be built and promptly.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that such a pronouncement coming from this man at this time leaves me with no possible alternative but to support the measure without qualification.

What fundamental factors of the seaway situation could have so changed in either their nature or their incidence as to render out of date the conclusions of only ten years ago, to which I referred in the earlier part of my remarks, of those most respectable authorities? The answer is: "Scientific developments." Things have happened in the world in many different ways since 1940 that have rendered what might not have been an urgent necessity then a most urgent and probably inevitable necessity in 1951.

I said the other night that the Social Credit movement and Alberta would support the project provided it could be established that it would be of benefit to each of the provinces. I can think of no greater benefit that could be conferred upon any one of the provinces at the present moment than adequate defence. Therefore it appears to me as though we Social Crediters are completely in the clear and completely consistent in all the positions we have taken thus far. Defence is the answer to the questions as to what benefit will be given to each province.

What of the maritimes? I said some strong things the other day about the inequities that have been endured for many years by the maritimes, and I meant everything I said. I am completely out of patience with people who persist in neglecting the interests of the maritimes.

There are two things which I believe will give cause for comfort to the maritimes. Looking over the whole field I would say the first one is that apparently it will be absolutely necessary in the interests of Canadian well-being and United States defence to develop a great steel mill in the maritime provinces before long. I would say there are two points in the maritime provinces at either one of which, and particularly at one, the largest and finest steel mill we could build would appear to be entirely in order. If such construction were undertaken I believe the maritimes would benefit greatly by the building of such a mill, and would probably benefit more than they will suffer through any economic results of the construction of the great St. Lawrence waterway.

There is another point, and I am sorry to say there will be no responsive ears among the maritime people when I say this. By employing the principles of Social Credit it is possible to reorganize the economy of Canada in such a way as to make the maritimes enjoy an era of prosperity the like of which their most ardent lovers have never even dreamed of. The maritimes possess the resources. They can produce goods that can make them rich, happy and prosperous. That has been proved time and time again. Is there any man in this house who will deny that the maritimes possess resources in materials, manpower and morale to produce the things that are necessary to raise that area to a high standard of prosperity? Is there any man who will dare to contradict me? Very well. Then the only problem confronting us is to enable the maritimes to produce those goods and distribute them.

Surely distribution is not an impossibility if we can only outgrow the prejudices that we have grown up with. Therefore I say to the maritimes that in taking the position I am taking now I am not receding in any way from my determination to support maritime rights and improvements. As a matter of fact I am prepared to join any one or all of those who will take the foremost position in an effort to begin right now to change conditions in the maritimes so the people of that region will all be able to be happy.

Mr. Riley: Why not make a tour of the maritimes?

Mr. Blackmore: Oh, I have been in the maritimes.

Mr. Riley: We would like to have you make a tour.

Mr. Blackmore: I would be happy to go down there. Thank you ever so much. I am happy to be invited as you are inviting me now. I will drop in some time.

Mr. Graydon: You have got yourself a week-end visitor.

Mr. Riley: Most interesting.

Mr. Blackmore: May I revert now from a discussion of the problems of the maritimes to the St. Lawrence seaway. Under the circumstances I wish to assure the minister and the government that we shall be with them all the way in building the St. Lawrence seaway as soon as possible.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks regarding the St. Lawrence seaway, I want to point out that for two reasons I do not wish to say anything with respect to the power phase of the project. One is of course that it is probably a very sound idea, and the second is that it is primarily a provincial affair. However, I should like to make a few remarks with respect to the navigation aspect of the St. Lawrence seaway development. I must say to begin with that I do not share the almost unbounded enthusiasm that certain hon. members seem to have for the scheme. We should remember that geographically our country is very large and spread out, that our population is very small, and that we already have a great and costly system of transportation which our economy must carry. The per capita cost for transportation is already very high, and we should be most careful indeed before we add to that load. We cannot but add to the load if we proceed with this very expensive development of the St. Lawrence seaway.

It may be of course that from a navigational point of view the St. Lawrence seaway would be such a stimulus that our economy would strengthen and our population grow to the extent that shortly the per capita load cost for transportation would be reduced. But I have seen no proof that that will be so, and I actually doubt very much if that will be the case. I have considerable doubt about the almost limitless enthusiasm of some hon. members that we can make ourselves rich merely by carrying products from one place to another and carrying other products back again. That type of economic philosophy reminds me somewhat of the gentleman in Georgia who had purchased a small truck, and who had $50 operating capital. With the $50 he bought a mule, and transported the mule across the county, after which he traded it for a cow. He transported the cow to another corner of the county and traded it for two sheep. He took the sheep to another part of the county and traded them for two goats; and he sold the goats to one of his neighbours for $50. His neighbour said, "You have been very busy, but where did it get you? You started out with $50 in the morning and this evening, after expending a great deal of energy, you have ended up with $50." The first gentleman replied, "Yes, I know, but look at all the business I did."

I am afraid that is the attitude some people are taking about this St. Lawrence seaway problem. We are not necessarily going to strengthen our economy by carrying goods from one place to another. What we should attempt to do is create sources of supply near the markets and create markets near the sources of supply. Let us so far as possible cut out all this business of having to carry goods from one end of the country to the other.

But, as I say, even if it can be proven that from the standpoint of transportation the St. Lawrence seaway is economically sound, there are many other side effects we should guard against. I cannot see where this is by any means an unadulterated benefit, an unmixed blessing. There are side effects which, if precautions are not taken, will have a very detrimental result upon the economy of certain parts of this country. An example of what I mean would be the development of our vast iron ore supplies in the Labrador area. Precautions should be taken to see that the economy of Canada is not reduced to that of a nation of primary producers and kept indefinitely on that basis, due to the fact that the iron and steel industry of the United States has the momentum of an earlier start and, for a time, can possibly carry on more cheaply than we can in Canada. We should see to it that, if necessary, an embargo is placed upon the export of iron ore needed for the production of goods we require in Canada, both for domestic use and for purposes of national defence. I can see no future for us, as Canadian people, in mining ore in Labrador and shipping it to the United States for smelting and rolling into sheets, then exporting it back to Ontario perhaps to be manufactured into automobiles, refrigerators and all that sort of thing, and finally to have it sold to the people of Labrador and the maritime provinces in a finished state. I see very little future in that.

We should make every attempt to develop our industries for ourselves. In that connection I am happy indeed to observe the broad-minded and statesmanlike attitude taken by certain members from the central provinces. But equally I deplore certain examples of provincial viewpoints, as they have been expressed in the debate. I resent the suggestion that if everything is well with the St. Lawrence valley, everything will be well with this great country of ours from coast to coast. That does not necessarily follow at all. That sort of narrow, provincial viewpoint is expressed by those people who at this late date, after almost a century, would revert to referring to this great country of ours as Canada. They would describe as Canada this dominion which stretches from sea to sea, "from the river unto the ends of the earth." They would describe it as it was originally described when it was two colonies in the St. Lawrence valley known as the Canadas. After all, in the beginning we were a group of colonies. We entered confederation so that we would no longer be separate and small colonies but rather we would be a great dominion, a great nation, a great domain from sea to sea. I am sure one of the reasons the fathers of confederation agreed to giving the name Canada to this new nation was that that name should be preceded by the word "dominion". The idea was that the Dominion of Canada should spread from coast to coast, from sea to sea and, to use the biblical reference, "from the river unto the ends of the earth".

If Canada is to become the great nation which is and should be its heritage, then it should be the concern of the government to try to look at our problems in a national way and consider all areas of the country. I do not think that as a nation we can prosper if there are depressed areas, if there are areas where there is not sufficient opportunity even to absorb the natural increase in population. I am shocked by the report in the last census which shows that the population of Saskatchewan has actually decreased in the last ten years. In this great country there should be all kinds of opportunities, not only for those who are born here but also for those who immigrate to this country from the crowded areas in other countries.

The same is true of the maritime provinces. Ever since confederation the maritimes have been unable to absorb their natural increase in population. In that part of Canada there is not the opportunity there should be. Until we look upon our problems as those of a great area from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as problems that must be tackled for the benefit of all of us, I do not think we can hope to progress.

Therefore I support this scheme for the development of the St. Lawrence seaway only if it is a part of a greater scheme, only if it is one little bit in a large and beautiful mosaic of development which will make this country of ours the great nation it has the right to be. So I suggest that we embark as one great nation upon a purposeful, energetic and broad-minded program for the development of the whole of this great country from sea to sea, and "from the river unto the ends of the earth".

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Carroll in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I know hon. members will want me to deal with some of the questions raised the other evening. Before doing so, however, I think I should first of all express to hon. members my gratitude for the interest they have shown in the bill, and particularly for the patience they have shown during the progress of the debate. I am delighted—and I say this in all sincerity—with the wholehearted support that has been given to these projects, both in the resolution stage and in the present stage of the seaway bill. I say that because, while in some of the remarks I made the other evening I might have been provocative, I certainly had no intention of being so. I can only feel that the members who have spoken with some hesitation about some of the aspects in so far as their regions are concerned would not have spoken as they did unless these projects were to the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. Pouliot: We all like you as you are.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope, Mr. Chairman, that any of the remarks I shall have to make now will be taken in the light of this statement. I shall deal now with the charges and complaints that have been made. First of all by the maritime members: I refer now to the hon. member for Royal, the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings, who have said, during the debate on the resolution, that the maritime provinces were consistently forgotten by the government when great projects were being considered. Last evening and during the course of this afternoon the hon. member for Lethbridge stated that this and other governments had been scandalous in their treatment of the maritime provinces, in other words that the maritime provinces had been scandalously forgotten.

I want to pause here to thank the hon. member for Lethbridge for the attitude which he adopted just a moment ago. He put on the record a number of statements by General McNaughton and said that so far as he was concerned these statements convinced him, because if General McNaughton felt this great scheme was in the interests of national defence and in the interests of security that was enough to convince him, and the project had his wholehearted support. I thank the hon. member for his statement.

I do not intend, and I hope hon. members will not take it as such, to get into a debate with members from the maritime provinces concerning what has been done or what has not been done. But I think I should put on the record at least what my own department has done in two of the maritime provinces. I am referring to projects that are now in the making, and partly in construction, which amount to over $54 million. There are other projects with which my department is intimately connected or associated which total close to $40 million. Surely a member of the house cannot say his section of the country is being neglected when that amount is being spent.

Mr. Brooks: To what does the minister refer in making this comparison?

Mr. Chevrier: I am going to give the details. Again I say that I do not want to get into an argument, but I think in fairness to all members of the house the whole story should be told. The hon. member for Cumberland categorically stated that shipbuilding in the maritime provinces had been neglected by the federal government. In fact he went so far as to say that what had been given amounted to crumbs. We are spending approximately $38 million right now in connection with shipbuilding in maritime yards. But let me get back to what is being done in my own department. The causeway to bridge the strait of Canso is a measure of some importance, and it is going to cost $21 million. The ferry between Yarmouth and Bar Harbour in the state of Maine is a project which will cost $5 million. The terminals at North Sydney are costing $3 million; the ferry between Port aux Basques and North Sydney, $7 million. There are airport developments at Fredericton and Sydney, in the constituency of the hon. member who made a speech a moment ago, totalling $8 million. The national harbours board has projects in the two provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at Halifax and Saint John costing $10 million. This totals $54 million, and it is to be spent by the Department of Transport alone.

Then there is the naval program in the yards at Halifax, Saint John and Pictou for the construction of escort vessels, minesweepers and gate vessels, amounting to $29 million. There is the conversion work in other yards such as Pictou, Charlottetown, Liverpool, Lunenburg and Halifax, amounting to $8,500,000. All this totals about $94 million. Surely it cannot be said that no consideration whatever is being given to the maritime provinces. I have not dealt with Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland. I have dealt with two provinces because the complaints seemed to come mostly from those two provinces.

Before I deal with the two points made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I want to say that I believe we are going off on a tangent on this project. For almost the entire time we have been discussing iron ore. This is not a project to develop iron ore. It is a project to develop power in the international rapids section of the river and, second, to build a canal 27 feet deep from the port of Montreal to lake Erie. Surely that is an all-Canadian project and a project that will develop wealth in Canada. It is the continuation of a program developed by Canada many years ago when it was first decided to build the Welland canal. The moment you develop the power by building dams in the international rapids section of the river, you drown out the 14-foot canals that are in that area. This immediately brings up the problem of constructing new canals. We could continue to build 14-foot draught canals and provide an expenditure for that if we so desired.

Mr. Brooks: The minister suggested that one of the chief reasons for the development of the canal was the ore coming from Labrador.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, and I am not getting away from the question of the ore. I hope to be able to deal fully with it. What I am dealing with now is that we should have an all-Canadian project with reference to the ore, and my reply is that the main objective of the two bills which will be before the house is not the development of ore or the shipping of ore, but the development of power and the building of the seaway. What greater Canadian policy could there be than this seaway measure which establishes an authority to build and maintain the canal? True, if we go on with the 1941 development the authority will be able to build it jointly with the United States. But if the United States does not go ahead it is our purpose to build it on Canadian territory. What greater Canadian policy could there be than that? In dealing with the two questions raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra the other evening, I wanted to preface my remarks by that statement.

The hon. member said he has some difficulty or fears and anxieties—I do not blame him because those are questions which should be explained to the satisfaction of the house, if they can—about the fact that the greater part of this ore will be moved in United States bottoms. The first point is that by treaty the United States has a right of navigation in the St. Lawrence river from the head of the lakes down to the sea, which was accorded many years ago. They have that right. In the next place, today a United States ship may pick up goods at our ports and take them to a United States port or to a foreign port. Conversely, a Canadian ship can go into a United States port, pick up United States goods and move them into a Canadian port. Those are provisions that are the law, and they cannot be changed unless we amend the law.

But there is what is known as cabotage. A United States ship cannot pick up a load of grain in a Canadian port and deliver it to a Canadian port. On that basis a United States ship might well pick up ore at Seven Islands, but it would have difficulty in bringing back grain. That is why I attempted to say, or rather I said the other evening, that we were developing new specialized carriers on the great lakes for the purpose of moving ore on the upbound movement and taking grain on the downbound movement, and that I was hopeful it would be possible—in fact, I feel quite satisfied that it will be the case—that Canadian ships will be used for this purpose.

My hon. friend said: "The minister is too sanguine. If he thinks these iron ore people in Labrador and northern Quebec are going to use Canadian ships, he is mistaken." I might conceivably be mistaken. But what has happened at Steep Rock? There the ore is moved in Canadian bottoms. What has happened at Arvida? The aluminum company, through its Saguenay terminals, move all of their bauxite from South America—from British Guiana, I believe it is—up to that district in Canadian bottoms. What has happened with reference to the development of pulp and paper in the lower St. Lawrence? All that is moved in Canadian bottoms. While I cannot say what the iron ore people are going to do in six, eight or ten years when this project is completed, I know there are being built right now in the great lakes area, for the purpose of this trade, the following ships: the John O. McKellar, a bulk freighter which will probably be from 13,000 to 15,000 tons; the Sir James Dunn, a bulk freighter which was launched the other day; one C.S.L. freighter which has not yet received a name; the James Norris, another 14,000-tonner; the Gordon C. Leitch, a 14,000-tonner; one Algoma freighter, a 14,000-tonner. Again, not so long ago the Scott Misener was launched, a bulk freighter with a gross registered tonnage of 13,081 tons.

Mr. Green: How many ships will be required altogether?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not able to say, but a substantial number of ships will be in this trade. These people who are Canadian operators would not be building these ships if they did not think they could get the trade. My hon. friend says: What assurance have we that they are going to get it? I cannot give the assurance and I do not think anyone else can give it. All we can do is to look at history and say here is what happened in other cases. As to these ships that are now being built, I can come to no other conclusion but that the iron ore people will use Canadian bottoms in which to move the iron ore.

My hon. friend made another important point with which I should like to deal, and it concerns iron ore. Perhaps we could call it 6.15, Mr. Chairman.

At 6.15 p.m. the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned at 6.15 I was just beginning to deal with the subject of iron ore and the argument made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and some other hon. members, that we should look twice before exporting our iron ore. That statement and others that are allied to it deserve some consideration, and I propose to deal with it as best I can at this time. First of all I should like to say that the government yields to no one in its concern that Canadian resources should be developed to their maximum, and that Canadians should get the greatest possible benefits in employment and other forms out of these developments of our natural resources.

Our concern is as active in the case of the Quebec-Labrador ore deposits as in the case of any other resource. We certainly do hope to develop markets for iron and steel. Our hopes do not stop there, either. We will do all we can to develop markets for Canadian products made out of that iron and steel. At the same time, however, it is clear that in Quebec and Labrador we have iron ore in such quantities as to be surplus to any such domestic requirements for many generations to come. We do have markets that can be opened up for that ore. Steel mills that are now in existence are looking for new ore supplies, not hypothetical mills that are to be built at some vague time in the future.

Without relaxing our efforts to create a larger steel industry in Canada, based on export markets, we wish at the same time to open up other markets that I have just mentioned for our iron ore.

I think the case of the Quebec-Labrador deposits can be compared with that of the Wabana iron ore from Bell island of Newfoundland. The Bell island deposits, as the committee knows, are made up of one of the largest deposits of hematite known in the world. Hematite is an ore with a comparatively high iron content. The Bell island mines are the main source of ore for the Sydney steel mills. But a large part of the production of Wabana ore is exported, and has been exported for many decades. Large new export demands have initiated an expansion program now under way that will mean a great increase in production. Anyone so irresponsible as to oppose this development would be attacked and with good reason, I am sure, by the very people who are complaining now that the iron ore from the Quebec-Labrador fields should not be exported. Why? Because the potential production of Wabana ore far exceeds any likely requirements of the Sydney steel mills for many generations to come.

Then if one looks again at the deposits at the Steep Rock and Michipicoten mines in Ontario the position is the same. Both ores are used to some extent in Canadian blast furnaces, but large quantities of lower grade ore are imported to mix with them in the furnace charge, while a large volume of the Canadian ores is shipped to the United States. Why? Because it is more economical to "sweeten" the low-grade with the high-grade in the furnace charge, and the high-grade ore is more valuable for this purpose than for direct charge to the furnaces in Canada.

Quebec-Labrador ores are high-grade too. However great the volume of steel production that may be achieved in Canada, it will always be to our advantage to exchange a quantity of high-grade ore for lower grade imports.

I think the same can be said of wheat. We have large quantities of wheat in this country, and we export large quantities; but we also mill large quantities. Other countries have flour mills, too, however. We are able to export our flour in competition with other countries. While our mills are competitive in cost and do get a large share of the world's milling business, they do not get enough of the world's milling business to keep them going. That is why it is necessary to export wheat. We do all we can to develop our flour markets, but I do not think any hon. member would suggest that we stop at that and refuse to export any of the wheat that is surplus to the requirements of the Canadian flour mills.

The same thing applies to the base metals, copper, nickel, lead, zinc and such other metals. A high proportion of the ores are smelted and the metal refined in Canada. In most cases there is a considerable domestic fabrication of the metal as well, and in some cases we do a sizeable business in the processed product, as for example, copper wire and cable.

I think, in so far as Quebec-Labrador ore is concerned, our objective is the same, but on the face of it the basic factors are not the same. Our success with base metals stems directly from the importance of cheap hydro-electric power in the reduction process. We do not have a comparable advantage in the case of iron and steel. The position does hold some promise, but I would be misleading the house if I were to say without equivocation that we can have the same success with iron and steel that we have had with base metals or for that matter with paper and other products that have been mentioned. But I do say that we will bend every effort to get the maximum advantage for Canada out of our iron ore resources.

It has been said during the course of the debate that little or nothing was being done in order to expand the present steel plants in Canada. I am not suggesting that what I am going to say now has been done by the government, but what I am suggesting is that a tremendous expansion in our steel production has been announced only quite recently. In that respect let me point out that all four major steel producers in Canada have large capital expansion programs that are under way at the moment. I refer first of all to the Dominion Steel and Coal Company at Sydney. It is spending $16 million for extensive modernization which, among other things, will add 100,000 tons to the theoretical steel capacity. This $16 million item is only one phase of a $44 million program involving also the increased output of Wabana ore referred to a moment ago, and $14 million for improvements at the coal mines. The Steel Company of Canada at Hamilton is spending $50 million to provide new blast furnaces and steel furnaces, which will add 450,000 tons to their capacity for smelting pig iron and 650,000 tons of ingot for an increase of 35 per cent in steel capacity. Dominion Foundries and Steel in Hamilton is building new blast furnaces at a cost of $16 million. Algoma Steel at Sault Ste. Marie is spending $40 million to add 360,000 tons to its pig iron capacity, 240,000 tons to its steel capacity and over one million tons to its rolling mill capacity. Manitoba Rolling Mill Company is spending $1 million to add 90,000 tons to its rolling mill capacity. The total new investment directly in steel production amounts to $122 million, aside from Dosco's new investment in coal and ore production. Of this $122 million program it is hoped that about $68 million, or over one-half the program, will be completed this year.

I pause for a moment while I am still on this subject to quote from the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's West who took an opposite view to the view taken by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. At the outset of his remarks the hon. member for St. John's West said he was of the opinion that the people of Newfoundland wanted this development. After paying a tribute to the hon. member for his independence he went on to say, and I quote from page 1695 of Hansard of December 7:

> At the same time I am sure he must recognize that even in connection with an industry of which he knows so much, the oil industry, the principal interests are from the United States. We must look to the richest country in the world to provide funds for the development and exploitation of our natural resources.

And a little later on:

> The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has stressed the desirability of the government promoting the smelting of iron ore in this country.

And again:

> It would be a great departure from the policy that has been pursued in the past in the development of the great industries of this country if the government should go into industries of that kind.

Mr. Green: I did not advocate that.

Mr. Chevrier: I know my hon. friend did not advocate that, but what the hon. member for St. John's West was saying, first, was that the people in Newfoundland are for this development and, next, that it would be a departure from government policy to attempt to go into this development other than in the manner to which I have referred, namely that the steel producers themselves should expand. There is already a tremendous expansion in the offing, a large proportion of which will be completed this year. There is no doubt in the world but that these mills will require a substantial amount of the Quebec-Labrador ore.

Mr. Brooks: Can the minister give us any idea what proportions will be used in Canada and in the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say that at this time because it would depend on a number of contingencies. But when the matter comes up at a later date, at another session, it will be possible to give more accurate and detailed information.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

I do not want to get into a debate on coal, but I think I should make one short statement. I placed on Hansard certain figures provided by the bureau of statistics, and I have the assurance that they were approved by the coal board. I do not think those figures can be challenged. They point to a position where at least an additional million tons of coal from the maritime provinces could be marketed in the central markets. I do not think there is any doubt about that. In the railways and shipping committee in 1950 Mr. Gordon said that he could have taken 1,200,000 tons of coal. I am not going to analyse the reply made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South because I do not think there would be any purpose in doing so, but I do want to make this statement and I hope that he will not disagree with it.

There is no surplus available after distribution in the maritime provinces of the coal production at this time. As the house knows, there is a substantial government program on foot costing in the neighbourhood of $14 million having to do with the mechanization of coal mining, the object being to reduce the price of the coal at the pit head in that area so as to make it more competitive in cost. That is a government program which is now in course of operation. As I say, the result should be to cheapen the cost of coal. When I say that I have reference not only to the maritime consumers who purchase 72 per cent of that coal, but to those in central Canada who will buy it.

The other side of the picture is that if there is to be surplus production because of this mechanization program it would be available for export to Quebec at lower cost and therefore at a better competitive price vis-à-vis United States coal. If the present subvention policy administered by the dominion coal board is maintained, and I know of no reason why it should not be, I can give assurance to the house that every ton of coal produced in the maritime provinces over and above the local demand will find its way to the market, seaway or no seaway.

Mr. Carroll: Is not the answer to the fears expressed by the coal miners in Nova Scotia the fact that the greatest opposition in congress against the building of this canal was from the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. Chevrier: I think perhaps that is a good answer. One hon. member was fearful of the damage this would do to the port of Churchill. Let me say immediately that those fears are not well founded, because the Hudson Bay railway, which operates to Churchill and which is owned by the government and operated by the Canadian National Railways as agent of the government, will do everything possible to bring just as much traffic as it can over that line in order to keep the traffic, rather than see it all go down the lakes in the manner it has been suggested it will go. Then again, the Department of Transport have seen fit in the last two years to co-operate to the fullest extent with all groups to see that the greatest possible movement of grain is made through Churchill. In that connection I will refer to what has been done by the department in connection with the commonwealth shipping committee in London to have the insurance rates on grain reduced and to lengthen the navigation season. I am confident there will be not the slightest effect on the port of Churchill from the construction of this seaway.

Hon. members have questioned the powers of this authority. They have indicated that they feel it should be in the nature of a planning board. Hon. members have now seen the bill and know that it is not the intention of the government to make a planning board out of the seaway authority. On the contrary, it is the intention to give the seaway authority the power to construct the navigation canal between Montreal and lake Erie and to administer and operate the canals entrusted to it.

I have just one word to say about the cost and then I shall resume my seat. This afternoon we had an interesting speech by an hon. member who stated that this huge project may cost a billion dollars or even a billion and a half. The information we have is that it will certainly not cost that much. In so far as the power aspect is concerned, that is to be looked after by the province in conjunction with an appropriate authority on the United States side of the line, so this house is not called upon to consider any expenditure in so far as that angle is concerned. Neither is the house called upon to consider any expenditure so far as the navigation portion of the project is concerned. It is estimated that the navigation feature of the project will cost $245,993,000, which is broken down as follows: In the Lachine section for navigation alone, $98,229,000; in the Soulanges section, $37,116,000; in the lake St. Francis section, $2,513,000; in the international section, $106,833,000, and in the Welland ship canal $1,302,000, making a total of $245,993,000.

It is expected that these sums of money will be liquidated by the imposition of tolls. Surveys have been made in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it is anticipated that by the imposition of tolls throughout the seaway it will be possible to liquidate the scheme over a period not exceeding fifty years. It will be possible to liquidate the interest charges, cost of operation and amortization. There is nothing so extraordinary about that. That has been considered by both the government of the United States and the government of Canada, and we are of the opinion that the scheme can be liquidated by the imposition of tolls in the manner set out in the bill. I think perhaps I have said enough at this stage. As I said earlier, I think we have been fortunate in that most members have found it possible to support these projects. If that is so, I am hopeful that from this point we shall be able to proceed more effectively than heretofore.

Mr. Graydon: My anxiety, as the minister is aware, for an early start on this undertaking prompts the question I now want to put to him. I imagine it is a question that is in the minds of a good many members who are desirous of seeing the plans proceeded with. As I understand it, Canada must go to the United States government for certain consents before the plan can go forward. When Canada goes to the United States for these concessions or consents, as the case may be, to develop the international rapids, can congress, if it follows its procedure in the past, block that, or has the United States government full power to give such consents?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think I should attempt to answer any questions as to what any foreign power can do. I will be glad to assist the house as to what is my understanding of the procedure. We have, I think, full authority to build the canal on our side. The province of Ontario will require some co-operation with an appropriate authority on the other side of the line, but if I were to attempt to answer questions as to what is likely to happen in congress I might well make a misstatement which I would regret afterward, and I would rather not. On the subject of asking questions, we are on section 1, and my understanding is that when we deal with the sections seriatim we can probably have the questions then. I am just wondering if the discussion is completed.

Mr. Green: The minister undertook the other day that there would be an opportunity for complete discussion on section 1.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not suggesting that there should not be discussion; oh, no. Please do not misunderstand me. I am not suggesting that there should not be discussion on this section. Let there be the discussion there should be, and far be it from me to stop it, but if we were going to get a series of questions and answers on section 1, I was merely suggesting that it might take place on the other section. However, I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. McLure: When the minister was dealing with the steel companies of Canada he mentioned Dosco in Cape Breton. I would have liked him to go a little further and say that the plant there was to be greatly enlarged. After hearing the minister speak about these plants, one is inclined to ask why there is a scarcity of steel in Canada. When I spoke in the interests of the maritime provinces the other day with respect to the seaway project, I supported the idea that something definite should be promised us, and not only my own province. Indirectly we would derive great benefit if the steel plant at Sydney were one of the big steel plants of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Substantial expansion is taking place at the Dominion Steel and Coal Company at Sydney. As I indicated, it is an expansion which will amount to $44 million, the first phase of which is $16 million. My hon. friend says there is a scarcity of steel but it is not only in Canada. There is a scarcity of steel all over the world. It is one of the most critical materials.

Mr. Green: The other night I asked the minister the following question, as found at page 1689 of Hansard for December 7:

> Has the government any plans for a great expansion of Canadian steel production?

The whole tenor of my remarks was based on that question. I take it from what the minister has said tonight that there is to be no greatly expanded steel production plan for Canada arising out of these huge deposits of iron ore in northern Quebec and Labrador. He has explained that there is some expansion going on in the present steel plants, but apparently there is no broad scheme based on these huge resources. Can the minister tell us what percentage of the ore from northern Quebec and Labrador is to go to the United States? The department must have made some estimate of the amounts that will be used in Canada and the amounts that will be going to the United States. If the minister will recall, I quoted the other day a portion of the evidence given by Mr. George M. Humphrey, president of the M. A. Hanna Company of Cleveland, before the House of Representatives public works committee in Washington. In that statement he said that from 2 to 4 million tons of iron ore a year would be going to the United States Atlantic seaboard for use in the steel mills there, and that 6 to 8 million tons would be going up the St. Lawrence for use in United States steel mills in the lake Erie district. These figures add up to a total of 10 million tons, which I understand is the estimated annual production from the new ore body. What is the expected proportion that will be used in Canada and what proportion will be going to the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think anybody can answer the first part of the hon. member's question. The railway is not completed yet. The ore has not moved from Burnt Creek and Knob Lake to Seven Islands. It is not expected it will be moved before 1954. So until that time arrives it will be impossible to answer the hon. member's question.

The statement which Mr. Humphrey made I suppose deals with this position: when they do move their ore to that port of Seven Islands the St. Lawrence seaway will not have been completed. They have to get their ore out of there. They have to get it down to the market. So they will get it, I presume, down to the Atlantic seaboard ports. They will also move it to ports on the St. Lawrence, so I am informed, and from there move it by rail to the great lakes area. They will do that until such time as the seaway is completed, when they will be able to move it in the specialized carriers I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Green: The point I made was that, according to Mr. Humphrey, all of this iron ore is to go to the United States. Surely the government has made some investigation into the possibilities of using some of this iron ore in Canada. From what the minister said a moment ago he would not be able to answer that question until the railroad is completed and the first train of iron ore gets down to Seven Islands. That surely is ridiculous. The government surely must have given some thought to what proportion of this ore is to be used in Canada, and what proportion is to go to the United States.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can throw some light on it. I think my hon. friend has a misconception of the relationship of the ore business to the steel business. For example, we will take the Algoma Steel Company, which uses roughly 1,200,000 tons of ore a year. At the mine some fifty or sixty miles away they produce about that much ore—that is, about 1,200,000 tons a year. Of that ore Algoma itself uses about 300,000 tons. You say: "Why is that? That does not seem reasonable".

Mr. Green: They mix it.

Mr. Howe: A steel company must have many kinds of iron ore for the kind of products they are turning out at the time. You have two or three types of ore for an open hearth charge, and a different type of ore for a Bessemer. It is common to put all this ore into what we call the great lakes pool of ore and to draw from that pool such ore as is required; also to put into the pool such ore as is surplus to the requirements of the owners of the pool.

It would be very difficult indeed to know definitely what was going to happen to Steep Rock ore next year. As a matter of fact the bulk of Steep Rock ore goes to the United States, for the reason that it is a very high grade of ore and no Canadian furnace can afford to use too much of it. All Canadian operations, I think, use some Steep Rock ore.

Then, getting back to the St. Lawrence, the stock of the Iron Ore Company I believe is owned by six steel companies, and by Hollinger and by the Hanna Company. I understand that there are eight owners. Mr. Humphrey as quoted was speaking about certain ore which has been allocated to certain steel companies. I understand each of the steel companies has contracted for a certain amount of ore. I understand those contracts represent about 50 per cent of the output of the mine. The railroad and dock facilities are being geared for an output of 20,000,000 tons of ore a year. So about half of it is sold on firm contracts, and half of it will be offered on the markets of the world.

It is anticipated that the Canadian mills will take such proportion of the ore as they can use. I have no doubt that Dosco will take a portion of their ore from this source. I am sure the steel mills on the great lakes will use a portion of that ore. But I do not think any man can say three years ahead where all the ore will be marketed. I certainly could not. It is anticipated there will be a good market in Europe. I understand there is a firm market for about half the output in the mills represented by the ownership of the property.

My hon. friend asked if the government has a plan. The government does not build steel mills; it never has, and probably never will.

Mr. Green: They help.

Mr. Howe: We help, of course. And I might say that four years ago I was so sure we needed additional capacity that I had put in the speech from the throne a proposal to help finance the expansion of the steel industry to about the size that is being built at the present time. I was not able to convince the mills that such capacity was needed. I regretted it very much. The best I could do was not good enough, and the capacity was not built at that time. Had it been built then Canada would have been in a much more comfortable position during the last two or three years, the last two years at least.

However, we do try as a government to keep the economy in reasonable balance; and we always try to see that the basic ingredients of industry are provided in ample supply. We stimulate that sort of development. That is why we are financing the mechanization of coal mines in Nova Scotia at the present time. That is why we have done everything possible to facilitate the expansion of steel mills. I might point out to my hon. friend that today Canada is not self-sufficient in steel, or I should say in ore. We use more ore than is mined in Canada at the present time, even though we export ore from Newfoundland, for the reason that its geography is such that it cannot be used in Canada. It is too far away.

Mr. Green: They are exporting ore from British Columbia, too.

Mr. Howe: Yes. My hon. friend thinks that is unfortunate. I am not so sure. I am just as anxious to develop Canada as he is. I hope he will give me credit for that. I will give him credit for being as anxious as I am. But it seems to me that the opening up of that ore is the first important step toward a steel industry on the west coast. Steel industries have been interested in that situation. They are faced not only with building a steel plant but with opening up a great ore-mining industry, which is expensive indeed. At least in future they will have three mines open on the island. That may give a selection of ore, or it may give all one grade of ore; I am not sure. But I would hope that out of the three widely separated points there might be a selection of ore. The fact that they can see that ore, the fact that shipping facilities are there, and the fact that it is being mined is a great inducement toward building a blast furnace to use that ore. Probably half the capital expenditure is already made when those three deposits are being mined.

I believe you have to do first things first. I believe you must first be sure of your raw product before you can go on to the later stages of development. That has been true of almost anything Canada has done. We first mined copper and sold most of it as ore. We have now built a great fabricating industry in the field of copper, and we export more finished products of copper than the refined copper. That is true of zinc, and it is true of lead. The proportion of zinc fabricated in Canada as compared with zinc produced in Canada goes up rapidly every year.

By first opening up the iron ore—and by "opening up" I include the improvement of the St. Lawrence because that certainly opens up that ore to the steel mills of the great lakes—I believe that is the first important contribution to the expansion of steel that will follow, as it always has followed in this country. Our steel capacity has been expanding steadily for a good many years.

Mr. Green: We are still only producing about two-thirds of our requirements, are we not?

Mr. Howe: We were producing before the war about three million tons and importing about one million tons.

Mr. Green: Is there not apt to be a tremendous increase in the demand for steel? Take for example the oil pipe lines, and developments like the aluminum plant in central British Columbia, and the development at Lynn Lake, as well as various other developments in Canada on a scale greater than we have ever had. Is it not likely there will be a tremendous increase in the demand for steel within Canada? If that is so, should not some more aggressive steps be taken to increase our steel capacity? The minister had admitted that a year or two ago we really needed the expansion of our steel industry, but it did not take place because the companies were unwilling to go ahead. We do not want to get into that position again. It does seem to me that the demand for steel is going to increase at a greater rate in the future than it has for years past.

Mr. Howe: As an optimist, that is my own view. My hon. friend and I are optimists. You could have a basic steel expansion for the isolated projects the hon. member mentions, projects that will be finished in the next two or three years. I am sure we both believe there will be other projects to follow for which we shall need more steel.

Mr. Green: Such as the South Saskatchewan and St. Lawrence waterways projects.

Mr. Howe: Yes, they will take some steel. Nevertheless, there is an expansion of 33 per cent in capacity in progress at the moment. Blast furnaces are being built and finishing capacity is being installed. In order to justify a steel plant you must have three things. You must have iron ore available; you must have coal available, and there are several other ingredients you must have available which are less important. But above all you must have customers within reach. This accounts, of course, for the location of the steel plants we have. The owner of a steel plant always keeps his eye on the customer situation to make sure the plant can operate at an economic level, and that is usually about 60 per cent of capacity.

Mr. Green: Is there any reason steel plants could not be successfully installed on the lower St. Lawrence?

Mr. Howe: You would have the iron ore there, but you would be still a long way from the coal and you would be an even longer distance from customers. I believe the latter ingredient would be most difficult. You would be moving finished steel instead of the ingredients.

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister indicate when this steel expansion program about which he talks will have shown results? A few days ago I believe he said that it would be perhaps 1953 before we began to see the results of this 33 per cent expansion in basic steel. Will he indicate what part of that 33 per cent is being made at the Sydney plant?

Mr. Howe: The first results of the expansion are already operative. The blast furnace which was built within the last 18 months at the plant of Dominion Foundries and Steel in Hamilton is now in operation, and we are getting the benefit of that additional production. The expansion at Sydney is in the direction of finishing capacity, because at Sydney the production of primary steel was out of balance with finishing capacity. As the hon. member knows, we were shipping billets from Sydney to be finished in Montreal and Hamilton. Additional finishing capacity is being put in so the operation will be brought into better balance. Just when it will come into production, I cannot say. I understand that $14 million is being spent in the present operation as part of a $40 million project. I am not familiar with the details.

Mr. Quelch: I have always been under the impression that when the St. Lawrence project was completed ocean-going vessels would travel up to the head of the lakes to pick up cargoes of grain. In his speech the other day the minister made it clear that this will not be the case. It will only be the case where a vessel has an inbound cargo. Otherwise the cargoes of grain will continue to be brought to Montreal by lake steamer and transferred at Montreal to ocean vessels. At page 1579 of Hansard for December 4, 1951, the minister said:

> The prairies would find a substantial saving in the cost of moving grain, flour and other products to markets in eastern Canada and overseas.

If the grain is going to continue to be brought down by lake steamer and then transferred at Montreal to the ocean-going vessels, where is the saving in cost?

Mr. Chevrier: The savings will be in the disappearance of the 14-foot canals. Today grain is taken from the head of the lakes to Port Colborne, Prescott and such places as Port McNicoll. There it is transferred into smaller ships and brought down to Montreal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In the course of the debate the other evening I made a reference to a statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. May I recall what I said, as it appears on page 1695 of Hansard for December 7:

> I hope I do not do him an injustice when I say that the hon. member for Cape Breton South seemed to me to favour nationalization, that the government should take over the business if private enterprise is not willing to do it.

Here is what the hon. member said as it appears at page 1674 of Hansard for December 6:

> As I suggested when I spoke before, I am prepared to support this project as one part of a large public investment program by the federal government. This authority to be set up should have the right to develop any potential power or other resource within a reasonable distance of that area.

Then in the next paragraph but one he said:

> I think the government would be well advised to have another basic steel plant. This would not be asking very much.

Further on he says:

> A new plant could be set up or the Sydney plant could be expanded, possibly by the use of public funds.

Well, if I misinterpreted the hon. member's remarks I am very sorry, but it seemed to me to be plain, from those and other remarks he made with reference to what is going on in Newfoundland at the present time, that he seemed to favour a policy of nationalization of the steel industry. The hon. member went on to make reference to Newfoundland. I can forgive him for what he said about me, but he made some remarks about Newfoundland which I believe he would not make again if he had the opportunity. On page 1697 of Hansard for December 7 he said:

> . . . after years and years of the kind of development visualized by my hon. friend, Newfoundland stood as a rather badly undeveloped and in every way neglected section of North America. In 1944 I heard a representative of the British government make a report to a meeting in London.

On the next page, he said:

> After listening to the report of that commission of government on the educational standards, the economic backwardness, the lack of sanitation and everything that was not modern in this world, if I had not known the section of Canada that was being referred to I would have thought the representative of the British government was describing a section of South Africa where civilization has just gone in to make a survey.

Now, sir, I have here a document published by the Department of External Affairs and entitled "Newfoundland, Canada's New Province". This document contains a statement of the expenditure per capita on education in the year 1944 in Newfoundland, the year to which the hon. member referred. Apart from what is spent by religious institutions and contributed by charitable bodies, Newfoundland spent $9.35 per capita; Prince Edward Island, $7.74; Nova Scotia, $9.41 and New Brunswick, $8.80. Therefore educational standards in Newfoundland stand up very well in comparison. Apart from that, sir, Newfoundland had the distinction even in this country of having higher educational standards than most of the provinces. I do not know to what the hon. member was referring as economic backwardness, because in 1944 Newfoundland had its highest foreign trade on record; it was over $100 million. He speaks of the lack of sanitation. Is a country going to be judged by the system of plumbing which it has? If that is so Italy and France as well as many other European and South American countries would come in for general condemnation, as would parts of this country.

Newfoundland came in for condemnation for having everything that was not modern in this world. Down there we have the largest pulp and paper plant in the world, and we have the best fish-processing plant in the world. But apart from that, I think everyone who has been to Newfoundland will recognize the fact that we have a law-abiding and Christian people, even if we have not all the modern facilities we might have. Those who go there enjoy themselves. Thousands of Canadians and Americans who went there during the war spoke very highly of Newfoundland. Only yesterday I heard a gentleman high in the civil service of this country state that the week end he spent down there was the happiest in his life.

The Chairman: Order. It seems to me that we are getting away from the matter of the seaway.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I only wanted to draw to the attention of the committee the incorrect statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of tying up the committee. What the hon. member for St. John's West thinks—

Mr. Pouliot: Speak louder, please. What you are saying is of the utmost interest.

Mr. Gillis: Whatever the hon. member for St. John's West thinks or says in this chamber is not a great national issue. I have no intention of tying the committee up on the matter. What I objected to a few nights ago was the hon. member's misinterpretation of what I said. He has clearly indicated now that he does not know the difference between the nationalization of an industry, what I propose to the government, and what is going on in Newfoundland. Nationalization, as I understand it, means that there is an industry set up and the government decides to take it over. They are nationalizing an asset that was created by someone else, and it is generally done on the basis of compensation; but it is the taking over of an established industry. What I proposed to the minister, and it is relevant to the bill before the committee, is that this now is a government development. The taxpayers are going to provide the capital. I suggested that what should be done, if possible, was to do it in a manner similar to the T.V.A. development in the United States in so far as we can do it. That was a government-sponsored project. It was on a co-operative basis. There is not anything that would suggest its nationalization. It is operating now successfully in the United States, and I think it is an outstanding example of what can be done by government research, competent engineering, capital and direction by the government. There is no suggestion of nationalization there.

The same thing is true in Newfoundland. The government of Newfoundland is providing the capital, or at least 50 per cent of it. It is giving this encouragement to industries to come in. The Newfoundland government is creating something. They are not taking something over. It certainly is not nationalization. The expansion of the steel industry talked about by the Minister of Defence Production is being done along exactly the same lines. I think I am safe in saying that 50 per cent of the capital that is going into our present steel expansion is government money given to the industry to encourage them to expand in a time of crisis and need. That certainly is not nationalization. Perhaps the hon. member caught me in a rather unhappy mood the other night. When I said what I did, I did not mean anything disparaging.

Mr. Riley: Now you are sorry.

Mr. Gillis: No, I am not sorry. I am never sorry for anything I say; but I am in a better frame of mind tonight, and perhaps I am more reasonable. I did not have any intention of being disparaging or of casting any reflection on Newfoundland. The hon. member for Melfort, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself heard Lord Ammon make a report of a survey on social and economic conditions, with particular reference to the outports in Newfoundland; and the description that I and the other members along with me heard left a great deal to be desired along many lines. But of course there are many sections of Canada to which the same description might be applied. I do not want to tie the committee up any longer. I am quite satisfied with what I put on the record, if the hon. member for St. John's West is now satisfied. It is not a great national issue, as I said before.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I thank the hon. member for Cape Breton South for his explanation. I just want to point out one thing to him, namely that there is a difference between what is going on in Newfoundland and what he said, because the Newfoundland government is actually setting up in that province industries financed with government funds and operated by the government.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister one question. If he has dealt with it he can tell me so readily. I appreciate the position he took with regard to any questions as to the position taken in the United States. If my question transgresses the position he took, of course he can tell me and all is well; but I should like to put this question to him. Is there any point—and I mean point in time—beyond which it would no longer be possible for the undertaking to be a joint Canada-United States undertaking?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can answer that question. Yes, there must be a time. When that time is I am unable to say, other than to repeat the general statement made by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada to the effect that if congress did not come along at an early date, then the President of the United States would be quite prepared to approve of this project as a second best choice, on condition that we would undertake to build the seaway.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that he is not able to indicate the exact date, although he realizes there has to be a point. Does the bill now before us close the door in any way or set any time beyond which there could not be a joint undertaking?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is there any relation between the works that will be done for the hydroelectric project and the works that will have to be done for the seaway project?

Mr. Chevrier: No, there is not.

Mr. McLure: Last year some time a committee of the congress of the United States came here to talk the matter over with a similar committee in Canada, of which I think the Minister of Transport was chairman or with which he was connected is some official capacity. I have often wondered about it. There was a great deal of talk at that time about this committee of the congress of the United States, and that they were here to discuss this St. Lawrence deep waterway. What was their reaction when they bade good-bye to Canada and had nothing more to do with this St. Lawrence waterway? Did they consider it to be an impossibility, or why did nothing further develop from that meeting of the committee of congress with a similar committee in Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: The committee that came to Canada to view the site of the Long Sault rapids was a committee on public works of the House of Representatives of the United States. It is not the first time similar committees of both the House of Representatives and the Senate have come to view the sites. They did not come here to deliberate with any opposite group in this country. They simply came to take a look at the works and to see the situation for themselves. That was only part of the visit which began at the Mesabi range at the head of the lakes, went right down through the whole of the project along the United States side and into the Canadian side at Beauharnois and Lachine, and ended at Montreal.

I was in contact with the chairman of the committee, Mr. Buckley. During his stay in Canada, he was sanguine about the whole thing. But of course he had to go back to the public works committee of the House of Representatives, which he did. I understand that some discussion took place later there, and that the bill which was under discussion at that time was not reported to the floor of the house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do wish to refer back to comments that were made by the Minister of Transport before the dinner recess. At that time he seemed to express some measure of surprise that so much time had been devoted to the discussion of iron ore, when we were in fact discussing a deep waterway project. But the fact is that the discussion of iron ore was introduced by his own statement to the house at the time he was explaining the advantages of this development. And one of the things which it would seem not only points up this discussion on the basis of the use of iron ore but also raises some additional measure of concern on the part of representatives from the maritime provinces was the emphasis which he placed upon the fact that this seaway would make it possible to convey the iron ore to great steel mills in the United States. I refer to what is reported at page 1576 of Hansard, where he had this to say:

> Now it also promises to be the key that will unlock for the future the iron ore fields of Quebec and Labrador. It will open large new markets for these ores in the great lakes area, otherwise largely out of economic reach. And on the other side of the coin it will give those interior steel mills the best new source of ore at the lowest cost, a matter of serious concern at the moment.
> Iron ore. The mills within reach of the great lakes account for about 75 or 80 per cent of the steel produced in United States. They draw ore preponderantly from the iron ranges of the lake Superior district. The immediate problem is not the exhaustion of these ores, although that too may be expected at some more or less indefinite time. The point is that production of the ores now in use has just about reached its maximum annual rate, and that maintenance of even that rate promises to involve a continued increase in costs. Meanwhile ore requirements continue to rise, not only because of additions to steel capacity but because with a shortage of scrap it is taking more pig iron to make a ton of steel. The problem thus is one of a growing gap between supplies and requirements.

The minister went on to explain that the construction of this deep waterway would make it possible for the iron ores from Quebec and Labrador to sell at prices which would make it possible for that iron ore to be sold to those great mills in the United States. May I emphasize the fact that in no remarks I made at any earlier stage did I suggest that we should not export iron ore to the United States; and so far as I am aware that argument has not been made. The argument that has been made is that there should be assurances that we are going to make the maximum possible use of iron ore in this country.

There are reasons why it would not be proper for us to place an absolute prohibition on the export of iron ore. Very large sums of money have been invested by companies in the United States in the development of this iron ore. It is unlikely that the maximum production now under way would have been actually yet undertaken were it not for the fact that companies in the United States had been prepared to invest capital in this venture. I do not think Canadians will wish to have the contracts of those companies disregarded at any time, or to see any suggestion of repudiation of the basis upon which we have encouraged and accepted investment in this country.

Having said that, however, we then come to what is to be done to encourage a greater use of iron ore in this country. We have heard speeches by hon. members from the maritime provinces which indicate very clearly the great concern they feel about the emphasis that is being placed upon the facilities that will be offered for concentrating still further industrial production in the central part of this country. I for one do not believe that anything except our own lack of vision could possibly prevent immense increases in industrial development in the central part of the country. I share, however, the sentiments of the hon. members from the maritime provinces, and I have already expressed my belief that at a time when the government is undertaking to spend so much of the people's money to provide facilities of this kind, it should give clear and positive evidence that it is going to take whatever effective steps it can to assure that there will be as great a decentralization of industry in this country as possible; and that local demands are created for iron ore in these areas where there will be opportunities not only to produce iron and steel for the local and Canadian markets, but also to export from seaboard to the markets of the world finished products from the iron and steel which could be made there if the steps are taken to provide power at low cost that could be taken, and which have been discussed here on other occasions.

I would recall the remarks of the Minister of Transport when he took up the suggestion he understood had been made by one hon. member that probably this iron ore would be largely carried by ships from the United States. He pointed out that there is a very large program of shipbuilding now under way in Canada, and that just within these past few weeks some of the largest freighters ever built in this country, or in fact on this continent, have been launched, the last of them just within the last two or three days. I think there is evidence, as he says, of the confidence that is in the minds of many Canadians, and may I add also of people living in the United States, that there is going to be a great expansion of shipping, and that accounts for the number of these new ships that are being built. However, time will tell whether the preponderant part of that ore will be carried by Canadian ships or by ships from the United States.

I wish to deal particularly with what the minister said about the production of iron ore at Steep Rock and also of aluminum in processed form at Arvida. He asked: what has happened at Steep Rock? What has happened at Arvida? What has happened to the development of pulp and paper? He asked these questions in relation to the use of ships, and indicated that Canadian ships were carrying large quantities of iron ore from Steep Rock and aluminum from Arvida and pulp and paper from the great mills along the waterways of the interior of Canada. I think the question he asked, though, produces an answer that does underlie the importance of some further efforts being made to assure Canadian use of the iron ore. What has happened at Steep Rock is that that rich concentration of iron ore is going to the United States, whether in Canadian bottoms or in bottoms from the United States. That is not a limitless source of ore; that is something that cannot be replaced when it is gone. It is true that a good mine has been developed there and that money is coming in for that ore, but we are receiving that money at the lowest level at which ore can be sold, except that ore which, as has already been mentioned, is being used in mills in Canada in mixture with other ore.

There is a difference between shipping pulp and paper and shipping iron ore. Pulp and paper is the result of a crop. True it is not an annual crop, but it is a recurring crop over a long period of years. It is a crop that can be maintained indefinitely if proper methods are employed. That is not true of iron ore. We are exporting pulp and paper because steps were taken to make sure that the highest possible employment would be created through the actual processing and manufacturing of wood products in this country. No objection was taken in the United States when the provinces of this country showed adequate concern over their legitimate self-interest and introduced a manufacturing clause into the contracts under which pulp logs were cut. If there are any people in the world who recognize legitimate self-interest it is the people of the United States, who have always practised that principle in relation to the development of their own resources.

In his earlier remarks the minister said this was something that the provincial governments could do, that it was not something the dominion government could deal with. The provincial governments have no authority over export as such. The provincial governments exercise control over export by licensing the cutting and making contracts under which the raw materials are used. The control they exercise over export is not direct, but there is effective control exercised by the terms they impose in the contracts under which the right to cut is given.

The dominion government has the right to deal with export and to impose any terms on export that it sees fit. As many hon. members will recall, we discussed for some considerable time certain questions relating to the export of oil and natural gas. It was fully recognized at that time that the dominion government and the parliament of Canada have the responsibility of dealing with export of that kind. There is no question about the fact that the dominion government and the parliament of Canada, where it is necessary to pass laws to deal with the subject, have authority. In fact they have the only authority to deal with exports as exports. I point that out because hon. members from the maritime provinces and from other parts of Canada which are not going to benefit directly in a way that can be seen at the moment, or to the extent of the central provinces, wish to have some indication that the government is prepared to use the authority it possesses, either under legislation now in existence or by legislation to be introduced, to assure the maritime provinces that where it is within their power they will take proper steps to bring about a greater decentralization of industry and an expansion of industry in the maritime provinces. That can be done so long as iron ore to be produced in this way is available under favourable terms to mills in the maritime provinces which could smelt it and produce pig iron or steel to be used ultimately in the industrial activities that could be encouraged in that way.

As has been pointed out, it is true that the dominion government does not build mills or directly actually enter into industrial developments of this kind in the ordinary course of events. However, the fact remains that the dominion government is exercising substantial influence on the location of plants by the fact that it is taking steps to assure certain types of production, and in taking those steps of course it has a great measure of choice as to where the developments will take place.

I recognize that this is not something that can be dealt with overnight. These are long-term plans that are being discussed. It is going to take considerable time for the railroad into the Quebec-Labrador ore areas to be completed and for the actual production of ore to reach the point where it will be flowing out to the port from which it will be carried. However, that very fact gives us time to take those steps which would encourage the increased construction of milling capacity in different parts of Canada to use the ore when it becomes available. In fact, if the plans are made now and encouragement given at this time, the mills would hardly be more than ready when the ore would actually be available for their expanded capacity.

It has been explained to us tonight that at Sydney, Hamilton, the Sault and elsewhere construction is under way. It has also been explained that the dominion government has actually assisted in the financing of the mechanization of the operation at Sydney. But it seems to me we should bear in mind that we have a statement by the Minister of Transport that we now have reserves of iron ore on such a scale that within no measurable term of years can we expect to seriously deplete the total reserve. We also have something else. We now have a mixture of different types of ores to an extent which we did not have only a comparatively few years ago.

Therefore it would seem only reasonable for us to examine just what our target should be, recognizing that most of us in this house believe in the free enterprise system and the development of operations of this kind by proper investment under proper encouragement. What is the target we should be aiming at? It has been mentioned that with a demand of something in excess of four million tons we have been producing a little over three million tons. But every hon. member knows that we are very short of iron and steel at this time. Every hon. member knows also that we are importing large quantities of products of all kinds made from steel which might well be made here if sufficient encouragement were given. Therefore we cannot measure our needs simply by what we are using at the present time. If we were producing the same amount of steel in this country that is produced in the United States in proportion to population we would be producing approximately thirteen million tons instead of just over three million tons. It has been explained that work is under way which will substantially increase our steel production, but only by a small fraction of that requirement based on our use of steel in the same proportion that it is being used in the United States. I think our target is a point far beyond that. We are seeing this country develop as it has never developed before; but we are only seeing the beginning of what can come in a country that now has such vast quantities of iron ore, oil, uranium and the other things which will go into industrial expansion in the years ahead.

Our target should be something like 15 million tons of steel a year, and even that will be far below what this country will be requiring within a comparatively few years. It will be far short of the amount the country can use to great advantage if we recognize that steel is the metal base of industrial development and economic strength. As I mentioned in an earlier speech, for centuries alchemists tried to transmute base metals to gold. Today we do not need to transmute iron to gold; it is the most precious metal of all. We have iron ore, we have electric power and we have oil available in ever-increasing quantities. We have inland waterways to carry the ore and our finished products back and forth. We have harbours at the seaboard to ship our finished products to the markets of the world. It is one of the most challenging prospects that has unfolded before any nation.

With all that has happened, we are now entering the period of greatest opportunity this country has ever seen, and that opportunity will be largely measured by the encouragement that is given to processing, finishing and manufacturing based on steel. I am not talking only of processing to the point of the steel ingot. I am talking of all the associated industries that will grow upon the expanded use of steel in Canada. Just as Great Britain suddenly emerged from the stage just over a hundred years ago where its population was a little more than our population today to a position of great international power and wealth, this country is at the beginning of a historic period when we may see our population grow to numbers far beyond anything we have yet dreamed.

When I say that I am not suggesting, as is said sometimes, that we should suddenly start shuttling ships across the ocean bringing large numbers of people here. If we hold in this country the population that is born and brought up here we will be increasing our population a great deal more than it has been increased for some time. Population also has a habit of adjusting itself to the capacity of a country to support population. In the United States the population has grown because of the employment created through resources which they have put to such good use. That is what we should be looking forward to in this country, and what we can look to with great advantage at this time.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has spoken of the fact that from the economic point of view we must export ore for the purpose of opening up this development. Very well; let that be done. But let us remember it is Canadian ore that has been found in our own soil and, while we encourage others to come here and make developments of this kind, when we spend huge sums of money to make it possible to move the ore back and forth we can also say very appropriately that Canadian consumers should have certain advantages in the use of ore that we produce in our country. There is nothing unreasonable in that attitude. There would be nothing unfair to the people of the United States or elsewhere if by appropriate measures we actually create more favourable terms for the Canadian industrial consumer of our ore so we might encourage great industrial development based on this raw material in the same way that we encouraged industrial development in the use of wood products a few years ago and made it the greatest money earning industry we have in the country today.

While this discussion takes place on the first section of the bill in committee after it has received second reading, I should like to point out that what was under consideration on second reading was the principle, and I think it is greatly to the credit of hon. members, who come from parts of the country that feel their position may be jeopardized by a measure of this kind unless certain assurances are given to them, that they should have accepted the principle contained in the bill and not voted against it, although there may be so many reasons from their point of view why it is difficult to make a decision of that kind without much stronger assurances than they have been given in the bill now before us.

Now we have the details presented to us for consideration. I hope the Minister of Transport will reassure those members who have expressed that measure of concern, and all of us who hope to see immensely expanded industrial production based on the use of iron and steel in this country, that along with a development of this kind, which according to the words of the minister will carry ore into that area where 75 or 80 per cent of the great steel mills of the United States now operate, steps will be taken to decentralize industry across Canada in every way possible. I hope he will reassure us that appropriate steps will be taken to give to the Canadian producer certain advantages in the use of our own ore which under a system of free enterprise and private investment will expand the steel industry and related industries of this country on the scale that is justified by the resources we now possess.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes to say a few words on the bill. Several members from the maritime provinces have expressed their views, and I should like to mention particularly the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, who spoke today. I wish to go on record as supporting to a great extent everything they have said. I realize that every citizen of the maritime provinces is very much interested in expanding our steel industry or any other industries that we may have, and in the creation of any new industries that might be set up there. I have spoken on the St. Lawrence waterway on two other occasions and expressed my views very clearly. However, there is one thing I have not heard discussed so far in this debate, and that is the change in the bill before us now having in mind suggestions that have been made in the years gone by.

I refer to the original agreement between Canada and the United States on the great lakes-St. Lawrence navigation and power project. When that was discussed originally many years ago it called for the free passage of vessels throughout the entire length of the St. Lawrence waterway. At the present time such a policy exists on the St. Lawrence waterway. Vessels from all parts of the world use the canals and the waterway free of tolls. Under the proposed all-Canadian St. Lawrence seaway authority, tariffs of tolls will be established. At this point I should like to quote the Minister of Transport as he is reported at page 1707 of Hansard for December 7. The hon. member for Lethbridge had asked a question, to which the minister replied:

> The United States have manifested great concern over it.

He was referring to the statement concerning the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway.

> The position of the President of the United States is indicative of that, when he states that he is willing, if the congress does not act within a reasonable time, to consent to the development of this project in conjunction with us, both as to power and navigation.
> In so far as the first part of my hon. friend's question is concerned, if he will only wait until the bill comes before the house he will find the seaway project is self-liquidating. He is going on the assumption that the taxpayer is going to be faced with a tremendous expenditure. In the original statement I made I indicated that it is intended to liquidate the whole project by the imposition of tolls.

If as the minister states this project will be self-liquidating—and I have no reason to doubt that statement—then there is little argument so far as the taxpayers of this country are concerned as to other parts of Canada which would not be benefited by the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway being obliged to pay their proportionate part of the costs.

That particular section in the bill will take away much of the feeling that has been created in the maritime provinces to the effect that we were paying a proportionate share of the cost of something from which we would receive no benefit. If the tolls which will be charged when the St. Lawrence waterway is completed will completely maintain operation and pay for the cost of building the waterway development, then there is very little in the way of increased taxation that can be used as an argument against this huge development, which I believe we are all pretty well convinced will be a benefit to all Canada.

When I spoke on this same subject on one or two former occasions I opposed it, stating that it was a project which, although financed by all the Canadian people, would bring no benefits whatever to the maritime provinces. But since I am convinced it will be self-liquidating, and that in the final analysis it will not cost the Canadian people anything, I cannot do other than support it.

Mention has been made of certain projects we would like to see developed in the maritime provinces. I believe the minister is well aware of them. In fact I have no doubt all cabinet ministers are aware of them. They have been brought to their attention on many occasions. I have faith in the cabinet and in the government, and I am going to support the bill without hesitation, convinced in my own mind that we in the maritimes will not be forgotten and that the many things we have brought to the attention of the government, which we feel would be beneficial to the maritimes if developed, will meet with the government's approval. I believe we can rest assured of their assistance.

Mr. Brooks: Like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I have spoken on this project on other occasions. I wish now to make only a few remarks with reference to statements made by the minister before six o'clock. He indicated that because about $92 million was being expended in the maritime provinces we should not complain about the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. He made special reference to the Canso causeway in Nova Scotia. When I spoke before I made reference to that project. It is in Nova Scotia. I said that while those of us in New Brunswick will receive no benefit from the causeway at Canso, still we were anxious that the development should take place.

He mentioned also the ferry between Bar Harbour and Yarmouth in Nova Scotia. This, also, will be of no particular benefit to New Brunswick, but we have no objection to it. As a matter of fact it will be to the disadvantage of New Brunswick. It is for the development of the tourist trade of Nova Scotia. Whereas in past years cars coming from the United States came through St. Stephen and up through Saint John and Moncton to Nova Scotia, we will now lose that traffic on account of the ferry. He also mentioned the Saint John airport. Let me remind him that Saint John waited a long time for the airport. I doubt if there is another city in Canada that has waited as long or as patiently as the city of Saint John. It was entitled to the airport. Although we are always grateful for anything given to us, I do not think we need feel too grateful in this respect.

He made further reference to Fredericton, another city which waited a long time for an airport. He mentioned the ferry between Cape Breton and Newfoundland. He must know that the ferry between Cape Breton and Newfoundland was promised to the people of Newfoundland when they entered confederation. While we are grateful for these things they are what we should expect, what we are entitled to expect. The expenditures on these developments are no greater than the expenditures on similar developments in all the other provinces of the dominion.

Airfields, causeways and ferries are good in themselves; but they do not make employment for our people. We would rather see the development of some project like the Chignecto canal, or the project at Passamaquoddy, where cheap power would be produced in the maritime provinces and industry would be encouraged. That is what we ask for; that is what we feel we are entitled to, in addition to these other things the minister has mentioned.

My leader spoke about our fear of centralization of industry. That is exactly what we fear. We have seen our young people leave our province because of the lack of industry. We believe the development of the St. Lawrence seaway and St. Lawrence power will create more industry in the central provinces, and will take more of our young people away from the maritime provinces unless there is a power development in that part of the country.

I have very little more to say. The minister tried to leave the impression that because we had received $92 million for the development of certain public works we should be satisfied. We are not satisfied. We want developments which will increase industry and give employment to our people. That is what we are asking for, something along the lines mentioned by my leader tonight, and to which reference has been made on other occasions. I do hope the minister and the government will keep these things in mind. The hon. member for Charlotte has just said that the cabinet is well aware of the requests of our province for the development of Passamaquoddy and Chignecto. I hope they will keep those matters in mind. If the government helps in the development of these projects, then in time I am sure they will be self-liquidating and self-supporting. I am also satisfied they will bring industry to the maritime provinces. As no doubt the St. Lawrence seaway and power project will be a great blessing to the central provinces, so the development of these projects would be a great blessing to the maritime provinces. We would have in Canada not only a prosperous central section, but prosperity in the maritimes and other sections.

That is what we are asking for. We ask not only for a causeway, not only for the airports to which we are entitled anyway, but something further which will develop our industries.

Mr. Nowlan: Just before this section carries, may I say that I was not in the house the latter part of the afternoon when the minister opened the debate, as I was attending the public accounts committee. I am not in a position, therefore, to discuss with him the proposed expenditures which I understand he enumerated. The hon. member for Royal has spoken about these moneys having been expended. I believe he is a little optimistic in that statement, judging from the projects I heard mentioned. They are still promissory notes, and are a long way from being cash. The causeway has been promised for at least twenty years, and bobs up before every election. Then, it subsides again beneath the waters of Canso strait. This time we are accepting the assurance that the government will go ahead with the scheme. Similar remarks could be made about the other projects mentioned.

I rise simply for the purpose of asking the minister if he would clarify one point he mentioned this afternoon. Specific mention was made of the proposed ferry from Bar Harbour to Yarmouth as something which has been constructed or which would be constructed. I might also let the minister know of a personal note in connection with that particular ferry. It has been promised for some considerable time. Plans were prepared and, as all hon. members know, this ferry means a great deal to the province of Nova Scotia because it does assist in the development of the tourist industry. I was shocked one day to read in the Ottawa Journal or the Globe and Mail a statement by the Minister of Transport that the construction of that ferry would be postponed because of a shortage of steel. I have not looked at my files to check the dates, but I believe that was about two years ago.

Then as I recall it, speaking again from memory and without trying to be accurate as to dates but it seemed to me within a week or two weeks, the hon. member for Stormont, who happens to be the Minister of Transport, speaking in his own constituency said the time had come when the St. Lawrence project must be proceeded with at once. If the government of the United States was not going to do it, then certainly the government of Canada must do it. To say the least, I was irritated and I believe many others in the maritimes were, at the suggestion, I know unintentional, that it was possible to find steel for such a huge project which meant much to the productivity of Ontario, but it was impossible to find a quantity of steel for a project which to some extent was comparable in that it would bring new dollars into Nova Scotia. I simply say that in passing. It still rankles when I hear this project mentioned. Since the minister has introduced the subject, and since there is some doubt as to when that ferry is to be built and when it is to go into operation, I trust that when the minister closes this debate he will give us some information on these expenditures which I understand total some $93 million.

Mr. Green: There is one matter I should like to mention to the minister, and that concerns the possibility of using the waterway for twelve months in the year. A huge amount of money is being spent to construct this waterway, and if some means could be found for keeping it open for twelve months instead of seven the value to Canada would be greatly increased. I am wondering whether the minister's department is doing any research into that problem, and is that possibility being kept in mind in planning for the waterway?

I was surprised to find in the Engineering Journal for June of this year an article entitled "The St. Lawrence Waterway, an All-Canadian and Very Deep Route." It is written by J. G. G. Kerry, M.E.I.C. who I understand is an outstanding engineer. As I read the article it suggests there is a possibility of keeping the waterway clear of ice.

Mr. Brooks: That would be the last straw.

Mr. Howe: Is my hon. friend trying to help the maritimes?

Mr. Green: This possibility arises from the fact that lake Ontario never freezes. The suggestion is that if the free water could be channelled from lake Ontario into the river it might be possible to keep the waterway open all winter. For example, this author has this to say:

> Such a supply of heat energy as is stored in the waters of lake Ontario during the winter months is almost unique. It is a great national asset that the engineers of Canada should not fail to use to the greater advantage of Canada.

Such a plan may or may not be sound, but it does seem to me that the objective is of such great value that the department would be wise not to ignore any suggestion of that type, and not to construct the waterway in such a way that it would be impossible to adopt some of these schemes. A year or two ago when we were interested in atomic energy, I understood that eventually that power might be used for dispensing with ice. I suppose it is many years in the future, but could the minister tell us whether his department has in mind the possibility of some such scheme that would eliminate ice in this waterway during the winter months?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to that question is no. We in the department have no means or scheme whereby we can do away with ice. I am aware of the article to which my hon. friend refers, and so are the engineers in the department, but we know of no method whereby navigation can be kept open for twelve months in the year. We in the department know of no method whereby navigation can be kept open for a greater length of time than it is kept open. On the contrary, we are proceeding on the basis that it can be kept open for seven or eight months only, because we are continuing our program of icebreakers. I am not an engineer, and I am not in a position to depreciate or appreciate the article to which my hon. friend has referred. All I can say is that we in the Department of Transport know of no method whereby the St. Lawrence can be kept open for twelve months in the year.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Green: I understand the St. Lawrence seaway authority is to be a crown corporation?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: Of what type? How would it fit in with the other crown companies? To what type would it correspond?

Mr. Howe: The national harbours board.

Mr. Green: It is to be set up in a way similar to the national harbours board?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Purposes.

Mr. Drew: Why does the authority extend only to lake Erie? In all the discussions that have taken place there has been constant reference to the fact that this is one great waterway from salt water to the head of the lakes. I am anxious to know why this authority simply goes as far as lake Erie and does not include the St. Clair or Sault development.

Mr. Chevrier: Because there is already fairly deep navigation in the upper channels. There is a 25-foot depth for outbound navigation, and a 21-foot depth for upbound navigation. Over the years it has been the practice and custom for the United States to provide for the expenditure in that area. That is the reason it is not included here; and it is certainly not included in the expenditure that we propose under the authority.

Mr. Drew: This bill, of course, does not deal only with expenditure and construction; it deals with administration and supervision. It would have seemed to me appropriate that the administrative authority and the power of supervision should extend through the whole length of the waterway.

St. Lawrence Waterway

Mr. Chevrier: There is provision for adding to the authority additional canals and operations in the upper lakes, if that were required. It is not envisaged at the moment. That is all I meant to say. While the 1941 agreement envisaged, as my hon. friend probably had in mind, the whole channel from the head of the lakes to the port of Montreal, this bill does not do that. Obviously that would mean a greater expenditure.

Mr. Drew: That is what I had in mind. It is what I also had in mind when on an earlier occasion I referred to the fact that this is one integrated waterway and has been for some time, and that what is really being done is to bring the St. Lawrence part of it up to the standards that have already been created across the Niagara peninsula and in the upper waters. It does not seem to me the mere fact that the authority would include the whole of the waterways right through to the lakehead would add to the expense in any way; because after all, the supervision and administrative direction that would have to be exercised would be only such supervision and direction as the government felt desirable at any time over those upper areas.

Mr. Chevrier: Quite so. It would not add to the expense if we were to take over canals already in existence in that area. It would only do so if we were to deepen the channels to 27 feet.

Mr. Adamson: I gather from the minister that there is to be some expenditure on the Welland canal?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: That is for deepening it from 25 feet to 27 feet is it?

Mr. Chevrier: No. It is already, at the sills, 30 feet in depth.

Mr. Adamson: That is what I thought.

Mr. Chevrier: It is for deepening the entrance and the exit to the Welland canal, which will run into about $1,200,000.

Mr. Adamson: No consideration has been given—or I suppose it has, but the decision has obviously been against it—to making all the canals 30 feet in depth?

Mr. Chevrier: No consideration has been given to that matter, because the expenditure would be tremendous.

Mr. Gillis: This clause is extremely important; it has to do with the purposes, capacities and powers of the authority. I think the clause restricts any development except in the area set out in the clause, namely between Montreal and lake Erie.

That makes the thing pretty much a central Canada development. When I was discussing this matter I had hoped that the authority would be broad enough to develop in any part of Canada any power or similar project that might be in the interests of Canada as a whole. This does not give the organization, when it is set up, any wide authority but restricts its activities to the area set out in this particular clause. I suggest to the minister that there are other developments which might be undertaken.

This bill has to do not only with the development of that waterway. It gives the authority the power to acquire lands for constructing, maintaining and operating all such works, and so on. What I had hoped—and I still hope the minister will think about it—is that once this authority is set up, it is going to develop in Canada power projects and industries, if necessary, in certain parts of the country. I should like to see this authority broad enough to give them power to look at, for example, the 'Quoddy project in New Brunswick. It is just as necessary to the province of New Brunswick, to the states of Maine and New Hampshire, and to that surrounding area as is this power project to the province of Ontario and the state of New York. It would not necessarily mean that we would have to go ahead and develop it overnight. But as we are embarking on a program of this kind, I think my suggestion might be adopted. It is government incentive in opening up and developing the country where there are potentialities and where risk capital cannot be found. I think that is in accordance with the government's program announced in 1945. It now looks to me as though the government were starting to implement it. Why should we restrict the development to the area to which it is restricted under this clause?

If the minister added just a couple of words I think it would be quite satisfactory to everyone. I suggest that it would be satisfactory if something were added to the effect that this authority had power to develop projects between the port of Montreal and lake Erie, and in any other area where a project might be in the best interests of Canada. I think those words would broaden the effect of the section, and would give them the right at least to continue the survey that is being made of the 'Quoddy project and the Saint John river project. As we are now setting up this kind of machinery, I think it should be broad enough to include the whole of Canada, where the authority may determine that a project is necessary and desirable and risk capital cannot be found for it, such as your power in Ontario and in the state of

New York. I do not think that is asking too much. I do not anticipate that it will be done overnight but at least it would give to the bill and to the authority the proper designation, that given it by the minister, namely that this is in the interests of Canada as a whole. While he said that, this clause restricts the authority you are setting up to the short section between Montreal and lake Erie. Will the minister consider adding the provision that, as to any other project that comes within the scope of this authority and that might be in the interests of Canada as a whole, they could take a look at it, at least?

Mr. Chevrier: Much as I should like to accede to the request of my hon. friend who is so co-operative, generally speaking, and who is being co-operative at this time, I have to say that this is a specific project. That is why the government felt that the authority should be set up in the form of a crown company, along the lines of a former crown company, to deal with two things, namely the construction of the waterway and the operation of the works. If there were to be an extension, where would you draw the line? I think I know what my hon. friend has in mind. He is thinking of something along the line of the T.V.A. in the United States. The government, unfortunately for him in this case, has decided that it should be a crown company in this sense; and I have no authority to amend the bill as he has suggested, nor could I do so at this juncture.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Management and operation of canals and works.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain what type of operation section 14 is intended to cover? It gives the authority power apart from the authority being given by the main portion of the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: This is to cover a case such as this, for instance. Let us assume that the Lachine canal is developed. It will authorize the seaway authority to take over the Lachine canal and operate it. Likewise it might authorize the seaway authority to take over other canals that are now operated by the Department of Transport, if it should be deemed necessary to do so.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Tariffs of tolls.

Mr. Adamson: As this takes in the Welland canal as well I gather that it will be possible, under this authority, to charge tolls on the Welland canal?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: As I read it, section 15 would empower the authority to charge tolls on the Welland canal, would it not?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but on the Welland canal only in so far as the cost is concerned. I indicated a moment ago that it would cost about $1,200,000. I have forgotten the figure I put on the record. Only as to that expenditure and the cost of the operation of the Welland canal is it the intention to charge tolls. I put on the record how the cost of amortization would be disposed of; and in so far as Welland is concerned, it would only be for the expenditure at Welland.

Mr. Green: Power contained in the section is broad enough to enable the levying of a regular toll in the Welland canal?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes.

Mr. Drew: Does that conflict with any existing arrangements we have with the United States in regard to the use of that and other waterways?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It seems to me the government is determined to have this put through. They have had excellent co-operation. I do not think we have ever experienced such co-operation in this chamber before, but I might say a minimum of consideration. It is after ten o'clock, and I think we have done enough.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Section stands.

MR. R. G. PEERS

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Mr. R. G. Peers and the government of Canada or any department or agency thereof since January 1, 1946.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESS REPORT OF INCREASE IN CANADA'S REARMAMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he give the house any information regarding reports in the newspapers this morning that Canada, among other nations, is to be asked to increase her rearmament program by 5 to 10 per cent? If so, what has become of article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The representative of Canada on the temporary council committee which has been meeting in Paris is the Minister of Finance. I would be glad if he would answer the question.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I saw the press reference. In reply to the question may I say that the committee is meeting on Friday to consider its draft report. I have no reason to believe that it will recommend an increase in Canada's military efforts.

CIGARETTES

DISPOSAL OF SEIZED U.S. CIGARETTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Minister of National Revenue two questions of which I have given notice. What is being done with the large quantities of United States cigarettes that are being seized by customs officials and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Are they being allowed to displace Canadian cigarettes for sale in Canada?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his questions. Cigarettes that are seized are first put in what is known as the king's warehouse. They are afterward distributed to veteran hospitals throughout the country. The practice formerly followed was to destroy such cigarettes. This distribution is made by officials of the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise branch, who in practically all instances are veterans. They visit the hospitals and make a personal distribution.

The hon. member asked also whether the cigarettes are allowed to displace Canadian-made cigarettes for sale in Canada. The broad answer to that would be "no". They do not enter into competition except in so far as the recipients in veterans hospitals would probably buy Canadian made cigarettes if they did not get the ones which have been seized. They are not in competition with them on the open market.

FISHERIES

TARIFF ON CANADIAN FISH TO U.S.A.—APPLICATION FOR INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Is the Minister of Fisheries in a position to give the house any information on the recent hearings before the United States tariff commission, Washington, D.C., concerning an application by certain New England groups to increase the tariff on fish entering the United States from Canada?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The United States tariff commission has completed its hearings on this subject. Our own industry presented a brief through Mr. Clarence Morrow of Lunenburg. While the hearings have been completed investigations will be continued for some time by the tariff officials and they will consider any submissions made by United States and Canadian officials.

AGREEMENT WITH NORWAY ON SEAL FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Have any steps been taken to reach an agreement with Norway as to the date when the killing of seals will commence so that both countries may derive the most benefit from the seal fishing?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): On several occasions Canada has discussed with Norway the matter of killing seals and has also conducted an inquiry with sealing companies in Newfoundland and along the maritime coast. Agreement has been reached and Canada is now prepared to enter into direct negotiations with Norway. We expect that will be done within the next two or three weeks.

RADIOTELEPHONES

REPORTED INSTALLATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of question No. 8 standing on the order paper in my name. It has been reported over the radio in St. John's that radiotelephones will be installed in the spring and I should like to ask if that is official.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of that and I did not hear the radio broadcast the hon. member has referred to. Since the question is on the order paper I shall try to see that it is answered as quickly as possible.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, December 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment, as amended, of Mr. Argue, and the amendment to the amendment, as amended, of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on the last evening of this debate when I was speaking I was about to read from United States fishery products report No. 224, to be found in the bulletin of the fisheries council of Canada of November 30, 1951. This reads:

> The outlook for increased fish production appears to be promising, for the FAO study reports that many countries are adding, or planning to add, mechanized craft to the fishing fleets to fish in areas farther from port and save on travel time. Moreover, the report adds, improvements in fishing gear and equipment are being made in many underdeveloped as well as developed countries.

I am aware that at the present time a joint committee is sitting in Newfoundland under the chairmanship of Chief Justice Sir Albert Walsh, a man who knows the customs of the country and who for several years was a member of the commission of government. The fishermen of Newfoundland will be looking forward to the contents of this report when it appears, but I do want to point out to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) that if our interest in the fisheries is allowed to lag, and if we allow our fisheries to decline, as appears to be the policy of the provincial government, other nations more vigorous than ours will step in and take our rightful place as the greatest fishing country in the world.

Today is the fiftieth anniversary of the reception by Marconi, the inventor of wireless telegraphy, of the first transatlantic message. Fifty years ago in Cabot tower on Signal hill, above the narrows of St. John's harbour, a copper wire suspended from a kite picked up a signal transmitted from Cornwall, thus justifying the confidence of Marconi in his discovery and inventions. The untold benefits mankind has derived as other scientists have improved upon Marconi's invention justify our grateful commemoration of the astonishing event that occurred just half a century ago.

I have only one other thing to say and that is to compliment the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) upon the solicitude that he showed the other day when he referred to the Canadian sisters who have been victims of the Chinese communists. I should like to draw to the attention of the house an article that appeared in La Presse yesterday, which reads:

(Translation):

Persecutions have cut down by two-thirds the number of missionaries in China.

As a result of the efforts of Chinese communists to drive the Catholic church out of China, the number of missionaries has fallen from 5,000 to 1,879. Every day, other missionaries are being expelled, or jailed prior to deportation. Most Protestant missionaries, never as numerous as Catholic missionaries, have left China. It is not known how many have remained.

According to the last survey, there were 142 foreign Catholic missionaries in the prisons of China and there are probably twice that number being kept under close watch in their homes.

Among Catholic missionaries jailed by the communists, are the following Canadians:

Mgr. Cuthbert O'Gara, of Ottawa; Rev. Arsène Mullin, O.F.M., of Montreal; Rev. Didace Arcand, O.F.M., of Three Rivers . . .

. . . and many other priests and nuns from Canada.

(Text):

I should like also to refer to an article which appeared in The Sign of November, 1951, which reads:

Countless martyrs have shed their blood. Today it is "dry martyrdom." A long slow process calculated to reach into a man's inmost being and dry up all spirit of resistance or desire to acknowledge anything but what is forced upon him. A slow but definitely effective process the horrors of which are beyond the imagination of those who have not fallen victims, a deadly inhuman diabolic process that reached its almost perfect form in the Mindszenty case.

Hunan—

A province in China.

—is now the training ground for this modern Soviet type of oppression and destruction. Bishop O'Gara—

Who is well known in Ottawa.

—is in prison, his priests under constant threat, his diocese in the hands of renegades, his faithful dreading each moment of the day and night. God be with them.

How can we feel happy when these people are facing martyrdom? All Canadians have a right to expect that their government will do everything possible to protect their lives and bring about the release of these heroic men and women.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I do not wish to prolong this debate an instant longer than is absolutely necessary, but I wish to refer once again to the remarks the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made in this house concerning cases of dismissal for security reasons. I still believe, Mr. Speaker, that some machinery must be set up whereby a man who is considered a poor security risk has the opportunity of hearing the case against him. I do not believe that this requires any breach of security, and I am convinced that it can be done without in any way disclosing the necessarily secret methods employed by the security forces of the country. Notwithstanding the genuine feelings of the Prime Minister concerning these cases, and the fears of allowing security material to be compromised, I feel that we in this house, as the custodians of the freedom of the individual, cannot permit these dismissals to continue without recourse to any appeal.

I thank the Prime Minister for the objective way in which he dealt with my submissions in this case. I feel that the present system is unsatisfactory, and I do suggest that it is dangerous to the genuine security and freedom of this peace-loving country.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I shall not take more than about two minutes of the time of the house, and then we shall be ready for the vote. One week ago I found it necessary to bring to the attention of the house certain complaints coming from the residents of Ottawa in connection with the practice of using tea bags in certain restaurants on more than one occasion. On Thursday I received a telegram from the president of the tea bureau in Toronto advising me of his displeasure over the complaint and stating a representative would come to Ottawa to make an investigation. I believe that the representative visited Ottawa on Friday and made an investigation. The result of the investigation, which appeared in the press yesterday and this morning, is to the effect that no tea bag tricks are being practised in Ottawa.

I believe that the officials of the tea bureau are not fooling the citizens of Ottawa in sending out a report of that kind. First of all, it must be realized that anyone practising these tea bag tricks would not admit to anyone that such was the case. They are not pulling the wool over the eyes of these victims of the tea bag tricks. I am not retracting one word of the complaint I made a week ago. In fact my position has been strengthened by the fact that since that time people have voluntarily told me that they have also had that trick pulled on them. The practice is injurious to the health of the people in this and other cities, and I feel that the publicity that has been given to it will prevent offenders from continuing the practice.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Does the amendment carry?

Mr. Knowles: The question is on the subamendment.

Mr. Speaker: The motion before the house is on the amendment to the amendment as amended. Is it the pleasure of the house to carry it?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion as to what we are asked to vote upon at this stage.

Mr. Speaker: I shall attempt to make it clear. There was an amendment moved by Mr. Argue to the main motion, to which Mr. Bater moved a subamendment which was carried. Then the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved an amendment to the amendment as amended. The question now is on the motion of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment as amended (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Cauchon moved, seconded by Mr. Simmons:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Field Marshal The Right Honourable the Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the Decoration of the Military Cross, Governor General and Commander in Chief of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

Mr. Argue, seconded by Mr. Wright, moved an amendment to that motion; and subsequently Mr. Bater moved an amendment to Mr. Argue's amendment, which was carried.

Mr. Bater's amendment is that the following words be added:

This house regrets the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems.

The question is now on Mr. Argue's amendment as amended by Mr. Bater.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Argue) as amended by Mr. Bater which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment as amended carried.

Mr. Fulton: I was paired with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart). Had I not been paired I am not quite sure how I would have voted, because I rather fancy that the motion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Speech.

Mr. Fulton: —was out of order.

Mr. Cleaver: I was paired with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment as amended.

Mr. McCubbin: I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted for Mr. Bater's amendment.

Mr. Graydon: I was paired with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment as amended.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted I would have voted against the government.

Mr. Huffman: I was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment as amended.

Mr. Speaker: The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the final disposition of this subject but I have one observation to make about the rather anomalous action that the house has just taken. If the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was right when he spoke in the house on October 15, what the house has just done is to express its lack of confidence in the government because when the Prime Minister spoke in this debate on October 15, as found at page page 33 of Hansard, in speaking of the observations of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) with reference to the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition he pointed out that if the amendment was not a motion of non-confidence it probably was not in order at that time.

Having regard to constitutional practice in these matters, which was so effectively reviewed by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he spoke on December 10, it is quite apparent that since 1899 no government member has ever moved an amendment on a resolution proposing that an address be presented to His Excellency.

An hon. Member: We are progressive.

Mr. Fleming: That practice has been followed in the United Kingdom certainly since 1894. Therefore in the light of constitutional practice what the majority of the house has just done in supporting this amendment is to express want of confidence in the government. I presume therefore the government has no alternative but to resign.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, while the government is trying to make up its mind whether it should carry out the suggestion and accept the vote as one of want of confidence, there is another matter that I want to bring to the attention of the house. I am quite sure that members on the opposition side of the house will appreciate the fact that during the present session, with no budget and no estimates, the throne speech is the one opportunity when members may deal with subjects of general interest to the country. I am confident that members on the Liberal side of the house, since they were quite ready to spend almost an entire day debating a meaningless amendment to the amendment so that Liberals would not find it inconvenient to vote against the amendment, will bear with me for a few moments on this question. I want to discuss a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) when speaking to the house on October 25. At that time he was introducing the resolution preceding the old age security bill, and at page 381 of Hansard he said:

> As my colleagues and I have so frequently emphasized in the years since 1945, the broad social objectives then outlined by the federal government have constantly remained in the forefront of its thinking and planning.

I want to bring to the attention of the house what some of these broad social objectives were which were proposed by the government in 1945. One of great interest to the country was a nationally based and nation-wide social security program which included among other things social and health insurance together with hospitalization. I want to quote—and I shall not be long—from the proposals made in 1945. At page 28 there is the following:

> Although great progress has been made in Canada during the first half of this century, there still remains a tremendous job to be done in improving the national health and in extending the benefits of modern science and medical care to all parts of the nation and all sections of the population.

Then I want to read another quotation from page 28. This is the Liberal government speaking in 1945. It reads:

> Under our present system, for the man who can afford to pay, the cost of ill health falls at the very moment when his earning capacity is cut off. The cost of treatment and cure for the individual who cannot afford to pay is borne to a considerable degree through the benefactions of well to do members of the community and the generosity of doctors who give so freely of their time and skill, and more and more by the provincial governments and municipalities. In spite of these efforts desirable treatment is still not obtained in many cases. While much of the cost of illness is thus hidden, it can only come out of the total productive capacity of the country. The advantages of a broader provision of health services on a more equitable basis are obvious.

That was in the year 1945. Then there is another choice statement, and I quote it because the spokesmen for the government who prepared these proposals put the sentiments I want to express today in words that are as good as any that I could use. They said:

> To remove disparities in standards of health services in different parts of Canada, to avoid the risks of sudden heavy expenditures, and distribute health costs more widely and equitably, and above all to obtain the benefits of better health for the great majority of our people, these are the objects of the proposals which the federal government is now making with respect to health insurance for all, and increased public health services assisted by federal grants.

The government, or at least the Liberal party, has apparently been interested in health insurance for a long time. We find that health insurance first found itself in the election manifesto of the Liberal party back in 1919, only thirty-two years ago. I suppose thirty-two years is not much in the lifetime of a political party and possibly the Liberals consider that thirty-two years is really not sufficient time for them to begin to implement their election manifesto promises.

We are now in 1951, thirty-two years since the Liberals first adopted the principle of health insurance as an election program, as an election promise. We are back now, probably not to where we were thirty-two years ago but certainly to where we were in 1941 or 1942. The government went much further than to just offer these pious proposals for health insurance; in 1945 the government actually spelled out these proposals and gave them to us in considerable detail. On page 29 of their proposals they stated:

> Health insurance has been widely adopted because it is regarded as the best means of meeting and of distributing fairly the costs of illness and, in conjunction with preventive services, of improving the general health of the nation. Specifically:
> (1) Health insurance enables the cost of illness to be prepaid, so that by paying regular sums when they are well people are able to meet the costs of illness when they are ill without being financially crippled.
> (2) Health insurance not only enables individuals to prepay their medical costs, but does this in such a way as to secure a wide pooling of risks and distribution of costs in much the same manner as any other form of insurance.
> (3) The provision of funds by all persons within a large area makes it possible for hospital and medical services to people in that area to be planned and administered more efficiently and economically than could be done by any other method.

(4) The provision of better facilities for treatment and advice also operates to reduce the total incidence of disease and preventable death. Health insurance must be accompanied by adequate public health measures of a preventive character, but health insurance itself also provides important preventive benefits.

(5) Health insurance permits the steady extension of health services into areas not previously covered, and the rapid application everywhere of new methods and services as they are discovered and developed.

In that language the government set forth back in 1945 most definitely its proposal of a health insurance program. Prior to 1945 they had done some spade work. In 1941 the then minister of pensions and national health had called a meeting of health authorities and persons interested in public welfare. It will be noted that that meeting was called only twenty-two years after the Liberals first adopted health insurance into the election manifesto. In twenty-two years' time they managed to get around to the point where the minister was calling a meeting.

In 1942 the government appointed an advisory committee on this matter. In 1943 a House of Commons committee was set up, and in that year the advisory committee reported to the House of Commons committee and presented a draft bill in which all the details were worked out. I recall the election which followed the presentation of that draft bill. It was pretty generally understood throughout the country that all that was needed to have that bill become legislation was to elect the Liberal party. That was the general appeal made by the Liberal party in that year. In 1944 a conference was called at Ottawa of representatives of all the provinces. Various views were put forth, and in that connection the proposals were as follows:

In May, 1944, a conference was held at Ottawa which was attended by representatives of all the provinces. The discussion principally turned on the estimated cost of the services contemplated under the draft health insurance bill and on the manner of meeting this cost. Views were put forward by several provinces which appeared to have the support of most if not all of the provinces. These indicated their strong desire that health insurance should be proceeded with by stages and that any scheme adopted should be flexible enough to permit the provinces to build on the varying services in each province.

In the throne speeches of 1944 and 1945 health insurance was included as part of the Liberal policy. That was one of the objectives that the Liberal party held out to the Canadian public just on the eve of the 1945 elections. Four definite proposals on the subject of health insurance were set out by the government in 1945. The scheme was to include a grant for planning and organization; it was to include health insurance; it was to include health grants; and it was to include federal assistance in the construction of hospitals. The proposed federal contribution was as follows:

(i) a basic grant of one-fifth of the estimated cost of each service as shown on the table which follows as from time to time revised by agreement, and

(ii) one-half the additional actual cost incurred by each provincial government of providing each benefit, provided that the total federal contribution does not exceed the amount stated in the table for each service, or maximum of $12.96 per person, when the complete program is in operation.

That was the financial basis upon which the program was to progress. Among other help that was to be granted, I am particularly interested in the reference to financial assistance in the construction of hospitals. The proposal stated:

To make a hospital extension program less burdensome to the provincial governments and to local communities, it is proposed that the federal government should provide loans to the provincial governments entering health insurance agreements, and through provincial governments to municipalities and other organizations, for necessary expansion of hospital facilities, at a rate of interest equal to or only slightly above the cost of such loans to the dominion. . .

That was to be one of the ways in which the government was to make its contribution towards the building of hospitals. There were to be loans from the government, and there were to be the basic amounts for health insurance grants for various types of assistance. We are now in 1951, and where are we with health insurance? We are back in 1942 or a little farther back than 1942. In 1942 we did have a committee, but in 1951 we have only the promise of a committee which is to be set up at the next session. Apparently the government's policy concerning this matter underwent a change in 1948, and Mr. King's announcement of the new policy on May 14 included no provision whatever for health insurance. Since then there has been no indication that the government is seriously considering the implementation of that 32-year-old promise to the Canadian people.

There can be no reasonable argument for delaying the implementation of that program. The government cannot say that these proposals were made, and were subject to agreement with the provinces. It was clearly set out that these proposals were flexible, and that any province could enter into an agreement to put into effect any part of this program that it was felt it could do at that time. The proposals were flexible enough to permit any province that wanted to institute health insurance to enter into an agreement with the federal government whereby it would get the federal aid set out in these proposals for the implementation of health insurance. Other countries, probably less fortunate than Canada, have instituted health insurance since 1945.

I should like to read briefly from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star under date of December 8, 1951. I am quite sure that Liberals will listen to any editorial appearing in a paper which is so devoted to the Liberal party and the Liberal cause.

Mr. Martin: It shows good judgment.

Mr. Noseworthy: The Star mentions an address made by Dr. Fraser Brockington of Manchester university on the subject of health insurance and social medicine. In summarizing that address the Star has this to say:

> The British national health scheme is in the third year of its operation.

In other words, Great Britain, with all her handicaps, with the aftermath of war and all her financial problems since 1945, has been able to institute an over-all health insurance program similar to that which this government proposed in 1945, but which we in Canada have not been able to implement. The editorial continues:

> It has already reduced the backlog of neglected health among a large portion of the population, and improved the efficiency of hospitals and other facilities. It has made possible for people in outlying areas to obtain the services of specialists where they were not easily available before. The nursing supply has been increased, as well as hospital beds. Maternity and child welfare services, home nursing and domestic aid have been extended. A national deafness service is a new addition through which hearing aids are being provided at the rate of 6,000 a month, most of them to elderly people who could not afford them in the past.
> Perhaps the most important benefit of the national health service is psychological. It has removed from the entire population the fear of sickness. It has eliminated the financial barrier to medical care. The service is especially appreciated by the middle classes, individuals and families whose income ranges between $2,000 and $5,000 a year. To these groups, sickness often brings calamitous burdens of debt. The health service guarantees protection to them and many others. No one in Britain now becomes shackled by debts for surgical operation, childbirth or hospitalization for a long, chronic ailment.

Then, this is interesting:

> The British national health service is mostly financed by general taxation. About a ninth of the cost is covered by contributions from employees and employers. An employed man (single or married) pays about 10 cents a week; a woman pays 7½ cents and an employer 1·8 cents. They contribute also as direct or indirect taxpayers. And everyone, without distinction on any ground, is entitled to whatever medical or hospital services are required for cure and prevention of sickness.

There is one other point brought out in this editorial that is interesting to Canadians in general. Dr. Brockington refers to the British national health service as social medicine. He says:

> —it is "social medicine," in that all essential health facilities are being extended to everyone on a co-operative basis, with due respect to the rights of those who give and those who receive the service. Doctors, dentists, pharmacists, etc., are not salaried employees of the state . . .

I wanted to point out that Great Britain, with all the difficulties, turmoil and aftermath of the war, was able to embark upon a social and health insurance program such as outlined there. We in this country are under a Liberal government that professes to believe in such a program, that has been promising such a program to the Canadian people for over thirty years, and that at one time reached the point of having a draft bill ready, which bill was held out to the Canadian public at election time when the appeal was made that all that was necessary to have the bill placed on the statute books was the election of the Liberal party. I might add that in recent months the Liberals in Ontario particularly have appeared to be quite interested in health insurance and hospitalization. Some cabinet ministers from this government went into Ontario in support of that program during the campaign. Did the minister say no?

Mr. Martin: I was looking to the right.

Mr. Noseworthy: As I recall the matter, if my memory serves me correctly, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was reported in the press as having spoken, probably by coincidence at that time.

Mr. Martin: Just so that the record will be clear, but not that this is important, may I say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare made no speech whatsoever in the provincial election campaign.

Mr. Noseworthy: No speech in Ontario during the provincial election?

Mr. Martin: I said that I made no speech whatsoever during the provincial election and in connection with the provincial election. I made a statement which was referred to in this house, in which I pointed out that it was this parliament that was responsible for the Old Age Security Act and not any provincial government. This was the only comment I made publicly during the election. I thank my hon. friend for giving me the opportunity to correct his statement and to make the record clear.

Mr. Coldwell: But the hon. gentleman was supporting the Liberal leader and the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin: The hon. gentleman always supports the Liberal leader and the Liberal party.

Mr. Coldwell: We have that clear now.

Mr. Noseworthy: That clears the matter up now. My point is that Liberals of the federal house participated in the campaign and seemed to be genuinely interested in this subject. I think it would be unfair to the Liberals who have shown such great interest in this subject throughout the years, and particularly in the last few weeks in Ontario, to close this debate on the address in reply without giving them an opportunity of expressing in some concrete way just what their attitude is. In order to do that I move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the following words be added to the address, as amended:

"This house further regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for a national health plan, including hospitalization, medical care and health insurance."

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated a moment lest the Minister of National Health and Welfare wished to comment on this further amendment. I hope he will do so even yet. A few words from him would be quite sufficient, if they are the right words. I can assure you, sir, and the house that what I have to say at this point will be brief.

I want to indicate that, in my view, the subject matter of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) is one of the most important questions facing this country at the present time. It is a matter of extreme concern to all our people. We are slowly but surely making some headway in the field of social legislation, particularly in that we are getting rid of the means test with respect to the old age pension for those 70 and over and in that we are getting a pension started at age 65.

There are other improvements necessary in that legislation, principally an increase in the amount. But, as I have pointed out on a number of occasions, it is becoming extremely important that we bring in along with our old age legislation some forward steps in the field of health. I need not rehearse the story that has been given by my colleague with respect to the promises that have been made by this government across the years but which are not measured up to by actual performance. It certainly is a fact that our people across this country are interested in this whole problem of health and need some attention to be given to it. The wording of the amendment proposed by my colleague pin-points what is really needed, namely a national health plan, including hospitalization, medical care and health insurance.

There are various appropriate announcements that the Minister of National Health and Welfare could make at this time. I hope that the least he will do is to confirm the promise he made last June to the effect that at the 1952 session of parliament there will be a special parliamentary committee to go into this question. As he knows, ever since the work of the special parliamentary committee on old age security some of us have been urging that a further committee be set up; and during debates on this matter last June the minister indicated that we would have such a committee at the next session of parliament. I hope that the minister today will confirm that promise. I urge further that that committee be set up just as early as possible in the session that will start some time in the first part of 1952.

There is just one other comment that I want to make while I am on my feet, and it relates to a copy of a sessional paper which was tabled yesterday but which reached me just this morning. It is sessional paper No. 86-B which was tabled by the minister's parliamentary assistant, giving the answers to questions of mine having to do with requests from the provinces for grants for research purposes under the federal health grants program. This sessional paper sets out requests for grants for research purposes which have been turned down by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I want to register my protest against the action of the department or of the minister, or whoever is responsible, for turning down some of these requests. I think that action shows an indefensible lack of interest in some extremely important matters. For example, according to this sessional paper, the Newfoundland provincial government asked for assistance for:

A complete survey of the provincial hospitals which would improve their management and business procedures, under the terms of the general public health grant.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I know of a lot of things on which money is being spent which are a lot less important than a survey of the provincial hospitals of any province—in this case it was Newfoundland—with the hope of improving their management and procedures.

Then there was a request from Quebec for research into a certain aspect of arteriosclerosis, to be carried out at the pathological institute, McGill university, and at the Royal Victoria hospital in Montreal. We know how excellent is the work done at these institutions. I suggest that the failure to grant the money for that research project is something that we should protest. Similarly, there was a request for money for research into the effects of electrical and chemical stimuli at the neuro-muscular junction, to be carried out by the department of physiology, McGill university. There are a number of other requests such as that from outstanding centres of medicine across the country.

Then here is one that came from Ontario, and frankly, when I look at it, I am amazed that the government turned this down, unless they were afraid of the results. Just listen to this. It is a request from the Ontario provincial government for assistance for a research project on:

> A housing and health survey in St. Thomas and district to discover the relationship, if any, between substandard housing and adult and child health.

I think that is definitely something that we should have research on, Mr. Speaker, namely the relationship between substandard housing and the health of our people. I think the government of Ontario is to be commended for proposing such a research project. I think that this government is to be condemned for turning down a project of that kind. There are others—I am not going to read them all—but there is one more I want to draw special attention to, and I am particularly disturbed that this request was refused. It was from the government of Saskatchewan. I am reading from the sessional paper that was tabled here yesterday. The request was for money for research on this subject:

> An administrative analysis of health insurance plans operating in Canada with emphasis on the patterns of administration emerging in this new field of health service.

I do not know all the details, but I believe that Saskatchewan indicated it was possible to get financial assistance from other sources as well, if they could get some assistance from the federal government for this, and it does seem to me that it would have been a very valuable piece of research.

The federal government wants us to believe that it has some interest in the question of health insurance. We vote money every year in the estimates for health insurance studies. It took considerable effort on our part for quite a while to get the government to spend that money for that purpose, but they are spending money on health insurance studies. They have a director of health insurance studies, although he does have other work as well. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has given further evidence of at least some interest in the question of health insurance by his announcement that we are to have a special parliamentary committee on this subject next year. If that is so, it seems to me it would have been an excellent idea to have a piece of research such as this carried on and perhaps completed before that committee is set up.

I do not know how wide it was intended that this survey be made, but it sounds as though the government of Saskatchewan was interested in an objective survey of the administration of health insurance plans operating in Canada in all the various parts of this country.

If the government is sincere in its interest in health insurance, sincere to the point of being willing to establish a parliamentary committee at the next session, I certainly think it should not have turned down that request. The amounts of money involved in these various research projects that are covered in this sessional paper 86-B I am sure would be only a drop in the bucket compared with the federal government expenditures at the present time, and I hope that the minister will reconsider his decision against these research grants. I feel that all of those that I have indicated—and perhaps the rest of them in this sessional paper—should have been made. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the minister will indicate that it is the intention to set up that special committee as early as possible at the next session of parliament.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I should like to say just a word about the amendment, because I would not like to vote on it without making our position very clear. I must begin by saying that I am absolutely opposed to the amendment, not because I do not want to see our people throughout Canada have the advantage of any health measures which it is possible to extend to them, but I object very strongly to having these things all centralized in the federal government; I object strongly to having our people molly-coddled constantly and forced into becoming wards of a superstate.

I do not find it possible often to come to the assistance of the government, but when I do I like to make my position very clear. I think that the federal government has set about this whole business of health measures on a very wide program. I think they have done well, and I want to pay that tribute to them. They have done an outstanding job in the field of health, but they have had the good sense to work in close co-operation with the provincial governments in order to see to it that whatever assistance could be granted from the federal government to the authorities who are supposed to be looking after the health of the people—that is, the provincial and municipal governments—is extended to them. I like a great many of the things that have been done by the department of health here. I could speak at length, but I do not intend to. I could enumerate the fine things that they have done to assist the provinces in their schemes for health insurance.

I would like to see more educational work done. There could be considerably more research, and perhaps more investigational projects. There certainly could be more education to assist our people to understand what it is that makes them sick, and to help them to follow a manner of living that will keep them well. I object to any national scheme that places a burden of taxation upon all the people to treat, we will say, a very large section of the population that will not do anything to keep themselves well. I do not think that is right. It is high time that we began to understand that until individuals in our country take advantage of the information that is available and educate themselves in nutrition and other health measures to the point where they will do their utmost to keep themselves out of hospital, until that time comes it is not wise to talk about taxing the daylight out of the rest for the sake of giving these others hospitalization and medical assistance.

When I say that, Mr. Speaker, I recognize that there are many people who could not do any more for themselves. I realize that. I realize, too, that there are many people who have no access to hospitalization or to doctors, because they cannot afford it. Certainly these are legitimate cases and there should be some way of helping them; but the best way to do it is to have the responsibilities placed upon the government nearest to them, and that is their municipal and provincial governments.

In our province of Alberta we have recognized the necessity of giving aid to our people as far as we possibly can, and that without taxing them to death. In the first place we decided years ago there were certain diseases that will strike members of families and will require long and costly treatment. Such diseases are likely to impoverish those families, and to render them homeless.

As a government we decided some years ago that it was our duty to step in and to assist in such cases. So we, as a government, took over the complete cost of poliomyelitis cases, and the after-training of individuals stricken with that disease, so that they could be fitted to earn something for themselves later on when their condition improved. We took over the full cost of the treatment of cancer cases. We recognized also that, to cut down so far as possible the high rate of infant mortality, we should extend maternity hospitalization of all expectant mothers, and do it at the expense of the government. That has been done. It has been going on very well for years. As a result, our infant mortality rate in Alberta has become very low.

Then, very early in the game we took over the full cost of the treatment of tuberculosis and, so long as necessary, the hospitalization incidental thereto. By taking these burdens off individuals the government has made it possible for families to get along, and has prevented their becoming impoverished through heavy medical costs.

We believe that in Alberta we have gone a long way in connection with hospitalization. We have now a scheme based upon careful and close co-operation between the provincial government and municipal authorities, and with the assistance of the federal government granted some years ago under a hospitalization scheme whereby individuals throughout the province can receive hospitalization for a dollar a day.

We felt it was wise to leave something to the individual. I do not believe it is good to give them everything. We felt in Alberta that a dollar a day was at least a token payment that almost any person could afford. It has had the effect that in Alberta one does not find the hospitals filled with patients complaining of bellyaches and ingrown toenails. They do not go to the hospitals unless they really need hospital treatment.

As a result we feel that our people gradually, step by step, are getting the kind of health assistance and health insurance they need. I believe it is wiser by far to work out schemes whereby the federal government will grant assistance through grants in aid so as, if possible, to equalize opportunities in respect of health facilities in all the provinces. We have felt it wise for the federal government to continue its investigational and research projects, and to make the results known to the people of Canada. This government should go as far as it can in assisting the provinces to inform the people about nutritional services and health measures of all kinds, so that people eventually will learn how to keep themselves well and out of the hospitals, as well as free from the necessity for medical care.

I wish to make it abundantly clear that we Social Crediters are favourable to every possible measure of assistance for our people in the field of health; but we strongly object to centralizing this in the federal government. Let us see to it that the fullest possible measure of co-operation is built up between the federal government, the provincial governments and municipal governments. Let us see to it that we leave something to the individual. The only way in the world we can ever maintain a spirit of independence is to do something of that kind. So I say that until some such thing as we have been doing in Alberta can be conceived on a national scale, I must oppose the amendment.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words. As it is now almost one o'clock, I wonder if I might be permitted to proceed after lunch.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: Certainly.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY NOVEMBER 1, 1951, TO NOVEMBER 30, 1951

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to ask to revert to motions and lay on the table a summary of the orders in council passed during the period November 1 to November 30, 1951.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Robert Cauchon for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, as amended, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Noseworthy.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure members that I rise to speak on this question with great reluctance, not because I am not interested in the subject matter of the amendment but like many other members of the house I hope to spend Christmas at home and I do not wish to hold up the house. I would not have spoken at all if it were not for certain remarks made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). That is one excuse, and if another is necessary, I have spoken very little in the house during the present session. I do not suppose I should ask credit for that because I feel I should have expressed my opinions more often. In this matter I suppose I feel like most people as they approach old age, namely, that the things they regret are not the things they have done but the things they have not done. The amendment before the house reads:

> This house further regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to make provision for a national health plan, including hospitalization, medical care and health insurance.

When the hon. member for Peace River spoke he gave the impression that the effect of the amendment would be to place all health matters under the control of the national government. Surely no member of this house believes that that is the purpose of the amendment, and least of all a member as intelligent as the hon. member for Peace River. All I want to do is to show that nothing more is included in the amendment than has been included in government statements in the house and in government documents over the last ten years. I have in my hand a book printed under the authority of the Department of Trade and Commerce, dominion bureau of statistics, health and welfare division. Its title is, "Health Reference Book, 1948." I should like to read briefly from the introduction on page 9 as follows:

> Government activities directed toward improving Canadian health standards include a broad range of services carried out by dominion, provincial and municipal authorities. Within the Canadian federal system, the principal responsibility for health administration—

Note that it is not all responsibility but the principal responsibility.

> —rests with provincial governments, the actual provision of service usually being shared with local authorities. Until 1948 the provinces and municipalities also paid virtually the full cost of maintaining traditional services and developing new programs in response to public demand.

Note that new programs came into being not to satisfy the social or political philosophy of any particular group or party, but in response to public demand. Then I wish hon. members to note this important paragraph in the introduction:

> An important change in the basis of support for new services was made in May, 1948, when the government of Canada announced the introduction of a system of grants to provincial authorities for the extension and improvement of facilities and services as a preliminary step in the development—> —of a national health insurance plan.

Development of what?

Surely this amendment does not go beyond what we find in the government of Canada's health reference book of 1948. I also have before me the health reference book prepared for the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction, August, 1945. It is a very instructive document, full of statistics and information on the health of the Canadian people and health services in Canada. The paragraph I wish to read is on page 47 and has the heading, "Summary of Opinions Regarding Health Insurance". It reads as follows:

> Recommendations made to the social security committee in 1943 and 1944 are summarized in the accompanying diagram, the most striking feature of which is the almost unanimous support given to the principle of health insurance by organizations presenting briefs and evidence.

This is referring to health insurance organized by whom? A health insurance plan organized by the government of Canada. It continues:

> Only one organization was quite opposed to health insurance, and another group requested exemption of its members on religious grounds.

I remember quite well the evidence given before the committee because I was a member of the committee. I wish to say again that the proposal contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) does not go beyond what the government itself has been advocating. Whether or not they believe in it I do not know, but that is what they have been advocating, and I can only assume they do believe in it. Then I come to a perhaps more important document, the proposals of the government of Canada in August, 1945, to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction. At page 28 there is a section dealing with the national health program. This is not a provincial or municipal program; this is the national health program. The subheading is, "Scope for Improvement in Health and Health Services". It reads as follows:

> Although great progress has been made in Canada during the first half of this century, there still remains a tremendous job to be done in improving the national health and in extending the benefits of modern science and medical care to all parts of the nation and all sections of the population.

The tremendous job mentioned in this document has hardly been started, let alone completed. What the amendment moved this morning does is to regret that that has not been done. There is not the slightest ground for saying that this amendment proposes that all matters pertaining to health be under the authority of the national government. Let me read again from the same page as follows:

> There are great inequalities in the quantity and quality of health care available to different groups of Canadians, and in the costs of such public and private health services and medical and hospital facilities as are now available. These inequalities in part reflect differences in personal incomes, and in part are due to differences between rural and urban areas. Great differences between provinces arise from these same factors.

I noticed that when the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) spoke he said that the government of Alberta was providing a large range of public health services. My congratulations to the province of Alberta not only on providing those services, but on being able to provide them. Then the hon. member went on to say that the government of Alberta was doing that without taxation. Even if Social Credit philosophy was being carried out by the government of Alberta, which it is not, I am firmly convinced that they could not carry out a program of health or any other service without taxation unless they had an alternative source of revenue. Fortunately for the people of Alberta they have an alternative source of revenue at the present time in the form of oil, but every province in Canada has not oil to draw on to provide funds for social services.

My own native province, the province of Prince Edward Island, has no oil wells from which it can finance social services. The province of Manitoba has no great oil wells, nor have the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There are scarcely any of the other provinces which can finance their governmental activities through the sale of oil. I say to the hon. member for Peace River that there is a limited amount of oil under the ground in Alberta. I do not care how much oil there is, the minute the first well was tapped they began to diminish the amount of oil under the ground. Some day they will find out that they have reached the bottom and they will have to turn to some other source of revenue to finance their social and other services.

As the hon. member for Peace River has said, I believe that people should do certain things for themselves. But before people can do things for themselves they must have the ability to do them. Social services are made necessary because people have not that ability. There is perhaps only one reason why a government should engage in any of these services and that is that the people as individuals are not able to provide the services for themselves. The moment there is a large number of people who cannot provide themselves with the things that are generally available within the country, then governments will have to step in because of public need and public demands. They must do this, not necessarily because they wish, but because the needs of the people compel them to do it whether or not it is in their political and social programs.

I believe and have believed for a long time that instead of being curers of disease which they cannot cure, doctors should be teachers of health. However, as long as medical doctors, the same as any other economic group, make their living out of disease I cannot see that they are going to waste a great deal of time in promoting health.

Mr. McCusker: That is a disgraceful statement the hon. member has just made to the house and I wish he would have it struck from the records.

Mr. MacInnis: The statement is not disgraceful nor does it cast any reflection upon doctors. However, I am not going to place doctors upon a pedestal above plumbers and other people who have their economic livelihood to gain. I do not know of anything that would disturb doctors more than having all disease disappear tomorrow from the face of the earth because they would have to find some other way of making their livelihood.

Mr. McCusker: That could come only from a man in that party.

Mr. MacInnis: If people have the necessary information there are things they can do to maintain their own health. I kept away from doctors for a period of thirty-four years, as I thought, owing to my knowledge of living, but finally I found myself in the position where I had to seek a doctor's advice. In the province from which I come we have hospital services and I had the benefit of that. People have to be taught what to do before they can know how to help themselves. I should like to read one more quotation from page 28 of this document:

> It is becoming evident that the basic condition for good health in a community is the wise use of sufficient money, and that this requires a degree of organization and long-term planning in the twin fields of preventive and curative medicine greater than anything yet attempted in this country.

If that is as true today, and I am sure that it is, as it was in 1945, it is also true that it cannot be carried out by the provinces or the municipalities without assistance from the national government.

May I say again that all that this amendment does is to regret that the government has not done as much as it could have done to carry out its own proposals and recommendations made over the last six or seven years. I had one or two other points which I wished to make but in order to save time I shall conclude my remarks now.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be fitting to mention the progress made with respect to health, in the last few years, with the present system. I have here two articles taken from a great Montreal daily, Le Canada, of August 22 last. The first is entitled:

Fruitful Federal-Provincial Co-operation

The death rate resulting from tuberculosis has been reduced by half in the province of Quebec from 1941 to 1950. It is quite natural that we should rejoice at such results. Unfortunately, the present government will immediately want to claim all the credit. In truth, part of the credit for this improvement is undoubtedly due to the government, but such improvement would not have been possible, during that period, without the vigorous fight undertaken against tuberculosis by the Taschereau government under the leadership of Mr. Athanase David.

The establishment of sanitary units, the popularization of B.C.G. and other means of fighting tuberculosis in which Mr. David took the initiative, could not bring immediate results. The governments which succeeded Mr. Taschereau's, those of Messrs. Godbout and Duplessis, carried on his work in favour of health.

We disapprove of many of the actions of the Union Nationale government, of the electoral methods of that party and of the continual boasting of its leader, but we note with pleasure that, in matters of health, Ottawa and Quebec, under any government, get along beautifully for the common good.

Thus, in 1945, with the unanimous approval of the legislative assembly, the government inaugurated a five-year health program. Financial help was not lacking from the central power; on the contrary, under the heading of tuberculosis control alone, it received more than $2 million; for the construction or expansion of hospitals, and of sanatoriums for consumptives, Quebec obtained from Ottawa nearly $8 million.

Last year alone, in the province of Quebec 1,372,800 persons were X-rayed in mobile clinics, dispensaries, county health units and general hospitals. One could hardly ask for better work in tracking down the disease.

Ten years ago, in the province of Quebec, 81 persons out of every 100,000 died from tuberculosis. Last year the proportion was down to 42. That is all we wish to remember, and we rejoice over that fact.

I have another item from the same newspaper, Le Canada of Montreal, in which it is remembered that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is a benefactor of humanity. The item was published on August 24 and is entitled:

Benefits of Federal Health Grants

It is interesting to point out the notable development of mental health clinical services now taking place in Canada, mostly for children and adolescents. Nearly forty of these clinics have already been established throughout the country and others are being planned, thanks to the federal government's grants.

Another service which will prove to be of great importance is an instruction course in mental health for experienced teachers in primary and secondary schools. The men and women attending this course will qualify as instructors in mental health for the teaching staff. They will also act as liaison officers between the schools and the mental health clinic in their district. The federal minister of health will pay the teachers giving the special course. He will also award scholarships in order to allow teaching personnel to attend this course.

The mental health grant is but one of the ten grants provided by Ottawa to help provinces extend and improve their public health services. More than $31,000,000 is available each year for this purpose and the provinces are availing themselves more and more of those funds. Federal grants go to the following fields of activity: mental health, cancer control, tuberculosis control, general public health, venereal diseases, crippled children, research work concerning public health and professional training.

If all the provinces continue to benefit fully from the money placed at their disposal under the national health program, the number and the quality of health services will improve greatly throughout the country. More than 20,000 hospital beds have been added to those already existing; the fight against cancer has been launched for the first time in several provinces and developed in others; medical research and training of medical personnel have been speeded up in the last three years. Public health authorities consider this federal grants program as the most memorable event of its kind on the continent.

Mr. Speaker, I have a third article I wish to read. This is taken from the leading editorial of a great Quebec city daily L'Action Catholique, in its November 2 issue. It is signed by the editor in chief of that paper, Dr. Louis-Philippe Roy, who pays a well deserved tribute to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This followed a conference which had taken place two days previously in Quebec. Here is the article:

To Centralize is to Weaken Confederation

"To weaken the provinces by having recourse to centralization would be to weaken confederation at the same time. As regards the administration of the federal state, or, for that matter of any other state, simplicity and success are inseparable. The duty of any government is to seek the good of the people, not its own power." Then the Hon. Mr. Martin continues immediately:

"It has always been my conviction that Canadians, taken individually, should act as much as possible on their own initiative; that the family and the local community should be free to undertake those things that come under their own jurisdiction, in their own proper sphere; and that the federal government should undertake nothing that the provinces can do better than they can. The one and only purpose of federal health grants is to strengthen and support the provincial health services. Co-operation and not centralization, such is the main idea of the national health program."

The family is the best agency . . .

. . . says Dr. Roy.

This policy implies another: We must let the family do what it can do. "No welfare agency", said the Hon. Mr. Martin, "can take the place of the parents. The family is the best agency to which the care of any child should be entrusted. However, if such care is to be satisfactory, the family must have an income commensurate with its obligations".

This does not mean the Minister of National Health and Welfare underestimates the tremendous services rendered by many welfare organizations, "but", he adds, "when the fundamental needs of children are at stake, I believe that the family is best equipped to look after them, provided it has the required economic resources."

The express purpose of family allowances is to provide parents with a part of the resources they lack. Experience shows that the government was right in entrusting the allowances directly to parents, abuses being comparatively rare.

Mr. Martin's whole conference was characterized by broad-mindedness and a Christian and social spirit. It is fitting that this be noted and that the minister be congratulated. Let us hope that the excellent principles he mentioned will be applied by all his colleagues in the federal government.

It is a remarkable article. It is a fine tribute, one that was well deserved by the minister.

(Text):

Now, Mr. Speaker, that I have finished reading some French quotations, I want to say a few words about this amendment.

In the first place I want to remind the house of what has been done in this country in the way of social improvements. Those who lived twenty-five years ago never thought that family allowances would be paid in respect of children up to 16 years of age. It was impossible to think of that social service; it did not exist. Then, twenty-five years ago, who thought that the old people over 70 years of age would have $40 a month and that all those in need between the age of 65 and 70 would be entitled to $40 a month?

I remember that in my early career as a practising lawyer in my district—not only in my comté but in my district—I knew of only two old people who had to prosecute their children for non-support. All the others were supported by their children in accordance with the natural law and the civil code. All the children looked after their parents when they were getting old and when they were in need. After a time pensions were awarded and now everybody wants to have one. In fact, everybody who is over 70 receives a reward for being three score and ten years of age. It is a second blessing.

That is not all. The blind receive a pension from the age of 21 on. All those pensions are paid in the domicile of those who receive them. Besides that there is the workmen's compensation act in virtue of which those who suffer accidents at their work receive compensation. Then there is unemployment insurance that gives to those who have lost their jobs some compensation until such time as they can get new ones. Not only that, but grants have been paid by the provinces and by the dominion government for the enlargement of hospitals, for clinics and for all sorts of things.

The constitution must be taken into consideration. Some people may think that it is obsolete, but so long as it is in force and is the law of the land, we must abide by it. In virtue of the constitution, all matters pertaining to public health come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) so well said a short time ago in Quebec city, and on many other occasions. I want to make myself understood. The dominion government does not make any grants to private individuals. The minister and the department respect the constitution, and they make grants to the provincial governments who, in turn, look after the private individuals.

I must congratulate two gentlemen of Quebec city who are benefactors of mankind. I know this to be so. One of them is Dr. Jean Gregoire, a famous doctor for whom my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare has personal admiration.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: He agrees with that statement. The other is Dr. J. C. Beaudet who was in charge of the health unit in my county for some years before becoming assistant to Dr. Gregoire. These gentlemen helped the people who have to go to hospital by paying part of their hospital expenses, and without any political consideration. How many times did I write to them sending the hospital bills of one of my électeurs in my comté who was unable to pay, owing to various unfortunate circumstances. Then the department came along and assumed all the hospitalization costs. It was a great help. There is in existence the public assistance act. If the case is recommended by the municipality, the department pays everything. There are in existence today a great many social services that did not exist twenty-five years ago, owing to the excellent co-operation that exists between this government and the provincial government in my province. I presume the same situation exists with respect to the province of Ontario.

As to Ontario, extravagant statements were made by Walter Thomson during the last provincial election campaign. He was going to bring in a new Beveridge plan, and he was going to look after all the sick and those who were not sick. He was like the famous Chinese doctor who was going to keep the people in good health. Where did he go with that program? He failed lamentably. It should have been food for thought for my hon. friends of the C.C.F. who moved that amendment. If they think of that episode, they must realize that following the footsteps of Walter Thomson is not the way to success.

It is a matter of opinion, of course, but when I read his speeches I thought that they were extravagant ones and that he was speaking through his hat. Apparently the majority of the people of the province of Ontario thought likewise. Just because a man calls himself a Liberal, I am not bound to support him. If I had been in the province of Ontario I would have said, as did my leader, that my domicile is in the province of Quebec; and I would not have voted. But I can express my views about what has been said on a question of public importance.

I do not intend to speak at great length about the matter but there is one case that is deserving of sympathy. It is the case of the invalids. Human miseries are always a sad thing to behold, and our sympathies are aroused when we think of those who have been afflicted by invalidity or infirmity; and sometimes they are poor and need assistance. This motion is for hospitalization and medical care through health insurance. So long as hospitalization is offered and medical care is given there is no need for health insurance. Many invalids that I know are able to earn their own living. They do not ask for a pension. The others who are in more unfortunate circumstances and who have not sufficient means are always cared for when they are willing to go to the hospital.

The problem in my province is not that they are not looked after; it is that they want attention at home instead of going to the hospital. That is the great problem. I understand, as I have already said, when a mother looks after her children who are disabled, who are invalids, she gives them better care, I am sure, or kinder care, than anyone could do. She expects some compensation for the attention that she gives to her children and which is most meritorious. Health insurance will do nothing for them because they are unwilling to go to the hospital for any treatment. They want to stay home. Often I have recommended these people to Dr. Grégoire and Dr. Beaudet of the Quebec department of health for their hospitalization, and they flatly refused such recommendations. They said: "We do not want to go to the hospital. We want to stay home."

Finally, sir, there is one reason in particular why I am strongly opposed to the health insurance scheme. I want to tell my friend, the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker), that I have respect and admiration for him, and I know that he is one of the leading members of the learned faculty; but during the war when I looked after the cases of disabled soldiers and I saw the way they were dealt with by the army doctors it revolted me. I do not want any army doctor to look after my family and myself; I want to choose my own doctor.

Mr. MacInnis: You had better be careful.

Mr. Pouliot: Because of the civil service preference, doctors who have been overseas on Cook's tours that lasted a few days have a preference even if they received the lowest required number of marks at the examination. That is one objection I have to the health insurance scheme. I have spoken long enough and I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I simply rise for the purpose of explaining why I propose to vote against the amendment. I do so in the hope that, with the oversimplification that sometimes occurs, I will not see the statement made that in doing so we have voted against any national health plan. That is not before us. We have indicated our position very clearly in regard to adequate plans for maintaining and preserving the health of our people and offering to the people of Canada the very highest level of hospital and other facilities. I think that the position of our party was very clearly and very briefly stated on March 4, 1949, when, in discussing this very subject, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) had this to say. I am quoting from page 1154 of Hansard of Friday, March 4, 1949:

> This party has long realized the necessity for a plan of health in the Dominion of Canada. Let there be no doubt where this party stands on that now. We stand in favour of a plan which, in co-operation with the provinces, will give the people the maximum of services, and yet be a plan of freedom, where the doctors will not be civil servants, and which will allow free choice between doctor and patient. We have got a full realization of the deficiencies in treatment services in Canada and in our preventive services, and we stand ready to implement a plan to overcome these deficiencies, and which will raise health standards in Canada to the equal of that in any other country of the world.

Without amplifying that statement, or seeking to go into further detail, I simply wish to say that this does represent a compact statement of the position of our party in regard to measures of this nature. We want to see provisions by which the health of our people will be advanced in every way that it is within the power of the government to assist. We want to see the opportunity afforded to every Canadian to have appropriate hospital service and to have the very highest level of medical treatment, no matter what their conditions in life may be. However, I would point out the statement on that occasion contained words which should not be forgotten in a discussion of this subject, namely, "in co-operation with the provinces." We must not forget that under our federal constitution health and civil hospitalization are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments. It is not competent for the dominion government, or for the parliament of Canada, to deal with over-all plans of this kind, or to introduce measures which would put into effect even the most admirable program, unless that had been done in consultation with and in agreement with the provincial governments, and ultimately the legislatures of the provinces.

The amendment now before us amounts to a vote of want of confidence on the ground that the government has failed to make provision for a national health plan. That does not mean that it has taken the proper steps to advance a measure of this nature; it suggests that steps should have been taken in the present speech from the throne to provide a national health plan. No matter what any one of us in this house may think of the government's failure to advance further than it has in consultation with the provinces, the fact is that this subject has not reached a point where it would be possible to present a plan to this house because the provinces have not yet had an opportunity formally to approve of any plan. Nothing would be more unlikely to prevent the implementation of an effective plan than to proceed in a manner which might be regarded by the provinces as an arbitrary attempt to place on record an established plan and then simply ask for their approval or rejection.

Having said that, I wish to indicate my own belief that this is a subject which should be explored as expeditiously as possible. It is necessary to carry on extensive surveys and inquiries to find out what the best methods are that could be employed in this country of ours. One aspect of this problem alone which has not been adequately explored in relation to any plans of this kind is the disparity between the financial strength of one provincial legislature and another. As has already been pointed out, some provinces have available to them great natural resources from which they derive revenue to an extent that makes it possible for them to undertake programs which other provinces might not be able to undertake, no matter how much they might desire to follow precisely the same course. Any plan introduced which can properly be described as a national plan must be one which recognizes that difference, and which assures throughout the whole of Canada an equal measure of opportunity, or as nearly an equal measure as is practicable, so that every Canadian may have his or her health protected and preserved.

I suggest the discussion that has followed the moving of this amendment may well be borne in mind by the government; because I think it is quite apparent that throughout the house there is no substantial difference in the attitude of hon. members as to the desirability of taking measures which will improve the general health standard of our people, and equalize opportunity for all Canadians, no matter where they may live or what their financial position may be.

With that in mind I propose to terminate these remarks by repeating the statement placed upon record on behalf of our party by the hon. member for Lanark, and emphasizing our hope that in full and harmonious co-operation with the provinces we will be able to introduce in this country the very highest level of health measures existing anywhere in the world.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take not more than five minutes of the time of the house to bring to the government's attention something which I believe is a matter of very great national importance. I refer to the alarming state of unpreparedness in our civil defence program.

I feel sure all hon. members were deeply impressed when they read about the program which the city of New York has worked out, and which was put to the actual test a short time ago. The people of New York have faced a very real threat in a very practical way. And what the people of New York have done, we here in Canada can also do if we are given real leadership by the government.

While visiting the city of Edmonton this summer, I learned of the great apprehension felt by the people of that city regarding the possibility of air attack. They feel particularly vulnerable to air attacks from Russia, because during the last war on many occasions they actually saw Russian pilots walking their streets. They know how easy it is to fly from Russia to Edmonton, and back again. They are greatly worried indeed because nothing of a practical nature has been done to protect their great oil centre and air terminal from the possibility of air attack.

The people of Toronto and Montreal are similarly apprehensive. They are worried because nothing of a practical nature has been done to protect those vital centres of production. I feel sure that people in similarly vulnerable centres share the same apprehension. I feel it is essential that every effort be made to maintain our productive capacity. We are obliged to do this if we are to carry out the commitments to NATO we have undertaken, because that whole program is so dependent upon the productive capacity of this country.

It is not enough for the federal government merely to contribute to the cost of civil defence. The federal government must give leadership in the building up of our civil defences. It is true that the co-operation of the provinces and municipalities is not only necessary but essential. However, the primary responsibility for the defence of the civilian population of this country rests squarely upon the shoulders of the federal government.

To the extent that our government assures a satisfactory civil defence program can we be assured of an uninterrupted continuation of our productive capacity, upon which our preparedness program depends. I call upon the government to give this country a civil defence program of which we can be truly proud—instead of feeling ashamed, as I for one, and many other people, feel today.

What this country wants is leadership and a practical plan. What we are getting are bland assurances that everything is all right, coupled with a shocking state of unpreparedness.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand we are now on the main motion as amended. I should like to protest against this method of parliamentary procedure in view of the fact that no answer or statement has been forthcoming from the government side in reply to the able presentation made the other day by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). It will not take me long to place my views before the house.

Unless a protest is voiced against matters such as this, in the future they may be looked back upon as being precedents and carry considerable weight. I do not wish that to happen. My confidence in the strength of our institutions leads me to believe that this parliament will be in existence for many years and some time in the future a similar incident may arise. I should like to put on the record the short form of the address to His Excellency in order that the record might be quite clear. Omitting the preamble, the short form reads as follows:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

That form of address has been in use in this country since 1903 without any change. In fact there has been no addition to the address presented to His Excellency in the 85 years of the existence of this country except in 1899, to which incident I shall refer in a minute or two. The practice in Great Britain has been to move a short address similar to the one which I have quoted, and this practice has been followed ever since 1891, except on occasions when the government of the day resigned.

To those who may say that there is no particular importance to be attached to that, I reply that this strikes at the root of our parliamentary rules and procedure. If we are to consider that this particular established custom is of no concern then we will be led to say that other established customs similarly are of no concern and the book of rules and established parliamentary procedure may be considerably disturbed. I have no objection to changes in the rules and parliamentary procedure when they are founded upon reason and are fully debated, but this procedure is being rushed through at this time without full consideration.

As I understand it, parliamentary rules and procedure exist for the protection of the rights of minorities. One can look forward to the rights of future minorities being in danger. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre, if the practice now to be incorporated into our procedure is adopted in future years we will have motions of non-confidence in the government being moved by the opposition and straightway being amended and altered by the government side so that they will be ineffective and no clear vote be taken on the subject at issue. Consequently I think we should use great care when deviating from established rules and procedure.

In connection with the altering of rules and procedure I would suggest that we should consider at an early time reviewing the nature of the debate on the speech from the throne as it has developed over the last ten years. My own investigation indicates that this debate has altered materially during the last ten years. We have now reached the stage where we have established a record in this session of having six amendments or subamendments to the speech from the throne. That is just another record for this rather peculiar session.

I think there should be some revision of our method of procedure with respect to the speech from the throne. This is necessary in view of the criticism inside and out of the house of the length of time taken in debates here. I would refer those who are interested to Beauchesne's third edition, page 96, paragraph 226, where the subject of the address in reply to the speech from the throne is considered. On that page will be found a short quotation from a speech made by the Hon. Mr. McKenzie, as follows:

> It has been thought desirable in our parliamentary practice that it is better to postpone debates upon specific subjects of discussion in the house until those matters are brought forward before us by a bill or resolution.

Speaking on the address in 1879 Sir John Macdonald said:

> I am glad the opposition have adopted the English modern system—a very proper one—of passing the address without amendment, and when all the various subjects alluded to in it are dealt with, when the measures proposed are before the house, they and their details can be criticized with a full knowledge and satisfactory explanation with regard to the policy of the government.

I suggest that there is a field for investigation with regard to the procedure followed in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne.

I should like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, about the precedent of 1899 which has brought us to this impasse. Unfortunately no one in the House of Commons objected to the form of that amendment during the debate. It was a lengthy debate, covering twenty days. The subject was controversial and followed the discovery of gold in the Yukon and consequent charges of maladministration there. No one objected to the type of amendment that was presented on that occasion, and consequently we are confronted with a situation where we feel that a somewhat similar plan could be adopted here. I point out, as was pointed out by the member from Lake Centre, that a different method of dealing with the address was followed in those days. The address in reply to the speech from the throne followed almost word for word the speech from the throne itself. It was divided into paragraphs which were numbered, and there was a debate on each paragraph.

The amendment of 1899 was attached as paragraph No. 10. There had been nine paragraphs written into the resolution, and this was attached as paragraph No. 10. To cite another example, in 1902 Mr. Bourassa moved an amendment to paragraph No. 5, but subsequently withdrew that amendment so it did not establish any precedent. However, that was the method of conducting the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in those days, that is up until 1902. Since 1903 we have had this short form of address, and there has been no means of moving amendments to particular items in the speech from the throne. Consequently, general amendments expressing want of confidence have been moved. Those, of course, have been considerable in number.

Now, how can the house extricate itself from this position? The only example that I have been able to find or that has been drawn to my attention is a procedure that was followed in England in 1894, to which reference has been made in this house. This is what happened on that occasion. There was a Liberal government in the house with the Conservatives as the official opposition, Liberal unionists, Irish nationalists and some independents. It was a rather mixed group, and the amendment on that occasion was moved by Mr. Labouchere. I am not sure of his position in the house, but I believe he was an independent. The government supporters in the house favoured the subject matter of the amendment, so it was passed and attached to the short address. In 1894 the short address read as follows:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in parliament assembled, beg leave to thank Your Majesty for the most gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both houses of parliament.

To that short address was attached an amendment concerning the restriction of the power of the House of Lords. The government felt that it could not present that amendment to His Majesty, and could find no precedent for an address that had been amended without the resignation of the government. The government was not resigning, so at the particular stage which we have now reached, the government of the day, assisted by His Majesty's loyal opposition, voted down the main motion as amended and Sir William Harcourt immediately introduced the following short form of address:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of the United Kingdom and Ireland in parliament assembled, humbly assure Your Majesty that the measures recommended to our consideration shall receive our most careful attention and we beg leave to thank Your Majesty for the most gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both houses of parliament.

That short form of resolution was then passed. I suggest that on this occasion, perhaps through an error in procedure—I am not referring to the Speaker's ruling but an error in procedure in the house—we have reached the stage where the address has been amended. Surely, the only way to extricate ourselves is to do the same thing as was done in England in 1894. The house should vote down the main motion as amended, and the government should introduce a new address in short form with just a minor alteration. This could be passed, and then we would be in keeping with the established tradition of the House of Commons.

Alternatively, if that course does not meet with favour, we should have a statement recorded on Hansard that this is not to be considered as a precedent, so that future parliaments will not look to this occasion as a guide. In this way, sir, I submit that no stifling precedent will be established which will interfere with the privileges and rights of the house. We shall maintain the long-established form of presenting an address to His Excellency, and the prestige of the House of Commons, which is at stake, will be maintained in high favour. We must recognize the fact that the House of Commons comes in for criticism from people on the outside, and we may be made to look ridiculous on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Drew: I should like to call a vote on it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Will five members rise?

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Mr. Fulton: He will probably send it back and ask for an explanation.

Mr. Graydon: He will regard it as a Christmas message.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to say a few words on this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think the motion is debatable.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a procedural motion. It is not set forth in the standing orders as a motion that is debatable. If an hon. member can show me to the contrary I shall be glad to see it.

Mr. Graydon: This is not an ordinary message, Your Honour.

Mr. Knowles: If you will give us time we shall find it.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will indicate to the hon. member what it is. It is standing order 38.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Cleaver: While the hon. member is looking up the citation may I refer to the fact that I was paired.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: Order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Halton merely wishes to mention the fact that he was paired with another hon. member.

Mr. Cleaver: I was paired with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Huffman: I was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask you to note paragraph (m) of standing order 38. When we read standing order 38 with paragraph (m) and the necessary preliminary words we get:

The following motions are debatable:
Every motion
(m) and such other motions as may be required for the observance of the proprieties of the house, the maintenance of its authority, the appointment or conduct of its officers, the management of its business, the arrangements of its proceedings, the correctness of its records, the fixing of its sitting days or the times of its meeting or adjournment.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this motion has to do with the proprieties of the house. I suggest it is unthinkable that it should not be in order to say a few words about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure this motion does not come within paragraph (m) of standing order 38. I doubt whether it would be appropriate to debate a motion which reads as follows:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

The address has been passed, and this is a procedural motion which has always been made. I cannot allow debate on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt it?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling, but may I point out—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that if Your Honour based it on section (2) of standing order 38 it could be decided by this house on a vote. I propose to ask that the house vote upon this motion.

Mr. Speaker: I have not ruled on that question. The ruling I am making is that the motion which has been made by the Prime Minister is not now debatable. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And some members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Fulton: I was paired with the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion to send this improper address to His Excellency.

Mr. Cleaver: I was paired with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. McCubbin: I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). Had I voted I would have voted in favour of the motion.

Mr. Huffman: I was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I beg to submit the motions required by standing order 57 for the setting up of the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means. I move:

That this house will at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

I also move:

That this house will at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. Drew: May we have some explanation as to why these motions are necessary?

Mr. St. Laurent: Because standing order 57 requires them.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the rules require a number of procedures in an orderly and sensibly conducted session, but in this particular session, where there has been no budget and nothing calling for these motions, I think members should be told why they are necessary, no matter what may be contemplated in the case of a regular session.

Mr. Speaker: I might remind the house that these motions are not debatable. There are two motions. One is to set up the committee to consider the supply to be granted to His Majesty and the other is respecting ways and means. Will the house receive both motions at the same time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: I am not debating these motions, but I should like to have some indication as to what supply is being called for.

An hon. Member: Read the rules.

Mr. St. Laurent: Standing order 57 reads:

The house shall appoint the committees of supply and ways and means, at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

"At the commencement of every session" means just as soon as the various motions, amendments, subamendments and votes can be disposed of, and this time there have been a great many. Under the standing order these motions could not be moved until the address had been adopted, and the rule requires that it be done as soon as the address is adopted. I am submitting them at the time required by the standing order. The house knows that it is not the intention of the government to submit a budget at this session, and there may be no occasion for anything to be dealt with by the committees; nevertheless they are required to be set up by the rule.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Drew: I simply repeat that I am not debating the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —but while the rules may call for a certain procedure, that procedure must have some relation to reality. The rule that has been read relates to the procedure having to do with the introduction of a budget. I submit if there is to be no budget these motions have no meaning.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motions?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Mr. St. Laurent: Does the hon. member want a recorded division again?

Motions agreed to on division.

PRIVATE BILLS

SENATE BILLS—FIRST AND SECOND READINGS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate have passed the following bills to which concurrence of this house is desired: Bill No. 37, letter C of the Senate, intituled an act respecting the general synod of the Church of England in Canada; Bill No. 38, letter D of the Senate, intituled an act respecting the general synod of the Church of England in Canada and the missionary society of the Church of England in Canada; Bill No. 39, letter E of the Senate, intituled an act to incorporate the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren of Canada; Bill No. 40, letter F of the Senate, intituled an act to incorporate the Sisters of Charity of the House of Providence.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this may be a less controversial subject. It has to do with a matter that was dealt with by unanimous consent the other day. If I have the unanimous consent of the house now to revert to motions I would move:

That the private bills received from the Senate this day be now read a first and second time and be referred forthwith to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills; that standing order 105 respecting the posting of private bills be suspended in relation thereto; and that the said committee be empowered to sit while the house is sitting.

Motion agreed to, bills read the first and second times and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY—DEEP WATERWAY BETWEEN MONTREAL AND LAKE ERIE

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 11, consideration in committee of Bill

No. 33, to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 15—Tariffs of tolls.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us whether the board of transport commissioners has jurisdiction over any other tolls on canals, or tolls of a similar nature?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I speak of course from memory, but I believe that some time ago the Transport Act was amended in order to give the board of transport commissioners jurisdiction over tolls on the Mackenzie river.

Mr. Green: Then the only ship tolls over which it has any jurisdiction at the present time are the tolls on the Mackenzie river?

Mr. Chevrier: They also have certain jurisdiction under part II of the Transport Act.

Mr. Green: I ask that because this would seem to be breaking new ground for the board. They will have to consider a new type of rate in connection with these tolls. I wonder whether this is the beginning of a policy of turning the control of shipping over to the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think this is breaking new ground in so far as the board of transport commissioners is concerned. My colleague draws my attention to the fact that the board does not fix these tolls. The authority will fix them and file them, but they are subject to the jurisdiction of the board under section 52.

Mr. Green: These tolls are to be adjudicated upon in much the same way as freight rates, are they not?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: If anyone complains that the tolls are unfair, that complaint is presented to the board of transport commissioners which could rule against the tolls, in which event the St. Lawrence authority would have to change them. Will that be the position?

Mr. Chevrier: Not quite. After deciding whether or not rates as fixed by the authority are unjustly discriminatory, the board of transport commissioners would then report to the authority.

Mr. Green: If the finding of the board is to be merely a recommendation and not an order, are we not putting the board of transport commissioners in a position which is not very sound?

Mr. Chevrier: I think not. The tolls have to be fixed with reference to the capitalization of this scheme. If the board of transport commissioners perchance were to recommend that tolls be lowered to an extent that would make it impossible to amortize the scheme, pay the interest and operating charges, then the authority might well not accept that recommendation. There is still the provision of section 52 for appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Brooks: I want to ask a question with reference to what was said the other day in answer to a question by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra about cabotage. I understood the minister to say that United States ships would not be allowed to pick up trade in a Canadian port for delivery to another Canadian port. My attention has been drawn to the fact that ships operated by the Chicago Tribune, which is owned by Colonel McCormick, are carrying pulpwood or pulp products from the lower St. Lawrence port of Baie Comeau to Thorold in Ontario.

Mr. Chevrier: My information is that those ships are under Canadian registry.

Mr. Brooks: My informant told me these ships carry the United States flag.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to look into that because it would be contrary to the rules of cabotage.

Mr. Howe: I think I am correct when I say that all the ships owned by the McCormick interests are registered in Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Tolls to be fair and reasonable.

Mr. Adamson: Would it be possible under this clause to have a differential in the tolls charged a ship plying between two Canadian ports under Canadian registry and a ship under foreign registry?

Mr. Chevrier: No, that would not be so under this section.

Mr. Adamson: I bring that up because that was one of the extremely contentious issues when the Panama canal was constructed. The United States, which built the canal, for many years had a differential in favour of United States ships because it was contended that ships moving between the east and west coasts were intercoastal ships and therefore should not have to pay tolls. I was wondering if a ship plying from a lower St. Lawrence port to a port on the upper lakes would pay exactly the same toll as a ship of foreign registry coming in from some other continent and carrying goods to an upper lakes port.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right; otherwise the toll would not be fair and reasonable.

Mr. Green: This section provides for the setting of tolls which will be high enough to pay the interest on amounts borrowed by the authority, to amortize the principal of amounts so borrowed over a period not exceeding fifty years, and to pay the cost of operating and maintaining the canals and works under the administration of the authority, including all operating costs of the authority and such reserves as may be approved by the minister. Of course this brings up an important point because it involves the whole financing of the seaway. Yesterday the Minister of Defence Production said this corporation was being set up with powers similar to those of the national harbours board.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend asked if there was a parallel in any other corporation and I said the parallel would be the national harbours board; but I was referring only to the form of the corporation.

Mr. Green: That is sufficient for my submission. There does not seem to be a provision anywhere for a report to parliament; parliament is left entirely out of the picture. Secondly, there is no provision in the bill for calling for tenders for work to be done. Both these provisions are contained in the National Harbours Board Act, chapter 42 of the statutes of 1936. As the minister knows, section 32 of that act reads:

> The board shall, as soon as possible but within three months after the termination of each calendar year, submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament.

Section 12 of the same act provides for the calling of tenders, and I should like to quote subsection 1 which reads:

> (1) Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of the board, the board shall call tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases
> (a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest; or
> (b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously or economically executed by the officers and servants of the board or of His Majesty; or
> (c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than ten thousand dollars.

That is the provision for the calling of tenders in the case of the national harbours board. I suggest to the minister that some similar provisions should be written into this bill covering, first of all, a report to parliament and, secondly, the calling of tenders. Here we have an authority being set up which will spend an amount of money perhaps equal to the amount spent on all the national harbours of Canada. I have not had time to check the amount of money expended on the national harbours, but I would doubt that it is as large as the amount involved in the St. Lawrence seaway. I think it is a very sound principle that this authority, which is to have such vast powers and is to control such a big project, should report annually to parliament. We must not get these bodies away from the control of parliament.

In this bill there is not even provision for a report to the minister. In the case of the national harbours board, I know it is helpful to get that report each year. I submit that parliament certainly is entitled to get a report from this authority in some way, and I hope the government will agree to an amending section providing for such report.

I would point out to the minister also that this bill contains no provision for the publication of regulations passed by this authority. The national harbours board has to do that, and I see no reason why there should not be some provision in this seaway bill for the publication in the Canada Gazette of the regulations which are passed by the authority.

With regard to the provision making it necessary to call for tenders, we have been getting farther and farther away from that good old-fashioned practice. Time and time again exceptions are made. Here is an authority which is to spend a great deal of our money, and I feel there should be a provision set out in the bill forcing the authority to call for tenders with, of course, whatever exceptions are reasonable. Such a provision seems to have been completely overlooked in this bill, and I believe that is a great mistake. If there is to be no such provision then it will be hard to justify insisting upon calling for tenders for many other types of work, and in my opinion this is a departure from a good practice.

Mr. Chevrier: On the last point raised by the hon. member, namely the reference to a report to parliament, if he looks at section 25 which has to do with the guarantee of loans he will see that when a loan or guarantee is made under that section, parliament must authorize it. There will be, therefore, an opportunity for discussion. Again with reference to the point he raised, the hon. member is not without knowledge that the financial administration measure, which is in the committee on public accounts, provides for an annual report being made to parliament by all crown companies. It is not necessary, therefore, to put a provision in this bill. The object of the financial administration bill is to consolidate the financial aspects of all crown companies so they would have to make annual reports to parliament, and so there could be a greater check on their finances by the department concerned. I believe that meets the point.

Mr. Green: That might be good enough in the case of the ordinary crown company, but here we have one set up by statute, and it is probably the most important crown company under dominion authority. What this financial bill will contain by the time it passes the house is open to question. It is still in the public accounts committee, and may very well not pass the house at this session. I believe a provision should be written into this bill that a report will be presented annually to parliament. There are not very many of these companies which do report annually.

Mr. Howe: Every one of them reports annually.

Mr. Green: To parliament?

Mr. Howe: Certainly.

Mr. Green: The national harbours board reports, I know, because I am interested in the Vancouver harbour. There is a report every year, and I find it helpful. I see no reason why there should not be a similar provision in this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no intention that this company will not report to parliament, and I hope the hon. member will not think there is. The point I am making is that there is provision already for all crown companies to report to parliament, under the financial administration bill. For that reason I do not think it is necessary to have a duplication. However, I am not saying that I am going to oppose it. I think it is redundant.

Mr. Green: It is not a redundancy yet, because the other bill has not been passed, and it might not be passed at this session.

Mr. Chevrier: The other point the hon. member raised concerns tenders. The reason a section concerning tenders was not put in the bill is that it may be necessary to do a great deal of the work with our own equipment. It might not be possible to get tenders for some of the work. As a matter of fact there is a section in the Ontario agreement which provides that under certain conditions the federal government can perform the work itself. It is for this reason that the tender clause was not put in.

Mr. Green: That exception is covered in the National Harbours Board Act. In section 12, subsection 1, paragraph (b) we read:

> in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously or economically executed by the officers and servants of the board or His Majesty.

That exception is made, as the minister has said.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the minister should object to introducing this amended section. In the first place, this is not a crown corporation in the ordinary sense of that term. Crown corporations are corporations of the type which usually contemplate the development of a particular enterprise with limited scope, important though it may be. This is a great national venture, and is comparable in many ways with the development and operation of publicly-owned power and other projects of that kind. Certainly there should be a provision for the calling of tenders. There could be the same reservation as there is in the National Harbours Board Act, and as is contained in other acts concerning the use of government equipment under the Department of Public Works where that becomes desirable. I do not believe we should be called upon to rely on a general provision calling for an annual statement, because this is an extremely important operation. In similar operations on the dominion or provincial level I believe there is a specific section calling for the delivery of an annual report to the legislative body from which the power of these organizations emanates. I would ask the minister to agree to have sections covering this point introduced and that the act stand, after having dealt with the other sections.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish I could accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, but I do not think it applies here with the same force as it does with regard to other crown companies, for the reason I mentioned earlier. I do not think any harm is going to be done if a reference to a report is not made in this act, because it is covered in the other act. In any event, because of the votes that will have to be dealt with at other sessions, there will be full opportunity for discussion of the seaway activities.

Mr. Howe: If I may, I should like to raise another point. It must be kept in mind that this act is intended to apply even though we become partners with a United States authority in carrying it out. The purpose is to leave it as flexible as possible so it can apply either as a partner or not. I do not think we should tie ourselves up to regulations which may not be parallel with those of the United States. It stands to reason that the men who operate this authority under the minister would use all reasonable precautions in protecting public funds. In that connection I might point out that the authority will finance itself. The borrowing is only temporary. It is intended that the authority will issue public bonds guaranteed by the government, and that it will be self-supporting. I think it is purely the point of view of having a flexible arrangement that would cause us to object particularly to public tender; I think if we are bound to public tender and the authority in the United States is not, difficulties may arise.

Mr. Green: With regard to the report I would point out to the minister that in the schedule of this other bill there is a list of crown corporations, and it does not include any reference at all, of course, to this one. They are all listed here in schedule C: Canadian Arsenals Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation Limited, Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, Defence Construction (1951) Limited, and so on.

Mr. Chevrier: It would not be listed there because it was not in existence. But my understanding is that in the earlier part of the bill there is a clause which provides for crown companies—

Mr. Green: Yes, that is true.

Mr. Chevrier: —making an annual report. I think it covers the point. The point raised by my colleague is, I think, a good one, namely that if we were to tie ourselves down to something which was not necessary in the United States we might be embarrassing ourselves.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I try to be a bit helpful on the point. Section 76 of the financial administration bill is in three subsections. Subsection 1 states that the crown agencies or crown corporations are those listed in the schedule to the act as it now stands. We can skip subsection 2. Subsection 3 of section 76 says that the governor in council may by order add to these various schedules the names of any other bodies that should be there. I think the minister could satisfy me on the point, and perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the leader of the opposition as well, if he could tell us that it is the intention of the governor in council, once both these bills are in effect, to add the St. Lawrence seaway authority to the appropriate schedule of the financial administration bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can give that undertaking.

Mr. Green: You would have to amend the other bill.

Mr. Knowles: No, it would not be necessary to amend the other bill. The power is there to add to the schedule by order in council any other crown agency or crown corporation. That was the reason I asked the minister for the undertaking which he has now given.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Green: We are not keen on orders in council. I think the better way to handle the matter—if the other bill goes through after this one—would be to amend the financial administration bill by naming the St. Lawrence seaway authority in a schedule.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection to that procedure, and I am sure that the Minister of Finance will not have any.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 and 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Regulations.

Mr. Green: What about publication of these regulations in the Gazette?

Mr. Chevrier: These are regulations of the same nature as our canal regulations. As set out here, they have to do with the control of works and property under the jurisdiction of the authority, the regulation of vessels and the like. They will not be different from those regulations. I understand that they are not published but that they are tabled here from time to time. When there are any amendments, the minister tables them from time to time in the house.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Authority to comply with directions of the governor in council.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this section?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This is in case it may be necessary to enter into an arrangement with the United States authorities in conformity with the 1941 agreement or some modification thereof; then the authority will comply with the directions of the governor in council in so far as the making of arrangements for the construction of the seaway with the United States is concerned.

Section agreed to.

Section 21 agreed to.

On section 22—Non-application of R.S., c. 140.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary to put in this provision that the Navigable Waters Protection Act shall not apply to works undertaken by the authority? Can the necessary exceptions not be made from time to time as the authority does the work?

Mr. Chevrier: I suppose it could be; but it would make for greater clarity and ease of operation if this section is approved, the reason being that when works are performed in navigable waters an application must be made to the Minister of Public Works for his approval and in some cases it is a fairly lengthy application. In a case such as this, where tremendously large works would be involved, a great deal of processing would have to be done by way of application to the minister. Since the international joint commission is the body that will be disposing of this project through its various divisions, there will then be ample protection from the Navigable Waters Protection Act and for that reason it is being excepted.

Mr. Green: Would this section not apply to the waters after the work has been completed? In other words, will the result of the passing of a section of this kind not be that the Navigable Waters Protection Act will not apply to any of the navigable waters in the seaway?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no.

Mr. Howe: No. Just the works undertaken by the authority.

Mr. Chevrier: This is with respect to works undertaken by the authority pursuant to this act. After the work is done, the Navigable Waters Protection Act still applies to the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. Green: Should that fact not be made clear? The minister intends it to apply only to the construction of works undertaken by the authority. But the way it reads it could be made to apply to the completed works. I think it is just a matter of English.

Mr. Howe: The Navigable Waters Protection Act applies only to structures. It does not apply to the operation of any works. In other words, if a structure is approved under the Navigable Waters Protection Act before it is built, that structure has complied with the act for all time.

Mr. Green: Suppose someone wants to build a wharf or a pier on the seaway. Would the Navigable Waters Protection Act come into the picture?

Mr. Chevrier: He could not build a wharf on the seaway. He could build a wharf off the seaway and the Navigable Waters Protection Act would apply, but no works could be built within the seaway itself, or on the banks of the seaway.

Mr. Green: The seaway is not all to be a canal. Part of it would be in the shape of lakes, would it not?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: If a person wanted to build a pier on the lake shore would the Navigable Waters Protection Act not apply?

Mr. Howe: It would apply.

Mr. Chevrier: I would think it would.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will permit me, this clause says:

> The Navigable Waters Protection Act does not apply to works undertaken by the authority pursuant to this act.

In other words, if the authority undertook works it would have to comply with the rulings of the international waterways commission; it would not have to comply with the Department of Public Works administration of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. One government authority is transferring a limited responsibility to another government authority.

Section agreed to.

Sections 23 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—Coming into force.

Mr. Adamson: This is the last clause, and it deals with commencement. I want to put this question to the minister for clarification. Whether or not we got any co-operation from any part of the United States government we could, and it is our intention to, proceed with this work?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I am afraid that is going pretty far. In the first place, this section indicates when the act shall come into force, and I do not think it would be the intention of the government to proclaim it until such time as the province of Ontario had passed a similar act covering the following bill.

Mr. Adamson: You can take that for granted.

Mr. Chevrier: While we can build a canal on our side, we certainly need some co-operation from the United States government in so far as the processing of the application by the province of Ontario, and the complementary authority on the other side of the line, to the international joint commission; and the government of Canada undertakes to do all in its power to hurry and press the thing along, as is indicated in the bill that will follow. Therefore I do not think we can go quite as far as my hon. friend did. I think that puts the position as it is.

Mr. Adamson: The bill that is to follow, which rather complicates the matter, does require compliance with the United States designated authority which, in these circumstances, is the power authority of the state of New York; but if that is not granted we could, as I understand it, proceed with the seaway alone and neglect the power?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, we could.

Mr. Adamson: Economically suicidal as it would be—

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: —from the power point of view, that still could be done, and if continued opposition were met by this government they would be prepared to proceed with that?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I think, as my hon. friend says, undesirable as it would be to proceed with one without the other, this bill gives us the authority to proceed with the other, namely the navigational works.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER DEVELOPMENT

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND ONTARIO GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, respecting construction of works for the generation of electrical power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I was just going to say that this is the bill concerning the development of power in the international rapids section of the river. I do not propose to make a lengthy statement for the reason that both resolutions were considered together, and to a large extent I think both bills are being considered together. All this does is implement an agreement made between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario. There are only four clauses in it, the first having to do with the approval by this parliament of the agreement; the next giving power to the province of Ontario to transfer certain lands, and likewise to Canada; the third gives certain powers to the hydro-electric power commission, and gives to the Power Commission Act of Ontario the same powers of expropriation mutatis mutandis as have been contained in the Expropriation Act of Canada. In other words, what this does is confirm the agreement entered into between the two governments of Ontario and Canada for the development of power in the international rapids section of the river.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, this bill is completely complementary to the other, and it would be unthinkable if one were considered without the other. As a matter of fact they are and must be considered as a joint plan. What I shall have to say on this subject at this time will be short, but I feel that the record should contain some statistics of the growth of the load of power and the demand for power in Ontario. I shall endeavour very briefly to put that on the record to show how desperately this power is needed in Ontario at the present time.

I think some hon. members do not realize what has happened in Canada since the end of the war. The figures for population, the figures for growth of industry, and the figures for growth of load for primary power I think are probably outstanding for any country in the world. In 1940 the load in Ontario was 2,116,600 horsepower; in 1945, that is at the end of the war, it had grown to 2,597,400 horsepower; but in 1950, that is in half a decade since the war, it had grown to 3,659,900 horsepower. In other words, in the period since the war the primary load in Ontario has grown no less than 41 per cent. In that period of five years the extra power load very nearly equalled half the total load in Ontario at the end of the war. While figures for gross provincial production show in dollar value an even more astounding gross, there is some degree of reduction owing to the inflated dollar and the lower purchasing power of the dollar. In 1945, however, the gross provincial production was $3·97 billion, while in 1950 this had grown to an estimated $6·55 billion, or an increase over 1945 of 64 per cent.

I mention this to show the growth of industrial output which runs concurrently with the growth of primary power, and how these two essential factors in our development run hand in hand. One is complementary to the other, and I give this as an example of why it is necessary and desirable for us to develop all possible sources of primary power, wherever they may be located in Canada. To give an example of this growth, and to show the current rate of increase in growth, let me point out that the gross primary load per 20-minute peak, on a date at the beginning of this session, was 415,086 horsepower greater than the same day a year ago. Or, to express it in another way, it was 32,400 horsepower greater than the Toronto average load for the month, including Leaside. In other words every year the total load for Ontario is growing at a rate equal to the total load for greater Toronto. We think that is an astounding development. It would appear that the load in this province is growing at a rate equal to the load of what is certainly the second, and perhaps is now the leading, industrial city in Canada. That is an example of the astounding growth of the load in Ontario.

Since the end of the war in 1945 there have been installed 1,112,700 horsepower of primary hydroelectric power. There are under contract and under construction 970,000 horsepower. I am using the horsepower unit rather than that of the kilowatt, because the former is a somewhat easier lay term. The same plants, now either completed or under construction, will add a further 892,000 horsepower, or a total under construction of 1,862,000 horsepower. This makes a grand total of 2,975,000 horsepower added or under construction at the present time in Ontario. When one considers the enormous construction that has been undertaken by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, if he did not appreciate the tremendous growth in this area he would conclude that there would be comparative security for at least the medium distant future. But at the present rate of growth, assuming we do not get an acceleration over the 1950 rate of growth—and that is not being borne out—there will be a further power shortage in Ontario in 1957. As we are now in the year 1951, we have at the very outside five years of grace before there may be a further power shortage in Ontario, despite the fact that there has been added or is being added nearly 3 million additional horsepower since the end of the war.

I believe that growth will compare favourably with the growth of any other area at any period, anywhere in the world. I very much doubt if comparable figures anywhere else have ever been established.

Now let us come to the next question, what it will mean if we are denied that power. The cost of steam power is approximately three times the cost of power developed on the St. Lawrence river. Using construction costs of 1949, we may assume that hydroelectric power can be produced on the bus bars at the plant for approximately 3 mills per kilowatt hour. Taking steam at the then rate, we find that the cost will be slightly over 7¼ mills per kilowatt hour. The original figure for hydroelectric power was 2 mills per kilowatt hour, but to be on the safe side it has been estimated that construction costs will now make it 3 mills per kilowatt hour.

Besides the extra cost to the consumer, there is the problem with steam power of obtaining coal. Certainly the coal for the Windsor generating plant, and up to now, I believe, for the Toronto generating plant, has been purchased from the United States, which further puts out of balance our balance of payments position with that country. Therefore both from the point of view of cheap power and the balance of payments position with the United States it is imperative that this work be proceeded with as soon as possible. I do not propose to go into the figures in detail with respect to the use of power in Ontario and the use of power by the Hydro Electric Power Commission. However, the figures show that nowhere in the world is there such high consumption of electrical energy on a per capita basis as there is in Ontario. This has been brought about progressively and aggressively by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, who deserve the greatest credit for the work they have done not only for the industrial and urban consumer but particularly for the farm consumer. I think the record of farm electrification in Ontario is unique anywhere in the world. They have done this as a public trust in such a way as to make Ontario hydro the best servant the people of Ontario could possibly have.

I mention these facts merely to put them on the record at this juncture. They have all been given before by the chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission, Mr. Saunders, and by others; but I also do so to show hon. members in the house who do not come from Ontario the growth of the load and the tremendous increase in productivity which has been brought about by cheap and abundant hydroelectric energy. I also do so to show hon. members who do not come from Ontario that it should be a primary function of every provincial government to endeavour to develop every waterpower resource it has, because with the addition of abundant and cheap electrical energy there is phenomenally increased production and population. In other words, it is largely upon electrical energy that the amazing prosperity of Canada has been built, and I hope this project, like the other, will be proceeded with as soon as possible.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCE POLLS AND PRISONERS OF WAR VOTING REGULATIONS

The house resumed, from Friday, November 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bradley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Dominion Elections Act to implement the recommendations of the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, embodied in the draft bill prepared by the said committee and inter alia to make provision for: (a) a greater number of advance polls; and (b) the Canadian prisoners of war voting regulations, 1951.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly the minister would make a general statement so that hon. members who were not on the special committee may know the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): After each general election the chief electoral officer is obliged to make a report to parliament on his experiences during the election, and also to suggest amendments to the elections act, having in mind those experiences. The chief electoral officer did make a report after the 1949 general election, which report was considered by a committee of this house which sat during the session in the first part of this year. A report was prepared and presented to the house, but not proceeded with in detail because of the lateness of the session. That committee was reconstituted at this session and the bill which had been prepared by the committee of last session was resubmitted, discussed in detail and reported to the house.

The bill which will follow this resolution is the same as the previous bill with the exception of a few minor changes which have been suggested by Justice for drafting purposes, and one exception which I shall mention in a minute. In general the bill covers the recommendations of the chief electoral officer, having in mind the improvement of the election laws. It includes quite a substantial revision of the regulations having to do with the taking of the service vote, particularly having in mind the experience of the 1949 election.

The only section in the bill which was not approved and forwarded to the house during the last session is the final one. This was the subject of some discussion by the hon. member for Temiscouata, and has to do with certain French translations. As I have said, otherwise the bill carries out the recommendations of the committee of last session as well as of the committee of this session. I do not recall that there was any particular objection to any of the features of the bill, though there may be some hon. members who think there should be other things in the bill that are not in it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister an extra copy of the bill which will follow this resolution?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I am sorry I have not, but I shall endeavour to get one.

Mr. Knowles: It is true that we do not have a copy of the bill, as this is only the resolution stage, but the committee submitted a draft bill which appears in Votes and Proceedings of Friday, November 16. May I ask the minister if the bill to be founded on this resolution is the same as that draft copy?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Precisely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, generally speaking there is no disagreement with what the minister has stated because that represents a factual outline. I should like to ask one question which has to do with the establishment of an advance poll at Wynyard, Saskatchewan. Some difficulty arose during the last election because no advance poll was provided in that area, where a great many railroad workers are located. Therefore I should like to ascertain where advance polls will be provided for in Saskatchewan. I do not know whether the minister has that information at the moment, and I think the difficulty has been remedied by this bill. If not it should be, because a large number of employees of the Canadian Pacific work out of Wynyard as a divisional point and an advance poll should be provided there. Something was done about providing an advance poll in the last election through the actions of the chief electoral officer, but I am not quite clear as to the circumstances that prevailed.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): My recollection is that the election act provides that the chief electoral officer may establish advance polls in certain places if certain conditions are met. A list of advance polls is not attached to this bill, but I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Murphy: I should like to make one observation with respect to this resolution. I notice from the proposed bill that the name is to be changed. I think I indicate the feeling of the people in many provinces, perhaps the majority of people in the Dominion of Canada, when I say that I dislike the trend that has become apparent in the last few years to change everything that is seemingly offensive to the ears of some. That is noticeable in connection with certain legislation where the word "dominion" has been changed to "Canada".

When the fathers of confederation finally agreed upon a name for this country it was only after a great deal of thought and study. All through the years we have been in general quite satisfied. The leaders of those days were great statesmen, and I have often thought that if what was ordained at that time was good enough for the people and for those great leaders, it should still be good enough for most of the people in the Dominion of Canada.

Some few years ago the telephone books were changed, and just a few weeks ago the Dominion Lands Surveys Act was changed to read "Canada Lands Surveys Act". I am one of those in this house who oppose that trend, and I do not purport to be in the minority in this country. When this question arose in the committee there was some moderate debate. We knew that others would have an opportunity to make a statement when the resolution was presented, to indicate to the people of this country that there was resentment against that trend. I am satisfied that there is such resentment in all parts of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and to change its title to the Canada Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL GALLERY

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES —EXPENDITURES—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the national gallery of Canada to increase the number of members of the board of trustees; to provide that the board may enter into contracts and may dispose of property vested in the board; to provide for a national gallery purchase account and for a national gallery special operating account to meet the expenditures of the board; and to provide further for the appointment in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act of the necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement on this resolution?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I would prefer to make a short statement in committee, if that would be acceptable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, in introducing this resolution to amend the National Gallery of Canada Act, may I recall that the national gallery, along with the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, was established in 1880. For the first twenty-six years of its existence the national gallery made little progress; it had no permanent home, few pictures of any significance, no purchase grant and no qualified staff.

In 1907 the government of the day decided that art had an important place to play in Canadian life and in that year, by order in council, the government established the advisory arts council, composed of three leading citizens prominent in the art field of this country. The council was charged with the duty of advising the minister on all purchases for the national gallery, and on the construction of public monuments and the acquisition of other works of art for the government. The council fulfilled its duty well. A qualified curator was employed and the national gallery grew rapidly and soundly by the able handling of the modest grants made by parliament for purchases from year to year.

In 1913 the national gallery was incorporated by act of parliament. The advisory arts council became a board of trustees to manage and develop the national gallery under the supervision of the Minister of Public Works. The act of 1913 proved to be a very satisfactory piece of legislation and served its purpose acceptably for many years, during which time regional art galleries fostered by the national gallery were established in many parts of the country. During that time also the work of Canadian artists became widely and favourably known in most countries of the world, and Canadian public interest in the fine arts showed a most encouraging growth, as described in the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, popularly referred to as the Massey report.

During these thirty-eight years the national gallery, from a practically unknown institution, has come to be widely recognized, not only at home but also abroad, by reason of its unique extension service, which I believe is superior to that of any similar institution in the world. Its collections have been reviewed from time to time by some of the world's best experts and it is agreed, I am informed, that they are among the finest of the smaller collections on this continent. These pictures are widely lent throughout the country under appropriate conditions, and it is expected that this extension work of the gallery will increase from year to year, as foreshadowed in the Massey report.

It is to implement some of the leading recommendations of that report that the present bill is being introduced. The new act preserves the substance of the act of 1913, with a number of important improvements. The board, which for many years was composed of three trustees, was in 1922 increased to five members, but may now, under the present bill, consist of from five to nine members, reflecting the country's wider interest in the institution.

A new section provides that the national gallery purchase grant will not lapse at the end of the fiscal year, but that purchase funds may be accumulated from year to year for important additions to the national collection. This provision will facilitate the work of the board, and put the national gallery more nearly on an equality with competing galleries. Section 4 (1) provides that appointments to the national gallery staff shall be made by the civil service commission, which has been the practice followed by the board for the past thirty years. Clause 3 (4) gives the board the power, with the approval of the minister, to sell, lease, exchange or otherwise dispose of any property which it is not considered desirable to retain in the national gallery.

The bill also makes provision for the design in industry section established on an experimental basis four years ago. This branch was formed to study the problems of industrial design with the objective of raising the design quality of Canadian manufactured products.

To sum up, this bill gives the national gallery greater opportunity to foster and encourage public interest in the fine and applied arts. I am sure the house would like this institution to be able to play an increasingly important role in our national life.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one or two questions and make one or two observations. Perhaps the minister will tell us a little more concerning what is meant by "entering into contracts", or perhaps that has no significance beyond what he has said already.

At a time when we are asked to concentrate so much on, and to make such ample material provisions for matters of defence, matters of social security and all the other matters which come before us and which are so pressing, it is perhaps difficult to convince ourselves that a matter of this kind, which cannot be assessed in any material terms, can be equally pressing. Yet I think a moment's reflection will enable us to realize that it is important. I suppose one of the things of which we are most constantly reminded is that, in this struggle in which we are engaged, it is not wholly a matter of material things; it is a matter of maintaining the whole fabric and quality of our civilization.

Even those of us who are less competent to express an expert opinion on the importance of art realize that our civilization is made up of things of that kind, things of the spirit. We do realize, too, that our whole civilization would be infinitely poorer if we did not have among us people who are devoting their lives to artistic pursuits, who know about them and who, so to speak, keep the flag flying in respect of those matters. Therefore I am quite sure we shall all welcome what the minister is saying to us, and we shall be anxious that proper steps be taken.

As the minister has already said, the Massey report has brought this and other kindred matters to our minds. However much we may be obsessed with the difficulties of finding money for the other things we are doing, I feel that we must not neglect these things. The more one looks about the more one realizes the many things that are pressing in on our civilization, and the more that some of the sanctions that supported our civilization decades ago are not so strong as they were. It seems to me, too, that we must realize that things such as those for which the national gallery stands must be supported in spite of all the other claims on our time and our purse. Those are all the remarks I desire to make, Mr. Chairman, but before I sit down I should like to ask the minister if he would answer my question as to whether the word "contracts" has any other significance.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, while art may be said to be international in its scope, and a great work of art may be said to belong to history, nevertheless increasingly there are individual artists who belong to Canada and who are finding in the Canadian scene much scope for their particular genius. There have come into being also, over the years, associations of creative artists and those who are interested in art. Thus it is a pleasure to note that in Canada we are making progress in a desired direction. It is not so long ago that one heard much talk of the inferiority complex which bedevilled Canadians in the matter of the arts. In our writing and in our painting we were held, and with some justice, to be mere imitators, mostly of the European or of the British school. If that were once true, I think it is fair to say that it is true no longer; for in our literature and even more in our painting we are becoming more mature, and we are beginning to use art as an expression of Canadianism.

Sir, I know little about art; I am certainly no authority upon it. However, I know what pleases me; and I think that to please must be the first function of art anywhere. In so far as art brings pleasure to the Canadian public or opens up to the masses of our population new vistas of enjoyment—enjoyment which up to the present has been unknown to many of them—I think that art as such should be encouraged.

By reason of its introduction of this bill, it would appear that the Canadian government holds the same view. The very existence of this bill is an acknowledgment on the part of the government that art has become an important phase of our national life. I suppose one might synopsize the provisions of this bill by saying simply they strengthen the hand of the board of trustees of the national gallery of Canada. The bill provides for an increase in the number of members of the board to which I have referred. It provides for added staff which I think is necessary, and it gives the board authority for the making of expenditures which it deems necessary; to that end, funds will be placed at the board's disposal.

It is not my intention to discuss here this evening all the functions which the board is performing or the functions which it may perform with its facilities increased as they will be by the passage of this bill. But there is one principle I would lay down. Just as a taste for good literature is developed only by the reading of it, so does appreciation of art increase by the viewing of it; it can increase only in that way. If one grants that principle—and there will be few who will deny it—then the opportunity to view good pictures must be brought to the greatest possible number of people. That, increasingly, must be the chief task and the primary responsibility of this board. That undertaking involves a decentralization of activity. There must, of course, be some central source of that activity, namely a central national gallery. Ottawa, the capital of this country, seems to be the logical place for it. That is where it now is, although the present facilities are much too meagre, and the space is much too limited in what we now call the national gallery.

Such a central point is the natural home for our national collection of paintings; but there must be co-operation between the national gallery and local galleries throughout the country if the principle I have expounded is to be acted upon. From this central gallery there must go out collections which we may be fortunate enough to borrow from other countries abroad, and exhibitions of particular Canadian artists. I commend the board for having already made available to the public of Canada reproductions of great paintings at reasonable prices. I am thinking of the silkscreen prints—I think that is the technical name of them—for public buildings, schools, and other educational institutions throughout the country. These become a source of education in art appreciation, which in turn might become a stimulus and inspiration to artistic endeavour.

Governments are fond of telling us that in all things they must be practical. I am happy that this government and this intensely practical house should give at least transient attention to what are commonly called things cultural.

In this connection may I pay tribute to the Massey commission for its stupendous accomplishment towards encouragement of the arts. The report of that commission has met with a fine response throughout this whole country, and has aroused wide interest among the Canadian people. I have not yet had time to read what it recommends in the matter of a national gallery, but from a study of other parts of the report in which I was greatly interested, I can anticipate with confidence the soundness of those recommendations.

We are pleased to support this bill as a group, and are pleased to endorse the request of the board and other interested organizations for a new and satisfying national gallery. We in this C.C.F. group, and particularly our leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, have on many occasions espoused the cause of the arts. We have not only advocated for Ottawa a great national gallery worthy of this nation, of which we now have only a mere imitation; we have been even more urgent and persistent in our request for a national library of which we have not yet a semblance.

Sir, I think it can be said that we in this country have reached the end of the pioneer stage. Canada has grown up. Canada is a great and wealthy nation. The needs of the body—if I may think of the matter in human terms—have become satisfied. Let us now reach out for the things of the mind and spirit. May I once more—I have done it before—cite the quotation from St. Augustine which adorns one of the front pages of the fine report to which I have referred:

A nation is an association of reasonable beings united in a peaceful sharing of the things they cherish; therefore, to determine the quality of a nation, you must consider what those things are.

May it be said of this nation in days to come, when history will have had an opportunity to estimate her quality, that she chose early to cherish the right things, the things which make a nation truly great.

We support the resolution with the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, what I have to say will take only a few minutes. The first thing I want to say is that I hope the minister will do everything possible—and this bill gives me the opportunity to say it—to relieve the congestion in the national museum where the art gallery is housed. I agree with him that the art gallery does contain a small but worth-while collection. A great part of it, though, is stored in cases underground. There are some very valuable objects in the museum which never are seen by the public, which are stored in the cellars and in many other places, I understand, in Ottawa. The overcrowding of that building is simply scandalous, and I hope that immediate steps will be taken to do two things. The first thing—I speak here as a mining engineer—is to do something about the proper housing of the geological survey, which is taking a tremendous amount of space in that building. It is not a proper place for the geological survey. They are taking up space that should be given to the scientific work of the museum. I say this because I had several people working in the museum complain to me last year about it.

We want to see the collections we have. Let us not bury them. That is the first thing. The second thing is this. We regard ourselves in Canada, and take much pleasure in considering ourselves, as Philistines. We say we have not much art. We rather think of ourselves as rough-hewn pioneers and that sort of thing. It may interest the committee to know that the famous collection from the Kunsthistorische (art history) museum in Vienna, known on tour as the Hapsburg treasures, showed a profit only in the city of Toronto. The only city on the entire continent of North America where sufficient people showed interest to make the exhibit a profitable and paying venture was Toronto. The other cities across this country, including the main cities in the United States, did not show the same interest as was shown in Toronto. That is something which shows the general interest in art amongst the people of Canada, and belies the happy Philistine idea which we endeavour to cherish amongst ourselves so much.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, respecting the National Gallery of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

TO PROVIDE FOR COMPENSATION, PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate agrees to the amendment made by the House of Commons to the sixteenth amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 21, respecting the Canadian forces.

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of National Defence) moved:

That this sixteenth amendment, as amended, be now concurred in; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

Mr. Knowles: Is it all straightened out now?

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE AND SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Bradley—Mr. Dion in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Civil Service Act in respect of the tenure of office and salaries of the commissioners.

Mr. Knowles: Who is the Acting Secretary of State?

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Bradley): Mr. Chairman, I shall try to handle this resolution to the best of my ability.

Mr. Knowles: It is good to know that this function has been added to the many duties of the Minister of Public Works. As the minister knows, in the light of such information as the house was able to get at an earlier stage, some of us on this side found ourselves opposed to the measure forecast by this resolution.

As we understand the measure, it is proposed to take out of the statute setting up the civil service commission any reference to the amount of salary to be paid to the civil service commissioners. Rather, it is planned that their salaries from here on will be fixed by order in council. We are opposed to that move, and we signified our opposition by voting against the motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on this resolution.

I wish to repeat that I was quite disappointed at the proposal as outlined to us by the Secretary of State. It was a surprise to us. We understood, from the wording of the resolution now before us, that it was a very simple proposal relating to the tenure of office and the salaries of the commissioners. I, for one, thought all that would be proposed would be that the Auditor General's recommendation would be carried out, and that the entire salary of each commissioner would be spelled out in the statute rather than having part of it in the statute and part of it in the annual estimates. However, when we had a brief statement from the Secretary of State it turned out that such was not the intention. Rather it is proposed to take this fixing of the salaries of civil service commissioners away from parliament altogether.

I think it is quite clear that the civil service commissioners should stand in the same relationship to parliament as does the Auditor General and also the chief electoral officer. In respect of each of these other officials it is clearly recognized that they are responsible to parliament, not to the government. They are appointed under that interesting piece of machinery known as the great seal; and they are officers of the whole of parliament rather than officials of the government. The civil service commissioners are not appointed in the same way; but the whole theory of the civil service commission is that government positions should be removed as far as possible from political control. That is a battle that was fought and won many years ago. I think it is an integral part of that situation that the salaries of the civil service commissioners should be fixed not by the government, not by order in council but by parliament.

As I have already indicated, I feel that their relationship to us should be the same as that of the other two top-ranking officials I have mentioned. I note that the salary of the Auditor General is fixed by chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1931. The whole of the salary he gets is the salary set out in and determined by that statute.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What is the amount of the salary?

Mr. Knowles: It is $15,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is 1931. That salary was fixed by statute in 1931.

Mr. Knowles: Well, is it not still the same salary that was fixed by statute? Although I have looked at it fairly closely, for all I know it may be that in the financial administration act there is some provision to change the salary of the Auditor General. If it is being changed in that way, then at least that is the proper way to change it.

I was about to point out that the salary of the chief electoral officer is also fixed by statute, namely chapter 46 of the statutes of 1938, as amended. And, to anticipate the question of the Minister of Public Works, I may say that his salary is $10,000 a year.

Up to the present time the principle that the salary of the civil service commissioners should be set by statute has been recognized by the fact that their salaries were fixed by chapter 53 of the statutes of 1947. Apparently the government has taken the view for a number of years that the salaries fixed for the commissioners by that statute were not sufficient. So for a number of years they have had a special estimate providing for a supplement of $2,000 a year. As I have already said, the Auditor General has commented unfavourably on the practice of continuing to pay supplements in respect of salaries in that way, and has suggested that the appropriate statute should be amended. But instead of taking the Auditor General's advice, which has been advocated from the floor of the house many times, the government is taking this further step of taking away from parliament altogether the fixing of the salaries of the civil service commissioners.

Let me point out that the issue here is not the amount of the salaries of the civil service commissioners. It may be that their salaries are not high enough. It may be that a case can be made to increase them. It may be that that is the desire of the government. But I contend that if it is the intention of the government to increase their salaries at this time, it should be done by amending the act accordingly, and it should be left so that any further changes in their salaries would be made in the same way, by a proper parliamentary statute.

I insist that the civil service commissioners should be on the same basis as the Auditor General and the chief electoral officer. For that reason I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should like to ask the minister if we may at least have some suggested reason why this is being done. So far as I can recall, it did not seem very clear whether we had ever convinced the Secretary of State that there was any need to give a reason. Perhaps we may be able to convince the genial Minister of Public Works that we are at least entitled to a reason. I should like to emphasize what has been said by the hon. member who preceded me, namely that I would have thought this was one of the worst places to begin to chisel a little—we are getting used to it, but every now and then we rebel—at the rights of parliament and to aggrandize the executive just that much more at our expense. The reason I think this is about the very worst place to begin is, as has already been said, that surely the civil service commissioners should have for the discharge of their duties the greatest possible independence. How else they can get that except from a statute under the authority of parliament I do not know.

I think the two illustrations that have been given are admirable, the Auditor General and the chief electoral officer; and it certainly will be very hard to satisfy me, and I hope a lot of people in this house, that there can be any reason for this proposed method of dealing with the position of the civil service commissioners. Surely it is tampering with their position. Nobody can doubt that. It means that now, like so many other people, they are going to be dependent upon the good will of the government. We do not always rate that very highly on this side of the house.

Mr. Knowles: We could also add the board of transport commissioners as an example.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Therefore I suggest to the minister that at the very least we should have what we have not had yet, a suggestion of a reason for what is proposed to be done.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I believe that on December 4 I certainly made a blunder by informing the house of the contents of the bill. That is due to my inexperience, but I thought that by giving details I would get the resolution through. However, I have lost that illusion because we had a vote on the question and I realized that we were not voting on the principle of the resolution but were only trying to stop Mr. Speaker from leaving the chair. The motion was that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to consider the resolution in committee. Some members did not even want Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the chairman to read the resolution in committee so that we might consider it.

Where my hon. friends are making a mistake is that they believe that increases or decreases in the salaries of the commissioners would make them more dependent. I think too highly of the three civil service commissioners to believe that an increase or decrease in their salaries would affect their sense of justice and fairness, and that they would not apply the provisions of the law as well if in 1931 they had been voted by parliament a salary fixed for all time to come.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is not a reason; that is just a collateral circumstance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps my reasons do not appeal to the hon. gentleman, but I know they appeal even to the members of the civil service commission. There are two phases of the bill. In the first place we are trying to avoid compulsory retirement for them at age 65. That is the first part of the bill. We wish to have the power to extend the tenure of the chairman and commissioners. I do not think the house would object to that feature of the bill. It is being done for a good many civil servants.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is another matter. You are not giving us the reason.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If you will permit the bill to come before the house you will be able to read it, and you will see it is right in the bill. I know if I discuss the bill at this stage it will take me longer to get the resolution through, but I think in all fairness I should point out that the bill is divided in two parts. One deals with tenure of office. The situation is that when a commissioner reaches the age of 65 we are barred from extending his term of office, and under the bill we are providing that we may increase the number of years that a commissioner may remain a member of the civil service commission. We could not do that if we had to use the method of voting money by estimates. The idea really came from the report of the Auditor General to the effect that instead of having an estimate, which is repugnant to certain members of the house, we should seek authority to increase their salaries.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what the Auditor General recommended.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Auditor General does not like legislation by appropriations or estimates. That is what he says. By passing this bill we will avoid that.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no; the Auditor General said: Do not do it by putting items in the estimates; do it by putting it in the statute.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Auditor General did not say that.

Mr. Knowles: As the resolution was explained by the Secretary of State, it is not to be put in the statute at all. It is to be turned over to the governor in council.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope I can go ahead now. We had the thought that, instead of introducing an estimate which nobody would discuss in the house when it came up, we would introduce a bill and have the matter aired before the members of the house. We do not ask every member to agree with the proposals of the government, but we have given a lot of study to this matter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Who?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If you look at the present statute you will see, so far as the first point I was dealing with is concerned, that when the commissioners reach the age of 65 they are out. The present commissioners are men of experience. They are known for their competence and fairness and for following the provisions of the law as to the merit system. We thought we were fortunate in having such men, and we would like to extend the terms of office of some of them at least beyond the age of 65. I do not believe my hon. friend is an old man or is incapable because he has reached that age, and these commissioners are in the same position. I like to see my old friends in the opposition come back here even if they are more than 65 because they are sometimes useful to their country, their party, and not often to the government except that sometimes by accident they do help us.

As to the question of fixing the salaries, I understand that the opposition would like to see the commissioners put in the same position as the Auditor General or the chief electoral officer who are appointed by vote of the house. There may be some good reasons for appointing the three commissioners by vote of the house and having them responsible only to parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are talking about salaries now. Do not twist the argument.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There may be some reason for that, but both parties have been in power and have held famous investigations by committees of the house, and at no time was it recommended that the commissioners be appointed in that manner. All these committees made very complete reports on the civil service, but on the question of the appointment of the commissioners it was understood that they would be appointed for a term by the governor general in council during good behaviour. That is where their independence comes into the situation. I really cannot understand the argument of both my hon. friends when they say that because the governor in council would fix the salary these people would lose that quality of independence and knowledge and would be thinking every day: We will not get the same increase as deputy ministers or high officials of the government whose salaries are fixed by the governor in council. I think very highly of our commissioners. I think they are public spirited, and I do not think the arguments my hon. friends have brought forward would affect their decisions in the administration of the civil service commission. At this time the government does not agree that these gentlemen should be appointed by parliament, but believes that they should be appointed by the governor general in council. In the past their salaries were fixed by statute, and that practice continued for thirty years before anyone mustered up sufficient courage to bring in a bill to increase their salaries, which in many quarters were thought to be rather high.

In order to be fair and just to these commissioners we placed an item in the estimates some years ago providing for an additional $2,000. The statute provides that the chairman shall receive $10,000 a year and each of the commissioners $8,000. At the time the statute was passed those salaries were comparable to the salaries paid to other civil servants occupying a like position, but today they are not. That is why we thought in all fairness we should have the item in the estimates. Today the chairman receives $12,000 and the commissioners, $10,000.

Since the item was first included in the estimates other officials occupying comparable positions have received increases. If the salaries were fixed today by statute it might happen that in six months the statute would be outmoded. We are simply trying to be fair to these gentlemen. I submit that we should either pass this resolution or vote on the principle of whether these gentlemen should be appointed by parliament or by the governor in council. It is the policy of the government to have the appointments made by the governor in council.

Mr. Harkness: A few minutes ago the minister suggested that the idea of looking after this matter by way of estimates was repugnant to a number of hon. members. I should like to know who those hon. members are.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not like to name names, but if the hon. member had attended in the house as I have he would be able to pick out members who do not like the fixing of salaries by special estimates which amount to legislation.

Mr. Knowles: I would be glad to answer the hon. member for Calgary East. It is repugnant to me and to the Auditor General.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to express complete approval of the action being taken by the minister to continue the service of these men. I have always looked upon it as being rather foolish to think we have to dismiss a man when he reaches 65 years of age. However, I am not quite satisfied that the determination of these salaries should be in the hands of the governor in council. Is it the desire of the government that they be able to increase the salaries of the civil service commissioners without reference to parliament?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When the cost of living increased and it was thought that the salaries of the civil servants should be increased, general approval was expressed in the house for these increases. But it was found that nothing could be done for the civil service commissioners because their salaries had been fixed by statute some years ago. We then brought in a special item in the estimates increasing those salaries by $2,000. Since that date other civil servants occupying comparable positions have received further increases. All we are seeking to do is what is done in the case of deputy ministers, many of whom receive far more by way of salary.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to set the minister straight on one point. I do not think anyone has suggested that these commissioners should be appointed by parliament.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The suggestion was that their salaries should be fixed by parliament. I would point out that no one has ever suggested that parliament should appoint judges, but we do fix their salaries.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It has been argued that it would affect the independence of these gentlemen if the governor in council fixed their salaries, but I argued that I did not think a man occupying the position of chairman or commissioner of the civil service commission would be affected by having his salary fixed, either by parliament or by the governor in council.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister seems to be trying to put us in the position of having criticized the civil service commission. There was nothing of that nature in our minds. I think the minister and any other reasonable man must admit that their positions would be that much more independent if their salaries were not fixed by the cabinet.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the government by introducing this amendment to the Civil Service Act is taking a retrograde step. Even if it does not affect the freedom of action of the civil service commissioners, I think it is wrong psychologically to put them under the governor in council. If the term of one of the commissioners has ended after serving ten years, the act could be amended to provide, as is provided in other acts, that he can be appointed for a further term. The appointment is completely within the jurisdiction of the governor in council at the present time and it would not be necessary to amend the act.

Regardless of how the salaries of the deputy ministers and others are fixed, I think it would be far better that these salaries should be treated like the salaries of judges. They should be set by statute, and when increases have to be made they could be made by amending the statute. I regret very much that the government has decided to do something which is not necessary in order to accomplish what they say they want to accomplish.

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Resolution reported on division, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Bradley) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 43, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF GOVERNORS, PROVIDE PENSIONS AND FURTHER GRANTS

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 17, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—"Minister".

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, as the house is aware, since this bill was given second reading it has been reviewed by the special committee of the house on radio broadcasting. As tonight the house will be reviewing the bill, it may be that the discussion will be somewhat broken up in order to relate it to the particular sections. At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I might say that the special committee has completed its public sittings but has not yet written its report, so the discussion tonight is necessarily in advance of the writing of the report, let alone its tabling in the house. However, having regard to the rather advanced stage of this session, I suppose it will be too much to expect that there will be an opportunity for discussing the report of the special committee when it is tabled.

I feel it is unfortunate that the bill should be before the house before we actually have the report of the special committee. I am sure we would have had a more concentrated and more helpful discussion if the house had the advantage of having before it the report of the special committee.

May I say this in general about the meetings of the committee. I think all members who were present will agree that the meetings were instructive. We had the assistance of the senior officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and questioned them freely. They gave us a good deal of information. The committee also had assistance from representatives of the Canadian association of broadcasters, representing the great majority of the private broadcasting stations in Canada. They gave their views on a broad range of subjects, and were very appropriately thanked by the committee for their helpful presentation. The committee also spent a day in Montreal examining the Radio Canada building, and seeing some demonstrations of television which were indeed interesting to all members present. In other words, the sittings of the committee, Mr. Chairman, were helpful to all concerned, and I think the committee has performed a service to the house and to the country.

The relationships between this committee and the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have always been very cordial. Even those who disagreed with the policy of the broadcasting corporation on some of the matters in which policy has played a leading part have always been glad and happy in the association of the committee and those senior officials.

The subject of programs did provide a source of some agitation in the committee meetings this year. I do not want to discuss that subject in detail in advance of the writing of the committee's report. I believe the report may have something to say on that subject this year. But I feel that all hon. members of this house should do two things in expressing their views on the subject of programs. First of all we should vindicate the principle of freedom of expression. Some representations are being made through the mails these days to members of the house that seem to suggest some people are becoming very panicky, and believe there is some effort afoot to interfere with legitimate freedom of expression on the air. I do not believe anyone in this house is going to suggest there should be any tampering or interference with the established principle of freedom of expression. On the other hand, as applied to this vitally important means of communication, we must have regard at all times, and particularly when the control of radio broadcasting in Canada is vested in a publicly owned and appointed board of governors, to the necessity of providing balance in the presentation of points of view.

Much of the criticism that has been levelled at certain programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation might well have been avoided if the corporation, instead of making a series of broadcasts by persons having a particular point of view, had sought at the same time to provide balance in the presentation of that point of view by giving equal opportunity on the same series to those who had a different point of view to express. It seems to me that those who are charged under the present set-up with the control of broadcasting in Canada, not only on the channels occupied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but on others which are after all under residual control of that corporation, should take great care to see that due respect is paid to the fundamental convictions of the people of this country. We heard that certain programs offended the religious sensibilities of people in Canada. We heard criticism of other programs because in a political sense they leaned too much to one particular point of view.

Recognizing the difficulty, and asserting at all times that the principle of freedom must be vindicated, we must nevertheless insist, in the first place, that anything in the nature of unnecessary offence to the religious and moral convictions of the people of the country must be avoided, and in the matter of programs having a political flavour, or news commentators and political commentators, a balance must be preserved. There is one situation that has been discussed more than once—I mention this because it struck some of us very forcibly at the time—concerning the series of political commentators under the title "Capital Report". When it came to totalling the number of those who participated in that particular series, that element of balance was not found present which the board of governors subscribes to, we are told, as a principle. There was criticism of this series which I for one voiced in the committee because those participating in it were, on the whole, leftist in their tendencies. That was the flavour of the reports. When we came to get the figures of those participating we found that out of 41 broadcasts in that series 28 had been delivered by one individual, Matthew Halton. Mr. Halton is an accomplished commentator; but in the opinion of most people I think his political views and comments are somewhat left of centre. When we come to examine the the other participants in that series, thinking in terms of balance, we find that Mr. Robert McKenzie had two; Milton Shulman, 3; Elmore Philpott, 3; Herbert Steinhouse, 3; Gerard Fay, 1; Jon Kimche, 1; Andrew Cowan, 1; Douglas Lachance, 1; Peter Stursberg, 1. When that matter was brought directly to the attention of the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation he readily agreed that it did not represent balance in a series where the point of view of the commentator is of no little importance. I am glad to say the chairman said that the unbalance in that particular series would be redressed.

I do not propose to repeat what was said three weeks ago in the debate on second reading of this bill. The subject of the fundamental method of control of radio broadcasting in Canada has been before the house on more than one occasion. This bill does not present an opportunity of seeking a test of opinion in the house on that subject because there is no one section that provides a vehicle for testing that opinion thereon. One must therefore content oneself at this stage with one or two general observations.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation strongly supports the present system of broadcasting in Canada, under which control of all broadcasting is vested in the board of governors. The Canadian association of broadcasters, on the other hand, took the position that there should be an independent regulatory tribunal which would have controlling powers so far as may be necessary to preserve freedom on the airwaves. Their contention was that there is no necessity for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to sit in judgment upon them.

We must never lose sight of the fact that radio broadcasting has become a highly competitive business. We have an abundance of evidence to show that as between private broadcasting stations in similar localities or in the same localities competition is exceedingly keen. As between private stations on the one hand and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the other, competition operates so far as is permitted by the corporation, and that competition is keen. The problem therefore is inescapable: is it right and fair that in that area in which keen competition exists, the system of control and regulation should be such that one of the competitors exercises control over the whole field, including its competitors? That is the problem.

To meet that problem Dr. Arthur Surveyer, one of the members of the Massey commission, put forward some concrete proposals which I am bound to say commend themselves strongly to some of us. They are not exactly the views put forward on that subject by the Canadian association of broadcasters, but Dr. Surveyer put forward on that subject views which I wish there were an opportunity of testing effectively in the house, so hon. members might determine whether the house can disregard those views and pass them by. His view was that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should carry on as an operating body, that the board of governors should be reduced in size, and that there should be established by act of parliament a separate tribunal which would exercise regulatory power over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations alike, in so far as regulation may be necessary. As the matter of the licensing of stations is extremely important, it would necessarily follow that the body to advise the Minister of Transport, who issues the licenses for transmitting stations, should not be the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but should be this independent regulatory body.

We have not before us the report of the committee. We simply have those two points of view put before the committee. While they do not exactly correspond to the majority and minority reports of the Massey commission, nevertheless there is some resemblance to those reports in the views expressed on the one hand, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation officials and, on the other hand, by the representatives of the Canadian association of broadcasters. For my own part, Mr. Chairman, I wish to express clearly my view that the recommendations of the minority report of Dr. Arthur Surveyer, a Montreal engineer of high distinction, contain a sensible proposal for handling this problem of the regulation of broadcasting in Canada.

Then, sir, there is one other subject, namely television, which I should like to mention on this opening section. What I have to say with regard to the method of financing the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I shall reserve for section 6 of the bill. The subject of television is of striking importance. We are told that there are some 60,000 television receiving sets in Canada. These receiving sets are today receiving United States programs. They are located within reach of the border. There is today no Canadian television. Why is there not? The answer is that it was policy on the part of the government—policy which agreed with the views of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—that there should not be Canadian television hitherto. On the one hand, when private applicants came forward and, as long ago as early 1948, made application for television licenses, those applications were simply held in a state of suspense. There are four such applications pending for two available channels in Toronto. There are two applications pending for three available channels in Montreal. There are applications pending in Hamilton, Winnipeg, New Westminster and several other Canadian cities. With the exception of one application from Hamilton which was dismissed, the others, for periods running up to almost four years, have been held simply in a state of suspense. Why? Because it was government policy, as well as policy of the board of governors of the corporation, that no private television be hitherto permitted in Canada.

What has the corporation done as regards television itself? Well, after a slow start, for which I think the government is principally responsible rather than the corporation, the corporation has been pressing its efforts to provide television over two channels assigned to them, one in Toronto and one in Montreal. When the committee of the 1950 session reviewed this matter, it was told by the officials of the corporation it was their hope and expectation that television programs would be available from these two stations by September last. It is a matter of disappointment to all concerned, including the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that shortages of materials and delays arising out of that fact have defeated that hope. Now the earliest date by which the officials of the corporation hold out any hope of television over these two stations is the summer of 1952, and apparently there is some uncertainty as to whether television may be expected even then.

The first stage of development contemplates that television will be provided over these two stations. There will in time be connections between Toronto and Montreal. There will be a network; there will be provision for relays and kinescope recordings, and efforts of that kind. The whole undertaking in this first stage will cost approximately $5,225,000, and will require at least a couple of years to complete.

What of the other areas in Canada which are unquestionably just as anxious to have Canadian television programs made available to them as the more fortunate people of Montreal and Toronto? That depends on the second stage of development, Mr. Chairman. Some effort will be made in the first stage to provide by kinescope recordings television in some of the other principal cities. For transmission of television from stations in those other principal cities in Canada they may have to wait for some considerable time, and the cost is going to be very great. We were told in the committee on Monday that the cost to complete this second stage may well run to something like $15 million; and there will be required, in addition to what has now been provided by parliament over and above commercial revenues from the sale of sponsored programs, $10 million during the first four years of operation.

Now, sir, these are the plans of the national system. I have indicated that the government is to be held responsible for the fact that these plans have been held back, and that today we are still without Canadian television in this country. One does not underestimate the difficulties. This is a new field, and I want to be quite fair in my approach to it. There are very great difficulties involved in television, in launching this new form of communication.

The plans of the corporation do not contemplate, even at the beginning, operations for more than perhaps three hours a day on these two stations. It will take a good deal of time to develop programs, to develop engineering and program techniques, to the point where Canadians will be able to have sustained enjoyment of television programs. In the face of all that, and the responsibility the government must bear for holding back the development of television under other auspices, as well as delay in the early stages of the development of television by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself, one asks how the government hopes to justify denying entry into this field to those who are quite prepared to come in and take their chances.

It is not enough, surely, for the government to take a paternalistic attitude and say: Well, we do not want to see you risk your money. These people are quite prepared to come in and run the risks—and they are very great risks—of losing money in the early stages of television. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation expects in the early stages of its operations to incur substantial expenditures; and those who made application for television licences well knew that for a period of time they might incur very heavy losses. But, sir, they were quite prepared to do it. In the face of their willingness to pioneer in this field, to take their chances and provide programs, it was the policy of this government to close and bolt the door, and to deny to any private interests any opportunity of entry into this field. What is the result? These dozen or more applications are still in a state of suspense.

The majority on the Massey commission made some recommendations on this subject that I for one cannot support. At page 303 they set forth this, among other recommendations:

> c. That no private television broadcasting stations be licensed until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has available national television programs and that all private stations be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

That recommendation, literally applied, will mean that until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has brought into effect stage one of its television plans, which will not even commence until at least next summer, no consideration will be given to any of these applications for television licences. They are still to be left in a state of suspense. Moreover, sir, let me remind you that the opening of broadcasting from Toronto and Montreal simply marks the opening of stage one of the television plans of the corporation, and it may be another couple of years before stage one is fully put into operation by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That leaves us with this unhappy consequence: that apparently it will be two or three years before any consideration is to be given these pending applications. In the meantime the door is closed to anybody else in Canada wanting to enter this field. It means that because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is encountering delays—there are shortages of different kinds now and their plans will have to be proceeded with under the limitations of finance—Canadians are not going to have much television in this country for at least several years to come, and they will not have television on any very substantial scale for apparently a great many years to come. And this is government policy.

It is the government that, through the Minister of Transport, issues the licences. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises the minister with regard to the issuance of those licences. The policy in these matters or views on policy are shared by the government and the board of governors of the corporation. Apparently they see eye to eye, and I for one say it is most regrettable that Canadians are to be denied television.

Let us not be turned aside, sir, by any talk about undue commercialism or an excess of United States content in these programs, because, sir, the content of programs is still subject to the regulatory powers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. No one has ever suggested in this House of Commons, so far as I am aware, that there should not be regulation exercised over television, as over sound broadcasting. There is going to be some form of regulation, whether it be carried on by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by some independent regulatory board or tribunal. Therefore that regulatory tribunal, whatever it may be—and under the present system it would be the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself—would have ample power to see that there is not an undue commercial content in any television programs sent out from private stations, and also that there was not any undue American content. All of us want to see as high a content of Canadian broadcasting in Canadian television as may be in keeping with good programs. It will take time to develop Canadian television talent and Canadian television techniques. But valuable time is being lost and unfairness is being perpetrated by the government, not simply on people who are applying for licences but upon the people who want to receive television.

Meantime, because of the concentration of television in these two major urban centres in Canada, Montreal and Toronto, the benefits of television, in so far as it is developed, are going to be enjoyed largely by the residents of these two great urban centres.

The government has not yet told us very much about how television is to be financed. The chairman of the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation indicated in his evidence last Monday that a receiving licence fee of $15 is probably going to be required, to make up the very large gap between revenues and expenditures of the corporation in television. Already the house has authorized substantial loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the development of television. Speaking from memory, these loans already aggregate $4,500,000. I think it will be a matter of concern to all members that, when these substantial expenditures have been authorized out of public moneys, the benefits of television in Canada should be as widely diffused as possible. It seems to me that that healthy diffusion of the benefits of television will be defeated by this policy of concentrating the development of television exclusively in the hands of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and denying to all others any opportunity of participating in that development.

These are only a few of the matters which have come before the committee. I wish it were possible for the opinion of the house to be tested on those two very important subjects which I have sought to discuss tonight. The first of these is: What type of regulatory machinery should be set up in Canada? Should it be an independent body standing apart from both the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its competitors among the private stations; or should it be the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself which, to a large extent, is a competitor of many of these private stations?

The other question is this: Should the development of television be hampered in the way the government is hampering it today? Why should not Canadians be permitted by the government to enjoy the benefits of television? There should be an opportunity of testing the opinion of the house with regard to that government policy. Unfortunately this bill does not offer adequate opportunity in that regard. But some day, and I hope before long, I am sure an effective opportunity will be given to the Canadian parliament to express its verdict upon that barren, negative government policy.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join the hon. member for Eglinton in saying how enjoyable the meetings of the radio committee have been, not only this year but in former years, and how we have appreciated the information and advice we received in that committee from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, indeed, through the representations from time to time of the Canadian association of broadcasters, representing many of the private stations.

As one who has served on that committee almost continuously—with the exception of two—I have been interested to see how, bit by bit, the original intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been set aside, and to a large extent the authority of government bodies, both the Department of Transport and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, reduced.

Those of us who have been familiar for a number of years with broadcasting in this country will well recollect the establishment of the Aird commission, and we will recall what the Aird commission recommended, because of the chaotic and unsatisfactory condition of broadcasting in Canada. The Aird commission recommended that we should have a completely government owned and controlled broadcasting system, that the private stations that existed at the time of the passing of the act which established the original Canadian Broadcasting Commission should be expropriated, and that we should have only a dominion-wide government owned publicly controlled broadcasting system in this country. That was the idea Right Hon. R. B. Bennett had when he introduced the first act governing broadcasting in Canada. I am not going to quote Mr. Bennett at this time; but when I look back over the years and recollect the warnings he gave the house, both when that act was passed and when the new act was passed in 1936, I believe it was, I realize how far-sighted he was in his prognostications of what might happen in the future.

No government we have had in Canada, whether Conservative or Liberal, since the first broadcasting legislation was introduced in 1932, has sought to change the original conception. That original conception was that, because of the peculiar nature of the country, because of its great distances, because of the scattered population, because we have two great peoples with different cultural origins, the only manner in which we could have a satisfactory system of broadcasting was to have one owned and controlled by the people through their government, and operated by a corporation set up by and operating under a statute of parliament And in 1936, when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was piloting through the house a new act, he said this:

> Radio broadcasting in Canada has been studied by one royal commission and three parliamentary committees,—

That was before 1936.

> —and these four reports agree on the broad principles that must govern us. That is to say, the aim of broadcasting should be complete coverage by government facilities and the present situation demands complete control over all forms of broadcasting whether public or private. These conditions are being maintained in the present bill.

Apparently the private broadcasters accepted that situation, until they made their recent representations. In those recent representations they have gone far beyond anything they ever asked before. What they actually asked for this time was the repeal of the acts as we understand and know them, the setting aside of the very basis of broadcasting in this country as we have known it hitherto. In their brief they said this:

> We believe that regulations applied to broadcasting should be for only the required technical purposes so that order may be maintained on the airwaves, and that broadcasting should not be subjected to controls which do not apply to any other form of mass communication.

In other words all that this house could do, and I presume the Department of Transport under the act, would be to see to it that the airwaves were properly apportioned, that interference was looked after and all that kind of thing, and that the private stations should be in the same position as are the newspapers of Canada. What they forget of course is that they are in a different position to the newspapers of Canada because they are occupying publicly owned airwaves which are granted to them for the time being and over which during that time they exercise some control. In other words, a monopoly of an air wavelength is granted to a private organization by the government, or by the people of Canada if you like that better, as a privilege and not as a right.

When we hear about business competition in connection with broadcasting between the private organizations themselves or between the private organizations and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation it is not competition in the ordinary sense of the word because to begin with a private broadcasting station, under acts passed first by the Conservatives and then by the present government and affirmed all through the years in the reports of various parliamentary committees, is placed in a position where it is under the control of a publicly organized authority. As I say, their representations this year went far beyond anything they have asked for heretofore. I should like to refer to page 151 of the record of the proceedings of the 1947 committee. Mr. Sedgwick was appearing on behalf of the private broadcasters and on June 3, 1947, he said this:

> . . . such freedom of speech should be properly safeguarded by having the regulation of radio broadcasting in the hands of a licensing and regulatory body which should be as independent as possible of the government of the day and which should be appointed directly by and responsible directly to parliament itself.

In other words in 1947, while they were asking for a different kind of regulatory body, they wanted a body to regulate all matters having to do with radio broadcasting. This year they have asked for something different. In support of the request for a new regulatory body they quote Dr. Surveyer. I wondered why they quoted Dr. Surveyer. If you will read his minority report you will find that he does recommend a regulatory body different from the C.B.C., and why? Because he thinks the C.B.C. is too busy to undertake the proper regulation of broadcasting in Canada. He quotes at some length to prove that radio broadcasting has not carried out the function it should have carried out in raising the tastes of the Canadian people. In fact he quotes various authorities to suggest that radio broadcasting has not hastened the maturity of many of the people of Canada. He quotes a number of experts and authorities to support these contentions, and he has this to say, as found at page 398 of the report of the Massey commission:

> The excerpts and quotations given above reveal what heavy responsibilities will be placed on the shoulders of the members of the independent regulating body charged with the task of not only arbitrating on the disagreements between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private broadcasters, but also with the more difficult mission of planning an adequate and well balanced schedule of radio and television programs for Canada. It is obvious that the group of men who will have this double responsibility should not be charged with this other double duty of operating the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation networks and of producing the programs suggested by the new control board.

In his recommendation for a new regulatory body I think Dr. Surveyer goes far beyond anything we in this parliament would approve or accept. He wants a regulatory body which would be responsible for raising the whole tone of Canadian broadcasting and which would, as he says, bring about a greater maturity of mind, thinking, culture and taste among the people of Canada. In other words, for the private broadcasters to call in Dr. Surveyer to support a private regulatory body—a minority report, in other words—is, I think, to destroy the very argument that some of my hon. friends are using in that connection.

I do not want to speak at any great length. The hon. member for Eglinton mentioned the criticisms that have been made of some of the programs that have been heard on the air. I am convinced that when second reading of the bill was before the house and we were discussing this matter, many hon. members who spoke had either not heard the broadcasts that were then under criticism or had not read the scripts. As it happened I had heard most of the broadcasts complained of, and I had the temerity to say in the house that I thought they were the kind of broadcast that a good many people in Canada should be entitled to hear. I was not only criticized in the house for having said that but subsequently I received a number of letters to the same effect. I think hon. members who were on the radio committee, and who have had an opportunity to read the scripts that were the basis of the broadcasts, will agree that in the main they were in very fine language, that there was nothing of a blasphemous nature and that they were the kind of thing that is heard daily in the classrooms of our colleges.

The only suggestion I would make is one that as a matter of fact was made also by the hon. member for Eglinton. I would suggest that when topics of that type are discussed on the air by scientists or others and they come to conclusions which may not be the opinion of a majority or even a large minority of the people of Canada, at the end of that same series of broadcasts an opportunity should be given to put the other side of the case. I may say that I listen with a great deal of interest to many different types of broadcasts. I enjoy the religious programs on Sunday afternoon. Some of them are distinctly doctrinal. They speak of the doctrines of the various churches and are of great interest. I have listened to a series of broadcasts by eminent clergymen of the Roman Catholic church, my own church which is the Anglican church, the Baptist church and the Presbyterian church, on a recent Sunday evening series dealing with the development of Christian thought, and have enjoyed them very much.

I think all sides of these questions should be presented to the people of Canada in order that we may arrive at some maturity in our thought. As I say, the only proviso I would make is that where something of a very controversial nature is being discussed an opportunity should be given for someone to reply. In connection with the four—I think that is the number—broadcasts by Dr. Hoyle of Cambridge university on the nature of the universe, which have been under criticism, at the end of that series of broadcasts a Roman Catholic priest I believe from St. Michael's college in Toronto replied to the position taken by Dr. Hoyle from the religious and Christian point of view.

I think it is perfectly satisfactory when that is done. I am happy to know that the church to which I belong, the Anglican church in Canada, held a meeting of its bishops and chancellors a short time ago who came to the unanimous conclusion that broadcasts of the type that have been under criticism should be permitted, indeed encouraged, provided that an opportunity for criticism is given. That was also the position taken by the United Church of Canada. I was interested to see that the Prairie Messenger, a paper which circulates widely in Saskatchewan and which is published by the Benedictine Fathers in that province, took a similar position in an editorial. That was the position taken by that great and influential Roman Catholic order. The same position was taken by the Canadian council of churches.

If we are to have freedom of speech on the air opportunity must be given for the airing of views with which some of us may disagree from time to time, always provided that an opportunity is given for the making of an adequate reply. In these days when freedom of speech is so essential we must beware lest we fall into the trap of limiting the freedom of speech we now have.

I do not know the political views of some of the commentators who have been criticized, and I was surprised to hear tonight that Matthew Halton was left of centre. I have listened to him on many occasions and have always thought he was pretty objective in his remarks. As I pass across the country I have been told by Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F.'ers, Social Crediters and people of every shade of opinion that the one commentator they have enjoyed over the years is Matthew Halton. He has been acclaimed by various broadcasting authorities, both in North America and overseas, as being one of the ablest broadcasters anywhere in the world. I do not know most of the others well enough to say much about them, although I have listened to them with a great deal of interest.

I am glad provision is to be made for the financing of the corporation. I believe that if the house approves the suggestion made as to financing more adequate programs will be available. I hope that will be so. I hope also that a greater limit will be placed on the amount of advertising over the air. I did not bring with me this evening the copy of Time of December 3 which I saw a few days ago, and which outlined the amounts spent on advertising by some of the big corporations in the United States. I remember that one was spending $43 million a year on advertising. One of the toothpaste and soap organizations was spending around $16 million a year.

People think they get their radio programs free over the private stations, but they do not. They pay for them in the soap, in the toothpaste, in the sausages, in the soup, in almost everything they buy. They pay through the nose for those things advertised on the various stations, including the private stations and those of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We would not buy some of these products at all if they were not constantly named and drummed into our ears hour after hour over the radio and constantly kept before our eyes in the various newspapers and other publications that we see. No wonder we pay 83 cents for a tube of toothpaste that I am told costs 9 or 10 or 12 cents to make and package. We pay dearly for radio programs through advertising.

May I say a word about television. Like my hon. friend I spent a most interesting day at Montreal looking over the headquarters of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think all Canadians can be proud of those headquarters at Montreal. I hope that with the additional funds we are proposing to appropriate through this bill the facilities in other places like Toronto, Winnipeg and elsewhere will be improved.

I repeat that we can be proud of what we saw in Montreal. We can be proud of the people who are doing the job in Montreal and across the country. There is a fine staff of young men and women who have entered this new field which has been developed over the last twenty years, and who are doing a competent and splendid job in radio broadcasting.

I think what interested us most on this visit was the television. We had the opportunity to see how far the corporation had gone in its preparations to give television to this country. I marvelled first at the intricacy of the equipment required both for radio and television. We sometimes speak of literacy as though it were merely the ability to write and perhaps develop our mental faculties in a literary way, but I sometimes feel most illiterate in another sense when I visit places of this description and see the intricate machinery and equipment with which many of these younger people have to work. It is all dutch to me, if I may put it that way. What these people are doing in Montreal is a great credit to them and to Canada.

Who is going to give us television? The hon. member for Eglinton would like to see the private stations take over television and give us presumably the kind of television they are getting in the United States. If that were done it would be a punishment upon all the people of Canada for the negligence of this House of Commons at the present time. I do not want to see our people undergo the kind of punishment they are getting in the United States from the private telecasting organizations. I have noticed statements that have appeared in certain responsible newspapers, not only those which support the government but those which ordinarily support the friends of the hon. member for Eglinton. The Ottawa Journal has the reputation of being a Conservative paper. An editorial in tonight's issue deals with a brief presented a few days ago by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in which they alleged to represent 100,000 businessmen in this country. They urged that an opportunity be given to private organizations to go into television. However, the Journal questions that statement; indeed, it makes the suggestion that if a vote were taken of those 100,000 persons it might be found that the majority would disapprove of the chamber's brief presented to the government in relation to television. I am convinced that our people would rather wait a little while than have the kind of television inflicted upon them that we find to a large extent in the United States. I believe the Massey commission was very forthright, and indeed very wise, in the recommendation it made. If one will read the sections in the Massey report at pages 301, 302 and 303, where the reasons for the recommendations are given, one finds the recommendations in these terms:

> That no private television broadcasting stations be licensed until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has available national television programs and that all private stations be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

They also submitted:

> That direction and control of television broadcasting in Canada continue to be vested in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.
> That the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation proceed with plans for the production of television programs in French and English and for national coverage by kinescope recordings or by any other practicable means.

The commission is most anxious that television shall be safeguarded. It is true that today there are a number of television sets in Canada. You find them in the Niagara peninsula, in Toronto, and other places near the United States border. I am quite sure that those who have these sets would agree with me that many of the programs emanating from the United States are third or fourth rate. In the evening a great many of the programs consist of wrestling or boxing matches which are easily televised, and indeed are televised very well. But in Canada we would like to see something a little more —I hate to use the word—cultural than that sort of thing. I should like to say that I believe we are wise to wait a while, and I do not agree with the hon. member for Eglinton in saying that this is a policy of government. I like to think of the policy with regard to radio and television as a policy of this parliament. Effective public control was the policy of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and it was the policy of the succeeding government under Right Hon. Mr. King. No fundamental change was made. It is the policy that has been consistently pursued, no matter what government has been in power. Consequently I should like to see the hon.

members of the house take pride in this as their broadcasting system, their television system; the broadcasting system of this parliament of Canada, and not of one section of this house or of any political party.

I hope that one day we may have the country covered by television. When one sees the equipment we saw in Montreal the other day, and realizes that to put television over will cost millions, not hundreds of thousands of dollars, one can realize the difficulties. The very mobile unit which we saw on the floor costs about $100,000. When you think of all the other equipment, the cost of operation and all the rest of it, it will run into the millions of dollars. As a matter of fact we were told that it takes 40 hours of preparation and rehearsal to produce a half hour program. I believe it takes seven times as many people as are engaged in the production of a radio program. When you look at those figures you begin to realize the costliness of this operation.

If television did get into private hands the organizations that could put on television programs would have to be very wealthy indeed. If you relied on advertising only, then the wealthiest corporations in Canada would be the only ones who could afford to advertise. Resale price maintenance would be nothing to the monopoly you would create if radio advertising did take care of television, because only the most powerful nation-wide organizations who were prepared to spend millions in advertising could take advantage of those facilities. Consequently I am one of those who believe that the Massey commission was right in its recommendations that we should proceed slowly, and that we should make this a Canadian effort. We should try to provide both our English and French speaking people with television as quickly as possible, but we should take every precaution to see that television is used for entertainment, for education, but most of all to promote the consciousness of Canada, our Canadian way of life, and our Canadian culture, and not to sell this country down the river to our friends to the south.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I hope I can finish what I have to say before 10 o'clock. Two or three weeks ago I was out in my constituency and I met one of my friends. He put out his hand and said "Well, how is beef Hansell?" I looked at him and said "What does that mean?" He said he had read a piece in the paper not so long ago which said I was the man with all the beefs. I want to say that I am not any different from anyone else when it comes to expressing myself. If I have a complaint to make, I am no different from anyone else, and if I have a compliment to express once in a while I like to be fair and have what the C.B.C. calls a balance of opinion.

I wish to say that I am not an opponent of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I may be a critic at times, but I am not an opponent. I believe we should retain the institution we have, which is known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In many respects they are doing a good job. I will say this, that the air is comparatively clean, and the programs are programs of which we can be proud. Should the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation need a little money in their attempt to do a good job, I am in favour of giving them some reasonable amount. However, I do have a beef, and it is the same beef I have had for a good many years. Once again, Mr. Chairman, I take the opportunity that is afforded hon. members of parliament to express their dislikes as well as their likes.

Somehow or other considerable criticism has been levelled at the corporation in recent weeks because of a certain series of broadcasts that were put over the network by certain individuals known as psychiatrists, philosophers, and I believe you could use one or two other names. Since that criticism has arisen and some publicity has been given to it, the members of the committee and perhaps members of the house as well have received representations from various sources deploring what they claim to be a move on the part of some to restrict freedom of speech. I believe every one of the representations that have come to my desk has specifically mentioned the fact that we are in danger of restriction of free speech. Yet not one of those briefs indicates who has ever advocated the restriction of free speech. I will challenge them on the floor of the house to tell us who it is—whether it is an organization, an individual or a group of individuals—that is advocating the restriction of free speech. I believe that if they properly appraised the criticism they will find that those whom they suppose to be advocating restriction are in reality advocating a wider freedom of speech; because what most of us are advocating is that not only should there be a balance of opinion but that, when opinion is expressed, opportunity should be given for that opinion to be answered. That is not the restriction of free speech. It is an amplification of the principle of free speech.

I have some criticism to offer in respect of these matters. One of the representations that has come through the mail to us makes special reference to the C.B.C. white paper with which I think we are all familiar. These representations deplore what they surmise may be some interference with this white paper. They want the principles involved in that white paper to continue and to be established. I am not going to criticize the white paper particularly, but I am going to analyse it a little and expound something which I trust will be a bit thought-provoking. This particular representation goes on to say:

According to the C.B.C. white paper on political and controversial broadcasting which has been approved by parliament in the past, the basic principles of this national policy are:

I am going to read them, and I am going to comment on them as I go along.

1. The air belongs to the people—

May I interject here that I have some reservation with respect to that assertion. I do not know that it does belong to the people. At least I will say that phrase "it belongs to the people" is a socialist phrase. But let me read the whole section:

The air belongs to the people, who are entitled to hear the principal points of view on all questions of importance.

The question I want to ask here is this. Who is to determine what the principal points of view are, and who is to determine what the questions of importance are? Another thing I am going to suggest is this. If the air belongs to the people, and if they are entitled to hear the principal points of view on all questions of importance, I am going to ask this question: Are they entitled to hear it at the taxpayers' expense?

2. The air must not fall under the control of any individuals or groups influential by reason of their wealth or special position.

I want to emphasize the last words "or special position" because the air does fall under the control of individuals with special position. It falls under the control of the talks department which is composed of people who are in a special position, for they are the ones who formulate the programs and decide on the people who must take part in opinion broadcasts.

3. The right to answer is inherent in the democratic doctrine of free speech.

I believe that; but we have not the right to answer over the national networks in this country. Someone has a right only if that someone is chosen by those in a special position and he is asked: Would you mind giving this series a little balance? Will you, along with others, take part in this series of talks?

[Mr. Hansell.]

I am saying that the right to answer which is inherent in the democratic doctrine of free speech is not a principle that is being followed in the opinion broadcasts on our national networks.

I now come to another thing:

4. Freedom of speech and the full interchange of opinion are among the principal safeguards of free institutions.

Once again I am going to say that there is no full interchange of opinion. It is only as full as the talks department care to make it. I know that it is not just the easiest thing in the world to arrange, and I am not harshly criticizing those four principles, because I recognize the fact that you have to put in there something to guide those who are in the special position of being able to say who is to take part in opinion broadcasts.

I now want to say just a word or two with respect to the particular series of broadcasts that have come in for some considerable criticism, and I am happy that this is so. I believe the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should also be glad, because that is the only way they are able to know what the people are thinking about. I want to say one thing. In my opinion—and it may differ from that of a good many—the broadcasts that were given in that particular series were anti-Christian. I am not wanting to cast any reflection upon the individuals who gave them. They may be good men and honest men. They may be speaking their own personal convictions. But in my opinion they ran contrary to what I would regard as being in the best interests of our Christian way of life. Surely we can put down as one great solid factor that the foundation upon which any nation can be built and made great is the foundation of Christian principles. Surely we can put that down as one solid, indisputable fact. Surely we want to build a great nation of God-fearing people. Surely we want to build a great nation whose people will recognize our dependence upon almighty God, the Creator and the Redeemer of men and of nations. Surely we want to do that. Very well, then. "If the foundations be destroyed, what will the righteous do?" That last phrase is a quotation from holy writ. Therefore I say that even though we may desire to have a properly balanced program of opinion broadcasts, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be very careful lest that institution be used to ultimately destroy the foundations upon which any great nation is built, the foundations which will make any nation great.

I wonder whether I might just refer to one or two of these broadcasts in question.

I am going to take the broadcast given by Dr. Brock Chisholm. I know what is going to be said. It is said all the time, as soon as you mention somebody's name. "Oh, well, now, you are going to slur some character; you are going to do this, you are going to do that. Let us not bring personalities into this thing." That is the cry that goes up. Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that any man who enters public life opens himself to public criticism. Some of us know that. I am going to say right now that no election campaign has ever been fought where public men, in some phase or another, have not been attacked. That is the natural process, because men in public life are responsible to the public and express themselves, or have opinions that are in the interests of, or in the disinterest of, the public; we can expect criticism.

I have never met Dr. Chisholm. I suppose he is a charming gentleman, a good man, a good citizen. I am not disparaging the person at all, but I am going to read one or two things he said in his broadcast. I cannot take time to quote too much. The broadcast, to start with, has as its theme "Man's last enemy, himself." He starts off in the introductory remarks with a very familiar quotation, "Man, know thyself." His broadcast is designed to bring to his listeners the important theme that man must know himself. Very well. Who is to teach man himself? Who is to teach man what he is? Who is to teach man so that man can know himself? We do not read very far in the broadcast until we come to the point which he illustrates, namely that if anything goes wrong with the washing machine, or the refrigerator does not work properly, you call in an expert to do whatever needs to be done. He goes on to say that the same principle is involved in this theme. Therefore if you want to know yourself you have to bring in the experts. He never tells us who the experts are; oh, no. I should like to know who they are. Perhaps he regards himself as one, and I have no quarrel with him if he does, but I am going to say this. I will tell you who I think the experts are. He deals with the matter of child psychology. The greatest experts in the world are the Christian mothers and fathers who bring up their children in the admonition of almighty God. They are the experts. Give me the kind of parents who will bring up their children in Christian teaching, with the devotion and affection those parents give to children; give me those, and I will put them alongside the Chisholms, the Freuds and the Camerons, or anyone of their kind, and I will guarantee that the nation will be stronger. The nations of the world will be stronger if we pay a little more attention to these kinds of experts.

What do the experts say, after all? I will tell you. They say: "Come along here. You are a man. I am going to teach you to know yourself. I will take your brain and put it on the table, and I will begin to dissect it. I will take your personality, and I will tell you all about your personality. I will dissect that, too. If you want to give me your gizzard I will put that on the table, and I will begin to dissect that, too. And after I have them all dissected I will put them back again and I will make a new man out of you, so that after I get through you will be able to understand yourself." That is just about the way they work. Well, by the time I got through reading this broadcast I made a little note on the bottom, and that little note in my handwriting is this: "I don't know myself any better than I did before I read the broadcast."

Let me go on a little further, Mr. Chairman. I notice that it is nearly ten o'clock, but if I may just have a few more minutes I will be through.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hansell: There is another part in this broadcast that I do not like, and I should like to mention it. Dr. Chisholm refers to certain things, and he gives an illustration. He is talking about the rate of increase in world population, and he says it has jumped to about 68,000 a day. He then asks this question:

> Are you among the hundreds of millions of people who are avoiding this frightening fact? Are you among those whose opinion, based on some authoritarian prejudice, prevents delegates to the United Nations bodies, even the population commission, from tackling this problem?

That leaves it in the air. Who is this prejudiced authoritarian who seeks to channel and control men's opinions? He does not say. Perhaps I know to whom he refers, but I do say that to put that in a broadcast and pour it into the ears of several million people is not fair. There are some people in the world who, because of their Christian concepts, have a great deal of respect for those who are in religious authority, and I believe that such phraseology is just taking advantage of them.

I might go on. He spends a good deal of time giving illustrations about the way parents should teach their children in respect of their bowel movements. I am not going to have anything to say about that, but once again I am saying that I do not think you can teach a mother and father very much about their children in that respect. He goes on to show how you can approach it from an angle which will have a particular reaction upon the child after he grows up. You can take that for what it is worth. I do not think it is worth very much. Then he goes on in his broadcast to talk about a child's sexual equipment. Well, some may smile. Some may say, "Why bring that up in parliament?" All I am going to say is: Why pour it into the ears of a few million people?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: Yet he gets paid for doing it. I will not say any more on that. I know we are anxious to get through.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: I will not talk long.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Hansell: No. I will not keep the house longer in this respect. If hon. members do not wish to go on tonight, I will adjourn the debate. But perhaps we might go on for five minutes more.

An hon. Member: Finish.

Mr. Casselman: You are asking for it. Let him give it to you.

Mr. Hansell: What I was going to say is this—

Mr. Fleming: There are others who will speak on this section.

Mr. Hansell: We believe in free speech. We like free speech. But let us not run away with the notion that the only place we can have free speech is over the radio networks of Canada. We are told the air belongs to the people. Well, it belongs only as far as one's voice will carry, and always has. We have no objection to a man gathering a few people around him, if he has an idea he would like to propound. There is nothing to prevent that idea from taking hold. There is nothing to prevent those people saying, "It is good; we think you should expound it further. We will call in a few more of our friends."

There is nothing to prevent a man from gathering a few supporters around him. That is not very difficult. And if his idea is worth anything it is not difficult for him to get on the air, even though in a small way. His friends will support him. He can start out on a small station at very small expense, and give voice to his idea.

That is free speech. And if it catches on, then some other stations will want it. Eventually the idea will become well known, but he does not have to express his ideas at the expense of the taxpayers. Almost anyone can get on the air in a small way if he has something worthwhile to say.

An hon. Member: Did you hear Mr. Fair last night?

Mr. Hansell: We must not think the only place free speech can be expressed is over a national network. I do not know whether those in this series of broadcasts who have been criticized take that view or not. If the psychiatrists have an idea, let them gather their friends around them. Let them pay for some time on a private station. Then if the idea catches on, let it spread. Someone will want it, in that event. But they should not do it at the taxpayers' expense.

But some of these people look at it differently and will say, "Oh, no; this is different. Here is a multimillion dollar corporation with huge networks capable of reaching millions of people. Why not take advantage of it?" I do not think I am far off the beam when I say the attitude is, "Well, if you pull the right wire, know the right people, and go about it in the right way, eventually you may get on the national networks, at the expense of the taxpayers, and be paid for doing it." That is the way it works.

I do not think I need say anything further. I could go on criticizing all these speeches, but I will reserve what I have to say until we reach other sections of the bill. There are one or two other matters about which I shall have something to say. I have set out my objections, and perhaps what I have said will be accepted as a contribution to the discussion.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue the consideration of Bill No. 17, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936; and then a list of small bills: Bill No. 41, to amend the Dominion Elections Act; Bill No. 42, to amend the National Gallery Act; Bill No. 43, to amend the Civil Service Act; Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act; Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the provision for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces and, if we have time, Bill No. 23, to amend the Government Annuities Act.

It being ten minutes aften ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 13, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INQUIRY AS TO DETAILS OF VISIT TO CANADA IN JANUARY

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on a question of privilege. In view of the fact that we are coming reasonably close, or would appear to be coming reasonably close, to the termination of this special session—and may I say I do not think that should be for some days yet—I would ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to announce to the house any arrangements that have been made for the Prime Minister of Great Britain and those coming with him which may affect members of the house.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No definite arrangements have yet been made. The tentative plan of the prime minister is that he will arrive here on Sunday, January 13. There have been some suggestions as to what his program might be while here but it has not yet been definitely determined.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Second and third reports of standing committee on public accounts.—Mr. Picard.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FOURTH AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the fourth and final report of the special committee which was appointed to consider the procedure of this house. Copies of the report have been distributed to the members. There are quite a few points covered in the report, and if the house would prefer it I will try to explain it. The house might then be able to follow it more easily. The report is in three parts. The first part recommends permanent changes which should be made in the rules at this time. The second part recommends a change which should be tried on an experimental basis next year, and the third part sets out other matters which the committee has considered.

Part I recommends that the hours of sitting should be the same in future as they have been during the latter part of this session with the exception that the dinner recess will be from six o'clock to eight o'clock p.m. There is also a provision that public and private bills will be dealt with on Tuesdays and Fridays from five to six o'clock in the afternoon instead of the former hour, which was from eight to nine o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays. There is also a provision that on one of the days private bills will have priority, and on the other day public bills will have priority. With that report there is a recommendation that the necessary changes in the standing orders should be made immediately.

Part II recommends that the length of speeches should be 30 minutes instead of 40 minutes. However, I should point out that it does not recommend that the change should be made immediately in this rule, but recommends that it be tried out during the next session, or until otherwise ordered.

Part III sets forth other matters which the committee has considered but upon which a recommendation has not been made. The committee considered whether a debate should be allowed on money resolutions when the Speaker is in the chair, and also whether it is necessary for the minister in moving a money resolution to rise in his place and inform the house that the Governor General has been informed of and recommends the resolution to the consideration of the house. The committee considered, too, whether Mr. Speaker should leave the chair on Wednesday when there is a motion to go into supply or committee of ways and means. Hon. members will recall that at the present time, in order for the Speaker to leave the chair on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays to go into supply or ways and means, it is necessary to have a motion. The committee considered also the question as to whether estimates should be referred to a special committee or standing committees of this house. The general question of the structure of house committees was taken into consideration, as well as the question whether or not the rulings made by Mr. Speaker should be subject to appeal. Consideration was given as to whether those who are not limited to time in the length of their speeches should be limited as to time.

I shall read the last paragraph of the report:

> Since your committee has thus far been unable to adopt the final report with respect to these proposals, and since other proposals may be forthcoming, your committee recommends that a similar committee be established as soon as possible after the commencement of the next session to continue the consideration of changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, might it be added to the statement you have given to the house that part I was adopted unanimously by the committee, but part II on division?

Mr. Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps Your Honour could get unanimous consent to have the entire report printed in Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the full report be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The report is as follows:

The select committee appointed on October 9, 1951, to consider, with Mr. Speaker, the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business, begs leave to present its fourth and final report.

Part I.

Your committee recommends that the standing orders of the House of Commons be amended as follows effective on and from the first day of the next session:

(a) Standing order 2 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"2. The house shall meet at 2.30 o'clock p.m. on each sitting day except Friday, when the house shall meet at 2 o'clock p.m. If there is not a quorum at the time of meeting, Mr. Speaker may take the chair and adjourn the house."

(b) Standing order 6 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"6. (1) At 6 o'clock p.m., except on Wednesday and Friday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair until 8 o'clock p.m.

(2) At 6 o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put, and the house will stand adjourned until Thursday.

(3) At 6 o'clock p.m. on Friday, Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put, and the house will stand adjourned until Monday.

(c) Standing order 7 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"7. At 10 o'clock p.m. on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday (unless the closure rule is in operation) the proceedings under consideration will be interrupted, and Mr. Speaker shall adjourn the house without question put. Any proceeding not disposed of at the end of the sitting will stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the stage at which its progress was interrupted."

(d) Standing order 15 is amended as follows:

"(i) In paragraph (3), the words '(From eight to nine o'clock p.m.)' and the words 'Private and public bills, the former having precedence' under the heading 'Tuesday (Government Day)' are deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(From five to six o'clock p.m.) Public and private bills, the former having precedence."

"(ii) In paragraph (3), the words '(From eight to nine o'clock p.m.)' immediately before the words 'Private and public bills' under the heading 'Friday (Government Day)', are deleted and the following substituted therefor: '(From five to six o'clock p.m.)'."

[Mr. Speaker.]

(iii) Paragraph (4) of standing order 15 is amended by deleting the words "9 o'clock" and substituting the words "6 o'clock."

Part II.

Your committee also recommends that, as an experiment for the next session, unless and until otherwise ordered, standing order 37 be considered as amended by the deletion of the words "forty minutes" as they appear therein and the substitution therefor of the words "thirty minutes," so that standing order 37 would for the duration of the next session have effect as if it were a sessional order reading as follows:

"37. No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "No Confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than thirty minutes at a time in any debate."

Part III.

Your committee has also given consideration to the following proposals suggested as possible means of expediting the dispatch of public business:

(1) That when the order of the day is read for the house to go into committee of the whole on a resolution preceding a money bill, Mr. Speaker do leave the chair at once without question put.

(2) That the practice of announcing in the house that His Excellency the Governor General recommends a money resolution to the consideration of the house be discontinued.

(3) That whenever on Wednesdays government business has precedence, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without question put when the order is read for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

(4) That the estimates be referred to a committee on estimates or to other standing or special committees of the house.

(5) That the committee structure of the house be re-examined and reorganized.

(6) That the rulings of Mr. Speaker be made conclusive and not subject to appeal.

(7) That the speeches of those not now limited as to time in standing order 37 be limited as to time.

Since your committee has thus far been unable to adopt a final report with respect to these proposals, and since other proposals may be forthcoming, your committee recommends that a similar committee be established as soon as possible after the commencement of the next session to continue the consideration of changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business.

Respectfully submitted,

W. Ross Macdonald,

Speaker of the House of Commons, Chairman.

Mr. Drew: May I ask what the procedure is by which it is proposed to adopt or otherwise deal with this report which has been read?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): The moment we go into routine motions I shall move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris), that by leave of the house we refer it to the committee as a whole, but upon the passing of that motion we would not proceed this day with the study of these changes. If we receive the unanimous consent of the house we shall be in committee of the whole tomorrow or Saturday. If we do not receive that consent we shall have to put a notice of motion in Votes and Proceedings and it would come up on Saturday.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be well to put a notice of motion on the order paper, because so far as a great number of the members are concerned this report has just come before us. I may as well say now that there will be a little debate concerning certain features of the matter when it does come up.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps we could discuss that on the order for motions because I have a few reasons to give, but if the opposition does not agree we will have to put a notice of motion in Votes and Proceedings.

MOTION FOR REFERENCE OF REPORT TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): In all cases where substantial amendments to the standing orders of the house have been proposed in the report of a special committee appointed for that purpose, it has been the practice to consider the report in committee of the whole, and when the committee of the whole reports to concur in such report. In most cases when the report of the special committee was presented the motion to consider the report of the committee of the whole was moved without notice, either immediately or at some specified date. Concurrence in the report of the committee of the whole was moved immediately it was received, and in no case was any objection raised to this procedure.

At pages 702 and 703 of Beauchesne's third edition there will be found a Speaker's ruling dealing with a motion for concurrence in a supply resolution, which ruling is to the effect that it does not come within debatable motions under rule 17(a), now standing order No. 38. It is assumed that this would apply equally to motions for sending reports to committee of the whole. Now, the standing orders were amended in 1876, 1906, 1910, 1927 and 1940. What I have just said applies to those previous occasions. I know that I have to ask for unanimous consent of the house, but in moving this motion we have no intention of debating these changes in the standing orders this day. This procedure would just avoid the notice of motion. The tenor of my remarks today would, I believe, be sufficient notice that we intend to bring this matter forward as soon as the delays are over.

I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris):

That the house resolve itself into committee of the whole immediately to consider the report of the select committee appointed on October 9, 1951, for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am as ready as anyone in this house to follow any course that is consistent with the proper dispatch of the business of this house and to expedite the proceedings. On the other hand, I do not intend to let the natural desire of every one of us, to have adequate time before Christmas day to make our own personal arrangements, to interfere in any way with what seems to be the best methods of dealing with business in this house. The suggestions that are before us on the one hand contemplate changes that have not been put in detail before the house in advance of this report, and it is not only the points that are raised but the points that are not raised that may be under consideration. For that reason, recognizing the fact it may well be that there would be some advantage in the members having an extended opportunity to consider this with others, I do not feel I could consent to this motion.

Mr. Speaker: If there is not unanimous consent, I cannot put the motion.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Coldwell be substituted for that of Mr. Knowles on the special committee on radio broadcasting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR AUTHORIZATION TO MAKE CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, TO ISSUE SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures not exceeding $55,581,816 for the purpose of meeting the commitments that have been incurred by the national railway system in the year 1951 in respect of new equipment; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of securities, not including any securities issued to secure temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance, outstanding at any time shall not exceed $55,581,816; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $55,581,816 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS ON AND AFTER DECEMBER 15

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, December 15, 1951, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the hours of sitting and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Thursdays.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ABOUT REGISTRATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will he please bring us up to date on the question of registrations under the Old Age Security Act?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I may say that the progress which I noted in the number of registrations a few days ago has been continued. There are over 340,000 applications that have come in, in addition to those already on the old age pension rolls, and which are being transferred from provincial to federal lists. To summarize my statement I think I should say that over 92 per cent of the expected total are in seven weeks before the date of payment.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

INFRASTRUCTURE AGREEMENT—DIVISION OF ESTIMATED COSTS AND EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on November 27 I directed a question to the Prime Minister, as reported at page 1356 of Hansard, in connection with our commitments under NATO. On that occasion the Prime Minister said:

I shall have to take that question as a notice. The hon. member will appreciate that I shall have to communicate with the NATO council because it is understood that any information about their decisions has to be authorized by the council. I shall be glad to make available to the house all the information that can be published.

[Mr. Abbott.]

I would ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to inform us with regard to the extent and the nature of the commitments under NATO.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, I am not, Mr. Speaker. I communicated immediately with our high commissioner in London who is the Canadian member of the council of deputies. I was informed by him that no information in that regard had been authorized to be published by the council and that the understanding was that none of the members would give any of that information without the general consent of the group. I can add that there have not yet been any definite commitments with respect to the expenditure which will have to be made for the purposes of what was referred to, I think, in the hon. gentleman's question, as the infrastructure or at least what is generally described as the infrastructure. That matter is still under consideration, and there has as yet been no determination as to the definite portion of the expenditure each of the members of NATO would have to assume. This is also a matter which is connected with the report that is to be considered, I think it is tomorrow, in Paris, by what is known as the T.C.C.

Mr. Abbott: The draft report.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, the draft report. The temporary council committee has that matter before it tomorrow, and I would assume that after this report has been made public it will be much easier to have all the members of the council agree upon the extent of further information that can be made public.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RADAR SCREEN—REFERENCE TO ARTICLES IN MONTREAL "HERALD"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. It relates to a series of three articles which appeared on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday in the Montreal Herald, in regard to our radar screen. It would seem that the articles are of a factual nature and they give sufficient detail to require that some explanation should be given to us as to whether they accurately interpret the real state of our radar screen in this country today. I would ask the minister if he is prepared to give us some explanation of the situation, having regard to what those articles have stated.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the articles and I should think that any explanation of them should be made by the publisher. I will be glad, however, to see if anything should be added.

Mr. Drew: As to the latter part of that remark, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that the minister has not seen the articles, that is of course an effective answer to any suggestion that he should answer at this time. But when he reads the articles I am sure he will realize that they are of such a nature that they do not leave the responsibility on the publisher to give an explanation. Either they are correct or they are not. If they are correct, an explanation is owing to this house.

Mr. Claxton: I will be glad to look at the articles.

WHEAT

AVAILABILITY OF ELEVATOR SPACE—DRYING FACILITIES—ALLOCATION OF CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he in a position to give a further report in connection with the availability of elevator space for wheat on the prairies? Is he able to say whether anything will be done by the wheat board to provide additional drying facilities for the damp wheat that is on the prairies? In particular, what is the situation now with regard to the allocation of cars in those areas that up to now have had a shortage?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The movement of grain, particularly during the past thirty days, has been very favourable indeed. We have succeeded in getting the insurance period for shipping on the great lakes extended, and grain is still moving down the lakes at a time during which navigation is normally closed. This has improved space in the terminals at the lakehead. Stocks are down to about 32 million bushels at the moment, and grain is moving forward from the country in volume that is unusual for this time of the year, and will continue to do so for a period.

Some three weeks ago orders were put out that the railroads should concentrate on points where the congestion has been chronic for some time. That has been done, and I think there are very few points on the prairies that have not had a fair movement of grain. If there are such points at the moment they will receive immediate attention from the transport controller.

The problem of tough and damp grain is more serious this year even than last year. We were able to deal with the situation last year without any loss of grain through spoilage. This year the problem is much more difficult. It is being met in part by marketing tough grain as tough grain, which we have been able to do in a few countries, and we are concentrating on the drying of damp grain. It is impossible to bring in new drying equipment for terminal elevators which would be effective this year. We have looked into that, and by the time the driers are manufactured and installed the season will be over. So far as we can foresee I doubt whether there will be any addition to the drying capacity, but I can assure my hon. friend that the drying capacity is being used to the limit and will continue to be so used until the damp grain is disposed of.

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN INSTALLATION OF MICROPHONE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What progress has been made with the design, construction and installation of a microphone system in the house?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should give a report—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This matter comes under the jurisdiction of His Honour the Speaker. I will not hesitate to give a report very shortly—

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt the minister, I should like to assure him that, along with other hon. members, I also would like to hear a report.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): As Your Honour knows, this has been a very long-drawn-out question in the House of Commons. We have not yet reached unanimity amongst hon. members, but we are—

Some hon. Members: In what way?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, some of them would like to remain in statu quo; while others would like to have some system. Our difficulty is trying to test a system. There are so many opinions as to what system should be tried out in the House of Commons that I spend hours myself thinking over which system I would approve of. But the report made by Mr. Speaker last session, from the committee which sat on the question, recommended that we instal here a system similar to the one which is in the United Kingdom parliament buildings at Westminster. After that report, which was agreed to by the house, we did get in contact with the representatives of the Tannoy company of Britain. They have the specifications of the system over there, and we are trying to negotiate an agreement or a contract with them under which they would instal that system here, maintain it in a good state of repair and operate it. That is the way they have proceeded in the British House of Commons, but as yet an agreement has not been signed.

The public knows that there is no other firm in our country that could instal a similar system—and I have looked up the dictionary to find out what the word "similar" means—and that could make a bid or an offer to the department to instal that system, unless they secure from us the specifications of that system in Britain. We have not those specifications, and I do not think I should send an expert over to Britain to get the specifications without an assurance that we would get them, because they belong to that company.

These negotiations are going on and we really hope that some day they will sign the agreement, and proceed to instal the system. I cannot go any further than that.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister one question? After the agreement has been executed, how long does the minister think it will take to have the system in operation in the house?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I believe that it would still take some time because they would have to do all the work of installing the system, and have their own people to operate and maintain it. We propose to lease the system from that company, not purchase it, because we would not have the people to operate it or maintain it. In the agreement we are trying to lease that system so that we would not have trouble. If any trouble arose Mr. Speaker would attend to it with those who were working on the console or at the table.

Mr. Coldwell: Is there any correspondence in relation to this matter that could be placed before the house? Many of us were under the impression that the recommendation made last session was to be implemented, and many of us would like to know just what is holding up this matter. Is there any correspondence in relation to it?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I know the hon. gentleman is right. We are supposed to implement the system, but it takes two parties to do that.

Mr. Coldwell: I know.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It takes two parties to agree before we can get this agreement signed with that company. I cannot say when it will be signed. It is a complicated agreement that has been prepared. I will look into the file and if there is correspondence I will certainly table the documents.

Mr. Drew: May I suggest for the assistance of the Minister of Public Works that it is not necessary for him to send someone over to England to get the specifications. Canada House is reasonably well staffed with a competent staff—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not with engineers.

Mr. Drew: It should be possible for them to approach the appropriate officials over there to obtain the specifications. May I say in the most friendly way, because the minister is always so genial, that what he has just done is strangely reminiscent of that term used so often by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) as a diversionary activity.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps I am under a false impression, Mr. Speaker, but when a company devises plans and specifications I cannot see how the government can request them to furnish us with those plans or specifications. That is why we are dealing with the company. If they were general specifications we would ask for tenders, but I remind the house that in the past we did ask for tenders for a system here and there were six tenders, if I recall correctly, and we chose the lowest tender, and then we had to drop that because many people were not satisfied with the system proposed. Then Mr. Speaker went to Britain and made a report himself concerning that system.

Mr. Adamson: I just want to say that I was a member of the committee that sat and discussed this matter. During the sittings a transatlantic telephone conversation took place between the chief architect of the department and the company, and the intimation was to the effect that the work could be started within a period of between four and six months. As a matter of fact, I was rather surprised that it had not been installed for this session.

[Later:]

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) what person or persons in his department is or are responsible for the installation of a loud-speaker system in the House of Commons, and whether we may expect it at an early date?

CIGARETTES

REPORTED SHORTAGES OF DOMESTIC BRANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he aware of complaints by retail tobacconists that the cigarette manufacturers are rationing popular brands of cigarettes and so creating shortages of supply? If so, what action does the minister propose to take to assure a proper supply of good Canadian cigarettes?

An hon. Member: Roll your own.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think this is somewhat outside the duties of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have heard there is a shortage of popular brands of cigarettes in the stores, but I have made no investigation in the matter. I cannot give a statement as to what can be done about it. I understand we are not very popular with the manufacturers of cigarettes; and perhaps they are trying to bring to the attention of the public the suggestion that the situation is not good. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter.

DEFENCE CONTRACTS

ORDERS PLACED BY UNITED STATES IN CANADA AND VICE VERSA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) on Monday, December 10, asked a question as to the total defence purchases in Canada by the United States and the total purchases by Canada in the United States. I have a report here which I would be glad to send to him, or to table, whichever he would prefer.

However, the short answer is that official orders placed by the government of Canada in the United States amount to $502,739,872, whereas orders placed officially with Canada through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, by the United States, amount to $158,-123,147. The memorandum which accompanies this information points out that the reason for this is that the Canadian purchases were made off the shelf on articles immediately required to equip our troops pursuant to the decision to equip with Canadian types. Whereas, orders placed by the United States are, in part, token orders to provide for tooling, with the understanding that those orders will be followed by production orders when tooling is completed.

I might add that the department is not unhappy about a situation which, on the basis of firm orders placed, seems to be very much out of balance.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the minister said the other day that the figure he has just given would be merely for government purchases. Is he in a position to estimate whether the disappointing disparity, which he has partly explained, would be made up in any way by private orders; or has the minister no knowledge whatever of those?

Mr. Howe: I have some knowledge of them. I know of substantial orders which have been placed, more particularly by American companies with their Canadian subsidiaries. I know of very substantial orders, but I have no knowledge of the total amount of those orders. I could only guess that they would amount to fully as much as the business that has been placed through Canadian Commercial Corporation. I would say it would be, perhaps, another $150 million.

TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

FILLING OF VACANCY ON THE BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Will the vacancy on the board of transport commissioners resulting from the resignation of Mr. W. J. Patterson be filled at an early date? Is it the intention of the government to appoint a western Canadian to this vacancy?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say when the vacancy on the board of transport commissioners will be filled, or from what part of Canada the incumbent will come. But when the decision is taken the government will announce it.

CIVIL SERVICE

DECEMBER 24 AND 31—QUESTION AS TO HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether the announcement made by the Secretary of State on December 5 to the effect that Monday, December 24, and Monday, December 31, will be observed as civil service holidays, under certain considerations, applies to prevailing rate employees such as the staff at the printing bureau?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to inquire into that. I am not in a position to say just how it will apply in the various services. It is something that, in a general way, is left to the discretion of the deputy ministers, to see that the essential public services are not interfered with by the manner in which these holidays are taken and observed.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the Prime Minister would answer later.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall make inquiry about the conditions in connection with the prevailing rate employees. But I would imagine there would be differences with respect to them, as necessarily there will be differences with respect to the classified civil servants.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

MANITOBA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA FLOODS—ASSISTANCE GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. On Monday, December 3, a question standing in my name was passed as an order for return. Would the minister make an effort to get that information to me before the session closes?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yes, indeed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF GOVERNORS, PROVIDE PENSIONS AND FURTHER GRANTS

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 17, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936—Mr. McCann—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—"Minister".

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some observations. First of all, let me say I support wholeheartedly the point of view expressed yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Owing to the lateness of the session I shall not take the time to make any lengthy observations such as otherwise I would have made.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I must say, however, that my correspondence, and contacts I have with large numbers of people in my constituency, indicate a keen interest in this bill, and a general interest in the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Correspondence I have received recently, as a result of study of the measure by the committee, shows that there is a general appreciation of the services rendered by the C.B.C., and the work it is trying to do. Therefore I am safe in saying that there is general support from people in all parts of my constituency, so far as the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concerned.

In a constituency such as that of Kootenay West, there are many who to a great extent depend upon radio for their entertainment. They live in isolated mining communities and logging camps. Among their number are prospectors, trappers and the like. On more than one occasion I have visited trappers at elevations of 5,000 or 6,000 feet, living at perhaps a distance of twenty-five miles from a neighbour. They have told me how much they appreciate receiving the C.B.C. news and other features of the corporation, when they can tune it in.

Those people working in the hills, in the mines, on the traplines and as prospectors, as well as those in the lumber camps, are entitled to receive more consideration because of the work they are doing and also because of their isolation. They are performing an important service for the benefit of the country in isolated places.

I now take advantage of this opportunity to raise a question I have brought to the attention of the house on several earlier occasions, and that was brought to the attention of the committee which sat prior to the one the sittings of which have just concluded. I wish to say that the concern of many listeners in both Kootenay West and Kootenay East is that better facilities be provided so that they may hear C.B.C. programs at all times. I have received a number of letters recently about this matter which no doubt were stimulated by the investigation into this bill by the committee, and I have had the matter brought to my attention by a good number of organizations from time to time.

There are two local stations in the area. The station at Trail is an excellent community station and I understand last year it gave something in the neighbourhood of $20,000 worth of free time to the community it serves. There is another station at Nelson about which I used to receive many complaints. In fairness to that station I must say that it has improved its services. These two stations are low in power and, generally speaking, can only be depended upon to serve a limited area. A large number of the people in the northern sections of the Kootenays and in the isolated valleys are dependent to a great extent upon United States stations for their entertainment and news. This poor reception, most likely caused by the topography of the country, is particularly bad after nightfall. We are able to get some C.B.C. programs during the daytime from Trail, Kelowna, at times from Calgary and Vancouver, but after dark we are completely isolated from Canadian programs and must depend upon the United States stations.

As one who lives in the backwoods miles away from his neighbours I do not like to have to listen to the news according to Sperry's pancake flour, when other people are getting measured and objective news reports from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think the manner in which news broadcasts are given by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is indicative of our national temperament and lack of hysteria in times of crisis. Repeatedly, people in my constituency as well as visitors have told me that they have been impressed by the objective reporting of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As I say, many people have asked why something cannot be done to provide them with an opportunity of hearing our own Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I am of the opinion that the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has some knowledge of my constituency, but officials in various departments have been inclined to look upon the Kootenays as being somewhat in the backwoods and possessing only a small population. Whatever their views may have been in the past, that situation has changed. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company are spending over $30 million on new developments. The mines in the area are spending another $10 million on new developments. Another $5 million is being spent on transportation and power facilities. Millions of dollars have been invested in saw mills and it is anticipated that an investment of over $70 million will be made within the next year or two in a pulp and paper industry.

All this means a great production of wealth and a large payment of taxes. According to Business Week, the Kootenays pay the largest amount of taxes per capita of any constituency with the exception of Westmount in Montreal. There will be an increased number of people working for the mines, the smelters, the lumbering industry and the future pulp and paper industry. I am making an appeal that something be done for the people of the southern interior of British Columbia in order that they may be able to hear the programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I am not a radio technician, in fact my mechanical ability is almost limited to oiling a wheel barrow, but people who know something about it tell me that we are not going to have satisfactory reception in the interior of British Columbia until a powerful station is located at Kamloops or at some other interior point. On occasion we can hear the Watrous, Saskatchewan station, which is a powerful station, and I am sure that it will require something of that nature to provide better service for the southern interior of British Columbia. I make this appeal to the minister and officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and urge they give consideration to this matter that has concerned so many people in Kootenay West and East for several years, and by so doing, recognize their needs and provide the proper service to that great and important part of this country.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the lateness of the session and the desire of many hon. members to bring it to a rapid conclusion in order to get home for Christmas I cannot resist the opportunity to say a few words on this important matter. It was my privilege to serve on the special committee on broadcasting, and as a new member who has been subjected to many experiences during the past few weeks, I must say that was the most stimulating and interesting experience of all. I have been interested in broadcasting, although perhaps not from the technical standpoint, for some time, and to come to grips with the concrete problems which face Canada in connection with this important matter was, as I say, a most stimulating experience.

I consider it most unfortunate that we should be pressed for time when we are considering this important subject. It seems to me that the whole field of broadcasting requires the maximum time for discussion so that we may clarify some of the confused thinking that obviously is present at the moment. As I took part in the discussions of the special committee I became increasingly aware of that confused thinking.

I consider this a most important topic because of the significance of radio broadcasting as a medium of communication in our complex civilization. Anything that plays a part in the communicating of ideas is significant. As has been the case with many other technological inventions and improvements, the attitude toward radio has been that it is a sort of panacea which will provide a universal solution for all our ills. The feeling seems to be that all you have to do in order to straighten out any problem is to organize broadcasting in the right style, put it on the proper basis and everything will be well.

It was so with newspapers when they first appeared on the scene. It was thought that with the advent of the modern press the problems of democracy would be solved because there would be provided an excellent medium through which public opinion could be moulded. Above all, in a democracy we must be aware of public opinion.

The first bright hopes have been dimmed as we witnessed the increasing power of the yellow press in the hands of such journalists as William Randolph Hearst and Mr. McCormick of Chicago. This has tended to suggest that all is not sweetness and light so far as the use of this important medium is concerned.

I remember being involved in a debate as a young high school student on that old perennial subject of whether the pen is more powerful than the sword. I went around to all my fellow students and asked them if they read the editorial page, and did not get one affirmative response. That seemed to impress the judges because they awarded the verdict to our side. We were, incidentally, supporting "the sword".

Radio is somewhat different from the press. Radio deals with the spoken word, and the spoken word or oral tradition is more impressive in its effect than the written word. For example, the late President Roosevelt was able to exercise his tremendous influence on the people of the United States, notwithstanding the opposition of a good part of the press, because of his magnificent radio technique as demonstrated in the famous fireside chats. He could ooze through the ether right into the home. His ability in this regard was as significant as anything else in maintaining his influence in the United States.

We are well aware today, amidst the babel and confusion of voices, that the broadcasting medium is very important. I think perhaps here is where a good deal of the confusion arises in our thinking. There have been charges of blasphemous and indecent broadcasts and other kinds of nefarious activities over the C.B.C. during the present discussion. I think this partly arises from the fact that radio has come upon the scene very rapidly. Only yesterday the fiftieth anniversary of the first radio or wireless broadcast and reception was observed. I refer to the occasion when Marconi received the signal "S" across the north Atlantic. Radio has arrived on the scene very quickly and has developed rapidly as an accomplished technique just at a time of great social change and upheaval. Its significance in guiding and influencing human affairs of course has now become obvious. It was used with great effect under the nazi regime in Germany and the present communist regime in Russia. Therefore we who cherish freedom of speech and the other freedoms are very sensitive concerning the possibilities of the harmful influence of radio at the present time.

I have tried to be objective in this matter as I endeavoured to be objective in all the deliberations of the committee. I have looked through the scripts which were mentioned particularly and which were tabled for the members of the committee. I read carefully the speeches of Dr. Brock Chisholm, Mr. Bertrand Russell, Dr. Line, Dr. Hoyle, and so forth. This is not the first time I have encountered these gentlemen because they are standard fare on our university curricula. I recall making a feeble protest on the committee that one of the basic principles of academic freedom is that no restrictions be imposed with respect to the discussion of ideas. Perhaps I do not have to say this, but my own background so far as religion is concerned is of the fundamentalist variety. I deliberately projected myself into a study of the social sciences because I was somewhat alarmed from a layman's standpoint at a few of the ideas that were circulating. I wondered exactly what was involved in the new schools of thought that are growing up, particularly with reference to psychology, sociology, psychiatry and the social sciences generally.

As for Brock Chisholm, he is rather an extremist in the field, and I do not think he has been too influential since he became involved in the Santa Claus discussion some few years ago. Most hon. members will recall that he tried to criticize Father Christmas and stirred up a great tempest in a teapot as a result of carrying the Freudian idea somewhat too far. I was very interested in Bertrand Russell because back in the thirties he preached doctrines that were rather contrary to the best interests of the family, our basic unit of society. Bertrand Russell is a great mathematician and also somewhat of a philosopher. I think his line of thought has been practically discredited in the mind of anybody who has followed his ideas carefully because he is still a social evolutionist, and social evolution went down the drain with the advent of world war I, world-wide depression, world war II and the difficulties that have since arisen.

With respect to Dr. Line, I believe he is connected with the university of Toronto. I think I can highlight the approach that he takes by referring to a little incident that occurred to me personally. I met a student from the department of psychology of the university of Toronto who was a great zealot for the mental hygiene movement. The mental hygiene movement is doing a very effective job in solving one of our major social problems, the problem of increasing mental illness. But like all new things these men who come up with new ideas and new formulas go off the deep end and begin to feel that their particular idea is the supreme good for which man has been looking all through the long centuries of his upward quest. This student was most enthusiastic about the beneficial effects of the mental hygiene movement. He said: "If I could only go across the nation in a great crusade and tell everybody about mental hygiene I am sure that a good many of society's difficulties would melt away". I said to him: "You sound almost like a religious fanatic in your enthusiasm for mental hygiene. You are attributing to the psychologist all the attributes of the Godhead, omniscience, omnipresence and so forth". He drew himself up very haughtily and said: "Are you not postulating God?" I think that is significant. I think it gets to the heart of the controversy in the struggle of ideas that is going on, the struggle of various ideologies for men's minds and souls during the disturbing times in which we are now living.

The farther I went in these respective fields of knowledge the more I realized their inadequacy and the more I realized that fundamental Christianity in the long run is big enough to smother and absorb any seeming inspiration or new viewpoint that might emerge out of these more scientific discussions. I do not think we need to be afraid of anything of that kind as long as we have a basic Christian philosophy, and as long as we endeavour to grasp the heights, depths and breadth of the wisdom that is involved in the Christian idea which underlies our western way of life.

If there is any danger at all from the threat of new ideologies I think it is because we have perhaps narrowed down our appreciation of Christianity to such an extent that it is not big enough to absorb the competition from these other ideas.

I would say something about the last script of Professor Hoyle's which was definitely atheistic. I am in receipt of a communication from the Student Christian Movement which, while supporting the right of freedom of expression, makes this reservation:

> We would, however, lay before you an additional request. It is true that while the broadcast in question did not deal in an explicit way with religion, some of them did proceed from assumptions that are antithetical to the religious and, more particularly, the Christian understanding of the universe and of human nature. While we would deplore any limiting of the freedom of expression of such points of view, we would, at the same time, request the C.B.C. to make provision for the presentation of the Christian position in broadcasts of as high a calibre as those being called in question.

Mr. Coldwell: Was that not done with regard to Dr. Hoyle's broadcast?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think it was. I merely present that statement for the record. My viewpoint is very much the same as that presented in the communication from the Student Christian Movement. I feel that Dr. Hoyle's discussion was not relevant to the main theme that was established in these psychological broadcasts, and it is perhaps unfortunate that it was included in the series. However, I am not fearful for the ideological or spiritual well-being of Canadians so long as we can press home the basic facts of our own Christian viewpoint.

The difficulty is, of course, that we are all somewhat egocentric, and we look at the world from our own particular viewpoint. It reminds me of the elderly couple who were discussing the world as they saw it, and the gentleman said to his wife, "You know, sometimes I think that everybody in the world is a bit queer except you and me, and sometimes I think even you are a bit queer". I believe that is at the root of this problem of failing to appreciate the other viewpoint.

In our discussions in the special committee we were mainly guided by the report of the Massey commission. This commission has done a magnificent job for the advancement of arts and sciences in Canada. But sometimes I am persuaded to think the commission is a bit idealistic in its approach—and perhaps we need more idealism. It seems to support the notion that radio can be the panacea and solve all our difficulties if we only handle it correctly. I agree with the commission's criticism that the springs of culture are changing from the universities and the church and are now lodged in Hollywood and the radio and other mechanized means of communication. It is important that both of these sources of information, these sources of publication and communication, should cater to a higher level than that to which they have tended to cater when they are operating on a strictly commercialized basis. Hence the reason why I am basically in support of an institution such as the C.B.C.

But I do not think we are going to see any great upsurge in cultural interests as the result of that emphasis in radio broadcasting. It will be gradual, and I can agree with the Massey commission that we must move in that direction. I see no immediate possibility, however, of establishing a nation of highbrows, particularly in some of the outlying regions of this vast country of ours. I repeat that there is no technological solution, there is no technological panacea for the problems that are besetting our western way of life, both social and political. Today there is no simple, easy formula that will come to grips with all these difficulties.

We come now to the problem of broadcasting regulation which was a very controversial matter in the committee discussions. In order to present my viewpoint, I feel I shall have to refer briefly to the situation in the United States. I have pointed out that radio broadcasting there developed quickly and in a haphazard fashion. For example, I am told that from 1922 on, the popularity of radio spread like wildfire simultaneously in all countries. In the United States 90 per cent of the families in the northern states own one or more radios. Canada had over a million licensed sets in 1945, which was an increase of 450 per cent over 1934. Figures are similar for other countries.

There have been, perhaps, three distinct periods in the development of radio. As I say the development has been haphazard and without any direction, because it was an invention which appeared so suddenly. First of all, there was the novelty period from 1919 to 1922. Then it was regarded as a profit rainbow from 1922 to 1926, when the advantages of commercialization were seen. Then it had a period of adolescence from 1926 to 1936, when it came into competition with the newspaper advertising. Finally, it achieved success and became more or less established from 1936 onward. By then radio had stopped apologizing, and was a well-organized entity with a definite character. Radio advertising had gotten away from its earlier, primitive forms and had tended to become somewhat of an art, although we must confess there are still some of these primitive forms surviving, unfortunately. We have heard references to them during these discussions on broadcasting. No doubt a good deal of the experience of the United States in radio broadcasting has been that of perpetuating mediocrity. As we listen to the emotional contortions of the soap operas, which is one of the frequent forms of program heard on the United States airwaves, some of us feel that radio broadcasting is far from being a mature medium.

It was the reaction to that sort of haphazard and uncontrolled development, when even too many channels were allotted to private broadcasting in the United States, that led to the B.B.C. complete state monopoly. Canada began to consider the problem back in 1929, and it was strongly influenced by both the United States experience and by the B.B.C. experience. During our discussions in the committee, I could not help but come to the conclusion that circumstances in broadcasting have changed rather remarkably since the Aird commission first made its report. At that time the conception was that broadcasting was a state monopoly, and there would be no private operators. Notwithstanding that fact, there are today 135 private radio operators in Canada. Admittedly they have all made a real contribution to radio broadcasting in this country. I have not stopped to examine why private broadcasting continued to survive, but no doubt it is due to the geographic nature of Canada. Notwithstanding the original intent of the Aird commission, we do have private broadcasting, and especially at the local community level it is doing a particularly fine job. It was obvious, as we listened to the private broadcasters' brief, that they are dissatisfied with the present arrangements for broadcasting in Canada.

It seems to me that the time has come when we might rethink and reformulate our attitude toward private broadcasting or toward broadcasting generally on the lines of some of the recommendations that have been made by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. The press is taking up this theme. The Winnipeg Free Press has recently taken up the theme rather strenuously and is suggesting that some rethinking be done with regard to the basic philosophy towards broadcasting. I have here in my hand a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press. Perhaps it would help if I were to put it on the record. It reads in part as follows:

> For years the case for monopoly in broadcasting seemed overwhelming. So far as the layman was concerned it rested on technical arguments that a monopoly was inevitable, or if not inevitable, at least highly desirable. In Canada the threat of Americanization through programs "piped in" to Canada was also a very powerful factor.
> It is, in fact, a very considerable tribute to the power of the idea of private enterprise in radio, diversification and independence, that in spite of the Aird commission proposal to close up or take over all private stations, and subsequent parliamentary studies strongly favouring the C.B.C., these private stations have grown steadily in number and in revenue, which in turn reflects increased listening by the Canadian public.

The report goes on to indicate that as radio has grown up, as it has matured, as it has grown from a haphazard uncontrolled stage of development, we are beginning to alter our attitude towards radio broadcasting and are wondering whether under the present set-up we are not violating fundamental principles of freedom of expression.

This thought leads to the suggestion that has been put forward, not only during the present discussion but on former occasions, as to the desirability of an independent regulatory body or the other suggestion that has been put forward during these discussions, namely, that some sort of a joint planning committee might be arranged whereby there could be direct, constant, continuing liaison between the C.B.C. and the C.A.B. I am getting away from the terms of the present bill, but every time this subject is discussed and every time briefs are presented I think it is obvious that there is great agitation for development of this kind, and it would seem high time that some attention was given to these requests.

I was greatly impressed by one of the closing statements made by the chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C., Mr. Dunton, when he said something to the effect that he hoped that parliament would define the radio broadcasting situation in Canada in sufficiently clear terms so that those engaged in the practical problems of broadcasting could get on with those practical problems, so that a state of relative stability would be established, making it unnecessary to be dealing constantly with those problems that have been emerging, particularly since 1936, the date I gave for the emergence of maturity in radio broadcasting.

I do not want to speak much longer, but I believe these are basic issues. The very fact that they are being discussed so frequently in the newspapers across the country and the very fact that they come up for discussion in the regular meetings of the committee on broadcasting indicate that they are real problems which must be faced constructively and directly in the near future.

I do not want to get launched into a general discussion of the problem of freedom of expression because that is a job for lawyers, and I will leave it to them. It is a topic however that should figure prominently in this debate.

In concluding, I might say just a word with regard to the licence fee. This matter was discussed in the committee and the impression I received was that the problem of licensing radio receiving stations had become so difficult that it was hardly any longer a profitable venture. Recommendations were made by the C.A.B. and by some of the members that the licence fee might well be dispensed with. For example, we heard charges that the collection of the licence fee lent itself to techniques of racketeering, where unqualified licence sellers would approach unsuspecting householders and ask if they had bought their licences—of course, nobody ever knows whether or not he has a licence; I myself cannot remember. Because of the fear of being prosecuted, the householder would immediately buy a licence, whether he had one or not. That was one difficulty brought out. On the other hand it was pointed out that there are a large number of citizens who are never successfully apprehended and forced to pay their licence fee. I have here a quotation from the Globe and Mail of November 5, which outlines the situation in Toronto as follows:

> It was announced recently that nearly 450 people were being prosecuted in the Toronto area alone, and that since last July, 1,800 delinquent owners who had failed to buy the 1951 licence had been found by house-to-house canvassing in this district by government inspectors.

If we got to the bottom of the problem, it might even be found that there would be in this chamber confessions similar to the one we heard recently with regard to smuggling, and that even some of the hon. members of this assembly are not in possession of their radio licences.

Most of the matters that I have discussed this morning are not up for review in the bill before us at the present time. But as one who had the privilege of serving on this committee, Mr. Chairman, I felt constrained to deal with them and to present, as briefly as possible, my own reaction to the situation.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, before this item passes I feel that I should say something along the line that was being followed by the hon. member for Macleod last night. The privilege of speaking over the C.B.C. is in some respects almost a sacred one. Only those who are entirely worthy should have that privilege. I am not sure that Mr. Brock Chisholm, who was under discussion for a short time last night, has qualified himself for that opportunity. I should like to quote three passages from his speech delivered on September 5, 1951, and to comment upon those passages briefly, bearing in mind that Canada is first and foremost a Christian country. I doubt if you can find anywhere in the world more devout Christians than the splendid people who speak French in Canada. I know that great numbers of the people who speak English in Canada are likewise devout in high degree. I believe that these people have a right to have their preferences respected. Having said that, may I read the passages I have in mind?

> Third, the experts would need to be identified as modern experts, not hereditary or traditional ones, who would advise on the basis of obsolete concepts, on long-past certainties which they had learned in their childhoods from their ancestors' ideas.

Mr. Chisholm may not have meant anything subversive by these remarks, but being unqualified as they are, they are open to the most adverse interpretations. What is the interpretation that would naturally be placed upon this passage by anyone who had studied modern science in our schools? Would it not be something like this? "Well, we really should not pay very much attention now to such figures as Moses. He is clearly out of date, obsolete. And that man, David, who wrote the Psalms—we cannot give very much attention to his ideas! And that Isaiah would be definitely a second rater or third rater! And the Saviour of the world would be one of those antiquated experts!" Look at what it means!

And that kind of doctrine is poured into the ears of our unsuspecting boys and girls of teen-age, unsuspecting and defenceless! They have the right to expect that anything that comes over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is of the very highest validity and respectability. Well, listen to that! That is a matter which cannot be treated lightly.

May I read another passage from the same speech? This includes some of the words that the hon. member for Macleod read last night, but I wish to get another passage in the context, so I shall have to read it again:

> The rate of increase in world population has jumped to about 68,000 a day. Are you among the hundreds of millions of people who are avoiding this frightening fact?

"Avoiding"; what does that mean? I continue:

> Are you among those whose opinion, based on some authoritarian prejudice, prevents delegates to the United Nations bodies, even the population commission, from tackling this problem?

"Tackling it". By, for example, making a world law under which people shall be restricted in the matter of their increase, and probably sterilized after a certain number of children? How does that sound to the devout members from Quebec? I continue:

> Do you think you will be left plenty of room, in North America for instance, when within a few years, hundreds of millions of people from Asia and Europe must go somewhere if their birth rate remains anywhere near its present level?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

What is the implication of that? The speech goes on:

> Yes, we can avoid this question but our children will pay for our cowardice if we do. These are only illustrations of our need to know ourselves.

Mr. Low: Pretty subtle.

Mr. Blackmore: Without qualifications the implication of that is just as clear as the moon in a cloudless midnight sky. Obviously he is indoctrinating in favour of birth control.

Mr. Low: And the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pays him for it.

Mr. Blackmore: And we pay the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Fleming: That is against regulations.

Mr. Blackmore: See how serious that is. This man, in advocating birth control, of course would have no concern—I hope I am not unfair; I want to be fair—but he apparently is not concerned at all about what the Creator of the earth thought about this matter of birth control. May I read into the record what God said in Genesis, chapter 1, verses 27 and 28. I read as follows:

> 27. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.
> 28. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

Apparently God was not much worried about those "hundreds of millions" who would come sweeping over us. Probably Mr. Chisholm has never read the 127th psalm, commencing with the third verse. I will read it into the record so that his friends can point it out to him:

> 3. Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord: and the fruit of the womb is his reward.
> 4. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth.
> 5. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate.

There are serious implications to all this, Mr. Chairman. It just happens that the main people in the world who are foolish enough to listen to the doctrine of birth control are the English-speaking people. Now they are limiting their children while the potential enemy is multiplying abundantly. And what is the meaning? Given several generations, and the English-speaking people will not "speak with the enemies in the gate."

Mr. Low: Hear, hear. They will get down on their knees and plead for mercy.

Mr. Blackmore: They will be lucky if they are alive. I do not wish to go too deeply into this whole matter. I am tempted to say something even further. I believe I will read the next passage, but before I do that may I say in passing, Mr. Chairman, that we need to bear in mind that the greatgrandfathers of the men in this House of Commons had families of eight, ten, twelve and fourteen children, while the men in this house—I do not wish to mention any of them at all—are lucky if they have three and two and one. What is the reason, in a time when we can make maternity almost painless and astonishingly safe, when we know more about nourishing people than man ever knew, when we can provide more nutritious food of greater varieties than any generation that has ever lived, why is it that today our families are two and three? What has brought this thing about?

Mr. Chairman, I will dare wager that there has been through the years an indoctrination by the men who drafted the patterns that Brock Chisholm is pouring out in the ears of Canadian people, doctrines that originated more than a hundred years ago. That indoctrination has little by little borne fruit, until now only those who have the most implicit faith in the Bible have families of substantial size.

Let us remember once again that we fight enemies with manpower. We produce goods to fight enemies with manpower. We raise goods to fight inflation with manpower. Manpower, the fountain of our manpower, is being dried up at its source. How? By men like Brock Chisholm. It is bad enough for people to steal around on the streets, to meet women on the corners and to talk contraception and birth control. But to have a man free to pour that doctrine premeditatedly over the airways of the C.B.C. is a monstrosity which strikes me almost petrified with amazement. A person like me stands completely astounded when I see that the C.B.C. would even tolerate a thing like that.

Mr. Low: Let alone take our tax money to pay for it.

Mr. Blackmore: But there it is. It was done—and no doubt it was done in other broadcasts. And it was done directly against the will of eighty per cent of the people of Canada, I wager.

We talk about having public control of the C.B.C. We see men rising in the house and saying that the C.B.C. should be able to control all our radio broadcasting. Well, to answer such a foolhardy argument one needs no more than that illustration, does he? And it is a foolhardy argument, let me repeat, to say that the C.B.C. should exercise complete control over radio broadcasting in Canada. I do not care who it is that advocates that argument, what I say is true. Some of these days, when it is too late, he will repent of his error.

Let me read again from what Brock Chisholm said:

> It is utterly ridiculous for a person to attend an international conference of any kind if he has not at least prepared himself by some study of the history, the ethical systems, and the religions of the natives of the countries with whom he will be discussing matters of concern to all of us.

I put that on record, not because I am particularly concerned about it, but to be fair by giving the context. And then he continues:

> Some knowledge of normal psychology, at least some knowledge of minor psycho-pathology, something of history and perhaps most importantly, comparative religion—

What is that?

> —is an absolute essential to effective work in the international field.

"Effective"—in what regard?

> The time has not yet come when the peoples of countries regard their responsibilities with such importance that they make sure they do send the right people to all international meetings to represent them and to see that war will not occur again.

I wonder if Canadians have sensed their responsibility in sending Brock Chisholm to those meetings? He assumes, I suppose, that he was predestined from his mother's womb to go to these meetings. And apparently the C.B.C. feel that he was so predestined to talk over the radio.

Well, I face the matter with considerable reservation. I have been hesitating all morning as to whether I should say what I am now going to say. But I believe I will say it. I wonder if hon. members know where communism began. I wonder if they know that the broad pattern of communism was laid down in 1812 with the death of a certain great international financier. In 1812 this great international financier, whose name I shall not mention, but whose name I could give, just as quickly as I now snap my finger, gave his sons a commission to destroy Christianity and to destroy the British commonwealth.

That is not idle fancy; that is verifiable fact. And the device they were to use to destroy both of them was to destroy man's faith in the bible. Now, how were they to go about that? He left them adequately supplied with money. This is the device they used: they built up what was known as the new learning. They built up in Germany what they called the new learning, and they brought that new learning into the seminaries where the young priests of Britain were being taught.

What was the new learning? First of all there was the evolutionary theory, that man arose from maggots, lice, monkeys. And they literally filled our textbooks, entirely against the will of the people, with propaganda in favour of evolution; and never a word in any way in answer to the pernicious doctrine—a doctrine which modern science has proved is utterly false. That was No. 1.

No. 2: Higher criticism. Higher criticism had a considerable vogue in the last two generations. Briefly it was a systematic calling in question of the bible text, as to authorship, arrangement, dates, and historic accuracy. You hear very little of it today. But the malignant evil which resulted from it has persisted. It got in among the people —the tendency to doubt the verbal or verbatim authenticity and validity of the bible.

No. 3: Comparative religion. What is comparative religion? Well, in a general way, this is the approach of comparative religion: that Christ was not the original teacher of Christianity at all, but that before He began His ministry He went to visit the people roundabout so as to familiarize Himself with their religions. Then, out of what He learned from the various religions they say He concocted His own religion—so that Christianity would become a hodgepodge of the various religions in the world.

Now, to the person who does not understand the origin of religion, the arguments advanced are completely plausible, completely convincing—but they are utterly false.

What has been the result of these three lines of attack? The result has been to destroy faith in the bible, to destroy faith in the living God, to destroy faith in the Originator of Christianity, the original Teacher of Christianity, as well as faith in the Saviour of the world.

And notice that in his speech this man Chisholm mentions "comparative religion" as one of the qualifications to go to the United Nations—as though that had anything to do with it. What is the result of the whole thing? The result of it is that the people of Canada are tolerating such pernicious doctrines as I have read into the record, tolerating them over the C.B.C!

Did those international plotters succeed? Admirably—admirably! They still are succeeding.

What was the first result of the lack of faith in the bible? Diminution of the Anglo-Saxon birthrate. That was the first thing. One can understand men and women toiling and struggling, the way our admirable people in Canada who have large families are doing. One can understand their doing that, if they believe they are raising daughters and sons of God. But one can understand their reticence to do it if they were to believe they were just raising monkeys. The ordinary man or woman is basically capable of drawing such conclusions—and they do it.

The result has been a disastrous falling off in the birthrate in the Anglo-Saxon world, while other people have gone on to multiply, as the Creator commanded them to do. I do not know whether I should say any more upon this point than I have already said. I think all can see that I am thoroughly justified in condemning without qualification the man Brock Chisholm as a candidate to speak over the C.B.C.

I feel that some would want me to say just a word or two as to what we are going to do about population. It may be said that people are multiplying and what are we going to do about them? The first thing to remember is that God does not seem to worry about them. We shall find in this world plenty of resources to supply the needs of all the children that will grow up if we just use our God-given intelligence instead of our antiquated prejudice in the production of goods from the resources of the world and the distribution of those goods to the people of the world. We need have no anxiety. Do our United Nations conferences spend any time talking effectively about how to get goods from the United States, to India, to China, to Siam, to Malaya, to Java or to Japan? They have never spent any time apparently at these wonderful United Nations meetings trying effectively to solve that problem, but we do have our representatives, no doubt under the guidance of the Brock Chisholms, trying to figure out how to give the United Nations control so that they will be able to sterilize the females in India for instance who have had two children. That is the only implication to be taken from the words I have read.

What do we suppose devout Hindoos and Mohammedans will think after they come into contact with a document of this kind? What will they think about a United Nations organization that would be activated by thinking of that sort? I can conceive of nothing that would be better calculated to drive them into fervent horror. Yet seemingly this man is considered eminently suited to go to international conventions! After a time they will be devising ways to stop population increase in China and ultimately they would show Canada what to do.

I urge upon those people who have charge of the C.B.C. to be careful of the kind of thing they allow to go over the air. They should not assume, because many of the people they come in contact with are agnostics and atheists, that everybody in Canada ought to be an agnostic or atheist and that if he is not, it is high time he was taught over the radio to be an agnostic or atheist. The first step toward communism is atheism!

Mr. Low: I intend to take but a few minutes to follow what the hon. member for Lethbridge has said and to endorse wholeheartedly what he has said. I speak only because in the course of the debate my name has been mentioned and certain things said which I feel I should answer briefly. To bring you up to date, let me say that on November 9, as reported on page 886 of Hansard, I spoke on the motion to refer the bill to the committee. In the course of that short address I had some things to say about the C.B.C. and more particularly about freedom of speech.

On November 20 the hon. member for Winnipeg North proceeded to take me to task in my absence, although the hon. gentleman did say that he would have been prepared to take me more strongly to task had I been in the house. I am grateful for his consideration and solicitude. On that occasion he said, and I quote from page 1211 of Hansard as follows:

I regret very much that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has been called away from the house on business. I was going to devote some little time to him but in his absence I shall have to modify my remarks. At least the hon. member for Peace River named names. He named one, Dr. Brock Chisholm, who he said has a poisonous mind. A Liberal member said the other night in the house that atheism was being preached over the C.B.C. When I asked him afterwards who was responsible he said it was Dr. Brock Chisholm and Dr. Ewen Cameron.

He then went on to say some other things which I shall quote briefly in a few moments. I stated on November 9 that I was not an intensive listener to the C.B.C. nor to the radio as I had not the time to listen to much of the stuff that comes over the C.B.C. I stated that I felt that I had other important things to do. But I do listen to some of the programs which I enjoy.

I did make the statement that as I went about the country people would tell me their opinion of the C.B.C. broadcasts and I said also that I had accumulated a considerable quantity of criticism, particularly of the commentators. I did mention Dr. Brock Chisholm and suggested that he was spreading his poisonous ideas over the airways. I do not take that back for one second. What has been said today by my colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, is ample evidence that Dr. Chisholm has been spreading his poisonous ideas over the airways of this country.

I should like to quote one or two things to indicate that I was making no idle charge. I am not afraid to mention those who have been frequently named as being leftists. I stated on November 9 that many people throughout Canada felt that the roster of commentators engaged by the C.B.C. and paid by the C.B.C. were heavily weighted to the left. I am going to quote one or two things which I have picked up at random out of the file I have accumulated to indicate that a great many people in this country feel as I do.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, when the noon recess was called I was about to put evidence on the record to support what I had said earlier while the resolution preceding the present measure was before the house for consideration. I should like to quote from two or three documents I have in my possession to illustrate the kind of thing that many people throughout Canada are thinking and to give support to what my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, has already said. I have here a copy of a Canadian Pacific telegram, dated November 26, 1951, addressed to the chairman and members of the select committee on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. These are the words which the sender of the telegram used:

Sirs:

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation again last evening on Week-end Review presented another of those speakers who can generally be counted upon to put across a degree of service to Stalin and his gang, as has been done notably since the start of the Korean war by so many Week-end Reviews and by certain special Sunday evening speakers who follow. A study of scripts by Constance Garneau, Woodsworth, Richardson, Jamieson, Hitchcock and others will reveal, with rare exception, consistent clever subtle propaganda for recognition of red China or turning over Formosa or cold shoulder to Spain or warning against provoking Russia, etc., all cleverly intermingled with many fine ideas and condemnation of certain aspects of communist behaviour but always putting over a line of thought such as Stalin and his gang are anxious to have prevail, even including cleavage between Britain and the United States or Canada and the United States. Moreover, in these week-end presentations I have never heard counter views as Dunton and others so piously pretend when they tell your committee all viewpoints are given hearing. This I categorically deny, and it can be disproved by any qualified sincere painstaking individual given access to pertinent records. Hitchcock's declaration last night that Vishinsky represents 90 million Russians is sample. Viskinsky represents a clique of armed bandits as does each of the delegates from Poland and the satellite countries where people have no voice and no representation. At the same time Hitchcock twists significance of excellent ideas expressed by Prime Minister St. Laurent and uses other most aceptable theories of his own to bolster his basic propaganda confusing the concept of the enemy at this hour and undermining resolve and unity of free nations.

Mr. Knowles: Who is that from?

Mr. Low: It is from John J. Fitzgerald of Blind River. It is on the record of the committee, or should be. Evidently this gentleman is a constant listener and he has taken particular pains to note the number of times that these week-end reviewers do put over the kind of propaganda that he mentions in his telegram. On other occasions the same gentleman has written to officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation about the same matter. I have in my hand a copy of a letter which he sent to Mr. Dunton, Mr. Frigon, Donald Manson and Ernest Bushnell on the twenty-fifth of June last. I should like to quote one paragraph which reads as follows:

From recent correspondence which is of record a conclusion is imposed that C.B.C. program officials are so zealous in the art of getting away with all the traffic will bear of sugar-coated poison that these officials, when Mr. Woodsworth is not available or repetition of his appearance too conspicuous, feel impelled to get Mr. Richardson from the same newspaper to make sure that the desired line will be faithfully maintained. One would think that speakers like Willson Woodside given a rare hearing just as a smoke screen. Grattan O'Leary and Robert Keyserlingk did not exist.

That sort of thing is heard all over the Dominion of Canada. It is not just an isolated case. I hold in my hand a clipping from The Ensign of April 7 last. The heading of the article is, "C.B.C. Broadcast Arouses Grave Concern". The article is from New York and reads as follows:

Surprise and grave concern have been expressed here over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's action last week in broadcasting from Lake Success the now discredited opinions of Owen Lattimore concerning red China and the nationalist government. It was pointed out that none of the American broadcasting systems would scarcely even consider putting Lattimore on the air because of his apparent communist sympathies. Why, it was asked, did the C.B.C. choose to do so? On the C.B.C. broadcast—an interview with United Nations correspondents—Lattimore repeated a number of pro-communist propaganda statements. Lattimore, who attempted to sell the idea that the Chinese communists were merely "agrarian reformers", hinted that the west should let Formosa go if the reds attacked the nationalist stronghold. The nationalist government, he claimed, is a "thing of the past", and there was no prospect of reinstating it in China. He said the United States was foolishly alienating support of Asiatic countries by trying to impose on them major decisions made outside of Asia. He cited the branding of red China as an aggressor in Korea as an example.

Mr. Coldwell: From what news agency does that come?

Mr. Low: I do not know. As a matter of fact the clipping came into my hands from a correspondent.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Coldwell: Is there no identification?

Mr. Low: Yes, it is from The Ensign of April 7, 1951.

Mr. Coldwell: As it is supposed to be from New York I was wondering what news agency sent it.

Mr. Low: I do not know. As a matter of fact, as I said, a correspondent sent it to me along with criticisms the like of which I have already put on the record, and it did not come from the same correspondent who sent the telegram and letter I have already quoted. One could cite and put on the record thousands of such protests. The hon. member for Macleod, who was a member of the committee that studied this legislation and the report of the C.B.C., asked during the committee meetings for a list of all commentators and the dates on which they spoke. He has been unsuccessful in getting that information. He has been told on several occasions that it just is not possible to get it. There is something very wrong if it is not possible to get that list. I think members of the house ought to have such information and the C.B.C. officials should be quite ready to supply it. It is the only way in the world that you can set at rest the minds of members of parliament when so many of them have the idea that the news commentators especially have been for years heavily weighted to the left.

Mr. Robinson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Robinson: Is it not true that the hon. member for Macleod withdrew that request when it was explained to him that it would require a great deal of time to supply the information?

Mr. Low: I do not know whether he withdrew it, but the fact remains that the C.B.C. stated that it could not be obtained because it would require so much work. However, that is no excuse. If the C.B.C. and the department are anxious to set at rest the minds of the people of this country, they will supply the information no matter how much time it takes; that is the contention we put forward.

I should like to go back, for just a moment, Mr. Chairman, to the speech given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North on November 20, because it relates to what I have been saying.

The hon. member said this as recorded at page 1211 of Hansard for November 20:

At least we have names . . .

He paid me the compliment of being prepared to at least suggest the names. I said there were people across this country who believed that the news commentators and week-end commentators were heavily weighted to the left. He said:

> At least we have names and we have the scripts of what these men said over the C.B.C.

Now, I ask the members of the committee to particularly note these words used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North:

> They said more or less what is being taught in the universities and colleges of Canada today.

I should like to make one comment on that. We know there are a lot of things being taught in universities and colleges today that are pure rot, and ought not to be taught. But in the interests of freedom of speech, and in the interests of freedom of thought, we concede the right of the colleges to teach them. I am not protesting against that now, although I tell you it is a terrible thing when so many of our immature boys and girls have to be subjected to some of the things that are being taught in our colleges. The thing I am trying to get at is that, even if there are things being taught in the colleges and universities today, that is no reason why the same things should be taught over the C.B.C., where no one can ask questions; where no one can call for an examination or give an answer. It is against that sort of thing, Mr. Chairman, that I protest. The hon. member continues:

> Why should not the ordinary person have the advantage of that teaching? Now let us consider this poison of which Dr. Brock Chisholm is accused. He said—and this seems to be his philosophy—

The hon. member for Winnipeg North goes on and quotes from the same broadcast as that from which my hon. friend quoted when he spoke in this debate immediately preceding me. But this is the extract the hon. member for Winnipeg North quotes:

> When we can live together in understanding and tolerance and compassion and in the hope that we may be able, enough of us, to love our neighbour whatever his race, religion, colour of skin, ideology, economic or social group—when we can do that, we shall no longer be found in the ranks of man's last enemy—himself. Instead we shall become friends of, and assets to, mankind.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North says: "Is that poison?" Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North selects a noble and high sentiment out of a whole broadcast and quotes it, then asks if that is poison. I answer him readily, no.

Mr. Blackmore: You could put strychnine in a good piece of meat.

Mr. Low: Yes, you could put strychnine in a good piece of meat, as the hon. member says. Doubtless in the course of his broadcasts Dr. Chisholm does express some high sentiments. There is no doubt about that at all. What we object to is not those high sentiments, those noble thoughts such as the isolated one or two the hon. member for Winnipeg North quoted. The hon. member for Lethbridge attempted to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North if it was to those noble sentiments that I was referring, but the member for Winnipeg North would not reply to the question.

Those were not what I was referring to at all when I described some of Dr. Chisholm's ideas as poison. What I was referring to was exactly the type of statements quoted from Dr. Chisholm's broadcast by the hon. member for Lethbridge. He quoted three and showed how they were very concentrated and subtle propaganda. That I believe; and it was the kind of thing to which I took exception, not the noble statements quoted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I do not intend to put the three quotations used by the hon. member for Lethbridge on the record again. I do not want to take that time, but I should like to pass on to something else that was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and which requires some consideration.

The hon. member quoted from a radio address which I gave on December 18, 1946, on a program entitled "The Nation's Business". After quoting what I said about a tie-up between international communism, international finance and international political zionism, he used these words:

> These are the views of the member for Peace River. I have no doubt they were spoken with conviction, but he is convinced of things which I believe to be wrong. He has faiths and beliefs which I cannot accept; and he is loyal to ideas which I abhor and scorn. I would say indeed that the ideas enunciated in that broadcast were dangerously subversive, that they approached something close to racial hatred.

The point I was making in that broadcast from which the member for Winnipeg North quoted this excerpt was that I believed fully and deeply that there was a tie-up, and had been for many years, between three international policies: international communism, international finance, and international political zionism. I am not going to debate that proposition today, because this is not the proper place. I say now that I am prepared to debate it with the hon. member for Winnipeg North or anyone else, because I have the information upon which to base my beliefs, and evidence to support my claim. But that is not the point. I ask hon. members of this committee, what can be subversive about the exposure of sinister designs that are intended to undermine and destroy the things and institutions which provide our safety, yes, our freedom and our happiness in this country and in the British commonwealth? What I was discussing in that broadcast was policies, not people. I was discussing the policy of international communism, the policy of international finance and the policy of international political zionism. I sought to show that there was a close tie-up between them.

What can be subversive in the discussion of policies, and especially those policies? If by subversive the hon. member for Winnipeg North means an effort to expose the policies for what they really are, or my effort to prevent the achievement of the design against the freedom and well-being of the people of the world, but more particularly the people of the British commonwealth of nations, then I do not in the least mind being called subversive. Evidently the hon. member for Winnipeg North loves these three policies I have named, and which I did my best to expose for what they really are. I shall always do my best to expose them for what they really are. The hon. member says in reference to me:

> He has faiths and beliefs which I cannot accept; he is loyal to ideas which I abhor and scorn.

Then he goes on to say what those ideas are. Here are his words:

> I would say indeed that the ideas enunciated in that broadcast were dangerously subversive, that they approached something close to racial hatred.

Mr. Chairman, if he does not love these policies that I have already named for you, at least he condones them because he abhorred what I said about them.

It has always been quite surprising to me, Mr. Chairman, that some people have been exceedingly touchy about the discussion of certain policies. They get jittery, and in order to divert attention from telling arguments that may be advanced about those policies, they resort to personal smear tactics and even to character assassination. It almost makes one feel that they have something to fear from the discussion of those policies. That may not be the case with my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North; but when one attempts to discuss a policy, and, when someone else stands up in the house and says that it is dangerously subversive and akin to racial hatred, when it is not even remotely related to either, one begins to wonder if that person is not worried lest the truth come out. I am of the opinion that that is exactly the situation with regard to the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Let me just make clear, once and for all, Mr. Chairman, this important point. We Social Crediters have always stood for freedom of speech and we now stand for the fullest possible measure of freedom of speech. We believe in real freedom of speech, however. By that I mean that we believe in granting every opportunity for the discussion of any beliefs, policies and ideas that have merit. We believe that they should be discussed openly, by logic and reason, not by insult or vilification.

Mr. Blackmore: Or in telling one side of the story.

Mr. Low: We further believe that all sides of these questions ought to be discussed. There is no freedom of speech in any country in which discussion is limited to one side or in which a certain definite line is taken and held preponderantly for months on end. So long as the discussions are balanced fairly, we do not think there is any danger. But we definitely deplore any attempt to weight discussions so that one view is pounded in upon the consciousness of our people day after day and month after month.

We do not believe that sufficient evidence has been adduced by any investigation carried on thus far to show that there is real freedom of speech on the C.B.C. We think that investigation ought to go forward until the subject has been exhausted; and the C.B.C. should be prepared to supply to the members of the House of Commons and to the committee on radio any and all information necessary to enable them to make up their minds about the matter. There are some features of the bill which we do not like, Mr. Chairman, but I am not going to discuss them now in detail. The discussion of them will be possible on the individual items. Before I sit down one thing I should like to say about the general policy or principle of the bill is this. I was sorry to note that no effort has yet been made to set up, for the purpose of regulating radio in Canada, an independent commission that is separate and distinct from the competing body, the C.B.C. We have been consistent in our belief that justice can never be done in this country to private radio and to the people generally until we have some regulating body that is separate and distinct from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is a competing institution in the field of radio. As we come to the individual sections, Mr. Chairman, we shall have something further to say.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, it was not my original intention to speak in this debate but, having listened to the eloquent speeches of the hon. member for Macleod, the hon. member for Lethbridge and the hon. member for Peace River, I feel obligated to express my point of view lest this committee might be accused of the very thing of which the C.B.C. is being accused, namely of expressing consistently a point of view which is not indicative of the general point of view of everyone represented.

While I agree in general with the philosophy of life, shall we say, of these hon. members, I do not at all agree with their interpretation of how that should apply to the C.B.C. and to their programs. While I think it may have been unfortunate that a certain series of programs were broadcast by the C.B.C. which consistently expressed one point of view only, I think we should be exceedingly careful before we take or suggest taking any step which might limit our liberties in any way or in any way set the C.B.C. up as a censoring body with regard to what our thought should be. As I said, I think it was probably unfortunate that a certain series of programs expressed only one point of view. I think this series of programs on which the much-discussed Brock Chisholm spoke would possibly have been brought into balance if the other point of view had been expressed by someone else as it was expressed by these hon. gentlemen today in this chamber. If one of these hon. gentlemen had been on that series of programs, for example, I think it would have brought the thing into balance. But I do not agree in any way that we should go to the slightest extent in the direction of censorship of our opinion.

Mr. Low: I agree with that statement.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): After all, we should remember that through the ages almost every advance—especially any advance in the fields of science—has been attacked as being against progress and contrary to religious beliefs. All sorts of accusations have been hurled at these advances. But in the end, in most cases the scientific principles have proven to be the truth. I think there is nothing we can lose if the truth is allowed to be expressed. If it is not the truth, it will not stand on its own feet but will fall by the wayside, provided that a free expression of opinion is allowed from all points of view.

We have advanced to a new high in civilization, or at least we imagine we have done so, by the formation of the United Nations since the last war. The United Nations has recently produced what is known as a universal declaration of human rights, and all member nations have subscribed to that declaration. Two of the articles which I will read would, I think, be a fair guide in governing us as to what is suitable and what is not suitable to be broadcast by our nationally-owned broadcasting system or by a privately-owned broadcasting system controlled by our government. Article 18 of the universal declaration of human rights reads as follows:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, worship and observance.

Article 19 reads:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

If we govern ourselves by the principle that is expressed in these two articles, we will not be far astray as far as our public broadcasting is concerned. By saying that I do not for one moment mean that I would agree with all points of view expressed by anyone over the air; but if we confine ourselves only to the broadcast of opinions with which everyone agrees I am afraid these discussion programs would be pretty sterile affairs. Therefore I think a divergence of opinion is quite justified, provided that all points of view are expressed.

There is another point on which I wish to speak briefly, and then I shall conclude. I refer to the present set-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As everyone knows, when the Canadian broadcasting system was brought into being in the 1930's the idea was that it should be set up as a state monopoly of broadcasting similar to the British Broadcasting Corporation, but in actual practice it was found not to be a practical thing, and as the Massey commission reports:

> It soon appeared, however, that these pioneers in the field of radio broadcasting had made a place for themselves in their own communities and that they could perform important national services. It seemed therefore in the national interest that the C.B.C. should recommend the continuance of their licences and that they should be regarded as an integral part of the national system.

Therefore we have the situation where private broadcasters exist, and yet no provision had been made in the original legislation for their existence. We have the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the position of being the parent of an unwanted child, if you wish. We have the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the position where it realizes that private stations exist, but their existence was not planned in the first place. In actual fact a different set of circumstances exists now from those which were originally anticipated. Therefore I think we should not confuse ourselves by assuming that the private stations should be entirely controlled by the C.B.C. There has been a lot of confused thinking on this matter, and people have been led to believe that if a separate non-partisan body was set up to control broadcasting generally, to set down the regulations and to enforce them, which should be applied to all broadcasting, certain services which are now supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would disappear. That is not true. I see no reason why the excellent public services which are carried on by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should not continue when subsidized by the government in various ways, even though broadcasting generally was controlled by an independent body.

As a further admission that the existence of the private broadcasters is justified the Massey report goes on to say:

> In this broad country we still have inadequate radio coverage; without the supplementary outlets of the private stations many more areas would be deprived of the national programs of the C.B.C., and could be reached only at great additional public expenditure. Apart from this direct national service, the private stations perform community services which, as they rightly point out, are important to the nation: local advertising is in itself a service of value to the community; local news, information and the promotion of worthy causes are essential services, as many individuals and groups have testified. A third proper function of the local station is the encouragement and development of local talent.

I do not think there is any argument as to the value of the private stations. That being so, I see no reason why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be put in the awkward position of trying to determine what is just treatment for what is in actual fact a competitor of its own in certain cases. As I said, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in the position of being the parent of an unplanned and unwanted child, and finds itself in the position of being torn between mother love on the one hand and embarrassment for the very existence of the private stations on the other. As far as the laying down of regulations and their enforcement are concerned, I would suggest that the control should be in the hands of a separate and non-partisan body, as are the railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway is not bound by regulations which are made by the officials of the Canadian National Railways, but rather both are controlled by the board of transport commissioners. The same principle could very well apply to broadcasting. You have the position of a crown company competing with private enterprise. In that connection I might quote again from the universal declaration of human rights. As a matter of fact I shall give two quotations. Article 25 says in part:

> All children, whether born in or out of wedlock, shall enjoy the same social protection.

Perhaps we could apply that principle in a wider sense to the private broadcasting industry in this country. The article I really intended to quote when I started is article 10 which says:

> Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that principle should be applied in the case of the private broadcasters in this country as well as to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation itself.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add a few words to what has been said, and it so happens that they really follow along rather naturally from what the hon. member for Queens has been saying.

I wish to make some comments on the control aspect of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and particularly as it may affect the freedom of the press. I wish to make it very clear that on what I call the production, the artistic side of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, not only am I not criticizing, I wish to applaud. I feel they have done a great deal of good work and, have conducted themselves in a constructive manner. They have brought honour in certain cases also on the name of our country abroad.

I would like to say also that although I myself am a very inadequate and intermittent user of radio, nevertheless I feel that I know enough about it to applaud the attitude of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in not being content always to follow public opinion but sometimes seeking—and I hope successfully—to lead public opinion.

I do not share the views which I have sometimes heard expressed criticizing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation because they try to keep above the highest common factor of the average taste of the most of us. I think it is desirable, and I think all of us in our better moments admit that we need education, and need to have our taste improved. For example, in the case of music—and there may be some others in the house who have had the same experience as I have had—I confess that when I first listened to classical music it seemed to me like an unknown and foreign language. But, as I have gone on, I feel I appreciate it at least to some extent—not as well as the educated musician—but at least to some extent. I think where this has been done in the case of children the results have been not only gratifying, but obviously much more important, because the results will last longer.

So I just wish to make it clear that my comments are not with regard to the programming of the C.B.C., but because in my opinion by government policy the C.B.C. is asked to do something which, in the first place, I should not think it would have any particular qualification to do, even if they were perfectly free and single-minded about it and which, secondly, I think it is impeded from doing because, so far as I can see, it cannot be completely independent and single-minded. I had better face the fact now that the actions of a former leader of this party, who was prime minister in 1935, may be invoked against me. May I digress for a moment to say that I am one who believes that history has dealt very shabbily with that gentleman. I would like some of those who quote him in this connection to give him credit for the energy and the courage he displayed in those years. Sometimes, the way people talk, one would think he invented the depression during the thirties, which existed throughout the whole free world. However, that is by way of digression.

I would like to point out that apparently the C.B.C. whose relationships the member for Queens said were a little equivocal, had apparently two birthdays. I gather the C.B.C. had a fifteenth anniversary of its founding some time ago and, if my mathematical calculation is correct, that takes one back to 1936. Actually the C.B.C. was set up in 1932 or 1933. But, I suspect, it was done away with, and a new beginning made in 1936. So that it would then date from that time. The real founder would be forgotten, or at any rate would get no credit for what he did—except when such insignificant persons as myself bring the matter up.

I might question that, but I do not know that I need to take the time of the house to go further. I believe it was a Scottish chieftain who said that the world dated from his birth, and he calculated all things from that time. Maybe we also must calculate all things from certain political celebrities and certain political anniversaries in this country. That is something we must accept, and accept with the best grace we can.

Mr. McCann: Nobody is doing it but yourself. I never have heard it expressed in the house before.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister tells me I am wrong about the fifteenth anniversary, then I shall accept his correction with the best grace I can. But I was credibly informed that that fifteenth anniversary was observed.

Mr. McCann: Informed by whom?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And I am sure any graduate from Queen's will know that fifteen from fifty-one leaves thirty-six.

An hon. Member: How about any graduate from public school?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He might know about it, too. We are not so much above the public school level of development, according to the testimony of people who come from other universities.

Mr. Martin: Why single out Queen's?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who comes from another place, which he regards very highly, would perhaps have a lower opinion of Queen's than one would expect a man of his intelligence to have.

Mr. Martin: As a matter of privilege, I have a high opinion of Queen's. But I thought my hon. friend had a higher opinion of other places.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have only in a very indirect way suggested any criticism of other places.

Mr. Knowles: What "other place" are you talking about?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I had wished to refer to the aspect of control, and this comes to my mind by reason of the Massey report. Because this report not only recommends the continuation of the control, subject to the right of appeal, but it seems to feel it desirable that the control should be exercised more authoritatively than in the past.

I read from page 284 of the report where it says:

> In 1936, the C.B.C. was constituted—

There it is, you see; the birthday is 1936. Evidently the earlier date was a kind of illegitimate birth, which has been forgotten.

> In 1936, the C.B.C. was constituted to "carry on a national broadcasting service within the Dominion of Canada" . . . the only status of private broadcasters is as part of the national broadcasting system.

It is important to remember that phrase, because we come to that line of reasoning again and again. Then, referring to private broadcasters, the report continues:

> They have no civil right to broadcast or any property rights in broadcasting. They have been granted in the national interest a privilege over their fellow-citizens, and they now base their claim for equality with their "business rivals" on the abundant material rewards which they have been able to reap from this privilege. The statement that the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is at once their judge and their business rival implies a view of the national system which has no foundation in law, and which has never been accepted by parliamentary committees or by the general public . . .

We are resolutely opposed to any compromise of the principle on which the system rests and should rest.

I am not going to enter into any argument with the Massey commission on points of law. All I wish to do is to introduce the much humbler ground of common sense.

At page 283 the report lays down the following principle—and here you have the same continuation, the same kind of argument which flows all the way through this report:

The principal grievance of the private broadcasters is based, it seems to us, on a false assumption that broadcasting in Canada is an industry. Broadcasting in Canada, in our view, is a public service directed and controlled in the public interest by a body responsible to parliament.

Let us examine this bold and categorical statement which the Massey commission makes. Can the Massey report, by an ex cathedra statement of this kind, alter existing facts? Surely the truth is that radio broadcasting is, in one of its aspects at any rate, an industry. It is one of the most important industries, the dissemination of news which is becoming, we are assured, increasingly more important. When they speak about there being no property rights, it has been well pointed out by those who have examined the situation closely that at the time of the invention of printing there was no property right in it, either. In some countries it was converted into a state monopoly, or it was placed under the church and subjected to licensing. It was only gradually, particularly in the democracies, that property rights in printing and publishing were recognized, and made free from licensing and censorship.

Surely it is correct to say that radio is a most potent industry, when it is an agency for the dissemination of news. Then, if the C.B.C. is to continue to control the news, are we not practically turning the clock back and returning to the situation of hundreds of years ago, by putting the dissemination of news under licensing and censorship?

It is not necessary to say, what I believe to be the fact, that up to the present time the corporation has exercised this right with restraint and, I think, with a sense of co-operation. I am assured by fair-minded private broadcasters that that is so. But my first comment is that if the power is a bad power, liable to abuse in the hands of men who are not moderate, then it is folly in the highest degree to continue it merely because at the moment it may be exercised with restraint and control. That is not all. I am not suggesting today that, merely because I am assured it is exercised in the main with restraint and consideration, there is not a great deal of evil connected with it even now. Let me read again from the Massey report, page 27, as follows:

The board of governors retains its control over air channels and programs. This it does in two ways: first, through its power to recommend to the Minister of Transport the grant, renewal or cancellation of licences, and second, through its power to regulate the nature and amount of advertising, political broadcasts, and in general, the character of all programs broadcast in Canada by any station.

I believe that power is having a considerable restraining effect even at the moment. The power outlined there is not a wishy-washy power; it is a power of life and death. It would be entirely unrealistic to suppose that the people in any private station faced with this power would feel that they were not in any way affected. I am informed by well-informed people that it is a mere statement of fact to say that every broadcast over a private station is more or less conditioned by the fear of offending the government. The C.B.C. has the power of life and death over every broadcasting station. As I said, if people have the power of life and death it does not matter much whether they exercise it in a nice or a nasty way. I remember reading an essay somewhere on murder, I think it was by De Quincey. The author said that he "once knew a bulldog who had murdered a brother bulldog with pleasing circumstances of good taste". I suggest that it is not going to be at all helpful to the private broadcasters if this power of life and death is used even in the most pleasant of fashions. The fact that you give a cigarette to a man who is going to hang makes no difference, because he is hung all the same.

Mr. Fleming: Hanged.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thank the hon. member for correcting me. What I have said is that this power overhanging the private broadcasters, however pleasantly it may be used, comes very near to being a pre-broadcast censorship.

We should not pretend that there is not a powerful tendency to suppress criticism of the government.

For instance, take what is going on at this very moment. I am assured that with the present situation so full of moment for the private broadcasters, with the Massey report having been published, with the brief of the private broadcasters having been presented, with the debates in this house and with all the other things that are going on, there has been very little radio discussion by the private stations, and that only in a very guarded and tentative manner. I am assured of that by a man who I believe knows what he is talking about. If that information is correct it does much to demonstrate the fact that there is a feeling of fear and hesitation to express themselves freely in the face of the government and the corporation.

There are just one or two further comments I wish to make. I am sorry to weary the minister and the government, but the first fifteen minutes are the worst.

Mr. Abbott: It would be most interesting if it were correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I only wish that the minister would be, not merely interested, but convinced. I should like to ask the committee to examine for a moment or two the nature of this new agency for the dissemination of information. As the London Economist points out, it is the greatest invention since the invention of printing. The Massey report, on page 23, indicates that Dr. James Thompson, for a short time acting general manager of the C.B.C., referred to radio as being a new device of singular potency for entertainment, information and public persuasion. Does not that phrase "public persuasion" raise inescapable questions as to whether this device of singular potency for entertainment, information and public persuasion should be in the hands of a corporation which to all intents and purposes, so far as control is concerned, is a monopoly?

Does anyone believe that however much it is desired to create an independent corporation, however genuine the officials are in their desire to be absolutely independent, they are not absolutely independent, that the corporation is still, when all is said and done, a creature of the state? Yet the Massey commission, far from deprecating this control, recommends that it should be more vigorously exercised and in that way gives it a kind of additional respectability, I suppose.

Let us look at this for just a moment from the point of view of freedom of the press. Someone has pointed out that anyone who can hire a printing press and buy sufficient newsprint can publish a newspaper, that he does not have to ask the government's permission. But anyone cannot operate a radio station. For one thing we are told that the frequencies are limited and have to be rationed. An informant tells me that that reason is rapidly disappearing as science is overcoming the shortage and we are going to have an abundance of frequencies, if we have not already.

Even if the reason advanced of the necessity for allocation is a valid one, it does not follow that the C.B.C. needs to be invested with power over what the private stations shall broadcast. The situation in the terms of the dissemination of news has been well pointed out by a man, I think he is a newspaper man, who said that it is as if newsprint were so scarce that it had to be rationed by government control and as if the government then said to the newspaper publisher "Before you can have newsprint you must agree to stop publishing speeches by Mr. Drew or stop putting advertisements on the back page or stop making rude comments about Mr. Gardiner in your editorials." If anything like that were done of course it would at once arouse vehement protests, and yet I suggest—I do not think it can be contradicted—that something like that is implied in the power of the C.B.C.

I am utterly unable to understand why the C.B.C. should desire to continue with this power and why the government should be so anxious to have them continue. I would have thought that they could do what, it seems to me, is their real job much better if they did not have this other job to do. It seems to me that that is not their real job and it is one which they should not have at all. I think they would be extremely well advised to divest themselves of this, and I believe it would add to their public support.

It is interesting to note that when radio first came into existence it was placed under the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Apparently no one was very interested in the child and perhaps there was a spare office in that department. That was the way it went. For some years it sort of bounced about and then it was recognized for the great and overwhelmingly important thing that it was but it was some time before it was realized that an invention comparable to printing had been discovered.

I think it would be the height of folly if, because we are ready to praise, as I am, the C.B.C. for the work which they have done and for their enlightened attitude on aesthetic and intellectual development, we were to overlook the fact that here we have a tremendous potential danger to the freedom about which we talk so much. It does not need much stretching of the imagination on the part of anyone to see someone at the head of the C.B.C. who would regard it as childish folly not to use the C.B.C. in times of a general election. I have said already that I believe that those at the head of it are doing their utmost to avoid that. I repeat what I said a moment ago, that we would be foolish to deny the possibility that we might have a very different kind of people and a very different kind of time. Of course everyone knows that radio has been the greatest weapon that dictators have had. I remind you again of Dr. Thompson's words, that it has "singular potency for public persuasion".

Canadian Broadcasting Act

There is one further quotation I wish to make from the Massey report. They recommend that the grant of the privilege of radio broadcasting in Canada should continue to be "under the control of the national government, free from partisan interests." This is surely a very naïve statement. It is only in another and better world that we can really expect a situation of that kind. One writer pertinently asks whether a public corporation is ever completely protected against political considerations. I should like to refer to a statement of Sir Frederick Ogilvie. I do not know anything about him except that he was the second director general of the B.B.C. For all I know he may be the world's greatest reactionary, but it does not worry me in the least. I want to quote a statement he made in February 1946, and members can make up their minds whether or not his words are correct. He had this to say:

Monopoly of broadcasting—

I will come back to that point. I realize that technically we have not a monopoly, but I am suggesting that broadly speaking we have something equivalent to a monopoly. Sir Frederick said:

Monopoly of broadcasting is inevitably a negation of freedom, no matter how efficiently it is run, or how wise and kindly the board or committees in charge of it . . . The B.B.C. itself, good as it is, would gain vastly by the abolition of monopoly . . . The only possible losers would be the various governments of the day—Labour, Tory, coalition or whatnot. Governments are thoroughly suited by the charter as it stands. What better could any government wish for than to have at the end of the street a powerful efficient instrument which has all the appearance of independence but which by the existing provisions of the charter and licence it can control at will.

As I said a moment ago, technically that is not our situation. We have private stations but they are under control of the C.B.C. I have tried to indicate what I think that means.

There was one thing which bothered the Massey commission and that was facsimile. They seemed to feel that in the case of facsimile there was some danger. It did not fit in with their picture of complete independence. They realized that freedom of the press was involved and their suggestion was that state regulation should be confined to technical matters. On page 292 of the Massey report they ask this question:

How can full liberty be assured to this new form of newspaper production without doing violence to the national broadcasting system?

Further on they say:

. . . we can see many grave objections to imposing upon it the limitations necessary for radio broadcasting but inapplicable to the press. It would seem to us both desirable and practicable to ensure that the potential development of facsimile take place in an orderly manner and at the same time the traditional freedom of the press be left unimpaired.

What I utterly fail to understand is why the Massey commission saw the danger there and seemed to think it was confined to facsimile. I think one can only say that they had developed a superstitious kind of worship of the phrase "national broadcasting system", that they seemed to think it had been constructed in heaven and that no one here should lay impious hands on it.

My suggestion is that the argument which led them to stop, look and listen in the matter of facsimile and to try, though perhaps not very effectively, to suggest a way out of that difficulty, should have led them to raise the same question and be troubled by the same doubts with respect to the much broader situation. For that reason I think they were wholly wrong in recommending that these powers be left to the C.B.C. I can only hope that these considerations, which I believe are serious, will not be brushed lightly aside. I think those who take time off to consider them are realizing more and more that there is a problem, and I hope we will not have it brushed aside here in any helter-skelter manner.

Mr. Fleming: There is one brief observation I should like to make. Last night, in speaking on this clause, I made reference to the subject of pending applications for television licences, applications which had been made to the Department of Transport and had been referred by that department to the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for their recommendation in the usual course. I mentioned at page 1847 of Hansard that these applications go back as far as February, 1948, and that some of them are consequently nearly four years old. I find now that I was somewhat misled with regard to that statement. The matter was brought to my attention by a telegram I received at noon today from New Westminster pointing out that radio station CKNW applied for a television licence in August, 1945. The telegram comes to me from station CKNW in New Westminster, B.C.

After obtaining this afternoon a copy of the memorandum filed by the officer of the Department of Transport with the special committee on radio broadcasting, I find on examining the heading of the table that it does not give the information or cover the complete period for which I asked in the committee. The house will appreciate that the proceedings of the committee have not yet been fully printed. The proceedings and minutes of the last three meetings of the committee are not yet available in printed form. At the meeting of December 6 I asked Mr. Browne, the official of the Department of Transport who was then the witness, to produce a list of the outstanding applications for television licences without any limitation as to time.

When the table was submitted by him it was sent immediately to the printer and copies were not available for the members. I was handed a copy at the meeting of Monday last for the purpose of examining it briefly, and I now find on closer examination that the list covers only the period from January 1, 1948, to December 7, 1951. Therefore we are left in the dark as to what applications were made for television licences prior to January 1, 1948. I can only say that we now find there was at least one, namely, CKNW, New Westminster. How many more there are we do not know because the information asked for was not fully supplied.

Therefore I submit the situation is more serious because it is apparent now, while I am not making comments on the fitness of any applicant for a licence, that the fact of the matter is that applications for television licences have been pending for six or seven years, and it has been and continues to be the policy of the government to deny to Canadians the benefits of television except in so far as television may be provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We are told we must continue to wait and that no action will be taken with respect to any application until the television system proposed by the C.B.C. is set up and in operation. I call that a policy of sterilization on the part of the government, a policy of depriving the Canadian people of television to which I think they are entitled.

Mr. McCann: That was an application made prior to when it was decided whether or not we would have television at all.

Mr. Fleming: I do not know whether I have made myself clear.

Mr. McCann: You are pointing out an error in the return.

Mr. Fleming: I am pointing out that the return is not complete and did not give the information I asked for. Far from being a period of three or four years during which those applications have simply been held in suspense, the period has now become seven years. I take it the comment of the minister is directed to the fact the government may not have arrived at a decision as to its policy in 1945 concerning television. How long must the country wait for a constructive policy to develop out of the minds of government? The excuses were given that while the Massey commission was sitting it was not proper that any policy should be laid down. The majority of the Massey commission has recommended a policy which I believe just contributes to this sterile governmental policy in the field of television.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say a few words, Mr. Chairman, which, if they do not have much to do with radio or the C.B.C., may have some relevancy to this discussion. With all due respect to the C.B.C. and radio, I think perhaps my subject is even more important. I should like to say a word or two on the question of freedom, and its application to the pursuit of truth. No doubt we are all united in that we do want to pursue the truth. The trouble is, of course, to find out what is truth. It is an age old question. The nearest I can ever get to it here, I think, is by an application of my intellect to my environment, my environment including as it does creeds, ideologies and opinions of all kinds. Then having examined those I must make my choice.

I am not here condemning any particular programs, nor am I advocating any particular programs, but I do assert, and assert vehemently, that speech must be free. By the same token listening must be free. In short, the intellect must be free to make the choice which I have indicated. If we restrict the freedom to listen, then we are indulging in the very same type of authoritarianism which we deplore in certain other countries. We who hold the majority opinion cannot deny the right to the minority to express theirs. There has been mention here of the influence of what has been termed by one hon. member as "bad programs" upon young people. I have had some experience with young people, both my own children and other people's. I should like to state my own position in that regard. These people have upon them the influence—I am now speaking of my own children—of the home. They know the religious opinions of that home, they know our political opinions, and I hope they will be able to form their own opinions about those things. We hope, of course, that they will be guided by our example. Let me make it clear that it is only a hope, and not an insistence. The only pressure which has ever been exerted upon them so far as I am concerned, or ever will be exerted upon them, is the pressure of what I hope is a good example.

Sir, the child is a new individual. I do not believe the mere fact that he is my child gives me ultimately the right to warp or twist him. He is a new individual and, may I say, a new soul. He must make his own choice. I would encourage him to look; I would have him listen to everything. I would have him see everything and examine everything, and then bring to bear his intelligence so that he may make his own choice. My responsibility in the matter is to guide him along what I believe is the proper road, and to provide him with a good example. My responsibility is to see that he is equipped with the ability which he requires to make his choices. I have tried to be open-minded. I do not attend only the political meetings sponsored by my own party. I go to Conservative meetings, to Liberal meetings and to Social Credit meetings when the opportunity is offered. Let me say that I have learned something from them, and that is why I go. I want to see if there is something I can learn. I do not go there with my eyes and ears closed and with my mind made up.

Let us come to radio, which I might mention incidentally. If there is any control over it, it must be control by a public body which in itself is controlled by this parliament, because parliament represents all the people of Canada. If that applies to radio, it applies with more force to television whose potentialities for good or evil, for vulgarity or decency, are even greater than those offered by radio. In passing, I might say I am well pleased with the C.B.C. on those points, particularly when one considers the difficulties with which that organization has been faced, and which it has done its best to meet. I believe that people at the head of that organization feel their responsibility in regard to the quality of the programs. I believe that when the C.B.C. is not so dependent as it is now upon commercial revenue, it should be able to raise the standard of the average program put out by the corporation.

Now, as to political programs, religious programs or other programs of a controversial nature, I believe they should be in the hands of a body which is prepared to allow all sides of the problem to be aired. This opportunity must be granted, or otherwise this vaunted freedom of speech will be limited by the amount that one is able to spend upon it. In such an event the scales would be heavily weighted in favour of those organizations or individuals who have great funds to spend upon the propagation of their own ideas. These people should have no more privileges on the air than those of less financial means.

I, sir, am not greatly impressed by a doctrine whose holders are not prepared to submit it to argument and public scrutiny. If it is a good argument, a good cause or a good belief, religious or political, it will stand upon its own feet. On the other hand, if those opinions which are expressed are unreasonable or poisonous, a word that has been common in this debate, then I say that the public will have the good sense so to adjudge them.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): If they are prepared to judge it.

Mr. Knight: Matters of religion and Christianity have been drawn into this debate. I do not like to make a parade of these things, but in so far as I am a Christian —and I hope I am a Christian—then I am a Christian not through coercion and not through fear. I am a Christian by my own choice.

Personally I do not think that the doctrine as espoused by the Sermon on the Mount has anything to fear from its detractors over the air or anywhere else. There was no freedom of speech accorded to the early Christians who founded the Christian faith. It is my contention that although they were a minority group, they were entitled to such freedom. Yet in my hon. friend's view they were a minority group. They were a group of revolutionists, as a matter of fact, who were rejected by the majority, despised by orthodoxy, and persecuted by the money changers; and their leader indeed was crucified. But nevertheless they went on to change the face of the world. That last expression makes me think of John Buchan who, as all hon. members will recall, was for a time Governor General of Canada. He said:

> The spark, once transmitted, may smoulder for generations under ashes, but the appointed time will come, and it will flare up to warm the world.

May I say that such spark should not be extinguished, for where there is no spark there can never be a flame.

Finally, let me draw one thing to the attention of some of my hon. friends who think that any opinions with which they do not agree should not be put over the air at public expense. Let me remind them of what Voltaire, with whom I violently disagree on many things, once said in a famous letter: "I disapprove of what you say", said he, "but I will defend to the death your right to say it". That sums up very succinctly and concisely my own opinion with regard to the demand for freedom in its relation to the search for truth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there are just one or two matters that I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. On this occasion I do not intend to discuss the abstract subject of freedom nor to re-express my views with respect to any censorship on the part of the C.B.C. over the programs of the C.B.C., particularly as to speech.

I should like to point out, however, that the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix summed up the situation very well in an editorial on November 28 entitled "Mr. Dunton Faces His Censors". That reference had to do with the appearance of Mr. Dunton before the committee of parliament. It there sets out the difficulties of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in these words:

> The national radio service will always be subject to political influence. Yet, in the long haul, it is wise to keep effective control in the hands of parliament and government, for at least we listeners can get at these people through the ballot box once in a while.

It deals in general with the subject of censorship and says:

> Censorship, whether by elected members of the House of Commons, cabinet ministers, customs officers, provincial bodies or the C.B.C., is a denial of the principle that in democracy freedom must exist under the rule of law.

As I have already said, I do not intend to make any reference to the abstract subject of freedom. But I believe that, when in our country the majority would determine what the minority shall think and say—provided the minority, in thinking and saying what they believe to be correct, are within the law—it would be retrograde and a denial of freedom; for freedom cannot exist when maintained by censorship.

I think that a forward step is being made by the C.B.C. in coming before parliament and receiving grants to continue and to expand the operations of the C.B.C. I challenged that procedure at one time; but having listened to and having read the evidence given before the radio committee, I believe that a forward step is being made in this regard. Someone may say that, in making that statement, I have changed my opinion. In reply, may I say that it should be one of the attributes of freedom not to be bound to the dogmas of one's past thoughts.

Having said that, may I say that I believe that a further forward step should be taken by way of reducing the amount of advertising that today seems to occupy so large a portion of the C.B.C. programs. Where there is advertising, I think it should be restricted to a considerable extent. I can see no reason why Canadians should be told the time and at the same time be subjected to the advertising of any watch company. If the dignity of our nation is to be preserved, surely over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations we are entitled to be told the time without at the same time having a monopoly on the time ascribed to any one watch company.

Then again, I think that some of the advertising is altogether beyond what is fair. It is true enough that all companies will puff up their products; but when they do it over the C.B.C., which is a national institution, there seems to be added to the claims of private advertising the approbation of the national body administering the C.B.C. I think one of the finest examples of good advertising is that in connection with "Singing Stars of Tomorrow". The reference is made that this program is sponsored by one of Canada's leading retailers, but further than that there is not that nauseating type of advertising that one sometimes hears with reference to tea, coffee, soap and the other things that are advertised on the radio.

Mr. Stick: Do you use Camay?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is limited to persons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all, we are being objective today.

Mr. Graydon: Don't answer. It is not in the public interest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to go that far. But in advertising I feel that a more dignified attitude should be adopted when the facilities of the C.B.C. are used.

Mr. McCann: You might include the private stations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are commercial stations.

Mr. McCann: Yes. They can put on anything.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has been said so often. Theirs are commercial stations.

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend the minister has over and over again stated that the national system is not in competition with the private stations. If it is not in competition with the private stations there is no reason why the private stations, being commercial stations, should not use the type of programs and the type of advertising that they choose without at the same time influencing the national body or the national institution. The very interruption that my hon. friend makes indicates that there is a competition for business as between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations, and rather intensifies the demand that hon. members have made over the years; and certainly it underlines the need that where there is competition there should be an independent body to determine the respective rights and authorities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations with whom they are in competition. I think the minister, by that very interruption, has given one of the best arguments why we should have an independent body, designed to assure and preserve that degree of competition as between the national body and the private stations which today is denied when the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in the position of being competitor, lawmaker, judge and jury in regard to all matters in controversy as between the national body and the private station.

Indeed, I was most impressed by the opinion given in the minority report of Mr. Arthur Surveyer, which is to be found in the report of the Massey commission. In his report he asked for the setting up of a regulating body to determine in a semi-judicial manner the controversies as between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations. I am not going into detail at the moment, but I suggest that the amendments proposed in the bill before the committee are merely makeshift. While they appear to set up a semi-judicial or judicial right of review, that is restricted entirely to the rights of the private stations, when a question of law is at stake, to appeal to the exchequer court when a licence of the private station has been suspended or abrogated. The amendment does not cover the field referred to by Mr. Surveyer in his minority report. All it does is to permit the right of appeal on a question of law, not fact, where a private station has had its licence suspended or abrogated.

I cannot understand the attitude of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in being so opposed to an independent body being set up. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways are in competition for freight and passenger business. By his interruption a moment ago the minister indicated that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations are in competition over advertising. That being so, where there is a class of interests such as that, surely however well intentioned the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may be, human nature being what it is, it cannot determine rights as between itself and those with whom it is in competition.

I know this argument will not be accepted, because the stand of the minister and those who preceded him in that position during the last ten or twelve years has been one of very strong opposition to such a body being set up. Nonetheless, as a result of the weight of public opinion, the government has seen fit at least to assure the private stations the right of appeal when deprived of their licences either temporarily or permanently, but that in turn is restricted only to a question of law. What does that mean? How many appeals will ever be made under that section? If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation cancels the licence of a private station on the ground that it has failed to live up to a regulation passed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that is a regulation as interpreted by the lawmaker, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, there will be no right of appeal. This right of appeal on a question of law is so restricted as to be almost a nullity before it is actually passed by parliament. I am going to suggest to the minister that the right of appeal should be widened to cover not only the questions of law but also questions of fact, so that justice may be assured when and if a private licence is suspended or abrogated either permanently or temporarily.

I now come to one further matter, namely the question of television. Those of us who live in other parts of Canada than Quebec and Ontario have a justifiable complaint that we are to be denied even the prospect of the likelihood of a hope of having television within the next ten years. Montreal and Toronto are to have television stations, but Winnipeg and Vancouver are given a rather nebulous promise that sometime in the dim future stations will be established there. Is television to be held back in this country because of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does not desire, for reasons which it knows, or by reason of difficulties over which it has no immediate control, to give it to us? Are we to be denied television when there are available private companies, and I believe private Canadian companies, willing and able to provide television in different parts of our country? Somebody has asked: Are we to allow United States companies to come into Canada and establish television? I only hope the same desire to maintain the development of our country had been characteristic of governments in the past. Our country is being developed; these great oil fields in western Canada are being opened up and are available to Canadians who have initiative to go ahead, yet they were allowed to remain dormant until financial interests in the United States came into our country. I would like to see Canadian companies given an opportunity to establish television in this country; for surely we are not to be held back for years just because the national policy at the moment denies to private companies the opportunity to expand and develop an industry that is rapidly becoming one of the great industries across the line.

How long have we to wait? Well, there is an article in today's Globe and Mail regarding the television station that is being built in Toronto. It says:

> Canadian television programs which, a year ago, were set to begin this fall will not go on the air before June at the earliest, a C.B.C. official said yesterday.

He gave the reason as lack of steel priority and the like. Then he announced this:

> A Canadian television network is far in the future.

The article goes on:

> It was indicated that licences for private TV stations will not be granted until C.B.C. has a national service.

Now we know, if that C.B.C. official who spoke yesterday in Toronto represented the policy of the C.B.C., that as far as western Canada is concerned, until a national system has been established—and at the rate the C.B.C. is going that is a long, long while in the future—no consideration will be given to the granting of licences to private companies. This is a retrograde step. It is a denial of the type of expansion we need in this country. If private industry is prepared to develop and expand this very necessary mode of communication in these modern days, then surely if the C.B.C. is not in a position to go ahead those of us in other parts of Canada should not have to wait until such time as a national system is set up before consideration is given to the applications of private companies.

Those are one or two considerations which had not been discussed at length, and which I thought should be placed before the committee. I believe the C.B.C. is doing an outstanding job; but that does not mean there is no room for improvement. That does not mean the C.B.C., in its policy on television, should be permitted to stagnate development in this country that would take place if at least the applications for licences by private companies were considered.

Furthermore this policy of stagnation in television is driving Canadians in cities along the border to the United States to secure the kind of programs Canadians have the right to expect in their own country. That would be bearable, were the policy of the C.B.C. such that, while granting priority to the C.B.C., it would not deny to private companies and to the people as a whole the right to the kind of service people across the line receive from private enterprise.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have just a brief word. I was not a member of the committee, but I have read the reports carefully and it is my view that they did a good job.

I have risen to give two warnings. I have received many resolutions from different branches of the church. Perhaps one of the best was from the Knights of Columbus which, it seemed to me, summed up pretty well what was said in the other resolutions. This particular one warns the government not to allow the C.B.C. to broadcast programs that are atheistic in their nature, sponsored by either men or organizations that treat God as a myth. So far as I am concerned—and I speak for a few—we are not going to tolerate this sort of thing. I am proud to think that the C.B.C. will back up these resolutions.

What is behind this sort of teaching? Mr. Link in his book "Way to Security" states clearly who are back of this propaganda. It is the advocates of Karl Marx. He tells us who Karl Marx was, that he was born of a reputable and well-to-do father. He sent his son to a good school, but the son could not get along with his associates in that school and left. His father got him a good job, and he quit the job because he could not get along with his associates. He married, and after a while could not get along with his wife. He had four sons, three of whom committed suicide. Then he persuaded a wealthy man to give him financial backing so that he could write "Das Kapital". Since that day, and from that book, hate has been spreading throughout the world. I would be sorry to think that the C.B.C. would have anything to do with that sort of thing. I know we believe in freedom of spech, but any freedom that tends to undermine the faith of our fathers and our faith, we are going to watch carefully.

My other word of warning flows from the fact that I have received a number of resolutions to the effect that the C.B.C. should not be used to advertise the liquor business. It has plenty of money to advertise in other ways, and we do not want to have that kind of advertising on the air.

I congratulate the minister upon his patience, and we wish him the best kind of success in his work.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I believe I should make my position clear, especially after the speech of the hon. member for Saskatoon. I thought some of his remarks were intended for me, or for others among my friends who have been advocating that this or that script should not be broadcast over the C.B.C.

I must say that the officials of the broadcasting corporation have demonstrated a full comprehension of our attitude as expressed in committee. We dealt specially with the scripts of Dr. Chisholm, Dr. Ewen Cameron, Dr. Anna Freud and Dr. Carl Binger, as well as with those of Dr. Bertrand Russell. I shall not discuss all these this afternoon, because I do not wish to delay the discussion.

Let me say, however, that it is not because we do not believe in freedom of speech that we asked the C.B.C. officials not to permit the reading of those scripts on the air. It is because we thought they were wrong. And we thought they were wrong because they advocated policies, for example, such as that of birth control. We ask those who, in the name of freedom of speech, are ready to permit the spreading of those ideas on the air whether, if such a policy were accepted and put into force by the governments of the world, we would be a free people.

It is all right to speak about freedom; but it is easy to be enslaved by having too much freedom, especially when the ideas expressed are wrong. The hon. member for Saskatoon said he did not want to twist or force his children into believing this or that. Well, I do not attempt to give him a lesson in bringing up his children. Such a thing would be far from my mind. But for myself, if I am to be charitable toward my children I believe I have to keep away from them everything that could harm them physically, intellectually, spiritually or morally.

I use the word "morally" with a purpose, because I believe when we permit the expression of the theory of Freud by this or that speaker over the air, then they are expressing an immoral idea. And if immorality is not wrong, then I must ask myself—as all hon. members will—what is wrong? It is immoral to advocate that our children should have no control placed over their sexual appetites. Those ideas have been expressed by some speakers who advocate the Freud philosophy. That is the stand we took in the committee; and we think we were not wrong in asking that normal, sensible ideas be expressed over the C.B.C. and the privately owned stations.

When we ask that the C.B.C. be more careful in the choice of its commentators or moralists, I do not think we are wrong. When we ask that truth be given priority on the air, I do not think we are wrong. I do not think it has been expressed before that truth is relative. Truth is one and indivisible. You cannot have two truths. It is impossible. We do not like to have these principles advocated.

It is all right to say that our children should be free to listen to anything on the radio and form their own opinions. We may think we are right in saying that, but we are wrong because our children have not been prepared to assimilate, to digest and to separate a dish of good food from a dish of poison. They cannot differentiate because they have not been prepared. That is why we ask that a proper selection be made of the scripts used by the C.B.C. I do not think we are wrong or too dogmatic in expressing our views in that regard. It is all right to say that one who expresses a good idea should not be afraid that it will come to naught. Communists were a minority but we allowed them to express their ideas everywhere and distribute their literature. Their philosophy was immoral, but it spread just the same. I am not at all afraid that the principles of the faith in which I believe will be endangered by communist principles, but I say it is not right for a public man to try to do away with the possibility of harm being done to the wax-like intellects of our children. We should not let them listen to everything and try to digest it themselves, especially when they are not prepared. It is our duty, it is the duty of the professors in our colleges and universities, to prepare them.

We should not permit ideas like those advocated by Freud to be spread among our younger population with the possibility of our young people becoming sex maniacs. That is why I got up in the committee the other day to ask that this kind of script should not be used by the C.B.C. I am a supporter of the C.B.C., as I think they are doing a good job. But I think they have also been a little careless. I hope the few remarks I have made this afternoon will be taken in good part, but if this situation is repeated I will be back again.

I am not ready to advocate that there be a full discussion followed by a vote on this matter. I think I know the opinion of nearly all hon. members in the House of Commons, and I think they will agree with me when I ask the C.B.C. to be careful and more charitable toward our children in the views they permit to be expressed over the air. It is all right to speak in the name of freedom, but I think it is immoral to think that we can give equal rights to evil and good.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I have listened most patiently to the discussion in the hope that some member from the other end of the country might get up. Someone from practically every part of the country has expressed his opinion on this matter except a representative from the maritime provinces. This is a most thought-provoking subject. After listening to the debate my opinion is that the best contribution has been made by the hon. member for Brandon. He is a young man still in university as a teacher and is apparently very studious, as is evidenced by the way he handled the discussion. I was very much struck with the observations he made on the whole matter.

I should like to make it quite clear that we have always supported the C.B.C., but I would point out that in the development of radio in Canada the trend has been toward centralization. We would have had no radio until late 1948 in our part of the country if it had been left to the C.B.C. The private station that covers Cape Breton Island, where one-third of the population of Nova Scotia is located, has done a very good pob. I want it to have that credit. It pioneered in that area and gave us service. It took the C.B.C. a long time to realize that there were a few provinces east of Montreal. That has been a general trend, and it has been repeated in this organization.

I was not a member of the committee, but I have read some of the press reports and some of the evidence given before the committee. In so far as television is concerned, no survey has been made of the maritime provinces. The corporation have stated that next year they will be able to give television service in Toronto, and will be close to giving it in Montreal. They have said also that they have a delayed program for Winnipeg and Vancouver, but east of Montreal there has been no thought of anything. I just want to let the C.B.C. know that there are four provinces east of Montreal. The people there pay taxes, and they would like to get television some time. I hope it will not take the C.B.C. as long to develop television in that part of the country as it did to establish radio broadcasting.

The C.B.C. station at Sydney does not provide much competition to the private station because the wavelength is poor, and it is rather difficult to get the station most of the time. Therefore it is rather hard to justify praise of the C.B.C. I believe in the C.B.C. because I think such an agency was absolutely necessary in order to allocate wavelengths and maintain some sanity in the field. They have done a good job on that.

What I am saying with regard to the lack of a survey in that part of the country is pretty well reflected in all government thinking. It is a centralized formula that is established in the centre of Canada. With respect to Brock Chisholm, Bertrand Russell and the others, so far as I am concerned I am completely opposed to that kind of propaganda being broadcast over the air. I think we should sit down, think seriously about the matter and try to differentiate between freedom of the air and freedom of speech on the one hand and a licence to abuse and insult on the other hand. There is quite a difference. I think the teachings of Brock Chisholm, Bertrand Russell and the rest of them belong in the universities. When a young man or young woman matriculates and enters university I think their minds are mature enough to differentiate between the teaching they got from their fathers and mothers and whatever religious body they may have belonged to and the teachings of the people to whom I have referred. I think they are able to sift the good from the bad in what Brock Chisholm, Bertrand Russell and others are teaching. I do not think it belongs on the air.

There are also those who take the view that people have the right to judge for themselves, and that children have the right to make their own selection. I should like to remind hon. members of an item that appeared in the press a few days ago. It said that 50 per cent of the freshmen class at McGill university were so immature that they did not know who the Prime Minister of Canada was. They thought the Secretary of State for External Affairs was the leader of the opposition. That is not my statement; it is a press statement. It would not be a bad idea if the C.B.C. were to institute a series of lectures to build up the institution of parliament in the minds of the Canadian people. Parliament is taking a pretty bad beating in the press, over the air and in many other ways. Boys and girls who were smart enough to go through high school and enter university apparently do not know very much about the institution of parliament and democracy as we understand it. I think the C.B.C. should put on a program series to try to build up parliament in the minds of the Canadian people, particularly the young people entering our universities because they are the ones who will be the leaders of tomorrow. If they come out of university with minds filled with the teachings of Anna Freud and Brock Chisholm, the future of Canada is going to be a rather doubtful proposition.

All through the discussion of programs so far as television and radio are concerned I have heard it said that we have to build up the culture of the country. That is a matter of definition. When I listen to Brock Chisholm, Anna Freud and these others, and the debate in the house today, and see the beating the institution of parliament is taking and the ridicule to which members are subjected, I am reminded of the propaganda disseminated in Europe in the twenties and thirties which led to the rise of Hitler. Hon. members will recall that the Hitlers, the Goerings, the Schachts and the rest of them were going to develop a new culture in Europe. They were going to develop a super race. Their philosophy was based on the teachings of Nietzsche They were going to make Hitler God. All the mythology of the past in the form of religion was to be stamped out. The totalitarian mind is very impatient when it comes to bodies such as the House of Commons, which move slowly. They want the right to move fast and to say they are going to do this and that. This insidious process came into being in Europe, and we should be careful when it comes to determining the cultural requirements of everybody in the country to see that we are not just absorbing a whole lot of the philosophy that has been disseminated throughout the world over the last twenty years in an effort to break down democracy and displace the institution of parliament.

I have sat and listened to all the debate and, mind you, I am just one of the proletariat. I do not consider myself to be very cultured. I think the dictionary definition of culture is that it is a matter of manners, intellect and taste. I know many well-mannered people who are very intelligent but when it comes to a choice between listening to a C.B.C. radio play on the death of Socrates or Amos and Andy, they will pick Amos and Andy. If we believe in freedom then we should have freedom of choice. We should not have something jammed down our throats from coast to coast on a Sunday evening, when people have time to sit down and listen, for which we do not care very much. Having in mind the definition of culture and the classics of the past, it took us a couple of hundred years to get around to saying, "Where are you going?", rather than "Whither goest thou?"

If you try to impose all the limitations and cumbersome methods of doing things in the past on a modern fast-moving world it is not going to work. I should like to know, for example, how many people would listen to a Shakespeare play, or look at it on television, while the Grey Cup final was being broadcast. There would not be very many. When we instituted our radio system I never thought it would be a straight educational and cultural organization moulded to conform to the ideas of any one individual or half a dozen people. The universities and schools are there for that purpose, and people can make their choice of what they want to study.

So far as I am concerned, I visualize radio and television largely as mediums of entertainment. I think that is the purpose for which the average person buys a radio set and for which he will buy a television set. The great majority of our people left school when they were in very low grades. They are not going to sit in their homes and have heavy Shakespearean plays and that kind of thing thrust at them which most of them do not understand, and no matter how often you keep shoving it at them they will not understand any more about it. They believe and I believe that radio and television should be largely designed to provide entertainment. I know there is a place for education. I enjoy the forum broadcasts very much. In my opinion they are a valuable asset. I listen to them whenever they are on the air. I do not care what the subject is. If two or three people on such a broadcast are discussing a question, then that is educational. You have got three sides of the question in most cases, or two sides with a chairman in the middle keeping the thing in balance. There is a lot of value in such broadcasts. People can understand that kind of thing, but when you take a man like Brock Chisholm and put him on the air with his theories on psychiatry you are only getting one side of the question. There is no debate and no discussion.

In my opinion it is largely wasted, because I do not think the average person in this country is interested in that subject. The great majority of them do not understand what he is talking about. All the evidence I have had as to the value of it has been against it. I have had letters protesting that kind of thing, but I have never had anyone write to me and say we should continue it. I do not believe we should remove it from the air, but I suggest to the C.B.C. that any time Bertrand Russell or Brock Chisholm is to go on the air the program should be like a forum so there could be a discussion of both sides of the subject. I believe the C.B.C. is wrong in putting it on in the manner they have been following.

There are medical doctors in this house, and they know that psychiatry is going directly into that field. The psychiatrist has about as much respect for the medical profession as he has for religion. They believe it is a case of mind over matter. I had one experience with psychiatrists, and if the theories they expressed on these broadcasts were no better than the experience I had with one of them in the veterans affairs department, then I do not think very much of them. When the last war was over the government relegated most of the boys who came out of the service with nervous breakdowns—psychopaths or whatever you want to call them—to the regular insane asylums.

This was done on the advice of the psychiatric department. This department said you could not be good to these fellows because they would never get better. On the advice of this psychiatric division these fellows were put away. Their wives and families were outside without any allowance, and these men were to be cured by leaving them in the institution. Their wives and children were left outside to starve to death.

We had the head of the psychiatric division before the veterans affairs committee at that time. I do not want to be disparaging, but I questioned him for a long time and I never saw a person more in need of a psychiatrist than he was. He stood there and tore a pocket handkerchief into about a thousand pieces while he was talking to us. I do not suppose he even knew he was doing it. I was not impressed with his theories. The government eventually took care of the matter and realized that the wife and children had to eat, regardless of whether or not the man was going to get better. I am not impressed by these theories. I have been the sort of fellow who knew he had to learn a lot, so I have read a lot of that material. It has not changed my opinion about anything. I agree with the hon. member for Macleod that the best teachers for the children of this country are the fathers and mothers in the homes. If the basis of a strong character cannot be made there, then neither Freud nor Brock Chisholm is going to do very much afterward.

I was brought up in a church. I have gone through life, and it has been a rather rough life, but I have never seen anything that changed any of the basic beliefs I learned there. In all the ups and downs of life those basic principles I learned when I was taught my catechism in my church have held constant and still hold good. Any time I hear a person talking about having a Christian philosophy, and at the same time belittling any religious body, I do not believe him. I think everyone who is a Christian finds his beliefs in the same basis. In my opinion all the Christian churches go together; you cannot separate them. I am not in a position to give advice to the hon. members of this house, but I have lived for fifty-five years and I have seen a lot of this world, and I suggest that anyone who has watched events for the last twenty years will realize that we want to be a little careful about our desire to expand freedom of that kind to make sure we are not giving licences to a lot of people.

Let us stop for a moment to think about the trade union movement in this country and in the United States. No organization in North America has greater respect for freedom than the trade union movement. What do you find the heads of the three congresses doing within the last couple of years? They realized the danger of subversive activities, and they had to use some discipline. They had to get a measuring stick to determine where freedom ended and where licence, abuse and vilification started. These congresses threw out some large bodies of unionists as a disciplinary measure to impress some small groups at the top who persisted in using their positions for the purpose of undermining everything for which the movement stood. I am suggesting to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they have a great responsibility to the future of this country, as have the newspapers. When they are thinking and talking about this business of freedom, democracy, preserving peace and all the things which we are building an army to defend, our language should be as moderate as we can possibly make it. This institution of parliament should not be held up to ridicule as it has been on a good many occasions in the last couple of years.

When controversial subjects are being dealt with, such as the one about which we are talking—and it is controversial because it hits at the very roots of society—rather than having one man on the air for half an hour the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, recognizing that it is controversial, should have someone else there to take the other side of the argument. The program should be a forum. I do not believe in stopping anyone from expressing his opinion, but I feel that with subjects such as this which are highly controversial care should be taken that they are presented in such a way that the people listening have an opportunity of balancing one statement against the other.

Mr. Blackmore: I have greatly enjoyed the contributions of the various members in respect of this whole matter, Mr. Chairman. At the beginning of the discussion my remarks were rather inclined to be non-constructive, but I should like to say something of a constructive nature now.

As other hon. members have so well said, I believe that all the points of view on all subjects, religious, political or other kinds, ought to be given an opportunity of being heard. I believe in freedom of speech to the fullest degree. Our position is that no particular philosophy or interest originating propaganda should be given free play to establish its particular notions consistently and consecutively without adequate reply.

If we might refer to our friend Brock Chisholm again for a moment or two, I would say that apparently we are discussing his particular freedom to use the air. I wonder why Brock Chisholm should have any more freedom to use the air than any of the other several million mature men in Canada. I do not think he has established any right above the rights of other people to have his opinions freely expressed. Then is Brock Chisholm speaking for someone else? Is there some interest behind Brock Chisholm which is seeking for freedom of expression? I am afraid that is the case, although I hope it is not.

I said this morning some fairly strong things, and I meant them; and I will say them again any time they need to be said. But I should like to put on what I said this qualification, which I thought unnecessary at the time but which I certainly had in mind. I do not mind having Brock Chisholm come into my home and express his views freely if I can be in my home and have just as much time as he has to put forward the other side. Let us take, for example, the evolutionary theory. I should be quite happy to have him discuss before my family—and they are the most precious possessions I have in life—the evolutionary theory if I can be there to say: "Now, look here, friend, have you read Sir Ambrose Fleming's "Origin of Mankind"? Are you aware that this book completely subverts your evolutionary theory? Have you read "The Bible is True" by Charles Marston, published in 1934? Do you realize that that destroys completely the grounds for your attitude of higher criticism toward the bible, as does also "The Bible comes Alive" published in 1937 by the same man? Do you realize that Sir Ambrose Fleming is backed up by Lecomte du Nouy in his "Human Destiny" and by Sir James Jeans, one of the very best scientists in the world?"

If I can have the time to put those things before my family in his presence, or before anybody else's family, I have no anxiety because Brock Chisholm and all the men believing as he does can be utterly torn to shreds by men who are as well informed as they are on the other side of the subject they are discussing. But to put him up there with a free hand for fifteen, twenty, thirty or forty minutes, with no chance in the world for anyone to answer him, is something that I say is almost necessarily the abnegation of true freedom of speech.

I rather incline to the ideas expressed by two or three hon. members whose names I have forgotten for the moment; the hon. member for Cape Breton South was the last one. If we are to discuss for instance the matter of what to do about the rapidly increasing birth rate in certain parts of the world, let us plan a town meeting of the air. Let us have three or four men who are qualified to talk about the matter. Let us meet and prepare thoroughly, as I know men do when they are going to have a town meeting of the air, and let us have somebody there who can present the alternative to the reckless idea Brock Chisholm is endeavouring to establish in the minds of the people. Then I would have no anxiety at all.

I would rather like to hear Brock Chisholm on the air if you could put alongside of him a man who knew how to deal with him; and there are plenty of those. I would not hesitate to stand before him at any town meeting of the air or on any platform; and there are plenty of people who could do the job just as well as I could.

Mr. Chairman, I thought it was probably well to say what I have said, in a manner, closing off what I said a little while ago. I still agree with exactly what I said, but I would put this little modifying speech alongside the former one, as giving the C.B.C. something constructive to work on rather than only what would be destructive.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I merely want to make one or two remarks on this subject. I think the debate has been extremely interesting. It shows one thing, namely the danger of a central government organization in radio, and the extreme danger lest we in this chamber set ourselves up as censoring what the Canadian people shall listen to. That is a dangerous trend. I do not think it is part of the job of a parliament to state what shall and what shall not be listened to. I merely mention that point because of the same dangerous trend which I see in these discussions.

The mass media of the radio and the moving pictures are failing to interest people, in my opinion, largely because of what I shall call infantilism. They are playing down to the most juvenile type of intellect you can imagine. As a matter of fact, somebody said to me the other day that the moving pictures have now been developed for the average teen-ager of seventeen or eighteen. I fear that radio has ceased to be the force it once was. I note this trend in the major urban centres. It is ceasing to be the force it once was because it is constantly appealing to a lower and lower intellectual level. That may be a good thing or it may be a bad thing; I do not know. But I know that the interest in radio has definitely slackened—that is, shall we say, in the more or less intellectual side of radio—in the major cities or urban centres.

I now want to make an observation with regard to the report of the Massey commission on this subject. The commission regarded with approbation an association known as the Canadian writers' committee. I was interested in this matter because I used to know some of the people who belonged to Canadian authors' guild. I tried to find out who this Canadian writers' committee was. All I could learn about them was that they were an ad hoc organization brought together apparently for the purpose of making this submission. As far as I could find out it consisted of Dr. Frank Scott, a man called Len Peterson and somebody called Bissell working at the university of Toronto. Dr. Frank Scott is well known for his socialist views for which I respect him but with which I disagree. Len Peterson is a commentator on the C.B.C., and is employed more or less full time by that organization as a free-lance writer. I could not find anything about the third member of this so-called writers' committee.

It seems that the difficulty in accepting views advanced on this subject—and of course it would be the difficulty of any royal commission—is that they have not been able to get the opinion of the ordinary man in the street with regard to the whole question of radio. Perforce they have to accept, and do accept, the opinions of those who I suggest in this case are prejudiced witnesses, who have every right to their submission and every right to their prejudices, as each one of us has; but I disagree that they represent either Canadian writers or the Canadian reading public. These facts should be brought out. The problem is of very great importance.

The rural parts of Canada are very much more dependent upon and more interested in radio than are the urban parts. I think that would be borne out by any survey of the listening habits of the Canadian people. We have to be most careful in bringing down opinions on this extremely controversial subject. For example, I heard that when the federation of agriculture brief was given it had not been submitted to the general meeting; and as a matter of fact a man called Howard Prentice was refused the opportunity of being heard by the federation and by the committee because he disagreed with that brief. Therefore I suggest that when we are considering this whole matter of radio the report we have in front of us, while it is sincere, is nevertheless apt to be based on the opinions of prejudiced witnesses. Therefore it must be considered in that light.

I am not going into the question of private radio stations, because that has been dealt with very adequately by others. I do wish to emphasize that unless the intellectual standard of radio is kept up, some fear that it will go the same way the moving pictures were going until they began to take hold of themselves, by basing its appeal on the adolescent mind and the undeveloped mentality. That is the greatest danger we face today in radio programs in Canada.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, this discussion on second reading of Bill No. 17 has assumed a rather broader latitude than I had expected, although I have no criticism to offer of that in particular. It was thought that by referring this whole matter of radio broadcasting to a special committee perhaps time would be saved and there would be more complete examination of all matters having to do with radio.

The committee did have the advantage of information given to it by the officers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and of representations made by outside interests and by those who were interested in radio privately. Although it is not my intention to speak at length on the whole question of radio, because that has been dealt with pretty much in the abstract here yesterday and today, the submissions I made upon the resolution preceding the bill and upon second reading of the bill put forth as clearly as I could, and perhaps in as much detail as might be expected, the position of the government and of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, so it is not my intention to go into more detail and to make any kind of a lengthy speech.

At this time I do want to congratulate the committee on radio broadcasting on the excellent work they have done, and to thank them for their deliberations. It afforded an opportunity, as I said before, of getting in detail both the criticism and the suggestions of those who were interested in radio. During the years in which I have taken an interest in this particular subject I do not know that we have had a better committee than the one which examined into that subject this year. I am like the hon. member for Brandon who spoke today, who said that he found the work very interesting and very stimulating. That was exactly my reaction to it years ago on the first radio committee that I attended. I think that has been the reaction of some of those hon. members of the house who have sat on this and similar committees having to do with radio broadcasting. Therefore at this time I want to take the opportunity—and it may be the only opportunity I shall have—to say thanks to the members of the committee, and to commend them for the excellent work they have done.

Among the things the radio committee did, which I think was of great advantage, was to visit Montreal and see our Radio Canada building. That was well worth-while. I think it was an eye-opener to the members of the committee to see the physical side of what goes into both television and sound broadcasting. It surely must have given them some tangible demonstration of what the costs are in radio, because, as was pointed out here yesterday, when you see a mobile unit for television with four cameras that cost in the neighbourhood of $100,000 you can well imagine what all the equipment costs. On the floor on which the mobile unit was located there was a million dollars worth of television equipment which was ordered by this country a year ago last May from the Marconi people in England. I was in their factory and saw some of it in the process of manufacture. When one sees a building of that type with its splendid studios, its great control board, the equipment and machines for making recordings, as well as all the other equipment, and couples with that the highly-paid officials, he can readily understand why the cost of radio, both sound radio and television, is as high as it is.

On December 4 the radio committee made its second report, at which time it reported Bill No. 17 to the house. The committee considered the bill carefully, and it has been reported to the house with only one slight amendment. The final report of the committee is expected shortly, and I am sure it will give expression to what have been the results of the deliberations of the committee, and will set out its recommendations.

The suggested changes in the act, with which we are now dealing, are those based upon the Massey report. Let me say at once that in my judgment whether we agree with it or not the Massey report is one of the finest, probably the finest report we have ever had. I say that because the commission went into great detail, took great pains to cover the whole country and to invite people to make submissions; and it did all these things to a much greater extent than any other commission we have ever had in this country dealing with radio.

Having set up the commission, and as a result of the representations made to it, the government is guided by those recommendations which go to form the report itself. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Greenwood deal almost entirely with the Massey report. Evidently he is not very favourable to it. I hope there has been no rift between him and his friends. Perhaps he was only laying the basis for some friendly family arguments over the Christmas season. He referred to this being the fifteenth anniversary of radio, and dates it back to 1936, when the Canadian Broadcasting Act was put into effect. He said it was a matter of regret that a former prime minister of this country and his government, who were in power from 1930 to 1935—and he was referring to Right Hon. R. B. Bennett—were not given credit for having implemented the report of the Aird commission. Well, about the only people I have heard casting any discredit upon that right hon. gentleman have been members of his own party. The reason they find themselves in the position they are in today is that they repudiated the political philosophy of that right hon. gentleman and his government, when they held office between 1930 and 1935. The hon. member would like to get away from that and start out on an entirely new basis.

The section in the Massey report dealing with television states:

> In radio broadcasting Canada experimented with a purely commercial system before changing to a national system.

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett changed that system on the basis of the Aird report, which was made at that time. I suggest to the committee that no sensible leader of the government, no matter what party he might be leading, would have followed a different course. It was clearly indicated that that was the course in the best interests of the people of Canada, and that was the course the people would endorse and would follow: a policy of national ownership and a nationally operated radio system. So I say the difficulties are principally based on the fact that his own party at this time is not following what was laid down by Mr. Bennett at that time.

The growth of radio in Canada has not yet achieved all for which we might hope in a national system. I quote again from section 80 in the Massey commission's report, where they say:

> It is still young. It has had to struggle against poverty, inexperience, and the physical obstacles of this difficult country. But, as we have suggested in part I and have stated here in language as clear and unambiguous as we can command, we are convinced that the existing Canadian system of broadcasting has served the country well in the past and offers the greatest hope of national unity and enlightenment in the future. We urge that the national broadcasting system be given the power and resources sufficient for its great national responsibilities.

Could there be any stronger recommendation than that? It is a recommendation, not made without deliberation, not made in haste, but made by the top men of this country, investigating it after years of deliberation and study.

There have been a number of criticisms by several hon. members which perhaps were just and legitimate, but which I believe can be answered shortly. I think it was the hon. member for Eglinton who, referring to the Canadian association of broadcasters and the recommendation that we should have a regulatory body, was critical of our present system. I would point out to him that the evidence before the committee shows that the Canadian association of broadcasters has shifted its ground very much within the last few years. What they want now is a regulatory body only with reference to the technical aspects of radio, and that to come from the Department of Transport. I suggest there is nothing to gain if they are going to attempt to wreck the set-up in the Department of Transport, just as throughout the years they have attempted to break down the system we have had under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The hon. member was critical, too, of our television policy. This afternoon he referred to the fact that applications for television licences had been made back as early as 1945.

Mr. Fleming: They might have been before that, so far as I know.

Mr. McCann: Well, some bright individual may have had an idea twenty years ago, or perhaps ten years ago, that a franchise would have some monetary value for him, and that television would come into being in this country; and for that reason might have put in an application. But, to go back even as far as 1945, I suggest such a person would not have had the slightest idea at that time what it would cost to set up television.

We have been criticized for being dilatory or slow in enunciating a policy and putting it into effect. I suggest that the action of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the government in that regard has saved the people of this country millions of dollars. In 1945 or 1946 one could easily have formulated a policy and attempted to implement it, and the result would have been that what was purchased at that time would have been obsolete by this date. Three years ago I accompanied the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to New York where we studied the matter of television. We were shown by National Broadcasting, Columbia and private interests what they had done. They told us that they had spent $50 million up to that date and that most of it had been spent to no avail. We have profited by the progress which has been made in television.

As far as issuing of licences for television goes, I have been told in private conversation that not one single person or group of persons is prepared immediately to spend money to go into the development of a private television unit. It would cost at least $500,000 for a set-up, and any group would have to be prepared to spend probably another $500,000 before they would reach the operating stage. A further cause for delaying the progress we would like to have made has been the shortage of materials for transmitters, steel for towers and the other things that go into the building of a television station. All these are in short supply, and we are in no better position than private persons or enterprises in making application to the steel controller. We do not get any preference in that regard.

I should like to say a word with reference to the much discussed matter of controversial broadcasting. I am going to put on record what I thought was a very good article which appeared in Saturday Night of December 15. The C.B.C., the Prime Minister and myself and I presume many members of parliament and of the government have received all kinds of correspondence with reference to the controversial broadcasts. A great many people objected to them, while many more commended the freedom of speech that had been allowed by the C.B.C. One is put in the position of deciding whether he should recommend closer censorship, or whether the freedom which has been exercised for years should be allowed to continue. This article reads:

> This journal shares very fully the view, which is now being expressed by a good many organizations of national or provincial scope, that there should not be any further restrictions imposed by statute on the character of the material which may be sent out over the air on Canadian wavelengths, beyond those which have been in force ever since the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was set up to regulate radio in Canada. These restrictions leave to the C.B.C. a very large freedom as to what it will broadcast and what it will not broadcast, and on the whole that freedom has been exercised for some fifteen years with great judgment and direction.

I think that is most significant. The article then goes on to discuss in some detail the broadcast given by Hoyle, the astrophysicist, and it has some criticism to offer with respect to that. It then continues:

> But we do not for a moment suggest that the fact of our differing with the C.B.C. in this instance is a reason for fettering the C.B.C. for all time with a statutory prohibition against certain proscribed ideas, or still worse, against certain proscribed broadcasters.
> We believe that there is a difference between radio and other forms of communication, and that the proposition that any and every idea has a right to communication on the radio in the same way as it has a right to communication in print or in an assembly, provided only that it is not indecent, seditious, libelous or calculated to promote disorder, is untenable.

I agree with that. It goes on:

But we believe that parliament would be most unwise to attempt itself to distinguish between those ideas which may be broadcast and those which may not, and still more unwise to hand over a general power to do so to a board of censors whose chief concern would inevitably be to allow nothing on the air which could possibly be the object of any protest.

I believe that in connection with these controversial broadcasts there should be an opportunity for reply. I would think also that the broadcasters or commentators ought to have sufficiently good judgment to say nothing that would be either insulting or offensive to the Christian religious beliefs and sensibilities prevalent in this country. I think censorship to that extent might very well be employed. It is not very often that we have criticism of that type in connection with the C.B.C. I am bound to admit that in this particular instance probably something got over the air which it would have been better for the great majority of our people not to have been permitted.

This morning the hon. member for Kootenay West referred to the needs of the southern interior of British Columbia. I feel quite sure we can assure him that when this bill goes through and our financial position is better than it has been for a number of years it will be the policy of the C.B.C. to greatly expand its facilities and that part of British Columbia will be looked after. I do not know that there is anything to be gained by taking up further time that might well be given to a consideration of the details of the bill.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Grants.

Mr. Fleming: This section raises the whole question of the financing of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The section provides that power shall be given to the Minister of Finance to grant to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund the sum of $4,750,000 in the present fiscal year and the sum of $6,250,000 in each of the next four fiscal years.

It will be recalled by the committee that a grant of $1,500,000 was made to the C.B.C. last spring so that if this section is adopted it will provide the C.B.C., along with the grant made last spring, with an annual grant of $6,250,000 over a period of five years. This provision happens to tally with the recommendation of the Massey commission, to be found on page 293 of the report. They indicate that the corporation will annually require, in order to carry out its program of expansion and for other purposes, the sum of $14,200,000 in all. Paragraph 61 of the report in part reads:

The C.B.C. has stated that in order to maintain services even at their present level it requires about $3 million a year in addition to its current income of approximately $7,500,000. For the improvement and extension of its services, it requires another $2,200,000, making a total annual budget of about $12,700,000. If all the local and less desirable national commercial programs are dropped, the corporation will require an additional $1,500,000—some $14,200,000 in all.

Mr. McCann: Why not finish the paragraph?

Mr. Fleming: I do not think it is germane to my purpose. I referred to the fact that the section did happen to tally with the report. I am not interested in the balance of the section for the present purpose.

The income of the corporation during the past fiscal year was $8,301,000. The addition of $6,250,000 to that sum would give the corporation something close to $15 million of revenue in the present fiscal year. The commission did contemplate that the corporation would submit to some reduction of its commercial revenues as a result of the elimination of some of the commercial broadcasts.

The income for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951, was drawn from three sources. The first was licence fees, and I will give only round figures. The amount was $5,572,000. Then there was commercial broadcasting, $2,463,000; and miscellaneous, $266,000, or a total of $8,301,000. I am going to digress for a moment to draw attention to one feature of that statement of revenues. In his remarks a few moments ago the minister apparently sought to create the impression that Mr. Bennett, in fathering the Canadian Broadcasting Commission out of which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation later grew, was committing himself and his party for all time to a nationally owned, nationally operated, national monopoly in radio broadcasting.

I do not think that is a fair interpretation at all of the views of Mr. Bennett. It is one thing to create a national system. It is quite another thing to say that there shall be on the one hand either no other type of broadcasting carried on in Canada or on the other hand that if broadcasting is permitted under other auspices, namely private auspices, the national system shall have the power of regulation, what together with the licensing powers amounts in fact to the power of life and death over these other outlets for broadcasting. But let me point out this further fact that the Aird commission and the whole scheme of the Canadian Broadcasting Commission as conceived by Mr. Bennett rested upon the assumption that the commission would not go into the field of commercial broadcasting, that their programs would be free of commercial features, and that the commission would be dependent upon public moneys or licence fees for its income. With the approval of this government, however, there has been a steady departure from that basic principle of the original scheme of national broadcasting in Canada, and it is to little purpose indeed for the minister to picture the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation today as being the fulfilment of the dreams of Mr. Bennett on the one hand, and then shut his eyes to the fact that the financing of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—yes, and in many respects the type of program it is giving—has departed very materially from the original conception of the Canadian Broadcasting Commission and national broadcasting in Canada.

I wish to offer some comments on the matter of the income of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It will have been noticed that the C.B.C. at the present time is drawing approximately $2½ million per annum from commercial broadcasting. The report of the Massey commission, which obviously commends itself to the government, recommends that the corporation should eliminate much of the revenue it is deriving at the present time from commercial broadcasting. I should like to refer to page 291 of the report where the majority make this recommendation:

> That the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation refuse all commercial programs not acceptable in content and that they consider the possibility of eliminating some of the less desirable commercial programs now carried, and of replacing them by programs more appropriate to Canadian listeners.

The recommendation in the minority report of Dr. Arthur Surveyer at page 399 should commend itself to the house. He says:

> There is no doubt that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be granted whatever amounts are needed to maintain an adequate service both in broadcasting and telecasting for the purpose of fulfilling the aims of the Canadian Broadcasting Act. Although the expenditures of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation appear reasonable when compared with those of the British Broadcasting Corporation, the commission does not know whether or not the operations of the corporation are efficient, nor if substantial savings could not be realized by entrusting the production of commercial programs to private producers.

That leads me to say that, far from there being no competition between the national system on the one hand and the private stations on the other, there is very keen competition. You have very keen competition to the extent to which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation permits competition on the part of those private stations which are its competitors. Competition for commercial revenues is direct and keen. Private stations have complained to the parliamentary committee that while they ask nothing of the Canadian taxpayer and must finance their operations entirely from their commercial revenues, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, on the other hand, while receiving the entire licence fee on receiving sets, nevertheless at the same time competes with them for revenue in this field of commercial broadcasting.

It should be clearly understood that if this substantial grant is to be made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation it should be upon the condition attached to its recommendation by the Massey commission. That recommendation was that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be prepared to forgo a good deal of its present commercial broadcasting. It will be the right of the people of Canada if this grant is made to expect better programs on the C.B.C. and to expect fewer and less objectionable commercial features. I think that is the wish of the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I wish to say that in fairness to them, but it seems to me it must be clearly understood that if this house is going to vote this large additional income to the C.B.C. it must attach that condition. I point out to you, sir, that such a condition does not appear in this legislation. There is no suggestion in the bill as it appears before the house that a condition of the kind recommended by the Massey commission is attached to this grant of additional income.

I come to another of the principal sources of revenue to the corporation today, licence fees, which last year yielded an income of $5,572,000. This income was obtained from the $2.50 licence fee on 2,212,000-odd receiving stations in Canada. I say "receiving stations" because one should not regard a receiving station and a receiving set as synonymous. A person may have more than one receiving set at a receiving station without requiring more than one licence. I point out to you, sir, that if this section passes we are not only committing parliament to a principle but to a very definite figure by way of parliamentary grant. That carries with it implications which I consider are of very great importance. I suggest that now that parliament is committing itself to this principle the time has come for the elimination of that nuisance tax, the licence fee on receiving stations.

I point out certain factors in relation to this $2.50 fee, some of which were the subject of evidence before the parliamentary committee. In the first place, whatever may have been the situation when that $2.50 licence fee was first imposed, I think it is a very different situation today. The fact of the matter is that today the benefits that are derived as a result of the operations of the C.B.C. bear no relationship to the fee. Everyone with a receiving set must pay that fee whether or not he listens to the programs of the C.B.C. The fee does not bear any relation to service.

In the second place the amount has no relationship to fact. It does not cover the cost of operation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In the third place, and I wish to develop this point, the collections of this fee have been very troublesome. I do not believe one member in this house will have the temerity to say that collection is complete.

The Massey commission in its majority report had this to say at page 294:

> The Department of Transport considers that the present method of collection is reasonably effective and thorough. However, if the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics are to be accepted, Canada's three and a half million private receiving sets which should be licensed ought to yield over eight and a half millions a year in licence fees instead of something over five million.

As was mentioned in the committee with regard to these licence fees, the fee is levied in terms of receiving stations and not simply in terms of receiving sets. There is a lot more in this discrepancy on which the Massey commission has placed its finger, however, than can be explained away simply by referring to the people who own more than one receiving set. I do not think the contention put forward by the officials of the Department of Transport charged with responsibility for the collection of this fee is very convincing when they say that collection is satisfactory. As I said a moment ago, I do not believe there is a member in this house who will have the temerity to say there has been universal or 100 per cent collection of this particular nuisance tax.

How many people who ought to be paying this tax are not paying it? No one in this country can answer that question. Even amongst those from whom collection is being obtained great difficulty is being experienced. The principal official of the Department of Transport for this particular subject is Mr. Browne, controller of communications. In his testimony to the committee on December 6, he said there are 120,000 to 150,000 people in this country who never pay their licence fees until late in the year. If you refer to a table he filed with that committee you will find that there is a great deal of tardiness on the part of many of the people who do pay. For instance, last year in the months of April and May 47·2 per cent of those who eventually paid remitted their licence fees, yet the fee is payable on April 1. The percentages for the remaining months are as follows: June, 21·5 per cent; July, 8·6 per cent; August, 7·4 per cent; September 4·4 per cent; October, 4·1 per cent; November, 2·4 per cent; December, 1·5 per cent; January, 1·4 per cent; February, 0·7 per cent; March, 0·8 per cent. That is not the kind of record that suggests that this is the sort of fee that is either collected easily or paid readily by those upon whom it is imposed.

I say to you, sir, that this is an extremely costly fee to collect. What would we in this house say if the Minister of National Revenue came to us and said it cost him over 12 per cent to collect the income tax, or over 12 per cent to collect the excise tax? We would throw up our hands in horror at the very idea, and say there was something fundamentally wrong if it was costing that much to collect these taxes, and that we ought to re-examine the whole situation. The fact of the matter is that for years it has cost over 12 per cent on an average to collect this tax, and last year it cost 12·2 per cent of every cent that was collected. If that cost had been charged directly to the proceeds of the tax you would have realized a net of 87·8 per cent. I say this is a shockingly high cost of collection, and the house ought to face up to that fact.

This year parliament has appropriated over $700,000 just to provide for the collection of these fees from which a revenue of something like $5,600,000 is expected. Parliament is throwing a lot of good money away, in my submission, in seeking to collect a tax that is unpopular and that is extremely difficult to collect. As you know, some time ago it became necessary to send people out, supervisors and others, from door to door canvassing for licence fees. These people were paid on a commission basis. In the committee a member asked Mr. Browne why one should introduce the principle of commission into the collection of taxes or fees imposed by parliament, a principle that would take us back to the abuses of the Roman empire. The answer was that when the department paid these people a salary they did not go out into the sparsely settled areas, but confined themselves to the built-up areas where it was comfortable to go about. I believe that is another factor which calls upon parliament to examine whether this nuisance tax ought to be continued any longer.

I think it would be interesting to the house to know that last year the government depended upon 346 house-to-house canvassers for 38·3 per cent of all that was collected on account of this nuisance tax.

The next factor in this connection which I should like to mention is the matter of prosecutions. This $2.50 licence fee is imposed by regulation pursuant to power given to the government under section 4 of the Radio Act. Many hon. members in this house, Mr. Chairman, may have forgotten that the further provision in section 4 of the Radio Act provides for the imposition of a fine of up to $50 or three months' imprisonment for any person failing to pay this fee. Just weigh that against the amount of the fee that is sought to be collected, and the difficulty in collecting it. The fact is, as has already been mentioned in this debate, that many people quite innocently do not know whether or not they have paid their fee. It is not something that comes to their mind like income tax returns. Many innocent people could easily overlook the payment of this licence fee. Yet any person who is in that position, however innocent he may be, is subject to a fine of $50 or three months' imprisonment.

Last year there were 13,830 prosecutions, and the result worked out in average figures in this way: The average fine was $3 and the average costs imposed $3, a total of $6.

The procedure in connection with prosecutions is very clumsy. A prosecution cannot be started locally without reference to Ottawa. At Ottawa a particular bureau in the Department of Transport sifts through these recommendations, with all the consequent delays. In the face of this situation, sir—an unpopular tax; a nuisance tax; a tax that is hard to collect; a tax that is not universally enforced and cannot be, I submit; a tax that has clumsy provisions attached to its enforcement —what did the Massey commission say? The Massey commission made some comments on this subject and they criticized in the language I have used the present collection of tax. While the Massey commission did not come up with the kind of recommendation I think they should have brought in for the abolition of this tax in favour of the parliamentary grant, they nevertheless criticized in the words I have used the present degree of enforcement.

In the light of the criticism contained in the majority report of the Massey commission I think it would interest many hon. members to know exactly what the Department of Transport now proposes. In the first place, sir, it proposes—as we were told by Mr. Browne in the committee on December 6—that there should be an amendment of the Radio Act to provide for a minimum fine of say $10 for anyone found operating a private receiving station without a licence. Let us bear in mind what that means. It means that there will be no power left in the magistrate to decide that it has been a case of innocent oversight, a first offence, or a case simply for a nominal fine. In many cases the fines today are just fifty cents. It would thus become obligatory upon the magistrate, on summary conviction, to impose that minimum fine of $10. I ask the house if they are so wedded to that kind of licence fee that they are prepared to back up the Department of Transport in wanting to see conviction in a case of this kind punished by a minimum fine of $10. I think not.

The second proposal of the Department of Transport is that the Radio Act be further amended to eliminate some of the cumbersome procedure in connection with enforcement. That may be good if we are to continue with this present clumsy system. But I think there is a better way of meeting the needs of the situation; that is by doing away entirely with this nuisance tax.

The third proposal now being put forward by the Department of Transport as something designed to meet the needs of the situation was described before the committee by Mr. Browne on December 6. It involves the elimination of the house-to-house canvass, that source of revenue which produced 38.3 per cent of all the licence fees collected last year on account of receiving stations. In place of 346 people working full or part time in the field in the house-to-house canvass, the department proposes an increase in staff in the department, 42 people to be put in the field full time and 8 people to be added to the staff of the central records office at a cost to the department for the addition of 50 people to their staff, of about $100,000 per annum.

But that is not all. From the testimony of Mr. Browne it is evident that more hope is attached to their proposal to transfer the issuance of the receiving licences to the post offices to a greater extent than has ever been done hitherto. You are aware, sir, that at the present time the Department of Transport tries to issue or, if you like, to vend these licences through the post office. But Mr. Browne was frank enough to tell us in the committee that there has been much reluctance on the part of the post office and of individual post offices throughout the country to take on the task of collecting this $2.50 nuisance tax on behalf of the Department of Transport.

We are told that there are 1,600 staff post offices in Canada, 6,500 accounting post offices and 5,000 non-accounting post offices. We are told that among the 1,600 staff post offices the carrying of these licences for those who may come in and seek to purchase them over the counter has become obligatory, but that on the part of the 6,500 accounting post offices the Department of Transport has found a great unwillingness to assume this task; and that in the case of the 5,000 non-accounting post offices there were, if you please, only 188 willing to take on this task at all. The other 4,800-odd simply refused to do so.

When the Department of Transport now proposes to look to the Post Office Department to take this unhappy task off their hands, it surely might have been well to ascertain in the first place whether the Post Office Department was willing to do so. I am informed on good authority, Mr. Chairman, that the Post Office Department has not agreed to take on this task for the Department of Transport. Where does that leave us? Let us forget for the moment the evidence of lack of co-operation between government departments or the attempt of one department to foist an unwelcome task on another government department. Does not this all point to the fact that this is a nuisance tax which ought to be eliminated? I have no doubt, sir, that if the committee heard the private opinions expressed by a good many government members there would not be much support left in this committee of the whole for the continued imposition of that $2.50 licence fee.

Let us look at some of the things that have been said by some of the more courageous members who had the temerity to express in the special committee an opinion on this subject. I refer now to the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Cariboo at the committee meeting of December 6. Mr. Browne made this comment:

> . . . and they are the towns on which we concentrate first—

That is, on which the department concentrate their inspectors.

> —when our prosecution campaign starts.

The hon. member for Cariboo said:

> I am not urging you to prosecute them. I suggest it would be better to abolish the idea of a licence and to provide the money out of the general revenue because this is a public utility in which everybody shares and in which everybody enjoys the value; yet, according to your figures, half the people are not paying.
> Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Listen to that now!
> The Witness: I cannot comment on that. I have simply been given a job to do.

Mr. McCann: All that is out of order. The committee is sitting.

Mr. Fleming: I continue:

> Mr. Richard: Look at London. In 1949-50 the figure given is 20,809 whereas for 1950-51 the figure is down to 16,692. That would indicate a drop of 4,000 licences in one year. Yet we all know that London is growing.
> The Witness: We hope that when we get this additional staff we will be able to improve our licence issue still further.

Then the hon. member for Saint John-Albert came before the committee. He was not a member, but he came before the committee and pointed out the curious situation which results from the way in which the fee is levied at the present time. The fee becomes payable on the 1st of April each year. The department does not issue any licences until April 1. It is not the system followed by the provincial governments in issuing motor vehicle licences. Here the licence cannot be issued until April 1. As the hon. member for Saint John-Albert pointed out, technically everybody is in default when the post office opens on April 1.

Then, if you please, none other than the Minister of National Revenue, at that same meeting to which I have referred, made some comments in which I think the committee would be interested. He said, in reviewing the proposal of the Department of Transport to foist this unhappy task of collecting the $2.50 licence fee on to the reluctant Post Office Department:

> But I would be against the policy—if it is the policy—of not paying so much attention to the house-to-house canvassers and trying to increase the matter of prosecution.
> The matter of prosecution is a very disagreeable thing to carry on. It only antagonizes people against those who are doing it, and I do not think that it is ever productive of any great results.

That is the verdict, sir, of the responsible minister who has had more to do with radio broadcasting in this country than any other minister. That is his comment upon proposals for shifting the collection of this $2.50 licence fee on to the Post Office Department, and his comments on the results of prosecutions for non-payment of the $2.50 licence fee.

This section does not propose simply to make a parliamentary grant this year; it proposes to set up a parliamentary grant for a five-year period year by year. I have said that the section is good in so far as it recognizes the principle of making direct parliamentary grants to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for its necessary purposes. It is sound to that extent, and to the extent to which the principle is sound, sir, I say to you it is then a condemnation in principle of the continued imposition of that $2.50 nuisance tax. If the principle of the parliamentary grant is sound, then it ought to be good enough for meeting all the needed revenues of the corporation. It is not, however, simply an annual grant, sir; it is a five-year grant that we are asked to approve, and I for one say that the principle of a five-year grant in advance is not sound.

We have had abundant evidence in this debate, if indeed evidence were required, of the vital importance of preserving strict parliamentary control, as distinguished from governmental control, over the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. When speaking on the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill several weeks ago I sought to urge that the principle of parliamentary control be vindicated in all circumstances with respect to radio broadcasting. There is not a danger that any one of us can conceive in this country, short of actual invasion by a totalitarian armed force, that would be a greater threat to democracy and freedom in Canada than for such a vitally important means of communication and dissemination of ideas and of shaping public thought as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be brought under the control of the government. Therefore I say, sir, that parliament must be vigilant at all times to ensure that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be divorced from government control, and that parliamentary control and parliamentary interest in the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be strictly and sedulously maintained.

I say to you that if parliament makes a five-year grant in advance, committing itself to such a policy and to such grants by statute, it is making a mistake. It is risking a weakening in that parliamentary control over the corporation which is so essential, and the value of which is recognized by the officers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

What seems to me should be the proper policy of parliament in this case is to make an annual grant to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to meet its needs. That will not prevent the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from shaping its plans. I realize that plans cannot simply be circumscribed by any twelve-month period of time; but surely the board of governors of the corporation has enough confidence in parliament to know that parliament will make such provision as is required to meet the legitimate needs of the corporation. Sir, if the principle of five-year grants is sound, why not ten years? If the principle is sound with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, why do we not apply it to the Canadian National Railways? We do not. We assert and preserve parliamentary control over the Canadian National Railways and their operations by insisting that parliament should, by annual grants, have an annual review to provide for the needs of that corporation. Why should the same principle not be vindicated and preserved with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Therefore I say to you that the proper method should be an annual grant to meet all the needs of the corporation, and that the item should appear in the estimates every year so that parliament will be acting consciously in making provision for the needs of the national system, and also so that the opportunity of discussing the affairs and reviewing the administration of the corporation every year will be guaranteed. It is not guaranteed here because we do not have a parliamentary committee set up every session. In view of the fact we have had one this session it may be unlikely that we will have one at the session of 1952; I do not know. But I do know, sir, that this year, as in so many years past, the report of the committee will come in too late for discussion. There will not be any opportunity given to the house for discussion of the report, and that is what will happen, it seems to me, in other future years even if you do have parliamentary committees, if this section is passed in its present form.

My final observation is this. Every one of us recognizes that broadcasting is going to cost money; that the kind of expansion which the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation indicated in their very competent and willing review of their plans before the parliamentary committee is going to involve the expenditure of very large sums of money in these ensuing years. The grant contemplated by section 6 of this bill is not for television; it is simply for the expansion and development of sound broadcasting. The corporation will be looking to parliament to provide further funds for the development of television; and along with that we must bear in mind that up to the present time at any rate the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has not been paying any taxes. It has not been paying any municipal taxes, even though the private stations with which it is competing directly for commercial revenues today have had to meet federal taxes, provincial taxes and municipal taxes.

Finally, sir, I say to you the issue that confronts the house now is one that I think is inescapable, because it is a challenge to the house. The issue is presented more clearly to the house with respect to the continuation of this $2.50 nuisance tax than on any occasion in any previous session; and if the house proceeds today to vindicate the principle of parliamentary grants then I say to you, sir, that it has destroyed any pretence of justification for a continuation of that $2.50 licence fee. Far better that parliament should make the provision consciously, and do away with this nuisance tax.

To vindicate the policy of parliamentary control, sir, I move the following amendment:

That clause 6 of Bill 17 be amended by striking out all the words after the word "fifty-one" in line 7.

I point out to you, sir, that this will give to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation under this section $4,750,000 in this fiscal year. That will bring the direct parliamentary grants for this fiscal year to a total of $6,250,000, which is a sum substantially in excess of the amount the corporation can expend this year. It will provide for all their needs, for as much extension and expansion as they can possibly contemplate this year, and will leave them a substantial excess to carry over into the next fiscal year. But at the same time it will ensure the maintenance of parliamentary control with respect to the voting of parliamentary grants year by year in the future.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations in support of what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton. However, before doing so I should like to relieve the kindly concern which, I am told, was expressed by the Minister of National Revenue because I had the temerity to disagree with part of the Massey report. I would say to the minister that it so happens I have several friends on the commission, and that I have the very highest regard for the report. I think it was a very distinguished document. But I have not made it the keeper of my conscience and the decider of every question it happens to consider.

By curious coincidence, for the second time today I find myself in the position of disagreeing with it. But I can assure the minister, if it is of any interest to him, that if in due time the government cares to bring in a number of other things mentioned in that report, it would be clear that in respect of those things I find myself in agreement with the Massey report.

I shall continue my observations at eight o'clock.

At 6.15 p.m. the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Howe: If I may have unanimous consent I should like to revert to motions in order to make an announcement regarding trade with the West Indies. I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

TRADE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXTENSIONS AND ADDITIONS TO THE BRITISH WEST INDIES TRADE LIBERALIZATION PLAN

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I may say that the timing of this announcement coincides with the timing of announcements being made in the United Kingdom and also in the British West Indies.

The United Kingdom has now authorized extensions and additions to the British West Indies trade liberalization plan, to take effect at the beginning of next year. Under this plan, limited quantities of traditional exports from dollar countries are being admitted to the markets of the British West Indies. It is estimated that some 650 firms have taken advantage of the present plan. The dollar value of the increased trade which will result from these new measures will not be large in total nor can it be estimated with any accuracy. For a number of Canadian exporters, however, it will provide a welcome opportunity to enter again into this trade. For others it will mean that increased quantities of their products will be admitted to those markets. All of this is definitely a step in the right direction. It is our great hope that further expansion will become possible in this trade in the future.

The British West Indies was the starting point for many of our manufacturers when they first looked abroad for export markets. There has been a tradition established of mutually advantageous trade. Because of the currency difficulties of the sterling area, British West Indian markets have unfortunately been closed to many of our goods since 1947. We have done our utmost in Canada, however, to provide a market for goods from the British West Indies, and from other countries in the sterling area, so that they might earn dollars with which to buy our goods. Canada has become a principal and substantial source of dollar earnings for these colonies. These efforts have obviously been recognized and appreciated in the United Kingdom, and I am happy to announce that we are now having increased opportunities being made available for Canadian goods in the British West Indies.

The government attaches great importance to our trade with the British West Indies. During 1950 we made strong representations to the United Kingdom for the creation of the trade liberalization plan which was put into effect on January 1 of this year. Since then we have taken advantage of a number of opportunities to request the United Kingdom authorities to expand the existing arrangements. Members will recall that we had the honour in Ottawa in the early summer of being hosts to a visiting delegation of parliamentary representatives from various British West Indian colonies. The talks which took place at that time were useful to all parties concerned. When I visited London in September I made a special point of carrying the negotiations on this matter a further stage ahead, through direct contact with the appropriate ministers of the United Kingdom government.

The following statement is being made public today in the United Kingdom and Canada.

"Following discussions between the United Kingdom and Canadian governments and representatives of the British West Indies, which started early last summer, arrangements have now been worked out for extending and amending the existing scheme for 'token imports' into the British West Indies and Bahamas from Canada and the United States.

So far as the Canadian side is concerned, from 1st January, 1952, the list of items covered by the scheme has been expanded to include a much wider range of commodities, including food products, leather, metal, electrical and textile manufactures, etc. Also the percentages for exporters' quotas for most of these commodities will be raised from 33⅓ per cent to 40 per cent.

The expanded trade liberalization arrangements will, as from the 1st January, 1952, operate differently for British West Indies and Bahamas trade with the United States. Instead of a system of commodity quotas based on a percentage of past trade, the West Indies and Bahamas will be able to licence additional imports from the United States up to a specified total value.

North American exports should also benefit from the authority recently given for colonial governments to introduce a system of world open general licences for certain commodities. These are mainly of a kind essential to colonial development. The list of goods to which open general licences may be applied covers for example a wide range of finished steel items and semi-manufactures of copper, zinc, and nickel but also includes dried, pickled, salted and smoked fish, onions, potatoes, certain animal feeding stuffs and jute goods.

In spite of the grave balance of payments position of the sterling area, it has been thought right to recognize in these arrangements the great importance of good commercial relations between the British West Indies and North America and they represent a substantial easing of import restrictions on goods exported by Canada and the United States."

I would like to conclude by tabling a more detailed statement, which has been prepared for the use of the press.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sure we have all heard with great satisfaction what the minister has said, although he has warned us that at the moment the quantities involved will not be very large. There is one thing I should like the minister to clarify. I am not sure whether he said but I think he implied that the sterling authorities were making available a sufficient number of dollars to take care of the trade which is contemplated. Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is a fact. Dollars will be provided from the sterling pool to pay for imports from Canada and the United States to the extent indicated by the announcement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Even though this is only a beginning it seems to me most satisfactory that there should be such a beginning. I think we all remember the situation that existed in the West Indies some years ago which created almost fantastic difficulties. For instance, at that time if the Massey-Harris Company wanted to sell implements in the West Indies they had to be shipped from their Australian plant. We are glad to note what the minister has said, and I suppose we may hope also that the quantities which he has described as being merely token quantities may be greatly increased.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF GOVERNORS, PROVIDE PENSIONS AND FURTHER GRANTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 17, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936—Mr. McCann—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 6—Grants.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just when the committee rose I had started to make some brief remarks in support of the two points made very strongly and clearly by the hon. member for Eglinton. The hon. member criticized notably two matters. One had to do with section 6, in connection with which he eventually moved an amendment, and his first point was in connection with a reduction of the radio licence fees.

I think the objections to these can be divided into two. First of all their collection is inefficient, and in the second place they are unfair because they are paid only by some whereas the benefit goes to all radio owners. The inefficiency can clearly be demonstrated because, as the hon. member for Eglinton has already said, it is costing 12 per cent to collect what is collected. Roughly it is costing $700,000 to collect approximately $5,800,000 leaving a net of about $5,100,000. That is only part of the story, because actually we fail to get an estimated amount of some $2½ million. Therefore we do not get anything like 88 per cent, which the 12 per cent cost of collection would indicate. We get something below that, somewhere between 60 and 70 per cent if my rough calculation is correct. That seems to indicate its inefficiency very clearly, and its unfairness is obvious.

As I understand it, it is not proposed to make it more efficient except in a way that I will mention in a moment. The actual method of collection apparently is not going to be made more efficient, but we are going to resort to fines. We are going to take on one of the aspects, I suppose you might say, of the police state. We will not leave it to the people because, as has already been pointed out, the matter of the radio licence fee is such a niggling thing that many people hardly know whether or not they have paid. I hope we are going to be given some reason for doing this. I have heard no reason yet except it is in the Massey report. However, I take it the minister is not bound to carry out the Massey report in every detail, and I would not have thought the Massey commissioners were necessarily qualified to speak as experts on this particular matter.

I do hope there is some chance of having the minister reconsider this proposal, which is inefficient and unfair. I think the hon. member for Eglinton is on perfectly sound ground in what he says, and I think it will carry the judgment of the house that whatever is proper to be paid should be paid without this inefficient and unfair method being used.

I want now to add a word to what the hon. member for Eglinton said as to the proposal that the grant to the corporation shall be not for one year but for four years.

Mr. Fleming: Five years.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Five years altogether. Here again I should like to ask what is the reason for doing something which, so far as I can discover from a rather hasty perusal of the estimates, is utterly without precedent and which—and I am trying to use moderate language—outrages one of the basic principles of our method of financing. I wish to read briefly from a British textbook on parliamentary grants which I think makes clear the fact that if this section is passed in its present form it goes flat in the face of our practice and the general British practice. I want to read from page 44 of a book by Durell on "Parliamentary Grants". I am going to read about half a page. I do not like reading, but I think this is a matter of importance. I want it on the record, and I think this will put it clearly on the record.

An hon. Member: Can you read?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand it was once said of Lloyd George: Presumably he can read and write, though he gives no sign of ever having done either. The late Mr. J. W. Dafoe told me that one day at Paris he saw Mr. Lloyd George go into the assembly and pick up Le Temps. Somebody saw him reading it and said, "He can read, he can read French." It is lucky for hon. members that I am not reading French. I will read English. The passage is as follows:

> The grants made by the House of Commons may be classified under two main heads: those which are authorized as recurring direct charges on the consolidated fund, and those which are met by annual or special vote for the supply services. Direct charges on the consolidated fund, which amount to about a third of the annual expenditure, are authorized by statute . . . When once granted they become in effect continuing grants to the treasury . . . They do not come up for annual review or criticism, and are to that extent removed from the control of the House of Commons after the statute has been passed. On the other hand it is at any time within the power of parliament to repeal such a statute and to transform the charge from a permanent one to an annual one . . . The fact, however, of the charges not being automatically brought under review necessarily withdraws them in a measure from the notice of parliament, and there is a disinclination consequently to make such permanent charges in any cases which could be provided for without detriment by an annual vote.

Then there is one short paragraph under the heading "Annual Estimates". It reads:

> The remainder of the expenditure set forth in the budget is in the form of proposals which require to be voted for the service of the year, and it is in the exercise of its function of granting these supplies that the supreme control of the House of Commons is most evident.

I have gone through the estimates not meticulously but with what care I could in the time available, and so far as I can discover there is no case that in the least resembles this. We have statutory grants of course for the service of the debt, the payment of the salaries of cabinet ministers, subsidies, grants to the provinces and various thinks of that kind, but I cannot find anything which in the least resembles the kind of grant that we have before us. I am not able to imagine any reason whatever why it cannot be dealt with in the ordinary way unless for the reason that those who are responsible do not want to face the proper test of coming forward each year. I do not imagine the minister will give that as a reason, but I hope he can give a much better reason than certainly I imagine he possibly can.

I have not had time to search through Hansard as I would have liked to, but I can well imagine the kind of things that would have been said in this house, and in particular by the leader of the opposition in the years between 1930 and 1935, if there had been any attempt to depart from a well recognized, well established, well understood and perfectly reasonable method of financing. I hope if the committee passes this section they will not do so in ignorance. If I am correct—and if I am not the minister will no doubt do his best to correct me—they will by so doing create an evil precedent which will no doubt be invoked again and again on other occasions. I still hope it may be possible that the minister will change his mind.

Mr. Hansell: I shall only take a few minutes of the time of the committee, but I wish to say a word or two on this particular section of the bill. Before I deal with what I was intending to discuss I should like to add a word or two to what the hon. member for Eglinton said this afternoon with respect to the discontinuance of the radio licence fee. I do not know that I am especially fussy one way or the other, but I want to point out particularly that a number of people have advocated to the public the doing away with the licence fee. What the hon. member for Eglinton really is saying in principle is not that we will do away with the licence fee but that because it is a nuisance tax we will shift it into the general taxation policy of the country and not call it a licence fee. I mention this because I think we need to point out that during election campaigns many aspirants to membership in this house have appeared on election platforms giving the people the impression that if they are elected they will advocate doing away with the licence fee. To my mind that may be technically correct, but since that same amount of money will have to be made up in some way those people should be fair and add that everyone will be taxed accordingly. That much more money will have to be raised, and therefore all citizens will share in it whether or not they own a radio. One thing we must remember is that under the present system of licensing it is the person who owns the radio receiving set who pays the licence fee, and the person who does not own a radio set does not pay the licence fee. Under the system advocated now, whether or not a person owned a radio set he would have to pay his share of the over-all taxation to make up that $5 million annually.

The point I really intended to make on this section which we are now asked to pass is that the people of Canada will have to pay to the C.B.C. about $30 million over a period of five years. Now, $30 million is a lot of money. In addition to that $30 million the C.B.C. also receives around $5 million per year from the radio licence fees. This will mean that by the end of that five-year period the C.B.C. will have received from the taxpayers of Canada about $55 million. I mention that for the purpose of making this further observation. During the radio committee's hearings a brief was presented by the Canadian association of broadcasters, which represents the bulk of the independent stations in Canada. During the sessions of the committee the spokesman for the association, Mr. Allard, whom no one will say was not an able witness, was asked this question: If the independent stations could so organize themselves and mobilize their forces as to give Canada a national system of radio, while at the same time giving the Canadian public the high standard of radio it now enjoys, could they do that without any cost to the taxpayer? Mr. Allard's answer was yes.

Before commenting any further, I take it that answer was given by a man who knew what he was talking about. I do not believe anyone on the committee would say that Mr. Allard did not speak with some considerable authority about radio. Yet his opinion was that private radio, by mobilizing these stations and its organizations, could give Canada a national system of radio such as it has today, at least without depreciating the calibre or quality of the programs and yet without any expense to the taxpayers. It is only fair that I should mention that the president of the board of governors appeared as a subsequent witness. I called Mr. Allard's answer to that question to his attention, and I asked Mr. Dunton if he had any comment to make. He said that his comment would be as terse as Mr. Allard's comment, but instead of saying yes he would say no. No one will doubt that Mr. Dunton also is qualified to speak on behalf of radio, at least on behalf of the C.B.C. He is in a position to know. What we have here is a conflict of opinion as between two men whom one would regard as radio experts.

My point is this. Even though there is some conflict of opinion, and even though Mr. Allard's statement might be regarded by some as exaggerated, nevertheless it was made. Even though we grant that statement might be exaggerated, the C.B.C. would still have an advantage over Mr. Allard's proposal to the tune of at least the radio licence fees of $5 million a year. They would have that amount of money over and above what Mr. Allard said the independent stations in Canada could actually give Canada. I point that out because I think it is an observation we need to keep in mind.

Now, $5 million is a lot of money to spend on radio in one year, expecially when radio is a competitive business and the C.B.C. is in the commercial field. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation say they have to have more than that. They have to have an additional $6 million. The people of Canada should know that they are paying $5 million a year in radio licence fees as a straight gift to the C.B.C. It is an amount that they have—I was going to say to play with, but that might be too loose an expression—but they have that much leeway over and above what the independent stations would need. Then there is another point, and it may be a meagre point. The independent stations would still have to pay their taxes, while the C.B.C. today is largely free of taxation and has that advantage over the independent stations.

The bill, of course, says the taxpayer must not only pay the $5 million in licence fees; he must pay another $6 million a year. I point out that observation. Personally I should like to see the C.B.C. develop just as far as it is possible for them to develop. But if the C.B.C. were a private corporation charged with the responsibility of giving Canada the standard of radio that is given today, I am quite certain that as a private corporation they could get along with far less than an additional amount of about $11 million a year which they are asking from the taxpayers. I say that in the light of the fact that we have one man's opinion to the effect that if radio were in private hands, they could do it without any cost to the taxpayers whatsoever.

Mr. Jones: I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill that is before us. I disagree with many of the statements made about the C.B.C. because I still think that, for $2.50 a year, we have the best value obtainable with respect to any commodity in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: But we do not pay only $2.50.

Mr. Jones: I believe the C.B.C. offers the best value on the North American continent. I do not mind paying $2.50 for the service that is rendered to my household in connection with the radio, but I feel that it is unfair to charge people in areas that cannot get the service the same fee charged in the ones that have it; and that is the point I wish to make tonight. We have ten or twelve areas in the whole dominion that cannot get C.B.C. service, I understand; and one of them is the Grand Forks-Greenwood area. The only service the people in that area can get is provided by United States stations; but they are still compelled to pay the $2.50 licence fee, and they are still subject to prosecution by the government if they do not pay that $2.50.

I should like to suggest to the government that in areas where the service cannot be received and where they are not rendering any service the fee be forgotten or abolished, and that definitely no prosecution should take place until such time as booster stations can be established in those areas to give the service the people are entitled to have. I would suggest that a portion of the money we are now voting to the C.B.C. be allotted especially to those areas that do not now get the service. Otherwise I feel that the C.B.C. is the logical and the proper outlet for Canadian programs and that it should, as far as possible, get into every corner of this dominion. But when we have a corner that has to rely on United States stations for service, my contention is that we have no right to collect a fee from the people in that area. I would suggest that the government consider this point and possibly abolish the fee in such an area until such time as these booster stations can be established.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to say just a few words against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton. The effects of the amendment would be to grant to the C.B.C. the amount of money provided in this section of the act for this year, but to leave for decision in each of the next four or five years, as they come along, the granting of money for those future years. So far as our attitude towards the C.B.C. is concerned I feel that, to use the words of the hon. member for Greenwood in connection with another argument, we should let them get on with the job they have to do. To hold over their heads the uncertainty as to whether or not this money is to be available for the period of the next four or five years is, I feel, to cramp their style in their effort to give Canada the very best in the field of radio service.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming: By parity of reasoning does the hon. member not think he is cramping the style of the Canadian National Railways by not providing them with a sufficient amount, for a period of five years in advance, to meet their recurring annual deficits?

Mr. Hees: Well said.

Mr. Knowles: Despite the interjection of the hon. member for Broadview to his colleague that it was well said, I think there is a very real difference. In the case of the Canadian National Railways we took over a series of defunct private lines which were already bankrupt, and we have been saddled with a capitalization which is completely false. That is the main reason for the deficits we have to deal with year by year.

As for the C.B.C., we have here a policy which a parliament of Canada has sought to initiate; and I echo the sentiments of those who have already recalled the fact that the policy of public ownership and control of radio had its origin during the days when R. B. Bennett was prime minister of this country. It is in pursuit of a policy which parliament has initiated that we are spending money on radio; and I think it is a wise expenditure.

As hon. members of the committee know, I could expand that idea; but I will leave it at that. I think that for the good of the C.B.C. and for the good of radio in Canada we should settle this question for the period of the next four or five years.

The other point on which I wish to comment is this. I was slightly startled at the difficulty the hon. member for Greenwood said he had in finding other examples of this practice in the estimates. He admitted that his examination, although not meticulous, was as careful as it could be in the time at his disposal. I think I have had less time, because it is only since he spoke that I have had the chance to go through the estimates to see whether or not there are other cases where, by statute, we provide for annual grants. The one that I would first of all draw to the attention of the hon. member for Greenwood is the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act under which, for a number of years, annual payments have been made in pursuance of the provisions of that act.

Mr. Fulton: It has been amended two or three times.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, that is so. As the hon. member for Greenwood says, on the basis of his quotations from the book he had in his hand, that can be done with statutes of this kind. The railway grade crossing fund is another. That statute provides for the annual payments, on terms and conditions laid down by parliament. The hon. member mentioned a large number of statutes that provide for the financing and the re-financing of the public debt, the redemption and the transfer of the public debt, the cost of issuing new loans and so on. All that financial conglomeration is covered in statutes which provide for the necessary annual payments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All debt.

Mr. Knowles: It is true that these items are debt, but not the other items to which I have referred. Neither can it be called debt in respect of the items listed on page 18 of the current year's estimates, where we have a list of the subsidies and other payments to provinces. There are two sets of them there. Statutes have been passed which provide for those annual payments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I mentioned them.

Mr. Knowles: Similarly there are statutory payments with respect to the various superannuation funds. There is statutory provision for the annual payment of a fishing bounty and of coal subsidies; there is statutory provision for annual payments to the national battlefields commission; and there is on the statute books a provision—with which we all agree—for annual payments in respect of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Fulton: You win.

Mr. Knowles: I hear the hon. member for Kamloops saying that I win. Thank you. I shall sit down.

Mr. McCann: The matter under discussion at the present time has to do with the amendment of the hon. member for Eglinton with reference to the new revenue arrangements for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and these are in line with the recommendations of the commission. Let me point out that they provide for the payment to the corporation of a fixed sum of $6,250,000 each year for a period of five years. It is estimated that these payments, together with the receipts from the receiving licence fees and commercial operations, will bring the annual revenue of the corporation to about the equivalent of one dollar per head of the population of Canada. This is the amount which, in the opinion of the commission, will be needed by the national broadcasting system to maintain its services and carry out some necessary improvements in the five-year period.

I should like to point out that the commission recommended the annual fee for radio licensed sets be maintained at its present level, but that a more effective method of collection be devised.

The hon. member has issued a challenge to give reasons why this policy should be followed. I accept this challenge immediately, and I think probably I can free his mind of any objection he might have. It has been suggested by him and by other hon. members that payments should not be set now by statute for a five-year period, but should be voted annually by parliament. That is the gist of the amendment. The chief argument for such an annual vote seemed to be that it would provide parliament each year with an opportunity to review the affairs of the C.B.C. I should like to say that I for one am in favour of frequent reviews by parliament of the matters and affairs of the corporation. Not to my knowledge has a request for the annual setting up of a committee on radio broadcasting been denied. It is true that it has not been held every year, but as far as my memory goes it has never been denied when it has been requested.

I think it is a good thing that every year, or every year it seems fit, this house should appoint a committee for this purpose. With the appointment of such a committee there is ample opportunity for discussion by the whole house of the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, its aims and objectives.

I believe there are two strong arguments against the annual vote of money for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The first I think was well put by the royal commission itself when it said:

> There are, however, serious objections to an annual grant to be voted by parliament. Although other essential government services depend on an annual vote, it is so important to keep the national radio free from the possibility of political influence that its income should not depend annually on direct action by the government of the day.

I have heard expressed in this house countless times, when radio matters were up, the fear, the accusation and the challenge that the government was interfering politically with the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think another important principle is involved here, with which I thought hon. members on the opposition side of the house would agree. They have stated that they are in agreement with us on insistence that the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should not come under the direct influence of the government of the day. Under the provisions of the bill before the committee there would be no question of the government having influence on the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation through the power of proposing votes of money for operating purposes each year. As I say, however, I believe that although payments to the corporation from public funds will not be voted annually, parliament will still have plenty of opportunity to examine the affairs of the corporation to which it is directly responsible, and I think should do so.

The second reason for a fixed sum for a period of five years is that it will enable the corporation to make proper plans on a reasonably long-term basis. When the corporation was set up by parliament it was the idea that it should manage its affairs on a businesslike basis, following as closely as possible the methods of private operations, as is necessary in the field of broadcasting.

The hon. gentleman made reference to the fact that this was not done in the days of the Bennett government from 1930 to 1935. No, certainly it was not. Let me draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in the annual statement of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation it was not until 1946 that it was necessary to secure a loan that still remains unpaid. There were loans on many occasions during the period from 1932 to 1946, but every one of those loans was repaid by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They were repaid not by taxes on the general public but by the people who were served and through their annual receiving set fee and the fees of private stations. They were able to save enough money out of that to redeem those loans.

Mr. Fleming: And the commercial broadcasts.

Mr. McCann: And the commercial broadcasts; exactly. To operate in a businesslike way the corporation needs to make a good estimate of its income ahead and then plan its activities and manage its affairs accordingly. Let me point out to this committee that there are a lot of circumstances nobody can foresee in the management of a corporation of this type. I will just give you two or three instances.

Mr. Graydon: In five years, too.

Mr. McCann: Yes, in five years, too; but even in one year. Take, for instance, the amount of money it cost the C.B.C. this year on account of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses. That was a costly job. Then there is the Korean war and the service we are giving there, the service to the boys over there, the programs, and the reporting to the people of Canada on the activities of our forces in Korea. In that connection we shall have to set up and pay for transmission of programs to the forces that are in Germany at the present time.

Mr. McIvor: It is worth it.

Mr. McCann: I do not think that broadcasting is the kind of activity for which estimates can be worked out each year in the same way they can for government departments. In broadcasting, particularly in Canada, there are—and very probably there always will be—many demands from different sections of the public for more of something, particularly in the program field where there are many different opinions about what expenditures are necessary.

It seems to me that the sensible thing for parliament to do is to tell the corporation what its sources of revenue will be for the next five years, and set a reasonable amount in relation to the economy of the country. Then it is the responsibility of the corporation, which will report here yearly, to spend that money to the greatest possible advantage, subject always to a review by parliament.

The hon. member for Yale spoke with reference to the services in the particular district in which he resides. I admit immediately that his district is entitled to better services, and I promise that it will get better services if the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has the money with which to give them. This is all a matter of finance. The physical part of it can be attended to. There are no technical difficulties in the way of giving better services, but because of the fact that the C.B.C. has not had sufficient revenue it has not been able to give the services to several communities to which these people are entitled.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman, as a member of this house I think I have the right to say a few words. After listening to the arguments pro and con this Bill No. 17, since it was introduced yesterday, I cannot help but feel that many hon. members have not given it earnest study. Having listened to the minister answer some of the members, I think I am in a better position to judge what has been said. I think we should thank the chairman and members of the committee who have worked diligently and hard.

However, I was in sympathy with what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton. His speech proved to me that he has given study to matters connected with the C.B.C. There is merit in what he said about abolishing the radio fee. The hon. member for Cape Breton South also gave a very good account of himself in this regard. I feel I am forced to my feet tonight, because a resolution was passed in November by the council of my home municipality and forwarded to the Minister of Transport. In that resolution they stated their objection to the radio licence fees.

Mr. Harkness: What municipal council was that?

Mr. Sinnott: If you happen to go through my constituency some time, get off the train and see for yourself.

Mr. Graydon: Good old Brokenhead.

Mr. Harkness: The train does not stop there.

Mr. Sinnott: Not only the train stops there, but all the buses.

Mr. Graydon: You flag her down.

Mr. Sinnott: I do not think the country as a whole would have any objection to taking out of the consolidated revenue fund the amount now collected in licence fees. It would be spread more evenly throughout the country than it is today. As was pointed out this evening by the hon. member for Yale, parts of the country are paying radio licence fees but are not receiving a proper service. I know there are many homes in the city where one licence fee is paid but where there are three or four radios.

In my view the method of collecting licence fees is a costly one. I would ask the minister at this point how much it costs to collect those fees, how many men are engaged on the job, and how the number is distributed among the different provinces.

Mr. Graydon: A tough question.

Mr. Sinnott: I believe if there were a plebiscite in Canada this troublesome licence fee would be abolished, because the people in my district, certainly, hold the same view that has been expressed by other hon. members tonight. Through neglect, or for some other reason, people forget to renew their licences. Then, first thing they know, an inspector comes around and it costs them $10. It is such a niggardly sum that I suggest the only fair thing to do is to collect the money through the consolidated revenue fund rather than as individual licence fees.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Eglinton. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived: Yeas, 28; nays, 55.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Regulations by the corporation.

Mr. McCann: There is an amendment to be made to subsection 2 at line 27. I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, to move the amendment.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I move:

That subclause 2 of clause 7 of the bill be amended by adding at the ninth line after the words "three months" the following words:

"but such order shall not be effective until the expiration of ten days after the making thereof."

Mr. McCann: If hon. members will look at the section they will see that it has to do with the suspension of licences. The subsection reads:

In case of any alleged violation or non-observance by a private station of the regulations made by the corporation under this section, the corporation may, after notice has been given to the licensee of the alleged violation or non-observance and an opportunity afforded to the licensee to be heard, order that the licence of such private station be suspended for a period not exceeding three months.

And then the words of the amendment come in:

—but such order shall not be effective until the expiration of ten days after the making thereof—

And then it continues:

—and any such order shall be forwarded to the Minister of Transport who shall forthwith communicate the same to the licensee and shall take such steps as may be necessary to carry out the terms of such order.

This means that before an order is actually executed there is a term of grace, if one may so describe it, for a period of ten days, before it goes into effect.

The Chairman: Order. It appears to me the amendment has already been made in committee.

Mr. McCann: Yes, it has been made in committee.

The Chairman: Then I shall put the section as amended in committee. Shall section 7 as amended in committee carry?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, are you putting the first subsection?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not understand what your ruling was.

The Chairman: There is no ruling. I am explaining that the amendment has already been made in committee. I have it before me, as made in committee, and I have put the subsection as it was amended in the committee.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, this has to do with section 7. Would you be good enough to call subsection 1 first. Subsection 2 is the part that is amended.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Is subsection 2 as amended in committee agreed to?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to refer to subsections 6 and 7, which are set out in subsection 2 of section 7. I shall not repeat the argument made this afternoon, that one of the matters respecting which there has been much criticism generally throughout the country has been the fact that in the relationship prevailing as between the corporation and the private stations no provision is made for the adjudication of disputes as between the corporation and the private stations. Indeed the corporation is in the position of making regulations, making the law as it were, interpreting the law and deciding on conflicts or disagreements as between the corporation and the private stations.

Many of us have advocated the setting up of a board similar to the board of transport commissioners in order to assure that as between the corporation and the private stations there will be a measure of equity, and the administration of justice will be preserved. However, that has not been accepted. Apparently with a desire to go part of the way provision is made in subsection 7 of section 7 that where the corporation orders the suspension of the licence of a private station under subsection 6, the licensee may by leave of a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada appeal against such order to the said court on any question of law.

That right of appeal to the exchequer court is limited and circumscribed to such an extent as to be meaningless and ineffectual to all intents and purposes. It covers only the right of a private station to appeal when its licence is suspended or cancelled, only to leave, and only in the event that a question of law is involved.

I am not saying at the moment that there are cases where prejudice or bias would enter into the determination by the corporation as to whether a private station should not have its licence suspended. As it now stands this section will have the effect of continuing in the corporation its psychological power of interfering with any particular private station one might name; and that private station will be in the position, if it does anything that is contrary to the regulations of the corporation, of being subject to the cancellation or abrogation or suspension of its licence. It would have no appeal. If there is bias or prejudice in the cancellation of the licence there would be no right of appeal. There is only a right of appeal, regardless of what the equities or facts may be, provided there has been a mistake in law or provided a point of law is at issue as between the corporation and the private station.

In order to provide an appeal on fact as well as on law in connection with all orders made by the C.B.C., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff):

That subsection 7 of section 7 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Any person affected by any order, direction or ruling of the corporation may appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada against such order, direction or ruling on any question of law or fact or mixed question of law and fact, and the said court may stay the operation of such order, direction or ruling pending its final decision and said court may affirm, alter or rescind the order, direction or ruling appealed from."

Under that amendment the effect would be that if the C.B.C. made an order or a ruling as against a private station under which that station felt aggrieved, it would have the right to appeal to the exchequer court. While that court is of lower jurisdiction than the Supreme Court of Canada in general, it is composed of men who have the necessary judicial capacity to determine whether or not an order that has been made is fair and reasonable or whether it is one that is inequitable, unjust and unjustifiable.

This amendment would provide for an appeal by the private station, but it would in no way weaken the C.B.C. After all the stand of the corporation is that it in no way does anything that is unjust to the private stations. If it does not, it has nothing to worry about as to the right of appeal. If it does, being in the position of a competitor, as was brought out this afternoon, by reason of both the corporation and the private broadcasting company being engaged in an endeavour to secure advertising, then in order to assure justice the private station surely should have the right of recourse to the courts.

It is all very well to say that the corporation will not do wrong and does not do wrong. There is no court, except the final court, in any land that ascribes to itself infallibility in its judgments or decisions. Courts make mistakes; that is why there are appeal courts. Surely we are not going to ascribe to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a higher degree of infallibility than the courts possess, particularly when in many cases its judgment is based on a complaint or on a subject of controversy with its competitor, the private station.

While this amendment does not suggest the setting up of an independent body such as we on this side of the house have advocated over the years, one in the nature of the board of transport commissioners which adjudicates as between the government owned railroad and the privately owned railroad, it would provide, first, an alternative to such a board and, second, the assurance that both the C.B.C. and the private broadcasting company as co-litigants in a proceeding before the court would be assured of justice and at the same time any suggestion of bias, prejudice, intimidation or the psychological effect of the private company being subject to the control of the C.B.C., both as a competitor and in an adjudicating position, would be removed.

On the face of it this amendment would remove any and every possible cause of complaint. It would assure justice. It would preserve the rule of law. It would maintain a relationship between the corporation and the private broadcasting companies that would inure to the benefit of broadcasting in Canada.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived: Yeas, 27; nays, 60.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the section carry?

Mr. Harkness: Before it carries, I was not a member of the radio committee and probably the question I am going to ask was brought up before, but I should like to ask the minister why the word "alleged" is introduced in line 21. The clause now reads:

In case of any alleged violation or non-observance by a private station of the regulations made by the corporation under this section, the corporation may, after notice has been given to the licensee of the alleged violation or non-observance and an opportunity afforded to the licensee to be heard . . .

The corporation may then suspend the licence. I should think the suspension of the licence of a private radio station is the most stringent action that could be taken against it. As a matter of fact it puts the private station out of business. It would seem to me that before a private station is put out of business there certainly should be a proved case of violation or non-observance, and that an alleged violation should not be good enough. As the clause now reads it would seem to me all that is necessary is for somebody to allege that a violation has taken place; and if the private station does not produce proof, which may be very difficult for it to do, that it has not been guilty of a violation then its licence is suspended. I should like to know why it was felt necessary to introduce the word "alleged". It seems to me it is entirely unnecessary, and puts the private station in an almost hopeless position. In other words it goes directly contrary to all our usually accepted ideas of the law, namely that a person accused must be proven guilty. In this case the person accused has to prove that he is not guilty, otherwise he loses his licence.

Mr. McCann: As I see it, if the clause read "in case of any violation or non-observance" it would really be taking for granted that there had been an actual violation and would be prejudging the matter. When it is worded "alleged violation" the licensee is given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Harkness: The licensee surely had an opportunity to be heard anyway. I do not see that the minister has given an explanation for introducing the word "alleged". In the act as it existed before the word "alleged" was not there. The clause merely read, "in case of any violation or non-observance". Apparently it is now proposed that it shall read "alleged violation". Why should it not be a proved violation? Why should the word "alleged" be inserted? As far as I can see it is for the specific purpose of putting the person against whom the violation is alleged at a disadvantage. It puts him in the position where he has to prove his innocence rather than leaving it, as has always been the case under our law, that the people alleging the crime or violation must prove that he is guilty.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Harkness: Oh, no, the minister has not explained it.

Mr. McCann: I have explained it but the hon. member does not understand it.

An hon. Member: And nobody else.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member is not a lawyer and neither am I. There is a great difference between a violation and an alleged violation. If I say that the hon. member violated a law or regulation I make an accusation, but if I say that I allege he has done so I am putting the onus on him to prove that he has not.

Mr. Harkness: That is exactly what I have been saying. The very point I have been making is that a private station should not be put in the position of having to prove its innocence.

Mr. Fulton: You had better ask the Prime Minister to explain it.

Mr. Harkness: It is one of the tenets of our law that an accused person must be proved guilty, and it should apply here as in nearly every other case.

Mr. Cannon: If I may put in a word by way of explanation—

Mr. Harkness: The minister's explanation is really the foundation of what I have been saying.

Mr. Cannon: —the words "alleged violation" in the first line of the clause refer to the accusation, to the violation of which they may be accused; but that is before any inquiry has been made. If the hon. member will read the whole clause he will see that it is as follows:

> In case of any alleged violation or non-observance by a private station of the regulations made by the corporation under this section, the corporation may, after notice has been given to the licensee of the alleged violation . . .

[Mr. Harkness.]

They give him notice so that he may defend himself, and at that time it is only an alleged violation. Before notice has been given it cannot be anything more than an alleged violation. That is why the word "alleged" was added in the first line, so there will be concurrence with what comes afterwards. That is the simple explanation. Before there has been an inquiry and before any investigation has been made into the matter there can only be an alleged violation.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine if, in spite of his explanation, it still does not leave the situation such that a person against whom a violation has been alleged has to prove himself innocent?

Mr. Cannon: No, it does not mean that, not at all. In any case in which an accusation is made the fact that an inquiry has to be made into the accusation does not mean that the person accused has to prove himself innocent. It means that the person making the accusation has to prove the accusation. It is the same thing here. If there is an alleged violation an inquiry is made and the corporation making the accusation has to prove that a violation has taken place. Until it is proved it is an alleged violation.

Mr. Harkness: The explanation of the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine is the exact opposite of what the minister said. Which is right? Am I to take the minister's word for this or—

Mr. McCann: If it suits the hon. member any better I will withdraw my explanation.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Repeal.

Mr. Fleming: I think you will find, Mr. Chairman, that in the report of the committee there is a submission with regard to clause 8. It was represented to the committee that there was no intention of removing section 23 of the broadcasting act from the statute books of Canada but simply to transfer it from the broadcasting act to the Radio Act. If you examine the report of the special committee on radio broadcasting you will see that in reporting the bill they indicate they have done so on the footing that this section is to be re-enacted in the Radio Act, and they so recommend. I think it should be clearly stated to the house that section 8 will not be brought into effect until a corresponding provision has been enacted by parliament by way of addition to the present provisions of the Radio Act.

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that subsection 2 of section 8 provides that subsection 1 shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council. The committee was informed that section was inserted with a view to deferring the coming into force of subsection 1, to repeal section 23 of the broadcasting act, until such time as the section could be re-enacted in the Radio Act. I think we should have on the record now formal assurance from the government that section 8 of this bill repealing section 23 of the broadcasting act will not be brought into force and effect until the same or an equivalent provision has been enacted by parliament to become a part of the Radio Act.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. McCann: The information we have—and I think the hon. member heard it at the time—is that the officer of the transport department did say that it was the intention to re-enact this provision in the Radio Act in practically the same terms. Is that not correct?

Mr. Fleming: Yes. It is in the light of that information that I ask now that assurance be given that this section 8 of the bill will not be proclaimed. In other words, that section 23 of the broadcasting act will not be repealed until such time as the equivalent provision has been enacted into the Radio Act.

Mr. McCann: I think we can give that assurance.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Application to be referred to corporation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In making an application for a licence, is there a public hearing?

Mr. McCann: Yes, there is.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCE POLLS AND PRISONERS OF WAR VOTING REGULATIONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 41, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and to change its title to the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Having been a member of the elections act committee, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations at this stage. Before so doing I must gently chide the genial Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for some remarks he made last night when he was informing us of the business of the house. The minister said:

> Tomorrow we will continue the consideration of Bill No. 17, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, and then a list of small bills: Bill No. 41, to amend the Dominion Elections Act . . .

I am quite sure this house does not consider this a small bill. It is not small in physical size, because it contains 50 pages. It is not small in content because it contains a great deal of material which is the result of much study on the part of the committee. It is not small in importance because it is the statutory provision governing the election of members to this house. I am sure it is not a small bill in any sense of the word so far as hon. members of this house are concerned.

I want to say that I have enjoyed working on the elections committee, both during the last session and this session. I particularly appreciate the non-partisan approach of the members of the committee in giving consideration to this very important legislation. The committee went through the act thoroughly from beginning to end. First of all we received the advice and suggestions of the chief electoral officer, Mr. Castonguay, as his experience had indicated there should be technical and other changes. Then the hon. members of this house presented to the committee the results of their personal experience, and their knowledge of conditions in various parts of Canada. I am sure the combination of the experience of the chief electoral officer and the experience of the members resulted in satisfactory amendments to this act.

Before proceeding with the sections of the act with which I wish to deal this evening, I do wish to pay a tribute to our chief electoral officer, Mr. Castonguay. I was very much impressed with his knowledge of the act and the completely detached and objective way in which he carries out his duties. Without doubt the majority of Canadians believe the chief electoral officer is some part of parliament's administrative machinery. He is not necessarily a personality they know. I am sure if they realized the objective way and the spirit in which our chief electoral officer carries out his duties they would have a very high appreciation of the great function he performs in a parliamentary democracy.

We in this group consider this bill generally satisfactory. We believe it is a most important measure because it is the foundation upon which the machinery of democracy functions. The other day I read newspaper comments concerning the limited knowledge and information of university students about the working of our democracy. They were asked who the Prime Minister of Canada was, and so on, and it was obvious from these newspaper reports that a lot of university students do not know who the Prime Minister of Canada is. These students lack other information relating to this house. I believe this indicates some lack in our educational system. In my opinion every high school student in Canada should be taught the terms of the British North America Act. In learning those terms the student would have a complete knowledge of constitutional developments in Canada, and of Canadian history. I believe everyone should have a thorough understanding of the Canadian Citizenship Act and of the elections act. Those three acts are fundamental and must be understood by a large percentage of our people if they are going to have a proper appreciation of the democracy we enjoy.

I am going to devote the rest of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, to a subject about which I am quite concerned, and about which a proportion of the constituents I represent are concerned. According to the elections act now, and the provincial legislation of British Columbia, certain persons of Doukhobor origin are denied the franchise. I am going to bring briefly to the attention of the committee a misunderstanding I found in the elections act committee when I first approached the matter. There seems to be a misunderstanding generally throughout the country, occasioned largely by improper reporting of the circumstances that exist in Kootenay West. I am going to deal briefly with that question as related to the elections act.

There is no question about it, no other immigrant group in Canada presented such a spectacular problem to federal and provincial governments as the Doukhobors, who are a religious sect of Russian origin. There are some seven or eight thousand Doukhobors in Saskatchewan and Alberta who have become more or less successfully adapted to their Canadian environment. There are some ten to twelve thousand persons of Doukhobor origin in Kootenay West and adjacent districts. In order to inform hon. members correctly I must explain that the Doukhobors in British Columbia consist of three main groups. First there is the orthodox element of some six thousand persons, the majority of whom belong to the Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ and live in the area surrounding the village of Brilliant. These people represent the heart of the Doukhobor community and are a group who aim to retain their traditional language, culture and religious beliefs while making a peaceful adjustment to the Canadian way of life.

Then we have the independent element numbering about three to four thousand persons. This element is composed of individual Doukhobors who have become partially or entirely assimilated. While many of them still pay lip service to the traditional Doukhobor beliefs, they have severed their former ties with Doukhobor organizations and occupy their own properties in the cities and in the country. This is the group that I want to deal with briefly in relation to this bill, Mr. Speaker. Then, finally, there is the group known as the Sons of Freedom, numbering something over two thousand persons. They are uncompromising Doukhobor fundamentalists who tend to react violently against any forces in the Canadian environment which they feel threatens their traditional Doukhobor values. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, with many Canadians the Doukhobor problem tends to be identified almost entirely with the activities of the Sons of Freedom, who refuse to pay rent or taxes and are technically squatters on provincial land.

In 1950, as a result of the disturbances occasioned by the Sons of Freedom, a consultative committee for British Columbia was established under the chairmanship of Dr. MacKenzie, president of the university of British Columbia, composed of several of the staff of that university and representatives nominated by boards of trade at Nelson, Trail and Grand Forks. Before proceeding further, may I say that this committee was formed to study the whole Doukhobor question and make recommendations to the government of British Columbia.

From a personal knowledge of the local situation and a personal knowledge of what these people are doing, I must express my appreciation of the work of the members of the committee, and of the outstanding work that is being performed by former Commissioner Mead of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, former Commissioner Shirras, of the provincial police, and to the Society of Friends, for allowing Mr. Gulley, one of the former United Nations relief administrators in Arabia, to come to the Kootenays to assist in solving this question. I must also express my appreciation of the work being done by the ministerial association of the Nelson district. Only recently I read of a meeting where large numbers of these people were gathered together with other segments of the population in an effort to bring those two groups together. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the meetings have been successful to date. There is no question about it that part of the difficulties in Kootenay West are created by the lack of interest other Canadians have taken in the problem they created in the years gone by.

I am also informed that officials of the minister's department are co-operating in this work and have attended meetings to discuss this question with interested persons. I hope this work will continue and be extended, because it presents a great challenge and opportunity to the citizenship branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Now that I have briefly reviewed the question may I say that I rise this evening to speak particularly on one aspect of the Doukhobor problem, namely the great injustice that is continued by the denial of the franchise to this group of independents and others of Doukhobor origin. The statutes of British Columbia prevent a Doukhobor or a person of Doukhobor descent from voting in a provincial election. I want to quote from those statutes. I quote revised statutes of 1948, chapter 106, provincial elections act."

> Definition of Doukhobor: Doukhobor means a person, male or female, exempted or entitled to claim exemption or who on production of any certificate might have become or would now be entitled to claim exemption from military service by reason of the order of the governor in council of December sixth, 1898, and every descendent of any such person, whether born in the province or elsewhere . . .

Then section 4, clause E, of the provincial elections act, disqualifies "every Doukhobor or person of Doukhobor descent, providing that the provisions of this clause shall not disqualify or render incompetent to vote any person of Doukhobor origin who served in His Majesty's forces" and so on. They are not allowed to vote in a provincial election. Section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act and of the act before us now, the Canada Elections Act, reads as follows:

> (2) The following persons are disqualified from voting at an election and incapable of being registered as electors and shall not vote nor be so registered, that is to say—
> . . . (j) In any province, every person exempted or entitled to claim exemption or who on production of any certificate might have become or would now be entitled to claim exemption from military service by reason of the order in council of December sixth, 1898, because the doctrines of his religion make him averse to bearing arms, and who is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legistive assembly of that province.

As a result of this combination of provincial and federal legislation, so far as elections are concerned some considerable group of persons of Doukhobor ancestry are prevented from exercising the franchise, regardless of the fact that they are willing to accept the full responsibilities of a Canadian citizen. What are the types of persons disqualified? There are a good many persons of Doukhobor ancestry who are completely detached from the Doukhobor community and are working in industries in my constituency, but who are not permitted to exercise the franchise in Canada. There are businessmen in my constituency, members of boards of trade, members of Rotary and other service clubs, members of churches—members, I think, of several churches to which members of the House of Commons belong—who are absolutely denied the franchise because they are of Doukhobor origin. I have, of course, in my constituency a number of university graduates, doctors of philosophy, masters of arts, bachelors of science, who are denied the franchise because they are of Doukhobor descent, but who have completely divorced themselves from the Doukhobor community.

In addition I know of a number of Doukhobor parents who persuaded their sons to join the armed forces during the second world war. There were considerable numbers of Doukhobors in the armed forces. Anyone who understands the Doukhobors realizes that that is something for the parents of young Doukhobors to do. Regardless of their desire—and in that case, from their point of view, an extreme demonstration of their desire—to be Canadian citizens, those parents at the present time are denied the franchise.

Then again, the grandchildren of Doukhobors whose grandmothers were Canadians of united empire loyalist stock are denied the franchise under the present legislation. I am speaking particularly of this group of three or four thousand persons, the independents, who are not associated with the orthodox community and are completely opposed to and dissociated from the Sons of Freedom. Mr. Speaker, in Saskatchewan and, I think, in every other province in Canada these people are permitted the franchise; that is, people of Doukhobor origin who are willing to accept the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship. I am making this particular appeal to the house tonight with the realization that it is not possible to secure an amendment to the act at the present time. I do so in order to inform hon. members of the situation so that when this act comes under revision in the near future, and when circumstances are opportune, something will be done about this continuing injustice.

Canada approved the universal declaration of human rights at the general assembly of the United Nations with certain reservations based on provincial rights under our federal constitution. What does article 21 of this declaration say? It reads as follows:

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through freely chosen representatives.
2. Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.
3. The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret vote or by equivalent free voting procedures.

Recently in the Ontario legislature a bill was introduced with respect to certain trade union legislation, and the United Nations declaration of human rights was quoted by the minister presenting that legislation to the house as one of the reasons the legislation was being introduced. Not long ago in California the district court of appeal upset a state law that caused discrimination against a certain race, and that district court of appeal judge based his decision on the universal declaration of human rights as adopted at the general assembly of the United Nations. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, federal and provincial legislation denying a franchise to these Canadian citizens is unconstitutional and I am convinced that an appeal to the privy council would be successful.

I presented this situation to the elections act committee, and after I made a very similar explanation to that which I have made here this evening I was very pleased to see that committee members were sympathetic to my representations, and understood the question much more fully than they had prior to that time. When the committee presented its report on June 27, 1951 they included in it the resolution I had moved and which the committee had adopted as follows:

That the government give consideration to extending the franchise to certain persons of Doukhobor origin and the advisability of consultation with the government of the province of British Columbia in this matter.

The committee met this session. This bill is the result of their meeting. I took the opportunity then to raise the question and find out what had happened. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) very kindly stated this to the committee:

The committee at the last session passed a resolution which asked the government to give consideration to approaching the provincial government of British Columbia with respect to the possible voting of Doukhobors. The form of the resolution was such that we did not feel any compulsion to approach them; it was merely that we would give consideration to approaching them, and we did that. Having in mind, however, that at this particular time the question of the movement of the Doukhobors from one location to another was a matter of some concern to the people in British Columbia as well as to the government we felt that we would be injecting another note which possibly might not be to the advantage of the government in solving what I think we all agree is a very difficult problem, and, accordingly, we have not approached them. I hope that statement has nothing in it in any way discourteous to the mover of the resolution, because it has only been carried to that extent, but it is felt that this is not the time that such a matter should be proceeded with.

Mr. Herridge: Might I ask the minister a question?

Hon. Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Are we to take it from that that action on the resolution is merely deferred until circumstances are more opportune?

And the minister replied yes. Because of my knowledge of the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think there is justification for some temporary delay in this important question because there are very difficult matters to be solved in the near months and years ahead. But I do hope that at the first opportunity, when the situation has improved in British Columbia and the work of this committee has been more nearly completed, the government and the members of this house will give early consideration to remedying this injustice to a large group of persons who want to be full Canadians. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that if these people are to receive justice there must be co-operation between the federal government and the government of British Columbia. I know that in dealing with this matter this government has to give some consideration to the present problem being faced by the government of British Columbia. But once again I urge that action be not long delayed. We cannot in justice deny the franchise to these Canadians much longer.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, looking at today's order paper, we notice that the French version of this bill has not been produced. Since it is a translation and because there is even one section of the bill, section 58, where new French expressions are used, it seems important to me that we should have both versions of the bill, especially the French version, so that we may know exactly what designation is given to the same functions.

The other day I spoke somewhat heatedly of the translation of laws. I will read section 58—I have just now received the French version of the bill—where it is seen that certain changes were made in the new legislation:

The French version of the said act is amended by striking out the expressions "officier-rapporteur" "sous-officier rapporteur", "officier rapporteur spécial" and "sous-officier rapporteur spécial" wherever they appear herein and substituting therefor, in each case, the expressions "directeur du scrutin", "sous-directeur du scrutin" and "sous-directeur spécial du scrutin", respectively.

The latter terms are unknown to those who look after the administration and enforcement of the elections act throughout the country. At all times, town clerks and others have been appointed "sous-officiers rapporteurs" (deputy returning officers)—that is how they have always been called—and it seems to me that when a French or English expression is sanctioned in the act, it should become a Canadian expression.

I understand that in the United States, whenever even a slang expression has been in the statutes for twenty-five years, it becomes official. I feel that here this is not necessary, and one cannot say that certain French terms are anglicisms, as long as they are accepted and authorized by the act.

I wonder why changes are made in terms and phrases that have their place and, especially, have a meaning. But what strikes me most, Mr. Speaker—and I will quote only one instance here—is that two different terms are used in the act to designate the same thing. For instance, on page 124 of Votes and Proceedings, in rule 33, the revising officer is called a "reviseur", while on page 120 he is called an "officier reviseur". That is very odd.

It seems to me the designation applied to someone carrying out the same duties should always be the same and, in my opinion, the use of two different designations is apt to be confusing.

I have also noticed that, in many sections, the French version of the act is bilingual since certain terms belong to the French language while others belong to the language of bureaucracy. Whenever a designation belonging to the language of bureaucracy is used, "expression française" is put in parentheses as an explanation or comment, in order that people may not be too baffled.

I will not insist too much on this subject since I do not intend to take up too much of the time of the house. But, Mr. Speaker, the question is extremely serious since I have the greatest respect for the law and I hold that it should be as immutable as possible.

In many circumstances I have complained of the far too great number of amendments made to the law. It runs past our eyes like a film. It lacks stability and that greatly affects jurisprudence.

Still, Mr. Speaker, I do take some consolation from the reading of the amendments to the elections act. Electors are not called "commettants" but "électeurs". It seems to me that immense progress has been made. In Hansard electors are called "commettants", here they are called "électeurs"; that is some progress anyway. I will not stop there; I warn the house against the work of translators in general. I am informed that in the translation of the Criminal Code, from English into French, there are a great many new expressions which will contribute a great deal to confuse all those who have to interpret and enforce the law. I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who is now in his seat, will see to it that no changes are made in the terms now used in the French version of the Criminal Code and of the other statutes. Statutory law is complicated enough as it is now and, in my opinion, it would be absurd to make it absolutely incomprehensible by using new expressions unknown to and not understood by the public.

Tonight I have appealed, as best I could, to the common sense of my colleagues and to the legal experience of those whom it is my privilege to number among my fellow members of the bar. It is my hope that each one of them will see to it that those who want to do better than others are prevented from defacing or mutilating the law.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I have only one or two words to say. I wish to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and insist on the importance, for lawyers and those who deal with the administration of the law, of not changing the terms that have been used in legislation for a great number of years and which have been interpreted by our courts, because changing those terms would naturally result in changing jurisprudence and in preventing its application.

Now the hon. member who spoke before me said that in preparing the French version of certain legislation, the meaning of the English version was not being properly rendered. In other words, there was legislating done in preparing the French version. We have a striking example of that in the bill now before us. I was a member of the elections act committee. When we dealt with section 58 of that act and when it was suggested that the words "officier rapporteur" should be replaced by the term "directeur du scrutin", I put forward the view that such a change should not be made for the same reasons as those already mentioned by the hon. member for Temiscouata. Another reason which prompted me to take that stand was that the words "directeur du scrutin" do not correspond exactly to the meaning of the English term "returning officer", whereas the term "officier rapporteur" is, in my opinion, more accurate. If the use of the term "directeur du scrutin" in the French version is insisted upon, the English version should also be changed so as to read "director of voting".

I gave that example to the house in order to illustrate what has just been put forward by the hon. member who spoke before me.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Fair the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 41, to amend the Dominion Elections Act; Bill No. 42, respecting the National Gallery of Canada; Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act. Those three bills we intend to proceed with in the morning.

Then Bill No. 43, to amend the Civil Service Act; the resolution of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the provision for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces; Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board; Bill No. 36, to amend the Combines Investigation Act; Bill No. 23, to amend the Government Annuities Act.

From Bill No. 43, of the list I have given, I cannot at this time state in what order they will be called.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 14, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CIGARETTES

PRIVILEGE, MR. MCIVOR—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" REFERRING TO SMUGGLED CIGARETTES

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. There is an article in the Globe and Mail, a newspaper I respect and frequently read, bearing this headline: "Claim Seven of Ten M.P.'s Use 'smugs'." The reference is to smuggled cigarettes, Mr. Speaker. This whole house passed this law, and if members of parliament are so keen on saving a few cents on cigarettes I do not think this is the place for them. We should obey our own laws if we expect others to obey them.

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): When I made that statement, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to include the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor).

Mr. McIvor: It is true, Mr. Speaker, that I do not smoke, but if I did smoke I would pay for my cigarettes; I would not smuggle them.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

First report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Winkler.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INCREASES IN SALARIES, PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF CIVIL SERVICE, ARMED FORCES AND MOUNTED POLICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to make an announcement concerning increases in civil service salaries, the pay and allowances of the armed forces, and the pay of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The statement is as follows:

After a careful review of all relevant factors, the government has decided that it would be right and proper to authorize an increase in salaries in the civil service, and in the pay and allowances of members of the armed services and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The last general adjustment in rates of pay occurred in December of 1950.

As I have said on previous occasions, the government's policy in these matters is based on two main principles. First, that salary and pay scales and other conditions of employment in both the civil service and the armed forces should be such as to attract and retain persons of the right type and necessary qualifications. Second, that having regard to the ancillary conditions of employment, remuneration for each class of work or employment should be generally in line with that paid for comparable work by good private employers.

Applying these principles to current conditions, the government believes that a broad series of pay and salary increases is now justified. These increases will apply to all ranks in the armed services and the R.C.M.P. (excluding the commissioner and the chiefs of staff) and to all classes of the civil service with the following exceptions:

(a) The salaries of civil servants in the higher brackets will be reviewed on an individual basis.

(b) Where it is clear that current civil service salary rates are already closely in line with rates being paid by good private employers, the civil service commission will consider whether and to what extent it would be proper to recommend specific increases.

(c) Where the salaries paid in any class have been adjusted since December, 1950, a lesser increase than that applied generally will be authorized, again having regard to rates being paid by good private employers.

(d) The proposed increases will apply only to classified employees. The rates of pay of prevailing rates employees, as is well known, are governed by the prevailing rates in similar private employment.

The amount of increase will vary from class to class in accordance with the basic principles to which I have already referred. The range of percentage increases will be from about 4 per cent to about 14 per cent. The general average effect of these increases will be to add between 8 and 9 per cent to the total salary, pay and allowances cost of both the civil service and the armed services. It is proposed that all these adjustments will date from December 1, 1951.

Full details of the new rates of pay and allowances in the armed services and the pay of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are being announced by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and I take this opportunity of tabling copies of these announcements. Complete details for all classes of civil servants are not yet ready. The civil service commission, however, has completed its recommendation for all the larger classes covering more than four-fifths of the personnel in the classified civil service, and I am tabling a copy of these recommendations which have been approved by the government. The remaining classes will be dealt with during the next few weeks and will be announced in the usual way as soon as they have been approved.

In the case of most departments, there have been sufficient savings in the salary votes to take care of the increased rates of pay for the remaining months of this fiscal year. Some departments may require small supplements to their salary votes before the end of the fiscal year. If that proves to be necessary, parliament will be asked early in the 1952 session to vote the required funds.

I now table copies of the schedules prepared by the civil service commission for the civil service and approved by the government and copies of the announcement and schedules issued by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Would it be possible for a document to be tabled showing us the basis on which these calculations have been made, in view of the fact that this 8 per cent increase in salaries covers a period during which the cost of living index has risen by about 12 per cent?

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member will look at the schedule that has been tabled, I hope he will find in it all the information required in that regard.

PRIVATE BILLS

RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES BILLS—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, might I have the unanimous consent of the house to make a motion with respect to these four bills concerning religious communities which have just been reported, without amendment, from the committee on miscellaneous private bills. The bills having been distributed to hon. members on December 11, I should like to move that when we pass to the orders of the day they might be referred to the committee of the whole house for immediate action prior to our dealing with government orders. I think that would be in order.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

[St. Laurent.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN INSTALLATION OF MICROPHONE SYSTEM

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) requested that I table the correspondence concerning the installation of a loud-speaker system in the House of Commons. I now do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RADAR SCREEN—REFERENCE TO ARTICLES IN MONTREAL "HERALD"

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to articles which appeared in the Montreal Herald of December 10, 11 and 12.

Perhaps it would be a fair summary of the articles to say that they allege that, despite orders for $400 to $500 million worth of radar equipment, it is doubtful if our radar defences will be completed in the three years planned and that this is because of red tape and delay in ordering and producing equipment.

The articles leave the impression that $400 to $500 million have been appropriated to be spent on equipment for the radar screen. I am unaware of the source of this figure but it is fair to say that it is a gross exaggeration. A more correct figure would be in the neighbourhood of 10 per cent of this amount. The equipment on order for the radar screen is of the latest type. Orders were placed as soon as the development work on this equipment had proceeded to a sufficient point to enable production to be undertaken. It will be appreciated that it takes about two years to construct a station of this kind and to make and instal the radar equipment. While delays are inevitable in this, as in every other country, in the production of new and complicated equipment of this kind, reasonably satisfactory progress is being made and some of the equipment has in fact already been installed. In the interim, we have equipment of the type in use at the end of the second world war.

FISHERIES

MARKETING OF NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I think I should make a short statement this morning on the marketing position of Newfoundland salt codfish. Certain misleading statements made in the house on Monday, December 10, by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) make it desirable for me to put the record straight.

Marketing of the 1951 production of salted cod is proceeding satisfactorily. Total production of salted fish was slightly higher than in 1950. However, shipments to market from July to November this year were 333,000 quintals, compared with 220,000 quintals of 1950 fish in the same period of last year.

The stocks on hand today are 80,000 quintals below those for the same date last year and 300,000 quintals less than in 1949. Contracts already made for the balance of the marketing year, together with regular monthly shipments to traditional markets, will take care of all fish on hand before the new season's fish becomes available.

The hon. member mentioned the Spanish market. I can inform him and the house that a shipment to that market is going forward this month.

Mr. Graydon: Order. This is not in order. We have let the minister go on as long as we can. This is an abuse of the privileges of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Graydon: Oh, yes. You cannot answer an hon. member in that way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) wishes to speak he should rise in his place.

Mr. Graydon: On your invitation, Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise in order to say this. We allowed the minister to proceed a long way in order to say this. We allowed the minister to proceed a long way in this statement which he actually had no right to make in answer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must be heard without interruption.

Mr. Graydon: Actually the minister had no right, under the rules of the house, to reply to a private member who made a certain statement in debate. I had thought that the minister was going to make a new statement of policy with respect to Newfoundland salt codfish. But instead of that he was using this as a means of replying to something said in ordinary debate. He should not have done that.

Mr. Mayhew: I do not agree with the hon. member for Peel. I am making a statement to correct a misstatement that will be detrimental to the fishermen of Newfoundland. That is my purpose in doing this.

Mr. Graydon: You must make it in debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether there will be an opportunity during the debate before the end of the session for the minister to reply. It occurs to me that the house would like to have the information, but the statement must not be provocative or argumentative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the minister can make his statement. He should give information only to the house.

Mr. Coldwell: May I—

Mr. Mayhew: I have no intention whatever to enter into a debate with the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar speaks, does the minister desire to continue with his statement, or to make a statement explaining his statement?

Mr. Coldwell: My question has a bearing on that. In this corner of the house we cannot hear what the minister is saying. I wonder whether he would speak a little louder.

Mr. Mayhew: I say that I have no intention of following and answering the debate of the hon. member for St. John's West; I merely want to make this statement.

Mr. Graydon: That is what has been done.

Mr. Mayhew: A similar healthy marketing situation exists in the mainland producing areas. Export prices for salted fish have shown definite improvement this year. Prices, grade for grade,—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Graydon: On a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: Order.

Mr. Mayhew: Prices, grade for grade, are significantly higher than a year ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Graydon: Order.

Mr. Mayhew: Efforts will continue to be directed towards expanding the markets, both at home and abroad, for all Canadian fish products.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, now that the record has been played I suppose I might as well sit down.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege—

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say something on a point of privilege. I think it shows exceedingly bad taste from those on the front opposition benches to object to a statement of this kind after all that was said by their leader during the last two weeks on questions of privilege from that very place.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege I should like to add a few words myself. May I say in this connection that we have had announcements in respect to the wheat growers and other farmers in the Dominion of Canada, but I have never heard an interruption like this. But in connection with the fishing industry, something that is of great interest to many of us coming from the maritime provinces, the interruptions today were very much out of order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Get the facts straight.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the minister's statement I think we should hear a few words from the hon. member from St. John's West.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries for the purposes of clarification. Will the minister state whether the fisheries prices support board is watching the market and the prices paid the fishermen—not the prices paid in the foreign markets, but prices paid to the fishermen—so they can come to the assistance of the fishermen if they are not getting suitable prices for their fish, as I pointed out in my address the other day?

Mr. Mayhew: The answer is definitely yes, and has been ever since I have been Minister of Fisheries.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXCLUDE CERTAIN AREAS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, to exclude certain areas of land from the provisions of section one of chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1950 and thus render such areas eligible for assistance.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gardiner: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house. But, under the circumstances, as has been suggested from the far corner of the house, I think I should make an explanation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This would be an unusual procedure.

Mr. Casselman: This is an unusual day.

Mr. Speaker: It would be an unusual procedure to have an explanation made at this time. I will allow it only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the objective in making the statement at the moment is that I think it was understood by the house some days ago that probably no new legislation would be brought in at this stage. I only wish to say, with regard to that, this measure was mentioned early in the session and was on the list of legislation which was to have been brought down, but it was dependent upon information which had to be gathered in the Peace river country particularly, and all across the northern part of the province of Alberta. I wish only to read to the house a statement which I made to the committee in 1950 when the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was being amended. It is found on page 72 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee:

I can give more assurance to my hon. friends. Since we met this morning and before the meeting this afternoon, we had a meeting of council and I discussed this matter with council, and they agreed with what I suggested. They think it should be retroactive in order to make the check that we want to make; and they are also committed to the undertaking I have given to the committee that if we find it is creating hardships which should not be created under the spirit of the act, we shall have amending legislation next year.

In order to explain what that had to do with my request may I say that we brought in legislation, as the house will recall, in 1950, which provided that prairie farm assistance would not be paid on certain lands which were in areas that had been open for homesteading prior to 1940, but had not been settled upon. At that time it was brought to our attention by members from the province of Alberta that there was a new area in the northern part of the province which should not come under that restriction. We gave an undertaking at that time that we would have our inspectors examine into that area carefully. We have had that examination made and we think that the payment should be made in the section of the country which is north of township 60. That will include the areas right across the north of the provinces in which new settlement has been made.

The payments are made under this legislation in December. If the legislation were agreed to now it would not be necessary for us at a later date to come back and make retroactive payments in connection with the year 1951. These cannot be made under the act as it now stands. Therefore I suggest that just a simple amendment be put in which says in effect that these payments may be made north of township 60 on lands which have been settled since January 1, 1941. I think that will meet the wishes of those who brought the question up during the time the matter was being considered in the committee on agriculture in 1950. I do not think it would necessitate any discussion on the general provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. If it were going to be the wish of the house, when the matter is considered, that there should be a discussion on the whole act, then I am afraid I would have to allow the legislation to fall by the wayside because I do not think there is time to do that this session.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Is it intended that the restriction that now applies in the amendment passed last year will continue in Saskatchewan? If so, it is most unjust to the farmers in Saskatchewan who are in a position similar to those in Alberta who will get the benefit of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to the question, it does not have that effect. It is township 60 right across the provinces.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well, coming from the west, that the line does not run straight east and west with regard to the settlement of these three prairie provinces. It runs from the northwest to the south, and the area affected in Saskatchewan is mostly between 45 and 60. Also the area in Manitoba is in that area, after this legislation passes.

Mr. Abbott: Next session, next session.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to what has been said, and so that we may have an understanding of the position, there has been a complete examination made of the four provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba; and I think it can be very clearly shown, when this bill is before the house, that there is not anything at the moment along the line suggested by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). If any such thing should happen in the future, of course, the house is still here to take care of it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that, notwithstanding standing order 60, I now leave the chair?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not ask that. It was simply to say that if there is going to be any long discussion of the measure, then I do not wish to proceed with it at this session. If it can be permitted later on, when we come to the time to deal with it properly in the house, to proceed without a lengthy discussion, then I would like to proceed with it at this session in order to make it possible to make the payments in December, which otherwise would not be made.

Mr. Wright: If there is going to be this discrimination, then there will certainly be discussion.

Mr. Abbott: Next session.

Mr. Gardiner: We will see when we come to it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Bill No. 38, respecting the general synod of the Church of England in Canada and the missionary society of the Church of England in Canada.—Mr. Fulford.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ADVANCE POLLS AND PRISONERS OF WAR VOTING REGULATIONS

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) for the second reading of Bill No. 41, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and to change its title to the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the friendly Christmas feeling evidenced this morning thus far, I feel we are lucky indeed to live in a country with the form of government we have here in Canada. Many people across the Atlantic would be very glad if they were in the same position.

In the elections committee this year, as in many other years, there was a spirit of friendly co-operation. That co-operation lasted while matters proceeded as the majority desired—and that is perhaps as one might expect. I might add however that for a number of years I have been trying to bring to the attention of the house an improved system of voting. Four or five years ago I had a bill prepared by the law clerk and, by coincidence, on the morning my bill was placed in my hands there appeared in Votes and Proceedings another bill along similar lines in the name of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). Because of the rush of other business before the house at the session it was not possible to deal with that bill.

On different occasions since that time I have brought to the attention of the committee on elections the fact that we should improve our system of voting, and I believe the reason for bringing about that improvement has not been disputed thus far.

Looking into the records since the time of my first election in 1935, I find that a number of members have been elected to the House of Commons without having received a majority of the votes cast in their constituencies. In 1935, I find, 103 members were elected by majority votes, and 138 by minority votes. In 1940 there were 162 majority candidates, and 79 minority candidates. Then, in 1945—and this may appear strange—only 99 members were elected by majority votes, while 142 came to the House of Commons with minority votes. In the 1949 election 142 members were elected by majorities, and 116 by minorities. The government has approximately 190 seats out of 262 and I believe they got 49 per cent of the vote polled. In my opinion that is not giving the kind of representation to which we are entitled in a good country like Canada. There should be some other method of voting which will give us the proper representation and prevent any member coming to this house unless he has received at least 51 per cent of the vote polled.

In addition to myself and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, there are other people in Canada who feel that our system should be changed. About two and a half years ago the Canadian Chamber of Commerce took up this matter and considered it worthy of some research. They requested their various branches across the dominion to indicate what they thought about having another system of voting which would bring about the results I have mentioned, that is, not allowing a member to come here without having a majority of the votes cast in his constituency in a particular election.

The chamber of commerce stated that if a sufficient number of their branches across the country were in favour of having a change made they would press the matter further. Apparently that majority was obtained because they made a request to have another method of voting adopted. When the committee met during the last session another letter was received from the secretary of the chamber of commerce reminding the committee of the request that had been made by that organization.

To carry this along a little further, we find that in the election held on November 22 in Ontario the Progressive Conservatives obtained 79 seats although they received only 49 per cent of the votes; the Liberals obtained 7 seats although they received only 31 per cent of the vote, and the C.C.F. obtained 2 seats although they received 19 per cent of the vote. Anyone who considers those figures must realize that things are not as they ought to be. When people come here to speak for their constituents they should have better backing than many have at the present time.

In my own particular constituency there were five candidates running in 1945. Had the vote been split up fairly evenly it would have been possible for a member to have been sent here after receiving only 25 per cent of the vote, or perhaps even less. In my opinion that is not good business. In the last election there was one candidate elected in Toronto who received 38½ per cent of the vote. This man belongs to the communist party. We are sending thousands of our men overseas and spending millions of dollars in fighting communism, yet under our method of voting one of their spokesmen sits in the legislature at Toronto. It may be necessary for me to deal more in detail with that a little later on.

This matter was brought up in the committee on November 15 last. I did not bring in an amendment at that time, but I did bring up the question for consideration. After I had explained this somewhat the chief electoral officer was called. I must say that he is doing a good job and in doing that he is following in his father's footsteps. Since I came here in 1936 I have had the best of co-operation and service from the former chief electoral officer and the gentleman who holds that office at the present time, and I think every hon. member of this house has had similar treatment. I hope that continues.

The chief electoral officer made quite an exhaustive presentation. There were two hon. members in particular who objected to the method of voting. I might say that in Manitoba and Alberta we have a form of alternative vote, but that does not give the results which I want to get in the dominion elections. Under that system a person may vote for only one candidate and stop right there. That is what we call plumping. The result is that many members are elected without having a majority of the votes polled.

In Australia they have compulsory registration and compulsory voting. They use a system of marking ballots which I should like to see used here. I am not at this time suggesting that we have either compulsory registration or compulsory voting. The method that I advocate is that where there are three or more candidates on the ballot the voter must mark his choice right down the line. In doing that he can give his last choice to the fellow he least desires to be elected. I think that would take care of the trouble we have at the present time. I should like to quote from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) before the committee, as reported on page 134 of the proceedings, as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, we have the experience of 18 to 20 years ago with respect to this present system as it applied in the case of the election of the city council in the city of Vancouver. One of the outstanding recollections I have is that before they finally arrived at the names of the candidates who were elected a period of six days had passed before the tabulation of the vote was completed. That was an obvious drawback, quite aside from the mental hazard. It seems to me that we would be getting away from the principles of democracy if we were to draft a section which would make it compulsory for an elector to vote for every man or woman whose name might appear on a ballot, particularly if such an individual might be a person for whom the voter would not want to vote.

Commenting on that statement I might say that the election in Vancouver which the hon. member referred to did not have the first thing to do with the argument I was presenting at that time. There were a number of candidates up for election on that occasion and several were to be elected whereas the system I am advocating would apply only to single-member constituencies. We have only two dual-member constituencies in Canada at the present time, Halifax and Queens. As far as the compulsory feature which he protests against is concerned, you are compelled to vote under our present method if you are going to have any say in the election. I do not think that marking your ballot in its entirety in order to keep out some undesirable candidate should be considered as a detrimental factor. The hon. member continued:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, it is quite conceivable that in many of the electoral districts throughout the dominion of Canada, if this suggestion advanced by Mr. Fair carries, there might be various constituencies where among the four, five or six candidates whose names might be on the ballot paper there might happen to be a communist and you would have to mark a ballot for him. Now, speaking personally, I do not want to do that. It seems to me that in that way we might write into our electoral law, in the way of compulsion, something which would force the elector to vote for somebody whom he does not intend, desire or want to vote for and in doing that we would be countermanding the great principle upon which our democracy is built.

I come back again to the case of the communist member elected in Toronto on 38½ per cent of the votes polled. If we had had the system which I advocate I am sure that in the legislature at Toronto there would not be a member of the communist party free to circulate the propaganda of that outfit. Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard had this to say:

> Then again, as the chief electoral officer has pointed out, it is not applicable in dual member ridings. And now, if this principle was adopted in dual member ridings you would have to go on the basis of proportional representation, because this is only applicable to single member ridings; and if there ever was a headache in God's world it is this question of proportional representation and the counting of the vote. Without in any way being discourteous to my good friend, Mr. Fair, I would like to suggest that we do not adopt this system of the single transferable vote for the federal seats.

I do not think we would have very much difficulty with the headache mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard because in the section of the country where there are dual member ridings only the old line parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, contest the elections. Therefore, so far as the arguments advanced by the hon. member are concerned, I do not feel there is anything valid in them. Then we come to another member from British Columbia who also spoke against the proposition. I refer to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). His statement can be found at page 137 of the proceedings of the special committee. He had this to say:

> Before you vote, Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my opinion. I appreciate Mr. Fair's presentation. I understand his argument for the alternative vote. But, speaking for the party I represent, I could not support that vote for these reasons: The purpose of the single alternative vote is to attempt to assure the election of candidates with an over-all majority of the number of electors supporting a candidate but, in order to be certain of that, it is obvious from the presentation by Mr. Fair and by the chief electoral officer, that there must be compulsion in so far as the voter is concerned in that he must mark his ballot for all the candidates whose names appear on that ballot, and the effect of that compulsion would be to force a man to vote for people for whom he does not wish to vote at all, and that in my opinion would be destroying the very objective of the change proposed in the voting system, because the voter would be required to vote for somebody whom he did not desire to vote for at all. A person would have to vote for some candidate or for something with whom or with which he did not agree. The second reason I would oppose the alternative vote —and I am sure that Mr. Fair would agree with me on this—is that it should be in effect in all the provinces now.

I do not think I need to go any further because there is very little more that is pertinent. First of all I would point out that there is compulsion in the present system of marking the ballot if you are going to have people register their choice. Carrying it a little further, registering their ballot against somebody whom they do not wish to have in office does not make it any more compulsory than at the present time. I was rather amused to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West object to the word "compulsion" because if he will read the program of his party I think he will find compulsion right along the line so far as he and the program of his party are concerned. He copied the arguments advanced—

Mr. Knowles: Neither correct nor fair.

Mr. Fair: —by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. To my mind these arguments are not valid. I believe they only go to show that there is no argument whatever against adopting a system of voting that will give us fair representation. The question of education of the people is a very minor matter. In Manitoba and Alberta they have got along very well with the system of marking ballots 1, 2, 3, 4 and so on, and I think the people of the other provinces would be just as quick as the people of Manitoba and Alberta to pick up that method of marking if they were only given the opportunity to do so.

This method is used in Australia, and only two or three per cent of the ballots are rejected. I believe that in Canada the percentage is possibly that high under the present system. We should aim to make progress in our system of voting and other things we do in Canada. This is one place where I believe we should make some advance. I realize it is not possible to get this matter through at the present session. I realize that people will have to have a little education and possibly give the matter some consideration, but I feel that if people all across Canada were given a true outline of the necessity for the change they would not hesitate for a moment to make themselves conversant with this method of marking ballots. I believe they would vote for something that is much more progressive and which is much more fair and democratic than our present system.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that I have spoken on this matter. In fact I think I have taken the opportunity at some time in every session since I have been a member to urge an amendment to the elections act making provision for the use of the transferable vote. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has put on the record the results of the last three federal general elections. According to my figures, in the general election of 1949 some 121 members were elected by minority votes cast in their ridings. I have a short article here that appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on August 24 of that year. It is a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa and reads:

A record total of 5,856,307 votes was cast in the June 27 general election compared with 5,246,130 in the 1945 election, it was disclosed Tuesday by Jules Castonguay, chief electoral officer. The Liberal party, returned to power with an overwhelming majority, received 2,926,029 votes in the last election compared with 2,170,625 in 1945. The Progressive Conservatives, second largest group in the commons, hold 1,742,235 compared with 1,455,453; the C.C.F., 790,321 against 822,661, and the Social Credit party 139,801 against 214,998.

These figures indicate that it required approximately 15,160 votes to elect a Liberal member in 1949 whereas it took approximately 42,540 votes to elect a Progressive Conservative. As has been pointed out, this situation might easily be reversed because in the recent Ontario election—and I have not seen a break-down yet—some 49 per cent of the votes cast elected 79 members to the Frost government out of a total of 90 seats. Before a candidate is declared elected I think it is very essential that he should have received a majority of the votes cast in the riding.

Those of us who have followed elections in the past know very well that there have been situations where a third and sometimes a fourth candidate has been brought into the field to split a certain vote. That has been recognized in several parts of the country, and it is only by an amendment providing for the transferable vote that you can overcome that system in an election. Where people can pretty well judge what the result will be I think it is very bad that a third or fourth candidate should be introduced simply to split the vote and change the representation of the riding. As I see it, that is not in the interests of democracy.

In the 1949 election just under 50 per cent of the vote resulted in the Liberal party obtaining 75 per cent of the seats. Thirty per cent of the vote resulted in the Progressive Conservatives obtaining 16 per cent of the seats. Thirteen per cent of the vote resulted in the C.C.F. winning 5 per cent of the seats, and 7 per cent of the vote gave the Social Credit party and others 4 per cent of the seats. That is a very unfair situation. At this late date I do not want to go into great detail. I want to repeat what the hon. member for Battle River said, namely, that for a great many years this system has been in operation in the provinces of Alberta and Manitoba. I have read editorials in some eastern newspapers to the effect that it would make the determining of the result too complicated. I want to say that is far from the fact because if people will converse with those who have been in charge of the elections in Manitoba and Alberta they will find it is a simple matter to make these transfers and ascertain who has received a majority of the votes cast in a particular riding. I simply want to make this appeal once more. While it probably cannot be done at the present session, I ask the minister responsible and the members of the house to give serious consideration, before another general election is held, to amending the elections act in order to make provision for the transferable vote so that many things that have happened in the past will not be possible under what I think should be a democratic system of voting in this country.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I rise at this time simply for the purpose of recording briefly my opposition to one feature of the bill. The point in which I am interested emerges very clearly from a reading of the order as it appears on today's order paper. It is No. 11 and reads as follows:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Secretary of State for the second reading of Bill No. 41, an act to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and to change its title to the Canada Elections Act.

I have indicated on previous occasions my opposition to the process which we have now succeeded in bringing out into the open, the process of eliminating the word "Dominion" as a part of the official name or description of Canada. I wish now to record once more my opposition, my objection and my regret that this process should be continued. I am not going to make a speech at any length because there are a number of factors which indicate that one should not. However, I could not allow the bill to be given second reading without again recording my position.

I put my objection on two grounds. First there is the ground of sentiment—or tradition, if you like—and second, the ground of logic. I object to the stupidity and irritations which accompany and are made necessary by this unnecessary process of changing the name. On the second ground let me point out the position we have now arrived at as a result of this process. Apparently we have to sit down and solemnly change every section of this act. It will of course be necessary to make technical amendments to every section of every bill where the word "dominion" appears in order to carry out this process. And it has got to the point now where the logical conclusion of that process has carried us to the absurd position where we have to sit down solemnly and say, in the piece of legislative nonsense found in section 2 of the bill, that if the word "dominion" happens to appear in any place in connection with an election in the future it shall not invalidate the whole election. One only has to follow the proposition a little further to see the absurdity of the position in which this process gets us, because after all, if you are going to eliminate a word, you have to ban it. So I suppose at some future date we shall have to sit down, if this government is to be consistent—and if it is allowed to remain in office—to study another enactment in similar form which will result from carrying the process to the ultimate point. It would then be necessary to provide that if the word "Dominion" does appear in any way in connection with an election, then it shall invalidate the whole election.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, the absurd, illogical and rather humiliating position in which this process lands us. Because it is so illogical, because it is so unnecessary, and because I find it so objectionable, I am not able to allow this bill to pass without recording once more my objection to that process.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I take just a minute, or two at the most, to say a word on the point raised by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I agree with those who contend that there should be improvements in our method of voting. It is certainly wrong that 49 per cent of the popular vote should result in some 72 per cent of the seats of this house being held by one party. I agree that something should be done about it. But I do want to enter this word of warning. In my view the single transferable vote would create as many problems as it would solve, if not more. I suggest that if we are going to go in for electoral reform, consideration will have to be given not to the single transferable vote but to a system of proportional representation, which is something quite different. After all, the aim of a democratic election is much broader than the position of any individual candidate. The aim of a democratic election is to get a parliament that is somehow representative of the political thinking of the people of the country. It is for that reason that I suggest if we are going to consider electoral reform, we should not adopt the single transferable vote which creates as many problems as it solves, but rather we should establish a system of proportional representation.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to say a word on this subject. I do not believe anyone can accuse me of taking up too much of the time of the house. I am more or less in agreement with the statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). He spoke in French so I did not understand it all, and Hansard is not available this morning. From what I could learn about his speech—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I interrupt to say that I have given the hon. member for Temiscouata the assurance that when we reach that section of the bill we shall drop it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have set aside all the rules here.

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member stated that he was more in favour of the old system of voting. The election officers at the polls throughout the Dominion of Canada are more familiar with that system. Any time a new system of voting is introduced I think it should be the subject of study not only in our high schools but in the senior grades of our public schools. No matter whether it is the single transferable vote or any other system, it should be taught in our schools. If the older people who are able to vote do not understand the system, then the children will bring home the information, and will familiarize the older people with it. I am glad to hear the minister state that that part of the bill will be dropped. I might say that I am always happy to listen to the hon. member for Temiscouata, but I have a greater appreciation of his remarks when he speaks in English rather than French.

I should like to say a word about the advanced polls. At this last election the province of Ontario tried out a system of more advance polls in the ridings. I believe it was quite unsatisfactory. It did not accomplish much. It seems to me that one advance poll to a riding, in a central place, would be the proper system, unless it is an extremely large riding in which case you might have two. But to have three, four or five advance polls in a riding, involving a great deal of expense, with nothing being derived from having them, does not seem to be worth while. In my riding at many of these advance polls there were only two or three ballots in the ballot box. Those advance polls cost the government a considerable amount of money, having regard to the fact that there was a returning officer and a poll clerk to be paid, and that the polling booth was rented for three days. For the number of votes cast in those advance polls, it was not worth the expense involved.

I think something should be done in the way of getting more people out to vote. In the last federal election 75 per cent of the voters went to the polls. In Russia, I believe, 99 per cent of the eligible voters went to the polls.

Mr. Graydon: They had better go.

Mr. Fulford: They are shot if they do not vote.

Mr. Hodgson: I should not like to see any such law that is in effect in Russia brought into effect in Canada; far from it. But I think something should be done by way of legislation so that people would exercise their franchise more than they have exercised it in the past.

I should like to pass on to the chief electoral officer the facts about these advance polls, because I have heard that at dominion elections there will be more advance polls than there have been in the past. If he will look up what happened in Ontario at the advance polls in the last election, it will give him some idea of the value of advance polls.

Another objection I have is in connection with changing the name and doing away with the old traditional name "Dominion of Canada". I do not care what act is passed here or what legislation is put on the statute books of Canada, it will always be the Dominion of Canada to me and to most of my constituents. I think that in my riding I could win an election on that issue alone; and I think the situation is the same in many other ridings in Canada.

Why there is a desire to change the name, I do not know. The name "Dominion of Canada" is probably only an old tradition, but it is dear to the hearts of many of the people of Canada. When Canada was first thought of, we had Upper Canada and Lower Canada. That was quite all right. But when we had confederation, it was called the Dominion of Canada. I have the dictionary here, and I was reading the meaning of the word "dominion". The dictionary says it means sovereignty, control; domains of feudal lord, territory of sovereign or government; name given to Canadian colonies after they were united in 1867; right of possession.

I do not know why anybody has any objection to "Dominion of Canada" as a name. In Canada we have two great races. Let us unite them rather than try to divide them. We have heard a great deal about this word "tolerance". I do not know in what dictionary to look, but, as I understand it, it is a big word with many meanings. After all, I think the time is now ripe for the people of Canada to pull together, with no faction trying to pull us apart. To the government or those who are at the bottom of this move to change the name of the Dominion of Canada, by taking off the word "dominion", and those who bring in bills for a new flag or for a new national anthem, and all this silly nonsense that is not at all necessary, may I say that it will not help us a bit in Canada, commercially, religiously or politically but that it will have a tendency to draw our people apart. I say that it is a heap of nonsense and that it is ridiculous, coming from people who are elected and who are supposed to be leaders. We are supposed to be leaders in our own community. Yet here we are down here and, instead of leading our people together, we are trying to divide the country and to divide our people on various issues. It is a heap of nonsense, as far as I am concerned.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hodgson: Probably the hon. member's constituency is different from mine. I do not agree that it is any better because of being different from mine, because I represent the best riding in Canada, bar none. In my riding we have the greatest cross-section of people that there is any place in Canada. We have settlements of all the different races and that sort of thing, and they are becoming welded together over the years. For someone to say: Because there are a lot of Germans in my riding, or a lot of French or a lot of Dutch, I do not agree with you, and that sort of thing, is just some more nonsense. Everybody who comes to Canada comes because he wants to do so, because he likes this country and because he wants to make it his home. After these people come here the law should provide that they become Canadians, and I think that 90 per cent of them will become Canadians. I hope so, anyhow. But these people who are coming to our shores now will never become Canadians if we cannot agree among ourselves about the one little word "dominion" in the "Dominion of Canada".

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make a few remarks when the bill had gone into committee, but in view of the speeches which have been made, I think perhaps this would be a better place to express my opinion. I believe that this change, doing away with the word "dominion" in the Dominion Elections Act, is unwise for two reasons. In the first place, that word has great value in enabling people to distinguish between dominion and provincial election law. In the province of British Columbia we had a provincial election within one week, I think it was, of the dominion election in 1949. In 1945 the elections were also held at dates which were quite close together. It is hard enough to keep the election activities separate without having all dominion election material showing just the word "election" rather than the two words "dominion election". From a practical point of view I think it is unwise to make this change. People understand the word "dominion" as meaning the difference between dominion and provincial with regard to elections; and if there is one act in which we should keep the word "dominion" it is this election measure.

My second objection is based on the ground that hundreds of thousands of people in this country—in fact, I believe millions of people —place great value on the word "dominion" and they resent this policy of the government of making that word almost out of order, as we would say in this house. To Canadians who feel as I do about the matter, the word "dominion" implies vastness. It means that we think of Canada as a great country, extending from sea to sea and from the boundary of the United States to the northern reaches. It is something of which we are proud. It makes us think of this country as one of the great nations of the world.

I admit that in other parts of Canada the word may not have that same meaning. To us it implies in no way whatsoever subservience to any other race, any other nation or to anyone at all. It implies no subjection and no inequality with them. Such an interpretation does not enter into our thinking. We are no less proud of the word "Canada". I remember the great pride with which I wore the word "Canada" on my shoulder straps overseas, and I am sure that the feeling was held by every Canadian in the Canadian corps in the first war. No doubt it was just the same with Canadians who served in the second world war. We threw our shoulders around a bit just because the word "Canada" was on those shoulder straps. But little did I think that 35 years from that time I would be sitting in a Canadian House of Commons and hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) making statements which insinuated that anyone who wanted to use the word "dominion" was not a good Canadian. That was the effect of the statements made by the Prime Minister on that occasion in this house a few weeks ago when this question was up. I resent the Prime Minister of Canada, no matter what his party may be, taking that stand toward any Canadian who believes that the word "dominion" should be continued.

I am not alone in that resentment. I hold in my hand an editorial from the Vancouver Sun, dated November 15, 1951. By the way, the Vancouver Sun is one of the most ardent supporters of this government, yet I read from their editorial dealing with this question the following:

> For instance, Ottawa has quietly dropped the word "dominion" from Canada's title. It has been quietly dropping the word "royal" from the mails.
> What is Mr. St. Laurent trying to achieve? Where is he going to stop?
> These piddling manoeuvres seem aimed chiefly at the appeasement of sectional prejudice.

I warn the government—and I would be interested to hear the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) justify the policy of dropping the word "dominion"—I warn the government that this policy is creating serious misgivings in the part of the country which I have the honour to represent. This policy is creating mistrust, and I believe it is tending toward disunity at a time when this nation could drive ahead to a destiny which no Canadian has ever even imagined in the years gone by. We have these tremendous resources just being developed, iron ore, oil, titanium and uranium. We have great material wealth, and all we need now is to go ahead and develop the country and become the greatest nation in the world.

I do suggest that it is most unwise for the government to be following a policy of this kind, which is just one of those things that make trouble between Canadians, trouble which could so easily be avoided. The government has delayed and hedged on a national flag for Canada, in spite of having a recommendation some years ago which was practically unanimous. It has hedged on a national anthem; hedged on these things, and yet is going ahead to wipe out this word "dominion". What on earth the ministers think they are going to achieve by a policy of this kind I do not know. They are doing it a little bit at a time. One bill this week, another bill next week and something else next year. Surely, that type of policy is much too petty for the Canadian people in the year 1951.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I want to make just one observation on this bill. In the recent Ontario election it was found that when the enumeration took place a great many people, particularly when there was somebody boarding in the house, were reluctant to give the names of the boarders. That was for the very obvious reason that they were frightened the information so given would be used and passed over to the Department of National Revenue for investigation purposes. This was quite prevalent. There should be a section in the act, as there is in the act dealing with the department of the dominion bureau of statistics—I suppose it is called the dominion bureau of statistics, although I suppose that will be changed fairly soon. There is a section in the legislation dealing with the dominion bureau of statistics which says that all information so given shall be given in confidence and that no use will be made of it by any other department of government.

One of the essential secrecies is the secrecy of the ballot. While naturally the names are published in the voters' lists, nevertheless I should like to have this point considered before the next federal—or whatever the election will be called, whether it will be called a dominion election or what—before the next federal election, and something put into the act to show that information given to the enumerators will be for the purposes of the elections act and for the purposes of the elections act alone. I mention this because today, particularly in ridings such as mine, a tremendous number of people are sharing accommodation. It is a very essential thing that that shall be continued because of the congestion and housing shortage. Because of that many people who would not normally do so have taken in others to help in what is still an emergency situation. They are reluctant to give the names or to admit that there are others sharing accommodation in their houses with them. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that consideration be given to these points in the act.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up what has been said by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). I know that at the time of the last federal election and also the provincial election, when people running boarding houses or rooming houses were asked by the enumerators as to who lived in those houses, invariably the answer was, "Mr. and Mrs. Jones". Then, when the inquiry was made if there was anybody else, the answer was no.

An attempt has been made to find out why this is done, and two reasons have been advanced. The first is that in the city these boarding house and rooming house operators are afraid that because they have boarders or roomers their property assessment may be raised. The second reason is their fear that perhaps the income tax collector might catch up with them.

In common with the hon. member for York West, I feel there should be some way of making these boarding and rooming house operators responsible for supplying the names of the people in their houses. Surely they should give those names. In the elections of 1940, 1945 and 1949 many people who had lived in boarding houses for twenty or thirty years were left off the lists. That is not right, because they are deprived of their vote. They say that when the enumerator called they were at their work, and that each year they have to check the voters' lists to see if their names appear. The names of these people are even left off the municipal lists, and for the same reason.

While I am on my feet may I make a vigorous protest against the substitution of the word "Canada" for the word "Dominion" in the Dominion Elections Act. In my view this is a slur against the people of Canada, against people who have thought of this country of ours as the Dominion of Canada since school days. Soon I fear there will be an effort to take the word "dominion" from our national holiday, the first of July. It has been tried already by this government, through its members and the cabinet. This is no less than chiselling on the people of Canada in regard to the use of the word "dominion".

The people are protesting. I have before me petitions from many organizations. Only a few days ago I received one signed by seventy-two members, and another one signed by fifty members of the Imperial Order, Daughters of the Empire. These people are protesting, and I do not blame them.

The Imperial Order, Daughters of the Empire is founded on British principles. Now, however, there is an attempt to chisel, and to take those principles away, in short to take away everything that is British. The word "dominion" is part of our tie-up with the crown. I protest against this change, and I say the name of the act should not be changed. Further, everything else that has been described as "dominion" should continue to be described in that way.

It is difficult for anyone to abbreviate the word "dominion", or the expression "Dominion of Canada". There is no such difficulty, however, in abbreviating the word "Canada" because, on more than one occasion in foreign countries I have seen "Canada" abbreviated to "Can.". I object to this, and I know there are thousands upon thousands of people in Canada who feel as I do—that "Dominion" should stay.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I was not privileged to serve on the committee which considered the provisions of this bill. However, on this motion for second reading I have some suggestions.

In connection with our elections law, I believe we should have the desire if at all possible to effect the greatest possible degree of uniformity in connection with the holding of elections, and the regulations applying thereto, both federally and provincially.

In the main session of the Ontario legislature, immediately preceding the last one, a change was made in the Ontario Elections Act, at which time the province attempted to combine the best features of the provincial law with the best features of the Dominion Elections Act. I believe all hon. members will agree that at the last provincial election the change proved beneficial.

I believe there may be some excellent provisions in some of the provincial election laws which could be incorporated in our dominion act. One of these is the elasticity now provided in the Ontario act in connection with advance polls. In that regard I believe the regulations under the dominion law are much too rigid. It must be realized that all people cannot be in the same place on election day, and it is my suggestion that our regulations should not be as rigid as they are. I can see no reason why in our Dominion Elections Act we should not have some provision in connection with advance polls which would be practical and along the lines of that now obtaining in Ontario. Many people in the province found it a great convenience and a matter of accommodation for their benefit when, at the time of the recent provincial election in Ontario, they were able to vote at advance polls, although they may not have been commercial travellers, trainmen or such others as would fall within the narrow classification set out in the Dominion Elections Act.

I suggest that even at this late stage the minister and the chief electoral officer, both of whom no doubt have given the matter considerable study, should consider expanding and liberalizing the federal regulations so as to include many people who normally are denied the use of the franchise because they move from place to place on election day.

Then, I am not at all satisfied with our polling hours. I have been trying to ascertain whether the new changes make any provision for a change in the polling hours, and I have failed to find any such change. I believe the hours we now specify for purposes of polling in Canada are unrealistic. They may work out all right in some places, but in my view polling from eight to six does not offer encouragement to people to go to the polling booths in large numbers. I have referred to the hours eight to six with some degree of uncertainty, owing to the fact that the polling hours in federal, provincial and municipal elections are all different.

In the county of Peel are hundreds of commuters—perhaps even more than that—and it is not easy for those commuters, who work at some distance from their homes, to find time to vote, under the present voting hours. If you happen to live at Clarkson, Lorne Park or Port Credit on the Canadian National line you have no time to vote either before the train leaves or after it gets back. It is all very well to say that employers allow two or three hours off, but two or three hours off is no good if there is no train to take you to the polling booth. It is unrealistic and it seems to me it would help considerably if the evening limit were extended one hour. We should consider how these hours affect people who commute.

The conditions today are quite different from those which prevailed previously in connection with elections. I suppose if some kind of inventory were taken of the people who work some distance from where they live we would find that the whole complexion has changed. I know in Malton which is in my constituency there are people who come to work at the A. V. Roe company from as far away as sixty-five and seventy miles. The same thing happens over and over again in other communities. This is due to the changes in industrial locations and housing conditions.

Before this bill finally passes I think we should give consideration to people who live some distance from where they work and revise the hours of voting accordingly. I have tried to be constructive in my suggestions. The advance poll system which worked out so well in the provincial election should be incorporated into the federal structure.

There is another matter I should like to mention and to which no doubt the minister has given consideration. It is confusing to find that there is an entirely different set of regulations governing voting in federal, provincial and municipal elections. The less complicated we can make our election machinery, the easier it will be for people to understand how to record their opinions from time to time. Not long ago in this debate an hon. member suggested that something should be done in the schools. I agree with that, but the only thing is that if you teach children how to vote federally, how to vote provincially and then how to vote municipally they are going to be just as confused as the electors. We should try to reach some form of unanimity if it is at all possible.

It may be that that is not possible. Ontario has gone a long way toward reaching unanimity with the federal government in connection with the recording of the franchise in that province. I rose to say these things because of what I have encountered personally. They are not theoretical views; they are views which I think should be considered before this bill is passed.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have been wondering whether I should say anything in this debate, but I think I had better because everyone else seems to have something to say. I want to support what the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said last night with regard to the disqualification of certain people in federal elections because they are disqualified in provincial elections. In past years a fairly large number of voters in British Columbia were disqualified in this way for reason of race. Fortunately that discrimination has been eliminated from the Dominion Elections Act. At this time I want to thank the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) for the help he gave me a few years ago in clearing up that situation.

When this discrimination was in effect it was thought that all kinds of evil things would occur if the vote were granted to those of our citizens of oriental origin. But it has been done and so far nothing catastrophic has happened. Everyone agrees that Canada is growing by leaps and bounds. As a matter of fact, I think most people feel that it was a shame that that discrimination was allowed to exist for so long.

Then a word with regard to the Doukhobors. These people are lumped together under that name whereas they should be divided into two categories. There is a small group known as the Sons of Freedom who do not want to be assimilated into Canadian society; they want to remain as a group apart. I am all in favour of refusing the privileges of Canadian citizenship to those who are not ready to assume the responsibilities that go with that citizenship.

However, I think the great majority of Doukhobors in British Columbia wish to become good Canadians and they should be given every opportunity to do so. One essential opportunity is the right to choose, along with other people, the men and women who make the laws of this country. I hope that in this case the minister will be as helpful as he was before in regard to orientals, and will have as clear an understanding of the issues involved.

I should like to refer briefly to another point which has been brought up by several speakers, that is, changing the name of the act from Dominion Elections Act to Canada Elections Act. I hope I am a good Canadian. I try to be. I flatter myself on occasions that I need not try, that it comes natural for me to be a good citizen. I cannot see that anything is going to happen because we change the title of this act from Dominion Elections Act to Canada Elections Act.

The other day my good friend, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), brought to my attention a letter that was reprinted in the Ottawa Journal from the Toronto Globe and Mail which had been written by another good friend of mine, Eugene Forsey, protesting against this change. Mr. Forsey has been a friend of mine for many years, I respect his opinions and I appreciate his friendship. However, on this occasion I think my opinion is just as good as his. I disagree with him, but I am quite sure that that will not make any difference in our friendship. We will both be just as good Canadians as we were before the change was made from Dominion Elections Act to Canada Elections Act.

I had occasion to say something on this matter a few evenings ago and what I did say was said on the spur of the moment. I thought I should be sure of my ground and I had a look at the British North America Act. I find that the word "dominion" is mentioned three times, I believe, and so far as I can ascertain it is confined to the first and second pages of the act. From then on every reference to this country is to "Canada". It says in the preamble, I believe, that there shall be one dominion under the name of Canada. From then on every reference is to "Canada" and not "Dominion of Canada".

For example, section 17 reads:

> There shall be one parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

We have dropped the Queen, and other words become obsolete for various reasons as time goes on. What I should like to point out, however, is that when the bill is passed it will be grouped with all other acts of parliament and put into a book which we call the Statutes of Canada, not "Dominion statutes" but "Statutes of Canada". Is there any reason why we should not call it the Canada Elections Act and have it in harmony with the other statutes?

Someone mentioned the question of Canada abroad. I think we are coming close to the time when as much of the work of our cabinet ministers will be in the international field as in the national field. A week or two ago I counted the number of cabinet ministers who were absent attending international conferences of one kind or another, and I found there were five or six. That is the case all the year round. At every one of these conferences Canada is known not by the name "Dominion of Canada" or "dominion" but by the name "Canada". The sign on the tables where our delegates sit has the word "Canada" on it. Surely there is nothing derogatory in the term. We are not adding to or taking anything away from this or any other act by changing the name. A few years from now we will be wondering why we spent so much time talking about it.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the hon. member if Australia is dropping the name "Commonwealth of Australia" and is South Africa dropping the name "Union of South Africa"? They are also known as South Africa and Australia.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know whether or not they are, but I know that in referring to Australia we speak of Australia, and when they refer to us I imagine they refer to us as Canada. Words of this kind become a fetish. We are afraid to drop them because they are like strings. When we grow up we drop our connection with the family. Surely that comes about naturally, and I believe the process has taken place naturally here. It is not forced. If I thought anyone was doing what we are doing for some ulterior purpose I would oppose it to the very limit, but I do not think that is the case, and I think there is no harm in it.

Mr. Brooks: You should read the editorials in certain newspapers.

Mr. MacInnis: Who are the editors anyway, and what do they know? They talk about different things and often do not know much about them.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to say a few words on this matter. The hon. member who has just taken his seat is agreeable to change the name "dominion". I noticed that during the speech he made he several times used the phrase "Dominion Elections Act" when he meant "Canada Elections Act".

Mr. MacInnis: No, no.

Mr. Cardiff: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacInnis: The change has not been made yet, and I was referring to the act as it is, not to the act as it is going to be, because the change may not be made.

Mr. Cardiff: When the hon. member reads his speech tomorrow he will find out that he used that phrase because it has become so familiar to him. I do not think there is any need whatever to change the name "Dominion". I am one of those who believe that Churchill is perhaps the greatest man this world has known. More than that, I think he is responsible for the fact that we have a Canada at all in this day and age.

Had it not been for Churchill's bluff for at least one year, Hitler would have taken Canada. There is no question about that. If you take the word "Dominion" away from Canada you weaken the name because you have taken half of it away. I am one of those who object strongly to the removal of the name "Dominion of Canada".

I believe there are many changes that could be made in the elections act. As a matter of fact, there are certain things for which a candidate can pay and things for which he cannot pay. We all know that these things are paid for, perhaps by someone else with the candidate's money or perhaps with someone else's money. It is not legal for the candidate to pay for these things, but the fact remains that somebody pays for them. I am one of those who believe in honesty. We now have an election act which states that the candidate cannot do this and cannot do that, but those things are done. The act could be changed so that we would have a better act, and we would at least have clearer consciences.

I only rose for these few minutes to put on the record my objection to the elimination of the word "dominion". I agree with those who have spoken before me, with the exception of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The fact that he used the name "dominion" two or three times in his speech proves that he has become so accustomed to using it that I believe even after the name is changed he will be using that name more than the other.

Mr. Hees: It is one o'clock, so may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Green: May I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) whether he can give us the order of business for the remainder of the day? Last night he only mentioned the first three bills, and we would like to know what the order is to be after those three are called.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like to know it myself. I believe we will be on the elections act for quite a while.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to agree completely with what the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said this morning concerning the desirability of extending the hours of voting by having the polls close at 7 o'clock in the evening instead of at 6 o'clock. From practical observation I believe that 50 per cent of the vote is cast in the last two hours. If the polls close at 6 o'clock, many people who live in urban centres, and who work at a considerable distance from their homes, simply cannot or do not get home in time to vote. If the closing time were extended to 7 p.m., the vote cast would be increased by at least 10 per cent.

We all believe that the successful functioning of a democracy depends upon a large number of people exercising their franchise. What the hon. member for Peel suggested this morning was a simple way of making it possible for considerably more people to cast their vote in an election than are able to do so now. This practice of voting until 7 p.m. has been successfully followed in several of the provinces, and I want to recommend to the government that they give serious consideration to extending this practice to our dominion elections.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. McLure: I have something to say about this bill. I should like to comment on the first section, which possibly contains the main reason we have this bill before us. It is proposed to change the title from the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, to the Canada Elections Act. I believe it is unfortunate that at the present time there seems to be so much dislike, you might almost say hatred, abroad in this government for the name "Dominion". It is hard for us to understand the reason why this feeling exists. It is unfortunate that now, when we should have the greatest unity in our country, there should be this policy against the name of "dominion" which causes bitter feelings between people who might otherwise live in harmony and unity. The move started some time ago when such words as "royal" seemed to have engendered a certain amount of hatred.

We are now dealing with a change in this elections act. There are other changes in the bill, but they will be dealt with later. I was pleased to have a clipping in which that great Prime Minister of England, Churchill, during the course of an introduction of Princess Elizabeth to her distinguished Guild audience, referred to our country as "that great dominion". Surely, a man of that calibre must not have been aware of the fact that we in this country have got ourselves into a frenzied state against the use of the name "dominion" or he would not have referred to the country as "that great dominion". Many articles have been written about this matter but I am not going to prolong the debate by reading a lot of them. Here is one from a newspaper that calls itself independent, though I would say it was more or less a Liberal newspaper. The article reads:

> The most high-handed act of grand larceny perpetrated in this country in the life of this generation was the sneak-thief style of filibustering perpetrated to deprive this great dominion of its complete name. Indignation is seething and the people may yet have something to say about it.

I think we should have something to say about it. I think the government should realize that they have gone far enough, and leave us with the name the Dominion Elections Act, 1938. If they want to change it to 1951, that is all right, but let us have unity amongst us. This is an old name and a glorious name. It stands for a glorious country, so why not keep it? The Dominion of Canada is good enough for me.

(Translation):

Mr. Courtemanche: I do not want to prolong the debate unduly but I do wish to congratulate the committee on having replaced the word "dominion" by the word "Canada."

I have the greatest respect for the empire but it is time to do away with those colonial links, which speak for our weakness and dependency. It is not as colonials but as Canadians that we have made almost superhuman sacrifices and efforts. It is time to understand, once and for all, that it is our duty to administer public affairs in the interests of Canada and not those of the empire.

(Text):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, Canada is a great country. Canada is now recognized internationally as a great power. The role we had during the war of 1914-18 and the major role we took during the last war have been recognized and appreciated throughout the western world. I am pleased to note that Canada has assumed this status, and is recognized as an independent member of the commonwealth which is one of the greatest associations of nations that our civilization has known. Unfortunately for me, since I am a Conservative, I have to congratulate the government upon its action in eliminating the word "dominion." I hope it is the last time I have to congratulate the government. I have been here for two years, and I think it is the first time I have had that opportunity. To come back to this word "dominion"—

An hon. Member: Move over to this side.

Mr. Balcer: Do not worry about that. In Webster's New International Dictionary under the definition of the word "dominion", I read these words:

> Dominion: That which is subject to sovereignty or control . . . territory governed, or over which authority is exercised.

In another dictionary, Funk and Wagnalls, I find this definition:

> Obedience, servitude, slavery, subjection, subjugation, submission.

I think that everyone in this chamber will admit those definitions do not apply to our great country. I know that every member of the committee is too much of a Canadian to admit that such definitions or such adjectives should be applied to our great country.

I am also proud of the fact that the Conservative party at the time of confederation was in favour of adopting the status of kingdom for this country. I want to mention this fact. According to Dr. Maurice Ollivier in his book "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty":

> Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Georges Etienne Cartier were of the opinion:
> 1. That the name of the federation be that of Kingdom of Canada.
> 2. That the federation should have the rank of a kingdom.
> 3. That the new arrangement should terminate the rule of Secretary of State for the colonies.
> 4. That the executive head should be the King himself or his representative.
> 5. That the authority of the Imperial Parliament should be only a fiction.

Another great Conservative in another country, another member of the commonwealth, namely the Marquis of Salisbury in Great Britain, when Prime Minister Attlee in 1947 brought into the House of Commons a bill to change the name of Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs to the name of Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, welcomed the change with the comment that the title of "Dominion's Office" has always been open to objection, and I quote:

> . . . in that it might be interpreted as implying that the governments of the commonwealth are dominions of Great Britain and to that extent of inferior status to her.

I have been here just long enough to appreciate the fact that all the members of this chamber are really proud of the commonwealth of nations as it is. I think the British commonwealth is an association of free countries which work hand in hand to promote the great principles of civilization, with not one single member inferior to the other and not a single one superior to the other.

I am pleased, Mr. Chairman, that the government and the committee have decided to change the name of this act to make it more in accordance with the spirit of the fathers of confederation and to make it in accordance with the British North America Act. In the British North America Act, in section 3 it is stated:

. . . the Provinces of Canada, of Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be One Dominion under the name of Canada.

In section 4 of the same act it is stated:

. . . unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, the Name Canada shall be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this act.

I have looked into the act and I have counted 156 references to the word "Canada" but never once have I come across the words "Dominion of Canada." By changing the name of the Dominion Elections Act to Canada Elections Act I think this country is showing something that is fairly well admitted all across this country, namely that we are now a free and independent member of an association of nations, that we are a great country and that we are respected throughout the world as a great, independent country. I am sure that this move will be welcomed, and I hope it will be welcomed as a move that was first brought by great Conservatives like Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Georges Etienne Cartier.

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word on this question. I wish to congratulate the two last speakers on the stand they have taken. If they are in accord with our general policy they should probably come across the floor of the chamber and stand with the Liberals, because that is the policy of the government as enunciated by the Prime Minister some time ago. After all, if four or five Tory supporters dissociated themselves from the Tory party—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege may I say that I think the minister is putting words into my mouth and attributing to me intentions that are absolutely not mine. I think that every member in this committee has the right to freedom of speech. If for once I happen to be of the same opinion as the government on one single detail, it does not mean that I do not belong to a party which is strong enough and powerful enough to win the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Balcer: I hope that the minister will not attribute to me any such intention.

Mr. Rinfret: I will change my words and I will say that this is indicative of the Tory platform of one policy in Quebec and another policy in the rest of Canada.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Mr. Brooks: The minister would make a great judge.

Mr. Rinfret: That is exactly what I am doing now. I am trying to judge your actions.

Mr. Brooks: You would be no better on the bench than you are here.

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) this morning referred to various questions of the flag and the anthem as being silly nonsense. I am of the opinion that anything that brings together Canadians of various nationalities and various origins is not silly nonsense at all but is something that we must aim at. The sooner we can agree on the things we have in common the better it will be for the whole of Canada. When words are used in this house describing as silly nonsense the things that are sacred to other parts of the country I think they do a great deal of harm to our country.

This morning the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to the word "dominion" as being necessary, particularly in the elections act, because of the fact that there has to be a differentiation between the federal government and the provincial governments.

Mr. Green: Elections.

Mr. Rinfret: He referred to the fact that in British Columbia in one week's interval there was a provincial election and a dominion election, and that there was some confusion about the title of the two acts. The differentiation or the distribution of power is governed by the British North America Act, and particularly by sections 91 and 92. Section 91 refers to the various things that the federal government can do, and section 92 refers to what the legislatures can do. It is very noticeable that in section 91 there is no reference to the word "dominion". Section 91 reads:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; . . . the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada . . .

Therefore on one side we have the powers of the government of Canada and on the other, under section 92, the powers of the legislatures of the provinces. If therefore we call our elections act "Canada Elections Act" we are following explicitly the wording of section 91.

This morning the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that 35 years ago he was very proud to have a uniform bearing on its shoulders one word and that he was always keeping his chest up because he was proud of that one word. Mr. Chairman, what was that word written on his shoulder in the first war and in the second war? It was not "Dominion of Canada", but the one word "Canada".

The hon. member for Queens referred to that one word as being a glorious one. I think it is a glorious one and should be borne by every Canadian on his shoulder, and he should put his chest out for that one word.

Mr. McLure: I was referring to the word "dominion". I am very glad that the minister has the same views on the word "dominion".

Mr. Rinfret: I am sorry that I cannot have the same views as to the word "dominion".

Mr. McLure: You said before you had.

Mr. Rinfret: The reason I rose was that reference was made this morning to the fact that the word "royal" had been taken out of royal mail. An editorial was cited this morning, referring to what happened in the dying days of the last session whereby the Postmaster General is supposed to have taken away from the title the word "royal". I tried to explain then and I will try to explain again that the words "royal mail" have never been in the Canada postal act. In 1867—

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order. Is a discussion on royal mail or the Post Office Act relevant to the matter now before the committee?

Mr. McLure: He was out of order long ago.

Mr. Rinfret: This morning reference was made to the same question, and I think I have a right to answer that reference.

Mr. Knowles: Two wrongs do not make a right.

The Chairman: Reference was made to it this morning, and I ask the minister to reply briefly.

Mr. Casselman: Easily led.

Mr. Rinfret: I will just say, Mr. Chairman, that never at any time in any postal act was there the word "royal". In 1867, in 1927 and again in 1951 the word "royal" never appeared in any postal act. The words "royal mail" refer to the mail of Great Britain. A prime minister of Great Britain referred to royal mail as distinct from Canada mail, Australia mail, New Zealand mail, and I hope this is the last we hear about it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Arsenault: I rise just for a few minutes to congratulate my friends the hon. member for Labelle and the hon. member for Three Rivers on their courageous stand in this house, and to say a few words to my ex-Conservative friends in this house—perhaps three things. Firstly, I think—

Mr. Knowles: You are the ex-Conservative.

Mr. Arsenault: An ex-Conservative became a good Liberal. Firstly, Canada, in the British North America Act, was never mentioned by the name "Dominion of Canada". The name was "one dominion under the name of Canada". That fact was established by many in this house, by the Prime Minister, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others, that Canada is one dominion under the name "Canada." I wish we could put that into the minds of hon. members once and for all.

Secondly, Canada as a dominion ceased to be a dominion the day in 1931 that the Statute of Westminster provided that all the nations of the commonwealth are:

> Autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Therefore, if Canada is a dominion, then the United Kingdom is a dominion and the United States is a dominion. On the one hand, previous to the Statute of Westminster —I wish my hon. friends of the Conservative party would take a few notes at this time— previous to the Statute of Westminster, no legislature in Canada could pass any law repugnant to the law of the United Kingdom. Under the statute, no law enacted in the future by Canada or any of its provinces shall be void on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of the United Kingdom.

On the other hand, the legislature of the United Kingdom cannot, under the Statute of Westminster, pass any act extending to Canada as part of the Canadian law unless it is expressly declared in the act that the Canadian parliament has requested and consented to the enactment.

Another provision of the Statute of Westminster states that neither Canada, nor any province thereof, shall in future be described as a colony or something that means colony in any act of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

When the expression "Dominion of Canada" is used abroad in the United Kingdom what does it mean? It means to indicate the idea of subordination of these dominions to the United Kingdom. That is what it means, although it might be that the expression is used carelessly and merely because it has been common to use it since those days when it was proper; that is, when the word "dominion" is used in our own country it indicates the acceptance of constitutional subordination, unless the excuse is careless speech. The word "dominion" as applied to Canada, or in any act of the Canadian parliament, has now lost its original meaning in practice—I say this with all respect to my colleagues of the Conservative party—as the supremacy of the United Kingdom is now denied in Canadian affairs, both domestic and external, since Canada has now become a sovereign state and enjoys full international status on the basis of an equal nation within the commonwealth under the provisions of the Statute of Westminster dated December 1931.

The use of the word "dominion" as applied to Canada gives a false impression as to the present constitutional position of our country, as it denies recognition of the autonomous status of Canada and implies the idea of subordination to another country. It is further misleading as it suggests to the popular mind in our country and to the populations of other countries of the world that Canada has a status which is less than sovereign. Therefore, the word "dominion" should be eliminated from our vocabulary.

I should like to quote briefly from Time magazine of May 10, 1948, in order to prove the statement I have just made. It will be remembered that I introduced a bill to strike out the word "dominion" from all acts and regulations, and this is what this publication had to say:

> C.C.F.'ers and many a Liberal cheered. From the Tories came a chorus of "No! No!" Arsenault's private bill had little chance of passage. Snapped the Ottawa Journal: ". . . A very silly notion. Words or the lack of them do not make our independence." But many loyal pro-empire Canadians agreed with Arsenault's purpose, if not his motive: they were tired of explaining to Americans that "dominion" does not imply "domination."

Mr. Fulton: I would not re-enter this debate had it not been for some of the things which have been said, deliberately or otherwise, and I hope otherwise, to misrepresent the attitude of those who attach importance to the retention of the word "dominion". I think it is important to set forth clearly our attitude in this regard. I would without hesitation enter a plea, particularly to hon. members opposite and to those who report in the press what we say here, to understand and report accurately and exactly what we say and mean and what we have at the back of our minds in respect to this controversy.

I want to take up immediately what the hon. member for Bonaventure has just said as to the implication of the word "dominion". I would be very surprised if he does not know that it is a fact that the word "dominion", in the minds of those of us who say that it is important to keep it, has no connotation whatsoever of subordination or subjection to another country. I think the hon. member knows that as a fact. If he does not know it, I tell him now that it is a fact.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

I want to read to the hon. member and to the committee some of the definitions to be found of the word "dominion". I think it is a pity that my good friend, the hon. member for Three Rivers, did not look at some of these other definitions when he was referring to one particular definition. I looked up the word in several dictionaries in the library. Funk and Wagnalls New Standard Dictionary of the English language gives a number of definitions. This is a United States dictionary and therefore we can expect the definitions to be impartial. In the 1949 edition they give these definitions of the word "dominion":

> 1. Sovereign or supreme authority; the power of ruling or governing; domination.

Mr. Arsenault: Being governed.

Mr. Fulton: Well, we have a government in Canada. Does the hon. member for Bonaventure say that we have no government in Canada? I could expect him to be ashamed of the government we have but I would not have expected him to admit it.

Mr. Arsenault: It is not a colonial government.

Mr. Fulton: Of course it is not a colonial government and we know that fact just as well as the hon. member. If the hon. member will just listen and try to rid his mind of the prejudices which are obviously there and which he is trying to implant in other minds he will perhaps appreciate even though he does not agree with what we have in mind and what we are trying to get at.

Mr. Arsenault: Give us the French translation of the word "dominion".

Mr. Fulton: The second and third definitions given are as follows:

> 2. Law; the right of absolute possession and use.
> 3. A country under a particular government.

And it gives as an example:

> The Dominion of Canada since the union in July, 1867; the dominion of New Zealand since September 26, 1907.

Then the dictionary goes on to give a number of synonyms, and among other words mentions: "sovereignty", and "supremacy". Then it gives the antonyms or opposites, and I ask the hon. member to note these particularly. The opposites given are: "servitude", "subjection", "subjugation" and "submission".

Can anyone say in the light of those definitions that the word means anything but sovereignty and supremacy? That is what it means. Is that not then a suitable name for our country? Funk and Wagnalls' dictionary then goes on to make reference to Dominion day, July 1, as being:

the anniversary of the formation of the Dominion of Canada: a Canadian holiday.

Then we find that this word was the subject of careful consideration at the imperial conference of 1926. That conference defined "the dominions" as—

Mr. Arsenault: We were a dominion then.

Mr. Fulton: I ask the hon. member to listen to this to see if he can find anything objectionable in this as a description of the position of Canada:

"The dominions" were defined as autonomous countries within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or foreign affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown; and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Can hon. members opposite find anything objectionable in that description?

Mr. Arsenault: Is the United Kingdom a dominion?

Mr. Fulton: Certainly, the United Kingdom is a dominion of His Majesty. That can be proved conclusively—if we discuss this thing impartially and intelligently instead of with prejudice—it can be proved by simple reference, among other things, to the form of the third prayer used daily in the House of Commons of Canada, which opens:

Most Gracious God, we humbly beseech Thee, as for Great Britain, Ireland, and His Majesty's other dominions, so especially for Canada—

The French version reads:

Dieu plein de grâces, nous vous implorons humblement en faveur de la Grande-Bretagne, de l'Irlande et des autres possessions de Sa Majesté.

It seems to me that it is demonstrated conclusively that in both languages, in the prayers we use daily in the House of Commons, the simple meaning of the word "dominion" is, a dominion of His Majesty. We refer to "Great Britain and His Majesty's other dominions", showing that we clearly understand the United Kingdom to be, in that regard, in the same position as Canada, a dominion of His Majesty.

It is in that sense that the use of the word "dominion" becomes dear to us, and full of meaning. Because we see in it not in any sense a connotation of being subject or inferior to the United Kingdom, but simply a recognition of the fact that Canada, together with the other self-governing nations of the commonwealth, is a dominion of His Majesty, and therefore we see it as a symbol of the common allegiance we all owe to the crown.

I cannot for the life of me see how even my good friends opposite, who have carried on this sort of discussion in the past with heat and prejudice, could find anything objectionable in that use and interpretation of the word "dominion", which is borne out by the authorities, by the prayers we use in the House of Commons, by a dictionary definition in an American dictionary—and by the facts.

In so far as this particular bill is concerned, we can see the matter in its true light when we compare the old title in the French version of the bill with that in the English version. We say that there is no need to eliminate the word "dominion", because it does not in any sense mean inferiority or subjection to another country. As used so frequently in titles of bills, it serves no other purpose than a connotation first of continuing allegiance to the crown which unites us, and second as a convenient method of distinguishing dominion, or federal, from provincial matters. In this instance we can see clearly that it has no other implications; and I cannot see why my hon. friends opposite should insist that it is desirable to eliminate the word "dominion" from the English version, because if hon. members will look at the French version—the version in the other official language of the house—they will see that section 1, which we are now discussing, and which gives the present title of the act, reads as follows:

L'article premier de la loi des élections fédérales,...

That is the French name of the bill.

Loi des élections fédérales

So that in this case the English word is translated by the word "fédérales"? Do my hon. friends find anything obnoxious in the word "fédérales"? Is not Canada a confederation? Why do my hon. friends insist so vehemently that the word "Dominion" should be eliminated from the act? In their own version it has nothing more than the connotation of federal as opposed to provincial. Why do they not accept our assurance that, to us, it means nothing more than first, a recognition of that allegiance to the crown which unites us, and which we all owe, and that when used in this connotation or in this type of legislation it has, in addition to that, only the meaning and connotation of "federal" as distinguished from "provincial"? It has no other meaning.

I have sent for some authorities in the library, but they have not arrived yet. Therefore I shall have to speak subject to correction. But I believe if one looks at the letters of Queen Victoria—

An hon. Member: Here they come.

Mr. Hodgson: If you read them you would know more about them.

Mr. Knowles: Merry Christmas.

Mr. Fulton: I will not take up the time of the committee now to locate the exact reference because, as I have said, I have not had the time to check these authorities. Therefore I am speaking subject to correction, but I believe that if you consult "The Letters of Queen Victoria", second series, volume I, at or about page 394, you will find reference to a statement by Lord Carnarvon, that at the time the delegates from Canada were visiting the United Kingdom in connection with the formation of confederation they made it clear that the desire for the use of the word "dominion" was the unanimous expression of the desire of all the delegates from British North America. And their reason for desiring it was that they gave the same meaning to the word as we do, and as it is given in the form of the words used in the prayers of the House of Commons.

I would also like my hon. friends—and I say this without any heat, because I think we should review the matter impartially and dispassionately—I would ask my hon. friends, including the Prime Minister who, when he last spoke on the subject, sought to create the impression that those who want to keep the word "dominion" are in some sense desirous of going back to colonial implications and a colonial status—I ask my hon. friends who create that false impression, and who say that that connotation is attached to the word "dominion", just to be logical about this matter. I ask them to realize that it would be as logical for them to complain of the use of the word "Canada" as having colonial implications as it is for them to complain of the use of the word "dominion" as having colonial implications.

That implication and complaint I reject absolutely, in both cases. But I do point out that, if we are to consider this matter impartially and fairly, it must be kept in mind that "Canada" was the name of two of the provinces of this country when they actually were colonies, and were not self-governing, and that the word "dominion" did not come into use in connection with this country, as part of our name, until we had graduated from that colonial status, through the British North America Act of 1867, into the status of a self-governing nation, which was then called "the Dominion of Canada."

So if we are going to be logical about this matter we would have to admit that there is more reason, in logic, to attach a colonial implication to the word "Canada" than there is to attach a colonial implication to the word "dominion". But there is no reason, in fact, sentiment or logic, to attach a colonial implication to either word.

Therefore I say that the two words should be carried forward together as descriptive of our status, of the grandeur of our land, of our affection for His Majesty and as expressing our loyalty to the crown which unites us, and will in the future as it has in the past, as one "Dominion of Canada."

Mr. Arsenault: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kamloops has shown us—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Greenwood has the floor.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a word. I am not going to deal further with the definition of the word "dominion" which I think has been dealt with adequately already. But I do wish to deal briefly with one point. I do wish to make this point clear, that there is not a single person in this party that anyone in this house can honestly suggest has one iota of the feeling of subservience to any country outside our own—not a shred of it.

My purpose is to show that, so far as our party is concerned, the whole history of the party makes it clear beyond peradventure, not to be guessed at, but to be taken by the action of those who are leaders of the party.

The hon. member for Three Rivers has already spoken of 1867, and the leaders of those days, Macdonald and Cartier. I come to the next great step, the greatest step in the establishment of our independence and our position as a sovereign state which I think any fair-minded man will agree took place in 1918 and 1919 when Sir Robert Borden—and it was not an easy task—insisted that we sign the treaty of Versailles in our own right.

I admit that until then there was a good deal of the feeling of colonialism toward us in Great Britain—and for all I know there may have been some here. But the first step was when Sir Robert Borden was placed in a position where he was able to say, "We sign this treaty on our own, as a sovereign state". That is what was done. No one can suggest that any other attitude has ever existed so far as this party is concerned. Let us take the next step. The next important step, and certainly very important, was when Mr. Meighen was prime minister and went to London where he resisted the attitude of the British government in the imperial conference of 1921. He was responsible for something that no doubt was of great importance. He was responsible for the non-renewal of the Anglo-Japanese agreement. Does that sound like subservience to the United Kingdom? Nothing of the sort. He took his position as the representative of a sovereign state.

It may be said—and I will come to it—that there were still some technical legalities which had to be cleared up and they were cleared up later. I will come to that in a minute. Borden and Meighen took that stand, and later on there was the Statute of Westminster. I do not take one iota of credit from the people who carried that through, Mr. King and the others; of course not. But that was in the main a tidying-up operation, a continuation of what had already been done. We need not dispute about that. Let us agree that both took part in it. I am not anxious to derogate from what Mr. King did.

Let me give you one other thing. How did our party win the election of 1930? It was on the cry, "Canada first". Some people may have forgotten that. I suppose it had been thought before that that perhaps Mr. Bennett was something of an imperialist and that he was going to defer to the United Kingdom and put us in a subordinate position. Does anyone suggest that Mr. Bennett put us in a subordinate position in 1932? Hon. members will recall perfectly well what happened then. If there was any subordination it was not on the part of Canada. It was the other people who were here. Those are the points I want to make, and whatever else is said I hope that as decent honest men trying to help this nation we will not misrepresent each other's feelings, and that merely because there are different definitions of the word "dominion" in the dictionaries no one will suggest that anyone on this side of the house has one trace in his makeup of a desire that this country should be anything other than what it is, an autonomous nation. As a matter of fact, as has been well pointed out, autonomy was won by French-Canadian, English-Canadian and other Canadian soldiers on the battlefields in the main, and I hope that nothing will be done here to disturb the unity that was their creation.

Mr. Hosking: I had no intention of taking part in this debate but I think it is time that I expressed the feelings of some of the people of my riding and also my own feelings as their member. I can say without hesitation that nearly all the people in my riding have the same feeling with respect to the definition of the word "dominion" as was expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Greenwood. I do not think there are many in my riding who do not revere, love and cherish the name "Dominion of Canada". But I can also say that there are not many of them who do not think it more important to maintain good internal relations between citizens of the Dominion of Canada than they do of the one word "dominion". If we can bring a little closer together the peoples of two great nations living in this country, the French and the English, by giving up the word "dominion", then that should be done. It is on that premise that I propose to support the clause. This is true Liberal policy.

Mr. Sinnott: There has been a little heat added to the argument by the hon. member for Greenwood. I see him walking out and I advise him that he had better stay. I should like to say a few words on Bill No. 41.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Get going.

Mr. Sinnott: I was pleased to see the member for Peel put forward suggestions as to changes in the bill, but what I want to bring to the attention of the committee is my own experience with certain suggestions made by the hon. member for Peel. I was also glad to see the terrific unanimity in the Conservative party with respect to the question of doing away with the word "dominion". The hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Three Rivers are deskmates, and yet they have expressed opposite views. I wonder if that is true of all the Conservatives.

Mr. Green: You voted with us last night.

Mr. Sinnott: That was on an altogether different matter.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Three-way John.

Mr. Sinnott: We have the hon. member for Three Rivers expressing one opinion and I am wondering if that is the view of his leader. Before this debate is concluded I hope his leader will express his views so that we may know whether they are the same throughout the whole dominion or whether there is one suggestion for the province of Quebec and another for the rest of Canada.

Mr. Hodgson: You are the next leader of the Liberal party.

Mr. Sinnott: I think there has been altogether too much emphasis put on the word "dominion". When people sing "O Canada", the words "Dominion of Canada" are not in the song. It is "O Canada".

An hon. Member: Oh dominion.

Mr. Sinnott: So far as amending the Dominion Elections Act is concerned, which will be called the Dominion Elections Act from now on—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: The Canada Elections Act—what we are interested in is to get as many people—

An hon. Member: They could not get "dominion" out of it if they tried.

Mr. Sinnott: —out to vote as possible. In the municipality I represent I have had a little experience in the last thirty years, and the old bylaw provides that voting shall take place from eight o'clock in the morning until five at night. Last year we changed it so that voting now takes place from eight o'clock in the morning until seven o'clock at night with the result that at the last election many more voters turned out at the polls.

Mr. Hodgson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: I have an amendment prepared by way of a suggestion to the minister for the purpose of changing the act, but since the next dominion election is many years away I will only make a suggestion to him. I suggest that—

An hon. Member: He cannot read it.

Mr. Sinnott: —we change the act—

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): And the bylaw.

Mr. Sinnott: I suggest that the bill be amended at some future time so far as paragraph (a) of subsection 5 of section 31 is concerned.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Of the Dominion Elections Act.

The Chairman: We are on clause 1.

Mr. Sinnott: This is only a suggestion. With respect to subsection 5, I suggest that the polls shall be opened at the hour of eight o'clock in the forenoon and kept open until seven o'clock in the afternoon of the same day. I realize that the returning officers will have to sit there an hour longer and it will involve more expense, but at the same time I think there are many voters in the country who do not have the opportunity to vote. I am sure that if the time were extended one more hour many voters would have the opportunity of casting their ballot. I believe I am being conservative in my estimate when I say that half a million more votes would be cast.

Mr. Ferguson: Here we find the members of the House of Commons discussing the elimination of this word "Dominion", and some of them seem desirous that it be eliminated from the background of Canadian history. All this is occurring at a time when there is a war in Korea, and when we may shortly be engaged in a life and death battle. It strikes me that there are a few members in the house who seem to feel that they must take from Canadians something that is very dear to them because some person might think we are inferior. Some Canadians cherish their historical background, and it makes for better Canadians. I am sick and tired of hearing people referred to as English or French Canadians. I hear hon. members of the house ask questions concerning how many French Canadians are fighting here, or how many French Canadians are in the civil service. We should stop that and refer to Canadians as Canadians.

I speak from a background of ancestors who have lived in this country for 150 years. The only people I know in the British isles, Germany, France or India are the people I have met as a young man going about in this country. I am a Canadian. There were French people from that marvellous province of Quebec who proved that they were Canadians by fighting side by side with me. Their forefathers fought on the St. Lawrence river with my greatgrandfather. They were Canadians. The fathers of confederation fought back and forth verbally and established the great Dominion of Canada. These history-making men, these nation-making men, these far-sighted men decided to give this country a name which would serve to let the generations to come know that colonial Canada had been welded into an everlasting nation. They gave it the name of the Dominion of Canada. Some people would like to set aside the historical facts concerning how this Canada of ours was made a nation and created the Dominion of Canada. There seems to be a concerted attack on all the historical connections between this country and France as well as those between this country and Great Britain. Why? Will any man in this house stand on his feet and say that we have ever suffered because of any connections with Great Britain or the people of France? We grow strong by trials and tribulations. No matter what our forefathers may have done, I am sure that they did those things because they believed they were right. Out of their efforts, and through their trials, this nation known as Canada has been created. It is the envy of the world today because of the calibre of the people who are really Canadians.

What a man who has been elected to the House of Commons sees in trying to break down the historical foundations of Canada, which he knows a great number of people love, I do not understand. Perhaps people believe they can be elected by crying about something that is meaningless. Take away the word "dominion" because these people believe it is historically necessary, take away the little things they cherish, and what will we have? There are some people in this country who would like to say the King of England is not the King of Canada. I go on record as saying he is the King of Canada. If we lose that connection with empire, we have lost what Germany is seeking today, a figurehead that everyone can respect; something for which France would be a better nation. Spain would be a greater nation if she had a common tie such as the one which binds the people of this country, and binds the people of the empire together. The people of the United States know that they would be a better nation if all the people could come together under a common symbol as we do.

I was in the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, when King George V was dying. Many of the people of that city came to me with their expressions of sympathy, and you would have thought that he was their king. There were announcements of sympathy on the radio, and the newspapers had a black border of mourning. In the great Wanamaker's department store every window on the main street displayed the sympathy of the people for the people of England, as a demonstration of the reverence in which the people of the United States held our king. The great trouble with France today, with its many parties in power, is that the people have nothing to bind them together. It will be a sorry day for Canada when we cannot live in unity with the other great nations of this empire. When our dearly beloved Princess visited this country, surely hon. members must have listened to the radio and heard the cheers that accompanied her along her route. These cheers accompanied our beloved Princess from coast to coast.

I plead with the government to give up their persistence or we shall have party politics. One half of the country will cheer one man and the other half will cheer another. There will be no binding power. I say, stop in your tracks, stop in your efforts, or you are headed for that. I say this as a Canadian. I am sick and tired of politicians trying to destroy something the other man loves, be its origin British, French, German or any other. If a Canadian likes it, if he feels he needs it and it is not going to hurt us materially, let us be big enough not to take away what he believes is dear to him and what we believe is dear to us. Stop this racial prejudice that exists in Canada amongst Canadians. Stop this trying to incite your constituents to point their finger from one end of Canada to the other or halfway across. Stop these references to French Canadians and English Canadians. Refer to Canadians. Bear in mind the thought that you should do everything in your power, irrespective of your origin, to maintain the great binding power of the English crown.

On section 4—Withdrawal of writ.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a question to ask the minister. If this is not the right place to ask it, will he tell me where it should come? Reverting to a remark which was made this morning about compulsory voting, I want to ask him whether he knows how the device used in Australia has worked out. There I believe a fine was imposed for non-voting. Does the minister know whether that device was effective or whether there is any other device which has been effective, short of the Russian device?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I could not give specific details. I could inquire from the chief electoral officer who, I know, has all of the information in this matter, and I could give it to my hon. friend later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mention was made just now by my hon. friend of the question of compulsory voting. There was also some mention of it earlier today. I do not think that the experience in other countries has been to the effect that compulsory voting has worked out well. Indeed if at this time a citizen has to be forced to exercise the basic right upon which freedom is based, there is something wrong with his conception of citizenship.

I thought I should like to point out one thing. On one occasion during the course of a meeting in my constituency, a question was raised with regard to compulsory voting. Among those present was an elderly gentleman who made his contribution. He said that over the years he had given consideration to means of assuring the preservation of democracy which, as he pointed out, could only be preserved through the general and intelligent use of the franchise. This gentleman said that he had read that in Australia and in New Zealand—particularly in Australia—the compulsory vote was used and that it had not worked out well, even though it had assured that some 91 per cent or 92 per cent of the people cast their votes. He said that he had given consideration to an alternative—and I pass it on to you, Mr. Chairman—which would do away with the necessity of compulsory voting but would assure that people would indeed exercise their franchise. This old homesteader's plan was that no one should have the right to go on the voters' list unless he registered and, at the same time, paid a fee of $2. At the time he came to vote, a part of the ballot would consist of a counterfoil which would entitle the person who had voted to the return of the $2. He said he believed that if his system were adopted there would be an almost 100 per cent vote in every election. I had never heard the suggestion before, Mr. Chairman, but it has merit.

Sections 5 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On section 35—Ordinary residence of member of Canadian forces.

Mr. Churchill: I want some information with regard to section 35. There are three questions I should like to ask in order to get some explanation. Section 35 of the bill has to do with section 23 of the act, which mentions three different places of ordinary residence for a member of the regular forces. Then at line 27 it suggests a fourth method by which a man may designate his place of ordinary residence. Will the minister explain the meaning of that fourth method that is indicated here, commencing at line 27? It is not clear.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That method was introduced for the purpose of taking care of those persons—particularly those serving in the navy—who apparently got posted about a good deal more than most; and it is only, as the hon. member has pointed out, the final clause which would take care of any other case which was not included in the three options open to the serviceman in (a), (b) and (c).

Mr. Churchill: No matter where a man be serving, surely he would be covered by (a), (b) or (c). It has not been clear to some of us, in discussing this matter, just why any further distinction would need to be made. The man has a next of kin or a dependent in (a); he could choose his permanent camp—I suppose that is what (b) stands for—if he is in the regular force; and he surely must have been living somewhere before enlistment. Why then the choice, as it must mean, of just any place that he may elect?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): In the regular forces there are a great many who have been in the forces for a great many years, and the original residences whence they enlisted have no reality because these people may have been stationed, for example, in Ottawa for some years. The purpose of this provision is that they may elect what would be a residence other than the residence of some years before.

Mr. Churchill: My second question is this. In line 9 I note the words "every member of the regular forces". Then in line 26 I find the word "enrolment", and I find it again in line 38 and in line 43. Would it not be clearer to say in line 9; "every attested member of the regular forces"? And where the word "enrolment" is used elsewhere, would it not be better to say "prior to attestation"? A man might become enrolled in the service and not be sworn in and attested for some time. Normally, of course, it would occur within a few days, but there are occasions when a man is enrolled and is on ration strength and so on, but where his attestation or his swearing in would not necessarily occur until all the other forms have been complied with in the way of personnel selection, officer's investigation and his medical testing. I just ask the minister for his comment.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The committee gave some consideration to that and concluded that there would be no difference made to the person concerned by leaving it in this form. You will see that the section we are dealing with does in fact apply to the regular army rather than those who attest for a limited period.

Mr. Churchill: My third question has to do with subsection 4, which is not very clear. It reads:

> Except when he or she is also a member of the active service forces of the Canadian forces, a member of the regular forces, may,—

And so forth. Is or is not a member of the regular forces a member of the active service forces of the Canadian forces? What is the distinction?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The distinction is that there are some who were members of the regular forces in the first instance, and they are now members of the active service forces as well. The purpose of this is that of a clean-up clause to cover all the other regulations, part of which is here; but part is not, because they are not complete. They are not all being changed, and this will take care of the very rare exception.

Mr. Churchill: Just one minor question. Does this mean then that a person who is in this excepted clause may change his place of ordinary residence at any time other than the month of December?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No; the one who is in the excepted class cannot change it in December; it is just those who are in the regular army who may change it annually.

Section agreed to.

Section 36 agreed to.

On section 37—List of names, etc., of Canadian forces electors.

Mr. Churchill: Just one question; commencing at line 35 it says that these lists of service people eligible to cast a vote shall be open to inspection by any officially nominated candidate or his accredited representative. An officially nominated candidate would not have access to these lists until nomination day, and that is just a short period prior to the actual election day. Is there any particular reason for placing that limitation on it? With regard to other electors, you have a chance to see their names certainly prior to nomination day. Why should it not be the same with regard to these service electors?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No one would be entitled to that information at all except as may be granted by the regulations. According to the section the regulations do not grant that privilege to any person other than the candidate officially nominated and his representative. I realize that the time factor may look rather short. In fact, it is not, because the voters' list is not made up until a matter of a few days before the actual nomination. In the camps and in the areas there will be ample time, having in mind the relatively small number of persons who will be voting, for the officially nominated candidate or his representative to get all the information he needs for the purpose of canvassing public opinion.

Mr. Adamson: I assume then that the various parties could name agents to look after the interests of all their candidates in the area.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Oh, yes.

Mr. Adamson: It would not require individual affidavits from the individual candidates to have access to this information?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is a matter of choice. The candidate may do it on his own, or he may go through the party organization.

Sections 38 to 48 inclusive agreed to.

On section 49—Disposition of outer envelope when declaration incomplete.

Mr. Adamson: One question. I have had some complaints as to the security and the secrecy of the ballot cast by active service electors, in that their names appear on the envelope in which the ballot is contained. Doubt has been expressed to me by several servicemen who voted in the last election as to the secrecy of the way in which they marked their ballots. I assume that this regulation covers that and merely adds to the secrecy. Will the minister explain?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is quite right. The committee considered this and made every effort to improve the secrecy. In fact there is no violation of secrecy but, nevertheless, because the name of the service voter is put on the outer envelope, the service voter himself might get the impression there was not complete secrecy. In fact there is.

Mr. Adamson: He did get that.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes. In committee it was suggested by your humble servant that we might communicate with the Minister of National Defence to prepare one of these very informative little brochures that he gets out, telling the service voter what happens to his ballot and the outer envelope after he hands it in for mailing and showing that there will be complete secrecy.

Sections 50 to 57 inclusive agreed to.

On section 58—French version amended.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I gave an undertaking that we would not proceed with section 58, and with the permission of the committee I would ask that it be not carried.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Mr. Balcer: I think it would be a very bad move if we did that. While I am on my feet I should like to pay a special tribute to the staff of this House of Commons that looks after the translating of our speeches in Hansard. They have recently been discussed in this house. I think this house should pay a special tribute to those translators who are doing a wonderful job and who are translating into beautiful French the speeches of the members. I know for a fact that hon. members are sometimes not as clear as the Hansard translators make them. I think also that section 58 has been improved not only from the point of view of making it good French but also from the point of view of being understood by the public. I know for a fact that in the rural municipalities of Quebec in the municipal elections we call the returning officer le président d'élection.

(Translation):

In the rural municipalities of the province of Quebec, the "officier rapporteur" is the "président d'élection" whereas the "sous-officier rapporteur" is the "secrétaire d'élection". Everybody understands and the use of these expressions prevents nobody from voting.

(Text):

That is why I should like to insist that this particular amendment contained in section 58 be carried. I think it would improve the act, and would also make for a better understanding of the elections act by all our electors.

Mr. Cannon: I wish first of all to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Three Rivers as to the excellent work being done by the translators of this house. They are doing very good work, and I certainly congratulate them upon it. But that is not what we have before us. We have an amendment suggested to the Dominion Elections Act, which will now be known as the Canada Elections Act. The purpose of the amendment, as we see on the page opposite, is to improve the French version. I was on the committee, as was the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, and we represented to the committee that it was not an improvement because it was not a correct translation of the English.

The words "returning officer" have been translated as "officier rapporteur" for a hundred years, and they are recognized by everyone. If the section offered an improvement, I would be for it. I would favour it, if there was suggested a better translation of the words "returning officer" than is found in the French words "officier rapporteur". But that is not what is suggested. The suggestion is made that the words "returning officer" be translated as "directeur du scrutin", which means "director of voting". I say a director of voting and a returning officer are not one and the same thing. I shall not elaborate upon it, but if we use the expression "directeur du scrutin" we should also change the English by using the words "director of voting". I submit that so long as the English text contains the words "returning officer" it is not an improvement to change "officier rapporteur" to "directeur du scrutin".

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I have just one further word. I join with the hon. member for Three Rivers and the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine in expressing appreciation of the translation of the French text of this bill. At the same time I take this opportunity to express regret concerning some observations which have been made with respect to the translators in the house.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I must point out that there seems to be a division of opinion among those best qualified to pass judgment on this question. And, so there will be no delay caused by something which can be dealt with at another time, I suggest that when Mr. Chairman puts the questions as to whether section 58 be carried the house join with me in rejecting the section, because we feel that at the moment it is not necessary to proceed with this section.

Mr. Adamson: Do you propose to drop it altogether?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the remarks which have been made about the excellent work done by the translators in connection with their translations of Hansard and other documents that come before us, I wish to re-echo the sentiments of the minister and to express regret that those particular faithful servants have been subjected to some of the criticism voiced recently in the house.

Then, as to section 58, I wonder how many times this session something like this is going to happen. A few days ago an amendment to the address in reply was passed by a vote on the government side. Now we have an instance where a section in a bill moved by the government is to be deleted by action of the government, although the official opposition wants to support it. Apparently this section will be defeated by hon. members on the government side.

Section 58 negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 53.

The Chairman: I declare section 58 lost.

On the title.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, at this point I should like to correct a reference I made earlier. I rise to a question of privilege in this connection. When I spoke earlier I pointed out that what I was saying was subject to correction when I received the information from the library. I have before me now the letters of Queen Victoria, second series, volume I, and the reference I wished to make is found at age 394. I would commend this to anyone who wishes to know more about it.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, without entering into the controversy which developed in the discussion which took place before, may I say that I have before me now the authority for which I was looking earlier, and I should like to read it into the record for the information of hon. members. It is a letter reporting to the Queen's secretary on discussions with the Canadian delegates regarding confederation. A moment ago I indicated the exact reference at page 394, where it is found under the heading, "The Earl of Carnarvon to General Grey":

Dear General Grey,—The North American delegates are anxious that the United Provinces should be designated as the "Dominion of Canada."

I should point out that this is dated at the colonial office, February 7, 1867, and I should add that the words "Dominion of Canada" are in quotation marks, with the word "dominion" italicized. It continues:

It is a new title; but intended on their part as a tribute to the monarchical principle which they earnestly desire to uphold. I see no objection to the proposal. It will give greater dignity to the commencement of this great scheme and consequently greater self-respect to those who take part in the administration of affairs there. I have spoken to Lord Derby on the subject. But it remains to ascertain whether, assuming the Queen to approve of the name of Canada, Her Majesty also approves of this proposed designation of the territory. May I ask you to take the Queen's pleasure upon this point and to let me know?

The point which emerges clearly, which we have been discussing, for which we have been contending, and which I repeat, is that in the use of the word "dominion" there is not the slightest connotation of subjection or subordination. It is now and always has been to us, and was intended at the inception of our nation, by those who first proposed the use of the term, as a tribute to the monarchical principle which they earnestly desired to uphold. And for the same reason and in the same spirit, in an earnest desire to uphold the monarchical principle in Canada, as loyal and affectionate subjects of His Majesty, we desire to retain that word "dominion".

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL GALLERY

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES—EXPENDITURES—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 42, respecting the National Gallery of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are one or two short references I should like to make to what the Massey report has to say on the national gallery. As I said the other day, in the midst of wars, rumours of wars and the other distractions we have to face, it is hard to see that justice is done to other departments of life. Nevertheless I feel that we must try to escape that danger. I am sure we will all agree that a national art gallery is one of the things which should be regarded as a public responsibility. The Massey report has this to say on page 77:

The national art gallery has been in temporary quarters for seventy years. It was founded in 1880 by the Marquess of Lorne, who selected the pictures which were then lodged with the Department of Public Works.

And later on.

The gallery's collection of Canadian art is the most complete in existence, and the European collections, although not fully representative, are regarded as important by well-informed authorities in Canada and from abroad.

And then I quote from page 79 as follows:

The national gallery states that it can only with difficulty carry on even its present services unless certain immediate needs are met.

I direct those words to the attention of hon. members. The report continues:

First of all, it asks that its present anomalous position in relation to the Department of Public Works be clarified and that it be established as a separate branch of government under a board of trustees, with a status similar to that of the public archives.

I should like the minister to state whether he thinks the bill gives full effect to that. Then later on page 79:

The second pressing need, according to the brief, is a new building.

Without taking up more time of the committee I wanted to put those brief facts before hon. members, so that in looking over the bill they will have this very fragmentary picture of the recommendations made by the Massey commission.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Also without going into detail as to the recommendations made by the commission, may I say that this bill is a direct result of the report of that commission. It would not be fair to say that the national gallery will have a more active role now than it has had; because my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, has been as interested in it as any minister could be. Nevertheless it is felt that after thirty-eight years the gallery should have its corporate existence put on a more exact basis and that it should become part of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration so that ideas of art may be given prominence in the life of our country. This is not to suggest that any and all of the recommendations of the commission with regard to the gallery will be carried out. It is merely to say that as a matter of convenience and perhaps to give more weight to the future of the gallery it has been placed under the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. The director will remain in the same relationship and will have the same access to the minister. I hope that what is to be done will meet with the approval of the committee.

Mr. Adamson: It seems to me there is a slight danger of conflict in where the work of the national gallery ends and the work of the national museum begins. The national museum is under the direction of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, whereas the national gallery is to be under the direction of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Most of the great museums in the world, such as those in Paris, Madrid and the great Metropolitan museum in New York, are also art galleries. They are more than mere picture galleries, because sculpture should play a great part in any artistic collection. In order to avoid this possible conflict I would hope that the jurisdiction of the museum and the gallery might be placed under one minister. There is one further comment I should like to make. The government in its wisdom provided a guarantee of $10,000 for the Vienna collections that were brought to Canada, but fortunately that was not needed.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I felt somewhat sorry that the minister was not able to pay a greater compliment to the Minister of Public Works. I think I could have paid him a more generous compliment if I had had the opportunity. I noted carefully what the minister said.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I say it every day.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister said the Minister of Public Works has been as interested in it as any minister could be. I think that is a most equivocal compliment, but I shall not pursue the matter further. I presume the present minister is the one most interested, and that is the ground on which he is being given the job. May I ask the minister to what extent this bill gives effect to the request of the commission that the national gallery be established as a separate branch of the government under a board of trustees, with a status similar to that of the public archives?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The bill does not do that; that is an administrative position which can be worked out within the department. The director of the national gallery would have the same rank in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration as other directors. As everyone knows, directors are usually at the heads of branches of departments.

[Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the Minister of National Revenue pointed out yesterday, I do not regard every word of the Massey report as being inspired, but I should like to know whether the minister considers that this is a substantial compliance with the requests made.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Very much so.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Agent of His Majesty.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This section reads:

(1) The board is for all its purposes an agent of His Majesty in right of Canada and its powers under this act may be exercised only as an agent of His Majesty.

(2) The board may on behalf of His Majesty enter into contracts in the name of His Majesty or in the name of the board.

I call attention to the fact that subsection 4 of this section, which gives the power to sell, lease and so on, begins with the words "subject to the approval of the minister." No such words appear in subsection 2. Would not it be proper to have them in that subsection, which is rather more important than subsection 4 which has the qualification?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): On the face of it that might appear to be so; but the authority of the board of trustees, which is a corporation, is neither extended nor abridged by subsection 2. By reason of its corporate existence it has power to enter into contracts. It is true these contracts necessarily cannot be carried out without a vote of parliament. The difference between subsections 2 and 4 is, as you will see, that in 4 the board has the power to dispose of property belonging to His Majesty. Subsection 2 is in all probability to be used to acquire rather than dispose of, and it was thought that where the board felt they might dispose of some property it would be proper for the minister to know about it before it was done. But in the contract to purchase the board of trustees are operating under a grant which is limited in amount, and their authority in so far as the government is concerned would only exist to the extent of that grant.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is certainly a very reasonable interpretation of what is intended. But surely under subsection 2 the minister might wake up to find that a contract had been made which exceeded their powers or their grant, and which might be embarrassing all round.

Actually is there any possible objection to putting those words in as a safeguard? As I understand what the minister has said, in effect it is very definitely limited, but why not put that in? Is there any objection to it?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think it is a matter of drafting in the Department of Justice. Crown corporations—and if you choose, this particular bill may be used as an example—are limited by the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act in that no contract is binding on His Majesty until certain procedure has been followed by the treasury board and the like. I have no objection to inserting it but I should like to warn that the insertion of these words too often in the act would make it appear that the minister had too much to do with the ordinary work of the board of trustees in what admittedly is a specialized field.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise merely for the purpose of seeking information. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood is very pertinent and deserves the serious consideration of the minister and the law officers. It would be a matter of interest if the minister could provide the committee with the opinion of the law officers regarding this particular section.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have just given it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister gave a general summary. I intend to follow through and ask the minister what is the purpose of making the board an agent of His Majesty in the right of Canada. The explanatory note says that it is to conform to recent legislative practice. Would the minister outline what the nature of the legislative practice is in this regard and the purpose of having the wording as it is in this particular subsection?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I could do that by repeating what I have already said. When the bill was first sent to the Department of Justice it was only to include one small amendment, namely to increase the number of trustees in order to carry out that recommendation in the report of the Massey commission. It was considered in the Department of Justice that it would be better to pass a new bill bringing up to date the powers of the board to conform with the existing powers of the various corporate bodies that operate under the government. When we were discussing this matter I asked this specific question: If the board of trustees entered into an agreement to purchase a picture or work of art that was worth $10 million, what would the situation be? I was told the situation was that the contract would not be valid as against the crown without certain action being taken by the treasury board, and that therefore we need not worry about that, whether or not the board of trustees would ever do anything of that kind. I was told that this section merely sets out the present position with respect to crown corporations, namely, that they have the power to make contracts within the limitations set out in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That might be so if subsection 4 covered purchases. Subsection 4 reads as follows:

> Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may sell, lease, exchange or otherwise dispose of any property vested in the board at the commencement of this act or subsequently acquired by the board.

If ministerial authority is required in the matter of purchases, for example, in the illustration given by the minister, or the authority of the treasury board, which after all in reality would amount to securing the approval of the minister, why is it that the word "purchase" is not included in subsection 4?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): For the very purpose of precluding the minister having anything to do with the ordinary business of a corporation established by statute. The minister does not want to appear, nor in fact does this minister want to have anything to do with the question of the relative value of art, and the board of trustees have the power to acquire art under this section. It is not intended that the minister should intervene in the normal processes of choosing pictures or matters of that kind. On the other hand, once the property is acquired and becomes the property of His Majesty it is thought desirable that it should not be disposed of without some reference to the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister makes the statement that he inquired whether or not the board of the national gallery could purchase a picture costing $10 million, I think he said—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I said that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and he said the legal opinion was that it could not. Where is there any control over the authority of the board under this measure? The board is given absolute authority as an agent of His Majesty. Subsection 2 says that the board may on behalf of His Majesty enter into contracts in the name of His Majesty or in the name of the board. Where is the limitation under statute that would deny the wide authority granted under this section?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add to that question before the minister answers. As far as I can see there is nothing in subsection 2 to limit it to the acquisition of pictures. There is no reason why they should not go and buy a national gallery so far as that is concerned.

Mr. Knowles: It might be a good idea.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I quoted the opinion I obtained from the Department of Justice, that there is a limitation in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. If my hon. friend wants the precise citation I cannot give it at the moment. If there is any feeling that this is a matter of importance and any doubt about the power of the board of trustees only extending to the objectives set out in the bill, I will be glad to let this subsection stand. But I am told that it is in practically the same words as in the case of several other corporations established by statute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which, for instance?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I must say I cannot give names.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister says that in the statute there is a prohibition as to the powers of the trustees I can follow it; but if he says there is something in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, or whatever its new name is—

Mr. Knowles: Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —that does not seem to me to help us much if these trustees go out and do something inconsistent with it. It reminds me of the old picture in Punch of the deck steward who said to a passenger, "You cannot be sick in here," and he said, "Can't I?"

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): But if they made a contract outside their powers it would not affect the crown.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With respect to subsection 2, what is the reason the board has authority to enter into contracts either in the name of His Majesty or in the name of the board? What is the reason for that distinction?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The reason given for that is, as you will see in the following section, that they have the power to hire people temporarily. They would do that in the name of the board. On the other hand a larger and serious expenditure would in all probability be made in the name of His Majesty after, as we have indicated, reference to those who would be providing a substantial sum of money.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Adamson: Could the trustees commission the creation of a work of art for a specific purpose? Supposing it was thought desirable to have a commemorative picture of some historical event, could they commission an artist to paint that picture?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes, they could.

Mr. Knowles: They would not have to call for tenders?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has been good enough to say he is prepared to allow subsection 2 to stand. We are possibly creating something which may go on for a long time, and it may become more important. I should like to be satisfied that there is a good reason for omitting those qualifying words. I believe I understand the distinction which the minister has made between 4 and 2, but I confess it is not wholly convincing.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Would it not be better if we passed the section? I shall discuss the matter with my officials and with my hon. friend. We shall not ask for third reading until tomorrow, and if there is any question in the mind of the hon. member at that time it can be discussed then.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are few people who know less about the rules than I do, but it seems to me that once this has passed the minister will not want to make a change. It is sensible to let it stand. I doubt if I have ever seen a bill altered on third reading.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think that what has happened in connection with the previous bill should be an indication that the minister would have no hesitation in amending a bill if he believes it should be amended. If the hon. member will permit it to rest there, I shall discuss it with the officials to see what they think. If an amendment is necessary it can be inserted at that time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I understand the minister correctly, we are really going to deal with this as if it had been held over, and I am content.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Objects and powers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it there is no plan under consideration at the moment which calls for an additional building?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There has been a good deal of discussion as to the location and nature of a building, and I believe that discussion is continuing. I understand there have been sites considered, and I believe the site itself is a factor that has to be decided before any other steps can be taken, because the architectural nature of the building would depend to some extent at least on the site.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not quite sure how far the minister has taken me. Does that mean the trustees are in a position to go ahead and make proposals for a building with a reasonable expectation that if a satisfactory proposal is made their recommendation will be accepted?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The precise situation is that already preliminary specifications have been drawn up by an architect, not as to the minimum that would be required in the building but including all those things which should go into a gallery building. The next step will be to determine a site, and then at that point to call for a competition for the design of the building incorporating the requirements which have already been agreed upon. At the moment I believe the position is that if the site is decided upon, then the recommendation of the board of trustees for the calling of a competition would be given serious consideration by the government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would it be fair to say that this is recognized as a matter of importance which will be given consideration?

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time; now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I gave an undertaking and if I said later this day or next sitting, I think it would meet the exigencies of the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Third reading of the bill later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTH FRASER HARBOUR COMMISSION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR TWO ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Commissioners.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was last before the committee, on October 30, the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Peterborough West asked for some additional information on the gross earnings of this harbour commission. I have that information for them. In 1950 the gross revenues were $50,158 and the gross expenditures were $46,372. I have some figures for 1951. To the end of November of this year, that is for the eleven-month period, gross revenues totalled $60,357.35, and the total expenditure for the same period was $46,348. The 1951 expenditures include an unusual item in that during the current year a tugboat was purchased which cost $18,000.

Mr. Goode: When the parliamentary assistant introduced this bill he called it a simple bill. If this bill is simple, then the bill covering the St. Lawrence seaway authority, as well as several other bills that have been considered by this house, are also simple. The parliamentary assistant has told us that the annual expenditure of this North Fraser harbour commission amounts to between $50,000 and $60,000 a year. Yet there is a section in this bill asking that the commission be increased to five members. This week the same department brought to this house the bill covering the St. Lawrence seaway authority. If I read that bill correctly the authority would consist of a president and two other members. So we are faced with the situation where the St. Lawrence seaway authority, which will be spending hundreds of millions of dollars per year, is composed of three members, yet we are asking this house to consider a bill that will increase the North Fraser harbour commission to five members, which body spends approximately $60,000 a year. We also agree that the national harbours board, with their tremendous responsibility in Canada, can get along very well at the present time with two members. Yet the North Fraser harbour commission must have five. The New Westminster harbour commission, which is directly east of the North Fraser, will have this year something like 400 ocean-going vessels under its control; yet over the years they have done very well with three members. For some reason unknown to me, however, someone wants to put five members on this commission.

To some extent I want to go into the matter of my interest in this bill; because it is most important that, when I oppose a bill presented by a minister of this government whom I greatly respect, I should have definite and proper reasons for doing so. About two-thirds of the shore line of the north arm of the Fraser is also the shore line of the municipalities of Burnaby and Richmond which I have the honour to represent in this house. The other third, approximately, belongs to the city of Vancouver. The city of Vancouver and the two councils of Burnaby and Richmond have bitterly opposed the passing of the first section of this bill, and that is why I am speaking at this time. When my people are against something and it is fitting, according to my judgment, that I should speak against it, then I am at all times going to accept the opportunity of speaking against it, even though a minister of the government proposes it.

As it happens, the Richmond Times—a paper put out in the municipality of Richmond—in an editorial some months ago pointed out that the commission was changed about June, 1950. Up to that time, when the old commission sat there seemed to be not too much trouble in regard to whether there should be additional members of the commission. But for various reasons that I do not intend to go into now it was considered by the Department of Transport that this commission should be changed; and it was changed, and will give better administration to the north arm of the Fraser. At that time, before the change, I can tell the committee now it was not possible to take an audit of the books. In fact it was most difficult to get the auditors to express an opinion at all on the commission. When I was elected in June, 1949, this matter was brought to my attention and I, properly I think, brought it to the attention of the Minister of Transport. He immediately took action on it and two members of the commission were changed. Since that time a senior officer of the Department of Transport has visited the commission and I have a copy of the letter he has written to the commission praising them highly for the efficient work they are now doing.

This is the first time, I think—and I do not believe the parliamentary assistant will contradict this—that the commission for the north arm of the Fraser river has ever shown a reasonable operating profit. The reason they are showing an operating profit now is that every industry on the north arm is having to pay its share, whereas in bygone days—and not too far bygone—some people were paying their share and some were not. I think it is the industries that were not paying their toll which are putting up the fight for the two additional members on the commission.

The committee will remember that this bill was brought to the house at the last session. It has been told to me—and I have represented it to the proper authorities—that it was because of a certain meeting in Vancouver not long ago, in connection with the visit of the Minister of Transport to Vancouver, that representations were made by industry that they should be represented on the commission. It is because of that meeting, I think, that this bill is presented to the committee now.

I take exception to the first section of the bill; I take no exception to the second section. The reason I take exception to the first section is this. I told the committee quite clearly that there are authorities administering many hundreds of millions of dollars which are considered by the government able to operate quite effectively with a small number of commissioners. Yet I must consent, being a member of this committee, to a small part of the national life of Canada, the north arm of the Fraser, having five members on that commission—not I think by any wish of the Minister of Transport but because it is the wish of the industries on the river who want control of the North Fraser board.

It will have to be proved by the parliamentary assistant before this committee finishes its deliberations—because I intend to get to my feet again—that the present commission is inefficient. I think I can prove in this committee that it is one of the outstanding federal bodies in British Columbia. If the parliamentary assistant wishes to argue that point I am prepared to prove that it is efficient.

Before I finish with what I am going to say—and I shall not be long because I seldom take too much of the time of this chamber—I want to go into the personnel of the commission as it is at present constituted. Mr. Tom Brooke, who has been an official on this part of the river for sixteen or seventeen years, in my opinion is an able administrator. I think his heart and soul are in the business of the commission. There are times when I do not agree with him; nevertheless he has done a good job on the north arm. I think it is a good appointment of the Department of Transport and I support Mr. Brooke in what he has done. Mr. William Lees, who lives in the municipality of Burnaby, is a recognized property evaluator in that part of the country, a man who is most necessary to the commission because of the foreshore rights that are being rented, leased and sold over the years. Mr. R. M. Grauer for twenty years was the reeve of the municipality of Richmond which is greatly interested in this bill. I do not think the parliamentary assistant or anyone else will say that any one of those three men has shown inefficiency in regard to his operations on the commission.

I say the commission is efficient, and I will take that view until the parliamentary assistant is able to prove me wrong. Then what is the reason for changing the commission? Does it not seem rather laughable to most of the members of this committee—when I tell you, as I have, that these other great authorities on waterways across the country can operate with two and three men—that a sixteen-mile stretch of water, that for the most part is not much more than half a mile wide at its widest part and a little less than that at its narrowest part before it gets to New Westminster, has to have five members?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that something more than common sense is behind this bill. The people of Burnaby-Richmond, in the words of the reeves,—and the parliamentary assistant has those wires as well as I—bitterly oppose this section of the bill. The original North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act properly sets out that the interests of the municipalities are to be studied and protected as best that can be done by the federal government. In this case we are not protecting the municipalities. The city of Vancouver has also opposed this section of the bill.

There are 400,000 people or more represented by those three councils. Is this committee to study the interests of the 400,000 people, or is it to study the pressure that has been put on certain people by a few industries on the north arm of the Fraser who are interested only in their bank balances and their financial balances at the end of the year?

I said I intended to speak on this again before we finished it in the committee, but I do formally and on the record oppose the amendments to the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act as bitterly as I can, knowing that I am supported by every council on the lower mainland of British Columbia, and knowing that it is a wrong thing for this committee to impose upon my people two more members of the commission for which there is no need. Mr. Chairman, if this commission is inefficient this is not the way to make it efficient. If we have members on the commission who are not doing their job I would be the first in this house to rise in my place and recommend to the Minister of Transport that they be asked to resign, and we would replace them by men who could do the job. But I am convinced that this is a proper commission and that it can do a good job, and I am waiting very anxiously and with some interest to hear the parliamentary assistant prove me wrong.

Mr. Green: Is the parliamentary assistant not going to answer?

Mr. Benidickson: I am waiting for the various comments.

Mr. Green: This is a rather unusual attitude for the parliamentary assistant to take. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has made out a very good prima facie case, and I think he is entitled to a reply from the parliamentary assistant. However, I should like to say a few words on section 1 and to suggest to the parliamentary assistant that he drop it.

No one is quarrelling with section 2 of the bill. Section 1 merely increases the number of harbour commissioners from three to five, and in addition—and this is a very important addition—it provides that four of these commissioners must be appointed by the government. The present set-up is that there are three commissioners, of whom one is appointed by the three municipalities of Vancouver, Burnaby and Richmond. The other two are appointed by the government. If this section is passed the municipalities will still have only one member on the commission and the government appointees will number four instead of two.

It is very significant that these three municipal organizations have all opposed section 1. When the North Fraser harbour commission was established in 1913 it was provided that the profits made by the operations of the commission would belong to the municipalities. Incidentally, in 1913 Vancouver was not involved but there were two municipalities called South Vancouver and Point Grey which have since become part of the city of Vancouver. The three municipalities are the bodies that are interested in any profits made from the operations. Therefore the operations of this commission are of prime importance to them.

Furthermore there must be some neutral control of this harbour commission, and I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the municipalities are the proper people to have such control. They are not subject to influence by different groups in the same way that other appointees would be. If there is any body in a position to appoint commissioners whose sole interest is the protection of the public, that body is these municipalities.

Mr. McIlraith: The same argument would apply with reference to the government, would it not?

Mr. Green: The same argument does not apply with reference to the government, because these municipalities are on both sides of this particular waterway, and members of the respective councils are right there on the spot where they can understand what is required. They have to satisfy the residents in the district. They are directly responsible to the people there.

Mr. McIlraith: Members of parliament are in the same situation.

Mr. Green: Whereas the government is back here, 3,000 miles away.

Mr. McIlraith: Members of parliament are responsible to their electors.

Mr. Green: I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production not to try to be smart about this matter.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not trying to be smart; I am pointing out flaws in the argument.

Mr. Green: I am making a serious argument. If he does not agree, he can get up and make his own speech. He does not know anything about this, anyway.

Mr. McIlraith: I know a specious argument when I hear one, though.

Mr. Green: Well, you hear a lot from your side of the house, so you should. We have here public bodies who are responsible to the people of the district and who in addition will gain from the proper administration of this seaway. As I have intimated, they are unanimous in opposing this section. They do not want to have the number of commissioners increased from three to five. If the government is not satisfied with the present commissioners, then it is its responsibility to change them. That is not what is being done. Those two men, who presumably do not meet with the favour of the government, are being left on the commission, and two other men are to be added. On the face of it that shows there is something not right with this proposal.

Another fact which is of great importance is that it would be unfair and unwise to place the control of this waterway in the hands of the people who have foreshore rights to acquire, who may want to get rights to erect docks and piers, who may want rights for booming grounds. There are millions of feet of saw logs stored in the North Fraser and there are very valuable rights to be acquired by the lumber people and other industries that use the waterway or that have operations on the North Fraser. I do not believe it is sound to turn over control of the waterway to representatives of the people who are doing their business on the waterway, and who stand to profit from being able to get benefits which might not come to them if it were under the control of the municipalities, or of an impartial body, or of a power which had absolutely no interests at stake.

It should be a cardinal principle in setting up these commissions that power ought not to be given to the people who are going to be doing business with them. Control should be kept in independent hands, and today that is the position. This commission is under the control of independent people. Someone does not like it and wants to have a change made. Representations were made a year ago showing that there is an attempt to get at least a strong voice in the operations of the commission. For many years we had a harbour board in Vancouver, the best harbour in Canada, and one which does a tremendous business. We had only three commissioners for that harbour, and they were not appointed on the recommendation of the people who were doing business with the harbour board.

I believe the same plan should be followed in connection with the North Fraser harbour commission. In reality I think this is a Liberal party matter. This trouble arises, and the bill becomes a necessity, because of trouble in the Liberal party. I have here a dispatch from the Vancouver News-Herald reporting an interview with the Minister of Fisheries upon his return recently from Japan. The article states:

> Mr. Mayhew says he favours the three-man harbour commission if a certain one of the present three members will resign, and if Mr. Goode will live up to his promise to obtain that resignation.
> Meanwhile Mr. Mayhew said the government is going ahead with the bill for a five-man commission. But anybody who is appointed will represent all the people, not the tow-boat or sawmill operators.

That report may or may not be correct, but—

Mr. Mayhew: I say part of that report is utterly wrong, and I shall take occasion later on to say where it is wrong.

Mr. Green: This is a quarrel in the Liberal party which should not have to be settled on the floor of the House of Commons. It should not have to be settled by increasing the expense to the extent of appointing two extra commissioners. It should not have to be settled by giving the municipalities concerned only a one-fifth voice instead of a one-third voice, as they have at the present time, in the operations of the harbour commission.

By section 20 of the incorporating act this harbour commission is given power to regulate and control navigation and all works and operations within the harbour, to appoint constables and so on. Also it is given power to make bylaws for the government of all parties using the harbour, and of all vessels coming into or using the same, and by such bylaws to impose tolls to be paid upon such vessels and upon goods landed from or shipped on board the same, as they think fit, according to the use which may be made of such harbour and works.

The commission is given control over shipping, and it has had one great difficulty, which I submit I am in order in discussing on this section, because it concerns the whole set-up of the commission. That difficulty is that there is an old bridge right across the waterway—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: —which was constructed at the turn of the century—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Green: —and which interferes with all this shipping.

Mr. Benidickson: A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The bridge to which the hon. member refers surely has nothing to do with this bill, or with the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: I submit it does have a connection with the bill, because control of shipping is in the hands of this harbour commission; and shipping is being impeded because of the type of bridge across this waterway.

For example, I have here a brief filed by the B.C. tow-boat owners association covering obstructions and hazards to navigation in this waterway in the vicinity of the Marpole bridge. I shall not read it at length, but I would point out—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, when this bill first came up the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra discussed the Marpole bridge at some length and, against my wishes, drew me into that discussion. He admitted at that time that we were both out of order.

Mr. Green: I did no such thing.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member will agree now that he knows he is out of order in referring to the Marpole bridge, which has existed for fifty or sixty years over the north arm of the Fraser river. This bill has no connection with the Marpole bridge. It is a subject matter foreign to the increase in the number of commissioners. I suggest the hon. member should not be allowed to discuss that subject. When the estimates come up, in whatever department the hon. member thinks is responsible, I suggest he should take a day and discuss the matter.

Mr. Knowles: Give him a day and he will take a week.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But right now I suggest the hon. member is out of order. He understands that.

The Chairman: I would refer the committee to standing order 58 (2) which says that speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. It seems to me that what the hon. member is saying is not strictly relevant.

Mr. Green: My submission is that the government is now taking the responsibility for changing the set-up of the commission, one of the main functions of which is to control shipping on that waterway. I submit further that we are entitled to a statement from one of the ministers in regard to the Marpole bridge.

The Chairman: Order. The principle of the bill is an amendment, not the act itself.

Mr. Green: I submit the amendment opens up the subject of the operations of the commission.

The Chairman: I think not.

Mr. Green: It brings about a change in the set-up, and I submit it entitles me to raise this question.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but I cannot permit the discussion.

Mr. Green: I am very sorry, too, Mr. Chairman. I only hope that you will not be held up for an hour or two some day when you are coming from the Vancouver airport because the Marpole bridge is open and a tug is going through.

I would urge again upon the parliamentary assistant that no attempt be made to alter this commission, as suggested in the bill. Leave the membership at three. If that is done the municipalities cannot complain. Then if the government is dissatisfied with its own two appointees—and, mind you, these two men were appointed by this very government—let it take the responsibility for removing those men and appointing others.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in connection with this bill. When the bill was in committee a month and a half ago we asked the parliamentary assistant for some information but he did not seem to have it; and the Minister of Public Works moved that the committee rise and report progress. We have a rather peculiar situation here. This bill appeared on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Transport, being one of several bills introduced at about the same time by the minister. When the other bills were dealt with the minister was here to pilot them through the house in his usual capable manner, but he seems to find it convenient to be absent when this bill is before the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think the hon. gentleman is fair. The Minister of Transport is out of town attending an official function.

Mr. MacInnis: Far be it from me to say anything that would reflect in any way upon the Minister of Transport. If there has been even a suggestion of that in what I have said, I willingly withdraw it. But I do point out that he was not here when this bill came up before and is not here today, while he was here when all the other bills introduced over his name were debated.

I suggest that the government take note of what the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond said this afternoon. I think he advanced an argument that cannot be met when he pointed out that only a few days ago we set up the St. Lawrence seaway authority which will have authority to expend hundreds of millions of dollars, and it was deemed by the government sufficient to have only three men constitute that authority and deal with a matter of that magnitude, while here we are to have a board of five to administer a small section of the Fraser river and handle expenditures of less than $100,000 a year. Surely there is no one in this house, no matter how naïve he may be—I am not suggesting that members are naïve—who cannot see something fishy in connection with the North Fraser harbour board.

I have in my hand a copy of the Richmond-Marpole Times, a weekly paper published in the area served by the North Fraser harbour board. The editorial in this issue is very much opposed to what is being attempted here, that is to increase the board from three to five members. It points out, as has been pointed out already by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, that the municipalities concerned not only are not asking for this but are definitely opposed to it. The editorial reads:

> The industrial forces behind the move to change the North Fraser harbour commission from three members to five have claimed that such reorganization is necessary in the interests of efficiency.

It indicates the organizations which are behind the move to increase the membership of the board as follows:

> B.C. Lumber Manufacturers' Association
> B.C. Towboat Owners Association
> Salmon Canners Operating Committee

The editorial goes on to point out that the new commission is certainly not inefficient when the present revenues are compared with those obtained under the old commission. The total revenue for 18 months under the old commission amounted to $37,938.72 as compared with $84,001.89 for 16 months under the new commission. It would appear that there could not be inefficiency there. If an attempt is made to force this through the house we shall have to oppose it because a case cannot be made out for appointing five commissioners to handle a revenue of $50,000 or $100,000 a year. There is no reason in the world why that should be done except to serve the interests of people who want to get control of the board. We might as well be straight on that and act accordingly. I suggest to the government that they withdraw the bill and not perpetrate this sort of thing on the people of the North Fraser river.

Mr. Hodgson: As the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, I think there is something fishy in this bill. I believe the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond deserves considerable credit for having the courage to get up and oppose the government in the way he did. There should be more members of parliament with such courage rather than simply being tin soldiers who get up and speak or pound their desks and at times act against their own way of thinking.

It has not been proved to me that more members are needed on this board. I should like the minister or the parliamentary assistant to tell me why two extra members are being put on the board and what salary they will be getting. It seems to me that probably there are some political heelers who have their hands on the doorknob of the government asking for jobs.

Somebody has to take care of them. If the minister would answer these questions I would be more happy about the situation. After all, those who have spoken must know something about the situation or they would not speak in the manner they have, especially when it is against the wishes of the municipalities on both sides of the river. I think there is something fishy about the whole deal.

Mr. Mayhew: I do not intend to delay the house long in rising to speak in support of the bill. I should like to point out, however, that while a three-man commission is probably satisfactory as a harbour board for Vancouver, and probably three men are sufficient on the larger project on the St. Lawrence river, I do not think a three-man commission would be satisfactory at the present time in this situation.

Mr. Hodgson: Why?

Mr. Mayhew: I will tell you why. In the first place the government has recognized two of the municipalities in the past. All three men on the board at the present time live in either Burnaby or Richmond. Vancouver's representative, while living in another municipality, has large holdings adjacent to the bridge. That does not mean to say I think that man would not be satisfactory, but the principle of giving representation to municipalities that do not contribute anything toward the support of the waterway has been recognized. Any revenue derived is divided with the municipalities. Some of the revenue goes to the provincial government, but all expenditures on the north arm of the Fraser come from the funds of the federal government. I think the very fact that there would be five men on the commission would make the situation more secure. If you want to change the present membership of the board representatives of the lumber industry, the fishing industry or any other industry could be appointed. There would be nothing to hinder the appointment of representatives of the lumber, fishing or tugboat industries, and they would have complete control of it.

With a five-man commission, and four of them appointed by the federal government, there is very little chance of any one industry or person imposing his will on the other four people on the commission. That is one reason I am supporting the bill. At one time I thought three members would be sufficient, but with only three members on the board there was no way to provide representation for all the municipalities affected. It might have been preferable to do what is being done with respect to the St. Lawrence waterways. The different municipalities and cities along the St. Lawrence river are not being brought into the picture and asked to take a part. The dominion government is going to appoint engineers who will be able to deal with the size, depth and width of the canal and how it is going to be operated. Nobody else is going to be allowed to have any say about it because they are not paying for it.

If we were to do the same thing here it might be the best way; but these same municipalities would be the very ones to object to taking that kind of stand. Therefore in order to protect the Fraser river from becoming the preserve of any special group on the river we are far better to have five commissioners rather than three, particularly when those three come from outside the area where most of the money is being spent. After all, the revenue of the commission comes from money paid by people who live along the river. It is not from the municipalities. It is revenue collected from the people along the river. Therefore I think they have the right to some say, but they have no right to dominate the commission and impose their preferences. Rather than there being something fishy about the matter, it would be far more liable to be fishy with only three men on the commission rather than five. I support the bill because I think it is the right thing to do.

Mr. Abbott: If I could have the indulgence of the house, I have an important announcement I should like to make, and I should like to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit later. The statement I have to make is fairly short, and I would ask that at this stage we revert to motions to enable me to make it.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

EXEMPTION OF ALL CLASSES OF TRANSACTIONS FROM PERMIT REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Adamson: Before the minister speaks, will there be an opportunity to discuss the motion he is about to make?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am not making a motion. I am going to make a statement. If I have leave to revert to motions, I wish to make an important announcement with regard to foreign exchange control. Members of the house will recall that when the government introduced the Foreign Exchange Control Act in 1947, and when we introduced bills extending it for two-year periods in 1949 and 1951, we made it clear that we regarded exchange control as a regrettable necessity with which we would gladly dispense when conditions permitted us to do so.

The present act expires sixty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament commencing in the year 1953. During the past year or so there has been a progressive relaxation of Canadian exchange restrictions; the travel restrictions were abolished in October, 1950; the last of the import restrictions imposed for exchange reasons were done away with at the beginning of this year; and in the course of 1951 there have been a number of quite extensive relaxations in the administrative procedures followed by the foreign exchange control board under my direction with respect to capital movements and other matters. At the present time exchange control bears very lightly on the Canadian economy. These welcome developments have naturally caused me, as the responsible minister, to give earnest consideration to the question whether the time was approaching when I could recommend to the government that exchange control be done away with. In considering this question, it has fortunately not been necessary for me to make any forecasts regarding the tranquillity or roughness of the waters which lie ahead; my task has been the more limited one of trying to decide whether there is sufficient likelihood that we shall wish to make use of foreign exchange restrictions to deal with whatever problems do in fact arise in the future to justify the continued retention of the powers contained in the Foreign Exchange Control Act and the administrative apparatus necessary to carry out its provisions.

The conclusion I have come to is that we would be better advised not to rely on exchange restrictions, but rather on the general handling of our domestic economic situation to keep us in reasonable balance with the outside world and to maintain the Canadian dollar over the years at an appropriate relationship with foreign currencies. This view has been shared by my colleagues, and the government has today amended the foreign exchange control regulations so as to exempt all classes of transaction covered therein from permit requirements. I shall lay on the table of the house a copy of the order in council by which this has been done. Its general effect is that foreign exchange control has been abolished in Canada.

It is the present intention of the government to introduce at the next session of parliament if the legislative program permits, and at all events before the present act expires, a measure repealing the Foreign Exchange Control Act and substituting therefor a new exchange fund act drafted along the same general lines as those parts of the Foreign Exchange Control Act which have to do with the operation of the exchange fund. Meanwhile the exchange fund, which holds the official reserves of gold and foreign currencies, continues in being and in operation under the Foreign Exchange Control Act and is available to contribute to orderly conditions and as a factor of stability in the exchange market.

Foreign exchange control was one of the basic instruments for effective utilization of our resources for the conduct of the war. During that period and during the period of post-war readjustment the circumstances and problems which arose often placed a heavy burden upon the administrative staff. On this occasion I wish to express, on behalf of the government, appreciation of the efficient and devoted services which the staff has always given in the fulfilment of its duties. I wish also to express appreciation of the co-operation we received from the agents of the board, business organizations and the public generally. I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to table these orders.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister will not be surprised if for once we are able to congratulate him. It is perhaps one occasion upon which one would like to spin out one's congratulations, and even make certain annotations on them. I believe I shall content myself with saying that we are very glad the minister has taken this action. We think we may have contributed something to it; and if we did, we are very glad of that, too.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I should like to associate myself with those few words of congratulation to the minister upon the action he has taken. I have been pressing for this for several years. There is just one further step his department should take, and that is the establishment of a free gold bullion market here in Canada. This would completely free our currency from any control, and make it the world's most desirable money. I hope to see this in the comparatively near future.

NORTH FRASER HARBOUR COMMISSION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR TWO ADDITIONAL COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Commissioners.

Mr. Goode: I am sorry that I have to oppose my own minister on this bill. I do so with respect, and I believe it is an indication of the strength of this party, if nothing else, when a member can get up in this house and disagree with the minister. I cannot follow his line of argument that there should be some representative of industry on this commission. Perhaps I am somewhat amateurish in this business, but I should like to know of any major board where such a condition obtains. I know many of my constituents have questioned me whether industry should be represented on the commission, and they have asked me the same question: Where is there a major board upon which industry is represented? I am sure this must be the one case where the commission has been increased from three men to five.

Mr. Benidickson: I thought the Minister of Fisheries had effectively answered the criticism of this bill. There are several features, however, particularly those which refer to the department upon which I think I should properly give the house some explanation. The hon. member for Vancouver East suggested that something more than the usual procedural delays accounted for the fact that this bill had not come before the committee earlier. I want to assure him that had nothing to do with the wishes of our department. At the beginning of this session this particular bill, as well as another harbour bill, were assigned to me by the Minister of Transport as those which he hoped I would guide through the house. It is recognized by all hon. members that the minister has had probably as great a responsibility in piloting legislation through this house as anyone on the front bench. It was always considered that this bill had less importance when compared with other items on the order paper. On the other hand it was realized that, since it was coming close to Christmas and the interest in the bill was chiefly on the part of members from the far west, the measure should be proceeded with even though there are other items on the order paper of greater importance. I have been here night after night waiting for this item to be called, and ready to go ahead if the procedure permitted.

Something has been said about the size of this commission. There are a number of harbour commissions composed of three people, but there are others that have five. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond said that I should establish the inefficiency of the present commission. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is the farthest thing from my thought. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that if the government has not confidence in its two nominees on this commission, it has the responsibility to replace them. The government has the authority to replace them, but that is not the issue. I do not for a moment propose to establish any lack of confidence in the men. While I agree with hon. members who have said that three of the municipalities concerned have urged that the commission be not increased, two of those municipalities have been persuaded through attending a joint meeting of the users of the harbour that there was some lack of confidence in the case of one municipality in two commisioners, and in the case of another municipality in one commissioner.

The Minister of Fisheries has suggested that by broadening this board it will rest better with all those who are users of this harbour. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond asked if there were any harbour commissions that had direct representation of industry. I do not think there is any intention of giving any particular industry, as such, the right to nominate a direct representative on this commission. On the other hand, the board of trade in the city of Toronto nominates one of the five members of that harbour commission. I am sure that, just like any member of this house, any person who has had business experience and who is placed on this commission will feel that he is a public servant. He would disregard his personal interests, and I am sure that would be the case even if the commissioner happened to have experience in the various industries that were the chief users of this harbour.

There was a suggestion that in comparing the revenues for the present year with those of 1949 one could make some assessment of the work of the present commission. I say that statement is neither to be challenged nor defended. It is a matter of fact that in the intervening year harbour rates were substantially increased, so that is not a yardstick that could guide the house. I might point out also that in the neighbouring harbour of New Westminster the government has the authority to appoint all the commissioners. It is established by what the Minister of Fisheries has said that additional investments in this harbour were made, not by the municipalities concerned but by the federal government. I might just put the figures on record which indicate that in the last fiscal year the federal government, in addition to the moneys expended by the harbour commission, spent $298,000 on this harbour for wharf construction and dredging. In the previous year the federal investment in this harbour, quite apart from the expenditure of the commission, was $358,696. We do feel that two more commissioners should be appointed since the city of Vancouver, one of the largest municipalities concerned, has not actually a representative on this commission. That might come about through this amendment.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to have my question answered.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) asked a question with respect to salaries.

Mr. Hodgson: How much money is involved?

Mr. Benidickson: It will be noted from the amendment that it is now proposed that the governor in council will have some control over the amount of these salaries. The simple increase in the number of commissioners does not, of necessity, mean that the total remuneration will be increased.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Fisheries has stated that, with only two government appointees on this commission, the situation would probably be more fishy than with four, using the word "fishy" in the slang sense in which it was used by one or two other members of the committee. That is not a particularly good recommendation for the government appointees. If he feels that way about the two present commissioners, surely something should be done about it.

Mr. Mayhew: Pardon me. I must not let that statement go unchallenged. I did not say that. The hon. member was the one who brought up the remark about lack of confidence. I did not say anything at all about lack of confidence in these men. The hon. member is the one who said there was something fishy about wanting five. Surely there is less chance for fishy dealing with five than with only three.

Mr. Green: That is what the minister said, that it would be less "fishy" if there were five rather than three.

Mr. Mayhew: I think it would be; that there would be more chance of its being efficient.

Mr. Green: Both he and the parliamentary assistant have now stated that they have every confidence in the present commission. The minister has gone on to explain that he is going to have these two additional men appointed to represent the industries doing business in the harbour.

Mr. Mayhew: Pardon me. Do not put words into my mouth. I did not say I was going to have anybody appointed. I never at any time said I was going to appoint anybody to represent any industry. I am a manufacturer, but I am not in this House of Commons representing the manufacturers. I am here representing all of the people of the city of Victoria; and in my present position as minister I am representing all the people of Canada in the thing I speak of, not the manufacturers or anybody else. If there happens to be on this commission a man who is in the tugboat business, or a man who is in the sawmill business or one in any other business, he is representing all of Canada and not representing that business.

Mr. Green: Then the parliamentary assistant and the minister said the municipalities had only one representative; they hinted that that was hardly fair, and might be one reason the government should be allowed to appoint two additional commissioners. If they really mean that, they could easily bring about that result by amending section 1 to provide that the municipalities shall appoint three commissioners of the five. Then there would be a representative from each of the municipalities and the whole argument would be settled. I would remind the Minister of Fisheries that, with regard to that point, the resolution of the city council of Vancouver reads as follows:

> Resolved that council is of the opinion if the act is to be amended to enlarge the commission from three to five members which is contrary to council's opinion on the matter concurrence can only be given if three are to be appointed by the municipal councils concerned or their nominees after consultation with industry and that the other two are appointed by the government from industries operating on the river.

If the minister wants to have the municipalities given fair representation on this commission, will he agree to a further amendment of this section to provide that there shall be one commissioner appointed by each of the municipalities?

Mr. Benidickson: The answer is no for the reason I gave, namely that quite apart from the expenditures of the commission itself, the federal government are making substantial investments in that harbour, which makes it possible. I think the same people in a municipal organization are a part of the representative area of Canada which has this substantial vested interest.

Mr. MacInnis: A moment ago the Minister of Fisheries said those who were appointed as commissioners, whoever they were, would represent the people as a whole; but I noticed that the first person he mentioned who might be appointed was a person from the tugboat owners' association. Does that mean an appointee has already been chosen from the tugboat owners' association? As possible commissioners he mentioned persons from the three organizations that we claim are behind these amendments, namely the tugboat owners' association, the operating canners and the sawmill operators. Are there any others outside of those who might be appointed commissioners? How did it happen that the minister just mentioned, first of all, the tugboat owners' association? That is what the people are concerned about. They are concerned that a representative of one of these interests will be appointed as commissioners, or two may be appointed; and they are just afraid that they will run the harbour board for their own benefit.

Mr. Gibson: Let us get someone who is on relief.

Mr. MacInnis: My hon. friend knows that he is on the outside fringe. There is no reason why a fringe person would not be just as satisfactory to them on the harbour board as my hon. friend is to them here.

Civil Service Act

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE AND SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 43, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, on division?

Some hon. Members: Just a moment.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take only a few moments to reiterate a suggestion I made last year when the estimates were under consideration. Since that time I have secured figures from the department with reference to the number of employees in the civil service who come under the regulations of the civil service commission. I find that as of May 31, 1951, there were 8,580 women with permanent status and 19,236 with temporary status. In other words at that time there were 27,816 women under the civil service commission.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house except to say that at the moment there are three commissioners, one of whom has had his time extended, and who will be due for retirement within a couple of years. When this vacancy occurs I would ask the government to give serious consideration to the appointment of a woman member of that commission, due to the large number of women who come under the control of the civil service commission, and because of the representation they deserve on it.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Tenure of office.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question on this section. I do not register any particular objection to section 1; it is section 2 to which I object. That is the reason I shouted "on division" so loudly a moment ago.

In connection with section 1, is it not a bit unusual to place in a statute the name of the minister on whose recommendation an order in council is to be passed? This section has to do with extending the tenure of office of civil service commissioners and, beginning at line 20, it reads:

> The governor in council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, may extend the term of office of a commissioner—

And so on. When statutes specify what is to be done by order in council, is it not customary merely to say that such and such can be done by the governor in council? Why pinpoint it to the Prime Minister?

[Mr. Cardiff.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only answer I could make is that the branch is under one minister who generally makes the recommendations. But, as the committee is aware, this is the most independent body we have in the employ of the country. While they have representation in the house in the person of the Secretary of State, the recommendations for the appointment of these commissioners are made by the head of the government.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has referred to the point that was in my mind. I have not the Civil Service Act before me, to ascertain whether there is in it a section saying whom the word "minister" means, but I would assume that for the purposes of the administration of the Civil Service Act "minister" would mean the Secretary of State. At least he is the minister responsible to parliament. It occurred to me that if anyone were making recommendations to the governor in council with respect to the civil service commission it would be the Secretary of State, and that such action would follow automatically. I appreciate the minister's statement that he has no answer other than the one he has given. However it struck me as not quite proper to have it put in this way.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I believe the civil service commission should be an independent body. It should be hired by parliament and, if necessary, its time extended by parliament. In my view the present commission is efficient. It has a big and an important job to do; but I have reason to know that the civil service commission is more or less tied by the cabinet at the present time. This bill will tie its hands to an even greater extent. It will not be the independent body that it should be. The Civil Service Act gives the minister power to overrule a decision of the civil service commission for cause. I have had occasion to inquire about this, and I could not find out just what the cause was other than that political pressure had been brought to bear by someone in my riding upon the minister or his staff, and the decision of the civil service commission was overruled. I am quite definite about that. If there is to be any change in the Civil Service Act, that one section should be taken out. We are either going to have a body that is independent, or one that can have its decisions changed by the minister for cause; and when that happens no one can find out just what the cause really is.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Salaries.

Mr. Knowles: I hear cries of "carried" from the other side, but hon. members know that we on this side are strongly opposed to section 2. I see no reason why the setting of the salaries of the civil service commissioners should be taken out of the statute and given to the cabinet. As the minister knows, we have made this view crystal clear on other occasions, and there is no point in taking up time just now unless by doing so we can persuade the government to change its mind.

I believe this is a retrograde step and one which the government should not ask parliament to take. I suggest that if it is possible for the government to do this with respect to the civil service commissioners, it will be possible for them to come along next year or the year after with a similar bill with respect to the salary of the Auditor General or the salary of the chief electoral officer. I serve notice now that if this precedent is followed with respect to other officers in the same category we will fight it even more lengthily and even more strenuously than we have fought this bill.

We feel that the point just made by the Minister of Public Works is one that should be underlined, that this body should be completely independent. I do not see how they can have the same independence they now have when instead of their salaries being fixed by a statute of parliament they are to be fixed by one group, namely the government. We have not had any satisfactory explanation as to why this change is being made. I presume an increase in the salaries of the civil service commissioners is in prospect, otherwise we would not have this change at this time. If an increase in salaries is in prospect, I think the government should come out in the open and do it by amending the statute. As has been pointed out by the Auditor General, the statute needs to be amended because for several years the civil service commissioners have been getting their salaries in part by virtue of the statute and in part by virtue of an item in the estimates.

Surely the thing to do was to put whatever salary was regarded as right and proper in the statute rather than doing it in this way. As I said the other day, the issue that concerns us is not the amount of the salary. If there is a need to increase these salaries, well and good; but let us have a case made out for that need. Let that case be made out on the floor of parliament rather than within the four walls of a cabinet meeting, to be followed by a decision by order in council. I suggest most strongly that this section should be deleted.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to add just a word to what I said before. I submit that no adequate reason has been given for this change, in fact nothing that could be called a reason has been given.

Mr. Knowles: No reason at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think that can be said, no reason at all. I can see no justification for this. It seems to me that these commissioners ought to be left with the utmost independence. How do we seek to make independent those whom we most of all wish to be independent, namely our judges? Do we allow the government to fix their salaries? No; we fix them here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why is not the statute being amended in such a way as to bring the salaries paid to these commissioners up to date. For example, it could be provided that there shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada to the chairman a salary of $12,000, and to each of the other commissioners a salary of $10,000, which salaries they are receiving at the present time. Will the minister please explain why he has not amended the statute in that way instead of asking that this power be given to the governor in council?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Those who have just spoken on this section have suggested that they have received no explanation, but I would point out that when we were discussing the resolution on December 12 I gave all the reasons we had, as reported on pages 1842, 1843 and 1844 of Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They do not seem to be convincing. I hope hon. gentlemen do not want me to repeat those reasons because I have stated them twice already.

Mr. Knowles: Give us a real reason.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is a matter of opinion. I could repeat the speech I made the other night but, unlike so many others who do it, I am not in the habit of doing that.

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to protest against this section. I am confident that hon. members of this house must realize that this section vitiates the basic principle upon which the civil service commission was set up. It was set up originally to remove the civil service from government patronage. As long as the cabinet has the authority to fix the salaries of the civil service commissioners they hold the whip hand over the civil service commissioners, which brings the whole civil service back under political patronage. Just what salaries has the government in mind to pay these civil service commissioners? Is it something they are afraid to announce to the house? If not, then there is no justification for not leaving it as it was, subject to statutory regulation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have been reading the reasons the minister gave the other night, and on looking at page 1842 of Hansard I find that they begin very well indeed. The minister said:

I believe that on December 4 I certainly made a blunder—

Mr. Knowles: Not only on December 4.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just continue; the hon. member must be fair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was going to read on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there a period there?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, there is no period. There is more to come, and I quote:

I believe that on December 4 I certainly made a blunder by informing the house of the contents of the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It was out of order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister continued:

That is due to my inexperience, but I thought that by giving details I would get the resolution through.

The minister went on to say that he had lost that illusion; then he proceeded to give some reasons and he continued:

Perhaps my reasons do not appeal to the hon. gentleman, but I know they appeal even to the members of the civil service commission.

That seems to be a good observation; I think that is probably quite true. Then the minister went on to say that the commissioners would not be affected in their sense of fairness by increases or decreases in salaries. Nobody has suggested that they would. The minister continued:

We wish to have the power to extend the tenure of the chairman and commissioners.

That is no reason for this section. Perhaps the minister can give other reasons that I have not been able to find in what he said before. Up to the present they do not seem to me very convincing. I hope he may still let the daylight in and not make another blunder by having this section passed.

Mr. McLure: What are the qualifications for appointment as commissioner?

An hon. Member: A good Liberal.

An hon. Member: A good Grit.

Mr. McLure: If we knew what qualifications were necessary many in this house might be making application. I should like to know what the qualifications are. Does he have to be a retired judge, a sitting judge who wants to get a better position, a lawyer, or what?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In my opinion the first qualification is a spirit of independence.

Mr. McLure: You are taking that away from them now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. The hon. member for Greenwood said he agreed with me that an increase or decrease in salary would not affect the fairness or competence of the commissioners. I have always thought that the first qualification required in a commissioner, and especially in the chairman of the commission, is that he would be independent even of the speeches we make in the house. The commissioners just follow the law, apply the merit system which is the basis of our Civil Service Act, and fulfil their duties to the best of their abilities.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The question is, who is going to apply it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I suppose they must have some education in order to be appointed. I believe they would need judgment. They would need to know something of human nature, and in the exercise of their semi-judicial duties they should be above pressure. They should be above personal sentiment and render justice to every candidate with ambitions to become a servant of the people.

Mr. McLure: What degrees do they require from a recognized university? In nearly every decent job advertised now by the commission the qualifications contain the provision that the applicant must have a certificate from some recognized university.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think you will find that is required in the appointment of the commissioners.

Mr. McLure: No; you will appoint them if they have no education, as long as they have common sense.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I can say one thing. I hold the three commissioners of the civil service commission in very high esteem. I think everyone will agree they are well qualified to fulfil their duties. If there is anything defective in the act, that may be corrected; but with respect to the present commissioners I bow to their fairness, good judgment and the way they have handled a very difficult situation in the last ten years.

Mr. Brooks: They will not be there for all time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): With the increase in the activities of the government they have had a very heavy load. In answer to the hon. member for York South, I do not think the government has in mind destroying or vitiating the Civil Service Act. The other evening I gave the reasons we were presenting this measure, and I do not see why people object so much. There are only two civil servants who are appointed by parliament and whose salaries are covered by statute, with the exception of the judges, as has been pointed out.

Mr. Knowles: And the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am asking myself if parliament with all its duties, functions and obligations, would have the time to make all appointments to higher positions in the civil service, and to make a study of the salaries that should be paid to all these people. I can see the sessions going on and on if we undertake that task. I think the government has the responsibility for these appointments. If they are bad appointments we certainly will suffer. If we do not pay them a salary that compensates them for the work they do, we will still be blamed because that is one of the duties and obligations of the government, which are not exactly the same as those of a legislative body.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the minister state what salary he intends to pay?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I avoided answering that question, but the moment the government decides to increase the salary we will be only too pleased to announce it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But you will do that after the house closes and we will not know anything about it for another two or three months.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The way the hon. gentleman puts it he wants to fix the salary the government would pay by order in council, and I do not think that is the proper procedure.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister indicated a few minutes ago that the chief qualification of a civil service commissioner was his independence. Does the minister or the government consider that the application of this particular clause, whereby their salaries are contingent upon a decision by cabinet, renders the civil service commissioners more or less independent?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I say to the hon. gentleman that if a man reaches the stage in life where he is considered qualified to occupy one of the highest positions we have to offer, that of chairman of the civil service commission—or of a commissioner—and is affected by a decision of the government to increase or decrease salary, I do not think he is fit for the position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is just one of the arguments why we set the amount of judicial salaries and make it so that they are not subject to change in that way, in order to maintain the integrity of the bench and its freedom from any control whatsoever on the part of the executive for the time being. That is recognized. I am sure the minister does not require any proof in constitutional works, but that is one of the main reasons given why their salaries shall be fixed by parliament and shall not be subject to the intermittent wishes of the government in power.

I have listened to the explanations given by the minister, and the last one was interesting. It apparently was that this is one of the first steps along the way of reform in bringing parliament to the position where it will do its work more expeditiously. In other words the minister indicated that if the power to fix salaries were left with parliament as in the past it would result in the delaying of parliamentary business. That is hardly an argument at all. Surely the minister and the government must have something in mind with regard to this change because on the face of it this has all the appearances of striking at the integrity and independence of the civil service commission, and placing the commission in a position where it will be subservient to the government in power.

Mr. McLure: When I referred to qualifications I had in mind qualifications for appointments to be made in the future. I have no objection to the qualifications of the present commissioners, and I do not want to be misunderstood in that regard. With respect to the question of the salaries of the commissioners, however, I take the same objection I did the other day when the salaries of certain court officials were being raised. I have pleaded on many occasions in the house for an increase in the amount paid to railway and other pensioners who are on a starvation allowance for the rest of their days. I could not get even a dollar for them, and I think the government is making a mistake in voting thousands of dollars to men who already have high salaries. They should give the money to those who need it at this time. They should pay it out of their wonderful $600 million surplus. These men should be given consideration as well as those in higher positions. The Minister of Transport and the Minister of Public Works know there are men retired from departments and organizations under their jurisdiction who have to get along on $28 to $39 a month. They have to live on it. On the other hand these salaries amount to over $50 a day.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I was glad the Minister of Public Works paid tribute as he did to the work of the present civil service commissioners. We all join with him in that tribute. We would like to make it clear that nothing we say in this debate either reflects on them in any way or raises any issue so far as the present incumbents are concerned. We are not even questioning the practice of the appointment of civil service commissioners being made by the government, any more than we question the practice of the government appointing the judges of this country.

But I want to say also, Mr. Chairman, that the issue in this debate as I see it is not the amount of the salaries that may be paid to the commissioners. My supposition is that after this bill has been passed and given royal assent, there will be increases for them. In view of the other increases being made, I do not doubt but what a case for such increases could be made. But that is not the issue. The issue is the way these salaries are determined. Should they continue to be determined as they have from the year one, by parliament through a proper statute, or should they be turned over to the cabinet for decision by the governor in council. The Minister of Public Works had a great deal to say about this in answer to our question. He has been drawn into the debate and drawn into making blunders, as he says. He has given what he said were his reasons. I have dealt only with what some of us on this side believe to be a cardinal principle, namely that the auditor general, the chief electoral officer, the board of transport commissioners, the judges, and the civil service commissioners should have their salaries fixed out in the open by parliament as a whole.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to ask the minister a question or two. Will he apply this argument which he wants us to accept for the civil service commissioners to the judges? The minister shakes his head. Then all I can say is that he has said nothing to make me understand why he would not do it in that case if he would do it in this case.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that the salaries of the ministers are fixed by statute. Would the minister consider an alteration in the law so that ministers of the crown could have their salaries fixed by themselves?

Mr. Hodgson: Following up what the hon. member for Lake Centre said, there is no doubt that the fellow who signs the cheque always has something to say—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Parliament signs the cheques for the money.

Mr. Hodgson: Parliament signs the cheques authorized by the cabinet.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But the estimates are approved by parliament.

Mr. Hodgson: If you will take section 38(c) out of the act—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are not discussing that.

Mr. Hodgson: The way it is now it really puts a ball and chain on the civil service commission.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

GRAIN

PROVISION FOR SHORT-TERM CREDIT TO PRODUCERS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to make provision for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties, arising from inability to complete harvesting operations or to make delivery of grain, through bank loans guaranteed by the crown with limitations including a limitation to the effect that the liability of the crown to pay losses will not exceed $5 million; moneys payable under the act to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there will not be time between now and the period of recess to make my full statement. If it meets with the approval of the members I should like to call it 6.15 and make my statement afterwards.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, as indicated by my own statement to the house on October 30, and again by the Prime Minister (Mr.

St. Laurent) on November 5, and in a further statement by myself on November 15, the government has under consideration the question of whether financial assistance to certain producers in the prairie provinces is necessary, and if so, the manner in which such assistance should be provided. I want to emphasize that in the government's consideration of this matter we have recognized a continuously changing position and a continuously narrowing need for temporary assistance.

It was considered by the government and it is considered throughout the prairie provinces that the major problem confronting western producers who have been unable to deliver significant quantities of grain in the present crop year will be met in the distribution of surpluses from the 1950-51 oats, barley and wheat pools. These payments will be completed within a few days and, as I have indicated to the house, have aggregated about $130 million. We must not underestimate the importance of these payments from the standpoint of improving the cash position of grain producers under the circumstances which have prevailed this fall.

The problem has also changed in that threshing has been proceeding in spite of adverse conditions, and the volume of unthreshed grain has been substantially reduced in the past four or five weeks, particularly in the province of Alberta. When I was in Alberta last week it was estimated that well over one-half the Alberta wheat crop had been threshed, and threshing was proceeding in many areas. In Saskatchewan, where threshing is still going on, 75 to 80 per cent of threshing is completed; and in Manitoba threshing is finished except for an area in the northwestern part of the province. In this respect, therefore, there has been some improvement, although many producers in Alberta and to a lesser extent in Saskatchewan have crops still in the fields.

The position has been changing in another respect. Up until October 25, producers in the prairie provinces had marketed 195 million bushels of grain. As at December 6 they had marketed 291 million bushels of grain, a very substantial increase in marketings over the past six weeks. These increased marketings have been made possible largely through shipments of grain out of country elevators. Up to October 25, shipments of grain out of country elevators had amounted to 150 million bushels. Up until December 6, shipments of grain from country elevators amounted to 241 million bushels. You can see, therefore, that in the last six weeks grain shipments out of country elevators amounted to 91 million bushels, and these shipments mean more opportunity for producers to deliver grain.

Since mid-October it has been necessary for the railways to concentrate their shipping to some extent at least on stocks of wheat which were most readily available to the lakehead and to the Pacific coast. This was necessary in order to meet urgent export commitments entered into by the Canadian wheat board. On November 21 it was possible for the wheat board to amend its shipping instructions and give a high degree of preference to the shipment of grain from delivery points which had been congested for some time, and to the shipment of tough and damp grain which producers had not been able to deliver in volume to their country elevators. Under these shipping instructions I am quite sure the delivery opportunity of many producers in the west is improving and will continue to improve. When you look at these developments, I think members of the house will agree with me that the need for some plan of interim financing for grain producers has steadily decreased and, of course, will continue to decrease as threshing and shipping of grain proceeds.

While in the west I also had a viewpoint expressed to me by producers themselves that while they have had an unfortunate fall in so many respects, they are able to carry on without difficulty after having experienced a series of fairly good crops and good prices for grain and livestock and livestock products.

In spite of all I have said there are producers who, because of delayed uncompleted threshing, have been able to deliver little or no grain this year, and there are also some producers whose deliveries have been restricted by lack of available storage space in country elevators. Therefore the government feels that a restricted problem does exist, and has decided to make advances available to producers in these circumstances. These advances will be made through the chartered banks. In seeking the proper course of action, discussions were held with country elevator operators in the three prairie provinces. The elevator companies were most helpful in their consideration of the problem, but the government has decided that it would be more appropriate to use existing financial institutions whose business it is to lend money rather than to ask the elevator companies to assume the responsibility of lending money provided under a government guarantee.

Under the plan which the government is proposing the banks will operate under an arrangement similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. That is, they will make loans on their own account to farmers, and the government will stand prepared to meet losses up to 25 per cent of the loans made. This guarantee is larger than under the Farm Improvement Loans Act because the risks are greater, and about the same as under the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. The banks will be able to call upon the government to implement its guarantee on October 1, 1952, after there has been an opportunity for deliveries to be made from the 1952 crop as well as the current crop. The loans should, however, be fully repaid out of the proceeds of the 1951 crop.

Since the loans are intended only to provide some cash for a limited period to those farmers who have been unable to deliver any significant volume of grain, it is proposed that the limit shall be $1,000 to any one farmer. In making individual loans, the banks will take into consideration the quantity of unthreshed or threshed grain which producers will have for delivery when their threshing is completed or when elevator space is available. The banks will also take into consideration deliveries which producers have already made in determining the amount of individual loans. Within the maximum provided, the amount of money which will be loaned in each individual case will be determined by the banks on the basis of their experience and judgment, and of course the banks will bear in mind the considerable guarantee which is being provided by the government of Canada. It is the intent of the plan that these temporary loans will be repaid just as fast as producers can deliver their grain.

May I conclude this explanation by saying that these loans are not in any sense to be regarded as a form of relief. They are interim advances made available at commercial rates of interest to producers who have grain on their farms or who have crops which they have every reason to believe will be harvested in due course.

I hope and believe that the provisions of the bill that will be founded on this resolution will solve the financial difficulties of those producers who have been unable to harvest and market sufficient of their crop to provide for their interim living expenses. I am happy to say that the number of producers in that position is growing smaller each day, but there are still certain areas where the credit to be made available will relieve a situation that might otherwise result in considerable hardship during the coming winter.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the minister respecting the advances to be made to western farmers has been long anticipated and long delayed. While welcoming the general principle in connection with the basis upon which these advances are to be made, having regard to the situation on the prairies, I think the amount of the guarantee by the government, $5 million, is palpably and obviously inadequate to meet the situation that exists. The maximum of $1,000 would appear to be fair and proper. However, the total amount of $5 million to be guaranteed to the extent of 25 per cent will not, as I see it, meet the situation on the prairies.

The minister is in a better position than a member of parliament, without the statistical and other information available to him, to see what the situation is. The minister has said that approximately 80 per cent of the crops on the prairies have been threshed in the province of Saskatchewan. I think the situation generally is this. The total percentage of grain that has been threshed is approximately 72 per cent, and about 28 per cent still remains either standing or unthreshed, about 13 per cent in the swath and 15 per cent still standing.

The minister has indicated that conditions have improved, and that as the weeks have gone by the situation, to use his words as I took them down, has been continuously changing and the need has been narrowing. True enough, the payment on account of the 1950-51 pool has been helpful in relieving the situation in many parts of the western provinces. But one cannot expect that the threshing will continue at the rate it has been proceeding in recent weeks. If my figures be correct they mean that almost 30 per cent of the wheat in the province of Saskatchewan, and I think generally speaking on the prairies, is unthreshed.

The minister mentioned that there are areas in which the farmers have been able to market but a small part of their production, first because their threshing or harvesting is not done, and second because of the shortage of available storage. That is true. While this is a step in the general direction that we on this side of the house have been advocating for the last two or three months, it does not go far enough and does not meet the situation that exists. I can see no risk in connection with loans on wheat in storage on the farms. Wheat is wealth. It is good security. That security can be taken by the bank at any time once the loan is made. There is no risk in the guarantee by the government of loans against wheat that is in storage.

For the last several months Mr. Alvin Hamilton, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Saskatchewan, has been advocating something very similar to what is now adopted by the minister, with this exception: that the amount should be at least twice if not three times that now to be guaranteed by the government in order adequately to meet the challenge to the economic solidarity of the western provinces.

The minister has mentioned that promises have been made from time to time that the problem would be considered. This is not a problem that has originated in the last few weeks. It is due in large measure—that is, excepting for climatic conditions that have prevented the harvesting of the crop in many areas—to the failure of the wheat board to realize that with over 100 million bushels of damp wheat in storage on the prairies from the 1950-51 crop, when this fall's crop became marketable there would be no available facilities for storage. The responsibility cannot be placed on the shortage of box cars, nor on any other explanation that has been made. It is not because of a shortage of railway transportation. I make that statement because of a joint statement that was issued on the tie-up in the movement of the present record crop, issued about September 20 by Mr. George McIvor, the chief commissioner of the wheat board, and Mr. R. W. Milner, the federal transport controller. In that statement the railways were not held responsible for the congestion. The railways were exonerated in these words:

> Full use cannot be made of presently available transportation and lake tonnage.

Then it points out:

> There is no lack of box cars.

The reason for the congestion is the large quantities of the 1950 frozen, low-grade wheat lying in the country elevators and in the terminal elevators at the head of the lakes, Montreal and Vancouver. Because of the unavailability of storage which should have been provided, farmers found themselves unable to market that which they had harvested, and climatic conditions accentuated the condition in that it prevented harvesting, threshing or combining in many areas on the prairies.

While a step has been made in the right direction, I feel that the amount of the guarantee holds out a greater hope than will be realized when the matter is actually applied and the loans given in accordance with the terms announced by the minister. I can see no reason why there should have been a restriction to $5 million; for, I repeat, I can see no risk so long as the advance—and I used the minister's word "advance"—is expressly made applicable to threshed and stored wheat.

Mr. Howe: I suggest to the hon. member that the full amount will not be used.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is possible because, after all, the banks are the ones that will determine whether or not any advances are made to the farmers; and if the banks have not felt like making advances up to the present time against the security, the 25 per cent guarantee will not result in the acceleration of any desire on the part of the banks to make loans at the present time. What the minister says may be perfectly true; no doubt it is.

I now come to another matter with which I had hoped the minister would deal, although he has denied on more than one occasion that the government had any intention of making payment to the farmers for the storage of wheat on their farms. Since he made those statements he has visited the western provinces. He attended the farmers union convention in Saskatoon. According to the press, he met them in a most congenial manner, and in keeping with his best tradition when meeting farm delegations. The farmers ask that payments be made for the storage of wheat on the farms. There would be no cost to the Canadian people in accepting that idea. After all, if it were not for the fact that the storage facilities in both the line elevators and the elevators at the head of the lakes were congested by unmarketable tough or frozen wheat of the 1950 crop, most farmers who did their threshing or combining this fall would have hauled their wheat to market immediately. I repeat that it was not a shortage of box cars but the allocation of available cars that resulted in the wheat being piled up on the farms.

If the wheat had been stored in the elevators the price the farmer would ultimately receive would have been subject to the deduction of the monthly amount allowed for storage. If the farmer stored the wheat on his farm he should be paid what otherwise would have been paid to the elevator companies. I know the government is adamant in this regard, but there is a strong feeling everywhere on the prairies that even at this late date something should be done to provide payment to the farmers for the storage of wheat on the farms.

I now come to the third matter, and that is in connection with the farmer who has not been able to thresh his crop, whose crop today is either standing in the fields or lying on the ground in swaths. I am not suggesting and I have not at any time suggested that there should be loans made on crops under those conditions, for there would be a considerable risk.

Mr. Howe: Yet we are doing it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the banks will make no advances against wheat lying on the ground, having regard to the probable toughness of that wheat next spring. I think in a case such as that there should be some provision whereby payments similar in nature to those under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act would be made available to farmers. I am sure of this, that if a farmer goes into the bank and says "I want to get an advance of up to $1,000 on 200 acres of wheat lying in swaths, and 100 acres that is standing unthreshed in the field," regardless of the 25 per cent guarantee on the part of the government that farmer will have made a fruitless visit to the bank, unless his credit is so high that the 25 per cent guarantee would not be necessary in any case. I am suggesting something in the nature of the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Legislation analogous to that would cover the situation.

I am not going further into the question at this time. Generally speaking what has been done is a step in the right direction. However, I do not think it holds out much hope for the western farmer who finds himself in a predicament today, first of all because of government failure to realize in May, June and July the probability that our crop would be one of the greatest in all history. Having realized that, one would expect the government to have made provision for the removal of many millions of bushels of wheat glutting the elevators, making those elevators available to the farmer for his marketing.

The situation is serious. The minister has seen it at first hand. No one who has not seen it can realize what it is. I have spoken to one or two members from Ontario who in recent months have travelled to the west, and they tell me that if they had not seen what they did see they could not have realized just how serious the situation is. What is being done through the announcement of policy by the minister I am sure will cause no loss to the Canadian treasury. It could have been brought into effect—I say it should have been—weeks ago. No doubt there would have been earlier consideration, had the event that took place about one week ago been set a month earlier. A step is being made in the right direction. I believe in commending where commendation is due. In making this criticism, I couple with it commendation of the government for having made provision, even though it is too little, and much too late.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in common with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has just taken his seat, I agree that this is a step in the right direction. As he has said, few people in eastern Canada realize the disappointment farmers in western Canada have faced in the last two years.

Last year we had one of the best crops we had ever grown, but we found in August that it had seriously deteriorated through frost. In fact the loss ran into millions of dollars. In the part of the country I represent many farmers did not realize anything from their crops. Large areas were completely frozen, and the crop had to be burned this spring.

This year our crop came through in most areas without serious damage from frost, though there were some isolated areas where the crops were frozen. But again we found we were unable to harvest this crop. In the northern part of the province, in the Carrot River valley, the northern part of the Meadow Lake country, and the Prince Albert country, we knew on November 15 there would be no more threshing. A large quantity of snow had fallen by that time, and it would have been most extraordinary indeed had we been able to thresh any of the crop that remained out. That was a large percentage of the crop. I believe I am speaking conservatively when I say that in that area only 40 per cent of the crop has been threshed, and 60 per cent is either lying in swaths under the snow or is still standing.

What will be realized from that, no one knows. Due to the fact that it was an extremely heavy crop, we do know that the chances of harvesting it in the spring will be that much less. The grain is lying on the ground so flat that, having regard to the state in which the snow will leave it in the spring, it is most doubtful whether it can be combined. As the minister has stated, it is true that the final payments by the wheat board for last year's crop will help a great deal in many areas, but there are many people who lost last year's crop and therefore have no payments coming from the wheat board.

In many areas in the northern parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta there are farmers on new land who have only from 20 to 100 acres under crop. The most they could receive from the payments on last year's wheat crop would be quite small.

I should like to say a word in commendation of the wheat board's method of handling grain. I think the wheat board did an excellent job in marketing the 1950 crop. I have heard it stated by many farmers in western Canada that if it had not been for the orderly marketing under the wheat board they would have received from 25 to 50 cents less per bushel for their lower grades. I think we should commend the wheat board for the manner in which they marketed last year's crop.

These final payments are not going to take care of the small farmer in the northern part of the provinces, nor do I think this loan will take care of him. In many cases the small farmers are some distance from the towns, and they have not been in the habit of getting loans from the bank. They have never been in the position where they could go to the banks and obtain loans because of their small acreages. Under this guarantee they will be able to go to the bank manager for the first time, but my opinion is that their chances of getting anywhere near the maximum loan will be small indeed.

I am afraid that in many cases they will be unable to repay it. I think some provision should be made whereby a farmer who had a total crop loss would not be asked to repay this loan. In many cases up there the crops are going to be a total loss, and that will mean the loan will have to be carried over for another year. As I say, I think where the crop is a total loss some provision should be made that it will not be necessary to repay the loan from the 1952 crop.

I am not so much worried about the farmer who has three, four, five or six hundred acres under crop because in most cases he can take care of himself. He will have payments coming from last year's crop and will be able to carry through, perhaps with a small loan which he would be able to get under this legislation. But I am afraid that many of these smaller farmers are not going to benefit from this loan because, as I said, they have not been in the custom of dealing with banks. The bank managers do not know them and do not know whether their land is good or not. Naturally they will hesitate to make loans to those people. The minister did not state what the interest rate on the loan would be but I suppose—

Mr. Howe: The commercial rate.

Mr. Wright: Five or six per cent when it is borrowed from the bank. Again I do not think that is sufficient, especially in the case of the small farmer whose crop was a total loss last year. The minister has indicated that he does not think the full amount guaranteed will be used. I think that will depend entirely upon the policy of the banks. If they are fairly liberal in making these loans, it is quite possible that the full amount will be used.

Mention has been made of small loans under the Veterans Land Act being similar to these, but I do not think they are. This is a different type of loan. Those other loans were not made to people who were suffering under the disabilities of the small farmers in the northern parts of the provinces. Not only should we have legislation on a more liberal basis; I think the government should have brought in legislation with regard to farm-stored grain. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) mentioned that, and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) brought in an amendment to the speech from the throne asking that there be an advance on farm-stored grain of up to 75 per cent of the initial payment. I believe if that type of legislation had been in effect we would have had a more orderly marketing of our crop than we have at the present time.

It is true that for the last two years the wheat board have been anxious to get deliveries of grain to meet their commitments and the necessity for this type of legislation has not been so apparent. But if we had had good weather this fall and had been able to thresh our crops in a normal way, a large percentage of that crop would have had to remain on the farm or there would have been one of the worst gluts that has ever occurred as far as transportation is concerned. Everyone would have been trying to market his grain just as quickly as he could. Until we have some permanent arrangement for payments on farm-stored grain that condition will prevail in any normal year. I ask the minister to give serious consideration to devising some method of making payments on farm-stored grain.

With regard to this particular piece of legislation, as I said before we are glad to have it. It will help in some cases, but I do not think it is going to help a great many of the farmers with small acreages who have not been dealing with banks and who are not known to the bank managers. Those bank managers will hesitate to make loans to them. If there were some provision that in the case of a total crop loss the loan would be paid in full out of the $5 million guarantee, then I think the banks would be freer in making loans to the type of person whom I am sure both the minister and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would like to see helped under this legislation. I ask them to give serious consideration to making some arrangement with the banks whereby those people who have a total crop loss will not have to repay their loans.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Like the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) who have preceded me, I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce

(Mr. Howe) has introduced this resolution tonight. I am only sorry it was not done five or six weeks ago. Had that been the case I believe many farmers would be enjoying a much happier Christmas than they will be able to do under present circumstances.

Many people do not realize that in large areas in the prairie provinces this is the second year in succession when crops have been lost during the winter months. The minister has stated that conditions are changing continually, but I do not think they are improving very much in many sections of the country. I understand that some threshing has been carried out during recent weeks in the southern part of Alberta, but they have the chinooks down there which are frozen up by the time they get to the northern part of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. As far as I know very little threshing has been done in my part of the country, and I am not as far north as many other farmers. The final payment on the 1950 crop has helped to a considerable extent, but here again I think many hon. members do not realize that the farmers were in debt and have been waiting for some little time to pay off their debts with the 1950 final payment. Therefore that money will not last long. It is all promised to merchants and others. Perhaps it will have to be used for paying back taxes. Therefore nothing will be left to take care of 1951 crop expenses. Many people also do not realize that the farmer's crop is his pay cheque for the whole year. By some method he has to finance the putting in and taking off of his crop and so on, and until he receives payment for his grain he is not in a very happy position.

I realize that shipments of several million bushels have been made recently, but so far as the farmers are concerned in most cases they received payment on that grain some time ago. That will not help them to a very great extent. The minister also stated that many farmers are able to carry on because they have had good crops and good prices. I think the minister knows a little better than to try to tell us that the farmers have had good prices in the past. Perhaps they are good when compared with the depression years of the thirties, but if the minister or anybody else will consider the cost of the things the farmer has to buy in order to produce then it should not be hard to understand that grain prices are away below what they should be.

With respect to loans, I feel that the banks are the proper agency to make them. It has been suggested by some that the Canadian wheat board should advance loans to farmers. If that proposition had been put forward I would have likely been the first to say we should not do business that way. The business of the wheat board is selling grain, not carrying into effect emergency policies of the government or other matters of that kind. Concerning the amount of the loan, $1,000 to each farmer, I am not quite sure whether that will be sufficient in some cases. In most cases I believe it will be, but I think the bank managers, who are experts in their fields, should be given some leeway in order that they might extend a little more credit to a farmer who had a good crop but has not been able to harvest any of it.

In the past bank managers have been doing a good job so far as guessing what the farmer will do is concerned because they do not only take his assets into consideration. They also consider his record of past performance. If he has been doing his job and repaying his loans in the past then I think the government might allow a little leeway over and above the $1,000. Where a farmer's crops are under snow at the present time, in addition to having the expenses of that crop he will have to have enough money to buy seed for the 1952 crop. If I were sowing seed again on the land I do not think I would take a chance on grain that had been under the snow all winter. That means the farmer has to have the cash to buy his seed somewhere else.

I am also glad the minister made it plain that this is an interim advance and not a gift to the farmer, because many people are ready to jump at any excuse to pin something on the farmer when it comes to receiving money from the Dominion of Canada. If the farmers were given full credit I think it would be established that they are the ones who have been making gifts to the rest of Canada rather than accepting them in the past. I believe figures can be produced to demonstrate that fact. The farmers are honest. I believe their record is as good as that of any other occupational group. A return brought down recently having to do with farmers' income tax showed that in the years 1945 to 1950 inclusive only two prosecutions took place for evasion of income tax and just one conviction was secured. That indicates they are honest.

Some farmers will be unfortunate enough to lose their crops. Before they can be harvested in the spring they may be flooded out or destroyed by mice or other animals. In that case I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that P.F.A. or some such assistance be granted to them.

When the minister was in Calgary and Saskatoon recently he made two statements with which I cannot agree. One had to do with the recent $65 million gift to the farmers of the prairie provinces. The minister realizes quite well that if the farmers had been paid the class II price for their grain during the period covered by the $65 million they would have had another $367 million in addition to the $65 million. In the same period they also subsidized Canadian consumers by supplying wheat to the millers at a price below what they would have received for it as class II wheat, and another $137 million should be added for that.

I believe these things should be taken into consideration when dealing with the problems of the farmers. In Saskatoon the minister said he would refuse to change the domestic price. He may have also said that in Calgary, but I did not see that report. I think we should no longer ask the farmers to give one-third of the price of their wheat to the Canadian consumer. Absolutely no case can be put up to support such a policy. I hope the government will change it without delay, and give the farmers what they are entitled to for their grain. Everybody realizes that the cost of machinery, wages and everything else for which the farmer has to pay has increased by 200 to 300 per cent over the past years. If we had had the kind of policy we should have had most of our farmers would have had a little reserve set aside so that a crop failure in one year would not have put them in the circumstances in which they find themselves at the present time. I may have more to say on this matter when we get into committee.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say that I think this is a step in the right direction, but like previous speakers I believe the provision is quite inadequate. Today I have been studying the report of the dominion bureau of statistics issued on December 13, 1951, dealing with the value of the wheat crop by provinces. Based on their figures the preliminary payment for wheat would indicate a value all told in the three prairie provinces of approximately $600 million. That is on the basis of the initial payment. As I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), he said that about half the crop was still out in Alberta, 25 per cent in Saskatchewan and a very little in Manitoba. On the basis of these figures founded on the initial price this would mean that the value of the crop still unharvested is approximately $175 million.

Therefore hon. members will readily see that the guarantee of $5 million is less than 3 per cent of the value of the crop which farmers still have unharvested. It is very small. The minister said that prevailing commercial rates of interest would apply, and I presume that the rate of interest will be set out in the bill when we receive it. I would think it should be. I agree with previous speakers that there will be many small farmers, who really need assistance, who will find difficulty in obtaining a loan from the banks. The minister says he does not believe the $5 million will be taken up, and that might well be so. In my opinion many of the needy farmers will be unable to obtain assistance under this scheme. Officials of the minister's department and others claim that we are going to experience difficulty in transporting our grain because of our present method of harvesting. It is said that the situation in the last two years is not temporary, and that we shall have to revamp our whole system in taking care of future crops. If that be true, and I think it is, then the government should give serious thought to assisting the farmers in storing the grain on their own farms.

As I have pointed out in previous statements in this house, we have the experience of our neighbours to the south who receive loans on farm-stored grain. In fact the United States has already advised the farmers that the initial payment, based on 90 per cent of parity, will be $2.18; and this crop has not yet been seeded. For 1952 no quota is being placed on the acreage because the United States wants full production. The farmers are going to be guaranteed $2.18 a bushel on properly stored grain, plus monthly storage up until April. After that they can turn the crop over to the government or they can sell it at the prevailing market price and pay off the loan. The market price is very much higher than the guaranteed loan of $2.18 per bushel. As at present the federal treasury of the United States pays that difference to the farmers, and it is a very great difference. In fact the difference between what the United States farmer receives in North Portal as an initial price and what the Canadian farmer receives is $1.07 and a fraction per bushel. On December 4 the United States farmer would receive $2.30, on the street at North Portal for a certain grade of grain, while his Canadian neighbour would receive as an initial payment $1.23. That is a great difference.

Our good friends from Ontario receive considerably more than $2 per bushel for their wheat today because they do not sell through the wheat board. The market is higher than that. I feel that, because of the trend that has taken place in Canada over the past few years, our government should give consideration to the United States system. It is true, as some people would argue, that under this storage system one farmer will simply be paying another for storage through our pooling system. But that is the case today, as the cost of storage paid to the elevators is pooled through the wheat board in many cases.

I think this should be given serious consideration. I know the minister and those people who have been out west will realize that the situation is very much better in Manitoba than in Saskatchewan or Alberta. They will realize how serious it is for these people who have their grain out under the snow. Our sympathies are with them, because they are going to experience considerable hardship. They have their year's expenses to meet. This year the cost of production has been higher than for any year in the history of this country. While we shall have statistics issued showing the great national income of the farmers this year, it should be pointed out that their cost of production has been considerably higher than in any previous year. The cost of farm implements has increased in 1951 by 14 per cent over 1950. In fact there has been an increase of 81 per cent above the level of 1939. The price of fuel oil is increasing, and farm wages are much higher than ever before in the history of this country. All of these factors must be taken into consideration.

I just wanted to make these few remarks at this time. I shall have a few questions to ask when we have the bill before us, but I do request the minister and his officials to give serious study to the possibility of introducing more comprehensive legislation that will assist in the marketing of next year's crop. The departmental officials claim that because of our system of handling grain we are going to have greater difficulties than we have experienced in the past, so thought should be given to that problem.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Along with other hon. members I want to say that I welcome the announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), concerning the steps the government is prepared to take to deal with the emergency situation in western Canada. As is well known, the problem has two parts. The first is the difficulty of marketing the grain the farmers were able to thresh, and the second is the difficulty the farmers had in threshing their grain. In some parts of the country large acreages are still lying under the snow. The box car situation has indeed been very difficult. At some points in western Canada, as the minister stated tonight, very little grain has been moved. I do want to say that I am pleased that the government appointed a controller. Any shortage of box cars at any particular point which has been brought to Mr. Milner's attention has been dealt with in an expeditious manner. I believe the fact that we have a controller is of material help to western farmers.

So far as I am concerned, I am not in agreement that this was the best method of handling this difficult situation. It seems to me that when any farmer goes to a bank manager to ask for credit, the bank manager must of necessity apply a means test to the farmer's application. In other words if the farmer can show the bank manager that he is a good credit risk, that he has cattle at home on the farm or that he has some grain which he has not been able to sell, the bank manager will likely grant his loan. If he is a small farmer who has been unable to harvest any of his crop, he is the type of farmer the bank manager is most likely to refuse. I believe the best method of handling this situation, which is an emergency situation, would have been to make advances through the elevator companies at the local points, with the government paying the interest and guaranteeing the wheat board against possible loss.

Every farmer in western Canada has to market his grain on his delivery quota book. I believe that farmers are basically honest, and when they have to market their grain on their own delivery quota book the elevator companies would be in the best position to collect the advance. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the premier of Saskatchewan, and I would even go so far as to say the municipal officials, the representatives of the federation of agriculture, together with the leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Walter Tucker, believed the government was going to handle this situation by advances made through the wheat board facilities. I have here a press report which appeared in the Leader-Post of Thursday, December 6, of a statement made by the premier of Saskatchewan to the Saskatchewan legislature. The report is as follows:

> Every likelihood exists that an advance will be paid farmers for unharvested unthreshed grain on their farms, Premier T. C. Douglas told the legislature Wednesday.
> Under such a system, Mr. Douglas said, a record would be kept at the elevator and the payment checked off when the grain was delivered.
>
> A payment of this nature would be different from a loan, he said. It would be treated as an advance and there would be no interest.

The premier said Trade Minister C. D. Howe was expected to make a statement either when he was in the west on a current trip or when he returned to the east.

If an announcement was not made on advance payments at the elevator for undelivered grain, he continued, then a move would be made toward a second proposal.

The second proposal the premier outlined was the proposal for loans to farmers guaranteed by the municipalities, the provincial government and the federal government. But the premier of Saskatchewan, because of the discussions he had with the Minister of Agriculture when the minister made his trip to Saskatchewan, was able to say in the Regina legislature that he felt, following those discussions, that the most likely way it would be done was by advances through the wheat board; and the premier of Saskatchewan supported that kind of policy. The press report goes on:

Opposition leader Walter Tucker said he agreed the advance payment proposal seemed to be the better of the alternatives.

It seemed, he said, to be a "very rational solution or partial solution." Many people would be preferring this to going to the banks and municipalities.

Mr. Tucker said he had made representations to federal authorities to have storage paid farmers who store their own grain at least this year and perhaps as a permanent policy. He had suggested some system of advance.

He believed some thought should be given to payment for farm storage.

I think, in this situation, the Minister of Agriculture knew the best type of policy to deal with the matter. I believe, from the report I have just read to the house, that an advance through the wheat board was the basis on which the discussion was held in Regina. I know, from the statement, that was the premier's impression, and that such a policy had the support of the leader of the opposition. In the resolution the government proposes to guarantee the banks against loss up to an aggregate of $5 million, by guaranteeing 25 per cent of the aggregate loans up to $20 million.

In my opinion, if one read this resolution without knowing the situation in western Canada one might have thought it to be a measure of assistance to the banks in western Canada rather than one of assistance to the farmers. The farmers are not going to get anything for nothing. They are going to have to pay the full commercial rate of interest. The banks are going to get a good return on their loans; and if they have any loss, they are going to have that loss paid by the federal government.

I believe there was a method by which the government could have provided some additional payments to farmers who have undelivered or unharvested grain, that would not have cost the government of Canada a single dollar and still would have more than covered the interest rate that farmers will have to pay. I refer to the payment of farm storage. The elevator companies now receive farm storage from the Canadian wheat board. They are paid at the rate of one-thirtieth of a cent a bushel per day. The elevator companies are now paid 1 cent per bushel per month as a storage payment. That works out to 12 cents per bushel per year. If the average value of the grain on which they were paid storage was $1.00 a bushel, that payment amounts to an interest rate of 24 per cent. If the value of the grain, shall we say, was $1.20 a bushel, then storage at the rate of 12 cents per bushel per year is equivalent to an interest rate of 20 per cent.

I think the farmer who is unable to deliver his grain or who is unable to harvest his grain is entitled to that storage payment. The wheat board made a storage payment some years ago; I believe it was about 1942, during the war, when there was a serious marketing difficulty. Administratively it was exceedingly simple for the wheat board to make that storage payment. All the wheat board had to do was periodically make a small advance in the initial payment for wheat, equivalent to the storage charge. If there had been in the initial price a gradual increase equivalent to the storage charge, the farmer who threshed his grain in the spring, and who had to go all fall and winter without a great deal of revenue, would have more revenue in the spring than he would have had in the fall, on the equivalent number of bushels, to an amount sufficient to cover any loans he might have had to make.

I am glad the government has had the wheat board send out the final payments on wheat, oats and barley. The fact that those final payments were made at an early date and that they were highly satisfactory, when one considers all the difficult circumstances under which the board had to operate, accounts in large measure, I think, for the favourable vote in Manitoba on the coarse grains plebiscite.

I can remember that in the wheat board debate last year I moved an amendment asking the government to wind up the pools within sixty days of the end of the crop year. The minister at that time said the idea of having power to wind up the pool year in a short time was mainly to handle, as he called it, dribs and drabs that had not been sold; in other words, a few million bushels of grain. I am glad the minister has had wound up the oat, barley and wheat pools a short time after the end of the crop year. I think that is the way it should be handled. I hope that next year, the year after, and the following year the government will consider as a precedent the good job the minister has done in that respect this fall, and will continue to pay out whatever balance there is in the various pools at the end of the crop year, and to make those payments before the beginning of the next calendar year. In his statement tonight the minister said the total of these final payments amounted to some $130 million. He added to that, as far as farm income is concerned, the returns farmers received from having marketed in the present crop year, that is up until December 6, some 291 million bushels of grain. The farmers of western Canada have $130 million as the final payment from the various pools. They have the proceeds of 291 million bushels of grain. I would take it that from all these sources western farmers have received this fall something in the neighbourhood of $400 million.

Mr. Howe: That is correct; yes.

Mr. Argue: The minister says that is a correct statement. I now come to this, Mr. Speaker. The most the banks can lend under this measure is $20 million, which is just 5 per cent of the money the farmers have already received. It would seem to me that if half the crop in Alberta, or nearly half, is still unthreshed, if 20 or 25 per cent of the crop is still unharvested in Saskatchewan, loans amounting to 5 per cent of the total amount of money the farmers have already received will be insufficient to assist in an adequate way those farmers who have been unable to harvest and market their crops.

Most of the suggestions that were made in western Canada in the last two months as to an adequate advance on unthreshed grain amounted to a figure of $10 an acre. If that was a reasonable figure—and it seemed reasonable to me—the $1,000 limit means the farmer who is able to satisfy the bank manager that he is a good risk will be able to get an advance equal to $10 an acre on a hundred acres of crop. The basis on which the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is operated is more generous than that, in that payments are made on one-half the cultivated land up to 400 acres, or payments are made on up to 200 acres of crop. I believe the $1,000 loan the farmer can obtain under this provision is too little for the majority of those farmers who have been unable to harvest their crops. I do not make that statement because I want to criticize this measure. I do so because I do not think $1,000 goes very far on a farm. A thousand dollars does not go very far for anyone, even if their only expense is that of living and providing for their families. The farmer has additional expenses. Most farmers have incurred obligations all through the summer to the local storekeeper and the local fuel dealer. Most farmers now have very large obligations to implement companies. When one considers that, along with these obligations, the farmer will have to provide for his own family's living expenses and other farm expenses, the $1,000 ceiling to my mind is too low. I think the ceiling should have been not less than $2,000.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I want to impress upon the minister my conviction, for what it is worth, that there should be provision for farm storage. It has been said over and over again that it would not cost the federal treasury a single dollar. If one farmer, because of bad weather conditions, because there is a shortage of box cars, cannot deliver his grain in the fall, I believe he should be entitled to a slightly higher initial payment next spring or early next summer when he does deliver his crop. The elevator companies are now given 1 cent per bushel per month as storage. It has been sufficient to encourage the elevator companies to build large annexes and other additional storage. Out of that 1 cent per bushel per month they have been able to finance the investment cost, cover depreciation and cover interest on the capital investment. If it is fair to pay farm storage to elevator companies it should be fair likewise to pay farm storage to farmers. If that provision were made, Mr. Speaker, then the commercial interest rate that the banks will charge for the loans made under this measure would not be a burden on the farmer. I also think the government should consider—and I hope they will—making a 75 per cent advance on farm-stored grain, not only as an emergency policy for this year but also as a good permanent piece of legislation.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, I welcome the legislation. I would prefer to have seen advances made through the elevator companies at no interest charge to the farmer. But to assist the farmer to pay the interest under the present measure I hope the government will make provision for the payment of farm storage which would be more than sufficient to cover the 5 or 6 per cent rate of interest payable to the banks.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Since I may not have an opportunity to say a few words when the bill is introduced I should like to take a few minutes now. I am neither a western farmer, a grain grower nor an eastern farmer, but I have listened to the appeals that have been made here since the session began and my sympathies are certainly with the farmer in the condition in which he finds himself in western Canada. After all, we must look after the farmer. I view the occupation he is engaged in as a great work for the benefit of us all. The farmer is the greatest gambler of any man in business, in the professions or in anything else we have in our communities. He gambles from the time the seed is put in the ground. He gambles on whether he is going to get the proper soil productivity, and also on whether he is going to get good cultivation of the soil. He goes right on gambling to the time of harvesting. He gambles on weather conditions, and worst of all he has to gamble on marketing conditions. Well, it is not quite so bad gambling on the market conditions in the east as it is in the west, because in the east the farmer uses his own experience and smaller organizations in marketing his products. But in western Canada the government takes charge of the marketing conditions, and according to the report we had last year it lost a good deal of money. Someone repeated the statement tonight that the wheat growers, through marketing conditions set up by the government, lost about $300 or $400 million.

Mr. Howe: I thought we settled all that in the Manitoba plebiscite.

Mr. Sinnott: That is nonsense.

Mr. Blackmore: It is not nonsense.

Mr. McLure: I am only saying what western members have said. I, for one, supported the $65 million they got from our treasury last year. I am not making any complaint about that. My sympathy goes out to them again on this occasion, and I am pleased that some guarantee is being given them so they can be ready for the crop season. And, instead of making it a short-term credit, why not make it for a longer term, so they will have a chance to get along until the crop is taken off?

I should like to add some personal observations, the first of which would be that while the farmer is a gambler, the fisherman is a real runner-up. I am proud to see the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) in his seat, after escaping from the communists in Korea. I know he will appreciate what I am going to say about the poor fishermen in my own locality. Last November there was a very heavy storm in that area, with winds reaching a velocity of 70 miles an hour, with extra high tides which broke up practically all the breakwaters, so that the waters flooded in over the beaches and around the homes of the fishermen. It invaded their fishing shanties and their equipment. A large percentage of that equipment was a total loss, so the fishermen are left without the security that would permit them to ask for a loan.

I bring this to the attention of the minister. When we are voting money for the western farmers I suggest something could be done for those fishermen. I know the machinery has already been set up in the Department of Fisheries, so it would take the burden of administration off the shoulders of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). This would cost only a few thousand dollars, as compared with the millions that would go to the west. Further, it could be operated through the fishermen's loans board which is already set up. I know the minister would find, upon investigation, that the loss suffered by these poor people has been very great. I know some of them whose homes have been disrupted. They had to leave their homes during the storm. Their shanties, buildings, machinery, equipment, boats, traps, rope and all other gear were lost. Some of it was beaten by the waves against the rocks. Surely those fishermen are deserving of some consideration at the hands of the government. If we are to be generous to the western farmers, then I want to see the fishermen of my constituency in Prince Edward Island receive what is properly their due.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Wright: I should like to pursue the matter of interest rates on these loans. I must admit that it is some time since I have done any commercial borrowing from the banks. For a good many years I knew well what their rate of interest was on loans. The minister has said that it will be the commercial rate. Is that 6 per cent?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is now discussing the details of the bill. When it is before the house, all that will be set out. I do not think that at this stage I should discuss what is in the bill.

Mr. Wright: I am only asking the commercial rate of interest at the moment. A principle is involved. The minister suggested that it was something the same as the loans under the small loans legislation for veterans. It will be recalled that in that instance we guaranteed the banks against certain losses; and because of those guarantees the banks made those loans at less than the commercial rate of interest.

In this instance we are guaranteeing a much higher loss than we guaranteed under the measure which dealt with the veterans. I think the same consideration should be given in this instance. If the banks are being guaranteed up to the total of $5 million, or 25 per cent of their loss, then I think there should be some consideration by way of a rate of interest lower than the commercial rate. It does not seem to me that the financial institutions of this country should be in the position of reaping a harvest out of every disaster in Canada. This was a disaster. In a large part of the western provinces the crop was not harvested this year. I certainly think the rate of interest should be lower than the commercial rate.

Mr. Quelch: Perhaps the minister would wish to wait until we reach the committee stage of the bill before he answers, but I would ask how loans will be averaged among the various banks. Will it be left to the banks to allocate the amounts among themselves, or will the government allot a certain amount to each bank?

I think the thousand-dollar average would be satisfactory in many instances, because it will carry the farmer who would not have any money at all. There will be many farmers who will borrow perhaps only a portion of the $1,000. On the other hand there will be a few who will require considerably more than that amount. I am thinking of those who are in the unhappy position of having their total crop under snow. If a farmer is farming 600 acres it would mean that in the spring he must purchase more than 700 bushels of seed wheat at a cost of perhaps $1,500. So the $1,000 would not begin to meet his cost of seed, let alone any other expenses. I should hope it would be possible to allow a certain amount of leeway to meet a situation of that kind.

Mr. Howe: It is not the intention that these loans shall take over the financing of all western Canada. They are loans extended on rather sketchy security—that is, security of crops which may be in the fields, and may be subject to all sorts of damage in the winter time. The intention is to provide enough to look after the living expenses of the farmer. It is not intended that we will provide money to pay his debts, or—

Mr. Quelch: His seed is most important.

Mr. Howe: We hope it will take care of seed. But there are always provisions to take care of seed. My hon. friend and I, as long as we have been in the house, have known of provisions for seed on a good many occasions. I do not think the farmer will be let down so far as his seed is concerned.

It is suggested that these loans should carry a special rate of interest that would be lower than the commercial rate. Inevitably that would mean that farmers who have perfectly good credit at the banks, and have been using it for years, would drop the private credit they have always enjoyed and make use of this special credit. That is not our desire. This is to be a loan for a short period of two or three months and no more, with the rate of interest about 5 per cent.

Mr. Quelch: The minister means more than that, surely.

Mr. Howe: Loans will be put out beginning January 1 and will stop, I would think, in May and will become due as the grain is marketed. If the farmer does not market some of his grain by the first of May he is not going to have much seeding done for next year.

Mr. Quelch: There is a lot of this grain that will not be threshed until June. Last year, in the area around Hanna, there were a few farmers who were not able to thresh grain until after their seeding operations had been completed; they were threshing up until July. Provision will have to be made so that loans may be continued until the farmer has done his threshing. Much depends upon the type of spring you have. If the snow goes early, threshing can be completed before seeding, but it is not often that we have a spring like that. I should imagine that a lot of the crop may not be threshed until after seeding.

Mr. Howe: I did not intend to say that we were going to call the loans on the first day of May. As a matter of fact they may run until October before they are in default. But it is not intended to make any new loans after May 1 or June 1. Again we are discussing the bill, which we can do much better when it is before us. We are in position to lend $1,000 to 20,000 farmers. Many of those farmers will have marketed some of their grain. I spoke to groups of farmers all across the prairies, and most responsible farm leaders agreed with me that $20 million would be more than ample. If we are wrong, parliament will be in session next spring and the situation can be corrected. This is intended to take care of a situation, and if we are wrong it will have to be corrected.

Mr. Fair: I am glad to hear the minister say he intends to take care of the situation.

Mr. Sinnott: The Liberal party always takes care of the situation.

Mr. Fair: How long has the hon. member been in the Liberal party? How many parties was he in before he got in the Liberal party?

Mr. Quelch: This will not allow the farmers sufficient time to complete their threshing.

Many of them will not get any payments out of the 1951 crop, and many will not have their crops threshed by that time. The time should be extended to November 15, because to stop payments on October 1 will create hardship on many farmers.

Mr. Howe: I do not think it is fair to be discussing the bill when it is not before us.

Mr. Argue: I was glad to hear the minister say that if the $20 million or the $5 million guarantee was not sufficient, the situation would be corrected during the session next spring. I wonder if the government still has under consideration the matter of paying farm storage. If the wheat board paid farm storage, a slight increase in the initial price would enable these farmers to pay the interest on their loans.

Mr. Howe: I do not mind saying a word on that. To me farm storage is the most fallacious nonsense in the world for improving the lot of the farmer. Who is it that pays farm storage? It is the farmer. He pays it to himself. My hon. friend is practically suggesting that when delivery of grain is made, say in March, instead of getting $1.20, which probably would be due on No. 1 northern wheat, the farmer would get $1.24. All right, that is 4 cents he is ahead there. But when he gets his final payment he is going to find that 4 cents is deducted. All he gets is 4 cents a little bit earlier.

If we changed the interim payment and made it 24 cents instead of 20 cents the result would be practically the same. After all, in a normal season every farmer has the right to market the same amount of wheat as every other farmer under the quota system. Therefore every farmer has about the same proportion of his grain to carry over a period. Some farmers do so deliberately, because they want to be sure they will have grain until they know how their crops are coming along in the next season.

A great deal of grain is marketed in June and July, as my hon. friend knows. One of the difficulties faced by a handling pool is that you get so much late-marketed grain. The payment of storage encourages the holding of grain on the farm, and with a short crop that would be most embarrassing indeed. The purpose of the wheat board is to sell grain just as fast as they can find markets and it is most important that the grain be in the elevators where the wheat board has it under its control.

When you set up a system of farm storage it is not just for one year, it usually becomes a permanent situation. It could be a situation that would react against the farmer. After all, the wheat board is only the agent of the farmer and if the wheat board gets in trouble, the farmer for whom the wheat board is agent is also in trouble. I travelled across the prairies and talked to farm leaders everywhere, and it was not until I reached Saskatoon that I got any indication of any interest whatever in farm storage. I think any thoughtful representative of the farmers would know that the holding out of the payment of farm storage to farmers, knowing that the farmers would be paying the storage to themselves, is misleading the farmers as to their best interests.

Mr. Argue: I take issue with the minister in his argument on farm storage. I do not think it is fallacious nonsense, and I do not think that anyone who proposes farm storage is misleading the farmers. The minister knows that at one elevator point there may be lots of box cars, there may be ample room, there may be no quota and the farmers may be able to haul out a large part of their grain. At some other point the situation may be entirely different. I know farmers in my own constituency who were unable to deliver a bushel of last year's grain until February or March. I do not think farm storage is fallacious at all; I think it is only justice that the farmer who cannot market his grain—that is the situation now for a great many farmers—should get some compensation for being forced to store that grain on the farm. After all, the elevator companies get it and it is the farmers' money that pays the elevator companies. I see no reason why the farmer who cannot sell his grain should not get farm storage.

I think the minister's suggestion that because it is done in any one year it will become a permanent policy, that the government will have to keep on doing it, is fallacious nonsense, if the minister will pardon my using that term, because the government can change its policy in connection with wheat very quickly, as has happened in the past. The wheat board paid it around 1942 and they did not continue that policy.

We have had two bumper crops. Let us assume that those two bumper crops are marketed and that next fall the terminals are empty and there is lots of room in the country elevators in western Canada. Then, as the minister said, we may have a short crop. I think the minister has a much better argument against farm storage in a situation like that. As to the situation this year, it was the government's policy, as the minister has said to us in the house, to move grain early in the year from Manitoba and Alberta, where it was available, to seaboard and to the lakehead. Those farmers were able to sell their grain, but farmers in Saskatchewan were not able to sell their grain to the same extent. If storage were paid it would merely be a redistribution of wheat board moneys. In the present situation I think it would be a fairer basis than paying storage only to elevator companies.

Mr. Wright: There is another way in which I think the minister's statement was fallacious. He stated it would amount to the farmer paying storage to himself. That is perfectly correct, but storage is paid whether or not the farmer pays it to himself. It is paid to the elevator company, and that is exactly why the farmer thinks he should have it. The grain remains in storage and storage is paid on it, but it is paid to the elevator company.

Mr. Jutras: Not for grain held on the farm, anyway.

Mr. Wright: Pardon?

Mr. Jutras: There is no storage paid on grain held on the farm, anyway.

Mr. Wright: There is none now, no. It is paid on what goes through the elevator companies. If storage were paid on farm-stored grain that amount would go to the farmers instead of to the elevator companies.

Mr. Jutras: Millions of bushels are marketed in the spring. There is no storage paid on that.

Mr. Wright: That is right. There is no storage paid on what is on the farm normally, but as to any amount over and above what is normally held on the farm, the storage would be paid to the elevator companies and they get the benefit of it unless the farmer is a member of a pool, when of course he gets it back.

Mr. Sinnott: I should like to ask a question of the hon. member who has just sat down, in order to be helpful. Does he not think if farm storage were paid there would be a tendency for the farmer to hold grain back on his farm until the latter part of the marketing season in order to gain that storage money for himself? That would then bring about far worse conditions for moving that grain.

Mr. Argue: A question like that is not very sensible at a time when the farmer cannot market his grain.

Mr. Sinnott: On a question of privilege, I did not ask the hon. member for Assiniboia; I asked the hon. member for Melfort.

Mr. Argue: Then you will get two answers.

Mr. Sinnott: I cannot comprehend fully the answer the hon. member gave.

Mr. Wright: I do not think payment of storage on farm-stored grain would make very much difference in the amount of grain coming forward. I do not think there are many farmers who would simply hold their grain on the farm for the purpose of getting the one cent storage on it. In the first place not many farmers are in a position to hold it if they can market it, but if they have to hold it they should get something on it.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Sinnott: I am not going to sit down. I am going to say what I have to say. I want to make this clear. We all want to finish the discussion of the resolution but I want to have this point cleared up first. It is quite clear that farmers, mostly in Saskatchewan where there are big farms, hold back their grain purposely to avoid having the income tax all coming in one year.

Mr. Argue: Has the government given any consideration to making the 25 per cent guarantee applicable to credit unions? We have a number of large credit unions in Saskatchewan and in other provinces of western Canada, that have been most successful. They are engaged day to day in the lending business. Has any consideration been given to extending to them the same guarantee as to the banks?

Mr. Howe: A good deal of consideration was given to who would do the lending. At first we thought the logical agency would be the elevator companies, and I must say the Saskatchewan pool was very co-operative in agreeing to arrange that and share part of the loss. However, on going into the situation it was found there were protests that elevator agents were not in the habit of filling out forms, that they were not bankers and were terrifically busy doing the job of running the country elevators. There was only one agency that was favourable to that plan. We gave it up as impractical. Then we looked at other sources of lending and decided that the chartered banks were the logical agencies. They undertook to do the job, somewhat reluctantly it is true; they agreed to carry out the letter and spirit of the act. I think the suggestions that have been made that the banks will not do a thorough job in looking after the needs of western Canada under this legislation are unfounded. We cannot go beyond the chartered banks. There are reasons for that. It is not possible to extend the same lending privilege to the credit unions, and I do not think it is necessary for this very short term financing.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I want to ask a question that has a bearing on farm storage. Is it not a fact that a certain amount of grain is carried for a while in the terminals and the expense is pooled to all wheat producers in the final settlement through the wheat board? There are certain charges at the terminal elevators that are ultimately pooled to all producers through the wheat board.

Mr. Howe: Storage in country elevators and in terminals at Fort William is a charge on the wheat board. Of course when the wheat gets beyond Fort William storage is a charge on the purchaser.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 44, to provide for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to complete harvesting operations or to make delivery of grain.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I ask hon. members if they will agree to let us pass the resolution under item 14 on the order paper. This is the measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures not exceeding a certain amount. If we could secure agreement to pass the resolution we would have the bill tomorrow and I would put it on the order paper for tomorrow. I think it is largely a formal resolution, and I believe the debate could take place tomorrow if the financial critic of the opposition will agree.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The resolution appears to follow the usual form, and I do not see any reason why we should not let it pass tonight.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR AUTHORIZATION TO MAKE CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, TO ISSUE SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures not exceeding $55,581,816 for the purpose of meeting the commitments that have been incurred by the national railway system in the year 1951 in respect of new equipment; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of securities, not including any securities issued to secure temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance, outstanding at any time shall not exceed $55,581,816; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $55,581,816 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I notice that the minister is not here. I think that any questions I wish to ask can be asked when we see the bill.

Mr. Adamson: Does this represent any new construction, or is it just to cover the annual deficit?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is just the annual financing bill for the Canadian National. I believe it is in the same form as the bill which comes up every year.

Mr. Adamson: I wondered whether it represented any new construction.

Mr. Howe: It covers the program of car building which is the usual capital expenditure of the Canadian National Railways.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain commitments for new equipment incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1951, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take up third reading of the two bills we passed this afternoon concerning the national gallery and the Civil Service Act; then the bill based on the resolution of the Minister of Finance concerning the Canadian National, which we just passed. I do not know if we can proceed with the first item, because I do not know if we shall have sufficient copies of the bill. However, I hope to have them tomorrow. Then we shall take up Bill No. 25, an act to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada; Bill No. 26, an act to amend the Public Works Act; Bill No. 15, an act to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; Bill No. 18, an act to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board; Bill No. 44, an act to provide for short-term credit to grain producers of the prairie provinces; Bill No. 23, an act to amend the Government Annuities Act. To the best of my knowledge there are few items left on the order paper after these.

Mr. Drew: The minister does not think we can take up resale price maintenance tomorrow as well?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I can try, but I do not think I shall succeed.

Mr. Drew: May I have an indication as to when the house leader does expect to bring forward the measure relating to resale price maintenance?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not give the definite hour on Monday, but on Monday we intend to bring it up.

Mr. Graydon: You are going on with it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Certainly. It was announced in the speech from the throne.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, December 15, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

PRIVILEGE, MR. DREW—CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO EUROPEAN DEFENCE—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I would recall the fact that, on two previous occasions, I have directed questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to any obligations that may have been established under NATO, and on a still earlier occasion I called the attention of the house to press reports from Europe in which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had made certain statements as to plans that had been settled in regard to construction that was to take place in Europe. I pointed out at that time that this raised the question of long-term policy which had not been placed before, let alone been settled by, the house in any way. In response to the questions I have asked, the house was informed by the Prime Minister as recently as the day before yesterday that these undertakings have not been settled.

This morning, over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news reports and also in today's press I have heard and seen the reports of the building that is to take place to house the 27th brigade in Germany. The report to which I refer is not put forward as a speculative report in any way but is a positive statement that the camps that will be built for the Canadians in the Soest area in Germany are expected to surpass even the excellent barracks the 27th brigade now has in the Hanover area, 100 miles to the northeast.

In the radio broadcast I heard the expression that our men would be living "the life of Riley" as they would be the finest barracks that had been built. Then the report went on to say as follows, and I am now quoting from the Canadian Press dispatch which reports this as information coming from Soest in Germany:

> The new camps are expected to scatter the brigade over a fairly large area just as its units are now scattered over a fifty-mile area around Hanover. For reasons of economy the scattering may be modified but tentative plans are for seven self-contained camps made up of hundreds of one-storey buildings of concrete, cement and stucco which will be built by Germans under Canadian direction.

It will be recalled that at the time the earlier press reports referred to this subject it was stated that buildings of this kind were going to be built by Germans at a cost of several million dollars, although the exact number of millions was not determined. I pointed out at that time that this could not be regarded simply as a statement affecting the construction of accommodation for the 27th brigade alone, but that it did establish a policy which would of necessity be related to possible commitments on a much more extended scale, and that a matter of this kind is something certainly which should be placed before the members of this house, particularly when they are in session. In any event, there is another question that arises, and that is, how buildings of this kind are to be determined. The statement appearing today in the press, and being given wide coverage by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, makes positive and very definite statements as to the way this is to be done, and particularly that it is to be done by German workmen under Canadian direction, and in relation to plans that have been settled on, on a very extensive scale.

I raise this question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, because I do believe that if this has been settled, particularly after the information we received before that there perhaps was some misunderstanding of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), we should know two things: First of all, is this part of some arrangement under NATO, and, if so, what arrangements have been made with NATO? Second, what exactly are the arrangements under which Canada is going to employ German workmen to erect these buildings, and is this just some indication of a broader policy which may relate to any other forces being sent overseas?

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Minister replies I wonder if I might say just a word. I hope that the leader of the opposition will not take offence at this. Likewise, I hope that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) will not take offence if I indicate that this is similar to the situation that we had yesterday. I hope that when we come back here for the next session we will have the matter clarified as to the rights of the leader of the opposition and ministers to make statements, called privilege or what have you, as compared with the rights that apply to ordinary members. It seems to me that far too often questions are asked on privilege—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Government members are applauding. But I may tell them that mistakes are made on the government side, too. Far too often ministers on the government side bring up matters that should be dealt with on the orders of the day, but raise them on questions of privilege. Far too often statements which ministers make on the orders of the day or on motions should be made in debate. As Your Honour knows, this is a matter that was the subject of some discussion in Your Honour's committee on procedure.

Mr. Graydon: It does not appear in the report.

Mr. Knowles: But it was discussed in committee, and the hon. member for Peel knows it. I am surprised that the hon. member for Peel, who objected to the Minister of Fisheries making a provocative statement on motions yesterday, did not object to his own leader making his statement at this time today. I say, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am not casting a reflection solely on the leader of the opposition. This is something that is done from the front benches on both sides of the house. It would be unfair not to permit the government a reply this morning, and I do not object to a reply being made, but I do hope that at the next session Your Honour will watch this matter in the way in which the house would like to have it watched.

Mr. Drew: Since the hon. member who has just spoken has—well, I really think, substituted himself for Your Honour on this occasion—

Mr. Graydon: Again.

Mr. Drew: —I do feel that I should make some comment in relation to the suggestion he has made that there is some impropriety in the proceeding that has been adopted. I would point out that the procedure I have adopted is in no way incorrect, and it is not similar to the procedure which was discussed yesterday. The procedure which was discussed yesterday was one relating to a particular statement within the house. I am referring to the privileges of the members of this house. I am referring to a fundamental privilege, and that is whether statements of policy and announcements of decisions by the government should be made in the first place before parliament knows anything about them, and in the second place are to be made without informing parliament when parliament is sitting.

[Mr. Knowles.]

As to the question of privilege, I submit, Mr. Speaker, this is the proper place, and I am seeking no special concessions as leader of the opposition. I am simply raising a question in regard to the rights of the members of this house, and may I say to those who applauded the suggestion that such questions should not be raised, that I would hope hon. members here would seek wider opportunities for parliament to exercise its authority rather than seeking to diminish it, as some of them would appear to wish.

Mr. Speaker: Probably it is just as well that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has brought this matter to my attention. However, hon. members will recall that during the present session no opportunity has been given to hon. members to raise grievances. We have not gone into committee of supply or committee of ways and means, and for that reason I have allowed considerable latitude both when motions are called and also on the orders of the day. I am sure it would please very few members if I endeavoured to carry out the rules of the house strictly when hon. members have not an opportunity to raise grievances.

The hon. member referred to an incident which took place yesterday. At that time, when the Minister of Fisheries was making a statement, the hon. member for Peel rose and objected to the statement being made. I think he was quite within his rights in so rising. I, in my very limited wisdom, thought that the statement was almost completed, and it might be just as well if it was completed, but I did point out afterwards that I was giving an opportunity to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) to make a reply.

I agree very largely with what the hon. member for Peel said, and I stated yesterday that statements from government benches should not be provocative or argumentative; they should be factual statements only. However, we are getting near the end of the session. I do not intend to be any more strict throughout the remaining days of this session than I have been, but I hope that next session we shall be able to carry on the proceedings of the house more in accordance with the rules, but in a manner which will enable me to interpret the rules so that every hon. member will have an opportunity to express his views.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I was not surprised, but I had some regret, when I heard you mention your limited wisdom. In fact your wisdom is equal to your humility.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you indeed. Perhaps we can now have an answer to the question which was raised by the leader of the opposition.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to what the leader of the opposition has said. I did not listen to the radio this morning and I did not see the dispatch to which he has referred; but I can assure him and the house that though we all knew when the brigade was going to Europe that it would have to be housed, the question as to how that was going to be done has not been discussed by the government so far, and there is no justification whatsoever for this report to which the leader of the opposition has referred.

Whenever the government does come to a conclusion with respect to this matter it will be announced here, and the house will be asked in the usual way to make provision for carrying out the recommendation the government may have to make. No policy has been decided upon by the government in that respect, and this matter as to whether and where and how new barracks may have to be built has not yet been determined. The barracks that are at present occupied are barracks which had been allotted to the United Kingdom forces, and that have been placed provisionally at the disposal of the Canadian brigade.

Now, what will ultimately be done about it has not yet been determined, and there is nothing so far that the government could announce in that respect. I am sorry it frequently happens there are assertions made over the radio and in the press that are not founded upon information properly obtained. I do not know where they get this. It may be summarizing rumours which are being talked about in public. But this matter has not come before the government. There has been no decision made about it; and when there is, it will be communicated to parliament as it should be.

Mr. Drew: I welcome the assurance by the Prime Minister because, as I explained, this was given in such factual detail that it raised the question as to whether some decision had been reached. But I would offer a suggestion in relation to the matter, which the Prime Minister has very clearly indicated is important, that if the practice of making anonymous statements by officials of the Department of National Defence were discontinued, some of this confusion might be avoided.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I must rise to answer that. I have in the Department of National Defence and in the three armed forces in Canada, the navy, the army and the air force, as good a group of public servants, devoted to the cause of Canada, as there ever has been serving this country.

There is no practice of making anonymous statements. Everyone knows that every statement issued by the Department of National Defence is issued over my name, if it contains a statement of policy; and otherwise they are issued as statements by National Defence headquarters or by the service concerned. There are no other statements. The suggestion the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) makes in this connection is just as far afield as anything could be.

How can we be responsible for a newspaper report which apparently emanated from Germany and which, so far as one can see, is based upon speculation—because the location of the proposed camp in Germany has not been finally decided upon. There is no decision as to the type of construction. There is no decision as to the arrangements under which the land would be made available. There is no decision as to the manner in which the costs would be met. All these are matters which have to be worked out.

Everyone knows, as the Prime Minister has said, that our troops have to be housed. They have to winter over there. They cannot live out in this weather. But the arrangements under which this is to be done have still to be decided upon, both with regard to the three occupying powers, the German government and the NATO organization.

RADIO BROADCASTING

THIRD AND FINAL REPORT

Mr. W. A. Robinson (Simcoe East) presented the third and final report of the special committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Simcoe East, who has just tabled the report of the radio committee, if he will make it clear that this report was not concurred in by members of the opposition on the committee, and that it is a majority report only.

Mr. Robinson: It speaks for itself.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Annual report of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, in English and in French.—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNITED NATIONS

UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES —ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question. It is, I believe, quite in conformity with your suggestion made a short time ago. A report appears in this morning's paper to the effect that Canada has joined with others in voting against a proposal before the United Nations to set up a special fund to assist underdeveloped countries. Many of us are very anxious to see more help being given to the underdeveloped countries, particularly in Asia, as a means of preventing the further spread of totalitarianism in that area.

Many of us too are supporting the rearmament program of NATO because we hope that some proportionate amount will be appropriated for the raising of the standard of living of underdeveloped areas, as a means of advancing human progress. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs give the house any information as to why Canada opposed this particular suggestion?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have not yet received a report on this matter from our delegation in Paris, it may be necessary for me at some later date to amplify what I am about to say. However, I do know that this proposal, and the action taken by our delegation in respect to it, does not mean that the delegation or, indeed, the government is unsympathetic to the question of technical assistance for underdeveloped countries.

We have already expressed that sympathy, both in deed and in word, at this assembly. This particular proposal, which was put before a committee of the assembly, was for the establishment of a fund of $500 million by the United Nations which could be made available, under the procedure outlined in the resolution, for the assistance of underdeveloped countries.

The general attitude we have taken in this matter at the United Nations is that there is sufficient machinery for this purpose now, if members of the United Nations wish to use that machinery, and that it is unnecessary and therefore undesirable at this time to set up a special organization with a stated amount to be made available to it; especially as during the discussion of the matter the United States, which would normally contribute the greatest proportion of the resources which would be made available, indicated that it was opposed to the resolution, and opposed to the procedure, and would not be able to contribute to this fund.

In the circumstances—and I think these are the circumstances; but I will have to confirm this when we receive the report from Paris—we decided to oppose the resolution. At the same time we were in favour of an alternative resolution which would have once again pledged our support for the principle of assistance to underdeveloped countries. However, we were not in favour of implementing that support by the particular method indicated in the resolution to which the hon. member has referred.

CRIMINAL CODE

CONVICTIONS FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT— REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, of which notice has been given. In order to assure the maintenance of freedom of the press and of radio, would the Department of Justice give consideration to amending the Criminal Code in connection with convictions for contempt of court, as against press or radio, so that in cases such as that in which the Globe and Mail was recently assessed the costs of the court for alleged contempt, by Mr. Justice Wells, a right of appeal will be provided.

Also, will an amendment be considered to remove the anomaly which would appear to make the law respecting contempt of court too strict, in that it denies press comment on a case after trial, until every accused has exhausted his rights of appeal.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I should like to reply to both my hon. friend's questions at the same time. We in the Department of Justice have been following with some interest the news stories and editorial comment concerning the action by Mr. Justice Wells of the Supreme Court of Ontario, high court division, who held the Globe and Mail in contempt. In that connection we have been giving consideration to the rather important issues which are involved in this course of action. The department has not yet reached any decision upon which government policy could be based that the present law should be changed. If there are any developments in government policy in this regard they will be announced in due course.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—CIVIL SERVANTS—WEEKLY WORK PERIODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the absence of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) I should like to direct a question to the appropriate minister. This relates to questions of mine which were passed as an order for return on November 28, reported on page 236 of Votes and Proceedings. My questions had to do with the five-day week for civil service and government employees. I wonder if I may expect this return before the end of the session.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have the matter looked into.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RADAR SCREEN—REFERENCE TO ARTICLES IN MONTREAL "HERALD"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): On Thursday last I directed a question to the Minister of National Defence in regard to very detailed articles which had appeared in regard to our radar screen and, in view of the positive statements which had been made as to the deficiencies of that screen, asked him to explain. At the time the minister stated he had not seen the articles, and I should like to ask him now if he is in position to make a statement.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I realize that the leader of the opposition was not in the house yesterday when I made a statement in that regard.

NATIONAL GALLERY

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES—EXPENDITURES—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the third reading of Bill No. 42, respecting the National Gallery of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE AND SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 43, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR AUTHORIZATION TO MAKE CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, TO ISSUE SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 45, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain commitments for new equipment incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1951, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have an explanation?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, while this bill stands in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) it concerns the financing of Canadian National Railways, so perhaps I could give the explanation. The short title is Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act (No. 2), 1951. Hon. members may ask why there is a second act of this type this year.

The house will recall that the annual Canadian National Railways financing bill passed at the first session of this year contained an unusual clause which permitted the Canadian National Railways, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to make commitments in 1951 for the purchase of equipment which it was not expected would be delivered in 1951, but in 1952 or perhaps later. Orders could not be placed without government authority. On June 19, 1951, I placed on Hansard a list of the equipment for which commitments were to be authorized; the total amount of the commitments was not to exceed $111,512,920.

The house will realize that normally this financing and guarantee act comes to it in May or June of the usual session. We are now informed that some of this equipment will be delivered sooner than expected and prior to June 30 next year. The present bill simply provides that the usual guarantees can be given for the financing of this equipment to the extent of $55,581,816, which it is expected is the value of the equipment that will be delivered under these authorized orders before the house has before it next year the usual Canadian National Railways financing and guarantee bill. With the permission of the house I could place on Hansard a list of the rolling stock that it is expected will be delivered prior to the time the house would ordinarily deal with it next year.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: The table follows:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the parliamentary assistant has stated, this bill is pursuant to action taken last June, which action was an innovation. I think any questions that I have to ask could better be asked when we are in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, as the parliamentary assistant has pointed out, authority was given last June by chapter 45 to the governor in council to incur commitments totalling $111 million. The explanation given then was that by reason of an anticipated shortage of steel and so on it was desirable to get that authority, which I believe was unprecedented. The judgment of the house was obtained and the authority was given to make commitments covering the equipment set out in the table to be found on page 4297 of Hansard of June 19.

The government is now coming to parliament and saying that with regard to part of that sum of $111 million, to wit, $55 million odd, they now wish to carry the transaction a step forward and be allowed to issue securities to provide for the purchase of equipment totalling this lesser amount. I should like to ask whether all the equipment in the amount now presently being provided for was included in the list of June last.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We granted the authority to make these commitments and naturally we must grant authority to pay. How soon are these deliveries to begin? How is this amount arrived at? As these commitments have been made, there is no sense holding back and not giving authority. On the other hand we ought to be given a prima facie case for the need of authorizing this very large amount at this time.

Mr. Benidickson: On page 4296 of Hansard for the last session I gave in some detail the reasons for the apprehensions of the railroad about future deliveries having regard to the short supply position of many of the items that they anticipated they would want in 1952. The detail of equipment that the house gave me permission to table without reading is in every particular to be found also in the list that I provided last session to which the hon. member for Greenwood has referred, and which appears at page 4297. It has turned out that the actual expected delivery date of this equipment is somewhat better than the management of the road believed was possible last spring when they thought that orders should be placed with manufacturers.

My hon. friend asks how we arrive at the figure of $55 million that we are now asking authority to finance. This is based upon the report of the C.N.R. management after consultation with their suppliers. There is now advice that the various items appearing on the list tabled will be delivered in sequence between now and June 30. The same items of course will also appear in the 1952 equipment budget of the Canadian National Railways. The additional equipment that the house authorized the C.N.R. last June to order will also appear in the 1952 C.N.R. budget and will come up for discussion before the committee on railways and shipping. We have information now that before June 30 next these various items, appearing on the list which I have provided for Hansard, can be delivered and thus must be paid for.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I presume that the issue of these securities will be timed so that we will not be issuing $55 million in securities and paying interest on the amount in advance of requirement. You are taking the power to get intermediate loans so that you will not have to issue them until the convenient and proper time.

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct. In the initial stages at least it is financed by temporary loans to the Canadian National Railways from the government, so the equipment can be paid for as delivered.

Sections 2 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Abbott) moved the third reading of the bill.

Bill read the third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION

PROVISION FOR CONSOLIDATION AND REVISION OF CERTAIN ACTS, AUDIT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS, FINANCIAL CONTROL OF CROWN CORPORATIONS, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 25, to provide for the financial administration of the government of Canada, the audit of the public accounts and the financial control of crown corporations—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make a few brief comments on clause 1. I think any other comments can await the relevant sections. This bill has been before the public accounts committee, and in general I approve of it. It is a measure which represents a great deal of efficient work on the part of the staff of the Department of Finance. In large measure it puts into statutory form practices which have grown up that have been found to be convenient and which have had to derive their sanction from various acts and no doubt from various other authorities as well. They are now brought together and put into this bill which I think the committee felt had a great deal of merit in it.

Mr. Knowles: Would the parliamentary assistant tell us at this point which sections of the bill were amended by the committee?

Mr. Sinclair: On the whole the amendments were fairly minor ones as to phrasing. The only place where the change in phrasing is substantial is in section 76 having to do with crown companies. As the sections are dealt with perhaps I might be allowed to indicate those where amendments were made. Members who were on the committee will recall there was no major change in any of the clauses. In certain cases a word was changed or a word was added. For example a change was made to "the Auditor General shall report forthwith" instead of "the Auditor General shall report". The only main change in phrasing is in section 76 having to do with crown corporations.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Duties of treasury board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say a word about section 5. This clause is in the part of the bill entitled "treasury board" and refers to finance and the making of estimates. I am not going to go over the ground again complaining about the inaccuracy of estimating, but I wish to refer to one thing which I think is relevant and which I regard as a matter of very great importance. Last April the Minister of Finance used very strong language indeed in speaking about the necessity of government economy as a matter of defence against inflation. I want to read a sentence or two from what he said because it was so strong, and I wish to record regret that he seems to have wholly departed from it. At page 1801 of Hansard for April 10 he said:

> Immediately following the Korean crisis last summer the government reviewed its own expenditure programs, and many projects that had been planned and for which parliament had voted funds were deferred. Since that time the numbers in many units in the public service have been reduced or held below the figures for which parliament had appropriated salaries. Hon. members and others have already seen tangible effects of this policy. The detail pages of the estimates show many instances where expenditure in the past year has been considerably below what was authorized and planned, despite the increase in wages, salaries, and prices. For this new fiscal year we have applied a similar but more severe test of need. For non-defence purposes we have reversed the upward trend in expenditures. The estimates placed before parliament for this year show a reduction of $35 million below last year, despite an increase of more than 10 per cent in salary and wage levels, despite higher materials and construction costs, and despite an increase of nearly $40 million in old age pensions, family allowances, tax rental agreements with provinces, and similar payments that rise automatically with increases in population and the value of production.

He goes on to speak about the reduction of employees, etc.

There was a great deal of dispute about the figure of $35 million, but I shall not labour the point. I shall merely read some remarks which I have put on record before.

They are from the Winnipeg Free Press. It speaks about the $35 million hoped-for reduction out of an estimate of $2,036 million for non-defence expenditures. The Free Press comment is as follows:

But the government's achievement here was only $35 million out of $2,036 million, virtually total failure.

Later it says:

. . . no government can continue to throw oil on the fire with one hand and keep down the flames with the other.

This committee will recall that some weeks ago we were given a figure, I think it covered the first seven months of the fiscal year, which showed that expenditures instead of being down $35 million were up $37 million. I asked a question of the parliamentary assistant, and he gave what I thought was rather a debating point answer, and in my opinion an answer that had nothing to do with the realities of the situation. But I comforted myself with the thought that when the minister came back there would be a more serious method of dealing with this matter. I thought that perhaps when the cat was away the mice would play. Actually, we have been thrown out of the frying pan into the fire.

The other day the minister spoke of this in a very offhand fashion, and said it was up only 3 per cent or 4 per cent, which is about right. My real concern, Mr. Chairman, which I want to record is that I believe, and I think the minister believed when he spoke last April, that this is one of the serious means of fighting this great plague which threatens us. I regret very much indeed that, so far as I can see, the minister has now thrown up the sponge, and in effect said that there is nothing that we can do about it, and that it is not too bad anyway. This has disturbed me a great deal, and in that connection I want to make one comment.

I have ventured in this house before, recognizing the difficulty of economy, to say that I thought the only way to make economies was for the minister to ration, as it were, the various departments. I am not going to labour that, but I am putting on the record and I regard it as a matter of real importance and great seriousness that apparently we have not only abandoned the pursuit of economy but that the minister takes it with apparent equanimity. I should like to refer in this connection to the fact that there are men in public life who have gone to the mat on this question of cutting expenditures. I have in my hand a copy of a speech delivered on June 12 last by the Hon. Angus L. Macdonald. I should point out that Mr. Macdonald was in a different position from our own finance minister because he was facing a deficit. But I do not think the parliamentary assistant, the minister or anyone else will be inclined to say that merely because one is not facing a deficit one should be careless with public expenditures. I am sure they will not say that because one of the criticisms we have been making is that one of the dangers of large surpluses is that it is often difficult to make people really serious about economy. Economy is not a thing that anyone likes, and I have no doubt that if the parliamentary assistant feels it is worth replying to my statement, he will say that we on this side do not like economy any better than the government does. That will speak for itself.

I want to read briefly what was said by the premier of Nova Scotia, who is also the treasurer. He said:

When I speak of cuts in expenditures, I do not say or even suggest for a moment that any of the things that we have been doing have been unjustified or extravagant, and I do not wish that impression to gain any ground either in this house or outside of it. It is not a case of cutting out needless services or extravagant services. It is a case of having to make some cuts somewhere. It is a case of trying to fix priorities, and all that we can do is to hold on to those things that are absolutely essential, and dispense, for the moment at any rate, with certain things that, while desirable and good in themselves, are not so essential as the others.

I am not going to press this matter further. I realize it is a difficult thing, but I wish to point out that when the minister made his forecast last spring he went a long way towards saying he had tried to take into account the various increases that we were going to face. I do not want this criticism to be answered with the statement, "Well, prices have gone up." If the minister had come to this house and dealt with the matter seriously by saying, "Yes, we have been disappointed,"

I would have felt somewhat better about it. The impression which I received, and which I am protesting against, is that this weapon which ought to be, and has always been thought to be, one of the great weapons against inflation is really regarded now as, shall I say, abandoned.

Mr. Sinclair: While I am very anxious to get this bill through, Mr. Chairman, I think an answer should be given to one or two of the points raised by the financial critic for the opposition. As he said, he has raised them before, both on an item which I was handling and directly with the minister when he returned from NATO. So far as this matter of treasury board control over government expenditures is concerned, when this bill was before the public accounts committee we had the deputy minister of finance as well as the secretary of the treasury board before us. They gave us an illuminating explanation of how the estimates were prepared by departments; how they were screened by treasury board with the aid of treasury officials stationed in every department, and of how economies were effected.

It is quite true that last year the minister estimated that there would be a reduction of $35 million in civilian expenditure over the expenditure of the previous year. Now, that was not easily achieved. Instructions were issued for an over-all reduction of 10 per cent in the number of civil servants in the civilian departments, most noticeably in post office, since that department is the greatest employer of labour. Everyone seems to be strongly in favour of economy in a general way, but when actual economies are effected it seems that members of parliament are the first to protest.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad I said that.

Mr. Sinclair: I am glad you did, too, because I want to point out one or two instances. It seems that the Minister of Finance and the treasury board have better success in resisting the desires for extra services of the various departments of government than in resisting the repeated desires of members of parliament.

During this session we have had requests for bigger pensions, for bigger allowances, for more public works, for bigger grain payments. This morning we heard criticism because we were not going to embark upon a further $500 million plan of United Nations, not for loans but for gifts to underdeveloped nations. The job of the treasury board, of course, is an unpopular job when it comes to the details of resisting these demands for extra expenditures from the public treasury which, in the end, have got to be met by the individual taxpayer. It is a difficult thing, as conditions are now, to accurately estimate in advance what costs will be. Every business firm in the country has that experience. I am sorry I have not with me at the moment the analysis I prepared of what the provincial treasurers had done in the last year, so far as both their estimates of revenue and their costs are concerned.

It is interesting to note that the provincial treasurers of three or four of our large provinces were very much more in error, if error is the word to be used, in their estimates of revenues than was the federal Minister of Finance. The same is true so far as expenditures are concerned, both in the provincial field and in many municipal fields. These public authorities were just as anxious for economy as are the federal authorities, and have found that increased wages, increased cost of materials, and in some cases shortages, which do add to the cost because of delay in construction, have caused the estimates they made last spring to be exceeded. But I should just like hon. members to remind themselves of the requests which have been made recently in this chamber for added payments from the public treasury and which have been resisted by the minister and by treasury board. As hon. members know, they have been resisted because of the desire for economy and also because there is on the part of many members themselves an inclination to regard the surplus as an invitation for further expenditures on whatever pet projects they may have in their ridings or in their provinces. I think that the record of the treasury board—

Mr. Knowles: It is a case of our projects versus yours.

Mr. Sinclair: As far as treasury board is concerned, their main project is to hold down the cost of running the country. Perhaps I can end on that note.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say only one word. The parliamentary assistant has dealt with the question of the estimates which I meticulously avoided, he will remember, except as to the results. I would just say this. When the minister gave some figures —some of them, I must admit, very large figures—of error, I noticed that he did not quote the British precedent. If I remember right,—unless there has been a great change recently—the most recent figures that I have seen suggested that if they got above a 2½ per cent or 3 per cent error they began to worry about it. That figure is not a last year's figure but it is a recent one.

The only other thing I want to say for the comfort of the parliamentary assistant is this. He has pointed out all the responsibility that the government carry. The only answer I can make to that is that with honour and privilege, responsibility always goes. After all, the government like to feel that they enjoy a great deal of honour; and I am sure that they regard it as a privilege—and a very proper one—to be charged with this responsibility that is theirs. Being a generous person, I would remind the parliamentary assistant that I have told them before how this job can be done, and the only way it can be done. The way to do it is not to ask the department to come in and then to say: We should like you to reduce your estimates. The way to do it is to make up your mind how much you can allow them to spend, and tell them accordingly. You would probably have to have a bodyguard if you did that. I know it would be a terribly difficult thing to do, but I am satisfied that it is the only way in which you will ever cut to the bone.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman. I think the point that has been raised by the hon. member for Greenwood is one that should not be passed over too lightly, because this perhaps will be the last time that there will be an opportunity to discuss the matter in relation to the responsibility of this particular department. At the time this measure was under consideration before, suggestions were made that there might be some way of establishing the responsibility of the minister and of the department for presenting to the house an estimate which would be as accurate as possible, within the measurable errors that inevitably creep into broad estimates of this kind. At this stage it seems difficult for any representative of the government to say that we have suddenly been confronted with unexpected revenues which have given us a large surplus; because this government has, year after year, been producing these large surpluses which, in fact, are nothing but overtaxation—and extremely heavy overtaxation —at a time that the people are already greatly worried about the high cost of living.

The Minister of Finance was away at the time the discussion took place on the introduction of this bill into the house. When he came back from Europe he made a statement here which at no point suggested any concern on his part about the fact that, in the first six months of this year, every man, woman and child in Canada had been overtaxed—not just taxed but overtaxed—by $43 per head or, as I pointed out at that time, an average of $215 overtaxation for every family of five in this country, taking that still as an average unit. There was no suggestion by the minister that there should be any reason for concern about that overtaxation. On the contrary, he returned to the argument he had made from time to time that we should be pleased with the opportunity that such surpluses afford to make reductions in the debt of the country, by paying off certain of those obligations out of that surplus.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Chairman, some of these questions of principle may not have an immense appeal, but it is these questions of principle in relation to matters of that kind that determine whether or not our form of government is going to continue to have the vitality and the strength which it should have in these difficult years.

The point which, it seems to me, has not yet sufficiently impressed itself upon the government is that it is not the government's right to say: We fooled you by including an estimate which would do something good, but which we did not disclose to you at the time. That is like saying to a child to whom you have denied something: Well, my child, I am very sorry that it was necessary for me to deny you this knowledge at the time, but I always had the thought in my mind that I was going to be generous to you at some later date. That may, perhaps, be good child psychology; but we are dealing with the question of the responsibility of parliament and of the right of parliament to determine what money will be voted to the government itself for the business of Canada. The government has no right to place before the house estimates which contemplate the possibility of raising one cent of taxes beyond what they really anticipate and what they disclose to the house.

I have no doubt that the members of the house will support the government in sound business measures as long as those measures are discussed and as long as reasons for supporting those measures are put forward in clear and understandable terms. Nevertheless, it is a challenge to the authority of parliament at any time to say to parliament: We thought this would be a good idea. We did not mention it at the time we got the money, but we claim great credit for having overtaxed the people to a point that made it possible to do something good which you yourself never knew was going to be done. That is, in effect, exactly what we are told when it is said: There is a huge surplus. We did not disclose it. Perhaps we did not expect it, but we claim great credit for paying off the public debt.

By all means, let us do what is wise, sound and to the advantage of this country from the point of view of its economic strength and stability. But in the consideration of this section we come to a real question as to whether or not the government was aware of the fact that there was going to be a big surplus of this kind. I would remind hon. members that when the budget was before the house last spring it was pointed out by members of the opposition that, in their belief, the government was planning for a surplus far in excess of that which was announced, and that the suggestion that certain taxes which were being levied were unnecessary was brushed aside. What I am saying now is directly relevant to a consideration of the importance of this section and the importance of impressing upon the government the fact that there must be some obligations under this section which have not been regarded. We pointed out over and over again that there was no need to impose a 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. We pointed out that there was no need to impress burdensome and irritating special excise taxes at a time when we clearly expressed our belief that the surplus would be far beyond the amount to be raised by these real nuisance taxes, and these taxes which have contributed so greatly to the increasing inflation in this country.

We are to be called upon before this session ends to consider a measure, the only measure put forward by the government, to deal with price maintenance agreements. The suggestion is that it would deal with inflation. What would have dealt with inflation a great deal more during this present session would have been to introduce some measures to correct the government's errors, and to have done away with these excessive sales taxes and excise taxes. That would have brought the government within some recognized sense of obligation to parliament to correct this position. It would have relieved inflationary pressures and it would not have simply placed before parliament a red herring like this legislation to deal with price maintenance which we shall be called upon to consider. We know that because of the time of the year the debates in this present session are drawing to an end; but I would remind the government that when its responsibility for overtaxation is being discussed every bank, every great financial organization in this country, every labour organization, every public body which has been called upon to present public reports at this time of the year in regard to our financial position, has emphasized the fact that inflation is the most dangerous thing that we face today in our domestic affairs.

Part of that inflation is being directly caused by the government's disregard for the figures it places before the house. Part of that inflation—and a substantial part of it—is being caused by these excessive taxes which are directly inflationary. I am talking about the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax and the special excise taxes which have all joined in giving us this more than $600 million surplus in the first six months. The government has done all these things, and instead of in any way correcting them while we are considering the measure of supervision there should be over our financial affairs the answer simply is that, it is true, we have a surplus. We are going to use it in a very good way by paying off debts.

This morning we had the statement by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance that the provincial treasurers in several of the provinces have also had surpluses, and that in some cases these have been on a proportionately higher basis than that of the dominion government itself. May I point out that the provincial treasurers make their estimates upon the projected figures of income given to the people of Canada through this house by the dominion government, and also through their statisticians. Every one of their estimates is prepared upon estimates that had been made available to them by the departments of the dominion government, either through the statistical department or otherwise. One of the reasons that they have had corresponding surpluses is the inflation which is going on and which is being aided, abetted and supported by the action of this government itself. That is one of the reasons that their surpluses have gone up. If there has been a miscalculation on their part, that miscalculation has been related to the miscalculations of the government of Canada which has placed these figures before us. I am not, however, putting any brief before this house on behalf of the provincial treasurers; they do not need it. But I am pointing out that what has been occurring in the provincial bodies is in the final result simply indicative of the fact that the estimates of the dominion government year after year have been disproved by subsequent events. While we discuss this section I would point out once again that although it may not be possible to place in it any mandatory provision which will correct the situation, I do believe that at this time, when we are considering the financial operations of the government itself, there should be a clear understanding on the part of all hon. members and of the government that the very first responsibility of parliament is to express its approval of any moneys which are granted to the government for the business of Canada, with full knowledge of the facts; and when the government makes a miscalculation on one side or the other, an explanation is due to parliament which has not yet been given; and that by methods which are more accurate than this we have agreed that the government should seek in the terms of this act and in the spirit of this act to place before us figures so that members of parliament are really exercising their authority over the money voted to the government in this house.

On section 7—Regulations.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant will say a word or two on this section. I did not have the privilege of being a member of the committee on public accounts, but by keeping in touch with my colleagues who were I have tried to follow what has been going on in that committee. Further, I would point out that the printed record of the proceedings of the committee has not reached us yet, so that we cannot refer to it. I understand, however, that officials of the treasury board did make some statements to that committee with respect to the provisions of section 7 which would make possible rewards to civil servants who make suggestions for the improvement of government business. Can the parliamentary assistant say whether any such statements made it clear that it is the intention of the government to make use of the permission set out in section 7 (d) (i)?

Mr. Sinclair: When the secretary of treasury board was before the public accounts committee he did make reference to this. He also made reference to the very able study which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made of this question and the speech he made in the house on it. In industrial firms in both Canada and the United States it has been the common practice to offer, in the form of providing rewards, incentives to employees of all ranks who offer information or suggestions which help the operations of the firms. The United States government has had such a plan in operation in their civil service for some time, and it was thought desirable that we should copy that plan, and so section 7 (d) (i) is, for the first time, making formal provision for it. Up till now of course there have been sections in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act which prohibited civil servants from accepting rewards for the discharge of their tasks, other than the reward which they got through their salary.

The secretary of the treasury board, when asked about the regulation, said of course that the regulations could not be drafted until this bill became an act, but that it had already been given preliminary study and they hoped to have regulations in effect very shortly after the act was proclaimed.

Mr. Adamson: Will the rewards be tax free?

Mr. Sinclair: No, they will be income.

Mr. Harkness: So far as I understand the matter, the general purpose of this legislation in relation to the treasury board is to increase the powers of that board and to put it in a position where a very considerable amount of the routine material which up to this time has had to be dealt with by the privy council can be handled by the treasury board. In order to enable it to have these increased powers, these regulations, which the treasury board are authorized to make, are listed. I would like to refer particularly to paragraph (e), which reads:

> The treasury board may make regulations subject to any other act, for any other purpose necessary for the efficient administration of the public service.

It seems to me that that is a very wide power. I have wondered whether something else could not be substituted, because this would seem to give the treasury board the power to make almost any sort of regulation. All they have to say is that in their opinion it is necessary for the efficient administration of the public service. Could the parliamentary assistant tell us whether any consideration has been given to phrasing that differently, so that the power would not be so all-embracing?

Mr. Sinclair: After all, treasury board is merely a subcommittee of the cabinet. Many matters which, fifty or sixty years ago, may have been considered very important, including those affecting civil service employment, for example, are no longer dealt with by the cabinet. In practice however the treasury board minutes still have to be approved by the governor in council. The first part of the section does relate to the treasury board minute as the final authority in a great number of these routine cases.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think anyone objects to that.

Mr. Sinclair: I am sure that is so. Paragraph (e) simply puts into a statute what has been done by practice for many years. Perhaps I could give three or four samples of the sort of thing that has been covered by treasury board, under delegation of authority from the governor in council. These would include the settlement of damage claims against the crown; action to be taken with regard to damage to or loss of public property; compensation to employees for loss or damage to property or personal goods occasioned in the carrying out of their duties; the placing of insurance on public property; financial liability to the crown, and some others. Insurance, for example, is not normally placed on public property, because the government of Canada is such an enormous holder of property that it can carry its own risk. In special cases however insurance is necessary.

These are routine matters in which the actual authority does rest with the governor in council but which, in practice, over the years, the governor in council has always delegated to treasury board. All we are doing is to make a provision in the financial administration bill which would make that statutory.

Mr. Harkness: I agree with everything the parliamentary assistant has said. But my question was as to whether any consideration had been given to phrasing this in some way which would not give what might be described as unlimited powers to treasury board.

Mr. Sinclair: They are certainly not unlimited powers, because these are all powers which are now held under statute by the governor in council. It is a matter of turning back to treasury board by the governor in council certain matters for final action. The difficulty in spelling it out is that this is a sort of basket section. One cannot foretell very clearly what these small matters, which come outside the regular run of affairs, may be. Under this measure they would be dealt with by treasury board, as they have been in the past.

Mr. Harkness: My own objection is that it is the kind of legislation which is capable of abuse. I am not saying that it will be or that it has been abused; but it puts treasury board in a position where it decides as to whether something is necessary for the efficient administration of the public service. They are the people who would decide it. They must make the decision as to whether they will make regulations—and, for all practical purposes, I would understand that these regulations are laws. Everyone must obey them, or they are subject to penalty.

It seems to me it could be possible to provide all powers required by treasury board without giving them what has been described by the parliamentary assistant as a basket authority—and, I would say, a bottomless basket.

Mr. Sinclair: I am afraid I have not made myself clear. The governor in council has these powers now. These are powers other than those spelled out in the statutes. For instance, they would include compensation to an employee travelling down from the Northwest Territories to fill a post in some other part of Canada and who, in the process of travelling, has lost his household effects which are moved by the government from the north country. Under the statute the governor in council has the right, first of all, to say whether a refund should be made, and then to say to what extent it shall be made. In practice the governor in council has always referred a matter of that kind to treasury board. True, treasury board would study it and place a minute, along with a great many other minutes, before the governor in council. But those would go through in routine fashion.

All that is being done now is to say that in those matters where the governor in council decides it should be handled by the subcommittee, it can be so handled.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Management.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some observations, and also a suggestion. I believe what I have to say might properly be said under this section which states, in part, that the minister shall have control and direction of all matters relating to the financial affairs of Canada not by law assigned to any other minister. I believe I have quoted the pertinent part.

When the Minister of Finance spoke in the house the other day he mentioned—and I think accurately—the difficulty of estimating revenues as compared with the comparative ease in estimating expenditures. Therefore it seems to me that measures which would do away with double taxation are not only helpful to the taxpayer but are also beneficial to those authorities charged with the work of drawing up the budget. No other country in the world suffers from double taxation as much as we do in Canada. The Minister of Finance has admitted this, and has mentioned it as one of the problems of the whole financial structure of the country.

He has attempted in a small way to overcome these abuses of double taxation by making certain very small allowances on dividends paid by corporations. I would mention again that in the United Kingdom the corporation pays its income tax, and then the resultant dividend is sent to the shareholder as a tax-paid payment. In Canada, on both levels, the corporation and the individual pay income tax.

That is one matter which I suggest should be considered carefully by the government, particularly when corporation taxation in some places has now reached something more than the 50 per cent level. I suggest it is not good economy and it is not helping to meet inflation to have these enormously high taxes. They serve merely to increase the final cost of the end product to the consumer.

However, that was not the case I wished to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. What I wished to make clear is the matter of double taxation of taxpayers who pay municipal taxes. I have brought this to the attention of the government before and I do so again in the hope that some consideration will be given to the matter when the budget is under review by the Department of Finance.

At the present time municipal taxation is increasing at an enormously rapid rate. That taxation is imposed on the one security many people have, their house and home. It is being levied, not on the fairer principle of ability to pay but on the capital value of the taxpayer's home and property. If a man's income goes down, he pays less income tax, but so long as he lives in a house, the taxes on that house go up as the expenditures of the municipality increase. I consider that the fundamental security of the average Canadian is his house and home and every effort should be made to maintain that security. Therefore, I make this suggestion to the department that in the next budget provision be made to allow taxes paid to a municipality on the taxpayer's dwelling as a deduction from income for tax purposes.

Mr. Sinclair: The taxation policy of the government has nothing to do with this bill. That would be covered by the income tax bill and that would be the appropriate place to raise it. This section 9 has been in the act since confederation and it merely provides that the minister shall be responsible for the handling of the consolidated revenue fund. I think that if we are going to get this bill through we should confine ourselves to the actual sections.

Mr. Adamson: I simply wanted to draw this to the attention of the minister as we will not have another opportunity during this session to discuss it. It is a matter of great urgency in the country today and I repeat my suggestion that not only municipal taxation, but taxation for educational purposes, be allowed as a deduction from income. I realize that perhaps this should not be brought up under this bill but I crave the indulgence of the committee to bring it to the attention of the minister because it is of immediate and urgent importance and has a great bearing on the well-being of the country.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Minister may acquire securities.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may have the indulgence of the committee I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question with regard to section 7, subsection (e). I ask him to consider whether the words "the public service" are not unnecessary and whether the words "of public moneys" would not meet the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary East. I do not press this further at the moment; I simply ask the parliamentary assistant to consider it and perhaps he can let me know his conclusions later on.

In connection with section 17, I may say that we had a rather interesting discussion in the committee, particularly with regard to the management of public money. It seems to me that there has been some unwillingness to use words accurately in the department. We had a discussion in the committee on the question of supporting the bond market. From an interesting statement made by one member of the staff it became quite clear that during the war years the government, either directly or through the bank, bought and sold bonds to the value of some $2,700 million. I think everyone understood and no one criticized the reason for doing that. In order to maintain its securities in public favour and promote the sale of future securities the government had to concern itself with the status of the bond market.

I mention that because there is a great unwillingness now to use the word "support". Even as sensible a man as the minister backed away a little from the use of the word "support", although I shall quote his own words in a moment or two to indicate that he used several words where the simple word "support" would have done. I do this because this is an important matter and it is most desirable that we should have a clear understanding of these things. Otherwise we shall all be fooled and the public will be irritated. Of course, the public is irritated at the moment because a lot of them believed and, as I have said in this house before, were led to believe that somehow, if they bought a 3 per cent government bond at say par or better, it would not go below par.

A responsible member of the financial community once said that to me. I said to him, "Why cannot they go below par?" He said, "Because Mr. Ilsley said they would not." The parliamentary assistant shakes his head. I am not going to charge Mr. Ilsley with saying that—I am sure he did not say it—I am simply pointing out that that impression got abroad. I should like to read just what was said at that time.

The other evening in the committee the minister expressed a view which I thought was most sensible, as to interest rates and prices. I thought that he was using words in their proper sense, but I do not think his predecessors were quite as careful in all cases. I have here a statement got out in 1945 entitled "Victory Bond Prices" which I received from a most respectable source and which contains a statement by the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley and, more important and to me much more surprising, a statement which came from the Bank of Canada.

I cannot help but think how easy it must have been for a bond salesman, first, to make himself believe and, second, to make other people believe that this was virtually a guarantee that bonds would not go below par. What Mr. Ilsley said was quite general; it created what I would call a pleasant atmosphere toward the bonds. When I read the statement from the Bank of Canada hon. members will realize how far responsible people went to make themselves believe that low interest rates had become the law of the universe. Here is what Mr. Ilsley said:

> It will be of the greatest importance that we maintain, indeed assure, a ready and stable market for all these millions of bonds that we have sold. We have now the monetary and financial machinery and we have developed the methods for accomplishing this, and we will therefore be able to deal with any situation which may develop in a way which will keep faith with the millions of investors who are supporting the savings program in this national emergency.

There is nothing said there about guaranteeing bond prices, but I do not think anyone will disagree when I say that it would not need a very enthusiastic salesman to be able, as I said, to make himself believe and then to make his customer believe that what was really meant was that bonds would not go below par. Here is a statement taken from a Bank of Canada report which to me is surprising because it goes a good deal further. It reads as follows:

> Government bond prices reflect the level of interest rates. A decline in bond prices could happen only if interest rates were to rise. In my opinion, the needs of the future will require and enable the kind of monetary policy which has brought about the current level of interest rates. Continuance of this policy means stability in victory bond prices.

That does not say that the bonds will not go below par but I say again that I do not think it needed a very enthusiastic salesman to believe that. When I saw that statement I was surprised. It went further than I had realized that responsible authorities had ever gone. I have quoted this statement partly because I want to go on now and read a short statement the minister made in the committee. He said:

> I believe in the law of supply and demand with certain reservations. I do not believe there is any such thing as a fixed interest. I believe in the use of the interest rate, and so far as the government securities are concerned I think that the holder of government securities must buy them on this basis.

I would not disagree with a word of that. The only thing is I am sorry that responsible authorities ever led anyone to believe anything else. Of course in England they are busy now trying to reassert what I think all sensible people have believed, that fixed interest rates are something that are inimical to anything like a free economy. Continuing our discussion with the finance minister in the committee, we got onto the question of support, and I was a little surprised. The minister did not seem to like the word "support", but I am going to read what he said and leave it to any fair-minded man as to what these words mean. He said:

> All I think any government should ever attempt to do in the management of public debt is to see that there is an orderly and stable market for its securities, and the price that is paid for those should be determined over the long pull by the demand for them and by other matters of monetary policy in which of course no country can be entirely independent.

I come back to the words "orderly and stable market for its securities". I submit you can give no meaning to them whatever unless—and I think it a proper thing—it be that the government is supporting its securities just as we were definitely advised it did during the war and as it has done since. As a matter of fact up to 1948, I think it was, the Bank of Canada quite openly indicated what its paying prices were, and I hope we will have none of the make-believe which I suggest has taken place during the last few years. I do not think anyone who has cut his eye teeth in the financial community has any doubt whatever that assuring an orderly and stable market for securities means that you have to be ready to support the market. If it is going to have a sinking spell it would be in the highest degree foolish not to do so. We know it is done in England and elsewhere.

I have brought up these matters under the heading of monetary management. Someone may say: Well, are you not making an awful lot of fuss about the use of words? I do not think so because it seems to me that, unless we are going to be perfectly frank and clear with each other as to what is actually going on, unless our thinking is clear, our actions are apt to be foggy. I express the hope we will not have any more—what shall I say—by-passing of the words which describe what is actually going on.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sinclair: I think the hon. member for Greenwood has again done a service as far as the bond holders of Canada are concerned by drawing to the attention of the people once again that the interest rate on a bond is a price. I am glad he agrees with the statement the Minister of Finance made to the public accounts committee the other night. However, why I rise is not so much for that as to repeat, in fairness to the former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, the statements which he made when he was minister. It may be quite true that enthusiastic bond salesmen selling bonds during the war in patriotic drives may have led the individual citizen to believe that his bond was cashable at any time before maturity for face value. I am glad that the hon. member for Melfort just rose because my recollection is very clear that each year some member of the C.C.F. party—and it was generally the hon. member for Melfort—would rise and ask Mr. Ilsley whether or not he would guarantee that these bonds would be redeemable at any time for $100. On every occasion Mr. Ilsley was quite definite in saying no. He did think there would always be a good market for them and that the security of Canada was the best security that could be offered behind any bond, but at no time did he, speaking as minister of finance in the House of Commons, ever say or give any indication that they would always be redeemable at par. At the end of the war, the hon. member will recall, we put out one issue of savings bonds at a lower rate of interest which are redeemable, as is the case with the last issue, for their face value at any time. However, they were limited in the amount which could be held by any individual, and carried a lower rate of interest, which gets back to the point of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that in no one instrument can you expect high security, high liquidity and a high rate of interest.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make it clear that the farthest thing from my mind was to suggest that Mr. Ilsley ever did so. I think he was a good man in adversity. I think immense pressure must have been put on him to go as far as he would go, and he certainly avoided it.

Mr. Wright: The parliamentary assistant to the minister has indicated Mr. Ilsley's stand quite correctly with respect to suggestions made by myself and others in this group with regard to having victory bonds issued during the war made redeemable at par. He did not do that although Mr. Ilsley did indicate that no government could afford to allow these bonds to fluctuate too violently. I think that is a fair statement of what he said. However, recently the Minister of Finance has been selling bonds at a very slightly lower rate of interest than was paid on other bonds which are redeemable at par. They seem to have come around to that idea, and the bonds that have been issued in the past three years if held for ten years will yield an interest rate of approximately 3 per cent, which is about the same rate as was payable on some of the older bonds. Therefore it can be done and is being done.

I am glad that the hon. member for Greenwood has come around to the point where he realizes that there must be a stable market for Canadian bonds. We in this group believe that, as well as the dominion government having the responsibility for maintaining a reasonably stable market for Canadian bonds, it should also be prepared to maintain a reasonably balanced economy in this country through the operation of certain controls. Do not let anyone get away with the idea that we have not got controls today. There is the control of taxation. There is the rediscount rate of interest which is controlled by the Bank of Canada. There are controls on borrowing. The government is using all these controls to maintain a reasonably stable economy, and I think they are right in doing so.

Mr. Adamson: The fact is that the Bank of Canada is almost the sole bidder for government bonds at the present time.

On section 23—Uncollectable debts.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question on this section concerning uncollectable debts. I have noticed a few cases of companies going bankrupt and owing the department certain amounts for sales tax collected from their customers. I know of one company which, having collected sales taxes over a period of a year or so, owed them for that period or longer and then the company went into bankruptcy. I have personal knowledge of one or two companies where the department apparently made no attempt whatever to collect that sales tax from the estate. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to explain what is done by his department to collect these amounts owing in case of bankruptcies. Then, in the case of companies, I presume there is no criminal prosecution, but is there a criminal prosecution in the case of individuals owing sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: This section on uncollectable debts was very carefully canvassed by the public accounts committee two years ago. Then last year we made a report to the house in which we recommended the write-off on uncollectable debts up to 1940. The uncollectable tax debts to which the hon. member is referring are handled by the Department of National Revenue.

First of all, in the case of bankruptcies when there is sales tax which had been paid by the purchaser, and which is still owing by the manufacturer who went into bankruptcy, I believe that the crown has a priority in the bankruptcy proceeding. In most bankruptcy proceedings there is nothing left and you cannot collect, but the crown is at least the first creditor. In my experience I have never heard the Department of National Revenue criticized for being too lenient in attempting to recover taxes owing. In the second place, where the receiver of funds for the government, whether they be sales taxes or unemployment insurance premiums, misappropriates the funds he is subject to criminal prosecution which is undertaken by the Department of Justice.

On section 24—No payment out of C.R.F. without authority from parliament.

Mr. Drew: I should like to make a short observation on this section. It states in most explicit terms that, subject to the British North America Acts, 1867-1951, no payment shall be made out of the consolidated revenue fund without the authority of parliament. I desire to go back again to the fact that there is a clear declaration by statute, which we are now approving, which should be regarded as having a very positive meaning that no payment shall be made without parliament actually knowing it is going to be made for that particular purpose.

I should like to quote what the Minister of Finance said about that surplus as recorded at page 1729 of Hansard for December 10:

> . . . we can congratulate ourselves, I think, that we have had a substantial surplus so far this year; because if we had not had a surplus we would have been obliged to borrow additional new money to the tune of $300 million to finance housing, the C.N.R. and other government loans and investments, and another $200 million to meet maturing debt, or $500 million in all.

Now, that is what the Minister of Finance told the house a few days ago. What he says in that statement is that, in the budget estimates presented to this house, he did not disclose $200 million required for refinancing, and he did not disclose these other obligations which the government would have been called upon to meet. This means that the budget was incomplete, in so far as the information to this house was concerned, to the extent of $500 million.

It is no answer to say that a very desirable course has been followed in paying off that $200 million of public debt which was maturing out of surplus instead of refunding it or issuing any new form of securities. I come back to the point of section 24, which we are now called upon to adopt as the law of this country. It says that no payment shall be made without the authority of parliament, and that means with parliament knowing it is to be paid for a specific purpose. No matter how good the idea, no matter how desirable the purpose, it is not proper for the government to make this decision as to how the money will be spent. The decision must be made when the need for it has been disclosed to parliament and parliament has approved.

Mr. Sinclair: A very important point here is that, so far as the refunding of maturing debt is concerned, or the payment of it, that is authorized by the statute which authorized that borrowing to be made in the first place. The borrowing referred to this morning of $111 million authorized this spring for the Canadian National expenditures is the authority of parliament to make that borrowing, and whether the borrowing is done on the open market or out of funds currently held in the consolidated revenue fund is a matter for the discretion of the minister under section 17 of this act, part II, where he is given management of public funds.

Mr. Drew: The point I am making, Mr. Chairman, and I do submit it is an extremely important point, is this. While there can be no question about the authority of the minister under the statute to refinance maturing obligations, while there may be no question about the legal authority of the minister and of the government to appropriate any surplus for any purpose, I am simply pointing out that any surplus is an overtaxation above the amount which parliament has authorized. The fact that the government is going to use that overtaxation or surplus, whichever you call it, for a particular purpose, as it has a legal right to do, does not justify the government obtaining the approval of a plan of taxation which will raise that money without parliament knowing that the money is to be raised for that particular purpose; that is my point. There are a great many things for which the government can appropriate money under various statutes, but when it is said that the government may not make payments out of the consolidated revenue fund without the authority of parliament, I submit that means that parliament has the right to know in advance, before it approves the amount that will be made available to the government, exactly what the purpose is.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask one or two questions of the parliamentary assistant, so will the chairman call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: When we took recess at one o'clock we were at section 24. Shall the section carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York West said he had one or two questions to ask. He is not here yet. Might that section stand over?

The Chairman: Shall the section stand?

Mr. Sinclair: Stand.

On section 36—Accountable advances.

Mr. Wright: Subsection 3 of this section reads as follows:

> The comptroller may recover any accountable advance or any portion thereof that is not repaid or accounted for as required by subsection two out of any moneys payable by His Majesty to the person to whom the advance was made.

As a general principle, I think this is a perfectly sound one, namely the principle that moneys owing to the crown should be recoverable out of money which the crown owes to the subject. I want to point out, however, that even a good principle can go too far. As to this particular subsection, questions were asked in the committee and it was determined that money could be recovered out of old age pensions, out of children's allowances, out of dependents' pensions and compassionate pensions paid under the Pension Act. That is a good principle, I think, where the moneys are owed because some false statement has been made in the obtaining of that money. But the principle can be carried to a point where it will work a real hardship on some people. I want to give an instance of where this might occur.

In western Canada, from 1906 on to 1912 or 1913, numbers of seed grain advances were made to settlers. Many of these seed grain advances were never paid. There is set up in the department a board which reconsiders these old debts. I have had occasion to take certain cases before that board and have found that the board has been most considerate. But in some of these cases those old advances have now multiplied to such an extent that they are three times the amount that was originally owed. Interest has been compounded for thirty years on some of these debts.

In taking a case before that board, I have found that they have considered the assets of the debtors as at today, and that they have made reasonable settlements in cases where these debts have been taken before them. But these old-timers who settled in the west have now an added asset in their old age pensions, and that added asset may be added to their total assets in order to determine the amount of the loan which is repayable, if this particular section is to be applied as it reads here. If it is not to be applied as it reads here in the section of the act, some amendment should be made either in this act or—and I think this would be preferable—the Old Age Security Act.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare certainly gave us to understand that when this old age pension became payable, it would not be attachable from any source. Now the crown can attach the old age pension through this section. Not only can the crown attach the old age pension but they can attach, for money owed to the crown, family allowances. If this particular subsection 3 of section 36 is to stand, I certainly think some amendments should be made to the Family Allowances Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act and the Pension Act where it applies to dependents' allowances or compassionate allowances.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, the present discussion is appropriate under section 95, subsection 1. This section 36 is only as to regulations for the recovery of accountable advances made to persons in the public service. Section 95, subsections 1 and 2, is the section on debts due to the crown, and also there is provision there for the collection of old debts. Therefore if we let the matter stand until we get to section 95, I will speak to it then.

Mr. Wright: What about the seed grain loan? They are advances.

Mr. Sinclair: The seed grain loans or advances are not advances in this sense, that of being accountable advances made to a civil servant, for example, for travelling expenses, which he has to account for at the end of the year. That is section 36 which we are now discussing. But section 95, debts due to the crown, is the section which covers the remarks made by the hon. member, and that was the section under which we discussed the matter in the public accounts committee.

On section 38—Term of contract that money available.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to raise a question here as to the undesirability of importing into a contract terms which are not written into it and which are merely deemed to be there. This question was raised by the hon. member for Eglinton in the committee, and I propose to read something from his evidence. But first of all I want to meet the point which has been made—and I know it has been quite sincerely made—namely that the intent of this clause is to maintain the control of parliament over expenditures. Having said that, I wish now to read from evidence of the hon. member for Eglinton because I think he has made it clear, and I do not see any reason why the objective of those who framed the act cannot be achieved without running the risk which the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out. This is a quotation from the evidence of the hon. member for Eglinton in the committee:

> I can see the desirability for a provision like this from the point of view of maintaining parliamentary control over expenditure, but I am wondering how it is going to affect the rights of private persons contracting with the crown. Now, this seems to say that even though it is not made an express term of a contract entered into by the crown with a private person, nevertheless, by this legislation a term is imported into that contract which might work very seriously to the disadvantage of that person if he did not have the good fortune to be aware of the law. It may not be that that is the intention of the act, but it seems to me that that is a consequence that might flow from it.

Again, from the evidence of the hon. member for Eglinton:

> It seems to me there cannot be any objection to that term if it is written into the contract in every case, but I have a very strong aversion toward legislation which simply takes every government contract and says, whether there is a clause in there or not, it will be deemed that this clause is written in there, whether people contracting with the government know anything about it or not.

Before we go any further perhaps I might make this suggestion and it is certainly not said with any disrespect to the parliamentary assistant. This is a legal question and since the hon. member for Eglinton who is a lawyer is not here, and the Minister of Finance who is also a lawyer is not here, perhaps this clause might stand.

Mr. Sinclair: I can give the explanation which the minister gave when he came before the committee two nights ago on this very clause. It has always been a term of government contracts that there was a condition that a parliamentary appropriation would have to be passed. That is the first question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the parliamentary assistant mean an implied term?

Mr. Sinclair: It has been a term as far as practice is concerned. I am quite sure any contractor who consulted his lawyer with regard to the terms of such a contract would learn that since confederation it has been to the knowledge of every contractor doing business with the government that first of all a parliamentary appropriation would have to be passed; and second, there would have to be unencumbered funds in that amount. The first situation which arises is mainly owing to the climatic conditions of this country. Our estimates are brought down during the course of the spring session. They are generally not approved until June or July. Public works in the northern part of the country, if they are not commenced in May or June, are very likely not to be finished before the cold weather arrives. Contractors have been willing to undertake those contracts with the knowledge that if parliament did not approve the appropriation then there would be no money forthcoming. But the minister did point out that since confederation there has never been an occasion like that. The different point that arises of course is one which could have arisen in 1949 where, between the submission of the estimates in the house and their final approval by the house, an election intervened. In that case I think the contractor would be doubly careful not to embark on any contract with respect to which there might be some likelihood of another government coming in and not going ahead with it.

All that this section 38 now contains in statutory form is the practice which has been followed since confederation. The point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton was not that. He went along with that, but he thought that it should be a term written and spelled out in every government contract that this was subject to an appropriation of parliament being voted and being available. It was pointed out at that time that the great bulk of government contracts are not affected by this consideration. It is the contracts which are awarded for work such as those which, because of the short construction season in many parts of Canada, have to be commenced late in the spring if they are to be done at all. And certainly every contractor who puts in a bid for that type of work is well aware that there has been this practice since confederation, of there being a contingency of payment that parliament should pass the appropriation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The parliamentary assistant has spoken with great certainty. What he actually says is that this practice is within the knowledge of every contractor. That is a pretty broad statement. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Eglinton, who is a man of very considerable legal practice and not a man who shies at shadows, was equally positive that he did not think this was within the knowledge of every contractor, and that there may be cases where the practice is not known. The question I want to ask is: Can there be any possible objection to having it written in the statute that it has to be written in the contract? Can there be any possible conceivable objection to that?

Mr. Sinclair: It was pointed out the other evening that, as far as the big contracts are concerned, the contracts to which this thing might apply, the contractors knew. When I say "every contractor knows", I mean every contractor who is going to bid on one of these northern projects.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why not the little fellows, too?

Mr. Sinclair: The ordinary tens of thousands of little purchasing orders which the government undertakes yearly are not affected by this type of condition, and certainly there would be no point in inserting that stipulation in every little purchasing order made by the government. That was the opinion expressed by the minister and by the deputy minister of finance when this point was raised in the public accounts. The fact that never since confederation has the issue arisen shows that the practice is well understood by those who are contracting for this type of work.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think that is fair comment, but I do not think it covers the case fully. I come back again—and I am not going to take the time of the committee on this—to the point, and say that nothing has been said yet which makes me believe that there is any difficulty in these contracts. I have no doubt that a formal clause could be put in, but you could make some reservation, if you want to protect cases where there is merely an exchange of letters, or something of that kind. But I do not think any effective answer has been made to the request of the hon. member for Eglinton.

On section 63—Accounts of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to say a word about this section. I had rather hoped that some change might be made in the form of casting up the public accounts, bringing them nearer to the income and expenditure system which is practised in business; but I must confess that after hearing the arguments made, after hearing the practices and reviews made in Great Britain quoted, I was convinced that probably no substantial change should be made. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will not mind my saying that I quoted him once or twice as having referred to the somewhat unusual way in which public accounts are kept, compared with those of private corporations; and I also quoted anonymously a preceding minister of finance who used to speak in the same way. I must confess the great aim of public accounts, which is to maintain the authority of parliament year by year, seems to me to be served by the present system, and therefore I have no criticisms to offer.

Mr. Adamson: The question I have to ask arises from a statement of the Minister of Finance. I asked about the redemption of securities that were paid off and he said he did not have the information there at that time. I would imagine it would be under this clause that securities redeemed and paid for would be enumerated.

Mr. Sinclair: Was this question asked in the public accounts committee?

Mr. Adamson: No; it was asked in the house. I am not a member of the public accounts committee. I asked the Minister of Finance what were the serials, what were the securities that were paid off? He mentioned that a certain number of securities were paid off, and that the surplus had been used for that purpose. I would imagine that under this clause the numbers and the amounts of the dominion government securities redeemed would be mentioned.

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member is referring to the statement that part of the surplus this year was used to meet the maturities which became due this year, they are normally shown in the public accounts, but of course the present year's retirements will not be shown in the last volume of public accounts because it has to do with the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951.

Mr. Adamson: I see that. My point is, there is no way of knowing where the current repayments of our funded debt are shown; that is, they are not shown until a year later in the public accounts committee.

Mr. Sinclair: That is true of all the public accounts of Canada. But any member of parliament who wants specific information on a current transaction can put a question on the order paper and receive from the department the information he wishes to have.

Mr. Adamson: I realize that. I did ask the Minister of Finance, and he said he did not have the information. I feel it would be helpful if some arrangement could be made, when a certain security is redeemed and paid off, to have the information brought down and tabled in the house.

On section 76—Crown corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some comments with respect to section 76, the first of the sections under part VIII, which deals with crown corporations. I believe this part of the bill does a good deal to clarify the situation. However, there are two points I should like to raise. First of all, a good many of the crown corporations are incorporated under the provisions of the dominion Companies Act. While I appreciate that there may have been some convenience in that—and, it may be, an overwhelming convenience—nevertheless on the face of it it seems to me undesirable that crown corporations should be incorporated under a statute which gives the powers given by the Companies Act. Many of those powers are utterly unsuitable to an emanation of the crown.

For example, let me refer to a few of the powers given under section 32 of the dominion Companies Act. Under that section a company has power to carry on any other business which may seem to the company capable of being conveniently carried on; it has power to purchase or otherwise acquire and undertake all or any of the assets of any other company; it has power to amalgamate or enter into partnership, and so on. I will not go through the list of them.

Members of the committee will agree that those to which I have referred are not powers suitable for crown corporations set up for very definite purposes. I would like to hear some comment from the parliamentary assistant; and perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce might care to comment upon it. This question of powers is of some importance. There may be other controls within the departments concerned which may hedge these broad powers round. Of course one is not going to assume that the directors will be so irresponsible as to take advantage of powers to which perhaps they have a technical right, but which they were never intended to enjoy.

It does not seem to me a sensible practice to have companies incorporated with powers they were not intended to have. I am wondering whether there is any real objection to these powers being spelled out in the statutes, as actually is the case in connection with some of the crown corporations.

Mr. Sinclair: In answer may I point out first of all that this bill has nothing to do with the actual form of incorporation of crown companies. What it is doing for the first time is to give a uniform measure of financial control over those companies divided into the categories set out in the schedule. Why some crown companies were set up under the dominion Companies Act, and other crown companies set up under special statutes of parliament, is a question I cannot answer. Further, it is a question beyond the scope of the bill.

The purpose of the bill is to provide a uniform method of financial control for the various types of crown corporations, and to provide for their annual reporting to parliament, through the appropriate minister. Perhaps the point raised by the hon. member could be dealt with more adequately by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the crown companies that are of major importance at the moment are those that compete in fields which are not occupied by private industry and are not likely to be occupied by private industry, but which have the same problems as are met by privately-owned companies formed under the Companies Act.

It is my own theory that they should have the same latitude as private companies, subject to the checks provided through government ownership. All such companies must have their budgets for the year approved by the governor in council. I believe it is to be the practice that the budgets will be examined in future by a committee of parliament. I have suggested some time in the past that that be done, but parliament has never taken any particular interest in that phase of the matter. After obtaining approval they are allowed to proceed to carry out the approved items in the budget, pretty much as management shall decide, but with a close check on finances by the department and by the Auditor General.

I think it would be a mistake to limit the powers of a crown company to the extent that its management could not carry on business as effectively as could a private company in the same field. We have two very prosperous crown companies; and I think the reason for their prosperity is that their directors have been able to function as well under government ownership as they would have if the companies had been privately owned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And, as the minister has explained, the reason is that they are not crown companies: they are his companies.

Mr. Howe: Well—

Mr. Adamson: Would the new St. Lawrence authority come under this regulation?

Mr. Sinclair: Not yet, because it has not been established. The departmental corporations, agency corporations and proprietary corporations set out in the schedule provide the classifications in which any new crown agency would be placed. Where it should be placed will be decided when the time comes. The Minister of Trade and Commerce now informs me it will come under schedule C.

Mr. Adamson: And the audit of expenditures, whether it be a company authority, or in some other form, would come under this section?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes; section 77 refers to the audit of crown companies. Most of the audits are carried on by the Auditor General. I am informed it is the intention that the St. Lawrence seaway authority will be audited by the Auditor General, and his report is of course submitted to parliament.

Mr. Green: Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce name the two companies to which he had reference a moment ago?

Mr. Howe: The Polymer corporation and Eldorado. They are the two producers.

Mr. Green: Both have monopolies, have they not?

Mr. Howe: Yes; if they did not have monopolies they would be crown companies in a competitive field, which is contrary to government policy.

Mr. Wright: When the bill was before the public accounts committee I endeavoured to have an amendment made to one of the sections whereby not only would the annual statements of crown corporations have to be tabled in the house, but they would have to be placed before some special standing committee of the house for consideration. My amendment was ruled out of order.

I agreed that it might not have been in order, although as a result of it it was found necessary to change another section which had been passed earlier. No one had noticed that in that section there was a reference to a special committee of the house.

Two years ago and again this year, in its recommendations to the house, the public accounts committee has recommended that the annual statements of these crown corporations should be placed before special standing committees. I asked Dr. Clark, the deputy minister, if there was any reason from his department why these annual statements should not be placed before special committees. He said that in his opinion there was no reason.

Today the government is in business in a big way. Some of these crown corporations are handling more money than is being handled by some departments of government. I referred in particular to the wheat board and I suggested that that board be placed in one of the schedules to the act. It was pointed out to me that there were certain disadvantages in doing that, and I agreed. Probably there are regulations in the act which would not be applicable to the wheat board. However, we have this wheat board, a crown corporation, handling hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of the growers' money each year. Those growers have no way of checking the annual statements beyond reading them. There is no body representing the growers before which the annual statements of the board can be placed and considered by the growers. They must depend upon this House of Commons to do that for them.

When the act was brought in the then Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the annual statement of the wheat board would be placed before the agricultural committee at each session, but that has not been done for the last three years. Someone may say that we would have a chance to discuss this matter under the estimates. I have before me the estimates for 1951-52 and there is no item in them dealing with the wheat board.

The wheat board is not handling government money; it is handling the growers' money. The wheat board was set up to handle the assets of the farmers of western Canada. As a parliament we have the responsibility of seeing that each year the statement of the wheat board is placed before a committee of this house so the officers of the board may be questioned. I am a firm believer in the wheat board and I think the present officers are doing an excellent job. I do not think there is any doubt about the accounting they are giving, but if the wheat board is to function satisfactorily I think each year its statement should be placed before a standing committee of this house, preferably the agricultural committee, so that the growers may feel that there is some responsible section of parliament giving consideration to these annual statements. I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to tell us just why these annual statements have not been placed before the agricultural committee for the last three years.

Mr. Howe: The annual report of the wheat board was placed before the agricultural committee in 1949. I have said many times, as reports of crown companies are laid on the table of the house, that if any committee was interested in having the reports referred to them I would be delighted to sponsor such reference. I made that offer to the agricultural committee this year but I was informed that the committee did not care to hear the officers of the wheat board.

Mr. Wright: That is hardly a correct statement. That has not been done for the last three sessions. Last year I wrote the chairman of the agricultural committee asking that the committee be called together for the purpose of considering amendments to the Canada Grain Act and I was told that the committee was not going to be called together. If the committee had been called it was my intention to ask that the accounts of the Canadian wheat board be placed before it. Although I was a member of that committee I was refused the right to have the committee called together to consider the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. Howe: The committee could have been called together to examine the report of the wheat board if that had been the wish of the committee. Evidently it was not. If my hon. friend called their attention to it and the committee did not take action he can hardly blame the minister. I would have been delighted to refer the report to the committee. As a matter of fact, I made inquiry as to when the officers of the wheat board could be present in Ottawa and I gave that information to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Wright: The committee did not meet although it was requested that they should. I am not blaming the minister for that because it is not his responsibility. It is the responsibility of the government to call a committee when a member asks that it be called.

Mr. Sinclair: I was asked earlier about the St. Lawrence seaway and I have been advised that when the Minister of Transport was piloting through the bill he said that that would be regarded as a crown corporation and therefore would come within section 76 (3) of this bill.

Mr. Knowles: He also gave the undertaking that the necessary order in council would be passed.

Mr. Adamson: I was interested in the method of financing that necessary work.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The question raised by the hon. member for Melfort has been left in a most unsatisfactory position. I do not think it is a very practical answer for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give when he says that a committee could ask to have a report brought before it if it so desired. There are some crown corporations for which there is no relevant committee. I think the hon. member for Melfort has made a practical suggestion. After all, let us be realistic about this. Committees always have a government majority and do not meet unless the government wishes them to meet. Some practical means should be provided, even though it is nothing more than an undertaking.

These crown corporations are becoming increasingly important, and with the various things that are on people's minds it should not be left to the initiative of somebody, we do not know who, to decide that this shall be done with these reports. In the name of common sense, let us devise some plan. Either the minister or the parliamentary assistant stated that it was a reasonable thing to do. If it is a reasonable thing to do, why not take reasonable means to see that it is done.

Mr. Sinclair: This Financial Administration Act does not provide the means of seeing that it is done. Once a report is tabled in parliament it is in the possession of the House of Commons, not of the government. It is quite true that today the annual reports of the C.N.R., the T.C.A. and the C.B.C. are referred to committees. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that he is more than willing to have the reports of other crown corporations referred to committees.

It has been said that there are some crown corporations which do not come within the ambit of existing committees, but I would point out that the annual reports of all but four of the crown corporations are contained in the public accounts, and even those four will be after this year, and the public accounts committee could consider any which did not fall clearly within the jurisdiction of existing committees.

The hon. member for Melfort has pointed out that for the second time the public accounts committee has recommended that the house should refer these reports to committees when they are tabled, but I repeat that the Financial Administration Act is not an act under which we should consider just how annual reports should be dealt with after presentation to parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That last remark is probably justified and I was not suggesting that that be done here and now. What I had hoped for was some indication that the matter would be pursued. Is the reference of the report of the Canadian National Railways to the committee each year something which must be originated each year or is there some standing arrangement whereby that is done?

Mr. Sinclair: It is my recollection that when the Minister of Transport tables the annual reports of the C.N.R. and T.C.A. he then moves that those reports be referred to the special committee on railways and shipping owned and operated by the government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think that is the complete answer. That is exactly what I was hoping the parliamentary assistant was going to say. Why should that not be done with regard to other reports? Why should they not be referred to the appropriate committee in each case, and if there is no appropriate committee why not adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Melfort and set up a kind of catch-all committee? As to that last suggestion, perhaps the parliamentary assistant will say that the public accounts committee is the catch-all committee. I am not so sure that is right. I would think that some of these reports might much more reasonably be referred to other committees. Some of them deal particularly with agriculture and they might be referred to the standing committee on agriculture. I understand the hon. member for Melfort would be satisfied if the same procedure were adopted with regard to such reports as that which is adopted with respect to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Howe: I might point out with respect to the complaint of the hon. member for Melfort that he asked that the standing committee on agriculture be called together to amend the Canada Grain Act, which is something quite different. It was not called for that purpose, and he said that if it had been he had intended to ask the committee to call before it the officers of the Canadian wheat board. I suggest that is pretty remote as far as censuring the government is concerned.

Mr. Wright: I must say that at some stage in every session I have asked in speeches I have made that the annual accounts of the Canadian wheat board be referred to the committee on agriculture. I do not think there has been a session in which I have not made that request. I would be very well satisfied if the minister would accept the suggestion and carry out the procedure followed by the government with respect to Canadian National Railways. When these annual statements of crown corporations are tabled in the house the minister tabling them could refer them to the appropriate committee. I do not think the public accounts committee is the appropriate committee to which all these annual statements should be referred. For instance the report of the agricultural prices support board would naturally go to the committee on agriculture. Then there is the fisheries support board, and I think its report should go to a different committee. Each crown corporation falls naturally within the scope of some standing committee of the house. I do not think they should all be referred to the public accounts committee.

If the public accounts committee carries out its job of examining the public accounts each year it has a pretty full schedule before it. It could handle some of the annual statements but certainly I do not think it should handle them all. I do not think they would fall naturally within their purview. Committees of the house are usually set up having in mind the interest of members in the particular subject with which the committee deals. I think these annual statements when tabled by the ministers should be referred to the appropriate committee. I think the government is quite capable of deciding what is the appropriate committee. I think the same procedure should be followed as in the case of Canadian National Railways. When a report is tabled it should be referred by the minister concerned to some standing committee of the house.

Mr. Howe: There is a procedure which my hon. friend could always have followed in order to bring any report before any committee he liked provided he was a member of the committee. That procedure was not to make a speech in the House of Commons. The procedure is to call the committee together, make his request to the committee and have the committee request that the matter be referred to it. That procedure was always open to him, and to my knowledge he has never followed it.

Mr. Wright: I beg your pardon. Last year as a member of the standing committee on agriculture I wrote a letter to the chairman, a copy of which I sent to the appropriate committee clerk, asking that the committee be called together for a specific purpose, and my request was refused.

On section 77—Auditor General eligible.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is one point I wish to raise.

The Chairman: On 77?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, I think I can raise it on 77. Perhaps I should have raised it on 76. I have been looking over the directorates of crown corporations and I think there is one comment that should be made. Companies that are carrying on outside business in the ordinary commercial way have a considerable number of outside directors on their boards. That seems sensible to me because businessmen ought to be able to make some contribution from their experience outside. Some crown companies have boards composed exclusively of civil servants. I think in some cases that is perfectly reasonable because where a company is what one might call a purely legal creation for the purpose of carrying out certain decisions of a department then I would not question the board being composed wholly of civil servants. However, in cases where that is not so—and I say this with the utmost deference to civil servants for whom I have high regard—and where the members of the board are expected to bring independent judgment to the decisions that are made, I do not think it is fair to have civil servants as members because unless they are men of outstanding courage, and probably independent income also, it is not fair to expect them to hold a view contrary to that of the minister.

I am not saying this by way of complaint because in most cases I have seen, where companies are carrying on an independent life, they have independent boards. I have not examined them all carefully enough to know exactly where the division comes, but I put that forward because it seems to me to be a sensible principle.

Mr. Sinclair: Once again, this bill has nothing to do with the appointment of directors to the various crown corporations. That is provided for under the various statutes incorporating the corporations. The purpose of this bill is to provide for uniform financial control, audit and report to parliament of the corporations that have already been set up. The observations made by the hon. member would be perfectly in order with respect to any of the crown corporations mentioned so far as their own acts of incorporation are concerned, but they have nothing to do with this financial administration bill.

Mr. Coldwell: Under what audit does the national film board come?

Mr. Sinclair: The national film board is not a body corporate. It is part of a department of government. It would come under schedule A, Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Coldwell: I asked the question because we have looked into the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on a number of occasions, and I want to take this opportunity to say that, inasmuch as we have investigated the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation this session, I think provision should be made next session to review the work of the national film board in the same manner. I think members of parliament are not familiar with its work and I think the board should have an opportunity to appear before a parliamentary committee and members of parliament should have an opportunity of going into its operations.

Sections 78 and 79 agreed to.

On section 80—Budgets.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The first subsection refers to "each agency corporation," and the agency corporations are in schedule C which contains Canadian Arsenals Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation, and so on. The subsection reads:

> Each agency corporation shall annually submit to the appropriate minister an operating budget for the next following financial year . . .

Subsection 2 reads:

> For each corporation the appropriate minister shall annually lay before parliament the capital budget . . .

As I understand the use of the words "capital budget" it means just what it says, that we are not going to get an operating statement. If I am wrong on that point I will be very glad to be corrected, but if I am right I do not see why under subsection 2 we should not have—if I am using the words as used by the department—both a capital and an operating budget. After all, we are responsible for finding the money to operate.

Mr. Sinclair: I think that question was best answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a moment ago. After all, an agency corporation is in effect an agent of one of the departments. But these other corporations, which are set up independent of the operations of any department, may very often, as the member for Greenwood pointed out, have directors who are not civil servants, directors who are chosen from the business life of the country. Some of these businesses are very successful. These corporations should have a certain degree of independence such as they would have if they were private corporations. I believe that the member for Greenwood, who has just made this plea that these corporations should be directed by men with real business training, would be the first to realize that these directors, if asked to prepare an operating budget which is going to be subject to the direction or control of parliament, would say we might as well be an agency of the government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How does the parliamentary assistant read the word "corporation" in subsection 2? Does he read that as meaning a proprietary corporation or an agency corporation or does he read it as meaning all crown corporations generally?

Mr. Sinclair: In section 78 it says that sections 79 to 88 inclusive apply to agency and proprietary corporations. Unless one is specifically mentioned as either type of corporation, it means both agency and proprietary corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then the distinction which was made is wrong, because the distinction which the parliamentary assistant has just made, if I understood it correctly, was on the basis that this would apply to proprietary corporations.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right, but proprietary corporations were the ones which did not have to submit their operating budgets. Both types of corporation have to submit their capital budgets.

On section 81—Bank accounts.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to set out my understanding of subsection 3 of section 81, and ask the parliamentary assistant if that is his understanding, too. I believe it is a matter of some importance, so I shall read subsection 3:

> Notwithstanding the other provisions of this section, where the appropriate minister and the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the governor in council, so direct, a corporation shall pay to the receiver general so much of the money administered by it as the appropriate minister and the Minister of Finance consider to be in excess of the amount required for the purposes of the corporation, and any money so paid may be applied towards the discharge of any obligation of the corporation to His Majesty, or may be applied as revenues of Canada.

What I want to ask is this. Whatever earnings are applied to the revenues of Canada are in aid of the taxpayer. My understanding is, and it is this I want to have confirmed, that in considering the accounts of any such corporation the minister will consider the question of what is capital and what is income according to the normal accounting methods; that is to say, as nearly as possible to what an ordinary, prudent corporation would do, and whatever is prudently regarded as income will be applied to the revenues of Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: That is exactly the situation.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Section 82 agreed to.

On section 83—Awarding of contracts.

Mr. Adamson: This is the section under which contracts are let by the various crown agencies. I gather that under this section there is complete freedom in the method of letting contracts. In other words, one year a crown company may call for open tenders to do a certain amount of work; the next year may appoint the Department of Public Works to do a certain amount of work; the next year may make a private contract without public knowledge at all, for another piece of work. Is my interpretation correct?

Mr. Sinclair: To begin with, so far as proprietary corporations are concerned, they obviously must be given the same freedom as any other private company such as the C.P.R. or the Hudson's Bay Company. So far as an agency corporation is concerned, since they are closer to the government in one sense, they come under the same conditions for contractual commitments as would a department of government. This section 83 would exercise more control over the way in which agency corporations can undertake contracts than has existed before.

So far as the proprietary corporation is concerned, however, it has the same latitude as any private company.

Mr. Adamson: A proprietary corporation such as Eldorado or Polymer may make a private contract without calling any open tenders or could ask the government to do the work? They are completely free to undertake work without consulting the government or the treasury board in any way?

Mr. Sinclair: Since the hon. member cited Eldorado, I shall put it this way. The directors have exactly the same powers, so far as operating their business is concerned, as would the directors of Hollinger.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Am I right in thinking Eldorado is a company incorporated under the dominion Companies Act?

Mr. Sinclair: Eldorado is under the dominion Companies Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): So there is no regulation of any kind which limits the powers of the directors under the dominion Companies Act. There is nothing as between them and the department or between them and the minister; they are literally just as free as if they were the directors of a private company.

Mr. Sinclair: There is the same judgment exercised by the directors of a private company as by the directors of a proprietary corporation as to the use they can make of the powers given to them. Both of them are anxious to make the greatest possible success of their operation.

Mr. Adamson: This applies to Central Mortgage and Housing as well? They have the right, without calling public tenders, to undertake a housing project? They could do that under this section?

Mr. Sinclair: But obviously Central Mortgage and Housing are under scrutiny by parliament, and they are going to conduct their affairs in the very best and most businesslike way.

Mr. Adamson: I am not contesting that argument at all. I am just saying that this machinery allows them to undertake, without calling public tenders, the work that they require to have done.

Mr. Sinclair: They have the same powers as would any other private corporation incorporated under the dominion Companies Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not propose to take any more of the time of the committee on this, but I do not wish my silence to indicate I am convinced.

On section 89—Notice to persons failing to pay over public money.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wish to make one comment here which might be of interest to the committee. When this bill was before the public accounts committee I asked a question as to whether government officials were bonded or whether the risk was carried inside the four corners of the government operation. We were told it was carried within the government operation. The reason I have risen to my feet is that we were given figures showing the small amount lost in all the years, and they were astonishing. If the parliamentary assistant has those figures, will he give them to the committee?

Mr. Sinclair: I am gratified by the hon. member's suggestion, because it is an indication of the high calibre of our civil servants. There is one section, section 98, which spells it out specifically. When we reach that section I shall put on the record the losses over the last few years.

Section agreed to.

Sections 90 to 94 inclusive agreed to.

On section 95—Debts due to crown.

Mr. Wright: I do not want to repeat the argument which I made on section 36 and which the parliamentary assistant to the minister stated should be made under section 95. He indicated that he would answer me on section 95.

Mr. Sinclair: As far as seed grain debts are concerned, I find that they are covered by a separate statute, an act respecting certain debts due to the crown, assented to in April, 1927. That is the statute under which the adjustments to which the hon. member referred have been made. This statute still is the governing statute as far as these particular types of debts are concerned. There is therefore no change in the practice.

Mr. Wright: There is a change in the practice. I understand that under that statute the assets of the applicant are taken into consideration in determining the amount that he should pay on his debt. He will now have an added asset, under the Old Age Security Act, as a result of the payment of so much each month. If I understand the act correctly, that will be included in his assets and will be taken into consideration.

Mr. Sinclair: It is scarcely an asset in the ordinary way of describing an asset. It is a future income. Even if the same recipient had come due a private annuity which brought him $40 a month for a period of time, that would not be regarded as an asset but would be regarded as current income. If that type of thing was in the past regarded as coming within the scope of this debt adjustment act, then probably the old age pension payments are too. I can find out definitely for the hon. member and give him a written statement on it.

Mr. Wright: Does the parliamentary assistant to the minister not consider that these payments made under the Family Allowances Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act and under the Pension Act where they are paid on compassionate grounds or to dependents of veterans, are in a special class and that they should not be attached under this section of the act for debts owed to the crown?

Mr. Sinclair: As to debts owed to the crown, it is quite easy to say that there should be no attachments. But there is another person who should be considered and that is the taxpayer, the man who has put up the money for all government payments. If an overpayment of crown money has been made to an individual, then I think most of the taxpayers of this country would think that there should be some right of recovery out of other payments made to that person from the consolidated revenue fund. As to the actual practice, it is unlikely that the mother receiving family allowance is going to have any substantial debt due to the crown on which recovery is going to be attempted. I think it is almost as unlikely that there will be many persons at age 70 who will owe substantial debts to the crown. If they have been overpaid through old age pension payments or disability pension payments and things like that, I think that most of the taxpayers of Canada, knowing that these people had obtained too much money out of public funds, would expect the treasury of Canada to try to recover those overpayments out of future payments from the treasury of Canada.

Mr. Wright: I agree with the minister where the overpayment has been as a result of the particular act under which the pension or allowance is being paid. But where it is a debt that has no connection with that act, where it is a debt that has been acquired perhaps fifteen or twenty years previously, and is a debt that is still owing to the crown, I do not think that it should become attachable under this section.

I agree with the parliamentary assistant to the minister that where false statements have been made or where overpayments have been made—even by mistake—to the recipients of the particular pension in question, they should be recoverable; but as to debts that may have been owed to the crown twenty or thirty years previously and are still owing because of the inability of the debtor to meet those debts, when eventually he comes to the age of 70 years and becomes eligible for the old age pension, this provision allows the crown to collect those debts; in fact, it makes it almost compulsory for the crown to do so. I think that the parliamentary assistant to the minister will find that there will be a good many cases where debts have been owed to the crown for a number of years and where now there will be an asset on which the crown can collect. Outside of something that has to do with the act itself, I do not think that these pensions under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Family Allowances Act or the Pension Act in connection with pensions to dependents or parents on compassionate grounds, should be attachable for old debts that had no connection whatsoever with the act itself. I think that the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Family Allowances Act and the acts covering pensions paid to dependents of veterans and those paid on compassionate grounds under the Pension Act, should be amended to provide that the pension would not be attachable for those ancient debts that might have been acquired by the citizen during a former period.

On section 24—No payment out of C.R.F. without authority from parliament.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, the questions I wanted to ask on section 24 I have asked subsequently on section 63, and they concern the repayment of the funded debt. I therefore have no further objection to section 24 carrying.

On the title.

Mr. Blackmore: Was not the assistant to the minister going to put a statement on the record that was of interest?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes. I have here a statement of the government officers guarantee fund showing the premiums, interest added, total credits, net payments from fund on defalcations and closing balance. As the hon. member for Greenwood says, in view of the large amounts of money which are handled by the civil service of Canada, I think it is quite a tribute to their efficiency and honesty that the loss should be so small. It is a tribute not only to the honesty of the civil service but also, I suggest, to the extremely effective internal audits and other treasury controls over the public moneys that we have all across Canada. I think it would be of interest to have this statement put on the record.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the statement be put on the record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The statement is as follows:

[3]Interest on the fund was terminated at the close of 1949-50. Rate reduced from 10 to 2 cents per $100 of coverage.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add a word to what the parliamentary assistant has said. At a time when there seem to be places where the standard is not quite so high, I think we can congratulate ourselves and remind ourselves that, whatever our differences are, we have no difference in feeling that the civil service is a fine organization and that it belongs to us all.

Mr. Sinclair: I had rather anticipated that because of current developments elsewhere a question would be asked somewhere along the route with regard to our audit of tax funds, and that is why I am so particularly pleased that we should have this on the record. I think it is a tribute to our British parliamentary system. It is a tribute not only to the high quality of our civil service and to the efficiency of the internal audit of the treasury board but to this great institution we have in our parliamentary system, namely the office of the Auditor General, reporting direct to the House of Commons.

Mr. Adamson: I have not seen that statement. Have there been any cases at all of persons taking bribes?

Mr. Sinclair: This statement does not refer quite to that matter, but to misappropriation of public funds. However, the same remarks can be applied to tax collections. Across the years I think every member of parliament has heard of an occasional instance of that. For example, I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I, in our own home town, remember a prosecution launched by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in Vancouver last year, in the case of one junior official attempting to extort money from a taxpayer. The thing that I think pleased the people at home was how quickly that attempt was discovered—even by the junior official—because of the system of checks within the national revenue department itself, the checks that treasury board has, the financial control of the finance department and then finally the exercise of the audit by the office of the Auditor General. Attempts to do these things are occasionally tried in very small amounts, but are always detected. Each year there may be one or two instances across Canada where an attempt is made to do something along that line. The great tribute to the service is how extremely rare such attempts are, and how quickly they are caught up with, when attempted. The people of Canada have good reason to be proud of the honesty and efficiency of our tax offices. And the other thing is the remarkable record as far as the civil servants are concerned who are handling the very large amounts of money which the treasury of Canada does handle.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, and it is a tribute to the kind of employees we have in the civil service that there have been so few attempts.

Mr. Adamson: I want to join with the parliamentary assistant and say how pleased I am as a Canadian and as a member of this house at the extremely high standard of probity and honesty of all levels of the civil service of Canada.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before proceeding with the next bill, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move concurrence in the Senate amendments to the Railway Act and to the Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act. They are on page 5 of today's order paper and on page 317 of the Votes and Proceedings of Friday, December 14.

Mr. Green: Will the Minister of Public Works, or the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport, explain them?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will explain them as soon as the order is called.

RAILWAY ACT

IMPLEMENTING CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: The first amendment is on page 4 of Bill No. 12, lines 26 to 29, and reads as follows:

Delete paragraph (b) and substitute the following:

"(b) may, in addition, specify class rates between specified points on the railway and when rates are established in groups the rates to or from individual points in the groups may be higher or lower than the rates specified under paragraph (a)."

The amendment reads:

may, in addition, specify class rates between points on the railway—

And here are the words:

and when rates are established in groups the rates to or from individual points in the groups . . .

That is satisfactory to the government. The next amendment is on page 5, line 22, and reads:

After "competition" delete "actually."

The next amendment is on page 8, line 36, and reads as follows:

After "act" insert "except section three hundred and thirty-two A."

The government is satisfied, and I move the amendments.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Adamson.]

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO DEFINE LIMIT OF THE PORT AND AUTHORIZE COMMISSIONERS TO CONTROL CONSTRUCTION OF PIPES OR PIPE LINES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 9, to amend the Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act.

Mr. Adamson: What are the amendments?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On page 1 of Bill No. 9 at line 19, after the word "act", insert the words "to control and regulate".

Mr. Adamson: Section 3?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 3. The second amendment is on page 1, line 24, and reads as follows:

Delete the words "in the opinion of the commissioners" and substitute therefor the word "adversely."

The third amendment is as follows: On page 2, lines 8 to 16, delete subclause 3 and substitute therefor the following:

(3) Section twenty-one of the said act is further amended by adding thereto immediately following paragraph (g) the following as paragraph (gg):

(gg) When any person, carrying on business for the purpose of processing and/or distributing bulk petroleum products upon and from lands now or hereafter used for such purpose within the port and harbour of Toronto, has been receiving such bulk petroleum products by water into the said port and harbour for such purposes, shall hereafter receive such bulk petroleum products in the said port and harbour through or by means of any pipeline, the corporation may impose upon any such person or upon any other person using such lands for the purpose of processing and distributing bulk petroleum products within the area of the said port and harbour, an annual charge not exceeding the amount of the harbour dues received by the corporation in respect of transportation of bulk petroleum products by water by such person into the said port and harbour during the whole of the calendar year immediately preceding the calendar year in which alternative transportation by pipeline shall commence, as a compensation to the corporation in whole or in part for the annual loss of revenue sustained by the corporation by reason of the substitution of transportation by pipeline into the said port and harbour for transportation by water as aforesaid: Provided, however, that—

(i) the period in respect of which the corporation may impose any such annual charge shall expire on December 31, 1961;

(ii) the annual revenue received by the corporation from any such person for transportation of petroleum products into and out of the said port and harbour by water shall be applied as a credit against any such annual charge;

(iii) if any person shall cease to carry on the business of receiving and/or distributing bulk petroleum products in the said port and harbour for such purposes through or by means of a pipeline, then the said annual charge imposed upon any such person shall cease; and

(iv) the corporation may without by-law enter into agreements with any person or persons for the purpose of fixing and collecting compensation in lieu of imposing such annual charge by by-law;

Mr. Adamson: I was in the committee when this took place and I took exception to the passing of this bill by the commons committee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is probably why the Senate amended it.

Mr. Adamson: At last the Senate has justified its existence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member for York West seems to agree to the substance of this amendment, and the government sees no objection to it.

Mr. Green: May I ask a question? Is it a fact that these amendments are the result of an agreement between the Toronto harbour commission and the people who were opposing the bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And the city.

Mr. Green: Between the commission and those in opposition to the bill. I understand that that is why these amendments are in this shape.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, to an extent that can be said, but I think I should qualify that by saying that the amendment comes before us because the Toronto harbour commission and the representatives of the people who might have objected to the rates sensed the feeling of the Senate committee, and as a result collaborated in this amendment.

Mr. Adamson: When the bill was first introduced the then council of the city of Toronto had not made up their minds what they really wanted in this bill. Eventually they did, and I think these amendments are good and should be adopted.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The fourth amendment is found on page 2, line 35, and reads: After the word "transshipped" insert the words "by water". The last amendment is found on page 2 and reads: Immediately after line 42 add the following subclause:

(7) Section twenty-one of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(5) No rate, toll or charge made under this act shall be construed as applying to trucks or other vehicular traffic duly licensed by competent authority or to the contents thereof.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT

TENDER BY PUBLIC ADVERTISEMENT FOR EXECUTION OF WORK

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Public Works Act.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make a statement on this?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A very short statement. It is a short bill. The government has brought in this bill to reaffirm our faith in the tenders system for public works.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: That ain't the way I heared it.

Mr. Hees: That is not the way I read it.

Mr. Graydon: Is the government wavering?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, I have studied what took place in Sir John A. Macdonald's government. I did not know whether I should base our policy on that of Sir John A. Macdonald—

Mr. Graydon: If you kept on reading it it would help you a lot.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Here is what the new bill says:

Where a work is to be executed under the direction of a department of the government, the minister having charge of that department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of the work.

As we find in every general statute of law, there are some exceptions.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But the exceptions should not overshadow the great principle of asking for tenders.

Mr. Knowles: That is right, they should not.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And they will not while I am Minister of Public Works. Here are the exceptions:

(a) the work is one of pressing emergency in which the delay would be injurious to the public interest,

(b) the work can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the employees of the department concerned, or—

Subsection (c) refers to limited contracts where the minister could use his own judgment to an amount of $5,000. That dates back to 1886. At that time $5,000 was a large sum. Today people say it is not quite so valuable, that is why we propose—

Mr. Knowles: A new ceiling?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, I am proposing that I get further under the controls of treasury board and the governor in council. The bill contains these words:

—the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable—

And those who have had any experience in construction work will understand that word. And it continues:

—and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders.

May we consider the whole section and the subsections? The whole section gives hon. members a clear picture that we ask for tenders, and that when we meet circumstances where tenders are impracticable—and, may I say, I could give examples, especially in this city of Ottawa, and very close to it—

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister's house?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, if you wish. And the east block, if you wish—and certain other buildings which were put up about seventy years ago, and that we have to keep in repair. We found out that we had to stretch the language—because, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who is a lawyer, will tell you, you can put an interpretation on nearly every statute, if you wish. He will tell you that lawyers do that every day. We had to use our best judgment under subsections (a) and (b), approved by treasury board, to proceed with these works. But, being an admirer of the tenders system, I thought that this was the time when we should—

Mr. Green: Do away with it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —allow the minister a subsection which would be clear enough to justify his decisions, and get the approval of hon. members of this house.

Mr. Hees: What an explanation! Wow!

Mr. Graydon: Now, Howard, what can you do with that one?

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Sharpen your teeth now, Howard.

Mr. Hees: File them, Howard.

Mr. Green: My first remark must be one of congratulation to the minister upon the interesting exposition he has made of this bill. I am sure that seldom have members of the House of Commons heard a bill explained with such humour.

It was also gratifying to hear the minister say that the government, at last, is trying to reaffirm its faith in the tenders system.

Mr. Knowles: Pretty tender faith.

Mr. Green: There is no doubt that—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "Reaffirm" is good, too.

Mr. Green: —the time has come for reaffirmation. But unfortunately this bill does not carry out all the hopes and promises contained in the remarks of the minister.

We of the official opposition feel that this bill is thoroughly bad, and should be defeated.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can't you put it stronger than that?

Mr. Green: Listening to the minister, one would think that this was an innocuous little bill which would further the cause of good government in Canada. But what it does, in fact, is to open the gates to no-tender contracts. It removes from the Public Works Act the ceiling placed there by parliament, the restriction parliament has placed on this procedure of awarding contracts without tenders.

I would ask hon. members to look at section 36 as it now stands. It begins in this way:

Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the government—

And I point out that the section covers "any" department; not only the Department of Public Works.

—the minister having charge of such department—

So that this section applies to all the ministers. It is not restricted to the Department of Public Works or to the Minister of Public Works.

—shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in the cases—

And then the section goes on to list the exceptions. The important part of section 36, as it stands without the suggested amendment, is the part I have just read; because it lays down the rule that tenders must be called for any public work.

Then, to go on to the exceptions; at the present time the first exception is where there is:

—pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest.

No one could quarrel with that exception, and it will be in the new section as set out in the bill. Then the second exception refers to cases:

—in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department.

Your Honour will notice that that exception refers only to the case where the particular department concerned has officers or employees who can do the work better than it could be done by having it let out by contract. There again, no one can quarrel with that exception.

In his explanation of the bill the Minister of Public Works has pointed out that these two exceptions are cramping his style. He says they have to be stretched a bit in order to let these contracts without tenders, and that therefore the time has come to give him more elbow room with regard to no-tender contracts. So he takes out the third exception which reads as follows:

> Where the estimated cost of the work is less than five thousand dollars and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

That provision is being removed entirely. In some other bills—and I think particularly of the National Harbours Board Act—there is a provision for a figure of $10,000 instead of $5,000. I do not believe anyone would have very much objection to the insertion of a figure higher than $5,000. But the weakness of this bill is that it takes out any ceiling at all.

What does it do? In place of the ceiling it gives the minister of the department concerned wide-open powers reading as follows:

> Where the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders.

That new subsection takes the ceiling out of the Public Works Act and says, in effect, that any minister whose department is to construct works can, if he so wishes, let contracts without tenders. That, we believe, is a very serious change.

The minister suggested—I noticed he was smiling at the time—that the government believes in the principle of asking for tenders. Yet under this new subsection the system of asking for tenders is just being thrown out the back window.

Subsection 2 of section 36 of the Public Works Act as it stands on the statute books today reads:

> Whenever in case of any work tenders are required to be, or are invited, the minister having charge of the department concerned shall submit all tenders received therefor to the governor in council and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the direction of the governor in council.

That means that wherever tenders are called the contract must have the approval of the governor in council. That salutary provision is also being taken out of the act.

It may be said that the whole situation is being taken care of by section 39 of the Financial Administration Act just passed which provides that the governor in council, which of course is the cabinet, may—they are not compelled to do—make regulations setting a ceiling on contracts over which tenders must be called. It must be remembered that section is merely permissive, and that the treasury board as well as the cabinet are given power to approve any contract even though tenders are not called.

In his explanation the minister said this bill was all right because he was being put further under the control of the governor in council and the treasury board than he had ever been before. We would like to see him a little bit under the control of parliament, and I am referring not only to the Minister of Public Works but to the ministers of all other departments which let contracts. Parliament should not be deprived of the right under the Public Works Act to put on a ceiling over which no contract can be let other than by tender.

The Public Works Act is the master act covering public works of all kinds. As I pointed out, the section applies to all departments. There have been similar restrictions imposed from time to time, even in the Defence Production Act which was passed at the last session. Under that act limitations were imposed on the Minister of Defence Production, and believe me when the government can impose any limitation on him there must be a good case made out. Also it must be remembered that he is dealing with defence works for which there is far more justification for not following the tender system. Section 17 of that act provides:

> (e) a contract may be entered into by the minister without the approval of the governor in council if
> (i) in the opinion of the minister, the contract must be entered into immediately in the interests of defence,
>
> (ii) the estimated expenditure, loan or guarantee does not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, or
>
> (iii) competitive tenders have been obtained and the lowest tender, involving an estimated expenditure not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, is accepted,
> but the minister shall make a report to the governor in council in respect of any contract involving an estimated expenditure, loan or guarantee exceeding ten thousand dollars and entered into without the approval of the governor in council.

In all other cases under that act the minister must have the prior approval of the cabinet.

I propose to illustrate our objection to this bill by referring to what happened in connection with the Alvin building in Vancouver, about which the Minister of Public Works has heard on more than one occasion. The department decided that they wanted an office building in Vancouver. Friends of the government, and I repeat that, obtained some land and built a building. I believe they were assisted in financing that building by the fact that they had an agreement with the government. They had their own contracting company. Without calling for tenders the government made a deal with these people. Order in council P.C. 1382, of April 6, 1948, passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works and with his report before them dated March 27, 1948, sets out that an offer had been obtained from Alvin Estates Limited—which incidentally was not incorporated until a week or so after the order in council had been passed—to construct a fireproof building on their property and to rent it to the crown under certain terms and conditions which also were set out.

The order in council explained that the crown was to pay a certain rental per year commencing with the date of occupation and was given the option to purchase the property at any time within the first twelve months of occupation for a certain price. About a year later order in council P.C. 563, dated February 8, 1949, was passed, again on a report from the Minister of Public Works. It set out that more floors and fixtures had been added to the building and established that the rental was to go up to $183,995 per year; and that the purchase price, if the government exercised its option, would be $1,063,105. That fall of 1949 I asked the minister about this Alvin building because it was becoming the talk of the town in Vancouver.

In the following session we had a debate on the whole question which took place on March 2, 1950. The minister was very emphatic about the actions that had been taken by his department. He tried to justify not calling for tenders on the deal, and there the matter ended for the time being. About a month after the debate the government exercised the option. The amount paid to these people in rent was $215,988.34, and the government paid $1,066,614.90 for the property, a total of $1,282,603.24.

The minister's defence of this deal was in the first place that there was an emergency and therefore under this emergency clause (a) of section 36 of the Public Works Act he was entitled to make the deal without calling for tenders. Another defence which he made with considerable skill was that shortly before the debate he had obtained valuations from two prominent contractors in eastern Canada, which showed that the price was a reasonable one. Subsequently as a result of the debate, and before the government exercised the option, he obtained two further valuations, this time from two Vancouver firms, and in due course the property was purchased.

On June 21, 1950 I moved for a copy of any and all valuations which had been obtained by the government on the Alvin building in Vancouver. That return had not been brought down by the time the session prorogued, but in July of 1950 I received a letter from the deputy minister of public works containing a list of figures. There were no details. The actual letters containing the valuations were not given me but simply the figures, and they ran all the way from $950,500 to $1,097.478. I wrote to the deputy minister pointing out that what I wanted was a copy of the valuations, but I never received them. During the present session the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) demanded the tabling of a half dozen returns which had been held back for a long period of time, and one of them was the motion for these valuations.

On November 16 the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) did bring down a return but again it merely contained the same figures. It did not contain the valuations letters. Then I pressed him for the actual copies of the valuations, he said he would get them, but he issued a warning. As found at page 1131 of Hansard he said:

> I shall do my best to give particulars of that. Perhaps I can also bring in the fact that this building is now worth nearly $2 million.

The return did come down on December 4 and it contained all the valuations. It also contained a valuation which the minister had made last month in an attempt, of course, to show that the building would have cost more if it had been built now.

These valuations merit a little consideration. Two of them were obtained from large eastern firms a few weeks before the debate took place in the house. One was from the firm of W. H. Bosley and Company of Toronto. When the debate took place in March of last year the minister pointed out what a wonderful firm this was, and how Mr. Bosley had made a personal inspection of the building and had said that the deal was a good one. Here is what Mr. Bosley actually had to say in his letter of February 13, 1950. It starts out by saying:

> This property is said to have a frontage on Robson street of 99 feet by a depth of 124 feet . . .

It goes on to refer to the building and then says:

> The crown is at the moment under contract to lease these premises for a period of ten years from the 17th of March, 1949, paying annually therefor a rental of $183,995 in equal monthly instalments at the end of each and every month. The lessor is to pay taxes, major repairs and insurance.
> This lease contains an option permitting the crown to purchase the demised premises at any time during the first year of the lease for the sum of $1,063,105. My analysis of this situation indicates that the present worth of nine years rental yet to be paid from the 17th of March next, discounted, after deducting the amount for taxes, repairs and insurance, will yield the owners an amount equal to or better than the option price.

Of course if the government had gone on renting it would have yielded the owners several hundred thousands of dollars more. Mr. Bosley concludes by saying:

> In my judgment it is in the crown's interest to exercise the option as before mentioned, and become the owners of this property.

Any child in elementary school could have decided that just by looking at the figures, and Mr. Bosley certainly did not say that the building was good value at the price which was paid for it. The other eastern firm upon which the minister relied in his reply to me in March of last year was E.G.M. Cape and Company of Montreal. Their letter of February 24, 1950, reads as follows:

> Re: Alvin estate building, Vancouver, B.C.
> Dear Sir:
> We estimate the cost of the above mentioned building, according to plans, etc., to be nine hundred and six thousand dollars ($906,000) all as per the attached breakdown.

The letter has attached to it a breakdown showing how they arrive at the figure of $906,000, which is nearly $160,000 lower than the government paid.

Mr. Gibson: Was the property included in that?

Mr. Green: No. Attached to the return are figures to show how the department dealt with the valuation given by E.G.M. Cape and Company. First of all they added to the $906,000 professional and inspection fees of $36,985, which I submit had nothing to do with the valuation of the building. Then they added $40,000 for the land, and I do not quarrel with that. That would put the value of the building and the land at $946,000. Then they added legal and financing fees of $31,860, and they added to that 5 per cent profit to the Alvin Estates Limited, $50,740, with the result that they brought the E.G.M. Cape and Company total up to $1,065,585, which is about $2,000 more than the government paid. But in order to get it up to that figure they padded it to the extent of about $119,000 by these additional charges for professional and inspection fees, legal and financing fees and 5 per cent profit to the Alvin Estates Limited, the owners of the building.

Mr. Harkness: That is what is known as conjuring.

Mr. Nowlan: No wonder there was a reaffirmation.

Mr. Green: This was one of the valuations which was obtained a few weeks before the debate took place in the house. Now let us turn to the valuations which were obtained a few weeks after the debate took place, and before the government exercised its option. One is from a very reliable firm of architects in Vancouver known as McCarter and Nairne. Their valuation is dated March 10, 1950, and addressed to the deputy minister of public works. It is headed "Re Alvin Building, Vancouver, B.C.", and reads:

> We are enclosing two copies of recapitulation of our detailed estimate of the cost of the Alvin building, Vancouver, B.C. This estimate does not include architects or engineering fees or the land, but deals only with the building estimate.

Then they set out the estimate in detail, and they show a total figure of $880,440.

Again to that valuation the Department of Public Works has added a memo showing additional figures as follows: Professional and inspection fees, $35,775; Land, $40,000, with which again I am not quarreling; legal and financing fees, $31,087, and profit of 5 per cent to the Alvin Estates Limited, $49,365. In that case they could not bring the total up to the amount that was paid. They only brought it up to $1,036,667. In my opinion that valuation has been padded by the department to the tune of about $115,000.

There is another valuation from a reliable firm in Vancouver which was obtained after the debate and just before the government exercised its option. It is from the Northern Construction Company and J. W. Stewart Limited, a thoroughly responsible contracting firm. The letter from the president of that firm, dated March 13, 1950, addressed to the deputy minister reads:

> Pursuant to your request and from the plans and information furnished us by your Mr. A. K. Mills, together with the personal inspections of the building, we have compiled price on the Alvin building on Robson street in Vancouver, on the basis that we would submit a tender for its construction today. This price amounts to $920,300, and includes the total structure together with a clearance of the site which involved the removal of old buildings which formerly occupied it.
> Trusting this gives you the information you require . . .

To that return the department has again added a memo bringing this figure up to the figure which they gave me last summer. They added $40,000 for the land, to which I do not object; professional and inspection fees of $38,143; legal and financing fee of $32,314 and profit to the Alvin Estates Limited of $51,523, bringing the total to $1,082,280. They have again padded the valuation which was turned in by their own valuator.

This is not the whole story, because there are also three valuations in this return which were made in the year 1949 about one year before the debate took place in 1950. One of them is by the resident architect in British Columbia, a Mr. Dawson, and it is dated March 21, 1949. He shows a valuation of $915,815. To that of course must be added the land value of $40,000. With this valuation the department includes a memo padding it again by the same three items to bring it up to $1,077,550, which was the figure given to me last summer.

There is one valuation in 1949, March 18, by another reliable architect, William Frederick Gardiner, who has since died. It shows a valuation, including land, of $950,000. On the return which I received there is this note about Mr. Gardiner's valuation, which is the only one included in the first return at the figure which was given by the evaluator:

> Gardiner in his valuation provides no details and is definitely low.

Actually, Mr. Gardiner's figures are practically the same as all the figures I have just quoted.

In 1949 there was one other valuation which was higher, and that was by a firm known as Hugh M. Fraser and Company Limited, signed by H. Forrester. Mr. Howard Forrester is a former Liberal member of the provincial legislature, but I am not quarrelling with Mr. Forrester; he is a good citizen. He has placed a valuation on the Alvin building at $1,097,478.67, but he puts it on a cubic foot basis. He does not break down the cost as was done in all the other cases.

Mr. Low: Including the land?

Mr. Green: Yes. Mr. Forrester's firm rents three postal stations to the government on a similar basis.

Then I should like to say a word or two about a valuation which the minister obtained last month. It was made by the new district architect, Mr. L. S. W. Wells. Mr. Wells sets out the details of the present cost of this building, and they amount to $1,124,676. Then he adds these words, "average increase of 25 per cent"—that is over the figures of two years ago. His letter ends with this paragraph:

> You will note the average increase amounts to approximately 25 per cent which is considered conservative.

Now, taking account of that 25 per cent, we find Mr. Wells' figures for the old building two years ago would have been about $900,000. From all of these people except Mr. Forrester, therefore, we reach a valuation, including land, varying from $920,000 to $960,000. Yet the government paid over $1,060,000 and apparently was proud of doing so. Was that the figure?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It was $1,063,000.

Mr. Green: No. They paid $1,066,614 and some odd cents, plus the rental of $215,988.34. There was considerable uproar about this deal in Vancouver. There were other transactions with the same contracting firm that built this building, the principals of whom owned this Alvin Estates Limited, and things got fairly hot. For example a year ago, on April 5, 1950, a statement by the Minister of Fisheries is quoted in the Vancouver press under the heading: "No More 'No-Tender' Building Deals".

Mr. Graydon: There is reaffirmation.

Mr. Green: This is another reaffirmation. The subheading reads: "Mayhew Forecasts Change in Government Accommodation Procedure" and he is quoted as saying:

> The no-tender policy was used in wartime when contractors wouldn't give a firm price. They couldn't.
> That period is gone by. I don't think we'll see any more of that. Government policy has always been by tender.

All we are asking is that the government keep this policy of tender and drop foolish bills of the kind now before the house. If this bill goes through the minister is free to make a deal of this sort. He could not be questioned if he made another deal of this kind, nor could any other minister; because the only restriction on him will be that he must be satisfied in his own mind. Obviously he was satisfied with this deal last year, and I presume he is still satisfied.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes; and I can tell you why.

Mr. Green: Yes? The wording of the paragraph is:

> (c) the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders.

We believe that the tender system is of greater importance to Canada now than it has ever been; in the first place because it is one of our main methods of keeping down government expense and, of course, the keeping down of government expense is or should be one of the prime policies in meeting the inflationary conditions which exist today. Second, we believe this tender system is of vital importance now because this is the day of the great surplus, when the cabinet have millions of dollars in their collective pockets just burning a hole. They do not want to be caught with a large surplus at the end of a fiscal year.

Mr. Knowles: That is what makes them feel so tender.

Mr. Green: That is too good for me. There is greater need than ever before. When the government is dragging in money in far larger amounts than is necessary, there is greater need for retaining and strengthening this tender system rather than opening the door to no-tender contracts. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid this change is merely another symptom of the cabinet disease which caused the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) a year or two ago to say: "Oh, what's a million dollars?"

Mr. Lennard: And also: "Who will stop us now?"

Mr. Green: Yes. At the last session he said: "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" We in the official opposition do not believe there should be any relaxation in the provision that public works must be constructed on a tender basis. We believe that retaining the tender system and, in fact, strengthening it is in the public interest, and that it should be a basic principle in conducting government business that tenders will be called for in the construction of government works.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am bound to say that we support the viewpoint put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). No matter how much confidence we may have in a minister of the government—and I have no reason to have anything but confidence in the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier)—I think we should not pass this bill. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has properly pointed out, the only safeguard this house has that contracts will be let in a proper manner is the provision that tenders will be called. As to this departure, I cannot recollect a similar instance during my term in the House of Commons. If the house permits this bill to pass, I think we shall be doing something the house will regret and maybe, in the years to come, a minister or a government may regret. I therefore say I think the house should refuse to pass this bill.

I have no doubt it will be pointed out, as the hon. member pointed out, that in section 39 of Bill No. 25 which we were discussing an hour or so ago there is a clause which seems to mitigate the provisions of this bill. Section 39 of Bill No. 25 reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations with respect to the conditions under which contracts may be entered into and, notwithstanding any other act,
> (a) may direct that no contract by the terms of which payments are required in excess of such amount or amounts as the governor in council may prescribe shall be entered into or have any force or effect unless entry into the contract has been approved by the governor in council or the treasury board, and
> (b) may make regulations with respect to the security to be given to and in the name of His Majesty to secure the due performance of contracts.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that this is permissive legislation. This is a permissive clause; it is not mandatory. It does not say that the government "shall direct". The word "shall" is not used. We have the word "may". "Shall" is mandatory; "may" is merely permissive.

In the second place, I do not think the house would be wise to rely on section 39 of Bill No. 25, because we do not know what the regulations will be, and regulations may be amended, varied or rescinded by the governor in council. The only safeguard we have is that the safeguards we want shall be written into a statute. Here we find that the old section 36 of the Public Works Act is to be repealed; the two most important sections in that act are to be repealed and there is to be substituted therefor paragraph (c) of the new section 36 of the bill which provides that where the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for public advertisement impracticable, and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting tenders, he may do so. To my mind that is a dangerous provision and one that we as a parliament should not possibly approve. In presenting his views the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra brought forward a case which evidently the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) himself thought warranted the discontinuance of the practice of purchasing buildings or letting contracts without tender, or without the proper supervision of this house. Wartime, he said, made certain things necessary. We are no longer in wartime. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said a few moments ago, we are living in a period of buoyant economy, of inflation in this country, and certainly this is the very time we should exercise more care than we should at some other and more normal time.

I do not want to prolong this debate. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra spoke this afternoon I think he spoke not only for the official opposition but also for at least the group for whom I have the honour to be speaking at the moment. We should either vote down this bill, or attempt to do it; or in view of the opposition expressed in the official opposition, and I am certain in my own group and probably in the opposition generally, the Minister of Public Works should withdraw this bill and not proceed with it not only at this session but at any time. If we pass this bill we shall be abrogating one of the rights of parliament, the right to lay down exactly how contracts shall be made, and shall be placing it in the hands of a minister, at the moment one perhaps for whom we have a high regard, but we do not know who his successor will be. We cannot tell what the future will bring; consequently I think the minister should either withdraw this bill or hon. members on all sides of the house should vote against second reading.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I hate to have to speak in opposition to my friend the Minister of Public Works. I believe at any rate his intentions are good, but I cannot feel otherwise than that if this house passes this bill it will be derelict in its duties. The tender system was designed originally to protect the taxpayers and their interests. I think the Minister of Public Works knows that; but the amendment to the Public Works Act, as it is presented to us now in Bill No. 26, not only throws the tender system out the window, as was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) but—I want to emphasize what someone else interpolated at the time—it also throws the window out with the tender. Consequently if this bill is passed nothing will be left in the Public Works Act to protect the interests of the taxpayers of Canada.

I would not object to a change in paragraph (c) of clause 36 of the old act, raising the amount to say $10,000, to bring it more in line with modern valuations and costs; but I certainly object to going as far as this bill proposes to go.

I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made a sound proposal. I believe the Minister of Public Works ought to withdraw this bill and not present it in this form again. In the light of the evidence that was brought before the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, it seems to me that we ought to be tightening up the tender system instead of loosening it, as we are doing in this legislation. We oppose it most strongly and we urge the minister to withdraw it. If he does not—well, we are bound to vote against it.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think there are reasons why this amendment should be re-examined by the minister that perhaps have been covered very well by the speeches that have already been made, but which I think perhaps gain further emphasis in relation to some of the other acts that are before this house. One of the things that perhaps make it difficult for some of the members to illustrate the dangers in such an amendment as this as forcefully as they otherwise might is that the minister who puts forward this bill, by his very geniality, disarms criticism at the outset. In that regard, not being absolutely certain that we might not be called upon to address him in some other capacity at some other time, and that someone else might be occupying that office, we must examine this not from the point of view of the individual who administers an act of this kind at the time but from the point of view of a public act which may be administered by anyone at any time, depending on the change of time and circumstance in public affairs.

This represents something more than the minister has put forward. I would say that from the point of view of the presentation of legislation, if the government wanted unsatisfactory legislation put forward, they should always have the Minister of Public Works be the advocate, because in this house you might describe him by the title of a book that I recall, namely "The Pilgrim of a Smile". He smiles his way through the greatest difficulties and differences, which makes it equally difficult for those on the other side to use as vigorous and as severe terms as should be applied to a bill of this nature.

An hon. Member: How true.

Mr. Drew: But I propose to approach this simply on the basis of an examination of the legislation itself. The minister has stated that this is a reaffirmation of a great principle.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Then he says in effect to the members of this house: we believe in this principle, but we ask you to disregard it and leave the continuity of the principle in the future to the discretion of the members of this government, or of any succeeding governments in the days ahead. I ask hon. members to look at this as something more than an amendment that merely affects those of us who are here today; and I do not mean those who are here this particular Saturday afternoon, but those who are now members of this House of Commons.

The Minister of Public Works has properly stated that throughout the years respect for public administration has largely rested upon the acceptance of this basic principle in awarding government contracts. There have been instances where there have been justified criticisms. There have been cases where that criticism goes to the extent of really bringing into question some of the details of this department and of other departments that have been put forward in this house this afternoon. But I would like to suggest reasons why there should be no suggestion of extending the provisions of this act now. I ask the Minister of Public Works to consider the advisability of withdrawing this legislation at this time, and not simply to move forward with the knowledge that in the ordinary course of events no voice is likely to be raised on the other side of the house no matter what the thoughts of the members on that side of the house may be.

Just a few days ago we had a striking example of the way the awarding of huge contracts is being carried out of the realm of ordinary supervision. We had before us for consideration the bill to set up the St. Lawrence seaway authority. It was very noticeable that in the terms of that measure, although $300 million is to be expended on the waterway part alone, there was no provision for the calling of tenders. An explanation was given which perhaps might gain acceptance by many hon. members. The argument was put forward that there should be no provision in regard to tenders in that measure because the door had not yet finally been closed upon the possibility that there would be co-operation between the government of the United States and the government of Canada in carrying forward the project. It was contended that perhaps their methods might not conform with ours, and that therefore it would not be wise to place restrictions in our act creating authority which might not conform with the practices the United States government would wish to follow. Nevertheless the fact remains that in those huge expenditures provision for tenders has been avoided.

Then we had under discussion earlier today the new provision in regard to crown corporations. There again we have a case where very large contracts are allocated in relation to what is essentially public business, without the necessity of tenders. For that very reason, as other measures themselves carry so much public expenditure beyond the tender system, I suggest that we should be putting in more restrictive rather than less restrictive definitions at this time.

Without going into that too extensively, I suggest that this government itself has afforded reasons why it should not now be asking for the relaxation of provisions of this kind. In the report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons, which we have just received in these last few days and which covers the financial period 1950-51, we see several references to practices which indicate the need for greater rather than less caution in matters of this kind. Already, under the section which would be repealed by the bill now before us, it was possible to dispense with tenders where there was a suggestion that there was an emergency. On page 11 of the Auditor General's report we find this:

> Case 1. On February 28, 1951, the Department of National Defence instructed the Canadian Commercial Corporation to procure 200 quonset type huts by March 31, 1951. At the same time the department indicated that a Canadian supplier was in position to make immediate delivery and that "if necessary, this department is prepared to send a representative to the manufacturing plant of the successful tenderer and accept delivery as the huts in question are loaded for shipment to their final destination." A contract was awarded without (a) advertising for bids, or (b) the governor in council giving prior consent to the award. $948,142 was paid in the fiscal year 1950-51. The records indicate that the huts were stockpiled.

The government has just been told by its Auditor General that its practices are already extremely loose. This does not, of course, refer specifically to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), whose smiling explanation would be most difficult to disregard if he gave it in the general terms he has already used to argue in support of the bill. Nevertheless, I say, the fact remains that here is a clear statement by the Auditor General that this government already finds it rather convenient to disregard the limitations that exist. And in this instance there was no urgent emergency for the acquisition of the huts—because they were stockpiled and not used immediately—if they were availing themselves of the provision that the need may be regarded as an emergency.

Then we have other cases set forth in the Auditor General's report. In some instances a device was employed that is constantly subjected to criticism when it is adopted. I refer to those occasions where original contracts were let by tender, and then at a later date there were readjustments of the contracts awarded for very much larger sums, with the simple explanation that these were extensions of original contracts. We find an example of this at page 8 of the Auditor General's report, where it says that vote 296 was for a firm contract of $179,182. That was the contract price arranged after tenders had been called. Following discussion and certain extensions that contract was increased to $365,232, in other words to slightly more than twice the original amount, without any subsequent tenders being called for. Then it is explained that in the case of vote 297 the original contract, following tenders, was approved at a figure of $49,836, and that in that case there was subsequent discussion and readjustments and a new contract was awarded for $89,832.

I mention those as examples furnished us within the past few weeks by the report of the Auditor General, where he shows a tendency on the part of the government to disregard the provisions of the act as it stands. And when we remember that provisions of this kind apply to all government departments including those departments which are purchasing enormous amounts of material at this time, then I suggest this goes far beyond any minor amendment. This would tear away completely the protection that has been afforded by that principle, which is affirmed by the minister but denied by the amendment itself.

This is no reaffirmation; this is a complete denial of that principle. For all practical purposes it would simply say that any minister who for one reason or other did not find it convenient to call for tenders, could easily find some ground for awarding contracts without tenders being called for. The most objectionable part of the proposed amendment is that part in which it states:

> Where the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable, and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders—

In that case they may be proceeded with by direct contract.

Without in any way bringing into this discussion any of those matters which were discussed earlier in the session, and which warn us of the recklessness of some departments of this government in the handling of public money, I think the Minister of Public Works, who has shown a much higher regard than some other departments of government for the authority of parliament, should withdraw the bill at this time and demonstrate to the House of Commons that he does in fact believe in that principle. The one reaffirmation he should afford this house today of his belief in that principle is to withdraw the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members who have spoken I find it an unpleasant duty to quarrel with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). He may find it difficult to understand that statement, in view of the fact that I quarrelled with him two or three times earlier this week. However, I think he knows what I mean.

I should like to underline some of the statements which have been made, but I do not wish to take undue time in doing so. In fact, having said that I will move on and deal with an aspect of the matter which I do not think has yet been discussed. I shall do this in the first place by setting out what I think might have been a better case for this bill than was made by the minister himself. I say that with all respect, as I realize he was trying to save time. He was also in very good humour.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What case did he make?

Mr. Knowles: You can see by his face that the minister is now enjoying the fact that he made no case at all. I want to make out the best case I think can be made for it. Having made out the best case, I shall endeavour to show that even that best case is no case at all. The best case that could be made out for this bill would be on the basis of section 39 of the Financial Administration Act. If the minister had taken the time to tell the house that it is the firm intention of the government, once the Financial Administration Act has been proclaimed, to pass an order in council specifying a ceiling for all contracts that can be let without tender; if he had made it clear that this Bill No. 26 would not be proclaimed until that order in council had been passed, I say that would be the best case that could be made out for it. In other words, that would tell us that on the government's own terms they intended to retain the tender system.

What is wrong with the case is that it is on all fours with another battle we had this week. Even when you reaffirm the tender system by passing an order in council under section 39 of the Financial Administration Act, which would apply to the Department of Public Works and all the rest of the departments, all you have done is make the tender system one whose ceiling is determined by order in council rather than by a statute of parliament.

That is the real issue now before us. It is the same battle we had yesterday, and have had two or three times before, when other measures were before this house. Our complaint about that other measure of yesterday was that it whittled away the powers of parliament. I do not know whether any of us used that precise word in what we had to say, but certainly that was the intent of what we said. I would refer hon. members to an editorial in this morning's Ottawa Citizen dealing with that other measure. The editorial is entitled "Whittling the Powers of Parliament". The whole tenor of that editorial is to the effect that those of us who opposed that other measure were perfectly right in the principle we put forward, namely that parliament should not by that statute have surrendered the right to determine the salaries of the persons who were then under discussion. The editorial states:

> Mr. Fournier, as acting Secretary of State, may argue with his usual suavity that there is no danger of loss of independence—

We have had that again today, the usual suavity and good humour of the Minister of Public Works. But this is the comment of this editorial on that other measure:

> The present move represents a further whittling away of the authority of parliament, and a concentration of further power in the hands of the executive. All such moves of the kind should be resisted, no matter how innocent the purpose is represented to be.

That is what we did yesterday in connection with that other measure and that is what we are seeking to do now, resisting moves which whittle away the authority of parliament. As it now stands, parliament by statute has determined that contracts may not be let without tender if they are for an amount of $5,000 or more. I will take the Minister of Public Works at his word that it is the government's intention under section 39 of the Financial Administration Act to pass an order in council fixing an appropriate amount. We do not know what that amount will be. Maybe the order in council will specify $5,000; maybe it will specify $10,000, maybe the figure will be higher, but whatever figure is specified in the order in council it can be changed the next day, the next week, or the next month by another order in council. In other words, for all time the determination by statute as to what that ceiling will be is to be taken away from parliament. Once again, on Saturday as on Friday, the powers of parliament are being whittled away.

The one other point I wish to make is that section 39 of the Financial Administration Act, which is noted as being a new provision, is of general application. It deals with contracts. In other words it is wider in its scope than the matter now before us, because it covers all contracts. I gather that there will be an order in council laying down the general principles with regard to the calling of tenders for contracts of all kinds, including the execution of works, the purchase of materials, and what have you. What is before us in the Public Works Act is not the whole broad field of contracts; it is simply one section of that field, namely the execution of works. That has been in the statute for a long time, and wherever public works are to be executed the law passed by parliament lays down at what point tenders must be called.

I submit that even after an appropriate order in council has been passed under section 39 of the Financial Administration Act laying down the general provisions for contracts as a whole, there is still room for a special provision with respect to contracts for the execution of works; and the place for that special provision is to be found in the Public Works Act. I submit that it is still important that parliament have the right to say at what figure there must be tenders with respect to contracts for the execution of public works.

So I support those who have urged the Minister of Public Works to withdraw this bill. I do not mind if instead of withdrawing it he amends it to still leave subsection 2 of section 36 in, and amends paragraph (c) to change the ceiling from $5,000 to $10,000, let us say. But I do ask him not to do again today what he did yesterday in his capacity as Acting Secretary of State and take away from parliament the setting by statute of these ceilings which are so important.

We are getting altogether too much of this kind of thing. I am sorry to see our genial and very good friend, the Minister of Public Works, mixed up in it. He is not the Minister of Finance; he does not lay down these general practices and principles so far as contracts are concerned. I realize that he has probably been assured by the Department of Finance that this is perfectly in order, that this will be a reaffirmation of the tender system. The only way in which it is a reaffirmation of the tender system, if I may run the risk of repeating myself, is that it hinges on section 39 of the Financial Administration Act. The section is general in its terms; and it takes away from parliament for all time the fixing of the ceiling at which contracts must be let only after tenders have been called.

I say again that whatever may be the general provisions of any order in council passed under section 39 of the Financial Administration Act, we know that with respect to contracts for the execution of public works the statutory provisions such as we have had are gone. I urge the Minister of Public Works to retain that principle of fixing the limit by statute. Let him amend the bill and name in it whatever figure he thinks is reasonable at this time, but let us retain that principle.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out by other speakers in this debate, the changes proposed by this bill would allow any minister for whose department a public work is required to declare that the calling of tenders for that work is impracticable and not in the public interest. He could then award a contract of an unlimited size without calling for tenders. In addition, he would not be required to submit the contract to the governor in council for scrutiny.

There is only one way to ensure that public works will be constructed at the lowest cost to the public, and that is by publicly calling for tenders. It is reasonable to exclude the types of contracts specified in subsections (a) and (b) of both the 1927 act and the present bill. I believe it is also reasonable, as pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), to raise the ceiling below which tenders need not be called from $5,000 to $10,000. I say this because the value of money today is about half what it was in 1927.

However, I believe that contracts for all amounts greater than $10,000, which do not come under the qualifications of subsections (a) and (b), must continue to be awarded by tender, and such contracts must continue to be scrutinized by the governor in council. To propose that this practice should be discontinued, as the government is proposing to do by this measure, is to invite inefficiency and cost padding, for which the public must foot the bill.

A procedure which very often creeps into the handling of contracts, both in the case of business corporations and the government, is that after the original contract has been awarded and is being proceeded with, additional contracts for work in the vicinity are awarded to the original contractor, simply because it is easier to do it that way than to call for new tenders. It is argued that the work can be more cheaply carried out by the man on the job, because he would not have the expense of moving his equipment to the job and because his price on the original contract was reasonable.

This practice results in work which is often many times the value of the original contract being done on a cost-plus basis. When that is done there is no incentive to keep costs down; in fact the incentive is quite the reverse—

An hon. Member: Are you thinking of Comstock?

Mr. Hees:—because the higher the cost, the higher the plus.

If the bill passes, I believe it will be a blatant invitation to political patronage, because the only qualification a contractor will then require, in order to obtain contracts of unlimited size, will be that he must be a faithful supporter of the government. This will provide a tremendous inducement to support the government at election time in more concrete ways than simply by good wishes.

Mr. McIlraith: Are you speaking for the Ontario government now?

An hon. Member: No, you fellows.

Mr. Hees: This is the kind of practice which we should be getting away from, rather than entering into. If the government forces the bill through, I believe it will be pursuing a course which is directly opposed to the public interest. If the bill passes, it will be inviting the kind of scandals we have been reading about in the newspapers lately, which are being unearthed by investigating committees of the United States congress. I believe that in the interests of good and honest government the bill must be withdrawn.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my voice to those of other hon. members who have spoken in opposition to the bill. I wonder if members on the government side of the house appreciate what is being done and how the bill departs from the provisions of the act in force at the present time. The amendment reads as follows:

> Where a work is to be executed under the direction of a department of the government, the minister having charge of that department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of the work—

If it stopped there, in my opinion it would be a good bill; it would be in line with what we are doing now. But it goes on to say:

> —except in cases where
> (a) the work is one of pressing emergency in which the delay would be injurious to the public interest—

That eliminates contracts of that kind.

> —(b) the work can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the employees of the department concerned—

That eliminates something more.

> —(c) the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract for the execution thereof without inviting such tenders.

That wipes away every obstacle to letting contracts without tender. Why the cabinet, composed as it is of men who have been engaged in such work, who have been cabinet ministers and administrators for a long time, should wish to remove restrictions and thereby leave themselves open to all kinds of lobbying is beyond my comprehension. I would think that every member of the cabinet would want his authority to do anything of this kind limited to the greatest possible extent. Then he would be assured that his department would be run without even a suspicion that there was anything wrong. But here they are introducing a bill the result of which will be that with every bit of work that is to be done the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will have on his doorstep all the people who want to do the work and who want to get a contract without having to tender. It is simply amazing.

As has already been said, $5,000 is not very much money today. Perhaps when the present act was put in operation $5,000 was quite a bit of money, but at a time when the dollar is only worth 50 cents $5,000 may be a very small contract. Why not enlarge the amount to $10,000, as has already been said, or if that is not enough enlarge it to $15,000 or $20,000, but for goodness sake put some limit so that the Minister of Public Works, or any other minister who is dealing with a work under the meaning of this act, can say to every lobbyist who comes into his office: "This has to be let by tender because the act says that it must be let by tender". Then all he can say is: "Good-day, you will have an opportunity to tender". But that is not what they are doing. They are inviting everybody who wants to get something for nothing to come in and see what he can get in the scramble.

As I have said many times, I have a great deal of respect for the members of the cabinet but, as I said before, I cannot understand men such as the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Defence Production (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), who have been administering public affairs for quite a long time, wanting to leave themselves open to the condition, human nature being what it is, that this legislation invites. Therefore I suggest to the Minister of Public Works, as others have done, that in the interests of good government and good public administration he should withdraw the bill and substitute something better for it, or amend it in such a way as to set an amount beyond which contracts cannot be let without tender.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to say a word on this subject, Mr. Speaker. Like the others who have spoken I certainly have great respect for the minister, but I do not think it is the minister we are talking about; it is his bill. We cannot have the same respect for the bill that we have for him. So far as subsection (a) is concerned, I realize that there are emergencies. The minister has not mentioned any, but I am sure a matter such as the Winnipeg flood would be such an emergency. We can also go along with the minister so far as subsection (b) is concerned. But as other members have mentioned, the striking out of the $5,000 ceiling in subsection (c) and the failure to put in any other ceiling make it difficult for us to agree with that. In my opinion this is equivalent to changing from the tender system back to the patronage system.

When the minister spoke in introducing the bill he made some mention about the construction of the building here during the regime of Sir John A. Macdonald. I believe the idea in the back of his mind was that they were constructed more or less under the patronage system, and that was seventy-five or eighty years ago. What was done then is not good enough for today. When a previous bill was before the house the parliamentary assistant spoke about the splendid record of our civil servants in Canada. This record grew up over a period of years. I am satisfied that if we had retained the old system of selecting our civil servants from friends of the ministers or the members we would not have the splendid record we have today. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the same thing applies to both tendering and patronage. If we take this retrograde step and return to the patronage system I am sure it will have a harmful effect upon this country.

I am inclined to feel that perhaps some of us come from sections of the country where patronage is a little more rampant than it is in other sections. I feel that my section of the country is more patronage-minded than some other sections. I know of patronage committees in our part of the country that would just lick their lips if they saw a subsection such as the one in this bill. They would see great possibilities in it. I hope that we shall not weaken the tender system. I have not heard the minister give any reasons why this step should be taken. He made a few remarks concerning the bill, but as yet he has not told this house why this subsection (c) is necessary. The subsection refers to cases where the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders the calling of tenders by public advertisement impracticable. The minister has not said whether that method will be impracticable in only a few cases or in many instances. If that section remains in the bill there may be a few cases at the outset, but as time goes on we will find such pressure that there will be more and more cases in the future. There is no comparison between the two systems, as the hon. member who has just spoken pointed out.

As has been stated, the fact that different contracting companies tender for a job means that the government is going to have the work done for less than if the contract is handed out to someone who has no competition. Then again, a contractor who is successful gets the very best man he can to help him carry on the work. From my own experience so far as government work is concerned, I know that when it is not performed under a tender system everyone flocks to the door of the man who has the work to do. If any of these people are friends of the government or friends of the party, they press their claim and receive consideration. The whole thing adds up to a greater cost so far as government work is concerned.

I feel it will be a great mistake if this bill is passed in this form, and I think the minister would be well advised if he withdrew it, as has been suggested by some members.

Public Works Act

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, while various hon. members were speaking I sent out to the library for the purpose of securing the book that is the epitome of good parliamentary government in so far as finance is concerned. That book is Durell's "Parliamentary Grants". It sets forth the principles that should determine good parliamentary procedure. I feel I can do no better than read one or two portions of the preface which are applicable here.

> Progress is essential as well as permanence; and progress is only possible if it is realized that methods and practices, which however good in themselves are no longer suitable to contemporary conditions, must be amended . . .
> Principles, on the other hand, if sound remain unchanged. They are not affected by such considerations. They constitute a solid foundation on which systems are built up.

The great foundation principle of awarding contracts is that they shall be awarded by tender, unless an emergency makes consideration of the safety of the state take priority over the great and abiding principle that a tender must invariably be called. I know that tenders are difficult for governments that are patronage-minded. Tenders do interfere with governments that have political friends. There is a natural disinclination on the part of governments to be controlled in the awarding of contracts. The tendering system is designed to deny, so far as practicable, the use of political patronage for the benefit of the government and to the detriment of the state. The principle has been long embodied in all British parliamentary history that tenders should be awarded.

On page 339 Durell says:

> The fundamental rules in making public contracts are that each should be put out to competitive tender, open or limited, and that the lowest should be accepted.

The only exceptions are those to which I have already referred, where the treasury board or the executive, because of conditions of emergency and the like, must depart from the asking for tenders in the interests of efficient and early action.

It is passing strange that this bill, involving a departure from the principles upon which our constitutional development has taken place in this country, should be introduced so late in this session. It is obvious what the purpose is. It is done so that parliament will grant this power because of a desire on the part of hon. members to return home with the approach of the Christmas season. The minister shakes his head negatively. If that was not the purpose of introducing this bill at this time, at least the result—it was hoped—would be effected by doing that. Sir, this is one bill we in this parliament should stand against and oppose, no matter how long it takes and how much delay there is, in order to assure that it will not pass.

This bill is a dangerous one. This bill is the negation of every principle upon which true democracy is founded, particularly in connection with the financial responsibility of government. It is naïvely worded. As the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has said, the first two subsections of section 36 are natural; there must be exceptions. But subsection (c) is a dangerous one. In effect, it says that the minister having charge of a department—and it is every minister—shall invite tenders by public advertisement except where the minister is satisfied that the nature of the work renders a call for tenders by public advertisement impracticable.

If you give any minister that power, or the authority to do that, it will not require any stretch of the imagination to believe that the minister will come to the conclusion that it is impracticable to grant tenders. "Impracticable" is a word with a wide definition: impossible in practice; unmanageable; impassable. If parliament grants this power to the minister of this government it will constitute an abdication of parliament's right to ensure that waste and extravagance shall not be condoned in advance, for that is in effect what parliament will be doing. It will be giving to the government or to a minister carte blanche to award contracts regardless of economy or any such consideration. It will be authorizing ministers to do that which the experience of history has shown is dangerous to place under the control of any minister.

I for one cannot support this action which, as my friend the hon. member for Royal has said, is a retrograde step that will be regretted by parliament as the years go by. In effect it says to ministers of the government: Award your contracts as you will. Parliament has given you the authority to do so. Consider no question of cost as long as you can believe that the calling of tenders would be impracticable and that the public interest can best be served by entering into a contract without inviting such tenders. Authority will have been given which will assure that any spendthrift department may spend as it will, and be authorized by parliament in advance to do so. It will be an invitation to patronage, waste and extravagance. It will place the public administration of this country at the mercy of the political friends of the government. It will constitute on the part of parliament approval of the return to a system of flagrant patronage.

Today contracts are not small; they are large. What a seductive piece of legislation this will be for the political friends of the government, who will be able to approach ministers of the crown and show how impracticable it would be to award a contract by tender, with the power granted by parliament to award it without tender. As far as I am concerned, I should like to see some of the members supporting the government speak on a matter such as this. Is it not strange that, as we sit here in parliament, only those who are opposed to the government oppose this kind of thing. This is a retrograde and dangerous step. I for one—I care not how long this session will last—will do everything I can to oppose being made the law of this country this bill which will place the public service at the mercy of the patronage friends of the government, and will place the ministers in a position to see that from now on contracts will be awarded without tender.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I rise because I believe I would be failing in my responsibility as a member of parliament if I did not condemn this bill in the strongest possible terms. As a matter of fact I am amazed at the government bringing in such a bill. I am amazed because it is such a barefaced attempt to bring back the patronage system and make it the only system operative with regard to government contracts.

The fact that this bill was introduced and brought before us at this stage of the session, when most of us had reservations and expected to be on our way home or to be going home shortly, certainly leads one to think the hope was that it would slip through without too much opposition. As has been indicated by other hon. members who have spoken, I think probably any hope the government had of that kind is now dashed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This bill has been on the order paper since November 23.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And was held up.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It could not be proceeded with before the other one was dealt with.

Mr. Harkness: I have not heard one good reason advanced by the minister or any other member of the government, or any member of the party supporting the government, as to why this bill should be put through. Not one good reason has been advanced for it; and certainly all kinds of reasons have been advanced by members on this side of the house as to why the bill should be defeated, withdrawn or amended. I would certainly hope that action would be taken along one of those lines.

Even under the system we have today under which, generally speaking, all contracts are let by tender, a large number of contracts have been the subject of criticism. The case cited this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was, to say the least, a bit unsavoury, in my opinion. There are all kinds of other contracts about which there has been a considerable amount of talk; and I do not think all that talk was without some just foundation. The way in which many of these contracts were renegotiated after the tender was let, and the amount paid to the man who got the tender increased considerably, is one of the—

Mr. Howe: Will my hon. friend name one? He is talking in wide generalities about renegotiating contracts upward. I would ask him to name one.

Mr. Harkness: I would ask the minister if in fact a large number of contracts were not renegotiated.

Mr. Howe: Renegotiated downward, but never upward.

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister say that no contracts have been renegotiated upward?

Mr. Howe: Quite right. Does my friend know of any? My hon. friend is talking about renegotiating contracts. Does he know anything to base it on?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, there were two cases this afternoon.

Mr. Howe: Two cases where work was added.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact I am not familiar and cannot bring—

Mr. Howe: Certainly you know nothing about the situation, but you can keep on talking.

Mr. Harkness: I said at the moment I cannot bring out the proof, but I do know I have heard a great deal of talk about a large number of these contracts, and I do know that a large number of contracts were renegotiated.

Mr. Howe: You just said you did not know.

Mr. Harkness: And upward.

Mr. Hodgson: "Who will stop us".

Mr. Harkness: I said I could not produce the proof at this moment. I did not say I did not know.

Mr. Howe: It is all very well to get up and smear the government with no facts.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to be extremely sensitive on this. I wonder why he is so sensitive.

Mr. Ferrie: The best businessman in Canada; why would he not be?

Mr. Harkness: That just leads me to think what the situation will be if this bill goes through, as far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned.

Mr. Howe: Do not worry about that. The Minister of Defence Production has been in that department a long, long time. My hon. friend is just passing through.

Mr. Harkness: We are all passing through this world, and I think perhaps the minister is passing through at the present time a little more rapidly than I am.

Mr. Knowles: The Department of Defence Production was set up only a year ago.

Mr. Harkness: In any event, to come back to the Department of Defence Production and the contracts which will be let by it; they will aggregate, I suppose, something better than $3 billion.

Mr. Howe: Yes. They aggregated $13 billion in the last war. What about it?

Mr. Harkness: Under the present rearmament plan they will aggregate something better than $3 billion in the next two years or so, and under this provision, as far as I can see, it will be possible for every one of those contracts, aggregating that very large sum, to be let without any tenders being called; and I would think it is very likely that most of them would be let in that way.

Mr. Howe: Every tinpot lawyer can get up and make statements of this kind without any justification whatever. That is the privilege of this parliament. Go ahead.

Mr. Harkness: I would ask the minister to retract that immediately. To begin with, Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer; and in the second place, I have nothing to do with tin pots which the minister seems to be very familiar with. The minister often makes these statements. The last statement is typical of the statements he makes.

Mr. Howe: I will say any colonel, then.

Mr. Harkness: As far as I can see this bill is another example of the very apparent desire on the part of this government to rule in Canada without the checks and controls, either parliamentary or otherwise, which are necessary if good government is to prevail. As has been suggested, if we are to continue to have good government in Canada, if we are to continue to have anything in the nature of economy in the matter of government contracts there is no question but that the bill should be withdrawn. Or it should be amended, as was suggested by two or three speakers, by putting a limit of $10,000, or some other sum, in, as the amount of any contract which can be let without tender.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two in opposition to the legislation that has been introduced. However, in the first place I might mention that I could support a change being made in paragraph (c) of section 36, which I feel is due to be revised. The $5,000 figure is certainly out of line with the situation that existed back in 1927, when the legislation was reconsidered; and along with my colleagues I can agree that this figure should be increased to either $10,000 or $15,000. With that I am in complete accord. I feel, sir, that in the interests of all other contracts that are issued by the government, and in the interests of the government themselves, we should be protected by the tender system. Those of us who have served in the municipal field of government know full well that when we asked for tenders we did so because it was the proper system. We realize that the public are always sceptical when the tender system is not followed in any contract. All hon. members who have served in the municipal field and who have been associated with civic and rural administrations recall that we never entertained thoughts of givings contracts even up to $100 without asking for tenders. Even at times when we did consider amounts of less than $100 in municipal work we were very politely and plainly told by government officials that the auditor of the government would not pass the accounts if we did not adopt the tender system.

Most people, sir, will agree with this procedure. Most hon. members feel down in their hearts that this should be the proper system. As far as municipal bodies are concerned, they have built up through this system of tenders on all contracts a feeling of confidence among the people in the various provinces. That is something we want to cherish and maintain.

I say to the minister in all sincerity that we do not want to embarrass him in any way in this matter, but we do feel that in government circles we cannot be too careful because we want to hold the confidence of the people whom we serve. If we are to maintain that confidence, sir, we must not give anyone an opportunity to believe or even to think it will be destroyed, but that good will shall be maintained.

I should like to say very clearly that one of the functions of government is to maintain those principles that have been advocated and carried on in municipal affairs. No one wants to see excessive powers placed in the hands of any department of government, and I am sure the Minister of Public Works will reconsider this bill for that very reason. We realize that it may cause some delay to ask for tenders on some of those contracts, to wait for them, to open them and so forth, but I say, sir, that the spotlight of the people of Canada shines very brightly and searchingly on the government and on parliament. In order to maintain the good will of those people again I say I cannot support this legislation. I trust it will be reconsidered by the minister.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, when this debate began this afternoon I must confess that I was somewhat disarmed by the very genial manner in which the bill was presented, because on my first reading of it I had come to a conclusion on this piece of legislation somewhat similar to that expressed by other members of the opposition today. Of course I must admit that, being comparatively new in the house, I am not familiar with political wiles to the extent that some of the older members of this house might be. However, I soon had my original interpretation of the bill reaffirmed as I listened to the excellent presentation by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) first of all, and those who have succeeded him in the discussion this afternoon.

In view of the very genial atmosphere prevailing in the chamber, at least up until just a few moments ago, I was going to take the risk of deviating from the dominant theme this afternoon and rather go off the track momentarily on behalf of the three prairie provinces, and Manitoba or western Manitoba in particular. But perhaps the tone of peacefulness prevailing thus far is to a certain extent disappearing, so I think I will not take the risk of presenting the case I had in mind.

I should like to speak not from the standpoint of any practical implications, that might arise from the proposed change in the act. As I have said, I come from the prairie provinces. The intent of the bill does not concern us too much because there are so very few contracts awarded in the prairie provinces. Actually we have no ulterior motive and no political intent, so far as this bill is concerned.

In the few remarks I shall make I should like to speak briefly about the principle involved. One of the problems that occupy the attention of students of political science in these days is that of the difficulty of maintaining parliamentary and representative democracy in a day when our parliament is forced to assume more and more power in order to operate the affairs of state. This has been particularly noticeable since the functions of parliament changed from those basically political to those of an economic nature. This bill concerns itself with the economic functions of parliament. The question with which the learned scholars occupy themselves has to do with exactly the thing represented by this bill. Is the executive assuming, to an increasing extent, more and more of the functions of the legislative part of parliament, the functions of the representatives of the people?

Recently a colleague of mine sent a letter asking me, now that I am actually engaged in the rough and tumble of political activity, whether it was true that such is happening. The theory is abroad that there is a very subtle trend toward this whittling-down process that has been referred to this afternoon. That inquiry was made at the beginning of the session. At that time I had not had enough practical experience to give many examples. But I suggest that during the last few weeks I have discovered many examples without any difficulty. We see one here this afternoon, and there was another in connection with the civil service legislation yesterday afternoon.

I have come to the conclusion that politics is an art, not a science. But I think if this bit of political artistry goes through this afternoon it will have the learned scholars, the learned political scientists, shaking their heads and speculating upon the possible fate, the possible future of our democratic parliamentary institutions.

I heartily support everything that has been said by opposition members this afternoon, and along with the others I suggest that the best recourse at this time would be for the minister to withdraw the bill. In closing I must say that during this session I have appreciated the words of encouragement offered to me, as a new member, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). Along with other members I have come under his gracious and charming influence. When I began my remarks this afternoon I was somewhat disconcerted for the moment, because of the benevolent manner in which this noxious bit of legislation has been presented.

I am sure after everything that has been said this afternoon the only reasonable approach to the dilemma in which the minister finds himself will be for him to withdraw the bill.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there has been a suggestion that some member supporting the government should have a few words to say in regard to this bill. I shall take but a very few minutes to bring to the attention of the house the fact that, in some branches of the Department of Public Works, there are times when urgent calls are received, and they require speedy action.

Let me put one case on record. In 1946 it happened that within my riding, at Leonardville, Deer Island, the breakwater was completely destroyed by a storm. In that harbour a valuable fleet of boats was left without any protection whatsoever. Telegrams, telephone messages and letters began pouring in to me stating that something must be done immediately. I got in touch with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), and the engineers in the New Brunswick branch of the department. They made an investigation and found that the condition was exactly as I had described it.

An endeavour was made at once to find a contractor who would go down and do the necessary work. I repeat that a fleet of valuable boats was affected. The people operating those boats depended upon the breakwater for landing facilities in connection with everything landed there by means of water transportation. All those commodities the people had been accustomed to receive, and which were a great convenience to them, were lost completely. Seventeen or eighteen months elapsed before a contractor could be found to build the breakwater. During those months the boats were obliged to use a harbour many miles away, and those who operated the boats, if they got home at all at week-ends, had to do so the best way they could.

For these reasons I feel there are many cases of emergency which call for speedy action, and the bill we have before us today will receive my support because I believe the Department of Public Works and the other departments of government are perfectly capable of having the work done in this manner, instead of calling for tenders.

Mr. Knowles: That is covered under paragraph (a).

Mr. Hees: That is covered in the first paragraph.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Do you want me to—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, we like this.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart)—

Mr. Ferrie: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hodgson: Oh, if you would stir yourself a little bit, and have something to say about it, all right; but you would not know what he was talking about. You can't tell me anything, because you have not been here all afternoon. I don't suppose you people ever read the bill.

An hon. Member: Have you read the bill?

Mr. Hodgson: May I point out to the hon. member for Charlotte that section 36(a) takes care of the situation he described. The work he mentioned would be one of pressing emergency, in which delay would be an injury to the public interest. In that case of pressing delay the minister is allowed to go ahead. But I am objecting to paragraph (c), where the responsibility is left in the hands of the minister; and not only the Minister of Public Works but ministers in other departments. I am surprised he would want this provision written into the bill. It takes away the right to tender, and will leave more people with their hands on his door-knob looking for jobs and contracts, and all that sort of thing.

Under the tender system the minister at least has an out. He will not be bothered from Friday night until Monday morning with people looking for this, that and the other thing. They have to put their tenders in, the same as anybody else. The tender system also takes away the grounds for criticism. For instance, jobs could be let without tender. There was a case of that kind in connection with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). There was considerable discussion in the house not long ago about a job that had been let without tender.

Mr. Howe: What job was that, does the hon. member remember?

Mr. Hodgson: C. D. Howe and Company.

Mr. Howe: We are back on the old debate. C. D. Howe and Company is a professional firm, as are architects. To my knowledge it is not customary for the government to call for tenders for professional services. If my hon. friend wants to debate C. D. Howe and Company, let us adjourn this debate and I shall be pleased to take him on. Otherwise I think he had better drop that particular subject.

Mr. Hodgson: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has just brought out the very point I was coming to. I am glad he has explained it to the house because it saves me the trouble. I was in the house the day that debate took place. By taking away the right to call for tenders on contracts we increase the possibility of criticism of the minister of any department. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not get too angry about it because I had no intention of taking him to task or inviting a debate with him. I do not want to get him into the position where he will say "Who will stop us? If we want to do anything who will stop us?"

Mr. Howe: Nobody is bothering to stop you.

Mr. Hodgson: He also said "What is a million dollars?" We do not want to get the minister into that mood; we would rather have him in his genial mood. My experience in public life has shown me that the tender system is the only system to follow. When you let contracts without tender you do not always know that you are getting the lowest price. It certainly is not in the public interest or to the public liking. Yesterday we had a case of the government taking more responsibility and authority under the Civil Service Act. In that instance I believe they were taking away the independence of the civil service commissioners. They disagreed with us; nevertheless that was the way I saw it. Today they are taking more responsibility and are asking that parliament give up certain rights which are to be taken by themselves.

I wish more Liberal members would get up on this issue and say what they really think about it. I do not like to see them sit in their seats and say nothing, and then be whipped into line to vote on the motion without having voiced their opinion.

I think the Minister of Public Works would be well advised to reconsider this bill and rewrite it so it will be satisfactory to this house and the people throughout the country. If this thing gets out into the country what will be the ultimate destination? It will be on an overland route of votes. It will not be only in the province of Ontario, it will be from coast to coast; and this government will find themselves sitting on this side of the house, in the opposition.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think everyone enjoyed the turn put on this afternoon by the minister. He does make it hard to be indignant, as has been said earlier, but we should be indignant about this. This is nothing less than throwing down the drain a practice which has had the sanction of generations, perhaps even of centuries, in free governments. I confess that I was slow to realize the full significance of it. The first two paragraphs are fairly wide, but the third one just takes the lid off. I can see no limitation of any kind. There is nothing that could not be done under that. You could do everything under that except make a man a woman or a woman a man.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not do that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I say, I was slow to realize what could be done. This seems to me by far the worst thing that has been brought before us. I am glad to note that there has been some response to the struggle which some of us made in the case of the civil service bill, but if we were correct in describing that as chiselling at the rights of parliament we would have to get some gigantic word to describe what is happening here, some word like smothering, blasting or some other word that implies the destruction of everything.

I think it was the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) who made the point that there would be cases of emergency or where it might be in the public interest to forgo the calling of tenders. I agree with that. We are sensible people—at least we like to think we are. There may be some concessions that should be made, and we are ready to consider them.

I like to think that I use moderate language, most of the time at any rate, but I think that this is an outrage on parliament. I have often disagreed with the government, and I suppose I shall again, but I have always been able to see some argument on their side, although it might be a bad one. But I cannot see any argument for this at all. The minister did not give us an argument. He delighted us; he entertained us; he made us laugh, but he did not give us any argument for this extraordinary change in parliamentary procedure.

I should like to refer to one or two opinions which have been expressed by those in the trade. First I should like to read from the Daily Commercial News a summation of the opinion of those in the construction industry, and which is exactly what you would expect it to be. I quote from the issue of December 10 as follows:

> A check by the Daily Commercial News finds there is distinct disquiet in the industry over an amendment to the Public Works Act (Bill 26), now before parliament.
> This appears to indicate an abrupt change in the long-established government policy of openly calling competitive bids on almost all federal public projects valued at upward of $5,000.

And later:

> Some in the industry say they are even more concerned about that aspect of Ottawa's almost sudden proposal to revamp the Public Works Act which, they remind fellow construction men, governs federal departments other than the Department of Public Works.
>
> The impression is abroad that this could open the way for switching the opening of public works tenders and the letting of public works contracts entirely away from the federal cabinet and reposing that authority wholly in the departments and offices of the ministers individually.

This is not something that can be done just by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), who would do it pleasantly and genially; it is something that can be done by all ministers, some of whom would not do it nearly as nicely. Apparently they are all to have this power. We have the Defence Production Act which grants very wide powers, but I doubt if they are much wider than this. There are two things to remember about the Defence Production Act. First, we hope that it will be temporary, that it will end some day and, second, we realize that it deals with what we all recognize as an emergency. I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has innoculated the Minister of Public Works, in the sense of contaminating him, in the sense of filling him with some desire for wide-open powers. Now I should like to read a short opinion from an independent newspaper in Toronto, the Telegram.

An hon. Member: Very independent.

An hon. Member: Non-partisan.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the Telegram describes itself as independent, and I have no reason whatever to doubt its word. The Telegram has this to say, as found in the issue of November 29:

The long-established practice of inviting tenders for the construction of dominion projects will be jeopardized if parliament passes a bill . . .

And so on. I think "jeopardize" was an understatement. It would not be any case of jeopardy. It would be a case of the finish, the end. I have indicated some of my feelings about this matter. There are two other things I should like to say. Within the time available I tried to find out whether there had been any other debates on this matter, whether the question had been under discussion before. I can find nothing, and I think the reason is that it has never been questioned. It has been a part of our political thinking. It has been a part of the landscape. Nobody has ever questioned it. I have no doubt that when the minister produced this extraordinary document he must have been surprised at himself. He must have said: Well, if I get these fellows on a Saturday afternoon and treat them gently I may get this thing through. After all, let us remind ourselves that he has given us no reason yet. He has entertained us, but he has given us no reasons. I imagine he is going to give section 39 of Bill 25 as a reason and I want to warn him in advance that so far as I am concerned that is no answer at all. It merely comforts us with the thought that the great and good cabinet will decide these things, but that is not satisfactory to us. We are still among the simple people who believe that parliament means something.

I admit it is difficult for anyone outside the opposition to believe that any more, and when I say "opposition" I mean all the opposition. It is very difficult because we realize there are a lot of people in the house who feel a bit cramped in their style in expressing their views, but happily we are not cramped yet. I think that is pretty nearly all I want to say. There may be one or two other points the minister would like to hear. As I said to the minister, we have here a change which seems to me to go to the very root of the matter. It throws not only out of the window—that would not be so bad because we might go and pick it up—but down the drain what after all in any man's language who has thought about the institution of parliament at all must be, if not the cornerstone, at any rate one of the most important rights. I cannot imagine any right more important, and the minister seeks to get rid of it by this simple clause which he tries to read to us in a sort of soothing syrup manner. The base may be sweet; nevertheless the poison is there. It is 6.15, Mr. Speaker. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We agree that you may adjourn the debate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is 6.15, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, you adjourn the debate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to be sure that I have adjourned the debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, yes, we all agree. Just one word—

An hon. Member: Not to close the debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not going to close the debate. I want to announce the business for this evening because I committed myself to my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that he could proceed with Bill No. 44.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do you mean to say we are not going to go on with this?

Mr. Knowles: Did the minister submit a tender?

Mr. Howe: You adjourned the debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I looked for a chance to reply this afternoon, but we will go ahead with Bill No. 44 at eight o'clock tonight.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You had your chance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know if we will resume the bill on public works later or if we will take up the bill of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have not very much more.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then there is a bill under external affairs. Those are the bills we are going to proceed with.

Mr. Drew: Without extending the debate, I hope the doubt the minister has expressed as to whether we may be discussing this amendment to the Public Works Act later suggests the possibility that he is going to withdraw the bill. I would remind him that it will be only a short time until next session, when full consideration can be given to it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In all fairness, my intention was to take time to digest all the advice that has been given to me from all quarters of the house. I do not take this bill in a—

An hon. Member: Casual.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —casual way. I believe it is serious. I have listened to every hon. member, and with the exception of one or two they all dealt with the amendment. A few others straggled around. I could name the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) because what he has said today appears in the Vancouver Sun. It caught my eye while he was speaking. His speech came out in Vancouver before he made it here. It is all there.

Mr. Hodgson: He is doing the same thing as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton).

Mr. Green: What about the bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I wish to have the advantage of replying. I want to think it over and I should like hon. members to think it over.

Mr. Fulton: You should have thought it over before you introduced the bill.

An hon. Member: Think it over until 1952.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like hon. members to think about section 39 of the Financial Administration Act, and we will see who gets the powers.

Mr. Knowles: That gives it to the governor in council.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Don't give us that.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) the debate was adjourned.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

GRAIN

PROVISION FOR SHORT-TERM CREDIT TO PRODUCERS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 44, to provide for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to complete harvesting operations or to make delivery of grain.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Will the minister make a statement now?

Mr. Howe: Yes. In my statement, made on the resolution, I mentioned that this legislation is not a relief measure in the customary sense, but rather is intended as a means of "broadening the base" upon which the banks can make commercial loans to producers. Although the general need for this type of assistance has been diminishing because of the resumption of harvesting in many parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan, nevertheless there are still some instances where the need is great and where producers would find it difficult or impossible to obtain the credit they require without this legislation.

In essence, therefore, the bill provides for loans to be made by the banks on a commercial basis to producers who are unable to harvest or to deliver their grain. By producers I mean the persons actually engaged in the production of grain, as distinct from landlords and others having an interest in the proceeds from the sale of the grain. After a loan is made the proceeds of the first grain delivered thereafter are to be applied to the reduction of the loan until the loan is repaid. An endorsement to that effect will be entered in the delivery permit book of the borrower. The aggregate principal amount of all loans is limited to $20 million. That is the upper limit, and my expectation is that the total of producers' applications will be considerably less than this amount. The government's guarantee to each bank is limited to 25 per cent of the aggregate principal amount loaned by that bank.

The bill provides that the maximum loan to any borrower may be $1,000. This maximum is subject to two qualifications. The first proviso is that if the value of the grain the borrower expects to deliver before the end of the crop year is less than $1,000, the established value of the deliverable grain becomes the upper limit of the amount of the loan. The second qualification applies in either case, and involves deducting from the maximum amount of the loan the value of any grain delivered by the borrower between September 1, 1951, and the date on which the loan is made. Since the intent of the bill is to assist those producers who are without funds because of their inability to complete harvesting or to make delivery, it is fair and proper to deduct the value of grain already delivered. Similarly, since these loans are being made on a commercial basis, it is obvious that the value of the security must be at least equal to the amount of the loan.

The bill provides that the last date on which loans can be made by the banks is May 31, 1952. Any producer will know by that date whether or not he is in need of this assistance. All repayments should be completed with the balance of deliveries to be made from the 1951 crop before July 31, 1952, and the government's liability to the banks on any outstanding claims does not become effective until October 1, 1952. Because of the practical basis upon which the credit base is being enlarged under this legislation there will not be, in my opinion, any volume of outstanding claims upon which the government will be called upon to implement its guarantee.

The basis for my opinion that the government's liability under its guarantee is negligible rests fundamentally upon my belief in the integrity and good faith of western grain growers. There are also suitable security provisions in the legislation. I have already mentioned the endorsement which the borrower will insert in his delivery permit book. In addition the bill requires that a responsible officer of the bank shall scrutinize the loan application with the same care required of him by the bank in its own ordinary business. Section 6 of the bill authorizes the banks to lend money on the borrowers' grain, whether threshed or unthreshed, and gives the banks the same security on such grain as is otherwise provided in the Bank Act. Section 8 gives the lending bank a prior claim to the proceeds payable on delivery of the grain. And finally, under the heading of security, section 10 of the bill provides the crown with the right to receive from the Canadian wheat board any adjustment or participation payments which are due or may become due to the borrower. This will only apply, of course, in cases where the Minister of Finance has had to make payment to a bank as a result of a guaranteed loan.

[Mr. Howe.]

Hon. members will note that there is no provision in the bill for repeal of the legislation. This is to enable the crown to maintain its claim against payments which may become due in the future by the wheat board to defaulting borrowers. It should be noted, however, that much the same effect as a repeal clause is provided by specifying that no loans may be made after May 31, 1952, and by providing the cut-off date of October 1, 1952, for purposes of the guarantee.

I believe that hon. members, upon study of the bill, will agree that we are dealing with the situation in a businesslike way. I repeat that what is required is not a form of relief. Nor is the legislation anything in the nature of a handout. Rather it is a means of providing short-term credit on a business basis to a group of producers who are finding it difficult to meet their living costs because of their inability, for the time being, to deliver their grain.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): In discussing this measure in the resolution stage, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that when we received copies of the bill I fully expected the rate of interest would be set out. As a matter of fact, when other speakers attempted to question the minister during the resolution stage he said he could not go into details until the bill was before the house, which is the proper procedure. As I have looked through the bill I cannot find any section which sets out the rate of interest. I feel disappointed in that because the minister said this bill would be patterned after the Farm Loan Improvements Act. In that act the rate of interest is specifically set out. I am disappointed because many of the small operators who find it difficult to finance will probably still find it difficult to obtain a loan from the bank under this measure. The fact that no rate of interest is stated in this measure will make it difficult for the small operator.

In the part of the country in which I live the same local bank will charge different farmers different rates of interest, depending upon the status and security of each. I think this house will be disappointed in the fact no rate of interest is set out in the bill, as there is in the Farm Loan Improvements Act. If this was intended to assist the small operator who is finding it extremely difficult, the measure will prove disappointing.

According to the estimate of the minister, the percentage of the grain which is still in the fields is as follows: 50 per cent in Alberta, 25 per cent in Saskatchewan, and very little in Manitoba. Taking the minister's estimate and comparing it with the report of the bureau of statistics issued on the 13th, it would prove that on the basis of the initial payment, with the total wheat crop of the three prairie provinces estimated at $600 million, there is still unharvested $175 million worth of wheat. There will be other payments to come later. That is the value that is out. The government guarantee of $5 million—that is 25 per cent of the $20 million—is therefore less than 3 per cent of the total unharvested crop, which is not very good. I imagine that the large operators who have considerable grain out, while they have had terrific expense, still would probably be able to finance at the bank. I therefore think that a great many of the people who most need this assistance will be greatly handicapped, and the more so when there is not a rate of interest set forth in that bill. I am terribly disappointed that the rate of interest is not embodied in the bill because, as I say, I know that men in my own community—neighbours of mine and myself—when we are arranging credit for the year, are charged a different rate of interest. Therefore you will realize what a great handicap that will be to the small man whose credit is not too good in that community. In many instances he will probably not be able to get assistance under this legislation.

There is much else I might say about this bill, but I do not want to repeat what took place at the resolution stage. I still hope something can be done to have inserted in this bill a definite rate of interest which will be of assistance to the small operators who greatly need it. I am also sorry that this matter was not dealt with somewhat earlier, because many of these people who have little other income, who have families to provide for, and with winter now upon us, find it difficult to make bare provision for their families let alone provide them with a proper Christmas. I should like to have seen this matter dealt with some weeks ago. May I appeal to the minister to have inserted in the bill, even in the committee stage, a rate of interest which will provide for all the operators throughout this stricken area of the prairie provinces.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I think one thing the minister said was exceedingly true indeed. That was that the government risk in making these loans is negligible. I would, however, give a different reason from the one he gave. He said it was negligible because of the confidence the government have in the farmers. I would say the government's risk is negligible because of the conditions under which the loan is made. No farmer can obtain a loan without first producing his delivery book and having the loan indicated in the book. He cannot make delivery of a bushel of grain for which he receives payment through the wheat board without that loan being first taken care of. As far as the government is concerned there is no risk. All they are likely to have to meet, I would say, is 5 per cent of the amount they guarantee under this bill, because of these restrictions. The only person who could possibly be a risk would be someone who quit farming this year, never delivered another bushel of grain and had no payments coming through the wheat board. He is the only man who could possibly default, in view of the conditions laid down in this bill as I read it.

The matter of interest raised by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is one that I raised yesterday. As he has stated, the banks in the western area charge different rates of interest depending on the risk they think is involved in making the loan. A large operator or farmer can go in and quite often get a rate of interest of 5 per cent. When a smaller farmer goes in, where the risk is greater, he pays 6 per cent. When the wheat board borrow money to finance initial payments on the grain bought by the wheat pools and the elevator companies, they borrow money at 4 per cent. When the wheat board, as a government agency, apply to obtain funds from the banks for the carrying of the grain they hold, they have a rate of 3 per cent. So as I see it, under this act different rates of interest may be charged to different farmers, depending on the views of the bank manager as to the risk involved. I do not think there is any risk—or if there is it is negligible—where the entry is made in the delivery book of the farmer. If he delivers grain at any time afterward or receives payments through the wheat board, those payments must be first charged against the loan.

The people who are really affected, at least in the area from which I come, are those who live a long distance from the banking institutions. In my own constituency the distance from Hudson Bay Junction to Tisdale is approximately 100 miles. There is a bank in Hudson Bay Junction and there is a bank in Tisdale. There are several hundred farmers living at Prairie River and Mistatim, or along that line, who are forty or fifty miles from either of those banks. They have to journey to one or the other of those towns in order to negotiate a loan. They have probably never before been in the bank asking for a loan, because many of them have small acreages. They are in the pioneer stage, and they have not made much this last year. In fact, in a large area there last year their crops were completely frozen. Many of them had to burn them this spring in order to put in this year's crop. Now they find this year's crop in that area, or at least 70 per cent of it, under the snow. With a heavy crop lying there flat on the ground, their chances of salvaging it in the spring are small indeed. I have letter after letter from that area indicating that it would be doubtful whether the grain which is not swathed can be harvested in the spring. From practical experience I know that where you have a heavy crop of grain and it is lying flat on the ground, when spring comes and you go in with a combine to try to pick it up it pushes ahead of the combine, and there is nothing you can do with it. I have had to burn crops because of that situation, and I know that condition exists there.

These people have lost two crops, yet under this act the minister states that an entry will be made in the delivery book. They will not be able to meet the loan out of this year's crop, but they can never deliver a bushel of grain again until that loan is paid. Over the past two years they have accumulated debts to the storekeeper for living expenses, and they are in a serious position. I can assure the minister that this act is going to be of little value to them. Those cases are not just isolated instances; you will find this situation right across the whole northern part of Saskatchewan and in some areas in the province of Alberta.

I would certainly urge on the minister that, where there has been a complete crop loss this year and where nothing is salvaged out of the crop, these loans should not be repayable. I think something should be done about that matter. I also believe that something should be done in the act to state the rate of interest on these loans; because I am certain the banks are not taking any risk where they have the entry made in the delivery book of the farmer, and as to any grain that farmer delivers in the future the first charge against it is the repayment of this loan.

Many of these farmers have not even been able to pay their taxes. Yet before they can pay their municipal taxes they must repay this loan. It is not being fair to the municipalities. It is not fair to the storekeepers and pools in the area who have carried these farmers that this loan should be the first charge against any grain delivered. That is the only income these farmers have. In some cases this will be the second year they have lost their crops. In that area some payments were made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act last year. But in some cases the townships did not qualify because there was the occasional crop in the area that was extremely good and was harvested. Again this year the same condition applies. Some of the larger farms in those areas, which had combines, were able to harvest a portion of their crop; the yield was very good, and therefore disqualifies the whole township as far as P.F.A.A. payments are concerned. That is the only alternative the farmer has. The only credit he can get is through this legislation. The conditions the minister has placed in the legislation with respect to repayment are not giving a fair chance to the municipalities to whom the farmers owe taxes, or to the dealers in the areas, the storekeepers and other people who are carrying these people on their books.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think this proposal, purely as a federal measure, is fairly satisfactory. Of course there will be many farmers who will not be helped very much by it. They could only be helped by outright grants. I quite realize that if anything of that kind were to be done it would have to be in a measure different from this.

The government is right in bringing down this proposal to utilize the banks rather than the wheat board or the elevator system. It would be a great mistake to try to get this done through the wheat board. I believe that board runs into enough criticism as it is without embarking on a program of helping to finance the harvesting operations of the farmers. I would say that the vast majority of the criticism of the wheat board today is unjustifiable. It is criticism that is made because the people who make it do not realize the true situation. Personally I think the wheat board has done a magnificent job. I believe a great deal of credit is due to the board for the way they handled the farmers' wheat, especially under very difficult circumstances.

In so far as the $5 million is concerned, I have heard some hon. members say they do not think it is enough. Personally I believe it should be enough. Of course it all depends on whether or not the banks endeavour to get the farmers to take loans under this measure instead of making loans in the usual manner If under this legislation they are going to grant loans to the farmers who would normally be obtaining loans as a matter of general banking practice, then it is quite possible that the full amount of money may be used up by farmers who do not need to borrow under this scheme. That is something we should safeguard against, and I mention it as something that I think should be watched. In so far as the losses are concerned, I do not believe that they will be very great. As the legislation is worded there seem to be ample safeguards, and I do not suppose for one minute that the banks are going to make loans to farmers whom they consider to be absolutely uncreditworthy. If a farmer has a reputation of not meeting his obligations I doubt very much whether he will get any help under this legislation, in view of the fact that the banks are handling it. I am not even saying they should. If they have built up that kind of a reputation, then I doubt very much whether they should be eligible under this legislation.

So far as the district in which I reside is concerned, I have found that the banks are perfectly willing to make loans to all bona fide farmers under the farm improvement plan. Under a scheme of this kind it should be far easier for the banks to make loans than under the farm improvement loan scheme, because the guarantee is that much greater. However, I have one or two objections, one of which I mentioned when the legislation was in the resolution stage. I said then that I thought the $1,000 limit was too restrictive. I think some leeway could be given to the local bank to decide whether a loan should be $1,000, $1,500 or even $2,000. It all depends on the size of the operation. For a small farmer, $1,000 should be ample. But if the man is farming on a fairly large scale and has perhaps his total crop unthreshed and under the snow he will need more than $1,000. Yet I take it under this proposal the hands of the banker are tied. He is not in a position to make a larger loan than $1,000. That would be one of my main objections to it. I think the government could give the bankers a little more leeway on this question. I realize the government may be afraid that if that is done the banks may be making too large loans to farmers who really do not need them, and then in cases where the loans are really needed the banks would find that the amount of the guarantee had been exhausted.

Then there is the question of the interest rate. Under a scheme of this kind, where there is a 25 per cent guarantee, I cannot see why the interest rate should be higher than that under the farm improvement plan, namely 5 per cent. Surely that should be ample. I think it should be so written in the legislation. If it were written in the legislation that the rate of interest was to be only 5 per cent then you would deter the bankers from trying to act under this scheme instead of lending money under the normal banking practice. If under the normal banking practice they were getting 6 per cent, they would sooner lend money at 6 per cent than advance money under this for 5 per cent; but if you are writing nothing into it, but letting them charge the same rate under this scheme as under the normal banking practice, then they will try to get the farmer to borrow under this scheme because they have the 25 per cent guarantee. Therefore I think the 5 per cent rate of interest should be put into this legislation. As I say, that would deter the banks from lending money under this scheme to people who should be able to borrow in the normal way.

I think generally speaking the proposal is quite good, but a little bit late. However, I am certainly glad the government has decided to use the chartered banks rather than try to utilize the facilities of the wheat board.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): I should like to say a few words on this bill. I think it affects my constituency more than any other in Saskatchewan. I should like to compliment the minister. I want to thank him for going out to western Canada and investigating the case, and I should like to say how pleased I am to see this bill brought down.

In the northeast part of the province of Saskatchewan we have a population that is just starting in farming. It is really and truly a pioneer country, starting in to make one of the best sections to be found in western Canada. These areas where they are farming are a long way from banks. I am not going to say anything against putting the loan through the bank, but I should like to see something in the regulations stating that if a farmer has from 20 acres and up under the snow the banker has no right to turn him down. He should get his loan. The guarantee is sufficient to take care of that. Some hon. members down here do not just realize what a permit book is, what it really means. It shows every bushel of grain that is marketed and every acre that a farmer has under cultivation. There is no reason for any loss, and I do not think there should be any.

This is not the only time we may have to come to the government of Canada and ask for some form of protection in our country. We in western Canada have been good to Canada. We have produced enormous amounts of grain, large numbers of cattle and quantities of animal products. We have produced these; we have done our share to help the economy of Canada, and there is no reason why there should be any kick against this bill. There is no reason why we should not have this help at this time. There is no reason why a bank should not render service to an individual who is in difficulty. A former speaker said he was glad to see the loans being put through the banks. To some extent I am, too; but I also appreciate something else. I appreciate our one great organization in western Canada, and that is our wheat pool.

When the minister was speaking the other day at the resolution stage he said the wheat pool was willing to co-operate, and that if there was any loss they were willing to pay part of it. I ask here and now: why did not all the grain companies of western Canada offer to do that? We have looked after them; we have given them good dividends; we have done the right and proper thing so far as the elevator companies in western Canada are concerned. There is no reason in the world why they should not all have come forward and said, "We are willing to render a slight service to the people of Canada, to the government of this country".

If that had been done there would have been better co-operation in my part of the country for the simple reason, as one speaker said—I think it was the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright)—that some of the farmers are fifty miles from the banks. In my constituency some of them are sixty or seventy miles away. When they get to the bank, the banker will look at them in a very discouraging way. Their assets are not very great. They may have only seventy-five or a hundred acres broken, at the very outside. And in passing let me tell the house that during August and September there were only nine days when we did not have rain in that northeastern part. That is a very serious situation.

No one up in that country is looking for a handout. We do not want handouts. All we want is fair play. We want to see the banks play fair with the farmers who have had the small crops.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) are most significant at this time. Because this problem affects his constituency so vitally, I believe the hon. member is beginning to realize the possible shortcomings of the measure before us. He mentioned that the small farmers might have difficulty getting loans from the bank. I agree with him that the wheat pool organization could have handled this measure, and that the elevator companies should have offered to go along with the wheat pool in that regard. Local wheat pool agents and the agents of other elevators are at every delivery point. They know the circumstances of the farmers. They are close to the situation, and in my view they could have handled this particular type of assistance for farmers in a better manner than is provided in this legislation.

As the minister has said, I think it is clear that the government is risking very little in this legislation by way of guarantee. The maximum loan a farmer can get is $1,000. If he has already delivered $1,000 worth of grain, he cannot get a loan. If he has delivered grain to an amount less than $1,000, the value of the delivered portion is deducted from his loan. The amount of the loan is entered on his permit, and when the farmer delivers grain to the elevator the full price of that grain is deducted for payments on his loan.

I, for one, hope the farmers in western Canada will not have to use this measure. I know that if I, as a farmer, needed money I would think twice before putting myself in the financial strait-jacket represented by a loan under this measure.

Other hon. members have said that the full amount should not be deducted as the farmer delivers his grain. I think perhaps a percentage should have been deducted. If a farmer has $1,000 worth of grain out under the snow and has threshed no grain, and receives a loan of $1,000; then, although I am sure the farmer will do his best, what incentive has he to go into more debt to get that $1,000 worth of grain out of the snow, when he will not receive any cash when he markets the grain? I believe there should have been a percentage, perhaps to the extent of 50 per cent or even more, if the minister had wished to do it in that way. But when a farmer gets a loan under this legislation, surely a portion of the proceeds from the sale of his grain, when he markets it subsequently, should go to the farmer, and a portion to the bank, not the whole of the money to the bank as is provided in this legislation.

I am sure the banks will be happy about the measure. They are going to be able to lend millions of dollars with absolutely no risk. The farmers are tied in a strait-jacket. Unless they quit farming or die they are going to have to pay the whole sum, and pay it in short order.

The minister has said that the government is risking little or nothing by giving this guarantee. One would think there was no emergency in western Canada at all, after reading this bill. I was glad that when the people of Winnipeg, Rimouski, Cabano and the Fraser valley faced emergencies the government came through with some money for their help. I believe if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had been handling this measure he would have brought in something better. From the discussions he had in Saskatchewan I believe he had another plan in mind, and that it was a better plan.

In Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and the Peace river country the Prairie Farm Assistance Act applies. If there is a widespread crop failure farmers receive some money without any necessity whatsoever of repayment. If there had been an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act whereby a farmer who, in the spring, has to burn his crop or plow it under, would get even $2.50 per acre as provided under that act, he would receive more actual benefit than he can under this legislation.

As the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has said, $1,000 is not very much money in this day and age. The amount of the loan should have been higher. I believe it should have been at least $2,000. One farmer who will have difficulty under this measure is the one who has already harvested and delivered $1,000 worth of grain. I know that farmer, in common with all others, will have spent the $1,000 long before the grain has been threshed. No doubt he has paid part of it to the municipality for taxes, part of it for groceries, part for gasoline and repair bills in the local town, and part to meet other obligations. The man who has threshed $1,000 worth of grain is probably broke today. If he has another $1,000 worth of grain out under the snow he will not be able to obtain any assistance under this measure.

As I have said already, I hope the farmers of western Canada will not have to avail themselves of the provisions of this measure. I hope they will be able to get the ordinary type of bank credit, or that they will be able to get credit through their credit unions. If a farmer gets credit under this legislation he places himself in a financial strait-jacket until the loan is repaid. The banks are risking nothing under this measure; they stand to gain. The government is risking very little.

The situation faced by many farmers is an emergency, and I think in the main they would have been better pleased had the government considered this to be a real emergency and provided some actual financial assistance. The least the government could have done in this emergency was to arrange to pay the interest on these emergency loans, at least for eight months.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that when introducing this bill the minister made it quite clear that this is nothing in the nature of a handout.

Mr. Howe: Quite.

Mr. Coldwell: The government is well protected; the banks are well protected, and the western farmers are going to meet their obligations in the manner in which they have always met them.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) has described the situation exactly. The purpose of the bill is to place farmers who have for one reason or another been unable to deliver any grain in the position they would have been in had they been able to deliver one thousand bushels. We were asked for this legislation; a number of hon. members stated the position in their own constituencies and said this type of relief was needed. At the same time they made it very clear that they did not want a handout. In other words they did not want any loan treated as disaster money, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) wishes to treat it.

It is not that kind of help that is needed in western Canada. We have had the largest total crop of grain in western Canada in our history. Some time before next spring about 97½ per cent of that grain is going to be harvested and marketed, and there is going to be more money in western Canada at that time than probably there has been from any single crop. That is the situation; it is not a disaster situation. However, it is a calamity for those farmers who have not been able to harvest any grain or who, if they have harvested, for some reason or other have not been able to deliver any grain. The problem was to make it possible for those farmers to be in the same position as though they could deliver 1,000 bushels of grain. We will do that by advancing $1,000 against grain in the fields or in storage.

The suggestion has been made that the operations of many farmers are too small and they will not be able to take advantage of this legislation. Each farmer has in his possession a document which shows his exact position, his delivery permit book. It shows his seeded acreage of each type of grain. If that permit book is brought to the bank and it shows that he has a certain acreage and has not delivered any grain, he is able to make out a prima facie case for obtaining a loan. It will be quite easy for a bank to check up on the position in that district. A banker can telephone the country elevator operator or go out and look at the farm himself. Unless he has good reason to believe that something has happened to that grain which is not general over the district, he is pretty well bound to make a loan.

The bankers whom we met accepted that responsibility. I may say that they were not keen to take on this business, but they accepted it as a public service, knowing the obligation that was upon them to do the job in the manner in which the government expects it to be done.

Mr. Coldwell: Was there any discussion about the interest rate?

Mr. Howe: Yes. We had in the bill no later than three or four days ago a clause setting the interest rate. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said that if the standard rate was 6 per cent in a district and this measure specified 5 per cent, the banker would be trying to lend at the 6 per cent rate instead of at the 5 per cent rate. There would be the converse situation in which a man paying 6 per cent on a normal loan might borrow under this arrangement at 5 per cent. He would be under the temptation to pay off his loan at 6 per cent and substitute the second loan.

After a great deal of study we decided that the only practical thing was to accept the interest rate in the district. It varies. The rate we had in the bill at one stage was not greater than 5½ per cent. We were assured by the committee of bankers with whom this transaction was negotiated that the rate would not exceed 5½ per cent in any district, and that in some districts it would be lower than that. It will be the prevailing rate for that type of loan in the district. After a great deal of study we came to the conclusion that we had better adopt the rate in the district for the type of loan that is covered by this measure.

Mr. Fair: That means the rate will not exceed 5 per cent?

Mr. Howe: Five and a half per cent. We were assured of that by the banks, although there is nothing in the bill that makes it mandatory. Reference has been made to farmers who might be some distance from a bank. That situation arises more often in Saskatchewan than in Alberta. In Alberta there is good coverage by the banks, but I believe that in Saskatchewan there are many farmers fifty or sixty miles from the nearest bank. However, most producers have some kind of conveyance and a trip of sixty miles and return to get $1,000 would not seem to be too far. I do not think that is an insurmountable difficulty, although it is regrettable. I wish some more convenient system of distributing this money could have been found. Although other ways were explored we met with a few disappointments and decided that using the banks would be the most feasible way of doing the job.

I will admit there was no intention that great risks should be taken. We are advancing money against good security. It is intended to be a short-term loan. As the security is realized we intend to collect the money. The chief purpose we sought to achieve was to place every farmer in as good a position as he would have been had he been able to deliver 1,000 bushels of grain in the normal way.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Wright: I want to say something of a general nature on section 1. I agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that in a great number of areas in the west this bill will do a reasonably good job, but in at least a part of the area I represent and in a large part of the area represented by the hon. member for Mackenzie many small farmers are a long way from banking facilities, and it is not going to do a job. Just imagine if you were in the position of one of these small farmers who has 100 acres of grain. In most cases it is less than that. Let us say he has 50 to 100 acres. He goes to the bank and gets a loan of $1,000. That loan will carry him over the winter. Then he is faced with the proposition of harvesting his crop in the spring; and he wants to go to the dealer and get certain supplies for that purpose. The dealer knows there is already a loan of $1,000 against the crop which must be paid before he can get one cent for the gas or anything else he advances to the farmer for harvesting the crop. How is he going to harvest that crop? I should like the minister to answer that. Many small farmers would like an answer.

Mr. Howe: I assume the hon. member is speaking of a farmer who only grows $1,000 worth of grain.

Mr. Wright: Many of them only have a small acreage in grain.

Mr. Howe: We will talk about a farmer who only grows $1,000 worth of grain. We will assume that in a normal season he is able to market his grain in the usual way; he brings it to the elevator and gets $1,000. What does he do in that case?

Mr. Wright: He also has his other payment coming in the spring.

Mr. Howe: He has that under this arrangement too.

Mr. Wright: No, he has not.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Wright: No, because he has not delivered any crop and he has no further payments in the spring. If he has any payments coming in the spring they are already hypothecated to pay the loan.

Mr. Howe: No, he will get his further payments this year. The only security we get is the initial delivery.

Mr. Fair: It has been suggested that a farmer who has delivered $1,000 worth of grain cannot get any further credit under this legislation. In my opinion that is not correct. What is the correct answer?

Mr. Howe: That is correct. If a farmer has obtained $1,000 by delivering grain from this crop he is ineligible for further credit.

Mr. Fair: I do not think that is very good business, because many people have very heavy expenses. The fact that they deliver a thousand bushels of grain and get an interim payment on it will not begin to pay the expenses incurred by many farmers. I think the $1,000 credit will not be sufficient.

Mr. Argue: I should like to follow up the minister's illustration of a moment ago with respect to the small farmer who ordinarily would thresh $1,000 worth of grain. He can apply now and get a loan of $1,000, but there is no assurance that that farmer will in fact be able to harvest his crop next spring. I believe the vast majority of the crop will be harvested, but if a man has a low-lying farm subject to floods the whole crop may be wiped out. If there is a wet, damp spring weeds will come up through the standing grain or through the swamp. I know that thousands of acres were burned over in my area in the spring of 1943 following the fall of 1942 when we had a situation such as we have now. If 50 per cent, shall we say, of the grain delivered on the permit book were allocated to the payment of this obligation the farmer would then have a little cash with which to go to the storekeeper and oil dealer and secure some supplies for spring operations. The minister has said—he is always an optimist and is very often right—that he expects about 97½ per cent of the grain will be harvested. I take it he means acreage. I think much more than 2½ per cent of the grain is lost now. However, he says that he expects 97½ per cent of the crop will be harvested. I hope the minister is right, and I think there is a good chance that he will be right, but the 2½ per cent that remains unthreshed will mean the whole crop for a lot of the smaller farmers.

Under this measure the 2½ per cent of the farmers who are unable to harvest their crop even in the spring will be able to get an advance of $1,000. Then they will be tied up for $1,000 worth of next year's crop. I should like to see, although I do not think the time is ripe for it now, an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which might bring the provision I wish to suggest into effect at the end of July next year. An inspection could be made then of the farms to ascertain which farmers had been unsuccessful in harvesting a large part of their crop. There are bound to be some farmers in that position. No farmer with a potential crop of 30 or 40 bushels an acre will forget about harvesting it in order to get some help under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. However, if because of bad weather conditions next spring certain farmers are unable to harvest their grain, I think in an emergency like that an amendment should be made to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to provide for payment to them of $2.50 an acre. It is not very much, but for the small farmer in the constituency of the hon. member for Mackenzie, shall we say, who next spring is unable through no fault of his own to harvest his crop, $2.50 an acre paid under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act would be of some material help. That is the type of emergency that I think the government should deal with.

On section 9—Offences.

Mr. Fair: You are going very fast, Mr. Chairman, and before you get away from us I should like to say something about clause 9. I think subsection 1 (a) is all right but subsection 1 (b) reads:

> A person who makes any other statement in his application that is false in any material respect . . .

I should like to see the word "knowingly" inserted before the word "makes". In many cases farmers may unintentionally make some statement that would get them into trouble under this clause, If we add the word "knowingly" it will relieve that situation. I am not sympathizing with the person who knowingly makes a false statement, but having been in banks myself and having sat on the other side of the desk from the manager a good many times in the past, I know that in many cases the manager writes down the answers to his own questions without consulting the fellow on the other side of the desk. The word "knowingly" would protect the innocent farmer. I should like to see it inserted if the minister has no objection.

Mr. Howe: I have an objection. Whether false statements are made knowingly or not is a matter of conjecture. It is a very difficult fact to prove. I think any misstatement of fact would have to be a gross misstatement such as saying that he owned property he did not own, or did not have a mortgage when he had, or something of that sort.

Mr. Fair: I do not think a farmer would take the chance of doing that, because the banker knows his business much too well.

Mr. Howe: If that is the case probably the clause means very little because it would have to be a rather gross misstatement of fact.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in subsection 1 (a) you have the word "knows". The subsection reads:

> A person who states in his application an estimated quantity of crops or grain or an estimated amount that he knows to be false.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Quelch: Why not say in subsection 1 (b), "makes any other statement in his application that he knows is false"? When it comes to estimating crops, it is going to be a pretty wise man who will be able to estimate what a crop will yield next spring. We do not know how much damage will result to the crop on the ground. It may only yield half what it was in the field.

Mr. Howe: That is why 1 (a) is worded in that way. It reads:

> A person who states in his application an estimated quantity of crops or grain or an estimated amount that he knows to be false.

For instance, a man may come in and say that his wheat goes 30 bushels to the acre and it may only go 20, but he may still be giving an honest estimate of what he thought that grain would yield. Therefore so far as the amount of the crop is concerned it is a case of knowing the estimate to be false. "Any other statement" refers to a statement of fact that is false, and not an estimate. I think there is a distinction between the two.

Mr. Quelch: He is not required to make any statement about whether he will harvest before seeding. He may intend to do it, but on account of weather conditions and so on he would not be able to do it.

Mr. Fair: What sort of statement is covered by section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (b):

> Makes any other statement in his application that is false in any material respect;

What would that cover?

Mr. Howe: He may say that he owns grain, whereas he may be only a tenant farmer and entitled to only the tenant's share of the grain. He might make any other statement about his position that would be false.

Mr. Fair: That would be deliberate.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Howe: Yes. I cannot think of anything else. In any question that involves judgment we say that if he knowingly makes a false statement, then he must be guilty. If he makes a statement of fact, then the fact must be accurate.

Mr. Fair: The minister will cover the situation by placing the word "knowingly" in that section. I do not suppose the minister would mind adding an additional word to make the bill quite clear. We have made changes in some of the other legislation we have had before us.

Mr. Howe: I am afraid it would not apply in this case.

Mr. Wright: What is the position of the landlord and tenant under this bill? Is it the tenant who will make application for the loan? What happens to the landlord's share of the crop; is that hypothecated on the loan?

Mr. Howe: That is a matter for the bank to sort out. Of course only the tenant would be entitled to make application for a loan. The landlord is not entitled to make application, and the security of the tenant is something the bank must work out. I suppose the tenant could only borrow on his interest in the grain.

Mr. Wright: What action is taken in a case such as I am going to describe? I know that a good many farmers are optimists and really expect they are going to harvest their crop. Suppose a farmer says he has a crop that will yield about 30 bushels to the acre. He finds when he starts to harvest his crop in the spring that it is impossible to operate his machinery. He made a statement that he intended to harvest it, and he tried to do so. Will there be any action taken where a farmer is unable to harvest his crop because of reasons over which he has no control?

Mr. Howe: In a case like that, it has to be proven that he intentionally made a statement that was false.

Mr. Quelch: Consider the case of a tenant who receives two-thirds of the crop. When he delivers his grain in the spring the bank will be able to insist on repayment from two-thirds of that crop on the loan they have made. Would there be any demand made on the other one-third?

Mr. Howe: I would not be too specific, but I would think that two-thirds of the crop would be applied against the loan, and the other third would be turned over to the landlord.

Mr. Quelch: But if the proceeds from two-thirds of the crop are insufficient to meet the loan, the bank would not be in a position to take the other third in order to liquidate the loan.

Mr. Howe: No.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Howe: Now.

Mr. Howe moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Before the bill is read a third time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two for my own section. No doubt conditions vary considerably throughout the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. In a large part of my constituency this measure is going to be of very little value. As I indicated in my speech of December 10, the losses there are almost as great as would be occasioned by a hail storm. It is doubtful that much of the grain in the western part of my riding will be capable of being harvested. Conditions are a little better in the southern and eastern portions, because there they did get some grain. I would imagine that all the way up the eastern foothills of the Rocky mountains there will be found conditions somewhat resembling those which obtain in my own riding. I believe the government should take more definite measures than those appearing in this bill.

Some steps ought to be taken to reward the people in those parts for the amount of money they have contributed under P.F.A.A. They have been making payments under P.F.A.A. ever since 1939. They have paid a lot of money in, but they have not received a cent in return because in that area they rarely lose enough of their grain to qualify for payments out of the fund. This area generally produces good crops. Heavy losses were substained there, as a result of the money which was stolen from the farmers of western Canada under the U.K.-Canadian wheat agreement. The losses were heavy because these farmers sold a lot of that grain. As I said the other night, I believe they should receive better treatment than this bill offers. I really believe that the minister, after having this bill passed, ought to begin to think of something a little better than this to aid the people in these grain growing areas.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD

TO PRESCRIBE THE CONSTITUTION AND POWERS OF THE BOARD, AND TO PROVIDE FOR NECESSARY EXPENDITURES

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the bill was thoroughly discussed in the resolution stage, and I do not know that there is anything I can add at this moment by way of discussing the principle of the bill. I feel I covered that very fully when we were in the resolution stage. I believe we could spend our time to better advantage at this stage in committee, where information could be asked for by members who so desired, and I am in the position to give information. I doubt very much if I could use the time to best advantage by repeating what I said before. I should like to move second reading at the moment and if there is any general discussion to listen to it and then go into committee as soon as we may so the information which members desire can be obtained.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): It is not my intention to take up much of the time of the house now, but I want to make a short statement about this bill. I realize to some extent the necessity for legislation of this type, since it will be more or less a stopgap due to the lack of producer boards in the country at this time. I should like to have the minister's assurance—and I think he can give it to us—that this board will not be used to discourage the setting up of more producer boards, or to work in competition with or to the detriment of any producer board now in existence. That is all I want to say at the present time, but I should like the minister to give us that assurance, namely that it is not going to work to the disadvantage of any producer board now in operation and that it will not work in opposition to or in competition with a producer board that may be organized in the future.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us empowers the government to establish an agricultural products board. While the bill empowers the governor in council to direct that board to do a number of things, such as purchasing food products in Canada for shipment to overseas countries and the buying and selling of agricultural products within Canada, it seemed to me that the main or the first purpose of the board would be to handle the imports of butter into Canada in the coming months.

Agricultural Products Board

When we were discussing the resolution preceding the bill the position of the members of the C.C.F. group was that we supported the bill; we are pleased to give the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) another board if he thinks he needs it. At that time, however, we said—as we have said in this house in the past—that in this measure a formula should be provided for the establishment of floor prices.

In the debate the minister said the policy of the government in establishing floor prices was to establish them on the basis of the same price-cost relationship that prevailed for agricultural products in the years 1943 to 1945. As reported at page 997 of Hansard, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), the Minister of Agriculture went on to attempt to demonstrate to us how the government's formula had applied to the dairy industry. The minister took the present prices of milk and said that the price today is higher than the price based on the formula. He made the same statement with regard to cheese. He said the present price is higher than the price would be based on the 1943-45 price-cost relationship. As reported at page 991 of Hansard the minister made this admission:

> Then, coming to butter the figures are 100 and 152. That is the low one. And when some say that butter is one of the lowest priced foods in Canada today, they are perfectly right. Taking 100 as the basis for 1943-45, the index for butter is 152.

The minister had already, prior to that, stated that the cost index today was 160. In that statement the minister admitted that the government's legislation does not provide a floor price based on parity with the same price-cost relationship as that which prevailed from 1943 to 1945. There is under milk no floor price established by this government. There is no floor price under cheese. The minister's argument therefore has no bearing when he gives us these prevailing prices for milk and cheese. The one thing under which the government has a floor price is butter; and the minister admitted that the floor price is below his own formula and that butter is one of the low priced commodities in Canada today.

There are three farm commodities today under which support prices are provided by the government. The first I have mentioned, namely butter. The minister himself says that butter prices are low and that the formula is not being applied to butter because the price is lower than the price-cost relationship, based on 1943-1945.

The government has a floor price under eggs of 38 cents a dozen for grade A large at Montreal. Taking 1943-1945 as 100, the minister said the farmers' cost of production index today is 160. In 1943-1945 the prices of eggs varied from a low of 34 cents a dozen in April 1943 to a high of 48 cents a dozen in the winter of 1944-45. I have worked out the average price for eggs in that three-year period and, on the statistics I obtained from the Department of Agriculture, I get an average egg price in 1943-45 of 38 cents a dozen. The floor price today is exactly the same as that which prevailed in 1943-45, yet the cost of production, on the basis of the minister's own statement, has gone up 60 per cent.

If the minister had a formula written into legislation the floor price under eggs should be not less than 60 cents a dozen for grade A large. That is what is wrong with the minister's legislation. The minister says there is a formula, but there is no formula. He says: Oh, we make checks and we go over the statistics. But the minister has not applied to the price of eggs a parity floor based on his own suggested formula of the price-cost relationship that prevailed in 1943-45. Because of the fact that there is not an adequate floor, we find farmers going into and out of the production of eggs periodically, with the result that sometimes there is a high price for eggs and sometimes the price for eggs is extremely low. On perusing the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix I noticed that in one morning—I believe it was about two weeks ago—in Saskatoon the price of eggs to the producer dropped 14 cents a dozen; it dropped 6 cents at one stage and 8 cents at another. How can any producer operate with any degree of certainty as to what his return for eggs will be when he finds the price of eggs dropping 14 cents in one morning? I think the floor price for eggs should be raised. I believe that a higher floor price would encourage production, would to a large extent iron out the peak in egg prices, and that as a result there would be a more stable price to the consumer and to the producer.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) has, during this session, gone over the serious drop in the price of hogs that has taken place in Canada during the last few months. In the figures he placed on Hansard at page 912, he pointed out that at Winnipeg in July hogs were an average of $37.75 a hundredweight—that was for grade A hogs, I believe—and that the price had dropped to $28 in the last week of October. Since the last week of October the price of hogs has taken another drop. On December 3 the price at Winnipeg was $26.50 a hundredweight. In other words, from July until early December the price of hogs to the farmer dropped by 30 per cent. That is not providing stability for the hog producer. A situation like that is most unsatisfactory. The government has a floor price on hogs of $32.50 a hundredweight for Wiltshire sides.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. member a question? Why does he not finish the story? Why does he not give us the price for last week and this week?

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Mr. Argue: The minister can do that, and I doubt very much whether he will find that the price has gone up very much. I have not checked the papers recently.

Mr. Gardiner: The price went up a cent each week.

Mr. Argue: I have not checked the papers for a few days, but when I looked at the last quotation in the Winnipeg Free Press in the reading room some two days ago that is exactly what the figures were. If the minister has any later figures that have come from Winnipeg in the last two or three days I will accept them, but I am certain that they are not much higher than the $26.50 I have quoted.

Mr. Gardiner: The price went up a cent last week and another cent this week.

Mr. Argue: That is fine; that puts the price back to where it was in the last week of October, so the 30 per cent drop is now a 25 per cent drop. The price of hogs is going up and down so fast that I cannot keep track of it. Neither can the farmer keep track of it, so finally he throws up his hands and says: "I do not know what I am going to get for my hogs, but I still think I might just as well go out of hog production". There is no encouragement for hog production when the minister and the government have set the floor price so low that the price of hogs can drop to $26.50 a hundredweight; and that is for dressed carcasses, not for Wiltshire sides.

As the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) has said before in the house, the price to the consumer has not changed at all. The fact that the price to the farmers has gone down in the short period of a few months from 25 to 30 per cent no doubt caused the farmers union of Manitoba, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of December 13, to call upon the government for an immediate investigation into the Canadian packing industry with a view to its nationalization. The farmers union of Manitoba is fed up with the packing industry that encourages this type of price fluctuation, and asks the government for an investigation into that industry with a view to nationalization. The Canadian Press dispatch goes on as follows:

> The resolution claimed present prices paid farmers for livestock have "not brought a like downward trend in the price of meat to consumers of whom we are a part."

There was no benefit to the consumer, even though the price to the producer went down 30 per cent. There is no stability for the egg producer. There is no stability for the bacon producer. We can produce more eggs in Canada; we can produce more bacon; we can produce more food of all kinds; and surely at this time when we are engaged in a world-wide struggle with communism, one of the best things we could do to sell our democratic way of life to nations throughout the world would be to provide food supplies to the best of our ability to underdeveloped countries.

I received a very interesting answer, I thought, to a question I placed on the order paper on November 4. The question read as follows:

> What was the quantity and value, in each month, of wheat, other grains, livestock, agricultural machinery, industrial machinery, and any other commodities made available to (a) each country under the Colombo plan, since its inception; (b) any other country, by way of economic assistance, during the past eighteen months.

To me that looked like a pretty complicated question, and I had no doubt the government departments would have to go to a lot of work to dig up all these statistics in detail. Therefore I said nothing in the house as to why the answer to that question was delayed. The question was asked on November 4; the answer came down on December 11, some five or six weeks later. What was the answer? It reads:

> Under the Colombo plan the only definite commitment so far made was to India for wheat to the total value of $10 million.

The answer to that question was known immediately I put the question on the order paper. It was a short answer, and could have been made within forty-eight hours. The answer goes on:

> This leaves $5 million available to India in this fiscal year. The other obligation is to Pakistan to which country $10 million has been allotted this year.

To the other part of the question the answer is:

> Ten million dollars loaned to the government of the United Kingdom under the provisions of the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946.

In other words, even though Canada is capable of producing much larger quantities of foodstuffs of all kinds than we are producing at the present time, the government does not give encouragement to our agricultural producers through proper floor price legislation, and does little or nothing in the way of providing assistance to underdeveloped and backward countries. The government should do what the minister says it is its intention to do, namely provide a formula for floor prices for agricultural products. I accept the minister's suggestion that the formula might be on the same price-cost relationship as prevailed from 1943 to 1945. During that period I do not think farm prices were particularly high. Farm costs were not particularly high, either; so that the 1943-45 relationship might represent a formula on which a floor price could be based. The minister may say: Suppose we get a surplus? Suppose we get a greater quantity of production than we can consume in Canada? I would say that is all to the good. If we could produce more eggs and more bacon than we can consume in Canada, many of the western European nations—and I am thinking particularly of the United Kingdom—would welcome Canadian eggs and Canadian bacon. Foodstuffs of all kinds would be welcomed in the poverty-stricken nations of southeast Asia. One of the best contributions Canada could make to the establishment and the promotion of democracy throughout the world and the maintenance of peace would be to ship larger quantities of food to European countries and countries in southeast Asia, because I feel Canada could and should produce more. If necessary let us give the commodities away. I think that is one of the best things we could do if we really believe in promoting democracy. One of the best ways to increase production is to write into our legislation a formula for the provision of adequate floor prices to our producers. Because I believe such a formula is absolutely necessary I wish to move an amendment to the motion for the second reading of this bill, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce):

> That Bill No. 18 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for the establishing of floor prices at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relationship not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1943-1945.

The minister says it is the intention of the government to provide floor prices on that basis. But that is not being done. All I am asking the government to do is to write into our farm legislation a formula which will provide a guaranteed floor price for agricultural producers, based on a parity formula such as I have mentioned.

If that were done, we would get increased production. If we had increased production there would be a lot less likelihood that we would have the very high prices consumers have to pay during certain periods of the year. If we stimulated production to a point greater than consumption in Canada I think we should be all the more pleased, and we should make available that increased agricultural production to the peoples in other nations of the world.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group believe that this bill to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board, together with the Agricultural Prices Support Act, provides the machinery which can—and I use the word "can" advisedly—stabilize the prices of farm products at a fairly satisfactory level. And when I say "a fairly satisfactory level" I mean a level which bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities.

For a long time farm organizations have been asking for a formula to be established for the purpose of setting floor prices. When this measure was in the resolution stage the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did tell the house what kind of formula the government is using at the present time. He stated that under the government formula floor prices would be maintained at such a level that the prices of agricultural products today would bear the same relationship to the price of other commodities that existed in 1943-45.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has said, the trouble is that that is not written into the Agricultural Prices Support Act. If it were, then I think it would safeguard the farmer against a similar occurrence to that of the thirties, when the prices of farm products fell by over 65 per cent at a time when the prices of other commodities fell to the extent of only 25 per cent.

Have we any assurance that if such a situation developed floor prices would be maintained under the formula outlined by the Minister of Agriculture? If that formula were set out in the Agricultural Prices Support Act we would have that assurance. But in view of the fact that there is no formula in either this measure or the Agricultural Prices Support Act, have we any assurance that if a serious drop in agricultural prices took place, a drop far below the price levels of other commodities, the government would carry out the formula outlined by the Minister of Agriculture? Or would the government then say that it would be too expensive to carry out that formula, and that therefore they would adopt another formula? The only assurance the farmer can have that that formula would be carried out is to place it in the act. Therefore I think the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia is good; only, unfortunately, I think it is an amendment to the Agricultural Prices Support Act rather than to the agricultural products board measure.

I know there are many people today who object to this kind of legislation. They say it is an interference with private business. But those very people who make that charge believe in insurance—and this is nothing more or less than a form of insurance. It is insurance against an undue fall in agricultural prices. And, mind you, it is insurance for which the farmers have already paid the premium, and a very heavy premium at that. Do not let anyone forget that in the depression years the farmers were taking prices far below the cost of production. They were told time and again they could not expect to get more than the world price. Yet when prices rose steeply during the war, price ceilings were placed on farm products. The government asked the farmers to take less than they might otherwise receive, and all this was done in the name of stabilization. The government promised that if the farmers accepted those prices, then the government would maintain the prices of agricultural products at a fair level after the war. While taking those lower prices the farmers lost millions upon millions of dollars. That is why I say they have paid their insurance premium for the insurance this measure provides.

Today we are told there is danger of serious starvation and famine conditions in many parts of the world, unless we can maintain production at a high level. We are told that today the increase in production is barely keeping pace with the increase in population. The food and agriculture organization have issued warnings time and again, and have stressed the fact that every nation must do everything in its power to maintain production at a high level. Yet today in Canada we find the farm population is decreasing. The younger people are leaving the farms and going to the cities, because they find that in the cities the wages are higher and the way of living is generally speaking easier. They have many conveniences in the cities that they do not have on the farms. Therefore we are having a great deal of difficulty in keeping the younger people on the farms. Today we find many farms being operated by people well along in years. One may well ask what will happen in the future, unless we can improve conditions on the farm so the young people will be willing to stay there.

If we want to keep food production at the highest level, then I think we must ensure that the increase in production in the future is not used as an excuse to force the prices of agricultural products down, as has been done so many times in the past. That has been the history of agricultural prices. Whenever we have had reserves of food the prices of commodities have gone down. And so the farmers have actually been discouraged from increasing their production because they have realized that if they did so they would be forcing prices down.

This measure, I believe, provides a means whereby the prices of farm products may be maintained. It provides a method whereby in the event of a surplus the government may make purchases, and either dispose of such surplus to foreign nations, or store it, or process it. I believe if the government utilizes this measure as it can be utilized, it could very well safeguard against any serious fall in prices. A surplus would then become a blessing and would be used in a year of scarcity to maintain the standard of living. As I say, the machinery is there. Most people are afraid, however, that the government will not make effective use of it in time of need.

One of the reasons for this fear lies in certain press statements we read. I must admit I was concerned by a statement that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of December 6. This was headed "Government May Continue Food Floors," and it went on to say:

> Agriculture Minister Gardiner wound up a two-day federal-provincial agricultural conference last night with the hint that the government is considering continuation of price support for eggs, butter and bacon in 1952.

Why the hint? That implies definitely that it is possible the government may not continue floors. Surely we should be able to feel confident under this legislation that floors will be continued next year. However, according to this, it is just possible that floors will be continued. No assurance is given. If this legislation means anything every farmer should feel confident that next year and during future years these floors will be in existence. It should not require a statement from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the floors will be continued next year. If the formula outlined by the minister was placed in the Agricultural Prices Support Act all fear or distrust would be wiped out and we would know that this legislation really means what it appears to say.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on the amendment, which has not yet been ruled out of order.

Mr. Knowles: It was not ruled out the last time it was moved.

Mr. Gardiner: It will probably be voted out if it is not ruled out.

Mr. Knowles: No doubt. It was voted down before, with the minister's help.

Mr. Gardiner: The amendment reads:

> That Bill No. 18 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for the establishing of floor prices at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relationship not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1943-1945.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), this is not the bill which you would amend if you were going to make that provision. The suggestion was made, both in the debate on second reading and in the debate on the resolution, that we were dealing with floor price legislation. I corrected that statement at the time we were discussing the resolution, and I repeat that this legislation has nothing to do with the matter. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was out of order most of the time he was speaking on the second reading.

Section 9 (2) of the act which provides for floor prices provides the very thing which is suggested here in as plain language as could be used without setting up a formula as suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia. This particular legislation does not do what has been suggested by the hon. member.

A moment ago the hon. member suggested that if the Minister of Agriculture wanted another board the house would be prepared to approve it. This bill actually does away with three boards and substitutes one in their place. It is not asking for another board. During the war and the transitional periods we had a board to handle dairy products, a board to handle meat products and a board to handle special products. This will constitute one board to take the place of those three.

Mr. Argue: Is it not true that those three boards went out of existence on March 31 of this year?

Mr. Gardiner: No, but those three boards will go out of existence as a result of what we are doing now. The three boards which were constituted during the war period were kept in existence until recently, and this is just a substitution. This board is being placed in a position to deal with matters that may be referred to it, matters that were previously dealt with by the three boards. It is perfectly true that only one thing has been given to it to deal with up to date, the purchase of butter. That butter is being brought in from outside Canada. They have not dealt in any way with the setting of floor prices.

The statements made by the hon. member for Assiniboia could be refuted, but I would probably be out of order if I attempted to do that, just as he was out of order in discussing what he did under this particular measure. If the amendment which has been moved had been passed in connection with the other act the facts would bear out by what has happened ever since the war down to the present time in relation to farm prices that what the member for Assiniboia contends should happen has happened. I have all the facts here in relation to it, and I can present them to the house. I do not think I would be in order to discuss them in detail now, but if hon. members desire to have the information I am quite prepared to give it when we get into committee.

I have information here which was prepared for the purpose of answering questions which have been asked within the last two or three days, and the statement I have in hand refutes one suggestion that was made with regard to eggs. It has been said by the member for Assiniboia that the price ought to be 60 cents per dozen if we are going to have a price which would bear out the suggestion made with regard to the relationship to earlier prices in 1943, 1944 and 1945. Actually the average price over the last eleven months at Montreal has been 67 cents, or 7 cents better than the hon. member says it ought to be.

One could go through the whole range of commodities and show a similar condition as having existed in connection with prices, but I say again that I do not think I would be in order to do that on the second reading of this bill. I suggest to you that the amendment really is not one which refers to this bill but rather to another act entirely, and as such should be declared out of order.

Mr. Blackmore: Were the prices at Montreal mentioned by the minister the prices to the producer or to the consumer?

Mr. Gardiner: The average wholesale market price for grade A large eggs at Montreal for 1950 was 51·5 cents per dozen and for the first eleven months of 1951 the average price was 67·4 cents per dozen. It was the wholesale price.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the minister that the amendment is not worded in such a way as to ask for an amendment to this particular bill. It reads:

That Bill No. 18 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for the establishing of floor prices at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relationship not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1943-45.

That simply sets out the principle we want the government to accept, and which the minister has at times said in this house they were prepared to accept. All this does is give members of this house, including members of the minister's own party, an opportunity to show that they are behind his placing in the proper legislation at the proper time a floor price which will give this guarantee to the farmers.

In the public accounts committee the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) stated that it was the duty of the government to maintain a suitable market for government bonds. Several years ago in this house, when I asked that there should be a floor of the par value under government bonds, that they should always be negotiable at par, Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley said that he did not believe it would be right to put that provision in the legislation, but no government would allow government bonds to fluctuate unduly. I say that if no government will allow government bonds to fluctuate unduly, then no government should allow the prices of agricultural products, the basic food of our country, to fluctuate unduly. It is just as great a responsibility to see that people are able to eat and that food is produced for them to eat as it is for them to maintain a stable market for government bonds, and in my opinion it is a great deal more important. All we are asking the government to do in this amendment is maintain stable prices for agricultural products so that our farmers will go ahead and produce as they can produce and as they have produced in the past. In 1944 we produced over 600 million pounds of pork products.

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of order, I understood my friend was starting off to speak on a point of order in reply to what I had said before, but if he is going to make a speech, which in my opinion is out of order, then I think we should have a ruling on the question of whether we are in order in discussing another measure on this measure. This bill is before the house, not the other act, and I do not assume that when a measure of this kind is before the house, or any measure is before the house, we have the right to turn aside and discuss some other bill or act which is not related at all to the one under discussion.

Mr. Wright: I am not discussing another act. I am discussing this bill, the purpose of which is to set up an agricultural products board. Surely one of the functions of the board will be to maintain orderly marketing in this country. Otherwise there is no object in setting it up. I am talking about orderly marketing of agricultural products, and I think that is very definitely within the scope of this particular bill. Has the minister anything to say to that?

Mr. Gardiner: I am waiting for Mr. Speaker to give his ruling. I do not think I need to say anything more.

Mr. Knowles: Are you ruling on the discussion or on the amendment, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I have read the amendment. It is submitted no doubt under the provisions of paragraph 657 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

It seems to me that similar amendments moved in the last few years were allowed to stand. I have not had an opportunity of looking it up yet, but in view of that I would hesitate to rule the amendment out of order at this time without at least looking up the amendment moved previously.

Mr. Knowles: May I confirm your memory, Mr. Speaker, by telling you that on March 27, 1950, a similar amendment was moved by the same member, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and it is to be found at page 1157 of Hansard for that year. You will find that on the next day, March 28, 1950, after considerable debate the amendment was voted on. It is similar to other amendments of a similar character, the details of which I have, but I will not take the time of the house to give them. That one is the best precedent because the amendment was in words very similar to the amendment which is now before you.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask whether that was not an amendment to the Agricultural Prices Support Act?

Mr. Knowles: Correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the other bill, of course.

Mr. Knowles: The amendment was not to the bill itself but to the motion for second reading of a bill amending the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

Mr. Gardiner: That would be quite in order—

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. In both cases the amendments suggest that the bill before the house be not now read a second time but in the words of citation 657 which you, Mr. Speaker, read a moment ago, "a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill" is placed before the house. I submit that neither on the other occasion nor tonight has the member asked for an amendment of the particular bill. After all, if he were to do that Your Honour would rule it out of order. You would say: Wait until you get into committee and then move the amendment. What is being asked for is other legislation differing from the legislation presented to the house at the present time. Perhaps Your Honour would like to leave the matter over until another time. I can present you with half a dozen such examples in the last three or four years.

Mr. Gardiner: It is almost ten o'clock. I am only going to say one word in conclusion, and then I imagine we can call it ten o'clock and discuss the matter on Monday.

Mr. Wright: I have the floor.

Mr. Gardiner: It is on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is speaking on the point of order.

Mr. Gardiner: We are discussing the point of order, and have been for some considerable time.

Mr. Speaker: If it is on the point of order the minister has the right to speak.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He always has the right to speak whether or not it is a point of order.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the words which have just been read bear out exactly the argument I was presenting to the house a few moments ago, namely that it would be quite proper to move that kind of amendment on the bill to which it is related, the Agricultural Prices Support Act. If an amendment were going to be made of the nature indicated, that is the act to which it would be made. I can quite understand the ruling being given, when that measure was before the house for amendments that it was proper to move some other amendment to the bill or the act. But here we have a new bill that is not related to that act in any way whatsoever. The purpose of this bill is to set up a board. That has nothing to do with the matter of establishing any formula in connection with prices. The purpose of the amendment moved is to amend some other bill, some other act.

Mr. Wright: No.

Mr. Gardiner: It does not mean anything unless it means that. I do not think it is proper to introduce a full-scale discussion on another bill into the discussion of this particular bill. I submit that, and if you will call it ten o'clock we can continue on Monday.

Mr. Wright: I wish to say a word on the point of order. The minister has just made the statement—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has the right to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. Wright: The minister has stated that this bill has no connection with the Agricultural Prices Support Act. What about subsection 5 of section 4? It reads:

> The board may, when so appointed under paragraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products for the purposes of that act.

This bill has a very definite connection with the Agricultural Prices Support Act if it means anything at all.

Mr. Gardiner: It has nothing to do with the sections that deal with the question that is referred to here.

Mr. Wright: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Wright the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will take up Bill No. 18, an act to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board. That is the bill that has been under discussion tonight. Then we will take up Bill No. 36, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act; Bill No. 15, an act to provide for privileges and immunities in respect of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Drew: You can stop there.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Bill No. 23, an act to amend the Government Annuities Act; Bill No. 26, an act to amend the Public Works Act. This is a bill for patient people. I have been thinking over what was said by the opposition and perhaps we may amend it to meet their wishes in part anyway.

An hon. Member: You had better.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not want to lose my good reputation. If time permits we will take up the remaining items on the order paper.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on November 2, 1951.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 17, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

KURT MEYER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO SERVING OF SENTENCE

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that we are obviously approaching the termination of the session, and because it is impossible to raise it in any other way, I propose to raise a matter that I think calls for some statement by the government before we leave. Right across this country a very general feeling of indignation has been expressed in regard to the uncertainty of the future of Kurt Meyer, and I think that before this house leaves we should have a very clear understanding of what is to be done. I think Canadians, without exception, will respect the decisions of our courts, and the decision that may be made in accordance with the ordinary principles of Canadian justice; but there is a strong feeling that there was some connection between the proposal that Kurt Meyer made just before he was arrested, that he be permitted to form a division of S.S. troops to be known as the division Europa, and the course of events which seems to have followed such a strange pattern.

I believe that Kurt Meyer is more than simply another nazi general. He has become a symbol in the minds of Canadians, who have suffered from nazi brutality, of the sort of thing that would raise doubts as to the clarity of our attitude toward conduct of that kind. I think that, at a time when other young men are being called upon to fight for their country, the people of Canada want some reassurance as to exactly what is going to be done in regard to a case that has followed such a strange course up to this time.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me rather strange that this should be raised as a matter of privilege. I understand that only matters of privilege can be raised at this stage; but since it has been raised, all I can say to the leader of the opposition is to repeat what has been said. Kurt Meyer is still under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian government, and no decision has been made that would justify the anxiety to which the leader of the opposition referred. There has been no change whatever, other than the transfer of this prisoner to a prison camp in Europe, where he remains, except as to the ordinary administration within the prison camp, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Canadian government.

HOGS

PRICE FLUCTUATIONS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to raise a matter of privilege. On November 15 I sent across the floor of this house to the Minister of Justice a letter requesting an investigation under chapter 26 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, with regard to a certain matter under the Combines Investigation Act. The matter had to do with the violent fluctuation in hog prices in this country and the prices at which pork was selling. To date I have had no acknowledgment of the receipt of this letter by the combines investigation commissioner. It is over a month now—the letter was sent across on November 15—and it seems to me that there should be some acknowledgment of this, and some indication as to what action, if any, it is proposed to take.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The combines commissioner, as I think can be well understood, has been pretty heavily preoccupied during the interval. I will bring this matter to his attention. I feel confident that action has already been taken on it, but he may have neglected to make an acknowledgment to my hon. friend.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Annual report of the national film board for the year ended March 31, 1951.—Mr. Winters.

PRIVATE AND PUBLIC INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on September 8, 1950, I advised the house that the Department of Trade and Commerce was preparing an analysis of Canadian investment experience for the last twenty-five years. To meet repeated requests both inside and outside the house for authentic information on the economic growth and industrial expansion of this country, this study, entitled "Private and Public Investment in Canada, 1926 to 1951", has now been completed, and I am tabling a copy. Other copies can be obtained from the distribution office in a day or two.

Questions

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—CIVIL SERVANTS—WEEKLY WORK PERIODS

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked that the return to an order dealing with the five-day week be tabled before the close of the present session. This order was referred to departments of the government. There are still four departments to furnish replies and I understand that some of the information is to be supplied by agencies of the government outside Ottawa. It is expected the return will be tabled before the close of the present session.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, WINDSOR, ONT.

Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. When was the Canadian National Railways station at Windsor, Ontario, erected?
2. Have there been any major repairs made on the said building since erection?
3. Has there been any extension made of the said building since erection?
4. If so, how much has been expended on repairs or extension of the said building by years since 1935?
5. How many railroad passengers have entered Windsor, Ontario, by Canadian National Railways from January 1, 1945, to date?
6. How many passengers have left Windsor by Canadian National Railways from January 1, 1945, to date?
7. What has been the passenger revenue of Canadian National Railways at Windsor, since 1940?
8. What has been the revenue for hauling freight and express of Canadian National Railways at Windsor, Ontario, since 1940?
9. Has there been any other revenue obtained by Canadian National Railways since 1940 at Windsor, Ontario? If so, from what source, and how much?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise:

1. 1883.

2. In 1910 some interior alterations were made to the station and in 1926 an improved heating system was installed.

3. No.

4. To answer this question would entail considerable extra work because records of repairs to individual structures are not maintained.

5. There are no records readily available which would disclose the information necessary to answer this question. The number of passengers entering Windsor could only be determined by counting ticket sales which would involve checking the sales of all agencies for the years concerned.

6. See answer to No. 5.

7. Passenger revenue would be determined from the ticket sales and answer to No. 5 explains why this information is not available. In any case, it is not the practice of the company to disclose traffic statistics pertaining to the business transacted at competitive points.

8. See answer to No. 7.

9. The railways' accounts are not maintained in a way which makes it possible to extract this information.

RADIOTELEPHONES—INSTALLATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Have any radiotelephones been installed in any part of the province of Newfoundland since July 1, 1951? If so, in what localities?
2. If not, when will they be ready for installation?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise:

1. No.

2. It is expected that installation of planned radiotelephones will commence on a progressive basis in about four months' time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, EDMUNDSTON, N.B.

Mr. Dube:

1. When was the present Canadian National Railways station and freight shed in Edmundston, New Brunswick, built?
2. How many passengers have left Edmundston, New Brunswick, by the Canadian National Railways since January 1, 1935?
3. What has been the freight and express revenue of the Canadian National Railways at Edmundston since 1935?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The station was built in 1912 with two small extensions; one in 1928 and the other in 1930. The freight shed was also built in 1912 with a 50 ft. extension in 1929.

2. There are no records readily available which would disclose the information necessary to answer this question. The number of passengers leaving Edmundston could only be determined by counting ticket sales which would involve checking the sales of all agencies for the years concerned.

3. There are no records readily available which would disclose the information necessary to answer this question. The freight and express revenue of the Canadian National Railways at Edmundston could only be determined by examining the accounts of all agencies for the years concerned. In any case, it is not the practice of the company to disclose traffic statistics pertaining to the business transacted at competitive points.

Note: The above sums include payments between April 1, 1944, and January 1, 1945, it being impossible to separate the payments in this particular period from those for the whole financial year 1944-45 as the vouchers for the year are not available. For the same reason, it is not possible to distinguish between disbursements and expenses for this period but the amounts in question are a small part of the whole.

2. The following are payments for transactions involving assistance to veterans for $248,340.70 of the figure of $252,760.70 shown in answer to No. 1 (a):

(a) Litigations and commissions—handled by Mr. Thomson: No. of cases, 6; amount, $4,437.90. Legal services relating to titles re land purchased for veterans—handled by Mr. Thomson: No. of cases, 7,848; amount, $215,517.80.

(b) Legal services relating to titles re land purchased for veterans—distributed to agents by Mr. Thomson: No. of cases, 1,622; amount, $28,385.00.

Note: Due to the vouchers for the fiscal year 1944-45 not being available, the balance of $4,420.00 cannot be broken down as between the cases handled by Mr. Thomson and those distributed to agents.

RAILWAY BRIDGE OVER HILLSBOROUGH RIVER, P. E. I.

Mr. McLure:

1. Who owns the condemned railway bridge over the Hillsborough river, Charlottetown to Southport?

2. To whom will the Prince Edward Island government pay rent for using this bridge for vehicular traffic?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. The records of the Department of Transport indicate that the Hillsborough bridge is owned by His Majesty the King in right of Canada.

2. There is no agreement with the government of Prince Edward Island for paying rent for the use of this bridge for vehicular traffic but the provincial government is obligated under an agreement of April 18, 1900, to contribute annually towards the interest on the cost of the construction and maintenance of the bridge the sum of $9,750.

3. What construction is now contemplated by the Department of National Defence in the said province?

4. Is there a priority list? If so, state priorities.

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Approved recommendations are announced as soon as practicable and since 1939 comprise armouries at Newcastle, N.B.

2. An armoury is at present under construction at Newcastle. In addition national defence wartime buildings were converted to provide reserve force accommodation at Chatham, Moncton, Saint John and Sussex.

3. Construction authorized:

Navy. (a) Renous—expansion of Royal Canadian Naval magazine.

Army. (b) McGivney—thirty-six permanent married quarters.

3. Were tenders called for the construction of these wharves?

4. If so, what were the amounts of tenders received in each case, and which tender was accepted?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. (a) Bonavista—North Shore Construction Limited, Montreal, P.Q.

HEALTH GRANTS—ONTARIO HOSPITAL SCHOOL, SMITHS FALLS

Mr. Fulford:

Has any financial assistance been given under the health grants program to the Ontario hospital school at Smiths Falls?

Mr. McCusker: Yes, a grant of approximately $217,240 has recently been made toward the cost of operating this school to March 31, 1952.

ARMED FORCES DEPENDENTS—ALLOWANCES

Mr. Harkness:

1. Have the increases in allowances put through at the last session of parliament, for the children of men killed overseas, been paid if the mother of the child, or children, has since remarried?

2. If not, what is the reason and the authority for not making the payment?

3. How many children are affected, and what is the saving to the taxpayer if payment is not made?

4. What is the number of widows with children who have remarried, and what is the saving to the taxpayer due to their remarriage?

Mr. Mutch:

1. All such cases of remarriage are being reviewed. Where need is established, the award for the child or children is increased above the ordinary rate.

2. The act was amended in June, 1951, and in Bill No. 288, an act to amend the Pension Act, the following explanatory note appears:

The purpose of this amendment is to make more adequate provision for the children of pensioned widows and to increase their awards to correspond to orphan rates which are double the ordinary rates for children.

A remarried widow is no longer a pensioned widow.

3. Approximately 3,500; impossible to state as review is still underway.

4. Approximately 3,200. A pensioned widow receives a bonus of twelve months' pension on remarriage. It is impossible to estimate the saving as the Canadian pension commission cannot determine the life expectancy of the widows.

TELEGRAM RATES

Mr. Pouliot:

What is the actual rate for (a) full rate telegrams; (b) day letters; (c) night messages; (d) night letters, between each one of the provinces compared to the previous rates?

An hon. Member: Dropped.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is not here, I suggest that it be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not here. It will stand.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES CONVENTION

Mr. Smith (Queens-Shelburne):

1. With respect to the northwest Atlantic fisheries convention relating to the regulation and conservation of the deep-sea fisheries, which countries (a) have ratified the convention; (b) have not yet done so?

2. What steps have been taken by Canada and other countries to implement the terms of the convention?

3. What studies will be made of the possibility of wasteful fishing on the continental shelf?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. (a) Canada, Denmark, Iceland, United Kingdom, United States. (b) France, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain.

2. As required by article II of the convention the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries has been established. It held its first meeting at Washington, D.C., in April, 1951. The next meeting of the commission is scheduled for June, 1952, at St. Andrews, N.B. Meetings of the scientists have been held and meetings of the panels or working committees of the commission are being held. It can be said the terms of the convention are now being implemented and made operative, investigations being made by the scientific personnel for submission to the international commission.

3. Studies are being conducted by the scientific group of the countries concerned. Reports will be made to the panels or working committees and subsequently to the commission for recommendation for action by the contracting governments. The investigations will include methods of fishing and the efficiency of the existing types of gear with a view to recommending to the contracting governments the avoidance of any wasteful fishing on the grand banks.

GRAIN—SALES, STORAGE, ETC.

Mr. Wright:

1. What was the amount of each grade and kind of grain purchased by each licensed elevator company operating as agents of the Canadian wheat board at country elevator points in the crop year 1950-51?

2. What was the amount of tough or damp grain in each such grade purchased?

3. (a) What was the date of the cut-off of the 1949-50 crop year; (b) what was the amount of the different grades of grain in storage (including damp and tough grain) at the date of the cut-off of the 1949-50 crop year?

4. (a) What was the amount of each grade and kind of grain sold by each of these companies as designated by their certificates final in the crop year 1950-51; (b) what was the amount of each grade and kind of grain retained in storage as covered by inspectors certificate at time of weigh-over for the 1950-51 crop year?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the hon. member the difficulty of answering this question, on account of the tremendous amount of information asked for. To answer the questions would practically mean the tabling of the books of the Canadian wheat board.

The hon. member asked for the amount of each grade, and I would point out to him there are 339 grades. I do not know how many country elevators there are, but there are at least 50,000. Then, he wants a separate report on each grade handled by each of the country elevators, and he asks for other information it would be very difficult to furnish. It would take months to prepare such a return; and then after the information was furnished the hon. member would need to retain a firm of chartered accountants and have them work two or three months to analyse the return. The wheat board has its own auditors; and I suggest the proper way to get the information is to call the board before the committee on agriculture and ask the board for such answers as the hon. member wants. I have no desire to withhold this information; but there is such a staggering amount of information asked, it is difficult to contemplate the answering of it.

Mr. Wright: That is exactly the point. If the minister will undertake to have the board before the committee on agriculture at the next session, then I certainly will drop the question. However, this is a matter of vital interest to the farm organizations of western Canada. They do want the information.

Mr. Speaker: Question No. 23 on the order paper, dropped.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

ARMED FORCES—OFFICERS OF FRENCH ORIGIN

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SHIP CONSTRUCTION COMMENCED 1950, 1951

Mr. Nowlan:

On how many ships or vessels, other than those for the Department of National Defence has construction been commenced in Canadian shipyards during (a) the calendar year 1950; (b) each month during the year 1951?

INDIANS—MONTHLY RATIONS

Mr. Fulton:

1. What is the scale of monthly rations for Indians on relief as issued by the Indian affairs branch to merchants in Canada, for families or groups of one to six adults respectively, and for the following commodities: flour, rolled oats, baking powder, tea, sugar, lard, beans, rice, cheese, meat or fish, salt, matches?

2. What grade of flour is specified?

3. What are the particulars of any other commodities and quantities which go into this ration scale?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND IMPERIAL OIL—DEVELOPMENT OF MINERAL OR OIL RESOURCES

Mr. Wright:

For a copy of any agreement or agreements made between the Canadian National Railways and Imperial Oil Company Limited in regard to the exploration and the development of mineral or oil resources on the said companies' lands.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there is objection to this notice of motion, because it offends against the principle of giving information of one of the railway companies to a private competitor. This matter was threshed out at some length in the committee on railways and shipping on March 30, 1950, when the very information sought here was requested by an hon. member, and objected to by the president of the Canadian National Railways. He took the stand then that it was not in the interests of the railways to give this information, and the committee upheld him. For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would object to the information being given.

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to have it dropped. but—

Mr. Speaker: The motion is not debatable, but I will hear the hon. member briefly.

Mr. Fulton: I was about to say, by way of a question of privilege, that the minister did refer to a question in committee last year. I was the member who requested that information. May I point out that I do not think the precedent set in committee covers this house at all. What was requested in committee by me was general information as to the price being paid to the Canadian National Railways for the sale of its oil lands or leases. I did not request the information in the terms of this motion, and I think that should be made clear on the record.

Mr. Chevrier: If this motion were to pass, the information for which the hon. member asked in committee would be obtained through the production of these agreements. I am objecting to that.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) prepared to drop the motion?

Mr. Wright: I think this information should be available. These are crown lands. I am not prepared to drop the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I declare the motion dropped?

Mr. Wright: No, no. The yeas and nays should be called.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish me to ask for the yeas and nays? Those in favour of the motion will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against the motion will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

PROPERTY FOR POSTAL TERMINAL, LONDON, ONT.

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Public Works and/or the Post Office Department and the International Harvester Company of Canada regarding the proposal to purchase from the International Harvester Company property situated at the southeast corner of York and Clarence streets, London, Ontario, for a postal terminal on the Canadian National Railways; also a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Public Works and/or the Post Office Department and D. H. Howden Company regarding the purchase of the above named property.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I ask the hon. member if he will allow this motion to stand. I understand that this is the subject of expropriation proceedings before the exchequer court. I have not had time during the last few days to get in touch with the officials. Hon. gentlemen know that I have been in the house, and I have not done any office work in the last few days.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the report of the film board has been presented this morning, will the government consider setting up a committee, similar to the one which examined the affairs of the broadcasting corporation, to look into matters concerning the film board? I am not doing this in a critical sense, but I think the board should have an opportunity of explaining its work to members and members should have an opportunity of knowing what the film board is doing.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government will be glad to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I assume he means that the establishment of such a committee should be recommended at the next session.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: The matter will be given consideration between now and the next session.

GREECE

STARVATION CONDITIONS—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have sent notice which I hope he has received. Has the government been advised of starvation conditions in Greece, and has it been asked for aid? What steps are being taken, by either national or international means, to help this brave people who have suffered so much in the cause of freedom?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I received notice of the hon. gentleman's question just as I was coming into the house, so I am afraid I may not be able to give him as detailed an answer as I would otherwise have desired to do. It is true that through our embassy in Athens we have been made aware of the very difficult and distressing conditions among the people in the northern area of Greece. To my knowledge, however, we have not received from the Greek government any request for assistance. The matter is nevertheless being looked into on the basis of the reports we have received from our embassy. It is also true of course that a great deal of assistance of an international kind has been given to Greece in recent years. This, among other things, is a recognition by those who have given assistance, including Canada, of the great services the Greek people have rendered to the free world during and after the war. Having said that, however, I should add that the resources of Canada for international assistance are not unlimited.

CRIMINAL CODE

COMMISSION ON AMENDMENTS—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING AND CIRCULATION OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I should like to know whether or not the report of the commission on the momentous amendments to the Criminal Code is available yet. If not, and if it is brought down during the recess, would the minister send copies to the members of the house, particularly to the lawyer members, so that the opinions of local bar associations can be secured regarding the provisions of the suggested amendments? I think it would be most helpful to have the benefit of the opinions of the bar associations on a matter so important as extensive amendments to the Criminal Code that take place only once every sixty years.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I am sure my hon. friend will realize that a report of this nature must necessarily involve some questions of government policy. Therefore, while we would be anxious to get the widest distribution possible of the report amongst members as soon as possible, I cannot very well take any steps in that regard until I have discussed it with my colleagues in the cabinet. As I indicated a few days ago, when I think it was my hon. friend who asked the question, not only have we not received the report but we do not expect to receive it for some little time yet. I can assure him it will be promptly taken up with the cabinet and that our action from that point on will be governed by the decision reached therein.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES

DEFERMENT—INQUIRY AS TO CUT-BACK IN CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a question I wish to put to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of which I have sent notice. Can the minister before the end of the session inform the house statistically how much cut-back he estimates there has been in capital expenditure since the announcement of deferred capital cost allowance? How much of this cut-back was due to (a) credit restriction; (b) curbs on instalment buying; (c) deferred capital cost allowance—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —and, Mr. Speaker, (d) any other cause.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question might be a proper one to appear on the order paper but as we are getting near the end of the session I think probably it can be put now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This question covers a good deal of territory. It asks the government to read the minds of people who do not go ahead with their capital expenditures. I do not know that we can do that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is not an easy question but I have great confidence in the minister!

Mr. Howe: However, I will be glad to turn it over to our statisticians and attempt to answer it as best we can, without guaranteeing the accuracy of the reply.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if there is any likelihood of our receiving the report of the commission investigating the South Saskatchewan river project before the end of the session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, there is not. I am told it may be February or March before they will have completed their studies.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF PREFABRICATED METAL HUTS FOR PERSONNEL IN GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence concerning a matter which has just come to my attention, but I presume he can answer without notice. Is it correct that prefabricated metal huts are being sent to Great Britain to house R.C.A.F. personnel over there?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): We are purchasing a number of prefabricated huts in Great Britain for use as storage depots for the R.C.A.F. but not for married quarters. The situation with respect to married quarters is that at the R.A.F. station at North Luffenham there are ninety-two permanent married quarters. The R.A.F. has been most co-operative in making them available. So far we have got possession of all except fifteen. When the wing moved to the other side transportation was provided for the wives and children of ninety-two officers and airmen. The others were warned that there would be no accommodation for them, and I am afraid that situation will continue. As hon. members know, there is a severe housing shortage in the United Kingdom. The station is located in an agricultural district, and there will be no accommodation for any considerable number of married personnel.

Agricultural Products Board

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD

TO PRESCRIBE THE CONSTITUTION AND POWERS OF THE BOARD, AND TO PROVIDE FOR NECESSARY EXPENDITURES

The house resumed, from Saturday, December 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose on Saturday we were discussing a point of order. I should like to make a submission with respect thereto before you rule whether or not the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is in order. The operative section of the bill is section 4. Subsection 1 (a) reads as follows:

> . . . the board may, with the authority of the governor in council and under the direction of the minister (a) sell or deliver agricultural products to the government of any country . . . and for these purposes may purchase agricultural products and make such arrangements for the purchase, sale or delivery of agricultural products as it considers necessary . . .

Subsection 1 (c) provides that the board may "buy, sell, or import agricultural products". Subsection 3 reads as follows:

> Except with the approval of the governor in council, the board shall not sell an agricultural product pursuant to paragraph (a) or (c) of subsection 1 at a price lower than the purchase price thereof plus handling, storage and transportation costs.

It sets a floor under which the board may not sell these particular agricultural products. Subsection 5 reads as follows:

> (5) The board may, when so appointed under paragraph (i) of subsection one of section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products for the purposes of that act.

All that the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) does is to place in this section of the act a floor similar to that which subsection 3 places under sales made under (a) and (c) of subsection 1. I would therefore argue that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment should be considered to be in order because this act is definitely governed by the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Quelch: I was saying that I think the amendment should be considered to be in order because this act is definitely governed by the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The point was referred to by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). Subsection 5 of section 4 of the bill reads as follows:

> The board may, when so appointed under paragraph (i) of subsection one of section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products for the purposes of that act.

The point is this. At what price will these goods be bought? We want a formula to be inserted in section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act which will definitely state that the same price relationship will be maintained today as existed from 1943-45. If that is not done, in supporting this act we are really buying a pig in a poke. We do not know what the price will be. Therefore I presume that if this amendment carried, the government would then give consideration to placing a formula in section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. It is all very well for the Minister of Agriculture to say that by regulation they have established a formula; but that regulation may be changed overnight. On the other hand, if we have legislation outlining the formula, we will then know at least that that formula will exist until such time as parliament may decide to rescind it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might say a further word on the point of order. From what Your Honour said the other evening when the point was first raised by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I take it that at that time you felt that you would hesitate to rule the amendment out of order. Nevertheless the Minister of Agriculture later sought to make a point; and lest you be giving any consideration to the minister's point I think we should have it perfectly clear.

The Minister of Agriculture sought to make the point that the last time this type of amendment was proposed was to the motion for the second reading of a bill amending the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The inference in that comment would naturally be that this amendment is relevant to the other bill but not to this one. As both the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) have pointed out, the question of what prices products will be bought at by this board is distinctly and definitely relevant to the bill which is now before us. Surely that is obvious. As a matter of fact, as I read the two acts under consideration, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is more under this bill than under the other one that the principle of giving support to farm prices is carried out. If we are going to know whether this bill is worth anything, we should know whether there is going to be a floor under the prices that the government will pay for agricultural products.

It seems to me that the proposal of my colleague, the hon. member for Assiniboia, is every bit as relevant to this bill as it was to the other one. In fact, I am inclined to the view that it is even more relevant to this bill because this is the one that sets up the board that does the actual purchasing. Therefore, on the ground of relevancy, it seems to me that the amendment is in order. Further, I would say, as Your Honour indicated in the remarks you made when the point was first raised Saturday night, the amendment is also in order in that it comes within the provision of paragraph 657 of Beauchesne's third edition.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in reply to what has just been said, I would point out that subsection (i) of section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act reads as follows:

(i) to appoint commodity boards or other agents to undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products;

All this reference to it in this act does is to say that if the government agreed that the agricultural prices support board should purchase some commodity under this board, then that may be done. It is just possible that under paragraph (i) no commodities whatsoever would be referred for purchase to this board under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The question which is relevant to the whole discussion is the one that was raised by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) at the beginning of this discussion on second reading, when he wanted to know definitely from the minister whether this board interfered with the activities of boards appointed by the provinces under their legislation. Of course it does not interfere in any way with them. As a matter of fact, I would go on to say that the government has promoted those organizations through discussions with the provinces and otherwise, and has no desire to interfere with them in any way whatsoever.

All that the Agricultural Prices Support Act says is that any agency may be appointed by the board in order to do what it is determined should be done. What my hon. friends are suggesting is that in this act we ought to determine what the agricultural prices board is going to do. That of course is not a matter which could be dealt with in this act. I might suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if you are going to rule that we could go so far afield in this house, on the question of relevancy, as to amend or to propose the amendment of another act, then there is not any limit that could be put on this discussion at all. The point at which the question of order should have been raised was when the question of action taken under the Agricultural Prices Support Act was first brought into the discussion. If reference is made to the discussions during the consideration of the resolution, I submit that it will be found that that question was raised.

It is obvious that, when one piece of legislation is introduced into this house, it is not the proper thing to do to suggest an amendment to another piece of the legislation which is already on the statute books. The time to amend that legislation is when it is before the house. An attempt was made to do that in the session of 1950, as has been pointed out, and this house voted the resolution down at that time. Now an attempt is being made to have the same amendment to that act discussed under this bill. That of course would be improper. There would be no limitation at all on our discussions in this house, on the question of relevancy, if that procedure were permitted.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): In answer to the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that one of the powers under section 4, subsection 1(c), is to "buy, sell, or import agricultural products." The amendment provides that in making those purchases provision should be made for the establishment of floor prices at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relation not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1943-1945. There can be no amendment more relevant than the one in question which, while it provides that parliament sets up the board, also assures the protection of the producer in that the prices the board shall pay shall bear the relationship set out in the amendment. On the grounds of relevance and applicability I submit that the amendment is in order. Surely we are not attempting to set up a board and to give it the power to do anything, to buy at whatever price at which it desires to buy regardless of the wish of the producers, with absolute powers being given to the board. As I see it, the amendment gives the direction of parliament to the prices that shall be paid by the board.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for going into this matter so carefully. I might say that when the amendment was proposed on Saturday night I did say, as the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has stated, that I would hesitate to rule the amendment out of order at this time without at least looking up the amendment moved previously. At that time I was not aware that the amendment that had been moved previously referred to another bill. I should have grasped that fact probably, but I did not.

I might say that since Saturday night I have given considerable thought to this question. In fact, the amendment was moved late Saturday night and the result has been that I, the Clerk, the Clerk Assistant and the Journals branch worked not only late Saturday night but also on Sunday. None of us like to work on Sunday, and it is even less palatable when the house is working six days a week. However, I considered the question a very important one, and I have gone into the matter carefully. I have listened attentively to what has been said this morning. I do not think the merits of an amendment, that is with respect to whether or not it is in order, have ever been put more clearly to the house. As I say, I considered it a very important question, and I crave the indulgence of the house while I give my ruling. So there will not be any anticipation, I might say that I do not hold the amendment can be put to the house at this time.

As I said, I have had an opportunity over the week end to give consideration to the matter which was in issue at ten o'clock Saturday night. Hon. members will recall that on the motion for second reading of a bill to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board, there was moved an amendment by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

> That Bill No. 18 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for the establishing of floor prices at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relationship not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1943-45.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) raised the point of order that, while such a motion would be appropriate as an amendment to the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, it was not related in any way to the present measure. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) had earlier expressed the same view when he said:

> Therefore I think the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia is good; only unfortunately I think it is an amendment to the Agricultural Prices Support Act rather than to the agricultural products board measure.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reminded me that I had allowed an amendment similar to the one before the house in March 1950, on the motion for the second reading of a bill to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944. He added that in any event, under citation 657 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition:

> It is competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill . . .

The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and several other members pointed out that there was a definite connection between the two acts in question by virtue of subclause 5 of clause 4 of the present bill, which reads as follows:

> The board may when so appointed under paragraph (i) of subsection one of section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, undertake the purchase and disposition of agricultural products for the purposes of that act.

It should, I think, be made clear at the outset that citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition must be read together with citation 354 in the same edition, which reads as follows:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

On November 15, 1949, I ruled that an amendment to the motion for the second reading of a bill, though in proper form under citation 657, is not in order if it does not satisfy the requirement of relevancy as set forth in citation 354. (See also Canadian Commons Journals, 1948, page 387.)

The present amendment satisfies the language of citation 657, and is thus in proper form under that citation, as has been maintained by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We must, however, go further and consider whether the present amendment also satisfies the requirement of relevancy. An amendment similar to this was allowed to stand on March 28, 1950, on the second reading of a bill to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944. That precedent is authority for the proposition that such an amendment is relevant to that act, but is silent on the question whether it is relevant to the measure now before the house. It is to this question that I must now address myself.

The principle of the proposed amendment lies in the establishment of general floor prices for agricultural products. The question, therefore, is whether that principle, though it differs from the principle of the present bill, is relevant thereto. I have carefully examined each of the clauses of the present bill, and I cannot see where any of them contemplate anything in the nature of the establishment of general floor prices for agricultural products. The functions of the board include the purchase and disposition of agricultural products, but not the establishment of floor prices for such products. Subclause 5 of clause 4 of the present bill does, as indicated by the hon.

member for Melfort, create a certain relationship between the two acts, but the effect of the subclause is, as I see it, that when appointed under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, the agricultural products board may purchase and dispose of agricultural products for the purposes of the first mentioned act: it does not authorize the board to institute floor prices.

I have in the past allowed amendments of this character to be moved in respect of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944. However, the present amendment, though in proper form under citation 657 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, is, in my view, foreign to the present bill and so does not satisfy the requirement of relevancy set forth in citation 354 of the same edition. Accordingly, I declare the proposed amendment out of order.

Mr. Argue: With the greatest respect, but because I feel the amendment is relevant to the bill, I must appeal your decision.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

On the motion for second reading of Bill No. 18, to provide for the establishment of an agricultural products board, Mr. Argue moved in amendment:

That Bill No. 18 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation providing for the establishing of floor prices at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relationship not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1943-45.

I ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that though in proper form, under citation 657 of Beauchesne's third edition, it was not relevant to the present measure. From this ruling the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and others have appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Gardiner: I was paired with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). Had I voted, I should have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. Cardiff: I was paired. Mr. Speaker, had I voted, I would have voted against your ruling in this case.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Mr. Speaker, had I voted, I would have voted against your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose on Saturday night I was speaking on the amendment. I wish to continue the remarks I was making at that time, although they will have to be changed somewhat, owing to the fact that you have ruled the amendment out of order.

I was pointing out at that time that ministers of the crown, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and a former minister of finance, had stated that they believed it was necessary for any government to lend support to the price of government bonds and government securities. I was arguing that if the government found it necessary to support the price of its own securities, then there was even greater reason why it should maintain fair prices for agricultural products. I argued that food was just as important as government securities. One cannot wear or eat securities; but to live he must avail himself of the products of the farm. And those farm products are, in our economy, the one group of products which in my opinion govern the prosperity of a great many other sections of our country.

Any time there is a violent fluctuation in the prices of agricultural products, one finds unemployment, with a falling off of production of not only agricultural products but many other lines of goods.

The board to be set up under this measure is one means the government may use to prevent these fluctuations, if such board is used by the government for that purpose. I agree with the principle of the setting up of the board. But I am quite certain, from the actions of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in connection with our amendment, that he does not intend to use this board for the purpose of maintaining fair prices for agricultural products in this country.

One of the results of this will be that, while our economy may not plunge, it may gradually slide into a condition of insecurity. To bear out what I say I should like to place on record certain figures showing what has taken place in the United States, and to indicate what has happened there.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The decision has just been given that the matters now being discussed by the hon. member for Melfort do not refer to this measure at all, but refer to other measures. I suggest the hon. member for Melfort has no right to follow that line of discussion, and that if he persists he will be out of order in so doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill before us.

Mr. Wright: Yes. The principle of the bill is to set up a board which, under section 4 (1) (c), is to buy, sell or import agricultural products. How any board can buy, sell or import agricultural products without paying attention to prices is beyond me. I cannot understand why the Minister of Agriculture insists that this board shall not have anything to do with prices. I do not know what use it would be if it did not deal with prices.

Mr. Gardiner: To answer the question—

Mr. Wright: I did not ask a question. The minister can answer when he makes his speech.

Mr. Gardiner: On the point of order raised—

Mr. Knowles: No point of order was raised.

Mr. Gardiner: Before my first interruption the hon. member did say, "If the minister said that this bill has nothing to do with the fixing of prices"—and I am going to suggest to him that it has nothing to do with the fixing of prices, and there is nothing in the statement of its principle that indicates that it has. All it says is that if the government instructs this board to buy farm products, then it may buy them. But the government will state at the time the conditions under which it will buy.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, unless you rule otherwise, I intend to pursue the argument I was following; that is, the argument that if this board is set up it must quote prices when it buys and sells agricultural products. And in quoting those prices it does affect the economy of this country. I suggest that arguments in respect to that are in order under this bill.

As reported in the Country Gentleman for June, certain arguments were put forth in the United States as to what effect agricultural prices had on the economy of that country. Our economy in Canada is very closely related with that of the United States. The same factors which govern the rise and fall of prices over there govern the rise and fall of prices in this country. In that article it states that if there was to be a reasonable stability in the economy of the United States:

> There is one requirement. The products of agriculture and our other raw materials must be priced at levels that will generate and maintain the income necessary for these conditions of prosperity.

They are the primary power source of our economy, the controlling influence in its operations. The economic record of this country for the past twenty-five years demonstrates this fact with mathematical conclusiveness. Over that period, in good years and bad, the national income has held to a ratio of close to seven times the gross farm income. For the full 25 years it averages exactly that proportion.

All the major interests in our economy are geared to the same governing factor, a study of the record clearly shows. The value of manufactures, labour pay rolls and employment, the volume of retail sales and construction expenditures all have inevitably followed the course of farm income, up or down, within short intervals.

Both the prosperity peaks of 1947-48 and the downward turn of 1949 confirm the invariable working of this process. Gross farm income reached a high of $33 billion in 1947. Its effects carried over into the unequalled prosperity of 1948, sustained also by a gross farm income of $32.5 billion that year. But in 1949 we failed to safeguard this state of prosperity. The price level of 35 leading commodities, most of them farm products, in September, 1948, stood at 186 per cent of the price level of the 1926 base period. By July, 1949, the price level of these 35 leading commodities had dropped to 150 per cent. The decline in national income, factory output and employment were the direct and natural results.

If we permit farm income to recede further we can expect these same results to be repeated in corresponding degree. A drop of 10 per cent in gross farm income will force a loss of approximately $20 billion of national income.

And later:

Agriculture supplies 65 per cent of our raw materials and its income is the most sensitive and active part of this combination. Its products are mostly the kind that quickly enter into use, generating a rapid turnover. Also farm income is distributed among a large number of individuals, while more than one-half of our labour force is engaged in processing and distributing the products of agriculture. A drop in farm prices is carried through this whole economic circuit. A decline of $1 in gross farm income will result in a loss of about $4 of retail sales volume.

And later on it states:

Any benefit consumers get from cheap food prices will be shortlived and paid for many times over in reduced purchasing power, as the record of our economy for 25 years clearly proves. Food was cheap in 1939, when farm prices were at 84 per cent of parity, but 16 per cent of our labour force was unemployed and purchasing power also was low.

That is exactly what has happened in Canada. In 1939 when farm prices were low we had unemployment. Right now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is favoured by a large surplus. Why? One of the basic reasons for that surplus is the large farm income this year. Large farm income is one of the basic factors in maintaining prosperity in this country.

Under this legislation the minister should provide that reasonable prices prevail in this country for agricultural products. That is necessary if we are to maintain prosperity in this country. This bill provides that the board to be set up will have the power to buy and sell agricultural products both in Canada and abroad.

When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) attended the food and agriculture organization general meeting in Washington some two years ago he argued, if the press was correct, against the maintaining of basic supplies of food in reserve throughout the world. I understand that at the recent meeting in Rome of the food and agriculture organization, attended by the minister, he changed his position and stated that he believed that reserves of food established under the food and agriculture organization might be a good thing.

If the press is correct, the minister also argued that if we were to get maximum agricultural production there would have to be some guarantee of future prices so that when a man commenced to produce a particular agricultural product he would be sure that he would obtain a reasonable price when he marketed that product. Apparently the minister can argue that in Rome, but when it comes to instituting the necessary legislation in order to make that principle workable here in Canada it is a different thing.

Mr. Gardiner: I again raise the question that the hon. member is out of order. There is legislation to provide what he is asking for, but this bill has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The amendment has already been ruled out of order and it is not in order to discuss the same thing on the main motion.

Mr. Wright: This bill provides for the setting up of an agricultural products board which will have the power to buy and sell agricultural products both in Canada and abroad. If that has nothing to do with the maintaining of fair prices of agricultural products, then I do not know what the bill was brought in for. Otherwise, it would have no meaning.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member can vote against the bill, but he should not discuss another bill.

Mr. Wright: The Agricultural Prices Support Act has no meaning unless there is a board to carry out the provisions of that act. The minister stated on the resolution stage of this bill that the three boards which had been set up for the purpose of selling agricultural products were to be replaced by a single board. When the minister was questioned on the matter of prices he replied that the board set up under the Agricultural Prices Support Act was set up simply to obtain statistics. If the statistics obtained are not carried forward into the implementation of other legislation, there can be no meaning to those statistics. The minister cannot have it both ways. He should read his own speeches to see what he says.

Mr. Knowles: They all go both ways.

Mr. Wright: I agree with the principle of setting up an agricultural products board, but unless the minister changes his position and uses this board for the purpose of maintaining reasonable and stable prices in this country, it means nothing at all. What has happened to our prices? The other day the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) noted where the price of eggs had fallen fourteen cents per dozen in one day in one market. Less than six months ago the price of pork fell ten cents per pound.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to have to call the hon. member to order, but in my opinion he cannot discuss floor prices under this bill.

Mr. Wright: I must abide by your ruling, but I contend that there is no use in setting up a board under this bill unless it is given the necessary power to establish reasonable prices for agricultural products in this country.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I take part in a debate on agriculture, but I would like to take just a few minutes to place my views on the record. I come from a part of the country faced with problems very similar to those encountered by agriculture in western Canada. However, I must say that I am astonished at the action taken by those members of parliament who represent agricultural ridings or ridings in which agriculture is of great importance.

Every single resolution or bill in connection with agriculture, regardless of what it might be, has been responsible for touching off a full-dress debate on everything from the fertilizer and seed until the product is finally marketed. We sit here week after week and have amendments brought in; we have Mr. Speaker's rulings discussed and voted on. It would seem to me that far too much time of the house is taken in the repetition of the same questions and the same answers over and over again. In the maritime provinces there are many problems in the fishing industry similar to those encountered today in the agricultural industry.

Mr. Gibson: Just as important too.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): And just as important to the people there. I want to take a minute to say that I know that during the past two years hundreds of fishermen have not paid expenses. They have taken their money and put it into equipment, and conditions have been such that they have not paid expenses. These people have never asked for any assistance. I put a question on the order paper some time ago—it can be found in Hansard—and hon. members will find that every single dollar paid out under the Fisheries Prices Support Act this year went to the province of Newfoundland. Not a single dollar was paid to any other province in Canada. In other words these people like to stand on their own feet as long as possible. I have every respect for the views of members representing western Canada, but I think these problems could be dealt with more expeditiously than by taking up time day after day, particularly when Christmas is near, in discussing the same thing over and over. The record in Hansard will prove that, so far as many of the speeches that have been made are concerned, they can be found repeated on different occasions in Hansard of different dates.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was quite interested in the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me. If conditions are as serious in the maritimes as he says they are and many hundreds of fishermen have not made their expenses in the last two years, then I would say that instead of reading a lecture to those from the western provinces he should be standing up in the house and demanding some action to preserve the fishermen of the maritimes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege, I might say that I have taken up the question, but I believe there are different approaches than taking up hours and days of the time of the house. I believe there is a more efficacious way of approaching these problems.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree with the hon. member that the situation is serious there, and if he and the other maritime members associated with him who support the government have taken up the matter then their lack of success must be attributable to government policy.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege, not a single fisherman in my riding has ever approached me to try to get my assistance. I know their problems, and I know what they are up against, but they have never asked me to approach the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not suppose fish comes under this measure, but my hon. friend has used it as an example, and in view of his recital of the serious conditions in the maritimes I believe the minister might very well join with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) and add fish to this measure in order to ensure at least a reasonable degree of prosperity for maritime fishermen. I have not listened for a long time to a member from the maritimes boasting that, although the people he represents are having difficult times and are not securing the profit for their products which they should, nonetheless they raise no complaints. The farmers—and I speak for an agricultural constituency—on the other hand ask and, I believe rightly so, demand that they shall receive fair and proper consideration. You will never build up a prosperous country if the fishermen of the maritimes are not prosperous, and you will never build up a prosperous country unless agriculture is prosperous.

Mr. Gibson: Ask and ye shall receive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend certainly is a true exponent of the doctrine he now enunciates.

Mr. Gibson: I have not been asking for anything. I do not ask for anything.

Mr. Graydon: Keep your fingers out of the buzz saw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is certainly nice that everyone is in such good form today and so friendly. It shows that we are all working together right from Vancouver island down to the maritimes. To return to the bill, the powers provided thereunder are very great. Arbitrary powers can be exercised by the board to be set up. I often hear some of my hon. friends discussing socialism in the abstract. I know of no more socialistic measure than the one now before the house. It sets up an agricultural products board with absolute power over livestock and livestock products, poultry and poultry products, milk, vegetables, fruit, honey, maple syrup, tobacco, fibre and fodder crops. It sets up a board whose authority will be absolute under regulations passed by the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister.

Far be it from me to depart at any time from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, for I follow the rulings of the Speaker with haste at all times, but the house is asked to place absolute power in the hands of the board to purchase, buy, sell or import agricultural products without any consideration of the welfare of the farmer who is the producer. Apparently that is the purpose. Otherwise consideration would have been given to the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). A very serious situation will result from the passing of this bill. Parliament meets and grants powers under this measure whereby, under regulations made by the board with the authority of the governor in council, and under the direction of the minister, it may sell or deliver agricultural products to the government of any country, purchase or negotiate contracts for the purchase of agricultural products, buy, sell or import agricultural products, store, transport or process or enter into contracts for storage, transportation or processing. If the powers contained in the bill were used by the board there would be nothing operated by private business in this country today, so far as agricultural products are concerned, that could not be done by the board.

I know of no case where greater powers have ever been granted to a board than under this measure. Powers have been granted before covering certain products. This bill covers every agricultural product imaginable and the products of agricultural products. I suggest that such power should not be granted until the house knows that the welfare of the producer is going to be considered and that parity prices are going to be assured to the farmers. Otherwise what we are doing is setting up a board with absolute powers to run practically every business having to do with agriculture in the country. We are giving the power to investigate, to require any person by order to give at any time such information regarding agricultural products as may be deemed necessary, and very great penalties are provided for failure to carry out the wishes of the board. I should like to hear the minister say something about what the formula will be under which purchases will be made and orders for purchase will be given. I hear it said so often that the farmer is the one responsible for high prices today.

Various investigations were taken in this regard. It is extremely interesting to read of the investigation which took place in the United States, where the purpose in mind with respect to the commission that was set up to look into the matter was to ascertain whether or not the farmer was the person responsible for the high prices paid by the consumer. The United States Department of Agriculture released the figures in August. They showed the degree to which the producer shares in the final price secured for consumer goods. On the basis of a 16-cent loaf of bread, the consumer would have to pay 13·4 cents a loaf if the wheat from which the bread is made was free. In other words, out of the 16 cents a loaf, only 2·6 cents went to the farmer and the rest went for processing and distribution. Again in connection with canned goods, as to a can of beans selling for 16 cents, the actual amount that the farmer received was 2 cents, and the balance was taken up in processing and distribution. Then, as to a $50 suit of clothes, if the wool was free and if the farmer received nothing for the wool that goes into the $50 suit of clothes, the suit would still cost $40.50. And thus it goes all through the record, indicating that the farmer, even though he receives a fair and proper price based upon parity or almost upon parity, is not the one who is responsible for the high prices that are today being paid or for the high cost of living in general.

I do not know what can be done about the situation; but certainly in the world of today where agricultural production is necessary we in Canada should join the other members of the United Nations in the establishment of a world food bank, whereby reserves would be made available for distribution in those parts of the world that are today facing starvation and whereby surpluses that heretofore have resulted in a major fall in prices would instead be used for the benefit of mankind. Certainly something must be done to encourage agricultural production in this country.

At this late stage in the session I am not going to go into a lot of statistics; but may I say that while agricultural production, in the last five-year period, has increased 9 per cent over what it was in the five-year period between 1934 and 1938, the number of people in Canada is 12 per cent greater than it was during that period. Our production is going back. Canada's milk cow population is today the lowest in twenty years. The production of milk has gone down a matter of 1 million pounds per year since the end of the war. Butter production has dropped by 50 million pounds per year since the war. Cheese production has dropped by 100 million pounds. I think the time has come to do something in connection with prices in order to expand and to encourage production. One thing that today interferes with production is the degree to which income tax is levied against those who engage in extra production. This is a large problem but it is one that has to be met: and it will not be met by pieces of legislation such as this which empower a board to remove surpluses or to import, to buy or to sell agricultural products without parliament at the same time knowing, when it does so, that the farmer is going to receive a fair and reasonable price.

I should like to hear the minister tell the house and the country something about that conference in Rome. I read some of the remarks he made there; they were remarks that were certainly favourable to the people of Canada and acceptable to the people of Canada. The establishment and the acceptance by Canada of a world food bank is necessary today in order to ensure that, in years of overproduction, the surpluses will not be thrown upon the market and result in the kind of conditions that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) has stated, in effect, are to be found in the maritime provinces in connection with fishing. Those of us who represent agricultural ridings, when we return to our constituencies, will be asked these questions: How is this legislation going to work? How is it going to operate? What prices are we going to get?

Today the farmer is disturbed over pork prices and the fall in them of some 25 per cent during a period of some three or four months. He is asking why it is that the price he receives has fallen by 25 per cent while the consumer has had no portion of the benefit in the prices he pays. That situation underlines the necessity for our knowing what we are doing when we pass this bill. It also calls upon the government of the day to do something to investigate the spread between the price the farmer receives and that which the consumer ultimately pays.

I cannot refer to another debate that is about to take place. Unfortunately I cannot be here for that one, having some time ago made my plans which require my presence in connection with a legal case. But when I see adopted by the government these plans for removing price maintenance and the like, I ask myself why it is that, as to foods, so much solicitude is shown for those great industries that distribute them and that no investigation has yet taken place to explain the spread between the price received by the farmer and that paid by the consumers, the people of Canada as a whole. Such an investigation would be a most interesting thing. That would be attacking the problem of prices. That would be attacking a matter that is of interest to every consumer, every farmer and every fisherman in this dominion. That would be a matter that would establish the facts so that ordinary Canadians like myself could understand why, when the price of pork goes down, as it has, the price paid by the consumer still remains the same.

Having said that, and not wishing to delay the house unduly at this time, I ask the minister when he replies to answer questions such as those which are of interest to the farmers and are also of equal interest to the consumers who today, because they do not know the facts, too often place the responsibility for high food prices on the farmers and on agriculture in general, where it does not belong, instead of placing it upon those distributors who apparently are able to maintain their prices regardless of the fall in the price of raw products.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for taking just a few minutes of the time of the house, and I may say that it will be just a few minutes because I believe that my stand in connection with the plight of the farmers of Canada is by this time well known. It must be because of the approach of Christmas, and of the good feelings being enjoyed by hon. members here, that we had the genial, good-natured hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) come into the house and make the confession he made, admitting that the fishermen in his constituency and in other sections of the country are not making expenses. I feel that this is a terrible admission for the genial member to make. We have heard little in this house from the representatives of the fishing communities. I want to tell the hon. member that if he presents a case showing the need of the fishermen, he will certainly have the support of every member in this group. We realize that these men have suffered, and that they are not receiving a fair return for their labour. As I have said, the hon. member will have our support if he presents a case for these fishermen. He has said that too much of the time of the house is taken up by farmers pleading their case and looking for something. Just as soon as our farmers receive justice, then we shall not take up any more of the time of the house. We shall devote some of our time to rectifying the wrongs inflicted on other sections of the country. While injustices are inflicted upon our people, then it is our responsibility to plead their case, and to continue to plead it until those wrongs are put right.

The farmers of this country have been asked to increase production. If they do so they find themselves between the devil and the deep blue sea. I say that because if they increase production there is no formula in our Agricultural Prices Support Act to enable the government to support prices, so prices fall. If the farmers do happen to make a few dollars profit, then the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) demands taxes, which in some cases he does not need, and we find the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) chasing these farmers to the ends of the earth to extract the last dollar. Many of the most prominent farmers in my constituency have said that, until we have a policy which gives the farmers justice, they are not going to produce on an all-out basis. We can hardly blame them for taking that attitude. Production in Canada this year is supposed to be very high, but included in the payments to farmers this year will be payments that have been owing to them since 1945. I hope the statisticians will not neglect to take that into consideration when arriving at their figures.

According to the best information we can obtain from the dominion bureau of statistics, in 1950 the 23 per cent of Canada's population on the land received only 9·95 per cent of the national income. I believe the farmers work longer hours and work harder than any other occupational group in Canada, so how does the government justify the fact that 23 per cent of the population received only 9·95 per cent of the national income? Yet at this date the government still refuses to put any formula into the Agricultural Prices Support Act which would enable farmers to receive what they are entitled to receive. Although the ruling of Mr. Speaker prevents us from holding up this legislation, so far as I am concerned I have no desire to hold up the legislation, I want to see it passed because it goes hand in hand with the Agricultural Prices Support Act. While saying that, I do want the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to introduce an amendment to the Agricultural Prices Support Act at this session, placing in that act a formula in line with the statement he made on the resolution stage, that farmers should at least receive prices bearing the same relationship as those they received in the 1943-45 period. In my opinion that will not give them a proper percentage of the national income, but it will at least ensure that they shall not be fleeced as they were in the thirties when wicked men brought about that depression, which many would like to see again.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I refrained from speaking on the resolution stage of this bill, Mr. Speaker, because I understood the minister was leaving that evening and desired the passage of the resolution by ten o'clock. This is an extremely important matter to quite a number of my farmer constituents. This is the first opportunity I have had to say a few words on this bill, and I intend to take advantage of the opportunity whether or not some members of the house like it.

We hear continuously of the great importance of the production of steel, of the production of iron ore and of the production of oil. But there is an inclination, even amongst some members of this house and a number of people in the country, to overlook the fact that all the other production in Canada depends upon the production of food. It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that we in this group and the members representing farm constituencies believe this is a most important measure. It is important not only because food is the foundation for all other production in this country, but because a great many of us believe that food is one of the great armaments in the efforts to build peace in the world today. It is taken for granted that business will try to get a fair profit. We hear repeatedly of the percentage of profit to which a manufacturer is entitled, or a wholesaler or a retailer. The workers organize to obtain a satisfactory wage agreement, and rightly so. The one group in the country upon whom all other activities depend is the group producing food, and the members of that group have to live a life that is, to a great extent, a gamble. Their life is dependent upon crop diseases, variable weather, markets and prices. Because we recognize this bill is a step towards building up orderly marketing in this country, and we hope it will do something to provide more economic security for the farmers, we in this group intend to support it.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I trust the house will be patient with me for a few minutes while I make a few further observations on this bill. I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that to the best of my knowledge I am the only British Columbian who has spoken on this bill. I think British Columbia's interests are entitled to some representation here, particularly from our point of view.

When I was concluding my remarks at the time we recessed for lunch I said that we in this group support the principle of this bill. We do that because we believe the bill does offer an opportunity to introduce greater stability and security into agriculture. We believe that if that stability and security are to be obtained this bill must be linked effectively and used effectively with the prices support act. If that is done we believe there will be some confidence established in the future for farmers and for farmers' sons, and we might do something to arrest the very dangerous drift from the farming districts of the country to the industrial section. That drift, Mr. Speaker, is occurring right in my own constituency. Many of the younger men are going into industry because they see no future for agriculture, and many of the farms are being operated by older men.

The British Columbia fruit growers association received notice that they were to obtain a grant of $1,200,000 to assist them in connection with apple costs for the past year. The British Columbia fruit growers association is very pleased to receive that assistance, and are making arrangements at the present time to borrow money from the banks and distribute it to the growers, pending the receipt of the money from the government. But with all that, there is a great feeling of uncertainty in the fruit and vegetable industry in the southern sections of British Columbia. The fruit growers, the vegetable growers, the fruit growers organizations and the vegetable growers organizations have written to me and expressed their serious concern for the future in that respect. Our British Columbia fruit growers association is a most efficient organization and keeps its growers well informed of the situation concerning marketing from week to week. Quite recently they published a special bulletin dealing with the government assistance on the 1950 apple crop. In that bulletin they published a letter written by the minister to the president of the British Columbia fruit association, having regard to this $1,200,000 assistance, and made some other comments. These are the two comments that concern the fruit growers of British Columbia. I am going to read just one short paragraph of the minister's letter. The minister said, in part:

> The government has decided, therefore, that after this grant of $1,200,000 no further assistance can be provided to the apple growers of British Columbia with respect to difficulties that have arisen and adjustments that have been necessary within the industry since the war.

At the conclusion of the minister's letter they go on to comment:

> It will be noted that no mention has been made of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. This grant was not made under the act but is a special grant from the government. It is a fact that apples have not been officially accepted under the terms of the prices support act.

What is causing uncertainty is the fact that the minister has said that in future they will receive no further assistance by way of grants, and to date apples have not been brought under the prices support act.

In passing I want to indicate to the minister and to the house how careful our organization is in the distribution of government grants.

They do not treat government grants lightly. I shall quote the figures of the distribution. They made arrangements for a joint committee of the British Columbia fruit growers association and Tree Fruits Limited to distribute this money. I want to mention this to indicate the care given in their calculations. Extra fancy, large, medium and small apples will be subsidized from this grant at the rate of $0·16126772 a box, just over 16 cents a box. It is taken to the tens of thousandths of a point. All Cee grade: extra small, extra extra small in both fancy and extra fancy, cookers and hailed fruit, $0.13126772 a box. That shows just how careful they are in their accounting. I should like the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) to notice just how efficient they are in the accounting end of their business.

Mr. Low: To the tenth decimal point.

Mr. Herridge: Yes—and in the distribution of public funds. They go on to say—and I am just going to quote two short paragraphs:

> While the money will not be available from the government until next March an arrangement is being worked out to borrow the money on a reasonable basis and it is intended to place it in the hands of the shippers in time for distribution by December 10.
>
> No one will pretend that the apple industry is in a happy state today. It would be remarkable if it were, with our offshore markets lost outright or heavily reduced by currency restrictions and subsidized competition, and our continental markets curtailed by excessive and unfair freight rates.
> These conditions have led to a great deal of talk about floor prices and the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Such assistance can come only from the federal government, and there are two essential conditions which must be met before there is any hope of it. The first condition is that it must be a strong case, presented by a strong organization speaking for all the growers. We have this organization in the British Columbia fruit growers association, with its growers united by a common contract. The second condition is that, in the event of aid being granted, the grower organization must have the means of distributing it.

Both of these conditions are fulfilled. Contracts have recently been signed, and they have a very strong united organization. They have the ability to co-operate with the federal Department of Agriculture in the distribution of any funds available. I am just going to support briefly what previous speakers have said, that agricultural prices have been dropping and costs have been rising. I am not going to quote at length, but I hold in my hand a pamphlet published by the Ontario fruit and vegetable growers association entitled "The truth about fruit and vegetable prices," which gives several illustrations of the lowering of prices of farm commodities and the increasing of costs. I do want to deal briefly with a clipping from the Nelson Daily News. The vegetable growers of the interior of British Columbia recently met in Nelson and discussed their general business and dealt with their problems for the future. There again they are very concerned about the uncertain future. This is taken from the Nelson Daily News of November 8:

> U.S. competition "unfair," vegetable growers charge.

Then there is a heading: "Planned production should be introduced." We in this group very heartily agree with that. We know that if the government is going to establish floor prices, forward prices, they cannot subsidize inefficient and uneconomical production. I read this extract from the Nelson Daily News:

> Growers agreed with Mr. Wilson (chairman of the interior vegetable marketing board) that vegetable growers received a square deal in wartime when there was a floor price for the producer and a ceiling price for the consumer.

Then one grower, whom I happen to know personally, and who grows 40 acres of vegetables on very fine land, a former immigrant from Holland, a very scientific vegetable producer, has this to say:

> Mr. DeJong said that an over-all program should be instituted by the government under which a farmer would be told what produce he could grow, with consideration, of course, to whether his land was suitable, availability of markets, and so on. This system is in effect in Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Holland, he said.

He goes on to deal with the uncertainty of the future. Mr. DeJong is the most efficient vegetable grower in the interior of British Columbia. Then he goes on to say this:

> Everyone else has security, but not the farmer.

I think there is a great deal of merit in that statement. The article goes on:

> Mr. DeJong said that this year he had put only 55 per cent of his land in crop, and had dispensed with buying any chemicals. "The risk is too great," he said.
>
> Society, the growers agreed, is overlooking the fact that its mainstay is the production of food.
> Attractive wages of industry are drawing more and more people into the cities, and young people are not entering farming.

The point of this case is that this very large grower, within ten miles of an industrial city, with a market at his door, cannot afford to pay wages in competition with surrounding industry. He has to curtail production, and curtail the quality of his farming, in order to get by at all.

The British Columbia federation of agriculture has repeatedly urged the necessity for some system of over-all forward prices. In fact, I think the British Columbia fruit growers organization was the first agricultural organization in Canada to suggest the necessity for an act similar to the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I do know that the British Columbia fruit growers association was the mother of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. So you see we are dealing with a progressive and intelligent type of farmers, and some I have the honour to represent.

Mr. Laing: Charlie Hayden was the father.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Vancouver South has mentioned that C. A. Hayden was the father of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. At present he is secretary of the British Columbia fruit growers association, and the editor of Country Life. It was through his efforts in the early days that we had the beginning of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

I wish to mention one or two further points before concluding. When we talk about price support we know it will cost the country something. But we have to balance that cost against the place of the farmer in society. I was very much interested in reading in the November issue of the Manitoba Co-Operator a few figures concerning the cost of price support, per capita, in Canada. It states:

> Canada's program of price support for farm products, initiated in 1946, has cost the Canadian people approximately three-quarters of a dollar per capita for the whole of the five-year period covered by the report just issued by the prices support board at Ottawa.

I am not going to deal with the figures in detail, but I would draw attention to the 75 cents per capita for price support. What would $5 per capita mean, if it were going to assure the stability of agriculture in this country, and if it were going to assure the necessary production of food both at home and for use of those abroad who are working for peace? I suggest seriously the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would be quite justified in receiving funds from the Department of National Defence. In the light of the terms of the Atlantic treaty, and the activities of ministers and delegates at various organization meetings to consider united action for the defence of democracy, I say the Department of National Defence could very well say to the Department of Agriculture, "Here is $10 million to assure positive and effective price support." That would be a good investment toward the maintenance of freedom.

Before concluding I should like to quote briefly from Country Life an article which I believe would be of interest to hon. members. This is the April, 1951, issue, in which Dr. Raymond W. Miller, who has been a frequent visitor to British Columbia, and has paid direct attention to agricultural affairs, and who now acts in an advisory capacity to the United Nations Organization, had this to say:

> The real answer to the world's problems lies in assisting the rural peoples of the earth to attain a better standard of living.

I believe that expresses well and briefly the facts as we see them today. The real answer to the world's problems is to raise the standard of living of the rural people. Before I take my seat let me say that I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made an excellent suggestion this morning when he said the government would be well advised to make an investigation into the spread between producer and consumer prices of agricultural products.

We know the producer gets only what is left, and that the consumer is paying a high price. I believe there is a great opportunity for the government in this instance to render a service to agriculture and to the consumers. It would assist the public generally in understanding the complexity of this marketing problem.

The farmers of Canada have built sound co-operative organizations. They can grow the crops. They can process the crops, and they can market them within the limits of their powers, and within the limits of fluctuating prices on a fluctuating market. There is no question about it, the farmers are doing their part. They are doing all that is required of them. I hope after the bill has been adopted the government will use the measure and link it up with the Agricultural Prices Support Act so as to give some measure of security to the farmers.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, the position in which agriculture finds itself today makes the adoption of this bill more or less a necessity. This comes about because of the peculiar position in which the policies of this government have placed agriculture.

I need refer only to one product, butter, to justify Bill No. 18. During the last year, when some 4,500,000 pounds of butter were imported, I believe Canada Packers and others took advantage of the situation to secure butter at a low price and to sell it at a fairly high price. So I say that while this bill is necessary, it is still vicious legislation.

The hon. member who preceded me in the debate has referred to the cost of 75 cents per capita in connection with the support of prices. That, in itself, is an indication that the support legislation has never been used seriously or conscientiously for the purpose for which practically all agriculture believed it was first intended.

I have said before that it was used to win two elections, but not to support agricultural prices. We were told many times that the surplus production of agricultural products in Canada was going to be used to feed a starving world. I can remember the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) boasting of the 700 million pounds of surplus bacon we had for export to Great Britain during the war years. But now that has disappeared, along with the surpluses of practically every other farm product, with the exception of wheat. If they have not disappeared, they are disappearing. The supplies are becoming lower and lower each year. Bulk sales at bulk prices have resulted in practically no surpluses with, as I have said, the exception of wheat.

This bill is an indication of an admission on the part of the government that their agricultural policy has been a failure. The net result has been lowered production and eventual higher prices to the consumer.

Over many years Britain engaged in bulk buying. Socialism and bulk buying reduced Britain to more severe rationing than had existed at the worst period of the submarine warfare. This morning the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to what the farmer gets and what the consumer pays. The price maintenance legislation that is likely to be discussed this afternoon is not going to help the farmer because he is the one class in the community who is not able to enter into price maintenance agreements as far as the resale price of his product is concerned.

In a more jocular mood, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) this morning referred to the fact that fishermen had suffered two bad years. Out west we are being told of the desperate plight of farmers who have been unable to harvest their crop or who still have wheat standing under the snow. Others have considerable damp and tough wheat on their hands. Efforts are being made with loans and advances to meet this condition. I would say that the fishermen's assets are in a much more liquid position.

Bulk buying may assure cheaper food for short periods but in the long run it results in lessening supplies and eventually higher prices. Continuity of supply is not guaranteed by that method of merchandising. I need only refer to the bulk buying of beef by Great Britain from the Argentine where the net result was the creation of bad relations between the two countries.

During the discussion of this bill reference has been made to the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The trouble with all bulk buying is that it is not the market price that eventually prevails, it is a political price. That is what happened with our wheat deal. We wanted to make a deal with Great Britain so that later on when times were not so good they would buy more of our wheat. What happened? We certainly did not like what happened.

It is becoming more and more apparent to the agricultural producers of this country that the government has come to the conclusion that they can deal with agriculture in a roughshod manner. After having sold the dairying industry down the river the people voted for them in 1949 and on that basis they considered that they could do pretty nearly anything they liked as long as it was for the advantage of the consumer. When the minister was introducing the resolution he said that there would be no compulsion under the bill. I should like to refer to his remarks on that occasion, and I quote from page 974 of Hansard of November 13, 1951, as follows:

> The proposed bill will set up one board composed of persons employed in the different branches of the department which are concerned to purchase and sell farm products. The board will have no authority to compel delivery of a product produced on the farms of Canada. It will only receive the product when the price offered in a competitive market results in its delivery.

The agricultural industry hopes that such will be the case. There is another rather alarming feature. There is a possible fine of $500 for the refusal to give information asked for. In this connection I should like to refer to the attitude taken not long ago by the government. On November 21 the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) inquired of the government as to the number of bushels of wheat which the wheat board had on hand. The minister replied, and I quote from page 1224 of Hansard, as follows:

> It has been a practice for many years to refuse information as to the current marketing position of wheat, for reasons my hon. friend will understand. We do not wish to give our customers our stock position. If we did, it might easily have a bearish effect on the market. Therefore the information cannot be given in the form asked.

On the one hand the government says that you must give the information required and, on the other hand, the government refuses to state its position as far as the marketing of wheat is concerned. When the shoe is on the other foot and the farmer does not want to give information, he is faced with a possible fine of $500.

There would be a howl from labour and industry if the government set up purchasing boards to buy manufactured products such as shirts, overalls, automobiles and many other things. What would happen if the government decided that the price of any one of these articles was too high in Canada and therefore they would import some to be sold for less? They would certainly be in difficulty. But that is what this government is doing under this bill.

What is needed is a more definite formula for agriculture so that when products are produced producers will know that they will receive a price bearing at least some relationship to the goods and services they must buy in order to carry on their work. Otherwise this country is going to face a continually declining production of agricultural products. Farmers do not stage sit-down strikes such as industry and labour have done, but over a long period the decision to reduce agricultural production can have a far more disastrous and far-reaching effect than the more spectacular strikes we read about in our newspapers and see taking place in our industrial cities. Section 4 of the bill reads in part:

(c) buy, sell, or import agricultural products;

(d) by order require any person to give, at the time specified in the order, such information respecting agricultural products as may be necessary for the proper administration of this act.

While we will be forced to support the bill, I am afraid of possible implications.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, there are some remarks I should like to make and in doing so I shall try to keep clear of a discussion of prices and thus abide by your ruling. I agree with this bill as I think something like this has been needed for some time. My good friend the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) said that bulk buying and socialism have put Great Britain in the position she is in today. I give my hon. friend credit for knowing the situation better than that. Even today Mr. Churchill has not cancelled bulk buying. They are still carrying it on, and during the war it was the best method they could find. If they would do a bit more of it I think it would be good for us. The hon. member said: What did it get us before? He knows that wheat sold at 35 cents a bushel at one time, and we do not want to go back to that again. However, I want to confine my remarks to the minister. I hope he will give us some assurance that when this board of from three to seven members is set up there will be a representative of the producers on it. He knows what I mean. I do not need to explain it to the minister and take up time. He knows what I mean by representation for the producers.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

I do not want somebody who was born on a farm and has forgotten what it looks like. I want somebody who is a bona fide farmer so that he may represent the producers on the board in company with the representatives of other classes. I think we should have been discussing prices, but I will let that matter go. All I want to say is that I think prices should be guaranteed. They should be on the basis of a formula so that we will know where we are. What I am trying to say is that in times past prices have been set but at the packers' level. I can explain that by referring to the setting of the price for lambs. It was set at a quarter of a cent less than the floor price. That was no favour whatever to the farmers. He sold his lambs to the drover or stockyard, they were purchased, and immediately they came into the hands of the packer the ceiling applied to them. I should like to see the farmers get far more protection than that.

From visiting other countries, which no doubt the minister has also visited, I know that forward prices have done wonderful things in giving the farmers security. I think it is quite possible for the government or the minister's department to enter into such a scheme, guarantee prices for two or three years, and give stability to everybody right along the line. Hon. members will realize the tremendous benefit it would be to hog producers, poultry keepers and dairymen if they knew what they were going to get, and that at no time would they have to take less but might get more. I cannot go further without getting into the question of prices and being ruled out of order, although I had prepared my notes to discuss prices. I hope the minister will tell us whether he does not think the time is ripe for us to have forward prices in Canada in order to give security to the farmer, the poultry producer, the dairyman and everybody else engaged in producing the necessaries of life for Canada.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of saying anything on this bill, but I should like to say that I have read the bill carefully and will vote for anything that will be of benefit to agriculture in this country. The farmers have never got too much. However, looking at the bill I cannot see that it will be of very much benefit to them because of the fact that there is no assurance that producers will be accorded representation on the board. When the minister replies perhaps he will tell us who are going to be on the board. Looking at the bill it is evident that all the authority rests with the minister and the governor in council, the cabinet. If they are going to have full authority under the measure then of course we will only get what they want to give us. If we cannot have a producer member on the board I do not think the legislation will be of much benefit to us. I hope when the minister replies he will give us some assurance that we will be taken care of.

Something was said about the reason why pork dropped approximately 25 per cent in price earlier this fall. I was told by a very good authority that the reason that pork dropped was not because of the quantity on hand but because packing house lockers were empty. The price went down so they could fill up the lockers with cheaper pork. I cannot figure out any other reason, and I do not think those are very sound business methods. The producer is in the position where he must market his hogs. He cannot hold them. One fellow came to me and said: "I will not deliver my hogs; I will not market them." I said, "What are you going to do?" He said, "I will turn them out to grass." That is all very well, but you have got to deliver them at a certain weight and you cannot hold them. You are caught both going and coming. The hogs must be delivered at a certain weight if you want to get a price for them. I do not think that is a good situation. Hogs should not take a slump of 7 or 8 cents a pound just at a time when perhaps a quarter of the production is ready for market. I think it is a disgraceful way of marketing anything. If the minister will tell me that producers are going to be represented on the board, then I have no fault to find with the bill; but if they are not, then I do not think it is any use at all. If the minister and the cabinet are going to exercise the whole authority then I am not satisfied with the measure.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) that the producers should have membership on the board. I hope the minister will give us that assurance when he speaks. Generally speaking I think the setting up of this board will be an excellent thing for the farmers. There is no doubt that considerable power is being placed in the hands of the board. I had a call from a friend of mine in the seed trade who is concerned as to what this measure may involve. For example, if there is a shortage of seed in Canada the board may decide to bring in large quantities of seed from South American and Mediterranean countries. Such seed would be No. 1 grade and could be blended with Canadian No. 1 seed and sold as top grade. So far as freedom from weed seeds is concerned, this would be perfectly all right, but there is the important question of the germination of seed coming from these countries. We have to remember that the question of the rigours of our climate means a great deal in the percentage of germination of foreign seed. When the question of the appointment of the personnel of the board is being considered, I hope serious consideration will be given to the personnel. They should be men well qualified to study every angle of the great agricultural problems facing us. I want to add that one word, that serious consideration should be given to the personnel of the board.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry it will not be possible for me, without breaking the point of order I raised earlier—

An hon. Member: That does not make any difference.

Mr. Gardiner: —to answer all the questions or suggestions that have been made as to what I should say in reply. I think what is most important for me to say is that I believe the members of the opposition have been attributing much more importance to this particular board than was intended by the government or myself. As I understand it, the board really has no authority to settle any of the questions that have been discussed here. They only have one authority, and that is to buy and sell farm products when they are instructed by the government to do so. That is the only authority they have; they have no other authority. In order to make it clear that they can perform that service for the agricultural prices support board, the bill names the agricultural prices support board as one of the authorities for which they may act—with government instruction, of course.

The agricultural prices support board, as has been indicated, has the authority, and has settled upon a form of action which results in agricultural price floors. They are not satisfactory to everyone. But nevertheless, that legislation gives that authority. The setting up of this board does not take any of that authority away from the agricultural prices support board. It does not give to this board any authority to do that kind of thing.

The second last speaker, I think it was—the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White)—suggested that he is not in favour of bulk buying. There is not much use of arguing the question as to whether you are in favour of bulk buying or not. There are certain countries that will not buy in any other way; and if you want to sell to them, you are going to sell in bulk or not at all. It just so happens that one of those countries is one to which we are most anxious to sell. Under the new government there we do not know whether they are going to pursue that policy. We know, however, that under the government that has just gone out they pursued that policy. One of their contracts is a meat contract with Australia for fifteen years. Of course, the question arises with those who are in authority now: What are we going to do about that contract? It is there; and there are other contracts ranging from that fifteen years down to four years. The only relationship that this board has to that situation is that the British had already indicated to us, before the change in government, and that representation has been continued since: "Would the government be prepared to buy farm products for us in Canada if we were to ask them to do so"? In so far as this measure is concerned, all we have said is: We have a board that can do that, if you want it done. That is what it really means. If they came to us and said: We want to buy certain things, we wish to buy them in Canada but we do not wish to go to the trade and we would like to have the government buy them, we will say: This board can buy them for you.

But under this legislation we do not intend to go into the business of buying farm products and selling them. That is not the intention at all. The intention is simply to have there a board which, when there is a job of that kind to be done, can do it.

In order to indicate that is the position, I would call attention to the fact that there is in this bill few of the powers that we had in the legislation, or even in the orders in council, under the War Measures Act, which made it possible for us to set up the dairy products board, the meat board and the special products board. Under either the orders in council or the legislation at that time we had authority to go and take the product out of the packing houses or even to go and take the product off the farms. We did not exercise the right to go and take it off the farms but we did exercise the right to go and take it out of the packing houses, and we exercised the right to take cheese out of storage and all that kind of thing. None of that authority is given to this board. It has none of those rights because, under our constitution, in peacetime we have no right to give to a board that kind of authority.

All we are saying in connection with this act is that where, for one reason or another, it is necessary, this may be done. There may be a dozen different reasons; the only one we have felt it necessary to act upon up to the moment is that which necessitated buying some butter outside Canada, and this board is doing that on instructions from the government. Other circumstances could arise. I am not going to try to guess at what they are.

In order to answer the question that was just raised as to whether the board should have farmer representation on it, I am only going to answer with the same answer as I gave at the time we were setting up the original board to deal with agricultural floor prices or what is properly known as the Agricultural Prices Support Act. We were then asked to put on that board representatives of the producers. I took that matter to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and I asked them which they would prefer to have, the chairmanship of that board or representation on an advisory committee. We were quite prepared to appoint their president, Mr. Hannam—and he is still their president—chairman of the board. They took that matter back to their board and discussed it, and they told us that they much preferred to be represented on an advisory committee and not on the board that was doing the job. They said much the same as was said here by one of the members a few minutes ago—I think it was the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce)—or as was implied by him in what he said, namely that if you put, let us say, Mr. Hannam on the board, and he remains there for five or ten years, people will start to say that he is not a farmer at all but that he is just a government employee. That is what would be said, because that is what has been said about every person who has been put on and kept on boards. The federation made the choice. They said: Set up an advisory committee and give us representation on it; make it possible for that committee to be called together at their request from time to time; we would much rather have that than have a member on the board. That is the way we have been operating. Mr. Hannam is the chairman of this advisory committee. He was made chairman because he was the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They have been allowed to nominate nine, I think it is, out of the sixteen members of the committee. Then the provinces have been allowed to nominate members. The result is that by far the greater number of those who are on the committee are deputy ministers from the provinces or representatives of farm organizations across the country. Every time they have indicated a desire to be called in here—and they indicate it through the chairman, Mr. Hannam—they have been called in. They have set a date which was satisfactory to us and to them, they have come here and advised us on every important action that has been taken from that time down to the present. I suggest that none of those who are closely associated with that organization will suggest that this procedure ought to be changed. But that applies more to boards that are settling these matters of policy which members have been concerned about, and I am quite sure that the farm organizations would be the last to ask that farmers be put on this particular board, because we do not know whether this board is going to operate to any great extent. The board, as it is operating, has been operating under order in council, under the measure we put through last year which was set up under the Department of Trade and Commerce. We had the right to appoint various organizations as emergency organizations. This one was appointed as an emergency organization to handle butter. It is assumed that there will be other operations that will need to be handled. The board was named under that authority. It consists of Mr. Pearsall, who was chairman of the old meat board; Mr. Chagnon, the vice-chairman; Mr. Nelson Young, director of production, as a member; Mr. W. C. Cameron, who is at the head of our dairy branch, as a member, Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Berry. Those men are all members of the staff of the department. There are no salaries to be paid out. They are simply there in case it is decided, perhaps over a few months, to buy some particular product. They are not operating as a buying and selling board. They are simply there as a group that could be called together and asked to buy a commodity for the time being in order to serve some purpose, or deal with some condition brought about through the administration of another act, or another operation within the department or some other department.

Now I repeated that in order to show that the board has not the important function that might be indicated by the language that has to be used in setting up a board of that kind. Certainly, the board has to be given the authority to buy and sell. But it is set out very carefully in the act that they cannot buy and sell at all unless they are asked to do so by the government, not by the minister, but by order in council. That is the only way they can buy or sell anything. They are not set up to buy and sell any farm product from day to day. I would suggest again that the board is not nearly as important as has been suggested in this discussion.

I do not believe it would be possible for me to discuss what has been said to any greater extent without getting into the position of discussing something which is not covered by this bill. When we get into committee, if there is any information desired about farm prices and the sale of farm commodities that it is proper members should be asking for, I am quite prepared to answer those questions. I do not believe I would be pursuing correct procedure if I were to enter into a general discussion of those other measures, and other activities under other bills, in the manner that has been followed by some of those who have taken part in the debate. I again move the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Wright: On section 1, I should like to comment on statements which have been made by some of the members about the bulk buying being carried on by Great Britain. I should like to direct the attention of this committee to the fact that bulk buying was not started by the Labour government. It was started by the coalition government during the war, was continued by the Labour government, and is still being carried on by the Conservative government in Great Britain. Evidently they believe it is the best method by which they can obtain their supplies. There are certain other questions I want to ask, but I shall leave them until we come to the appropriate sections of the bill.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister state whether or not this bill has as its major function the finding of markets for Canadian products? Is that intended to be part of the work of the board set up under this bill?

Mr. Gardiner: No, that is not one of the functions of this board at all. Of course, it is the general function of the marketing branch of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce as well, but this board has not that authority.

Mr. Blackmore: Why then is the provision made for buying and selling?

Mr. Gardiner: Let us take the one product, butter. If butter is bought, of course it is going to be sold. We are just bringing it here for the purpose of seeing that it is sold. It is brought to Canada because our supply is short. The board has the authority to sell, and may do that by simply selling it to some branch of the trade which will distribute the butter to the public.

Mr. Blackmore: It is just a sort of agent for doing a job?

Mr. Gardiner: That is all.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. McLure: Various products are set out in section 2. Will the minister state whether conservation furs come within the definition of "agricultural products". There is no mention made of them, and they are now under the prices support act.

Mr. Gardiner: In so far as we have assisted in the marketing of furs, they have been handled under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939. Under that measure we have guaranteed accounts at the bank. The act permits us to guarantee the account of anyone who comes under that act up to 80 per cent of the average price of the preceding three years. In actual practice, I do not think the board has ever agreed to a price higher than 60 per cent of the average of the preceding three years. We did guarantee the price of furs up to a set amount in 1947-48, at which time we took a considerable loss. Speaking from memory, I think the proportion of the price at that time was somewhere between 40 and 50 per cent. Prices were so high during the latter part and at the end of the war that there was a loss on those furs. So far as I can recall, furs have been handled under that act, and are still handled under it.

Mr. McLure: I understood the minister to say the board took a loss, but the producer took a tremendous loss. It costs 50 per cent more to produce those furs today than it did in 1939 or 1940. The cost of everything, such as labour, food and so on, has caused that increase in the cost of production. No farm can produce today except at a loss, that is with the prices that are realized under this market support act. I thought if some changes were going to be made, consideration might be given to bringing this product under this act and treating it in a different manner from that in which it has been treated. The method now being followed is of no benefit whatever; in fact it is injurious to the trade.

On section 3—Board established.

Mr. Cardiff: When it is stated that the board will consist of not less than three and not more than seven, why is there not a definite number set out in the bill?

Mr. Gardiner: At the moment we think it is best that the three groups that were represented on the previous three boards should be represented on this board. In case we are dealing with a dairy product, we think a dairy man should be on; in case we are dealing with meat products, then we think a meat man should be on, and to keep all of them represented it requires seven.

Mr. Cardiff: In that event the minister can call in anybody he wishes.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, or any part of it.

Mr. Wright: A little while ago when the minister discussed this matter he said he had discussed it with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on a previous occasion, and they had indicated that they would prefer to be represented on the advisory board rather than on the main board itself. I should like to bring to the minister's attention a criticism that is frequently raised in the country, and I should like to know whether it is justified or not. The growers' representatives from the various farm organizations who are on this advisory board, and who sit in with the main board in discussing questions that may arise as to whether the product should be brought under the board or as to what the price is, are sometimes criticized. The criticism that I hear in the country is that, having sat in on the discussion, these men are not able to come back and freely express their views before their own organization, because their hands have been more or less tied by the fact that they have discussed the matter with the government. There is considerable criticism of members of some of these advisory boards by the growers themselves because of the fact they feel that their representatives have more or less tied themselves to a certain position and cannot come back and freely discuss that position with their growers or with the body whom they represent. Are these men who are on these advisory committees of the two boards in any way prevented, through being members of these advisory boards, from coming back to the producers and fully discussing their position on the advisory committee with regard to matters that may have been discussed between them and the government?

Mr. Gardiner: The committee is set up with a full understanding and in such a manner that the members are advisory not only to the department and through the department to the government, but they are intended to be advisory as from the department to farm organizations represented and the provincial government represented. What they expect me to do, and what I do, is to open the meeting and give them all the information that I can properly give them with regard to what we know about the marketing situation in different places, probably the information that has come to us from provincial authorities, or from authorities in some other country as to what the position is.

We have had an understanding from the beginning that while these discussions are on a great many things may be said on both sides that should not be spread indiscriminately around the country. We could not give it if it were going to be spread around the country, and they would not be in a position to advise if they did not have all the facts. I must say that over the years, I think beginning back about 1944, down to the present, there has never been an occasion that I know of when anyone came out of that committee and said anything they should not have said, and that is a rather remarkable experience. I think they will agree too that no member of the departmental staffs, including myself, has gone out and repeated anything that they have said, that they might, after getting all the facts, have thought that probably it would have been just as wise not to have said. The committee is not conducted in that way. They all sit down behind closed doors for the time being, and do discuss the whole matter, and it is fully understood that the decisions which have been reached there, and the information that they are finally given by the government after the discussions —at the end of these considerations I come back and discuss the matter with them after they have spent two or three days in threshing out all the questions that they think should be threshed out—they have put their representations in front of me and I go over each one of them and tell them pretty well what I think can be done in the circumstances, or what may be done. They then are in a position to advise either their provincial governments or the farm organizations they represent as to what the position is. That is the principle on which we operate. It has not been said to anybody: "You must not say this, or you must not say that". There is a general understanding that we think we know one another's point of view on it, and we think we know when something has been said that other people would perhaps prefer not to have repeated as having come from them directly. Therefore we do not repeat them. That is the only sense in which there is any restriction.

Mr. Charlton: Just a word, but before I say that I do wish to say that I appreciate the assurance the minister gave this morning—at least I thought he did, if I heard him correctly—that this board would not in any way interfere with the producers' boards now in existence or organized in the future.

Mr. Gardiner: That is correct.

Mr. Charlton: He did make that statement, and I thank him for it.

With regard to section 3, I should like to say a word on subsection 6. It has been quite apparent in the last few years that the government does want to take away from the civil service commission the right to hire men and fix salaries. In view of the fact that number 7 is here, that the members of the board, as I understood the minister to say, were now civil servants in his department, I see no reason for number 6 being there. I think it should be deleted. It changes all the principles of the Civil Service Act as it now stands. I do not believe in the principle that the governor in council should have the privilege of picking men and giving them jobs and setting their salaries, all outside the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Gardiner: There is only one reason for continuing it in the bill, and I think it is a good one. We have no reason at the moment for thinking that there should be anyone on the board who is outside the civil service. There is always the possibility that there might be some product to be dealt with that is not a product over which we have sufficient control to be able to feel that our officials should handle it. We may desire to go outside to some farm organization that really has control over the product. Just by way of illustration—I may be introducing something with which I may be confronted later and asked to appoint someone. A question was raised just a few moments ago by an hon. member from Prince Edward Island with regard to furs. There is just a possibility that if someone were to say to us: "We would like this board to buy furs", we might not think we had anyone in the department capable of handling that matter, and we might ask somebody to sit down with the board to deal with that. In that case we would want to provide for some payment. That is the only reason it is there. In addition to that we may have it develop into a sufficiently onerous job to be giving to some official in the department far more work than he should be asked to carry without any additional pay. Then there might be something added to the pay he is receiving. I think the section should stay there to deal with these matters, but I can assure the hon. member that I will not be able to get any considerable payment for any of those who are already on the civil service staff past some of my friends, including the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Charlton: The statement does not answer the question. Surely in the case of furs the minister would not hire a man to go on that board.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps one would hire him for a few months.

Mr. Charlton: You could hire a specialist for a month. That would be better than hiring a man to go on the board for the entire year.

Mr. Gardiner: We would have to pay him, whatever the length of time was.

Mr. Charlton: Well, that is an altogether different thing. This subsection says that the governor in council may fix the salaries or other remuneration of members of the board. He would not necessarily be a member of the board. An expert who would be hired to give advice as to the grades of furs, and things of that kind, would not necessarily be a member of the board. But subsection 7 of section 3 says:

> Officers, clerks and employees required for the proper conduct of the business of the board shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act. But the minister may require any officer, clerk or employee on the staff of the Department of Agriculture to serve on the staff of the board without additional remuneration.

The minister has just said that he might have to give them more; and yet in subsection 7 it is made clear that he cannot give them any more. They must work for the salary they are receiving now as civil servants.

Mr. Gardiner: The other remuneration might be only expenses.

Mr. Charlton: Oh, if the minister is going to add to salaries by paying expenses—does he mean under the table?

Mr. Gardiner: No, you do not get anything done under the table around here.

Mr. Charlton: If it is to be by way of expenses, we know that most members of the board and of the Department of Agriculture get travelling expenses now. What other expenses would they have?

Mr. Gardiner: I suggest there is no use of our discussing that question here, because neither of us can settle it. The point that is important here is that authority is given to the governor in council to do something that is absolutely essential.

Mr. Charlton: As I see it, the two subsections are absolutely opposed to each other. One subsection said more cannot be given, while the other subsection says something different.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: No; one deals with officials and the other deals with members of the board, who may not be official. There are other members who think that there ought to be members on the board who are not officials. At the present time I do not think we need any; but if it should develop that we did, it would give us authority to make the appointment.

Mr. Wright: I appreciate that in discussions which take place between the advisory committee and the board there may be certain confidential information given to the board. There may be arguments the government may use to the board that they do not want to have used by the advisory committee. But I am still of the opinion that unless these advisory committees are able to go back to their producers and give a fairly accurate résumé of the discussion which has taken place between them and the various boards they meet, the growers of the particular product an advisory committee represents are not going to be satisfied.

This argument has been brought to my attention often, that an advisory committee is being tied by the discussions in such a way that, because they think what they have been talking about is of a confidential nature, they are not free to come back and give a full report of what the conditions actually are.

I am all for these boards, and for this method of handling our agricultural products; but we want to see it done in such a way that the confidence of the growers can be maintained. The only way they can be operated successfully is to maintain the confidence of the growers in connection with the methods being used. That can be done only when these advisory committees are free to come back and discuss with the producers the arguments used both by the government and by themselves in the presentation of the case to the board.

On section 4—Powers of the board.

Mr. Charlton: What has the minister in mind in paragraph (e) where it refers to storing, transporting or processing, or entering into contracts for the storing, transportation or processing of agricultural products? Has the minister any idea as to what the board may do in connection with marketing some product that must be processed before it is marketed? Or does he want to have that provision in there only because he might wish to use it some time?

Mr. Gardiner: As has been said, the only product we are handling at the moment is butter. When butter enters Canada it has to be stored. It comes in in bulk, and has to be processed to the extent of having it put into pound packages. That could be considered processing.

That is all the paragraph refers to—that kind of thing that must be done in connection with the actual handling of a product.

Mr. Charlton: Is there anything else in the minister's mind? After all, packaging butter is not processing it.

Mr. Gardiner: We have no intention under this measure of going into the packing house business, if that is what the hon. member has in mind. It is just simply a matter of making arrangements to have a product stored.

Mr. Charlton: Then perhaps the minister has other services in mind?

Mr. Gardiner: Only in so far as they are authorized to buy. For instance, if the British were to come here and say, "We want pork products, and we would like this board to buy them for us", we would probably go to the packing houses who are receiving pork from all over the country, and say, "Here is the price you can have, the price which has been offered for it;" and we would see that the transaction was carried through. In that way we would make arrangements to have the product frozen and stored and shipped, as would have to be done. But all the cost of that would be borne by somebody else, not by this board.

Mr. Charlton: I do not quite understand what the minister means.

Mr. Gardiner: The board would do what the purchaser decided he wanted to have done. Whatever he wanted done he would have to arrange payment for. But the board would act in seeing that it was handled through the usual facilities.

Mr. Charlton: The board themselves would not do it.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: They would have the processor do it?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: What has the minister in mind in connection with this section of the bill? Ordinarily the board would not do it themselves. They would have the processor do it, would they not?

Mr. Gardiner: They would have the authority to store it, for one thing. That is part of the process of transferring it from the producer to the consumer. Then they would have authority to pay for transport, and to enter into a contract for the storing, transporting or processing of the agricultural products. They would enter into those contracts on behalf of whoever was purchasing the pork. The government would not be purchasing it. It might be the government of some other country, or a buyer in some other country. But they would be paying for it, not this board.

In actual fact they would handle the financing, but they would get their money from elsewhere.

Mr. Charlton: This board has the power to go out and buy goods, build huge factories and process the goods themselves?

Mr. Gardiner: If you will read the act you will see that this board really has no power to do anything. Someone was saying a moment ago that if this was just a matter of leaving power in the hands of the government they did not think very much would be accomplished. Well, that is what it does do. The board will not get any instructions under the bill to go into the packing house business.

Mr. Charlton: I have one further question in connection with subsection 2 which states:

> The authority given by the governor in council and the direction given by the minister to the board pursuant to subsection one may be given generally or in any specific case or with respect to any particular matter.

Could the minister state where he would give a general order? Why does he want the word "generally" in the subsection? Ordinarily you would tell the board to go out and buy butter or cheese, but what would the general order be?

Mr. Gardiner: Probably I should not put it this way, but that is not something that I wanted in there. You know, there are people, and naturally so, who want to place a little restriction on the minister and that section pretty well does that. If you read it carefully you will see that it is the governor in council that does the instructing. I do not think there is going to be any instruction given which can be criticized in any way.

Mr. Charlton: I do not see any restriction upon the minister in that section. It reads:

> The authority given by the governor in council and the direction given by the minister—

That puts the minister in the same spot as the governor in council.

Mr. Gardiner: You have to read that along with subsection 1.

Mr. Charlton: That reads:

> Subject to the regulations, the board may, with the authority of the governor in council and under the direction of the minister . . .

That is a separate part.

Mr. Gardiner: The minister is giving the directions as from the governor in council and he can give them in general or in specific terms.

Mr. Charlton: Subsection 2 reads:

> The authority given by the governor in council and the direction given by the minister to the board pursuant to subsection one may be given generally or in any specific case or with respect to any particular matter.

The minister could give a general order to go out and buy all the agricultural products across the country.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not intend to, and I am quite sure the government would not give me the authority to do that even if I did.

Mr. Charlton: I am not saying the minister intends to.

Mr. Gardiner: You do not know the government.

Mr. Argue: The main reason the government could not do that is that they have only $15 million. I do not think you could buy up all the agricultural products in Canada with $15 million. This particular section seems to me to be the whole core of the bill. It provides that the board, directed by the government, may buy products in Canada. I have said already in this discussion that I think floor prices are exceedingly low, in particular floor prices under eggs and hogs. They should be increased and increased substantially. I think the minister should tell the committee and the country whether this board during the coming year will be in a position to buy agricultural surpluses, including those of eggs, hogs and butter. I think it is time a definite announcement was made as to what support will be given to bacon and egg prices in the future.

I certainly do not agree that the present floors are sufficient, but I think the very least the government could do with any of these floor prices is to maintain them.

Mr. Gardiner: As hon. members know, there have been different methods followed in securing for farmers reasonable prices for their products. The floor price method is one, and that is followed in connection with butter. It has been followed in connection with pork products. I must say that at no time since we started to follow that policy under the Agricultural Prices Support Act have we found it possible to purchase any pork products. We started out with the position that the level of prices previously paid by the British government would be augmented—I am speaking just from memory—with a subsidy of $3 paid by the government.

At the end of that period we undertook to continue a floor of $32.50 on Wiltshire sides, and that still exists. There has been no indication from the government up to now as to when it may be discontinued. There is no date limit. It is set at $32.50 basis Wiltshire sides at Montreal. There has been no sale for Wiltshire sides at $32.50 since the floor price was placed on. Any price offered was considerably below the price at which pork was being sold in this country.

In spite of the fact that there have been no purchases, during that whole period there have been only one or two days—I would have to check the records in order to determine how many—when the price was below what we figure would be a proper relationship between the $32.50 and the price of pork. It just so happened that that was very recent. We have a standing offer to buy at a rate which is represented by the $32.50 for Wiltshire sides. I speak subject to correction, but I think that works out to about $27.50 at Winnipeg. It is true that the price was down for a day or so to $26.50 or some such figure, but I have no doubt that the fact that there was an offer to buy around the other price resulted in the price going back to where it was, $27.50. It has gone even higher than that.

If it were necessary to buy up that product the government might say to this board, "You buy it and turn it over to some purchaser, whether it be the British or someone else." That would be the natural thing to refer to this particular board. But for the last two years we have not had any of it offered at that price.

We do not follow the policy of establishing a floor price as on pork in connection with eggs. Two years ago we came to the conclusion against the opposition of many people that we could serve the poultry producers, and particularly the egg producers, much better by simply taking part of the risk out of handling eggs. When the British stopped buying eggs two years ago the price went down to sixteen cents a dozen in some parts of Canada. At the end of the six weeks when the market was open we said that at the end of the year we would take all the eggs in storage at 38 cents a dozen. We told the trade and the producers to go ahead and handle their own affairs, but at the end of the season we would take the eggs in storage at 38 cents a dozen. Eggs have remained above 38 cents all the time.

I must say that at times there has been far more criticism of the heights to which they have gone than there has been of low prices since. A year ago when the question was up for consideration those who represent the producers and handlers of eggs came to my office and unanimously asked us to continue the same policy for another year. We did so.

I was waiting for an appropriate time to be able to announce what we are going to do in the coming year, and I think this is as good a time as any. We have had representations again this year from all across Canada, and the question was fully discussed at the agricultural conference held in December. The vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, speaking for the federation because the president was not there, said definitely they were of the opinion that the price should not be set at less than 38 cents. Of course he would not object to its being set higher, but it was their considered opinion that it should not be set at less than 38 cents, or in other words that we should not lower it. That was on the very day eggs dropped 12 cents a dozen in Ottawa. Those representations were after they had dropped 12 cents.

What we have decided to do is continue the same policy for 1952 as we had through 1950 and 1951; namely, at the end of the season we are prepared to buy all "A" large eggs which are in storage at Montreal on a basis of 38 cents. The prices range up and down across Canada from there. Therefore we are not changing the policy at all, and we think it would be bad practice to change a policy which has worked so well as the one I have been discussing. In order to indicate how well it has worked I want to point out that the average wholesale price of grade A large eggs at Montreal in 1943 was 45 cents a dozen. In 1944 they sold at 41 cents a dozen, and in 1945 at 43 cents a dozen. The average for the first eleven months of 1951 is 67·4 cents per dozen. That is not bad, of course; and that is under the policy we are now following. I might say that at present the price is 55 cents.

In order to give the whole table at one time I think I might just as well continue. The figures for cheese, No. 1, are 1943, 22 cents; 1944, 21 cents and 1945, 21 cents. The average for the first eleven months of 1951 is 37·5 cents. I would point out that the question raised by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth a few moments ago is involved there. Cheese is now handled under a producers board in the province of Ontario, and of course we would not interfere in any way with that handling. As a matter of fact we have not only co-operated with them but advised very strongly that it be handled that way. The figures for butter, No. 1, are 1943, 36 cents; 1944, 36 cents, and 1945, 37 cents. For the first eleven months of 1951 they run from 61·6 to 68 cents a pound.

Then I come to whole milk prices to farmers at dairy, per hundredweight. The exact figure for 1943 is not here, but for 1944 it is $2.50 and for 1945, $2.50. For the first eleven months of 1951 it averages $4.32. For B-1 hogs the figure for 1943 is $16.94; 1944, $17.25 and 1945, $18.20. For the first eleven months of 1951 it is $33.88 per hundredweight. For fancy B.C. McIntosh apples the figure for a 42-pound box for 1943 is $3.36; 1944, $3.07, and 1945, $3.46. This is the first product for which the price was lower in 1951 than in the three years at the end of the war. It is $2.94, but I would remind the committee that in that period the government was giving considerable assistance, because of conditions that existed during the war, in order to bring about the prices to which I have referred.

Then I come to potatoes. For 1943 the figure is $2.26; for 1944, $2.33, and for 1945, $2.57. For the first eleven months of 1951 it is $2.19, but at the present time it is $4. I could review the prices at the present time for the others, but only in respect of potatoes is there sufficient variation from the average for the first eleven months of 1951 to make any considerable difference in the answer that might be given to these questions. That is the present position, and I would only say in conclusion with respect to eggs, about which I was specifically asked, that we think the policy we have followed for the last two years, and which has brought about the results I have indicated, is not one from which we should lightly depart in so far as the interests of the producer are concerned.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask the minister a question.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact I might say that the hon. member for Melfort asked for all the figures with respect to the first three years I have mentioned, and I added the others.

Mr. Coldwell: Will you put the whole table on the record?

Agricultural Products Board

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. The table is as follows:

* Are average of monthly prices,—not weighted average.

Mr. Bryce: The prices the minister has quoted are dealers' prices. They are not the prices to the producers. Am I right?

Mr. Gardiner: They are wholesale prices.

Mr. Bryce: Have you the prices the producers received? That is what we are really interested in. We are not interested in what the dealer gets.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sure the hon. member for Selkirk, who is a practical farmer and who delivers products to the Winnipeg market, will readily agree when I say it would be absolutely impossible for me to go across Canada and get the prices at which these products are sold in every community. It just could not be done. There are, however, estimated averages worked out which are available, and they bear a reasonable relationship to these prices.

Mr. Bryce: I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but why continually look after the dealer? Look after the man who is producing the goods.

Mr. Argue: I was very pleased indeed to hear the minister's announcement that the government is going to continue the present support prices for eggs and bacon for another year. I am only sorry the minister and the government have not agreed to increase the floor price.

Mr. Gardiner: Before the hon. member goes on I should have said, and I want to say it now, that the floor price for butter was set last year for two years. In the meantime we increased the amount we were offering from 58 to 63 cents. That has been allowed to run indefinitely, and we have not received butter. We got about 280,000 pounds at that price, and that is all. The price of 63 cents has run along to date.

Mr. Argue: I am glad to have the minister's further explanation. As he said, the figures he gave the house are averages of the prices prevailing throughout the year. The difficulty with them is that while they appear fairly high, the price for hogs, shall we say, is high when hogs are not coming on the market, and in the fall period when they are coming on the market you have a lower price. A much better policy for agriculture would be a floor price raised or lowered from time to time as farmers' costs of production go up or down. If there were a more adequate floor price for eggs I do not think we would see egg prices reaching the high peaks they have reached over the last year. If the government raised the floor price, it would thereby stimulate production, and that increased production would stop egg, hog, and other prices from going very high. The price the minister has stated is an average price over the year. But for the farmer, the price he receives is highly fluctuating and highly unsatisfactory. In the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix the other day I read that the quoted price for grade A large eggs is now 38 cents in Saskatoon. With the floor price of 38 cents a dozen for grade A large eggs at Montreal, that 38-cent price at Saskatoon can go down a good deal further. After other expenses are deducted the price to the Saskatchewan producer can probably go down to as little as 20 cents a dozen, with the present floor price.

Once again I say that, as far as I am concerned, I am glad the government is staying in the price support field. My only wish was that the prices had been adjusted to take care of the increased cost of production since 1943-45. In those years, 1943-45, because of the British contracts the price for hogs averaged out to $22.25 for Wiltshire sides. Since that time, on the minister's own statement, the cost of production has gone up by 60 per cent. If the farmer is to have the same comparable floor today the price should be $35 or $36 a hundred for Wiltshire sides, with a further increase in the premium. Under the present floor or support price there is no incentive for the farmer to go into the production of hogs, if in the future—as happened this year—the price is going to drop 25 or 30 per cent when the farmer is sending his hogs to market.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to add something further to what the hon. member for Assiniboia has just said with regard to floor prices. Now that we are on subsection 5 of section 4 I guess we can say something about floor prices. The floor price of eggs is absolutely no guarantee at all to the producer of eggs. The only thing it guarantees is that the buyer of those eggs from the producer will get 38 cents plus his storage costs. The plant that buys the eggs from the producer can pay the producer whatever it pleases. It can pay him 20 cents. Still there is no guarantee by this government to the producer of eggs; not a particle.

The minister made a statement with regard to the average prices of products. The average over a year does not mean a thing. As the hon. member for Assiniboia has just said with regard to hogs, when they are high in price, none are coming on the market or if there are, they are few in number. Then when there is a flood of hogs coming in, the price is low. The average is not figured on the basis of how many hogs are coming in. Average prices do not actually mean a thing to the producer. Hogs and eggs are what you might call perishable products. I do not mean to say that the hog is going to spoil if you keep him an extra week. What I mean is that if the producer keeps a hog past the weight when it should be marketed, he is docked probably $5 for doing so. The hog has to be marketed at the time it is of the correct weight, just as the egg has to be marketed when it is fresh. It cannot be kept by the producer for a couple of weeks until the price goes up. Just this fall, at sales or in similar places, I heard a great many producers and farmers make the statement that they were through producing eggs and hogs for that very reason, namely that they had nothing to say about the prices they received, and the product had to be marketed at a particular time.

As to beef cattle or dairy cows, you do not have to sell them today or tomorrow; you can keep them for a month if you want to, or for a year. But as I have said, the situation still is that, as to hogs and eggs particularly, those products have to be marketed at the time they are ready to go to market, and they cannot be held. Therefore, as I have said, the average price does not mean a thing.

The farmers in this country want floor prices. The government is maintaining floor prices on some products, even though we feel they are too low to keep production up to a point which we think is safe even for Canada. Along with that floor price we will accept the ceiling. As producers we think it is a good idea not to have prices go too high because if the price of a product goes too high, the consumer will be forced into another market, an event which is actually to the detriment of the producers of that particular commodity. If the farmers or producers of the country are to be put in that position, then why should not other classes of the community be placed in the same position? In effect this government is guaranteeing, by tariffs, a floor price to industry. Nobody can argue that point. There is a guaranteed floor price to industry across the country. But does the government hold the ceiling? No, there is no ceiling on those products. Yet there is a ceiling, or a practical ceiling, on farm products. When the government puts both classes in the same category I think the farmer will be happy.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words with regard to paragraph (e) of section 4. We have heard a great deal lately from officials of FAO to the effect that the production of food in the world is barely keeping up with the increase in population; and they are calling for the highest possible production of food by the various nations. Is the government anxious that the farmers of this country increase their production of food to the highest level, that is, along special lines? If the farmers do that, have they any assurance that, if any surpluses occur the government will find a market for them? If that surplus is of a commodity that is perishable, have they any assurance that the government will then provide for storage or for the processing of that commodity so it can be kept over until such time as it may be made available to a nation that needs it?

The minister may say that the United States did a good deal of that sort of thing last year, and that some of the products that were processed deteriorated on their hands. That is true; but the United States did not make those commodities available to many nations that would have taken them, provided ways and means had been worked out to make the transfer. Last year FAO faced that problem. A special committee was set up to find ways and means of making this surplus available to nations that required it, and it proposed an international commodity clearing house. Canada voted against that proposal. If I remember rightly the Minister of Agriculture was one of the delegates who voted against that proposal; and one of the reasons he gave was that there in that proposal nothing that could not be carried out by Canada on her own as an individual nation. So we come back to the question: in the event of any surplus occurring, is Canada prepared to find ways and means of getting that surplus food to the nations that require it, even though we have not the type of exchange we want in return? Again I come down to the point: is the government today asking the farmers of this country to expand their production to the highest level possible with the guarantee that if they do so they will not be penalized by having surplus goods left on their hands?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I would speak on the question were it not for the fact that at least two or three members have made much the same statement just made by the hon. member for Acadia. The fact is that from the time FAO was first set up the government of Canada supported Sir John Orr in his proposal, which was along the lines of the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for Acadia and others. I believe that on two occasions, probably three, I was the representative of this country and the government's position was clearly stated as being favourable to Sir John Orr's proposal. Then there was the Washington meeting to which reference has been made. I have not given the answer at any time that Canada could do the job as well herself.

The statement I did make had to do with wheat, and it was to the effect that Canada had carried 600 million bushels of wheat throughout the last half of the war, and not at the cost of Canada but at the cost of the wheat grower. My statement was that if 200,000 farmers in Canada could carry 600 million bushels of wheat, surely a group of nations could carry the comparatively small amount which they would be required to carry in order to take care of the surpluses that might occur elsewhere. It was that argument that we advanced. In the face of that argument the countries that were most capable of financing any such proposition refused to do so. All Canada ever did in the matter was to say that it would be an impossible position for Canada to head a group of nations who would find it impossible to finance such a proposition, so Canada could not vote for something she could not possibly carry out. Canada voted against that. We still maintain that if all the countries of the world, and particularly those most capable of financing, wish to follow such a plan, then Canada would be in a position to consider the matter again and express her point of view with regard to it. But so long as the situation is that those who might be expected to do the greater part of the financing are opposed to it, Canada certainly is not going to step in and try to finance alone the feeding, let us say, of the suffering people in China. That is all that has been said. The position Canada has taken from time to time has made that quite clear.

We are saying to the farmers of Canada, go ahead and produce for the markets that are available. The farmers are doing that rather successfully, and they are getting a fair return for what they produce.

Mr. Wright: I am very pleased indeed to have that statement about Canada's position, because I am afraid the minister's position with regard to the Washington meetings has been misinterpreted.

Mr. Gardiner: My statements have always been misinterpreted by certain people.

Mr. Knowles: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Wright: Whose fault is that? If the minister reads his own speech he will find it is not very clear.

Mr. Harkness: The minister often misinterprets himself.

Mr. Wright: The minister has made a statement in this house that in the setting of floor prices—if the minister would talk to me instead of someone else—

Mr. Gardiner: I have heard what you have to say so often that I know what you are going to say.

An hon. Member: The minister made a statement in Regina.

Mr. Wright: He says too much where he should not say it, and not enough where he should. The minister made a statement in this house that in the setting of floor prices the government had regard to the prices which obtained between 1943 and 1945. Just a few minutes ago the minister put certain figures on the record, and I have some figures here in the form of a return. These figures show that in the years 1943-45 grade A eggs averaged 43 cents a dozen. The minister has told us that the government has set a floor price for the packers or buyers of those eggs—

Mr. Gardiner: That illustrates exactly what I said a moment ago. My friend is misinterpreting me—

Mr. Wright: Is the minister making a speech or stating a point of privilege?

Mr. Gardiner: I am speaking to a point of privilege.

Mr. Wright: Then perhaps you should say so.

Mr. Gardiner: I just stated that there is no floor under eggs. We are not setting a floor price there, from day to day as we do for butter. We are saying that we will buy any eggs that are in storage at the end of the year at 38 cents a dozen.

Mr. Wright: You are buying eggs at the end of the year that the packers may have in storage, or that anyone else has in storage, at 38 cents a dozen. In effect, that is setting a floor for the packers or the other people who have their eggs in storage.

Mr. Gardiner: Including the member for Melfort, if he has any.

Mr. Wright: There is no doubt about that, because you say you will purchase them at that price. This price bears no relationship to the statement that the 1943-45 period will be used in establishing floor prices for agricultural products. If the floor were established on that basis, the average price for those three years was 43 cents so the floor would be at least 60 per cent higher than that.

The minister has made the statement that he listened to the representations of the egg producers. He indicated to this house that they were satisfied with the 38 cents the government guaranteed to the packers at the end of the year. Did those people who made the representations on behalf of the producers not ask for anything more than that? Were they satisfied?

Mr. Gardiner: They did not say anything about the packers at all. We did not guarantee the packers.

Mr. Wright: That is not the question I asked. Were they satisfied with the 38 cents guaranteed to the packers?

Mr. Gardiner: You said more than that.

Mr. Wright: I am asking for an answer. Since there is no answer, I take it that the producers were not satisfied. But they would be satisfied if the minister put into practice what he stated should be the guiding principle of setting floor prices, that is using 1943-45 as a guide.

In this statement he has given me it says that British Columbia McIntosh apples averaged $3.25 a box during that period. When it came time for the government to put a floor price under apples they certainly did not use the 1943-45 formula. The statement shows that Canada No. 1 potatoes averaged approximately $2.40 during that period. If my memory serves me correctly, when the government placed a floor under New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island potatoes it was approximately 75 cents, and did not bear any relationship to these figures.

In this return which I have in my hand the support price in December of this year for Wiltshire sides at Montreal is quoted at $31.04. I want the minister to tell me just how the disparity arose between the $32.50 which he has been quoting and the $31.04 which is shown on the return.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Wright: No, I asked the minister certain questions. I want to know if he can explain these differences.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think I should have to answer the question three or four times.

Mr. Wright: The minister has never answered this question, because it is the first time I have asked it.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend will read the statement I made a few moments ago he will find an answer to all the questions he has asked. When he asked for that return, if he had asked for all the information he is now asking about, he would have got that information. That was not what he asked for. He asked for prices, which would make it possible for him to use certain arguments. I have given the committee that information and it will be on Hansard, and I feel it will answer all that has been said with the possible exception of the reference to potatoes and apples. I might say in that regard that the price received by the producers of apples in those war years was to a very large extent the amount which was put up by the government to support the price at that time for certain reasons, as I indicated.

The other matter is quite different. In concluding my remarks on it I might answer what has been said and what was said previously by just reading what has been decided on the other side of the line. My friends have been saying that we ought to do the same. Here is what they decided and announced on November 30, very recently:

> Promising as much help as possible, the department said it would be prepared to support producer prices of corn, cotton, wheat, rice, soybeans, wool, milk and butterfat at maximum levels permitted by law. That level is 90 per cent of parity.
> However, no supports were promised for hogs, beef cattle, poultry, eggs and other perishable products. None of these products is being supported this year.

I just read that in order to give the latest information that is available on it in order to indicate that the policy which is being advocated by some was followed in the United States, and they have come to the conclusion that they cannot carry on with that policy with perishable products any further. The products we are discussing here this afternoon are largely in that class. If I may say so, our policy has worked out better than the policy followed in the United States.

Mr. Wright: In answer to that I would just say that in Canada we have not one agricultural product at the present time supported by a parity price. At least they have a few in the United States, the major products. The minister still has not answered my question as to whether the representatives of the egg producers asked for anything more than the 38 cents guaranteed to the packers or others who had eggs to deliver at the end of the year.

Mr. Gardiner: Some asked for 42 cents the year we first set it at 38 cents, and we set it at 38 cents. They all came back at the end of the year and said it had worked satisfactorily, and asked us to re-establish it just as it was. A few people have been writing in this year and saying that it should be 42 cents, and actually a few had it up to 43 cents. But in so far as the general producers and handlers of eggs are concerned, no general representation has been made that it should be changed, and we are leaving it as it is.

Mr. Fair: After listening to the discussion during the last ten or fifteen minutes I should like to ask the minister whether I am correct in assuming that at the present time there is no producer floor price for eggs?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a system which is being followed in handling eggs which has resulted in the farmer having the highest price for his eggs in the last eleven months that he ever obtained in any eleven months of any year.

Mr. Fair: That is all gone by. What of the future?

Mr. Gardiner: It is not a matter of how it is done; it is a matter of what results from what is done.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Fair: There is no guaranteed floor price for the producer for the remainder of the present year? That would be correct, would it not? There is no reply.
